consecrate

Henceforth to Hades. I believe, the sword —

Its office was to cut the soul at once From life, — from something in this world which hides

Truth, and hides falsehood, and so lets us
live

Somehow. Suppose a rider furls a cloak About a horse's head; unfrightened, so, Between the menace of a flame, between Solicitation of the pasturage, Untempted equally, he goes his gait 70
To journey's end: then pluck the pharos off!

Show what delusions steadied him i' the
straight

O' the path, made grass seem fire and fire seem grass,

All through a little bandage o'er the eyes!
As certainly with eyes unbanded now

Alkestis looked upon the action here, Self-immolation for Admetos' sake;

Saw, with a new sense, all her death would
do,

And which of her survivors had the right,
And which the less right, to survive thereby. 80

For, you shall note, she uttered no one
word

Of love more to her husband, though he wept

Plenteously, waxed importunate in prayer —

Folly's old fashion when its seed bears fruit.

I think she judged that she had bought the ware

O' the seller at its value, — nor praised
him

Nor blamed herself, but, with indifferent
eye,

Saw him purse money up, prepare to leave The buyer with a solitary bale —

True purple — but in place of all that coin, 9

Had made a hundred others happy too, If so willed fate or fortune! What remained

To give away, should rather go to these Than one with coin to clink and contemplate.

Admetos had his share and might depart,
The rest was for her children and herself.
(Charopé makes a face: but wait awhile!)
She saw things plain as Gods do: by one stroke

O' the sword that rends the life-long veil away.

10 (Also Euripides saw plain enough:
But you and I, Charopé! — you and I Will trust his sight until our own grow clear.)

"Sun, and thou light of day, and heavenly dance

O' the fleet cloud-figure!" (so her passion paused,

While the awe-stricken husband made his moan,

Muttered now this now that ineptitude:
"Sun that sees thee and me, a suffering pair,

Who did the Gods no wrong whence thou shouldst die!")

Then, as if caught up, carried in their course,

20 Fleeting and free as cloud and sunbeam are,

She missed no happiness that lay beneath:
"O thou wide earth, from these my palace roofs,

To distant nuptial chambers once my own
In that folk of my ancestry!" —

There the flight failed her. "Raise thee, wretched one!

Give us not up! Pray pity from the Gods!"

Vainly Admetos: for "I see it — see The two-oared boat! The ferryer of the dead,

Charon, hand hard upon the boatman's pole,

30 Calls me — even now calls — 'Why delayest thou?

Quick! Thou obstructest all made ready here

For prompt departure: quick, then!"

"Woe is me!
A bitter voyage this to undergo,
Even i' the telling! Adverse Powers above, How do ye plague us!"

Then a shiver ran:
"He has me — seest not? — hales me, — who is it? —

To the hall o' the Dead — ah, who but Hades' self,

He, with the wings there, glares at me, one gaze

All that blue brilliance, under the eyebrow!

What wilt thou do? Unhand me! Such a way

I have to traverse, all unhappy one!"

"Way — piteous to thy friends, but, most of all,

Me and thy children: ours assuredly
A common partnership in grief like this!"

Whereat they closed about her; but "Let be!

Leave, let me lie now! Strength forsakes my feet.

Hades is here, and shadowy on my eyes Comes the night creeping. Children — children, now

Indeed, a mother is no more for you!
Farewell, O children, long enjoy the light!"

"Ah me, the melancholy word I hear, Oppressive beyond every kind of death!
No, by the Deities, take heart nor dare To give me up — no, by our children too Made orphans of! But rise, be resolute, Since, thou departed, I no more remain!
For in thee are we bound up, to exist Or cease to be — so we adore thy love!"

— Which brought out truth to judgment.
At this word

And protestation, all the truth in her Claimed to assert itself: she waved away
The blue-eyed black-wing'd phantom, held in check

The advancing pageantry of Hades there,
And, with no change in her own countenance,

She fixed her eyes on the protesting man,
And let her lips unlock their sentence, — so!

"Admetos, — how things go with me thou seest, —

I wish to tell thee, ere I die, what things I will should follow. I — to honour thee, Secure for thee, by my own soul's exchange,
Die for thee — yet, if so I pleased, might live,

Nay, wed what man of Thessaly I would,
And dwell i' the dome with pomp and queenliness.

I would not, — would not live bereft of thee,

With children orphaned, neither shrank at all,

Though having gifts of youth wherein I joyed.

Yet, who begot thee and who gave thee birth,

Both of these gave thee up; no less, a term

Of life was reached when death became them well,

Ay, well — to save their child and glorious die:

Since thou wast all they had, nor hope remained

Of having other children in thy place.

So, I and thou had lived out our full time, Nor thou, left lonely of thy wife, wouldst groan

With children reared in orphanage: but thus

Some God disposed things, willed they so should be.

Be they so! Now do thou remember this,
Do me in turn a favour — favour, since to Certainly I shall never claim my due,

For nothing is more precious than a life:
But a fit favour, as thyself wilt say,

Loving our children here no less than I,
If head and heart be sound in thee at least.

Uphold them, make them masters of my house,

Nor wed and give a step-dame to the pair,
Who, being a worse wife than I, thro' spite

Will raise her hand against both thine and mine.

Never do this at least, I pray to thee!

to For hostile the new-comer, the step-dame

To the old brood — a very viper she For gentleness! Here stand they, boy and girl;

The boy has got a father, a defence

Tower-like, he speaks to and has answer from:

But thou, my girl, how will thy virginhood Conclude itself in marriage fittingly?

Upon what sort of sire-found yoke-fellow Art thou to chance? with all to apprehend —

30 Lest, casting on thee some unkind report,

She blast thy nuptials in the bloom of youth.
For neither shall thy mother watch thee

wed,
Nor hearten thee in childbirth, standing by Just when a mother's presence helps the most!

No, for I have to die: and this my ill Comes to me, nor to-morrow, no, nor yet

The third day of the month, but now, even now,

I shall be reckoned among those no more.
Farewell, be happy! And to thee, indeed,

40 Husband, the boast remains permissible

Thou hadst a wife was worthy! and to you, Children; as good a mother gave you birth."

"Have courage!" interposed the friends,
"For him

I have no scruple to declare — all this Will he perform, except he fail of sense."

"All this shall be — shall be!" Admetos sobbed:

"Fear not! And, since I had thee living,
dead

Alone wilt thou be called my wife: no fear

That some Thessalian ever styles herself Bride, hails this man for husband in thy place!

No woman, be she of such lofty line 50
Or such surpassing beauty otherwise!

Enough of children: gain from these I have,
Such only may the Gods grant! since in thee

Absolute is our loss, where all was gain.
And I shall bear for thee no year-long grief,

But grief that lasts while my own days last, love!

Love! For my hate is she who bore me,
now:

And him I hate, my father: loving-ones Truly, in word not deed! But thou didst

pay
All dearest to thee down, and buy my life, 60

Saving me so! Is there not cause enough That I who part with such companionship

In thee, should make my moan? I moan, and more:

For I will end the feastings — social flow O' the wine friends flock for, garlands and the Muse

That graced my dwelling. Never now
for me

To touch the lyre, to lift my soul in song
At summons of the Lydian flute; since thou

From out my life hast emptied all the joy!
And this thy body, in thy likeness wrought 70

By some wise hand of the artificers, Shall lie disposed within my marriage-bed:

This I will fall on, this enfold about, Call by thy name, — my dear wife in my arms Even though I have not, I shall seem to have —

A cold delight, indeed, but all the same

So should I lighten of its weight my soul!
And, wandering my way in dreams per-

chance,
Thyself wilt bless me: for, come when they

will,
Even by night our loves are sweet to see. 80

But were the tongue and tune of Orpheus
mine,

So that to Koré¹ crying, or her lord, In hymns, from Hades I might rescue

thee —
Down would I go, and neither Plouton's dog Nor Charon, he whose oar sends souls

across,
Should stay me till again I made thee stand

Living, within the light! But, failing this, There, where thou art, await me when I

die,
Make ready our abode, my house-mare

still!
For in the self-same cedar, me with thee 94

Will I provide that these our friends shall place,

¹ Proserpine.

My side lay close by thy side! Never,
corpse
Although I be, would I division bear From thee, my faithful one of all the world!"

So he stood sobbing: nowise insincere, But somehow child-like, like his children,
like

Childishness the world over. What was new

In this announcement that his wife must
die?

What particle of pain beyond the pact
He made, with eyes wide open, long ago — 10 Made and was, if not glad, content to make?

Now that the sorrow, he had called for,
came,

He sorrowed to the height: none heard him say,

However, what would seem so pertinent,
"To keep this pact, I find surpass my
power:

Rescind it, Moirai! Give me back her
life,

And take the life I kept by base exchange!
Or, failing that, here stands your laughingstock

Foiled by you, worthy just the fate o' the fool

Who makes a pother to escape the best 20 And gain the worst you wiser Powers allot!"

No, not one word of this: nor did his wife

Despite the sobbing, and the silence soon To follow, judge so much was in his thought —

Fancy that, should the Moirai acquiesce,
He would relinquish life nor let her die.

The man was like some merchant who, in storm,

Throws the freight over to redeem the ship:
No question, saving both were better still.
As it was, — why, he sorrowed, which sufficed.

30 So, all she seemed to notice in his speech Was what concerned her children. Children, too,

Bear the grief and accept the sacrifice.

Rightly rules nature: does the blossomed bough

O' the grape-vine, or the dry grape's self, bleed wine?

So, bending to her children all her love,
She fastened on their father's only word To purpose now, and followed it with this.

"O children, now yourselves have heard these things —

Your father saying he will never wed 40 Another woman to be over you, Nor yet dishonour me!"

"And now at least I say it, and I will accomplish too!"

"Then, for such promise of accomplishment,
Take from my hand these children!"

"Thus I take — Dear gift from the dear hand!"

"Do thou become Mother, now, to these children in my
place!"

"Great the necessity I should be so,
At least, to these bereaved of thee!"

"Child — child!
Just when I needed most to live, below Am I departing from you both!" 50

"Ah me!
And what shall I do, then, left lonely thus?"

"Time will appease thee: who is dead is nought."

"Take me with thee — take, by the Gods below!"

"We are sufficient, we who die for thee."

"Oh, Powers, ye widow me of what a
wife!"

"And truly the dimmed eye draws earth-ward now!"

"Wife, if thou leav'st me, I am lost indeed!"

"She once was — now is nothing, thou mayst say."

"Raise thy face nor forsake thy children
thus!"

"Ah, willingly indeed I leave them not! 60 But — fare ye well, my children!"

"Look on them — Look!"

"I am nothingness."

"What dost thou? Leav'st . . ."

"Farewell."

And in the breath she passed away.
"Undone — me miserable!" moaned the
king,

While friends released the long-suspended sigh

"Gone is she: no wife for Admetos more!"

Such was the signal: how the woe broke
forth,

Why tell? — or how the children's tears ran fast Bidding their father note the eyelids' stare, Hands' droop, each dreadful circumstance of death.

"Ay, she hears not, she sees not: I and you,
 'Tis plain, are stricken hard and have to bear!"

Was all Admetos answered; for, I judge,
 He only now began to taste the truth:
 The thing done lay revealed, which undone
 thing,

Rehearsed for fact by fancy, at the best,
 Never can equal. He had used himself
 This long while (as he muttered presently) To practise with the terms, the blow involved

By the bargain, sharp to bear, but bearable Because of plain advantage at the end.
 Now that, in fact not fancy, the blow fell — Needs must he busy him with the surprise.
 "Alkestis — not to see her nor be seen, Hear nor be heard of by her, any more
 To-day, to-morrow, to the end of time — Did I mean this should buy my life?"
 thought he.

So, friends came round him, took him by the hand,
 Bade him remember our mortality,
 Its due, its doom: how neither was he first, Nor would be last, to thus deplore the loved.

"I understand" slow the words came at
 last.

"Nor of a sudden did the evil here Fly on me: I have known it long ago, Ay, and essayed myself in misery; Nothing is new. You have to stay, you
 friends,

Because the next need is to carry forth
 The corpse here: you must stay and do your part,

Chant proper pæan to the God below;
 Drink-sacrifice he likes not. I decree That all Thessalians over whom I rule hold grief in common with me; let them shear

Their locks, and be the peplos black they show!

And you who to the chariot yoke your steeds,

Or manage steeds one-frontleted, — I
 charge,

Clip from each neck with steel the mane
 away!

And through my city, nor of flute nor lyre

Be there a sound till twelve full moons succeed.

For I shall never bury any corpse Dearer than this to me, nor better friend:

One worthy of all honour from me, since Me she has died for, she and she alone."

With that, he sought the inmost of the house,

He and his dead, to get grave's garniture, While the friends sang the pæan that should peal.

"Daughter of Pelias, with farewell from
 me,

I' the house of Hades have thy unsunned 5
 home!

Let Hades know, the dark-haired deity, —
 And he who sits to row and steer alike, Old corpse-conductor, let him know he bears

Over the Acherontian lake, this time, I' the two-oared boat, the best — oh, best by far

Of womankind! For thee, Alkestis Queen!
 Many a time those haunters of the Muse Shall sing thee to the seven-stringed mountain-shell,

And glorify in hymns that need no harp,
 At Sparta when the cycle comes about, 60 And that Karneian month wherein the moon

Rises and never sets the whole night
 through:

So too at splendid and magnificent Athenai. Such the spread of thy renown,
 And such the lay that, dying, thou hast left Singer and sayer. O that I availed Of my own might to send thee once again From Hades' hall, Kokutos' stream, by help

O' the oar that dips the river, back to day!"

So, the song sank to prattle in her praise: 70
 "Light, from above thee, lady, fall the
 earth,

Thou only one of womankind to die, Wife for her husband! If Admetos take Anything to him like a second spouse — Hate from his offspring and from us shall
 be

His portion, let the king assure himself!
 No mind his mother had to hide in earth
 Her body for her son's sake, nor his sire Had heart to save whom he begot, — not
 they,

The white-haired wretches! only thou it 80
 was,

I' the bloom of youth, didst save him and so die!

Might it be mine to chance on such a mate
 And partner! For there's penury in life Of such allowance: were she mine at least,
 So wonderful a wife, assuredly She would companion me throughout my days

And never once bring sorrow!"

A great voice —

"My hosts here!"

Oh, the thrill that ran through us Never was aught so good and opportune As that great interrupting voice! For see!
Here maundered this dispirited old age Before the palace; whence a something crept

Which told us well enough without a word
What was a-doing inside,—every touch
O' the garland on those temples, tenderest Disposure of each arm along its side,

10 Came putting out what warmth? the world was left.

Then, as it happens at a sacrifice When, drop by drop, some lustral bath is brimmed:

Into the thin and clear and cold, at once They, slaughter a whole wine-skin:
Bacchos' blood

Sets the white water all a-flame; even so, Sudden into the midst of sorrow, leapt Along with the gay cheer of that great
voice,

Hope, joy, salvation: Herakles was here!
Himself, o' the threshold, sent his voice on
first

20 To herald all that human and divine I' the weary happy face of him,—half
God,

Half man, which made the god-part God
the more.

"Hosts mine," he broke upon the sorrow
with,

"Inhabitants of this Pheraia soil, Chance I upon Admetos inside here?"

The irresistible sound wholesome heart O' the hero,—more than all the mighti-
ness

At labour in the limbs that, for man's sake, Labour'd and meant to labour their life long,—

30 This drove back, dried up sorrow at its source.

How could it brave the happy weary laugh Of who had bantered sorrow, "Sorrow
here?"

What have you done to keep your friend from harm?

Could no one give the life I see he keeps?
Or, say there's sorrow here past friendly
help,

Why waste a word or let a tear escape
While other sorrows wait you in the world,
And want the life of you, though helpless
here?"

Clearly there was no telling such an one

40 How, when their monarch tried who loved him more

Than he loved them, and found they loved,
as he,

Each man, himself, and held, no otherwise,
That, of all evils in the world, the worst

Was — being forced to die, whate'er death
gain:

How all this selfishness in him and them Caused certain sorrow which they sang
about,—

I think that Herakles, who held his life Out on his hand, for any man to take — I think his laugh had marred their threnody.

"He is in the house," they answered. 50

After all,
They might have told the story, talked their best

About the inevitable sorrow here, Nor changed nor checked the kindly nature,—no!

So long as men were merely weak, not bad, He loved men: were they Gods he used to
help?

"Yea, Pheres' son is in-doors, Herakles.
But say, what sends thee to Thessalian soil, Brought by what business to this Pherai
town?"

"A certain labour that I have to do Eurustheus the Tirunthian," laughed the 60
God.

"And whither wendest — on what wandering

Bound now?" (they had an instinct, guessed what meant

Wanderings, labours, in the God's light
mouth.)

"After the Thrakian Diomedes' car With the four horses."

"Ah, but canst thou that?
Art inexperienced in thy host to be?"

"All-inexperienced: I have never gone As yet to the land o' the Bistones."

"Then, look
By no means to be master of the steeds Without a battle!" 70

"Battle there may be:
I must refuse no labour, all the same."

"Certainly, either having slain a foe Wilt thou return to us, or, slain thyself, Stay there!"

"And, even if the game be so,
The risk in it were not the first I run."

"But, say thou overpower the lord o' the
place,
What more advantage dost expect
thereby?"

"I shall drive off his horses to the king."

"No easy handling them to bit the jaw!"

"Easy enough; except, at least, they breathe
Fire from their nostrils!"
"But they mince up men With those quick jaws!"

"You talk of provender For mountain-beasts, and not mere horses' food!"

Thou mayst behold their mangers caked with gore!"

"And of what sire does he who bred them
boast Himself the son?"

"Of Ares, king o' the targe — Thrakian, of gold throughout."

Another laugh.
"Why, just the labour, just the lot for me Dost thou describe in what I recognise!
Since hard and harder, high and higher
yet,

Truly this lot of mine is like to go
If I must needs join battle with the brood Of Ares: ay, I fought Lukaon first,
And again, Kuknos: now engage in strife This third time, with such horses and such lord.

But there is nobody shall ever see Alkmené's son shrink foemen's hand
before!"

— "Or ever hear him say" (the Chorus
thought)

"That death is terrible; and help us so
To chime in — 'terrible beyond a doubt,
And, if to thee, why, to ourselves much
more:

Know what has happened, then, and sympathise'!"

Therefore they gladly stopped the dialogue, Shifted the burthen to new shoulder
straight,

As, "Look where comes the lord o' the land, himself,

Admetos, from the palace!" they outbroke
In some surprise, as well as much relief.

What had induced the king to waive his right

And luxury of woe in loneliness?

Out he came quietly; the hair was clipt,
And the garb sable; else no outward sign Of sorrow as he came and faced his friend.
Was truth fast terrifying tears away?

"Hail, child of Zeus, and sprung from Perseus too!"

The salutation ran without a fault.

"And thou, Admetos, King of Thessaly!"

"Would, as thou wishest me, the grace might fall!

But my good-wisher, that thou art, I know."

"What's here? these shorn locks, this sad 4' show of thee?"

"I must inter a certain corpse to-day."

"Now, from thy children God avert mis-
chance!"

"They live, my children; all are in the
house!"

"Thy father — if 'tis he departs indeed, His age was ripe at least."

"My father lives,
And she who bore me lives too, Herakles."

"It cannot be thy wife Alkestis gone?"

"Two-fold the tale is, I can tell of her."

"Dead dost thou speak of her, or living
yet?"

"She is — and is not: hence the pain to 50
me!"

"I learn no whit the more, so dark thy speech!"

"Know'st thou not on what fate she needs must fall?"

"I know she is resigned to die for thee."

"How lives she still, then, if submitting
so?"

"Eh, weep her not beforehand! wait till
then!"

"Who is to die is dead; doing is done."

"To be and not to be are thought diverse."

"Thou judgest this — I, that way, Herakles!"

"Well, but declare what causes thy complaint!

Who is the man has died from out thy 60
friends?"

"No man: I had a woman in my mind."

"Alien, or someone born akin to thee?"

"Alien: but still related to my house."

"How did it happen then that here she died?"

"Her father dying left his orphan here."

"Alas, Admetos — would we found thee
 gay,
 Not grieving!"

"What as if about to do Subjoinest thou that comment?"

I shall seek Another hearth, proceed to other hosts."

"Never, O king, shall that be! No such ill Betide me!"

"Nay, to mourners should there
 come
 A guest, he proves importunate!"

"The dead —
 Dead are they: but go thou within my
 house!"

"'Tis base carousing beside friends who mourn."

20 "The guest-rooms, whither we shall lead thee, lie Apart from ours."

"Nay, let me go my way!
 Ten thousandfold the favour I shall thank!"

"It may not be thou goest to the hearth Of any man but me!" so made an end Admetos, softly and decisively, Of the altercation. Herakles forbore:
 And the king bade a servant lead the way, Open the guest-rooms ranged remote from view

O' the main hall; tell the functionaries,
 next,

25 They had to furnish forth a plenteous feast,
 And then shut close the doors o' the hall, midway,

"Because it is not proper friends who feast Should hear a groaning or be grieved," quoth he.

Whereat the hero, who was truth itself,
 Let out the smile again, repressed awhile Like fountain-brilliance one forbids to play.

He did too many grandnesses, to note
 Much in the meaner things about his path:
 And stepping there, with face towards the sun,

30 Stopped seldom to pluck weeds or ask their names.

Therefore he took Admetos at the word:
 This trouble must not hinder any more A true heart from good will and pleasant ways.

And so, the great arm, which had slain the snake, Strained his friend's head a moment in embrace

On that broad breast beneath the lion's hide,

Till the king's cheek winced at the thick rough gold;

And then strode off, with who had care of
 him,

To the remote guest-chamber: glad to give Poor flesh and blood their respite and relief

In the interval 'twixt fight and fight again —
 All for the world's sake. Our eyes followed him,

Be sure, till those mid-doors shut us outside.

The king, too, watched great Herakles go off All faith, love, and obedience to a friend.

And when they questioned him, the simple ones,

"What dost thou? Such calamity to face, Lies full before thee — and thou art so bold

As play the host, Admetos? Hast thy wits?"

He replied calmly to each chiding tongue: 50
 "But if from house and home I forced
 away

A coming guest, wouldst thou have praised me more?

No, truly! since calamity were mine, Nowise diminished; while I showed myself Unhappy and inhospitable too:

So adding to my ills this other ill,
 That mine were styled a stranger-hating
 house.

Myself have ever found this man the best Of entertainers when I went his way To parched and thirsty Argos." 60

"If so be —
 Why didst thou hide what destiny was here, When one came that was kindly, as thou say'st?"

"He never would have willed to cross my door

Had he known aught of my calamities.
 And probably to some of you I seem Unwise enough in doing what I do; Such will scarce praise me: but these halls of mine

Know not to drive off and dishonour guests."

And so, the duty done, he turned once more
 To go and busy him about his dead. 70

As for the sympathisers left to muse, There was a change, a new light thrown on things,

Contagion from the magnanimity O' the man whose life lay on his hand so
 light,

As up he stepped, pursuing duty still "Higher and harder," as he laughed and
 said.

Somehow they found no folly now in the act They blamed erewhile: Admetos' private grief

Shrank to a somewhat pettier obstacle I' the way o' the world: they saw good days had been,

And good days, peradventure, still might
be,

Now that they overlooked the present cloud Heavy upon the palace opposite.

And soon the thought took words and music thus.

"Harbour of many a stranger, free to
friend,

10 Ever and always, O thou house o' the man
We mourn for! The Apollon's very self,
The lyric Puthian,¹ deigned inhabit once, Become a shepherd here in thy domains, And pipe, adown the winding hill-side paths,

Pastoral marriage-poems to thy flocks
At feed: while with them fed in fellowship, Through joy i' the music, spot-skin lynxes,
ay,

And lions too, the bloody company, Came, leaving Othrus' dell;² and round thy lyre,

20 Phoibos, there danced the speckle-coated fawn,
Pacing on lightsome fetlock past the pines Tress-topped, the creature's natural boundary,

Into the open everywhere; such heart
Had she within her, beating joyous beats,
At the sweet reassurance of thy song!
Therefore the lot o' the master is, to live In a home multitudinous with herds, Along by the fair-flowing Boibian lake,³ Limited, that ploughed land and pasture-
plain,

30 Only where stand the sun's steeds, stabled west

I' the cloud, by that mid-air which makes the clime

Of those Molossoi: and he rules as well O'er the Aigaian, up to Pelion's shore, — Sea-stretch without a port! Such lord have we:

And here he opens house now, as of old,
Takes to the heart of it a guest again:
Though moist the eyelid of the master, still Mourning his dear wife's body, dead but
now!"

And they admired: nobility of soul 40 Was self-impelled to reverence, they saw:
The best men ever prove the wisest too: Something instinctive guides them still aright.

¹ Apollo was so called on account of his victory over the Python.

² The home of the Centaurs in Thessaly.

³ In Thessaly.

And on each soul this boldness settled now,
That one, who revered the Gods so
much,

Would prosper yet: (or — I could wish it ran —

Who venerates the Gods, i' the main will still

Practise things honest though obscure to judge).

They ended, for Admetos entered now;
Having disposed all duteously indoors,
He came into the outside world again, 50
Quiet as ever: but a quietude Bent on pursuing its descent to truth,
As who must grope until he gain the ground
O' the dungeon doomed to be his dwelling
now.

Already high o'er head was piled the dusk, When something pushed to stay his downward step,

Pluck back despair just reaching its repose.
He would have bidden the kind presence
there

Observe that, — since the corpse was coming out,
Cared for in all things that befitted the case, 60 Carried aloft, in decency and state, To the last burial place and burning pile, —
'Twere proper friends addressed, as custom prompts,

Alkestis bound on her last journeying.

"Ay, for we see thy father," they subjoined
"Advancing as the aged foot best may;
His servants, too: each bringing in his hand Adornments for thy wife, all pomp that's due

To the downward-dwelling people." And in truth,

By slow procession till they filled the stage, 70 Came Pheres, and his following, and their gifts.

You see, the worst of the interruption was,
It plucked back, with an over-hasty hand, Admetos from descending to the truth, (I told you) — put him on the brink again, Full i' the noise and glare where late he stood:

With no fate fallen and irrevocable, But all things subject still to chance and
change:

And that chance — life, and that change — happiness.

And with the low strife came the little 80
mind:

He was once more the man might gain so
much,

Life too and wife too, would his friends but help!

All he felt now was that there faced him
one

Supposed the likeliest, in emergency,
To help: and help, by mere self-sacrifice

So natural, it seemed as if the sire Must needs lie open still to argument, Withdraw the rash decision, not to die But rather live, though death would save his son: —

Argument like the ignominious grasp O' the drowner whom his fellow grasps as fierce,

Each marvelling that the other needs must hold

Head out of water, though friend choke
thereby.

And first the father's salutation fell.

10 Burthened, he came, in common with his
child,

Who lost, none would gainsay, a good chaste spouse:

Yet such things must be borne, though hard to bear.

"So, take this tribute of adornment, deep In the earth let it descend along with her!
Behoves we treat the body with respect — Of one who died, at least, to save thy
life,

Kept me from being childless, nor allowed
That I, bereft of thee, should peak and pine In melancholy age! she, for the sex,

20 All of her sisters, put in evidence,
By daring such a feat, that female life Might prove more excellent than men suppose.

O thou Alkestis!" out he burst in fine,
"Who, while thou savedst this my son, didst raise

Also myself from sinking, — hail to thee!
Well be it with thee even in the house Of Hades! I maintain, if mortals must Marry, this sort of marriage is the sole Permitted those among them who are wise!"

30 So his oration ended. Like hates like:
Accordingly Admetos, — full i' the face Of Pheres, his true father, outward shape And inward fashion, body matching soul, — Saw just himself when years should do their work

And reinforce the selfishness inside
Until it pushed the last disguise away:
As when the liquid metal cools i' the mould, Stands forth a statue: bloodless, hard, cold bronze.

So, in old Pheres, young Admetos showed, 40 Pushed to completion: and a shudder ran,
And his repugnance soon had vent in
speech:

Glad to escape outside, nor, pent within,
Find itself there fit food for exercise.

"Neither to this interment called by me

Comest thou, nor thy presence I account Among the covetable proofs of love.

As for thy tribute of adornment, — no!
Ne'er shall she don it, ne'er in debt to thee

Be buried! What is thine, that keep thou
still!

Then it behoved thee to commiserate 50 When I was perishing: but thou — who stood'st

Foot-free o' the snare, wast acquiescent
then

That I, the young, should die, not thou, the old —

Wilt thou lament this corpse thyself hast slain?

Thou wast not, then, true father to this
flesh;

Nor she, who makes profession of my birth And styles herself my mother, neither she Bore me: but, come of slave's blood, I was cast

Stealthily 'neath the bosom of thy wife!
Thou showedst, put to touch, the thing thou 60
art,

Nor I esteem myself born child of thee!
Otherwise, thine is the preëminence

O'er all the world in cowardice of soul:
Who, being the old man thou art, arrived

Where life should end, didst neither will nor dare

Die for thy son, but left the task to her,
The alien woman, whom I well might think

Own, only mother both and father too!
And yet a fair strife had been thine to strive,

— Dying for thy own child; and brief for 70
thee

In any case, the rest of time to live;
While I had lived, and she, our rest of time, Nor I been left to groan in solitude.

Yet certainly all things which happy man Ought to experience, thy experience grasped.

Thou wast a ruler through the bloom of
youth,

And I was son to thee, recipient due
Of sceptre and demesne, — no need to fear That dying thou shouldst leave an orphan
house

For strangers to despoil. Nor yet wilt 80
thou

Allege that as dishonouring, forsooth, Thy length of days, I gave thee up to die, —

I, who have held thee in such reverence!
And in exchange for it, such gratitude

Thou, father, — thou award'st me, mothe
mine!

Go, lose no time, then, in begetting son Shall cherish thee in age, and, when thou diest,

Deck up and lay thee out as corpses claim!
For never I, at least, with this my hand

Will bury thee: it is myself am dead 90
So far as lies in thee. But if I light

Upon another saviour, and still see The sunbeam, — his, the child I call
myself,

His, the old age that claims my cherishing.
How vainly do these aged pray for death,
Abuse the slow drag of senility!
But should death step up, nobody inclines To die, nor age is now the weight it was!"

You see what all this poor pretentious talk Tried at, — how weakness strove to hide itself

In bluster against weakness, — the loud
word

To hide the little whisper, not so low 10 Already in that heart beneath those lips!
Ha, could it be, who hated cowardice Stood confessed craven, and who lauded so Self-immolating love, himself had pushed
The loved one to the altar in his place?
Friends interposed, would fain stop further

play
O' the sharp-edged tongue: they felt love's champion here

Had left an undefended point or two,
The antagonist might profit by; bade
"Pause!

Enough the present sorrow! Nor, O son, 20 Whet thus against thyself thy father's soul!"

Ay, but old Pheres was the stouter stuff!
Admetos, at the flintiest of the heart,
Had so much soft in him as held a fire:
The other was all iron, clashed from flint Its fire, but shed no spark and showed no bruise.

Did Pheres crave instruction as to facts?
He came, content, the ignoble word, for
him,

Should lurk still in the blackness of each
breast,

As sleeps the water-serpent half surmised:
30 Not brought up to the surface at a bound,
By one touch of the idly-probing spear, Reed-like against unconquerable scale.
He came pacific, rather, as strength should,
Bringing the decent praise, the due regret,
And each banality prescribed of old.
Did he commence "Why let her die for
you?"

And rouse the coiled and quiet ugliness
"What is so good to man as man's own
life?"

No: but the other did: and, for his pains, 40 Out, full in face of him, the venom leapt.

"And whom dost thou make bold, son — Ludian slave,

Or Phrugian whether, money made thy ware,

To drive at with revilings? Know'st thou
not

I, a Thessalian, from Thessalian sire Spring and am born legitimately free?

Too arrogant art thou; and, youngster
words

Casting against me, having had thy fling, Thou goest not off as all were ended so!
I gave thee birth indeed and mastership 1' the mansion, brought thee up to boot: 50 there ends

My owing, nor extends to die for thee!
Never did I receive it as a law Hereditary, no, nor Greek at all, That sires in place of sons were bound to
die.

For, to thy sole and single self wast thou Born, with whatever fortune, good or bad; Such things as bear bestowment, those thou hast;

Already ruling widely, broad-lands, too, Doubt not but I shall leave thee in due
time:

For why? My father left me them before. 60 Well then, where wrong I thee? — of what defraud?

Neither do thou die for this man, myself,
Nor let him die for thee! — is all I beg.

Thou joyest seeing daylight: dost suppose Thy father joys not too? Undoubtedly, Long I account the time to pass below, And brief my span of days; yet sweet the
same:

Is it otherwise to thee who, impudent, Didst fight off this same death, and livest
now

Through having sneaked past fate appor- 70 tioned thee,

And slain thy wife so? Cryest cowardice On me, I wonder, thou — whom, poor poltroon,

A very woman worsted, daring death Just for the sake of thee, her handsome spark?

Shrewdly hast thou contrived how not to
die

For ever more now: 'tis but still persuade The wife, for the time being, to take thy
place!

What, and thy friends who would not do
the like,

These dost thou carp at, craven thus thy-
self?

Crouch and be silent, craven! Compre- 80
hend

That, if thou lovest so that life of thine, Why, everybody loves his own life too:

So, good words, henceforth! If thou speak us ill,

Many and true an ill thing shalt thou hear!"

There you saw leap the hydra at full length!

Only, the old kept glorying the more,
The more the portent thus uncoiled itself Whereas the young man shuddered head to foot,

And shrank from kinship with the creature.
Why

- Such horror, unless what he hated
most,
Vaunting itself outside, might fairly claim Acquaintance with the counterpart at
home?
I would the Chorus here had plucked up
heart,
Spoken out boldly and explained the
man,
If not to men, to Gods. That way, I
think,
Sophokles would have led their dance and song.
Here, they said simply "Too much evil spoke On both sides!" As the young before, so
now 10 They bade the old man leave abusing thus.
- "Let him speak, — I have spoken!" said the youth:
And so died out the wrangle by degrees In wretched bickering. "If thou wince at fact,
Behoved thee not prove faulty to myself!"
"Had I died for thee I had faulted more!"
"All's one, then, for youth's bloom and age to die?"
"Our duty is to live one life, not two!"
"Go then, and outlive Zeus, for aught I care!"
"What, curse thy parents with no sort of cause?" 20 "Curse, truly! All thou lovest is long
life!"
"And dost not thou, too, all for love of life, Carry out now, in place of thine, this corpse?"
"Monument, rather, of thy cowardice, Thou worst one!"
"Not for me she died, I hope!
That, thou wilt hardly say!"
"No, simply this:
Would, some day, thou mayst come to need
myself!"
"Meanwhile, woo many wives — the more will die!"
"And so shame thee who never dared the
like!"
"Dear is this light o' the sun-god — dear, I say!"
30 "Proper conclusion for a beast to draw!"
- "One thing is certain: there's no laughing
now,
As out thou bearest the poor dead old man!"
"Die when thou wilt, thou wilt die infamous!"
"And once dead, whether famed or infamous,
I shall not care!"
"Alas and yet again!
How full is age of impudency!"
"True!
Thou couldst not call thy young wife impudent:
She was found foolish merely."
"Get thee gone!
And let me bury this my dead!"
"I go.
Thou buriest her whom thou didst murder 40
first;
Whereof there's some account to render yet Those kinsfolk by the marriage-side! I
think,
Brother Akastos may be classed with me,
Among the beasts, not men, if he omit Avenging upon thee his sister's blood!"
"Go to perdition, with thy housemate too!
Grow old all childlessly, with child alive,
Just as ye merit! for to me, at least,
Beneath the same roof ne'er do ye return.
And did I need by heralds' help renounce 50
The ancestral hearth, I had renounced
the same!
But we — since this woe, lying at our feet
I' the path, is to be borne — let us proceed And lay the body on the pyre."
I think,
What, thro' this wretched wrangle, kept the man From seeing clear — beside the cause I gave —
Was, that the woe, himself described as full
I' the path before him, there did really
lie —
Not roll into the abyss of dead and gone.
How, with Alkestis present, calmly 60
crowned,
Was she so irrecoverable yet —
The bird, escaped, that's just on bough
above,
The flower, let flutter half-way down the brink?
Not so detached seemed lifelessness from
life
But — one dear stretch beyond all straining yet —
And he might have her at his heart once
more,
When, in the critical minute, up there comes
The father and the fact, to trifle time!

"To the pyre!" an instinct prompted:
 pallid face,
 And passive arm and pointed foot, when these
 No longer shall absorb the sight, O friends, Admetos will begin to see indeed Who the true foe was, where the blows should fall!

So, the old selfish Pheres went his way, Case-hardened as he came; and left the
 youth,
 (Only half-selfish now, since sensitive)
 To go on learning by a light the more,
 As friends moved off, renewing dirge the
 while:

"Unhappy in thy daring! Noble dame, Best of the good, farewell! With favouring face
 May Hermes the infernal, Hades too, Receive thee! And if there, — ay, there,
 — some touch
 Of further dignity await the good, Sharing with them, mayst thou sit throned by her
 The Bride of Hades, in companionship!"

Wherewith, the sad procession wound
 away,
 Made slowly for the suburb sepulchre.
 And lo, — while still one's heart, in time and tune,
 Paced after that symmetric step of Death Mute-marching, to the mind's eye, at the head
 O' the mourners — one hand pointing out their path
 With the long pale terrific sword we saw,
 The other leading, with grim tender grace, Alkestis quieted and consecrate, — Lo, life again knocked laughing at the door!
 The world goes on, goes ever, in and
 through,
 And out again o' the cloud. We faced
 about,
 Fronted the palace where the mid-hall-gate Opened — not half, nor half of half,
 perhaps —
 Yet wide enough to let out light and life, And warmth and bounty and hope and joy, at once.
 Festivity burst wide, fruit rare and ripe Crushed in the mouth of Bacchos, pulpy-prime,
 All juice and flavour, save one single seed Duly ejected from the God's nice lip, Which lay o' the red edge, blackly visible —
 To wit, a certain ancient servitor:
 On whom the festal jaws o' the palace shut,
 So, there he stood, a much-bewildered man.
 Stupid? Nay, but sagacious in a sort:

Learned, life long, i' the first outside of
 things,
 Though bat for blindness to what lies beneath
 And needs a nail-scratch ere 'tis laid you bare.
 This functionary was the trusted one We saw deputed by Admetos late To lead in Herakles and help him, soul And body, to such snatched repose, snapped-up Sustainment, as might do away the dust 50
 O' the last encounter, knit each nerve anew
 For that next onset sure to come at cry O' the creature next assailed, — nay, should it prove
 Only the creature that came forward now
 To play the critic upon Herakles!

"Many the guests" — so he soliloquised In misings burdensome to breast before, When it seemed not too prudent tongue should wag —
 "Many, and from all quarters of this world, The guests I now have known frequent our 60
 house,
 For whom I spread the banquet; but than
 this,
 Never a worse one did I yet receive At the hearth here! One who seeing, first of all,
 The master's sorrow, entered gate the
 same,
 And had the hardihood to house himself.
 Did things stop there! But, modest by no means,
 He took what entertainment lay to hand,
 Knowing of our misfortune, — did we fail In aught of the fit service, urged us serve just as a guest expects! And in his hands 70 Taking the ivied goblet, drinks and drinks
 The unmixed product of black mother-
 earth,
 Until the blaze o' the wine went round
 about
 And warmed him: then he crowns with myrtle sprigs
 His head, and howls discordance — twofold lay Was thereupon for us to listen to — This fellow singing, namely, nor restrained
 A jot by sympathy with sorrows here — While we o' the household mourned our mistress — mourned,
 That is to say, in silence — never showed 80
 The eyes, which we kept wetting, to the guest —
 For there Admetos was imperative.
 And so, here am I helping make at home
 A guest, some fellow ripe for wickedness, Robber or pirate, while she goes her way Out of our house: and neither was it mine
 To follow in procession, nor stretch forth Hand, wave my lady dear a last farewell,

Lamenting who to me and all of us Domestics was a mother: myriad harms
She used to ward away from everyone,
And mollify her husband's ireful mood.
I ask then, do I justly hate or no
This guest, this interloper on our grief?"

"Hate him and justly!" Here's the proper judge

Of what is due to the house from Herakles!
This man of much experience saw the first 10 Of the feeble duckings-down at destiny, When King Admetos went his rounds, poor

soul,

A-begging somebody to be so brave

As die for one afraid to die himself —

"Thou, friend? Thou, love? Father or mother, then!

None of you? What, Alkestis must Death catch?

O best of wives, one woman in the world!
But nowise droop: our prayers may still assist:

Let us try sacrifice; if those avail

Nothing and Gods avert their countenance, 20 Why, deep and durable our grief will

be!"

Whereat the house, this worthy at its head, Re-echoed "deep and durable our grief!"

This sage, who justly hated Herakles,

Did he suggest once "Rather I than she!"

Admonish the Turannos — "Be a man!

Bear thine own burden, never think to thrust

Thy fate upon another and thy wife!

It were a dubious gain could death be doomed

That other, and no passionatest plea

30 Of thine, to die instead, have force with
fate;

Seeing thou lov'st Alkestis: what were life

Unlighted by the loved one? But to live —

Not merely live unsolaced by some thought, Some word so poor — yet solace all the
same —

As 'Thou i' the sepulchre, Alkestis, say!

Would I, or would not I, to save thy life,

Die, and die on, and die for evermore?"

No! but to read red-written up and down

The world 'This is the sunshine, this the shade,

40 This is some pleasure of earth, sky or sea, Due to that other, dead that thou mayst
live!"

Such were a covetable gain to thee?

Go die, fool, and be happy while 'tis time!"

One word of counsel in this kind, methinks,

Had fallen to better purpose than Ai, ai,

Pheu, pheu, e, papai, and a pother of praise

O' the best, best, best one! Nothing was to hate

In King Admetos, Pheres, and the rest

O' the household down to his heroic self!

50 This was the one thing hateful: Herakles

Had flung into the presence, frank and
free,

Out from the labour into the repose, Ere out again and over head and ears

I' the heart of labour, all for love of men:
Making the most o' the minute, that the
soul

And body, strained to height a minute
since,

Might lie relaxed in joy, this breathing-
space,

For man's sake more than ever; till the bow,

Restrung o' the sudden, at first cry for
help,

Should send some unimaginable shaft 60

True to the aim and shatteringly through

The plate-mail of a monster, save man so.

He slew the pest o' the marish yesterday:

To-morrow he would bit the flame-breathed stud

That fed on man's-flesh: and this day between —

Because he held it natural to die,

And fruitless to lament a thing past cure,

So, took his fill of food, wine, song and
flowers,

Till the new labour claimed him soon
enough, —

"Hate him and justly!" 70

True, Charopé mine!

The man surmised not Herakles lay hid

I' the guest; or, knowing it, was ignorant

That still his lady lived — for Herakles;

Or else judged lightness needs must indicate

This or the other caitiff quality:

And therefore — had been right if not so
wrong!

For who expects the sort of him will scratch A nail's depth, scrape the surface just to see

What peradventure underlies the same?

So, he stood petting up his puny hate, 80

Parent-wise, proud of the ill-favoured babe.

Not long! A great hand, careful lest it crush,

Startled him on the shoulder: up he stared,

And over him, who stood but Herakles!

There smiled the mighty presence, all one
smile

And no touch more of the world-weary
God,

Through the brief respite. Just a garland's grace

About the brow, a song to satisfy

Head, heart and breast, and trumpet-lips
at once,

A solemn draught of true religious wine, 90

And, — how should I know? — half a mountain goat

Torn up and swallowed down, — the feast was fierce

But brief: all cares and pains took wing and flew,
Leaving the hero ready to begin And help mankind, whatever woe came
next,
Even though what came next should be nought more

Than the mean querulous mouth o' the man, remarked

Pursing its grievance up till patience failed And the sage needs must rush out, as we saw

To sulk outside and pet his hate in peace.
By no means would the Helper have it so;

10 He who was just about to handle brutes In Thrace, and bit the jaws which breathed the flame, —

Well, if a good laugh and a jovial word Could bridle age which blew bad humours
forth,

That were a kind of help, too!

"Thou, there!" hailed This grand benevolence the ungracious
one —

"Why look'st so solemn and so thought-absorbed?

To guests a servant should not sour-faced be,
But do the honours with a mind urbane.

While thou, contrariwise, beholding here

20 Arrive thy master's comrade, hast for him A churlish visage, all one beetle-brow —

Having regard to grief that's out-of-door!
Come hither, and so get to grow more wise!
Things mortal — know'st the nature that they have?

No, I imagine! whence could knowledge
spring?

Give ear to me, then! For all flesh to die,
Is nature's due; nor is there any one Of mortals with assurance he shall last The coming morrow: for, what's born of
chance

30 Invisibly proceeds the way it will,
Not to be learned, no fortune-teller's prize.

This, therefore, having heard and known through me,

Gladden thyself! Drink! Count the day-by-day

Existence thine, and all the other — chance!
Ay, and pay homage also to by far

The sweetest of divinities for man, Kupris!¹ Benignant Goddess will she
prove!

But as for aught else, leave and let things
be!

And trust my counsel, if I seem to speak To purpose — as I do, apparently.

30 Wilt not thou, then, — discarding over-
much

Mournfulness, do away with this shut door, Come drink along with me, be-garlanded

This fashion? Do so, and — I well know
what —

From this stern mood, this shrunk-up state of mind,

The pit-pat fall o' the flagon-juice down throat

Soon will dislodge thee from bad harbourage!

Men being mortal should think mortal-
like:

Since to your solemn, brow-contracting
sort,

All of them, — so I lay down law at least, — 50 Life is not truly life but misery."

Whereto the man with softened surliness:
"We know as much: but dealt with matters,

now,
Hardly befitting mirth and revelry."

"No intimate, this woman that is dead: Mourn not too much! For, those o' the house itself, Thy masters live, remember!"

"Live indeed?

Ah, thou know'st nought o' the woe within these walls!"

"I do — unless thy master spoke me false Somehow!" 60

"Ay, ay, too much he loves a guest, Too much, that master mine!" so muttered he.

"Was it improper he should treat me well, Because an alien corpse was in the way?"

"No alien, but most intimate indeed!"

"Can it be, some woe was, he told me
not?"

"Farewell and go thy way! Thy cares for thee —

To us, our master's sorrow is a care."

"This word begins no tale of alien woe!"

"Had it been other woe than intimate,
I could have seen thee feast, nor felt amiss." 70

"What! have I suffered strangely from my host?"

"Thou cam'st not at a fit reception-time:
With sorrow here beforehand: and thou seest Shorn hair, black robes."

"But who is it that's dead?
Some child gone? or the aged sire perhaps?"

"Admetos' wife, then! she has perished, guest!"

"How sayest? And did ye house me, all
the same?"

"Ay: for he had thee in that reverence He dared not turn thee from his door
away!"

"O hapless, and bereft of what a mate!"

"All of us now are dead, not she alone!"

"But I divined it! seeing, as I did, His eye that ran with tears, his close-clipt
hair,
His countenance! Though he persuaded
me,
Saying it was a stranger's funeral He went with to the grave: against my wish,

10 He forced on me that I should enter doors, Drink in the hall o' the hospitable man Circumstanced so! And do I revel yet With wreath on head? But — thou to hold thy peace

Nor tell me what a woe oppressed my
friend!

Where is he gone to bury her? Where am I

To go and find her?"

"By the road that leads Straight to Larissa, thou wilt see the tomb, Out of the suburb, a carved sepulchre."

So said he, and therewith dismissed himself

20 Inside to his lamenting: somewhat soothed,

However, that he had adroitly spoilt The mirth of the great creature: oh, he marked

The movement of the mouth, how lip pressed lip,

And either eye forgot to shine, as, fast,
He plucked the chaplet from his forehead, dashed

The myrtle-sprays down, trod them under-
foot!

And all the joy and wonder of the wine Withered away, like fire from off a brand
The wind blows over — beacon though it
be,

30 Whose merry ardour only meant to make Somebody all the better for its blaze,
And save lost people in the dark: quenched
now!

Not long quenched! As the flame, just hurried off

The brand's edge, suddenly renews its bite, Tasting some richness caked i' the core o' the tree, —

Pine, with a blood that's oil, — and triumphs up

Pillar-wise to the sky and saves the world:
So, in a spasm and splendour of resolve, All at once did the God surmount the
man.

"O much-enduring heart and hand of 44
mine!

Now show what sort of son she bore to Zeus,

That daughter of Elektruon, Tiruns'
child,

Alkmené! for that son must needs save
now

The just-dead lady: ay, establish here
I' the house again Alkestis, bring about Comfort and succour to Admetos so!
I will go lie in wait for Death, black-stoled King of the corpses! I shall find him,
sure,

Drinking, beside the tomb, o' the sacrifice:
And if I lie in ambuscade, and leap 50

Out of my lair, and seize — encircle him Till one hand join the other round about — There lives not who shall pull him out from
me,

Rib-mauled, before he let the woman go!
But even say I miss the booty, — say, Death comes not to the bolted blood, — why then,

Down go I, to the unsunned dwelling-place Of Koré and the king there, — make demand,

Confident I shall bring Alkestis back,
So as to put her in the hands of him 60
My host, that housed me, never drove me
off:

Though stricken with sore sorrow, hid the
stroke,

Being a noble heart and honouring me!
Who of Thessalians, more than this man, loves

The stranger? Who, that now inhabits Greece?

Wherefore he shall not say the man was vile

Whom he befriended, — native noble
heart!"

So, one look upward, as if Zeus might laugh Approval of his human progeny, —

One summons of the whole magnificent frame, 70
Each sinew to its service, — up he caught,
And over shoulder cast, the lion-shag, Let the club go, — for had he not those
hands?

And so went striding off, on that straight
way

Leads to Larissa and the suburb tomb.
Gladness be with thee, Helper of our world!

I think this is the authentic sign and seal
Of Godship, that it ever waxes glad,
And more glad, until gladness blossoms, busts

Into a rage to suffer for mankind, 80
And recommence at sorrow: drops like seed
After the blossom, ultimate of all.
Say, does the seed scorn earth and seek the sun?

Surely it has no other end and aim Than to drop, once more die into the ground,
Taste cold and darkness and oblivion
there:
And thence rise, tree-like grow through pain to joy,
More joy and most joy, — do man good
again.

So, to the struggle off strode Herakles.
When silence closed behind the lion-garh, Back came our dull fact settling in its place, Though heartiness and passion half-dispersed

10 The inevitable fate. And presently In came the mourners from the funeral, One after one, until we hoped the last
Would be Alkestis and so end our dream.
Could they have really left Alkestis lone I' the wayside sepulchre! Home, all save she!

And when Admetos felt that it was so,
By the stand-still: when he lifted head and face

From the two hiding hands and peplos'
fold,

And looked forth, knew the palace, knew the hills,

20 Knew the plains, knew the friendly frequence there,

And no Alkestis any more again, Why, the whole woe billow-like broke on
him.

"O hateful entry, hateful countenance O' the widowed halls!" — he moaned.

"What was to be?

Go there? Stay here? Speak, not speak?
All was now

Mad and impossible alike; one way
And only one was sane and safe — to die:

Now he was made aware how dear is death,
How loveable the dead are, how the heart

30 Yearns in us to go hide where they repose, When we find sunbeams do no good to
see,

Nor earth rests rightly where our footsteps
fall.

His wife had been to him the very pledge, Sun should be sun, earth — earth; the pledge was robbed,

Pact broken, and the world was left no
world."

He stared at the impossible mad life: Stood, while they urged "Advance — advance! Go deep

Into the utter dark, thy palace-core!"
They tried what they called comfort,

"touched the quick 40 Of the ulceration in his soul," he said,

With memories, — "once thy joy was thus and thus!"
True comfort were to let him fling himself

Into the hollow grave o' the tomb, and so Let him lie dead along with all he loved.

One bade him note that his own family Boasted a certain father whose sole son, Worthy bewailment, died: and yet the sire Bore stoutly up against the blow and lived;
For all that he was childless now, and prone

Already to grey hairs, far on in life. 50 Could such a good example miss effect?

Why fix foot, stand so, staring at the house,
Why not go in, as that wise kinsman would?

"O that arrangement of the house I know!
How can I enter, how inhabit thee

Now that one cast of fortune changes all?
Oh me, for much divides the then from
now!

Then — with those pine-tree torches, Pelian pomp

And marriage-hymns, I entered, holding high

The hand of my dear wife; while many- 60 voiced

The revelry that followed me and her That's dead now, — friends felicitating
both,

As who were lofty-lineaged, each of us Born of the best, two wedded and made
one;

Now — wail is wedding-chant's antagonist,
And, for white peplos, stoles in sable state

Herald my way to the deserted couch!"

The one word more they ventured was
"This grief

Befell thee witless of what sorrow means, Close after prosperous fortune: but, reflect! 70 Thou hast saved soul and body. Dead, thy wife — Living, the love she left. What's novel

here?

Many the man, from whom Death long ago Loosed the life-partner!"

Then Admetos spoke: Turned on the comfort, with no tears, this
time.

He was beginning to be like his wife.
I told you of that pressure to the point,
Word slow pursuing word in monotone,

Alkestis spoke with; so Admetos, now, Solemnly bore the burden of the truth. 80
And as the voice of him grew, gathered

strength,
And groaned on, and persisted to the end,
We felt how deep had been descent in grief,

And with what change he came up now to
light,

And left behind such littleness as tears.

"Friends, I account the fortune of my wife Happier than mine, though it seem other-
wise:

For, her indeed no grief will ever touch,
And she from many a labour pauses now, Renowned one! Whereas I, who ought not live,

But do live, by evading destiny,
Sad life am I to lead, I learn at last!
For how shall I bear going in-doors here?
Accosting whom? By whom saluted back, Shall I have joyous entry? Whither turn?
Inside, the solitude will drive me forth, 10 When I behold the empty bed — my wife's —

The seat she used to sit upon, the floor Unsprinkled as when dwellers loved the cool,

The children that will clasp my knees
about,
Cry for their mother back: these servants
too

Moaning for what a guardian they have lost!

Inside my house such circumstance awaits.
Outside, — Thessalian people's marriage-feasts

And gatherings for talk will harass me,
With overflow of women everywhere;

20 It is impossible I look on them — Familiars of my wife and just her age!
And then, whoever is a foe of mine, And lights on me — why, this will be his
word —

'See there! alive ignobly, there he skulks That played the dastard when it came to
die,

And, giving her he wedded, in exchange,
Kept himself out of Hades safe and sound, The coward! Do you call that creature —
man?

30 He hates his parents for declining death, Just as if he himself would gladly die!"
This sort of reputation shall I have,
Beside the other ills enough in store.
Ill-famed, ill-faring, — what advantage,
friends,

Do you perceive I gain by life for death?"

That was the truth. Vexed waters sank to smooth:

'Twas only when the last of bubbles broke,
The latest circlet widened all away
And left a placid level, that up swam To the surface the drowned truth, in dreadful change.

40 So, through the quiet and submission, —
ay,
Spite of some strong words — (for you miss the tone)

The grief was getting to be infinite — Grief, friends fell back before. Their office shrank

To that old solace of humanity —
"Being born mortal, bear grief! Why born else?"

And they could only meditate anew.

"They, too, upborne by airy help of song,
And haply science, which can find the stars,
Had searched the heights: had sounded depths as well

By catching much at books where logic 50 lurked,

Yet nowhere found they aught could over-
come

Necessity: not any medicine served, Which Thracian tablets treasure, Orphic
voice

Wrote itself down upon: nor remedy
Which Phoibos gave to the Asklepiadai; Cutting the roots of many a virtuous herb

To solace overburdened mortals. None!
Of this sole goddess, never may we go

To altar nor to image: sacrifice

She hears not. All to pray for is — 'Ap- 60 proach!

But, oh, no harder on me, awful one,
Than heretofore! Let life endure thee
still!

For, whatsoe'er Zeus' nod decree, that
same

In concert with thee hath accomplishment.

Iron, the very stuff o' the Chaluboi,

Thou, by sheer strength, dost conquer and subdue;

Nor, of that harsh abrupt resolve of thine,
Any relenting is there!"

"O my king!

Thee also, in the shackles of those hands,
Not to be shunned, the Goddess grasped! 70

Yet, bear!

Since never wilt thou lead from underground

The dead ones, wail thy worst! If mortals
die, —

The very children of immortals, too, Dropped 'mid our darkness, these decay as
sure!

Dear indeed was she while among us: dear, Now she is dead, must she for ever be:

Thy portion was to clasp, within thy couch,
The noblest of all women as a wife.

Nor be the tomb of her supposed some heap

That hides mortality: but like the Gods & 80 Honoured, a veneration to a world

Of wanderers! Oft the wanderer, struck
thereby,

Who else had sailed past in his merchant-
ship,

Ay, he shall leave ship, land, long wind his
way

Up to the mountain-summit, till there break

Speech forth 'So, this was she, then, died of old

To save her husband! now, a deity She bends above us. Hail, benignant one!

Give good!' Such voices so will supplicate.

"But — can it be? Alkmené's offspring
comes,
Admetos! — to thy house advances here!"

I doubt not, they supposed him decently Dead somewhere in that winter world of Thrace —

Vanquished by one o' the Bistones, or else Victim to some mad steed's voracity —
For did not friends prognosticate as much?
It were a new example to the point, That "children of immortals, dropped by stealth

10 Into our darkness, die as sure as we!"

A case to quote and comfort people with:
But, as for lamentation, ai and pheu, Right-minded subjects kept them for their
lord.

Ay, he it was advancing! In he strode, And took his stand before Admetos, — turned

Now by despair to such a quietude, He neither raised his face nor spoke, this
time,

The while his friend surveyed him steadily.
That friend looked rough with fighting:
had he strained

20 Worst brute to breast was ever strangled
yet?

Somehow, a victory — for there stood the
strength,

Happy, as always; something grave, perhaps;

The great vein-cordage on the fret-worked
front,

Black-swollen, beaded yet with battle-dew
The yellow hair o' the hero! — his big frame

A-quiver with each muscle sinking back Into the sleepy smooth it leaped from late.
Under the great guard of one arm, there leant

A shrouded something, live and woman-
like,

30 Propped by the heart-beats 'neath the lion-coat.

When he had finished his survey, it seemed,
The heavings of the heart began subside, The helpful breath returned, and last the
smile

Shone out, all Herakles was back again,
As the words followed the saluting hand.

"To friendly man, behoves we freely speak, Admetos! — nor keep buried, deep in
breast,

Blame we leave silent. I assuredly Judged myself proper, if I should approach
By accident calamities of thine,

40 To be démonstrably thy friend: but thou

Told'st me not of the corpse then claiming
care,

That was thy wife's, but didst install me
guest

I' the house here, as though busied with a grief

Indeed, but then, mere grief beyond thy gate:

And so, I crowned my head, and to the Gods Poured my libations in thy dwelling-place, With such misfortune round me. And I
blame —

Certainly blame thee, having suffered thus!
But still I would not pain thee, pained 50

enough:

So let it pass! Wherefore I seek thee now, Having turned back again though onward
bound,

That I will tell thee. Take and keep for
me

This woman, till I come thy way again, Driving before me, having killed the king O' the Bistones, that drove of Thrakian
steeds:

In such case, give the woman back to me!
But should I fare, — as fare I fain would
not,

Seeing I hope to prosper and return, — Then, I bequeath her as thy household 60 slave.

She came into my hands with good hard toil!

For, what find I, when started on my
course,

But certain people, a whole country-side, Holding a wrestling-bout? as good to me
As a new labour: whence I took, and here Come keeping with me, this, the victor's prize.

For, such as conquered in the easy work, Gained horses which they drove away: and such

As conquered in the harder, — those who boxed

And wrestled, — cattle; and, to crown the 70
prize,

A woman followed. Chancing as I did,
Base were it to forego this fame and gain!
Well, as I said, I trust her to thy care:

No woman I have kidnapped, understand!
But good hard toil has done it: here I
come!

Some day, who knows? even thou wilt praise the feat!"

Admetos raised his face and eyed the pair:
Then, hollowly and with submission, spoke,

And spoke again, and spoke time after time,
When he perceived the silence of his friend 80

Would not be broken by consenting word.
As a tired slave goes adding stone to stone

Until he stop some current that molests,
So poor Admetos piled up argument

Vainly against the purpose all too plain In that great brow acquainted with command.

"Nowise dishonouring, nor amid my foes Ranking thee, did I hide my wife's ill fate;
But it were grief superimposed on grief, Shouldst thou have hastened to another
home.

My own woe was enough for me to weep!
But, for this woman, — if it so may be, — Bid some Thessalian, — I entreat thee,
king! —

Keep her, — who has not suffered like
myself!

Many of the Pheraioi welcome thee.
Be no reminder to me of my ills!

10 I could not, if I saw her come to live, Restrain the tear! Inflict on me diseased No new disease: woe bends me down
enough

Then, where could she be sheltered in my
house,

Female and young too? For that she is young,

The vesture and adornment prove. Reflect!

Should such an one inhabit the same roof With men? And how, mixed up, a girl, with youths,

Shall she keep pure, in that case? No light task

To curb the May-day youngster, Herakles!
20 I only speak because of care for thee.

Or must I, in avoidance of such harm, Make her to enter, lead her life within The chamber of the dead one, all apart?

How shall I introduce this other, couch
This where Alkestis lay? A double blame I apprehend: first, from the citizens — Lest some tongue of them taunt that I betray

My benefactress, fall into the snare Of a new fresh face: then, the dead one's self, —

30 Will she not blame me likewise? Worthy,
sure,

Of worship from me! circumspect my
ways,

And jealous of a fault, are bound to be.
But thou, — O woman, whosoe'er thou art, —

Know, thou hast all the form, art like as
like

Alkestis, in the bodily shape! Ah me!
Take, — by the Gods, — this woman from my sight,

Lest thou undo me, the undone before!
Since I seem — seeing her — as if I saw My own wife! And confusions cloud my
heart,

40 And from my eyes the springs break forth!
Ah me

Unhappy — how I taste for the first time My misery in all its bitterness!"

Whereat the friends conferred: "The chance, in truth,

Was an untoward one — none said otherwise.

Still, what a God comes giving, good or bad,
That, one should take and bear with.
Take her, then!"

Herakles, — not unfastening his hold On that same misery, beyond mistake Hoarse in the words, convulsive in the face, —

"I would that I had such a power," said he, 5
"As to lead up into the light again Thy very wife, and grant thee such a grace."

"Well do I know thou wouldst: but where the hope?

There is no bringing back the dead to
light."

"Be not extravagant in grief, no less!
Bear it, by augury of better things!"

"'Tis easier to advise 'bear up, than bear!'"

"But how carve way i' the life that lies
before,
If bent on groaning ever for the past?"

"I myself know that: but a certain love 6 Allures me to the choice I shall not change."

"Ay, but, still loving dead ones, still makes weep."

"And let it be so! She has ruined me, And still more than I say: that answers all."

"Oh thou hast lost a brave wife: who disputes?"

"So brave a one — that he whom thou behold'st
Will never more enjoy his life again!"

"Time will assuage! The evil yet is young!"

"Time, thou mayst say, will; if time mean
— to die."

"A wife — the longing for new marriage- 7 joys
Will stop thy sorrow!"

"Hush, friend, — hold thy peace!
What hast thou said! I could not credit ear!"

"How then? Thou wilt not marry, then, but keep A widowed couch?"

"There is not anyone Of womankind shall couch with whom thou seest!"

"Dost think to profit thus in any way

The dead one?"

"Her, wherever she abide,
My duty is to honour."

"And I praise — Indeed I praise thee! Still, thou hast to pay
The price of it, in being held a fool!"

"Fool call me — only one name call me not!
Bridegroom!"

"No, it was praise, I portioned thee, Of being good true husband to thy wife!"

"When I betray her, though she is no
more,
May I die!"

And the thing he said was true:
For out of Herakles a great glow broke.
There stood a victor worthy of a prize:
The violet-crown that withers on the brow Of the half-hearted claimant. Oh, he knew

The signs of battle hard fought and well won,

This queller of the monsters! — knew his friend

Planted firm foot, now, on the loathly
thing

That was Admetos late! "would die," he knew,

Ere let the reptile raise its crest again.
If that was truth, why try the true friend
more?

"Then, since thou canst be faithful to the
death,
Take, deep into thy house, my dame!"
smiled he.

"Not so! — I pray, by thy Progenitor!"

"Thou wilt mistake in disobeying me!"

"Obeying thee, I have to break my heart!"

"Obey me! Who knows but the favour
done
May fall into its place as duty too?"

So, he was humble, would decline no more Bearing a burden: he just sighed "Alas!
Wouldst thou hadst never brought this prize from game!"

"Yet, when I conquered there, thou conqueredst!"

"All excellently urged! Yet — spite of all, Bear with me! let the woman go away!"

"She shall go, if needs must: but ere she go, See if there is need!"

"Need there is! At least, Except I make thee angry with me, so!"

"But I persist, because I have my spice Of intuition likewise: take the dame!"

"Be thou the victor, then! But certainly Thou dost thy friend no pleasure in the act!"

"Oh, time will come when thou shalt praise 40 me! Now — Only obey!"

"Then servants, since my house Must needs receive this woman, take her
there!"

"I shall not trust this woman to the care Of servants."

"Why, conduct her in, thyself, If that seem preferable!"

"I prefer,
"With thy good leave, to place her in thy
hands!"

"I would not touch her! Entry to the
house —

That, I concede thee."

"To thy sole right hand, I mean to trust her!"

"King! Thou wrenchest this Out of me by main force, if I submit!" 50

"Courage, friend! Come, stretch hand forth! Good! Now touch The stranger-woman!"

"There! A hand I stretch — As though it meant to cut off Gorgon's
head!"

"Hast hold of her?"

"Fast hold."

"Why, then, hold fast
And have her! and, one day, asseverate Thou wilt, I think, thy friend, the son of Zeus

He was the gentle guest to entertain!
Look at her! See if she, in any way, Present thee with resemblance of thy wife!"

Ah, but the tears come, find the words at 60
fault!

There is no telling how the hero twitched The veil off: and there stood, with such fixed eyes

And such slow smile, Alkestis' silent self!
It was the crowning grace of that great
heart,

To keep back joy: procrastinate the truth Until the wife, who had made proof and
found

The husband wanting, might essay once
more,

Hear, see, and feel him renovated now — Able to do, now, all herself had done,

Risen to the height of her: so, hand in 70
hand,

The two might go together, live and die.

Beside, when he found speech, you guess the speech.

He could not think he saw his wife again: It was some mocking God that used the bliss

To make him mad! Till Herakles must help:

Assure him that no spectre mocked at all; He was embracing whom he buried once. Still, — did he touch, might he address the true,

True eye, true body of the true live wife?

to And Herakles said, smiling, "All was truth.

Spectre? Admetos had not made his guest

One who played ghost-invoker, or such cheat!

Oh, he might speak and have response, in time!

All heart could wish was gained now — life for death:

Only, the rapture must not grow immense: Take care, nor wake the envy of the Gods!"

"Oh thou, of greatest Zeus true son," — so spoke

Admetos when the closing word must come,

"Go ever in a glory of success,

20 And save, that sire, his offspring to the end! For thou hast — only thou — raised me and mine

Up again to this light and life!" Then asked

Tremblingly, how was trod the perilous path

Out of the dark into the light and life: How it had happened with Alkestis there.

And Herakles said little, but enough — How he engaged in combat with that king

O' the demons: how the field of contest lay

By the tomb's self: how he sprang from ambushade,

30 Captured Death, caught him in that pair of hands.

But all the time, Alkestis moved not once Out of the set gaze and the silent smile;

And a cold fear ran through Admetos' frame:

"Why does she stand and front me, silent thus?"

Herakles solemnly replied "Not yet Is it allowable thou hear the things

She has to tell thee; let vanish quite That consecration to the lower Gods,

And on our upper world the third day rise!

Lead her in, meanwhile; good and true thou art,

Good, true, remain thou! Practise piety To stranger-guests the old way! So, farewell!

Since forth I fare, fulfil my urgent task Set by the king, the son of Sthenelos."

Fain would Admetos keep that splendid smile

Ever to light him. "Stay with us, thou heart!

Remain our house-friend!"

"At some other day! Now, of necessity, I haste!" smiled he.

"But mayst thou prosper, go forth on a foot

Sure to return! Through all the tetrarchy 50 Command my subjects that they institute Thanksgiving dances for the glad event, And bid each altar smoke with sacrifice!

For we are minded to begin a fresh Existence, better than the life before;

Seeing I own myself supremely blest."

Whereupon all the friendly moralists Drew this conclusion: chirped, each beard to each:

"Manifold are thy shapings, Providence! Many a hopeless matter Gods arrange. 60

What we expected never came to pass: What we did not expect, Gods brought to bear: So have things gone, this whole experience through!"

Ah, but if you had seen the play itself! They say, my poet failed to get the prize:

Sophokles got the prize, — great name! They say,

Sophokles also means to make a piece, Model a new Admetos, a new wife:

Success to him! One thing has many sides.

The great name! But no good supplants 70 a good,

Nor beauty undoes beauty. Sophokles Will carve and carry a fresh cup, brimful

Of beauty and good, firm to the altar-foot, And glorify the Dionysiac shrine:

Not clash against this crater in the place Where the God put it when his mouth had drained, To the last dregs, libation life-blood-like,

And praised Euripides for evermore — The Human with his droppings of warm tears.

Still, since one thing may have so many 80 sides,

I think I see how, — far from Sophokles, —

You, I, or anyone might mould a new Admetos, new Alkestis. Ah, that brave Bounty of poets, the one royal race
That ever was, or will be, in this world!
They give no gift that bounds itself and ends

I' the giving and the taking: theirs so breeds

I' the heart and soul o' the taker, so transmutes

The man who only was a man before,
That he grows godlike in his turn, can give —

10 He also: share the poets' privilege, Bring forth new good, new beauty, from the old.

As though the cup that gave the wine, gave,
too,

The God's prolific giver of the grape, That vine, was wont to find out, fawn around

His footstep, springing still to bless the dearth,

At bidding of a Mainad.¹ So with me:
For I have drunk this poem, quenched my thirst,

Satisfied heart and soul — yet more remains!

20 Could we too make a poem? Try at least, Inside the head, what shape the rose-mists
take!

When God Apollon took, for punishment,
A mortal form and sold himself a slave To King Admetos till a term should end, —
Not only did he make, in servitude, Such music, while he fed the flocks and herds,

As saved the pasturage from wrong or fright,

Curing rough creatures of ungentleness:
Much more did that melodious wisdom
work

Within the heart o' the master: there, ran wild

30 Many a lust and greed that grow to strength
By preying on the native pity and care, Would else, all undisturbed, possess the land.

And these, the God so tamed, with golden
tongue,

That, in the plenitude of youth and power, Admetos vowed himself to rule thence-
forth

In Pherai solely for his people's sake, Subduing to such end each lust and greed
That dominates the natural charity.

And so the struggle ended. Right ruled might:

40 And soft yet brave, and good yet wise, the

Stood up to be a monarch; having learned The worth of life, life's worth would he bestow

On all whose lot was cast, to live or die,
As he determined for the multitude.

So stands a statue: pedestalled sublime,
Only that it may wave the thunder off,

And ward, from winds that vex, a world
below.

And then, — as if a whisper found its way E'en to the sense o' the marble, — "Vain thy vow!

The royalty of its resolve, that head 50
Shall hide within the dust ere day be done:

That arm, its outstretch of beneficence,
Shall have a speedy ending on the earth:

Lie patient, prone, while light some cricket leaps

And takes possession of the masterpiece,
To sit, sing louder as more near the sun.

For why? A flaw was in the pedestal; Who knows? A worm's work! Sapped,

the certain fate
O' the statue is to fall, and thine to die!"

Whereat the monarch, calm, addressed 60
himself

To die, but bitterly the soul outbroke —
"O prodigality of life, blind waste

I' the world, of power profuse without the
will

To make life do its work, deserve its day!
My ancestors pursued their pleasure, poured

The blood o' the people out in idle war,
Or took occasion of some weary peace

To bid men dig down deep or build up high, Spend bone and marrow that the king might feast Entrenched and buttressed from the vulgar 70 gaze.

Yet they all lived, nay, lingered to old age:
As though Zeus loved that they should laugh to scorn

The vanity of seeking other ends

In rule than just the ruler's pastime. They Lived; I must die."

And, as some long last moan
Of a minor suddenly is propped beneath

By note which, new-struck, turns the wail, that was,

Into a wonder and a triumph, so Began Alkestis: "Nay, thou art to live!

The glory that, in the disguise of flesh, 80
Was helpful to our house, — he prophesied

The coming fate: whereon, I pleaded sore That he, — I guessed a God, who to his couch

Amid the clouds must go and come again,

While we were darkling, — since he loved us both,

He should permit thee, at whatever price,
To live and carry out to heart's content

Soul's purpose, 'turn each thought to very deed.

Nor let Zeus lose the monarch meant in thee."

"To which Apollon, with a sunset smile, Sadly — 'And so should mortals arbitrate!
It were unseemly if they aped us Gods,
And, mindful of our chain of consequence, Lost care of the immediate earthly link:
Forwent the comfort of life's little hour,
In prospect of some cold abysmal blank 10 Alien eternity, — unlike the time They know, and understand to practise
with, —

No, — our eternity — no heart's blood, bright
And warm outpoured in its behoof, would tinge

Never so palely, warm a whit the more:
Whereas retained and treasured — left to beat

Joyously on, a life's length, in the breast O' the loved and loving — it would throb
itself

Through, and suffuse the earthly tenement, Transform it, even 'as your mansion here 20 Is love-transformed into a temple-home Where I, a God, forget the Olympian glow,
I' the feel of human richness like the rose:
Your hopes and fears, so blind and yet so sweet

With death about them. Therefore, well in thee

To look, not on eternity, but time:

To apprehend that, should Admetos die, All, we Gods purposed in him, dies as
sure,

That, life's link snapping, all our chain is lost.

And yet a mortal glance might pierce,
methinks,

30 Deeper into the seeming dark of things,
And learn, no fruit, man's life can bear,
will fade:

Learn, if Admetos die now, so much more Will pity for the frailness found in flesh, Will terror at the earthly chance and change Frustrating wisest scheme of noblest soul,
Will these go wake the seeds of good asleep Throughout the world: as oit a rough wind sheds

The unripe promise of some field-flower, —
true!

But loosens to the level, and lets breathe 40 A thousand captives for the year to come.
Nevertheless, obtain thy prayer, stay fate!
Admetos lives — if thou wilt die for him!"

"So was the pact concluded that I die,
And thou live on, live for thyself, for me,
For all the world. Embrace and bid me hail,
Husband, because I have the victory —

Am, heart, soul, head to foot, one happiness!"

Whereto Admetos, in a passionate cry,
"Never, by that true word Apollon spoke!
All the unwise wish is unwished, oh wife! 54
Let purposes of Zeus fulfil themselves, If not through me, then through some other man!

Still, in myself he had a purpose too,
Inalienably mine, to end with me:
This purpose — that, throughout my earthly life,

Mine should be mingled and made up with thine, —

And we two prove one force and play one
part

And do one thing. Since death divides
the pair,

'Tis well that I depart and thou remain
Who wast to me as spirit is to flesh: 60

Let the flesh perish, be perceived no more,
So thou, the spirit that informed the flesh,

Bend yet awhile, a very flame above
The rift I drop into the darkness by, —

And bid remember, flesh and spirit once Worked in the world, one body, for man's sake.

Never be that abominable show Of passive death without a quickening
life —

Admetos only, no Alkestis now!"

Then she: "O thou Admetos, must the 70
pile

Of truth on truth, which needs but one truth more

To tower up in completeness, trophy-like,
Emprize of man, and triumph of the world,

Must it go ever to the ground again Because of some faint heart or faltering
hand,

Which we, that breathless world about the base,

Trusted should carry safe to altitude, Superimpose o' the summit, our supreme Achievement, our victorious coping-stone?

Shall thine, Beloved, prove the hand and 80
heart

That fail again, flinch backward at the truth

Would cap and crown the structure this last time, —

Precipitate our monumental hope
And strew the earth ignobly yet once more?

See how, truth piled on truth, the structure wants,

Waits just the crowning truth I claim of
thee!

Wouldst thou, for any joy to be enjoyed,
For any sorrow that thou mightst escape,

Unwill thy will to reign a righteous king?
Nowise! And were there two lots, death 90 and life, —

Life, wherein good resolve should go to an,
 Death, whereby finest fancy grew plain fact
 'T' the reign of thy survivor, — life or death?
 Certainly death, thou choosest. Here stand I

The wedded, the beloved one: hadst thou loved

Her who less worthily could estimate Both life and death than thou? Not so should say

Admetos, whom Apollon made come court Alkestis in a car, submissive brutes

Of blood were yoked to, symbolising soul Must dominate unruly sense in man.

Then, shall Admetos and Alkestis see Good alike, and alike choose, each for each,
 Good, — and yet, each for other, at the last Choose evil? What? thou soundest in my soul

To depths below the deepest, reachest good In evil, that makes evil good again,

And so allottest to me that I live
 And not die — letting die, not thee alone,

But all true life that lived in both of us?
 Look at me once ere thou decree the lot!"

Therewith her whole soul entered into his,

He looked the look back, and Alkestis died.

And even while it lay, i' the look of him, Dead, the dimmed body, bright Alkestis'
 soul

Had penetrated through the populace Of ghosts, was got to Koré, — throned and crowned

The pensive queen o' the twilight, where she dwells

Forever in a muse, but half away From flowery earth she lost and hankers for, —

And there demanded to become a ghost Before the time.

Whereat the softened eyes Of the lost maidenhood that lingered still Straying among the flowers in Sicily, Sudden was startled back to Hades' throne
 By that demand: broke through humanity
 Into the orb'd omniscience of a God, Searched at a glance Alkestis to the soul,
 And said — while a long slow sigh lost it-
 self

I' the hard and hollow passage of a laugh:

"Hence, thou deceiver! This is not to die,
 If, by the very death which mocks me now,
 The life, that's left behind and past my
 power,

Is formidably doubled. Say, there fight Two athletes, side by side, each athlete armed

With only half the weapons, and no more, Adequate to a contest with their foe:

If one of these should fling helm, sword and shield

To fellow — shieldless, swordless, helm-less, late —

And so leaped naked o'er the barrier, 50
 leave

A combatant equipped from head to heel,

Yet cry to the other side 'Receive a friend Who fights no longer!' 'Back, friend, to the fray!'

Would be the prompt rebuff; I echo it.

Two souls in one were formidable odds:

Admetos must not be himself and thou!"

And so, before the embrace relaxed a whit,

The lost eyes opened, still beneath the
 look;

And lo, Alkestis was alive again,
 And of Admetos' rapture who shall speak? 60

So, the two lived together long and
 well.

But never could I learn, by word of scribe Or voice of poet, rumour wafts our
 way,

That — of the scheme of rule in righteous-
 ness,

The bringing back again the Golden
 Age,

Which, rather than renounce, our pair would die

That ever one faint particle came true,
 With both alive to bring it to effect:

Such is the envy Gods still bear mankind!

So might our version of the story prove, 70
 And no Euripidean pathos plague

Too much my critic-friend of Syracuse.

"Besides your poem failed to get the prize: (That is, the first prize: second prize is none).

Sophokles got it!" Honour the great
 name!

All cannot love two great names; yet some
 do:

I know the poetess who graved in gold,
 Among her glories that shall never fade,

This style and title for Euripides,
The Human with his droppings of warm 80

tears.

I know, too, a great Kaunian painter,¹ strong

As Herakles, though rosy with a robe Of grace that softens down the sinewy
 strength:

And he has made a picture of it all.

There lies Alkestis dead, beneath the sun,

She longed to look her last upon, beside The sea, which somehow tempts the life in us
 To come trip over its white waste of waves,
 And try escape from earth, and fleet as
 free.
 Behind the body, I suppose there bends Old Pheres in his hoary impotence;
 And women-wailers, in a corner crouch — Four, beautiful as you four — yes,
 indeed! —
 Close, each to other, agonising all, 10 As fastened, in fear's rhythmic sympathy, To two contending opposite. There strains The might o' the hero 'gainst his more than match,
 — Death, dreadful not in thew and bone, but like
 The envenomed substance that exudes some dew Whereby the merely honest flesh and blood

Will fester up and run to ruin straight, Ere they can close with, clasp and over-
 come
 The poisonous impalpability
 That simulates a form beneath the flow Of those grey garments; I pronounce 20 that piece
 Worthy to set up in our Poikilé!

 And all came, — glory of the golden
 verse,
 And passion of the picture, and that fine Frank outgush of the human gratitude Which saved our ship and me, in Syracusc, — Ay, and the tear or two which slipt perhaps
 Away from you, friends, while I told my tale,
 — It all came of this play that gained no
 prize!
 Why crown whom Zeus has crowned in soul before?

THE LAST ADVENTURE OF BALAUSTION.

ARISTOPHANES' APOLOGY.

οὐκ ἔσθω κενέβρει * ὁπότεν δὲ θύης τι, κάλει με.

I eat no carrion; when you sacrifice Some cleanly creature,—call me for a slice!

WIND, wave, and bark, bear Euthukles¹
and me,

Balaustion, from — not sorrow but despair,
Not memory but the present and its pang!
Athenai, live thou hearted in my heart:
Never, while I live, may I see thee more, Never again may these repugnant orbs Ache themselves blind before the hideous

pomp,
The ghastly mirth which mocked thine overthrow

— Death's entry, Haides' outrage!

Doomed to die, —

Fire should have flung a passion of embrace

About thee till, resplendently inarmed, (Temple by temple folded to his breast, All thy white wonder fainting out in ash) Lightly some vaporous sigh of soul escaped,
And so the Immortals bade Athenai back!
Or earth might sunder and absorb thee,
save,

Buried below Olumpos and its gods, Akropolis to dominate her realm

For Koré,² and console the ghosts; or, sea,
What if thy watery plural vastitude, Rolling unanimous advance, had rushed, 20 Might upon might, a moment, — stood,
one stare,
Sea-face to city-face, thy glaucous wave Glassing that marbled last magnificence, — Till fate's pale tremulous foam-flower tipped the grey,
And when wave broke and overswarmed and, sucked
To bounds back, multitudinously ceased, Let land again breathe unconfused with sea, Attiké was, Athenai was not now!

Such end I could have borne, for I had 30 shared.

But this which, glanced at, aches within my orbs

To blinding, — bear me thence, bark, wind and wave!

Me, Euthukles, and, hearted in each heart, Athenai, undisgraced as Pallas' self,
Bear to my birthplace, Helios' island-bride, Zeus' darling: thither speed us, homeward-
bound,

Wafted already twelve hours' sail away
From horror, nearer by one sunset Rhodes!

Why should despair be? Since, distinct
above

Man's wickedness and folly, flies the wind 40 And floats the cloud, free transport for our
soul

Out of its fleshly durance dim and low, — Since disembodied soul anticipates (Thought-borne as now, in rapturous unrestraint)

Above all crowding, crystal silentness, Above all noise, a silver solitude: — Surely, where thought so bears soul, soul in
time

May permanently bide, "assert the wise," There live in peace, there work in hope once more —

² Proserpine.

O nothing doubt, Philemon! Greed and
 strife,
 Hatred and cark and care, what place have
 they
 In yon blue liberality of heaven?
 How the sea helps! How rose-smit earth will rise Breast-high thence, some bright morning, and be Rhodes!
 Heaven, earth and sea, my warrant — in their name,
 Believe — o'er falsehood, truth is surely sphered,
 O'er ugliness beams beauty, o'er this world Extends that realm where, "as the wise
 say," 10 Philemon, thou shalt see Euripides Clearer than mortal sense perceived the
 man!

A sunset nearer Rhodes, by twelve hours' sweep
 Of surge secured from horror? Rather
 say,
 Quieted out of weakness into strength.
 I dare invite, survey the scene my sense Staggered to apprehend: for, disenvolved From the mere outside anguish and contempt,
 Slowly a justice centred in a doom Reveals itself. Ay, pride succumbed to pride, 20 Oppression met the oppressor and was matched.

Athenai's vaunt braved Sparté's violence Till, in the shock, prone fell Peiraios, low Rampart and bulwark lay, as, — timing
 stroke
 Of hammer, axe, and beam hoist, poised and swung,
 The very flute-girls blew their laughing
 best,
 In dance about the conqueror while he bade Music and merriment help engineery Batter down, break to pieces all the trust Of citizens once, slaves now. See what walls

30 Play substitute for the long double range Themistoklean, heralding a guest From harbour on to citadel! Each side Their senseless walk demolished stone by stone,

See, — outer wall as stonelike, — heads and hearts,
 Athenai's terror-stricken populace!
 Prattlers, tongue-tied in crouching abject-
 ness, —
 Braggarts, who wring hands wont to flourish swords

Sophist and rhetorician, demagogue, (Argument dumb, authority a jest) 40 Dikast and eliaist,¹ pleader, litigant,

Quack-priest, sham-prophecy-retailer, scout O' the customs, sycophant, whate'er the
 style,

Altar-scrap-snatcher, pimp and parasite, — Rivalities at truce now each with each, Stupefied mud-banks, — such an use they serve!

While the one order which performs exact
 To promise, functions faithful last as first,
 What is it but the city's lyric troop, Chantress and psaltress, flute-girl, dancing-girl?

Athenai's harlotry takes laughing care 54 Their patron miss no pipings, late she loved,

But deathward tread at least the kordaxstep.²

Die! then, who pulled such glory on your heads!

There let it grind to powder! Perikles!
 The living are the dead now: death be
 life!

Why should the sunset yonder waste its wealth?

Prove thee Olympian! If my heart supply Inviolate the structure, — true to type, Build me some spirit-place no flesh shall
 find,

As Pheidias may inspire thee: slab on slab, 60 Renew Athenai, quarry out the cloud, Convert to gold yon west extravagance!
 'Nenth Propylaea,³ from Akropolis

By vapoury grade and grade, gold all the
 way,

Step to thy snow-Pnux,⁴ mount thy Bema,⁵
 cloud,

Thunder and lighten thence a Hellas
 through

That shall be better and more beautiful And too august for Sparté's foot to spurn!
 Chasmed in the crag, again our Theatre Predominates, one purple: Stag hunt- 70
 month,

Brings it not Dionusia? Hail, the Three!
 Aischulos, Sophokles, Euripides Compete, gain prize or lose prize, godlike
 still.

Nay, lest they lack the old god-exercise — Their noble want the unworthy, — as of
 old,

(How otherwise should patience crown their might?)

What if each find his ape promoted man, His censor raised for antic service still?

Some new Hermippos to pelt Perikles, Kratinos to swear Pheidias robbed a shrine, 80 Eruxis — I suspect, Euripides,

² Cancan. ³ Part of the Acropolis.

⁴ A rocky eminence in Athens frequented by orators and their audiences.

⁵ The platform used by the orator.

No brow will ache because with mop and mow He gibes my poet! There's a dog-faced dwarf

That gets to godship somehow, yet retains His apehood in the Egyptian hierarchy, More decent, indecorous just enough:
Why should not dog-ape, graced in due degree,

Grow Momos as thou Zeus? Or didst thou sigh

Rightly with thy Makaria? "After life, Better no sentiency than turbulence; Death cures the low contention." Be it so!
Yet progress means contention, to my mind.

Euthukles, who, except for love that speaks,

Art silent by my side while words of mine Provoke that foe from which escape is vain Henceforward, wake Athenai's fate and fall, —

Memories asleep as, at the altar-foot Those Furies in the Oresteian song, — Do I amiss who, wanting strength, use craft,

Advance upon the foe I cannot fly, Nor feign a snake is dormant though it gnaw?

That fate and fall, once bedded in our brain,
Roots itself past upwrenching; but coaxed forth,

Encouraged out to practise fork and fang, — Perhaps, when satiate with prompt sustenance,

It may pine, likelier die than if left swell
In peace by our pretension to ignore, Or pricked to threefold fury, should our stamp

Bruise and not brain the pest.

A middle course!

What hinders that we treat this tragic theme

As the Three taught when either woke some woe,

— How Klutaimnestra hated, what the pride

Of Iokasté, why Medeia clove Nature asunder. Small rebuked by large,
We felt our puny hates refine to air,
Our poor prides sink, prevent the humbling hand,

Our petty passions purify their tide.
So, Euthukles, permit the tragedy
To re-enact itself, this voyage through,
Till sunsets end and sunrise brighten Rhodes!

Majestic on the stage of memory, Peploused and kothorned, let Athenai fall Once more, nay, oft again till life conclude, Lent for the lesson: Choros, I and thou!

What else in life seems piteous any more After such pity, or proves terrible Beside such terror?

Still — since Phrunichos¹

Offended, by too premature a touch Of that Milesian smart-place freshly frayed —

(Ah, my poor people, whose prompt remedy

Was — fine the poet, not reform thyself!)⁵⁰ Beware precipitate approach! Rehearse Rather the prologue, well a year away,
Than the main misery, a sunset old.

What else but fitting prologue to the piece Style and adventure, stranger than my first By so much as the issue it enwombed Lurked big beyond Balaustion's littleness?
Second supreme adventure! O that

Spring,

That eve I told the earlier to my friends!
Where are the four now, with each red-60 ripe mouth

Crumpled so close, no quickest breath it fetched

Could disengage the lip-flower furled to bud

For fear Admetos, — shivering head and foot,

As with sick soul and blind averted face
He trusted hand forth to obey his friend, — Should find no wife in her cold hand's response,

Nor see the disenshrouded statue start Alkestis, live the life and love the love!

I wonder, does the streamlet ripple still,
Outsmoothing galingale and watermint Its mat-floor? while at brim, 'twixt sedge and sedge,

What bubbleings past Baccheion, broadened much,

Pricked by the reed and fretted by the fly, Oared by the boatman-spider's pair of arms!

Lenaia² was a gladsome month ago — Euripides had taught "Andromedé:" Next month, would teach "Kresphontes"

— which same month
Someone from Phokis, who companioned me

Since all that happened on those temple-steps,

Would marry me and turn Athenian too. 8c

Now! if next year the masters let the slaves
Do Bacchic service and restore mankind That trilogy whereof, 'tis noised, one play Presents the Bacchai, — no Euripides Will teach the choros, nor shall we be tinged

By any such grand sunset of his soul,

¹ An Athenian poet who was fined for referring to the defeat at Miletus.

² A Bacchic festival.

Exiles from dead Athenai, not the live That's in the cloud there with the newborn star!

Speak to the infinite intelligence,
Sing to the everlasting sympathy!
Winds belly sail, and drench of dancing brine

Buffet our boat-side, so the prone bound
free!

Condense our voyage into one great day
Made up of sunset-closes: eve by eve, Resume that memorable night discourse

15 When, — like some meteor brilliance, fire and fifth,

Or say, his own Amphytheos, deity And Iung, who, bound on the gods' em-bassage,

Got men's acknowledgment in kick and cuff —

We made acquaintance with a visitor Ominous, appanitional, who went Strange as he came, but shall not pass away.
Let us attempt that memorable talk, Clothe the adventure's every incident With due expression: may not looks be told,

20 Gesture made speak, and speech so amplified

That words find blood-warmth which, cold-writ, they lose?

Recall the night we heard the news from Thrace.

One year ago, Athenai still herself.

We two were sitting silent in the house,
Yet cheerless hardly. Euthuktes, forgive!
I somehow speak to unseen auditors.

Not you, but — Euthukles had entered,
grave,

Grand, may I say, as who brings laurel-branch

And message from the tripod: such it proved.

30 He first removed the garland from his
brow,

Then took my hand and looked into my
face.

"Speak good words!" much misgiving falter'd I.

"Good words, the best, Balausion? He is crowned,

Gone with his Attic ivy home to feast.
Since Aiskhunos required companionship, Pour a libation for Euripides!"

When we had sat the heavier silence out —
"Dead and triumphant still," began reply To my eye's question. "As he willed he worked:

And, as he worked, he wanted not, be sure, 40 Triumph his whole life through, submitting
work

To work's right judges, never to the wrong —

To competency, not ineptitude.

When he had run life's proper race and worked

Quite to the stade's end, there remained to try

The stade's turn, should strength dare the double course.

Had the diables reached, the hundred plays Accomplished, force in its task and sufficed

To lift along the athlete and ensure

A second wreath, proposed in foils for first, 50

The statist's olive as the poet's bay.

Wiser, he suffered not a twofold aim

Retard his pace, confuse his sight; at once

Poet and statist: though the multitude

Girded him over 'All thine aim thine art?

The idle poet only? No regard

For civic duty, public service, here?

We drop our ballot-bean for Sophokles!

Not only could he write "Antigone"

But — since we argued? whose penned 60

that piece

Might just as well conduct a squadron, —
straight

Good-nut, really he took on him command, Got laughed at and went back to making japes

Having allowed us our experiment

Respecting the fit use of irony?

No whit the more did athlete slacken pace

Soon the jeers grew: 'Cold hatred of his
kind,

A sea-cave suits him not the vulgar hearth!

What need of tongue-talk, with a bookish score

Would stock ten cities?" Shadow of an 70 ass?

No whit the worse did athlete touch the mark

And, at the turning-point, consign his score

Of the scornors to that final trilogy

"Hesperia," "Polichinon," and the Match

Of Life Contemplative with Active Life,

Letus against Amphilochus. Ended so

Newswise — began again: for heroes rest

Dropping shadow's evil for the entire man.

And he who thus took Contemplation's
prize

Turn'd stake-point but to face Activity, 80

Out of all shadowy hands extending help

For life's decline pledged to youth's labour

Whatever renovation flatter age. —

Society with pastime, solitude

With peace — he chose the hand that gave the heart.

Queen of Lemnos and entertainer of Jas. v.

Bade Macedonian Archelaos take
The leavings of Athenai, ash once flame.
For fifty politicians' frosty work,
One poet's ash proved ample and to spare:
He propped the state and filled the treasury, Counselled the king as might a meaner soul, Furnished the friend with what shall stand instead

Of crown and sceptre, star his name about When these are dust; for him, Euripides Last the old hand on the old phorminx¹

flung,
Clashed thence 'Alkaion,' maddened 'Pentheus' up;

Then music sighed itself away, one moan Iphigeneia made by Aulis' strand;
With her and music died Euripides.

"The poet-friend who followed him to Thrace,

Agathon, writes thus much: the merchant-
ship

Moreover brings a message from the king
To young Euripides, who went on board
This morning at Mounuchia: all is true."

I said "Thank Zeus for the great news and good!"

"Nay, the report is running in brief fire Through the town's stubbly furrow," he resumed:

—"Entertains brightly what their favourite styles

'The City of Gapers'² for a week perhaps, Supplants three luminous tales, but yesterday

Pronounced sufficient lamps to last the
month:

How Glauketes, outbidding Morsimos, Paid market-price for one Kopaic eel A thousand drachmai, and then cooked his prize

Not proper conger-fashion but in oil And nettles, as man fries the foam-fish-
kind;

How all the captains of the triremes, late Victors at Arginousai, on return

Will, for reward, be straightway put to
death;

How Mikon wagered a Thessalian mime Trained him by Lais, looked on as complete,

Against Leogoras' blood-mare koppamarked,³

Valued six talents, — swore, accomplished
so,

The girl could swallow at a draught, nor
breathe,

A choenix of unmixed Mendesian wine;
And having lost the match will — dine on herbs!

Three stories late a-flame, at once extinct, Outblazed by just 'Euripides is dead'!

"I met the concourse from the Theatre,
The audience flocking homeward: victory Again awarded Aristophanes

Precisely for his old play chopped and changed

'The Female Celebrators of the Feast' — That Thesmophoria, tried a second time.

'Never such full success!' — assured the 50 folk,

Who yet stopped praising to have word of
mouth

With 'Euthukles, the bard's own intimate, Balaustion's husband, the right man to ask.'

"Dead, yes, but how dead, may acquaintance know?

You were the couple constant at his cave:
Tell us now, is it true that women, moved By reason of his liking Krateros . . .

"I answered 'He was loved by Sokrates.'

"Nay,' said another, 'envy did the work!
For, emulating poets of the place, 60
One Arridaios, one Krateues, both Established in the royal favour, these . . .'

"Protagoras instructed him," said I.

"Phu,' whistled Comic Platon, 'hear the fact!

'Twas well said of your friend by Sophokles
'He hate our women? In his verse,
belike:

But when it comes to prose-work, — ha,
ha, ha!"

New climes don't change old manners: so,
it chanced,

Pursuing an intrigue one moonless night
With Arethousian Nikodikos' wife, 70 (Come now, his years were simply seventy-five)

Crossing the palace-court, what haps he on

But Archelaos' pack of hungry hounds?
Who tore him piecemeal ere his cry brought
help.'

"I asked: Did not you write 'The Festivals'?

You best know what dog tore him when alive.

You others, who now make a ring to hear,
Have not you just enjoyed a second treat, Proclaimed that ne'er was play more worthy prize

Than this, myself assisted at, last year, 80 And gave its worth to, — spitting on the
same?

Appraise no poetry, — price cuttlefish,
Or that seaweed-alphestes, scorpion-sort,

² Athens.

³ A certificate of high-breeding.

Much famed for mixing mud with fantasy On midnights! I interpret no foul dreams."

- If so said Euthukles, so could not I, Balaustion, say. After "Lusistraté"
No more for me of "people's privilege," No witnessing "the grand old Comedy Cœval with our freedom, which, curtailed, Were freedom's deathblow: relic of the past,
When Virtue laughingly told truth to Vice, 10 Uncensured, since the stern mouth, stuffed with flowers,
Through poetry breathed satire, perfumed blast
Which sense snuffed up while searched unto the bone!"
I was a stranger: "For first joy," urged
friends,
"Go hear our Comedy, some patriot piece That plies the selfish advocates of war With argument so unevadable That crash fall Kleons whom the finer play Of reason, tickling, deeper wounds no whit Than would a spear-thrust from a savourystalk!"
20 No: you hear knave and fool told crime and fault,
And see each scourged his quantity of stripes.
'Rough dealing, awkward language,' whine our fops:
The world's too squeamish now to bear plain words
Concerning deeds it acts with gust enough:
But, thanks to wine-lees and democracy, We've still our stage where truth calls spade a spade!
Ashamed? Phuromachos' decree provides
The sex may sit discreetly; witness all, Sorted, the good with good, the gay with
gay, 30 Themselves unseen, no need to force a blush.
A Rhodian wife and ignorant so long?
Go hear next play!"
I heard "Lusistraté." Waves, said to wash pollution from the
world,
Take that plague-memory, cure that pustule caught
As, past escape, I sat and saw the piece By one appalled at Phaidra's fate, — the chaste,
Whom, because chaste, the wicked goddess chained
To that same serpent of unchastity She loathed most, and who, coiled so, died distraught 40 Rather than make submission, loose one limb
Love-wards, at lambency of honeyed
tongue,

Or torture of the scales which scraped her snow
— I say, the piece by him who charged this piece (Because Euripides shrank not to teach, If gods be strong and wicked, man, though weak,
May prove their match by willing to be
good)
With infamies the Scythian's whip should cure —
"Such outrage done the public — Phaidra named!
Such purpose to corrupt ingenuous youth, Such insult cast on female character!" — 50
Why, when I saw that bestiality —
So beyond all brute-beast imagining,
That when, to point the moral at the close,
Poor Salabaccho, just to show how fair Was "Reconciliation," stripped her charms,
That exhibition simply bade us breathe, Seemed something healthy and commendable After obscenity grotesqued so much
It slunk away revolted at itself.
Henceforth I had my answer when our 60
sage
Pattern-proposers seniors pleaded grave
"You fail to fathom here the deep design!
All's acted in the interest of truth,
Religion, and those manners old and dear
Which made our city great when citizens Like Aristoides and like Miltiades Wore each a golden tectix¹ in his hair." What do they wear now under — Kleophon?
Well, for such reasons, — I am out of breath, But loathsomeness we needs must hurry 70
past, —
I did not go to see, nor then nor now, The "Thesmophoriazousai." But, since males
Choose to brave first, blame afterward, nor brand
Without fair taste of what they stigmatise,
Euthukles had not missed the first display, Original portrait of Euripides
By "Virtue laughingly reproving Vice":
"Virtue," — the author, Aristophanes,
Who mixed an image out of his own depths, Ticketed as I tell you. Oh, this time 80
No more pretension to recondite worth!
No joke in aid of Peace, no demagogue Pun-pelleted from Pnux, no kordax-dance Overt helped covertly the Ancient Faith!
All now was muck, home-produce, honest-
man
The author's soul secreted to a play Which gained the prize that day we heard the death.
¹ Grasshopper, used as a badge of honour.

I thought "How thoroughly death alters things!

Where is the wrong now, done our dead and great?

How natural seems grandeur in relief, Cliff-base with frothy spites against its calm!"

Euthukles interposed — he read my thought —

"O'er them, too, in a moment came the change.

The crowd's enthusiastic, to a man:
Since, rake as such may please the ordure-heap

Because of certain sparkles presumed ore,
At first flash of true lightning overhead,
They look up, nor resume their search too soon.

The insect-scattering sign is evident,
And nowhere winks a fire-fly rival now Nor bustles any beetle of the brood
With trundled dung-ball meant to menace heaven.

Contrariwise, the cry is 'Honour him!' —
'A statue in the theatre!' wants one; Another 'Bring the poet's body back, Bury him in Peiraios: o'er his tomb Let Alkamenes carve the music-witch,
The songstress-seiren, meed of melody:
Thoukudides invent his epitaph!' —
To-night the whole town pays its tribute thus."

Our tribute should not be the same, my friend!

Statue? Within our heart he stood, he stands!

As for the vest outgrown now by the form, Low flesh that clothed high soul, — a vesture's fate —

Why, let it fade, mix with the elements
There where it, falling, freed Euripides!
But for the soul that's tutelary now Till time end, o'er the world to teach and bless —

How better hail its freedom than by first Singing, we two, its own song back again, Up to that face from which flowed beauty —
face

Now abler to see triumph and take love
Than when it glorified Athenai once?

The sweet and strange Alkestis, which saved me,

Secured me — you, ends nowise, to my mind,
In pardon of Admetos. Hearts are fain
To follow cheerful weary Herakles Striding away from the huge gratitude, Club-shouldered, lion-fleece round loin and flank,

Bound on the next new labour "height o'er height

Ever surmounting, — destiny's decree!"

Thither He helps us: that's the story's end;

He smiling said so, when I told him mine — My great adventure, how Alkestis helped.
Afterward, when the time for parting fell,
He gave me, with two other precious gifts, This third and best, consummating the 5th
grace,

"Herakles," writ by his own hand, each line.

"If it have worth, reward is still to seek.
Somebody, I forget who, gained the prize And proved arch-poet: time must show!"
he smiled:

"Take this, and, when the noise tires out, judge me —

Some day, not slow to dawn, when somebody —

Who? I forget — proves nobody at all!"

Is not that day come? What if you and I Re-sing the song, inaugurate the fame?
We have not waited to acquaint ourselves 6th
With song and subject; we can prologise How, at Eurustheus' bidding, — hate strained hard, —

Herakles had departed, one time more,
On his last labour, worst of all the twelve;
Descended into Haides, thence to drag
The triple-headed hound, which sun should see

Spite of the god whose darkness whelped the Fear.

Down went the hero, "back — how should he come?"

So laughed King Lukos, an old enemy,
Who judged that absence testified defeat 7th
Of the land's loved one, — since he saved the land

And for that service wedded Megara Daughter of Thebai, realm her child should rule.

Ambition, greed and malice seized their prey,

The Heracleian House, defenceless left, Father and wife and child, to trample out Trace of its hearth-fire: since extreme old age

Wakes pity, woman's wrong wins championship,

And child may grow up man and take revenge.

Hence see we that, from out their palace- 8th
home

Hunted, for last resource they cluster now Couched on the cold ground, hapless supplicants

About their courtyard altar, — Household Zeus

It is, the Three in funeral garb beseech, Delaying death so, till deliverance come — When did it ever? — from the deep and dark.

And thus breaks silence old Amphitruon's
voice. . . .

Say I not true thus far, my Euthukles?

Suddenly, torch-light! knocking at the
door,

Loud, quick, "Admittance for the revels'
lord!"

Some unintelligible Komos-cry —
*Raw-flesh red, no cap upon his head, Dionusos, Bacchos, Phales, Iacchos,
In let him reel with the kid-skin at his heel, Where it buries in the spread of the bushy myrtle-bed!*

10 (Our Rhodian Jackdaw-song was sense to that!)

Then laughter, outbursts ruder and more rude,

Through which, with silver point, a fluting pierced,

And ever "Open, open, Bacchos bids!"

But at last — one authoritative word,
One name of an immense significance:
For Euthukles rose up, threw wide the door.

There trooped the Choros of the Comedy Crowned and triumphant; first, those flushed Fifteen

Men that wore women's garb, grotesque disguise.

20 Then marched the Three, — who played Mnesilochos,

Who, Toxotes, and who, robed right, masked rare,

Monkeyed our Great and Dead to heart's content

That morning in Athenai. Masks were down

And robes doffed now; the sole disguise was drink.

Mixing with these — I know not what gay crowd,

Girl-dancers, flute-boys, and pre-eminent Among them, — doubtless draped with such reserve

As stopped fear of the fifty drachma fine (Beside one's name on public fig-tree nailed)

30 Which women pay who in the streets walk
bare, —

Behold Elaphion of the Persic dance!
Who lately had frisked fawn-foot, and the
rest,

— All for the Patriot Cause, the Antique Faith,

The Conservation of True Poesy —
Could I but penetrate the deep design!

Elaphion, more Peiraios-known as "Phaps,"

Tripped at the head of the whole banquet-band

Who came in front now, as the first fell
back;

And foremost — the authoritative voice,
The revels-leader, he who gained the prize, 4
And got the glory of the Archon's feast —
There stood in person Aristophanes.

And no ignoble presence! On the bulge Of the clear baldness, — all his head-one
brow, —

True, the veins swelled, blue network, and there surged

A red from cheek to temple, — then retired

As if the dark-leaved chaplet damped a flame, —

Was never nursed by temperance or health.

But huge the eyeballs rolled back native
fire,

Imperiously triumphant: nostrils wide 5 Waited their incense; while the pursed mouth's pout

Aggressive, while the beak supreme above, While the head, face, nay, pillared throat thrown back,

Beard whitening under like a vinous foam,

These made a glory, of such insolence —
I thought, — such domineering defty

Hephaistos might have carved to cut the brine

For his gay brother's prow, imbrue that path

Which, purpling, recognised the conqueror.

Impudent and majestic: drunk, perhaps,
But that's religion; sense too plainly snuffed:

Still, sensuality was grown a rite.

What I had disbelieved most proved most
true.

There was a mind here, mind a-wantoning
At ease of undisputed mastery

Over the body's brood, those appetites.
Oh but he grasped them grandly, as the

god
His either struggling handful, — hurtless snakes

Held deep down, strained hard off from side and side!

Mastery his, theirs simply servitude,
So well could firm fist help intrepid eye.

Fawning and fulsome, had they licked and hissed?

At mandate of one muscle, order reigned.
They had been wreathing much familiar

now

About him on his entry; but a squeeze Choked down the pests to place: their lord stood free.

Forward he stepped: I rose and fronted
him.

"Hail, house, the friendly to Euripides!"
(So he began) "Hail, each inhabitant!"

You, lady? What, the Rhodian? Form
and face,
Victory's self upsoaring to receive The poet? Right they named you . . .
some rich name,
Vowel-buds thorned about with consonants, Fragrant, felicitous, rose-glow enriched By the Isle's unguent: some diminished
end
In ion, Kallistion? delicater still, Kubelon or Melittion, — or, suppose (Less vulgar love than bee or violet) Phibalion, for the mouth split red-fig-wise, Korakinidion for the coal-black hair, Nettarion, Phabion for the darlingness?
But no, it was some fruit-flower, Rhoidion
. . . ha,
We near the balsam-bloom — Balaustion!
Thanks,
Rhodes! Folk have called me Rhodian,
do you know?
Not fools so far! Because, if Helios wived,
As Pindaros sings somewhere prettily, Here blooms his offspring, earth-flesh with sun-fire, Rhodes' blood and Helios' gold. My phorminx, boy!
Why does the boy hang back and baulk an ode Tiptoe at spread of wing? But like
enough, Sunshine frays torchlight. Witness whom you scare, Superb Balaustion! Look outside the house!
Pho, you have quenched my Komos by first frown Struck dead all joyance: not a fluting puffs
From idle cheekband! Ah, my Choros
too?
You've eaten cuckoo-apple?¹ Dumb, you dogs?
So much good Thasian wasted on your throat
And out of them not one Threttanelo?
Nebiaretai!² Because this earth-and-sun Product looks wormwood and all bitter herbs?
Well, do I blench, though me she hates the most Of mortals? By the cabbage, off they slink!
You, too, my Chrusomelofonthion-Phaps, Girl-golding-beetle-beauty? You, abashed, Who late, supremely unabashable, Propped up my play at that important
point
When Artamouxia tricks the Toxotes?

¹ Arum maculatum, to eat which makes a fool of you.

² Vulgar noises imitating familiar sounds.

Ha, ha, — thank Hermes for the lucky throw, —
We came last comedy of the whole seven, 40
So went all fresh to judgment well-disposed
For who should fatly feast them, eye and
ear, We two between us! What, you fail your
friend?
Away then, free me of your cowardice!
Go, get you the goat's breakfast!³ Fare afield,
Ye circumcised of Egypt, pigs to sow, Back to the Priest's or forward to the crows,
So you but rid me of such company!
Once left alone, I can protect myself 50
From statuesque Balaustion pedestalled On much disapprobation and mistake!
She dares not beat the sacred brow,
beside!
Bacchos' equipment, ivy safeguards well As Phoibos' bay.

"They take me at my word!
One comfort is, I shall not want them
long,
The Archon's cry creaks, creaks, 'Curtail expense!' The war wants money, year the twenty-sixth!
Cut down our Choros number, clip costume, Save birds' wings, beetles' armour, spend the cash
In three-crest skull-caps, three days' salt- 60 fish-slice,
Three-banked-ships for these sham-ambassadors,
And what not: any cost but Comedy's!
'No Choros' — soon will follow; what care I?
Archinos and Agurhios, scrape your flint, Flay your dead dog, and curry favour so!
Choros in rags, with loss of leather next,

We lose the boys' vote, lose the song and dance,
Lose my Elaphion! Still, the actor stays.
Save but my acting, and the baldhead bard⁴

Kudathenaian and Pandionid, 70
Son of Philippos, Aristophanes Surmounts his rivals now as heretofore, Though stinted to mere sober prosy
verse —
'Manners and men,' so squeamish gets the
world!
No more 'Step forward, strip for anapæsts!'
No calling naughty people by their names,
No tickling audience into gratitude

³ Vulgar expression connected with the worship of the god.

⁴ Aristophanes himself.

With chickpease, barleygroats and nuts and plums, No setting Salabaccho . . ."

As I turned —

"True, lady, I am tolerably drunk:
The proper inspiration! Otherwise, — Phrunichos, Choirilos! — had Aischulos So foiled you at the goat-song? Drink's a
god.

How else did that old doating driveller Kratinos foil me, match my masterpiece The 'Clouds'? I swallowed cloud-distil-ment — dew

10 Undimmed by any grape-blush, knit my
brow

And gnawed my style and laughed my learnedest;

While he worked at his 'Willow-wickerflask,'

Swigging at that same flask by which he swore,

Till, sing and empty, sing and fill again, Somehow result was — what it should not
be

Next time, I promised him and kept my
word!

Hence, brimful now of Thasian . . . I'll be bound,

Mendesian, merely: triumph-night, you
know,

The High Priest entertains the conqueror, 20 And, since war worsens all things, stingily The rascal starves whom he is bound to stuff,

Choros and actors and their lord and king The poet; supper, still he needs must spread —

And this time all was conscientious fare:
He knew his man, his match, his master —
made

Amends, spared neither fish, flesh, fowl nor wine:

So merriment increased, I promise you,
Till — something happened."

Here he strangely paused.

"After that, — well, it either was the cup 30 To the Good Genius, our concluding pledge,

That wrought me mischief, decently unmixed, —

Or, what if, when that happened, need arose

Of new libation? Did you only know What happened! Little wonder I am drunk."

Euthukles, o'er the boat-side, quick, what
change,

Watch, in the water! But a second since,
It laughed a ripply spread of sun and sea,

Ray fused with wave, to never disunite.
Now, sudden all the surface, hard and black,

Lies a quenched light, dead motion: what 40
the cause?

Look up and lo, the menace of a cloud Has solemnised the sparkling, spoiled the sport!

Just so, some overshadow, some new care Stopped all the mirth and mocking on his
face

And left there only such a dark surmise
— No wonder if the revel disappeared,
So did his face shed silence every side!
I recognised a new man fronting me.

"So!" he smiled, piercing to my thought
at once,

"You see myself? Balaustion's fixed 50 regard

Can strip the proper Aristophanes
Of what our sophists, in their jargon, style His accidents? My soul sped forth but
now

To meet your hostile survey, — soul unseen,

Yet veritably cinct for soul-defence With satyr sportive quips, cranks, boss and spike,

Just as my visible body paced the street, Environed by a boon companionship Your apparition also puts to flight.

Well, what care I if, unaccounted twice, 60
I front my foe — no comicality

Round soul, and body-guard in banish-
ment?

Thank your eyes' searching, undisguised I
stand:

The merest female child may question me.
Spare not, speak bold, Balaustion!"

I did speak:

"Bold speech be — welcome to this honoured hearth,

Good Genius! Glory of the poet, glow
O' the humourist who castigates his kind, Suave summer-lightning lambency which plays

On stag-horned tree, misshapen crag askew, 70
Then vanishes with unvindictive smile

After a moment's laying black earth bare.
Splendour of wit that springs a thunder-ball —

Satire — to burn and purify the world, True aim, fair purpose: just wit justly strikes

Injustice, — right, as rightly quells the
wrong,

Finds out in knaves', fools', cowards' armoury

The tricky tinselled place fire flashes
through,

No damage else, sagacious of true ore;

Wit, learned in the laurel, leaves each wreath
O'er lyric shell or tragic barbiton,¹ — Though alien gauds be singed, — undesecrate,
The genuine solace of the sacred brow.
Ay, and how pulses flame a patriot-star Steadfast athwart our country's night of
things,
To beacon, would she trust no meteorblaze, Athenai from the rock she steers for
straight!
O light, light, light, I hail light everywhere;
No matter for the murk that was, — perchance,
That will be, — certes, never should have been Such orb's associate!

"Aristophanes!

"The merest female child may question
you?"
Once, in my Rhodes, a portent of the wave Appalled our coast: for many a darkened
day,
Intolerable mystery and fear.
Who snatched a furtive glance through crannied peak,
Could but report of snake-scale, lizard-limb, —
So swam what, making whirlpools as it went,
Maddened the brine with wrath or monstrous
sport.
"Tis Tuphon, loose, unmanacled from mount,
Declared the priests, 'no way appeasable Unless perchance by virgin-sacrifice!' — Thus grew the terror and o'erhung the doom —
Until one eve a certain female-child Strayed in safe ignorance to seacoast edge,
And there sat down and sang to please her-
self.
When all at once, large-looming from his wave,
Out leaped, chin hand-propped, pensive on the ledge,
A sea-worn face, sad as mortality,
Divine with yearning after fellowship.
He rose but breast-high. So much god she saw;
So much she sees now, and does reverence!"
Ah, but there followed tail-splash, frisk of fin!
Let cloud pass, the sea's ready laugh outbreaks.
No very godlike trace retained the mouth Which mocked with —

"So, He taught you tragedy"
I always asked 'Why may not women
act?'
Nay, wear the comic visor just as well;
Or, better, quite cast off the face-disguise.
And voice-distortion, simply look and
speak,
Real women playing women as men —
men!
I shall not wonder if things come to that,
Some day when I am distant far enough.
Do you conceive the quite new Comedy When laws allow? laws only let girls
dance,
Pipe, posture, — above all, Elaphionize, Provided they keep decent — that is,
dumb.
Ay, and, conceiving, I would execute,
Had I but two lives: one were over- 50
worked!
How penetrate encrusted prejudice, Pierce ignorance three generations thick Since first Sousarion crossed our bound-dary?
He battered with a big Megaric stone; Chionides felled oak and rough-hewed
thence
This club I wield now, having spent my life In planing knobs and sticking studs to shine;
Somebody else must try mere polished steel!"
Emboldened by the sober mood's return,
"Meanwhile," said I, "since planed and 60 studded club Once more has pashed competitors to dust,
And poet proves triumphant with that play Euthukles found last year unfortunate, — Does triumph spring from smoothness still more smoothed, Fresh studs sown thick and threefold? In plain words,
Have you exchanged brute-blows, — which teach the brute Man may surpass him in brutality, —
For human fighting, or true god like force Which breathes persuasion nor needs fight
at all?
Have you essayed attacking ignorance, 70
Convicting folly, by their opposites, Knowledge and wisdom? not by yours for ours,
Fresh ignorance and folly, new for old, Greater for less, your crime for our mistake!
It so success at last have crowned desert, Bringing surprise (dashed haply by concern
At your discovery such wild waste of
strength
— And what strength! — went so long to keep in vogue

Such warfare — and what warfare! — shamed so fast,
 So soon made obsolete, as fell their foe
 By the first arrow native to the orb, First onslaught worthy Aristophanes) — Was this conviction's entry that same strange
 'Something that happened' to confound your feast?"

"Ah, did he witness then my play that failed,
 First 'Thesmophoriazousai'? Well and
 good!

But did he also see, — your Euthukles, — 10 My 'Grasshoppers' which followed and failed too,
 Three months since, at the 'Little-in-the-Fields'?"¹

"To say that he did see that First — should say
 He never cared to see its following."

"There happens to be reason why I wrote First play and second also. Ask the cause!
 I warrant you receive ere talk be done,
 Fit answer, authorising either act.
 But here's the point: as Euthukles made vow

Never again to taste my quality, 20 So I was minded next experiment Should tickle palate — yea, of Euthukles!
 Not by such utter change, such absolute A topsy-turvy of stage-habitude As you and he want, — Comedy built fresh,
 By novel brick and mortar, base to roof, — No, for I stand too near and look too
 close!

Pleasure and pastime yours, spectators
 brave,
 Should I turn art's fixed fabric upside
 down!

Little you guess how such tough work tasks soul!

30 Not overtasks, though: give fit strength fair play,
 And strength's a demiourgos! Art renewed?

Ay, in some closet where strength shuts out — first

The friendly faces, sympathetic cheer:
 'More of the old provision none supplies So bounteously as thou, — our love, our
 pride,

Our author of the many a perfect piece!
 Stick to that standard, change were decadence!"

Next, the unfriendly: 'This time, strain will tire,

He's fresh, Ameipsias thy antagonist!"

40 — Or better, in some Salaminian cave

Where sky and sea and solitude make earth
 And man and noise one insignificance, Let strength propose itself, — behind the
 world, —

Sole prize worth winning, work that satisfies

Strength it has dared and done strength's uttermost!

After which, — clap-to closet and quit cave, —

Strength may conclude in Archelao's
 court,

And yet esteem the silken company
 So much sky-scud, sea-froth, earth-thistle-
 down,

For aught their praise or blame should joy 50 or grieve.

Strength amid crowds as late in solitude May lead the still life, ply the wordless task:

Then only, when seems need to move or
 speak,

Moving — for due respect, when statesmen
 pass,

(Strength, in the closet, watched how spiders spin)

Speaking — when fashion shows intelligence,

(Strength, in the cave, oft whistled to the gulls)

In short, has learnt first, practised afterwards!

Despise the world and reverence yourself, —

Why, you may unmake things and remake 60
 things,

And throw behind you, unconcerned
 enough,

What's made or marred: 'you teach men, are not taught!'

So marches off the stage Euripides!

"No such thin fare feeds flesh and blood like mine,

No such faint fume of fancy sates my soul,
 No such seclusion, closet, cave or court,

Suits either: give me Iostephanos² Worth making happy what coarse way she

O happy-maker, when her cries increase About the favourite! 'Aristophanes! 70

More grist to mill, here's Kleophon to grind!

He's for refusing peace, though Sparté cede Even Dekelia! Here's Kleonumos

Declaring — though he threw away his shield,

He'll thrash you till you lay your lyre aside!

Orestes bids mind where you walk of nights —

He wants your cloak as you his cudgelling:

² Violet-crowned Athens.

Here's, finally, Melanthios fat with fish,
The gormandiser-spendthrift-dramatist!
So, bustle! Pounce on opportunity!
Let fun a-screaming in Parabasis,¹ Find food for folk agape at either end, Mad for amusement! Times grow better
too,

And should they worsen, why, who laughs, forgets.

In no case, venture boy-experiments!
Old wine's the wine: new poetry drinks raw:

10 Two plays a season is your pledge, beside;
So, give us 'Wasps' again, grown hornets
now!"

Then he changed.

"Do you so detect in me — Brow-bald, chin-bearded, me, curved cheek, carved lip.

Or where soul sits and reigns in either
eye —

What suits the — stigma, I say, — style
say you,

Of 'Wine-lees-poet'? Bravest of buffoons, Less blunt than Telekleides, less obscene Than Mutilos, Hermippos: quite a match

In elegance for Eupolis himself,

20 Yet pungent as Kratinos at his best?
Graced with traditional immunity

Ever since, much about my grandsire's
time,

Some funny village-man in Megara, Lout-lord and clown-king, used a privilege,

As due religious drinking-bouts came round,
To daub his phyz, — no, that was afterward, —

He merely mounted cart with mates of choice

And traversed country, taking house by
house,

At night, — because of danger in the freak, —

30 Then hollaed 'Skin-flint starves his Clench-fist stows figs away, cheats government!

Such an one likes to kiss his neighbour's
wife,

And beat his own; while such another . . .

Dancing and verse, and there's our Com-

There's Mullos, there's Euetes, there's the stock

I shall be proud to graft my powers upon!

And these — what curds and whey for marrowy wine!

That same Alkestis you so rave about Passed muster with him for a Satyr-play,

The prig! — why trifle time with toys and 60 skits

When he could stuff four ragbags sausage-
wise

With sophistry, with bookish odds and
ends,

Sokrates, meteors, moonshine, 'Life's not
Life,'

'The tongue swore, but unsworn the mind remains,'

And fifty such concoctions, crab-tree-fruit Digested while, head low and heels in heaven,

He lay, let Comics laugh — for privilege!
Looked puzzled on, or pityingly off,

But never dreamed of paying gibe by jeer, Buffet by blow: plenty of proverb-pokes 70

At vice and folly, wicked kings, mad mobs!
No sign of wincing at my Comic lash,

No protest against infamous abuse, Malignant censure, — nought to prove I

The man like to accept this measurement 80
Of faculty, contentedly sit classed

Mere Comic Poet — since I wrote 'The Birds'?"

I thought there might lurk truth in jest's disguise.

- "Thanks!" he resumed, so quick to construe smile!
- "I answered — in my mind — these gapers thus:
- Since old wine's ripe and new verse raw, you judge —
- What if I vary vintage-mode and mix Blossom with must, give nosegay to the brew,
- Fining, refining, gently, surely, till The educated taste turns unawares From customary dregs to draught divine? Then answered — with my lips: More 'Wasps' you want?
- 10 Come next year and I give you 'Grass-hoppers'!
- And 'Grasshoppers' I gave them, — last month's play.

But I won't tell you: for — could I dispense
 With one more gird at old Aripkrades?
 How scorpion-like he feeds on human
 flesh —
 Ever finds out some novel infamy Unutterable, inconceivable, Which all the greater need was to describe Minutely, each tail-twist at ink-shed
 time . . .
 Now, what's your gesture caused by?
 What you loathe, Don't I loathe doubly, else why take such pains
 To tell it you? But keep your prejudice!
 My audience justified you! Housebreakers!
 This pattern-purity was played and failed Last Rural Dionusia — failed! for why?
 Ameipsias followed with the genuine stuff.
 He had been mindful to engage the Four — Karkinos and his dwarf-crab-family — Father and sons, they whirled like spinning-tops,
 Choros gigantically poked his fun,
 The boys' frank laugh relaxed the seniors'
 brow,
 The skies re-echoed victory's acclaim, Ameipsias gained his due, I got my dose Of wisdom for the future. Purity?
 No more of that next month, Athenai mine!
 Contrive new cut of robe who will — I patch
 The old exomis, add no purple sleeve,
 The Thesmophoriazousai, smartened up With certain plaits, shall please, I promise
 you!
 "Yes, I took up the play that failed last
 year,
 And re-arranged things; threw adroitly in, —
 No Parachoregema,¹ — men to match My women there already; and when these (I had a hit at Aristullos here, His plan how womankind should rule the roast)
 Drove men to plough — 'A-field, ye cribbed of cape!
 Men showed themselves exempt from service straight Stupidously, till all the boys cried
 'Brave!
 Then for the elders, I bethought me too, Improved upon Mnesilochos' release From the old bowman, board and binding-strap:
 I made his son-in-law Euripides Engage to put both shrewish wives away —
 'Gravity' one, the other 'Sophist-lore' — And mate with the Bald Bard's hetairai twain —

'Goodhumour' and 'Indulgence': on they tripped, Murrhiné, Akalanthis, — 'beautiful Their whole belongings' — crowd joined choros there!
 And while the Toxotes wound up his part By shower of nuts and sweetmeats on the mob,
 The woman-choros celebrated New Kalligeneia, the frank last-day rite.
 Brief, I was chaired and caressed and
 crowned
 And the whole theatre broke out a-roar, Echoed my admonition — choros-cap Rivals of mine, your hands to your faces!
Summon no more the Muses, the Graces, Since here by my side they have chosen their places!
 And so we all flocked merrily to feast,
 I, my choragos, choros, actors, mates And flutes aforesaid, friends in crowd, no
 fear,
 At the Priest's supper; and hilarity Grew none the less that, early in the piece, Ran a report, from row to row close-packed,
 Of messenger's arrival at the Port With weighty tidings, 'Of Lusandros'
 flight,
 Opined one; 'That Euboeia penitent Sends the Confederation fifty ships,' Preferred another; while 'The Great King's Eye'²
 Has brought a present for Elaphion here
 That rarest peacock Kompalakuthes!
 Such was the supposition of a third.
 'No matter what the news,' friend Strattis laughed,
 'It won't be worse for waiting: while each click
 Of the klepsudra sets a-shaking grave Resentment in our shark's-head, boiled and spoiled
 By this time: dished in Sphettian vinegar, Silphion and honey, served with cocks'- brain-sauce!
 So, swift to supper, Poet! No mistake, This play; nor, like the unflavoured
 "Grasshoppers," Salt without thyme!' Right merrily we supped,
 Till — something happened.
 "Out it shall, at last!
 "Mirth drew to ending, for the cup was
 crowned
 To the Triumphant! 'Kleonclapper erst, Now, Plier of a scourge Euripides Fairly turns tail from, flying Attiké For Makedonia's rocks and frosts and
 bears,

² A nickname in "The Acharnians."

Where, furry grown, he growls to match the squeak

Of girl-voiced, crocus-vested Agathon!
Ha ha, he he! When suddenly a knock — Sharp, solitary, cold, authoritative.

"Babaiax! Sokrates a-passing by,
A-peering in for Aristullos' sake,
To put a question touching Comic Law?"

"No! Enters an old pale-swathed majesty, Makes slow mute passage through two ranks as mute, 10 (Strattis stood up with all the rest, the sneak!)

Grey brow still bent on ground, upraised at length

When, our Priest reached, full-front the vision paused.

"'Priest!' — the deep tone succeeded the fixed gaze —

'Thou carest that thy god have spectacle Decent and seemly; wherefore I announce That, since Euripides is dead to-day, My Choros, at the Greater Feast, next
month,
Shall, clothed in black, appear ungarlanded!'

"Then the grey brow sank low, and Sophokles 20 Re-swathed him, sweeping doorward:

mutely passed

'Twixt rows as mute, to mingle possibly With certain gods who convoy age to port;
And night resumed him.

"When our stupor broke,
Chirpings took courage, and grew audible.

'Dead — so one speaks now of Euripides!
Ungarlanded dance Choros, did he say?
I guess the reason: in extreme old age
No doubt such have the gods for visitants.
Why did he dedicate to Herakles

30 An altar else, but that the god, turned Judge,

Told him in dream who took the crown of gold?

He who restored Akropolis the theft, Himself may feel perhaps a timely twinge
At thought of certain other crowns he filched

From — who now visits Herakles the Judge.

Instance "Medeia!" that play yielded palm

To Sophokles; and he again — to whom?
Euphorion! Why? Ask Herakles the Judge!

'Ungarlanded, just means — economy!

40 Suppress robes, chaplets, everything suppress Except the poet's present! An old tale Put capitably by Trugaios — eh?

— News from the world of transformation strange!

How Sophokles is grown Simonides.

And, — aged, rotten, — all the same, for greed

Would venture on a hurdle out to sea! —

So jokes Philonides. Kallistratos Retorts — Mistake! Instead of stinginess,

The fact is, in extreme decrepitude,

He has discarded poet and turned priest, so

Priest of Half-Hero Alkon: visited

In his own house too by Asklepios' self,

So he avers. Meanwhile, his own estate

Lies fallow; Iophon's the manager, —

Nay, touches up a play, brings out the same,

Asserts true sonship. See to what you sink

After your dozen-dozen prodigies!

Looking so old — Euripides seems young, Born ten years later.'

'Just his tricky style!

Since, stealing first away, he wins first word

Out of good-natured rival Sophokles,

Procures himself no bad panegyric.

Had fate willed otherwise, himself were taxed

To pay survivor's-tribute, — harder squeezed

From anybody beaten first to last,

Than one who, steadily a conqueror,

Finds that his magnanimity is tasked

To merely make pretence and — beat itself!

"So chirped the feasters though suppressedly.

"But I — what else do you suppose? — had pierced Quite through friends' outside-straining, foes' mock-praise,

And reached conviction hearted under all.

Death's rapid line had closed a life's account,

And cut off, left unalterably clear

The summed-up value of Euripides.

"Well, it might be the Thasian! Certainly

There sang suggestive music in my ears;

And, through — what sophists style — the wall of sense

My eyes pierced: death seemed life and life seemed death,

Envisaged that way, now, which I, before,

Conceived was just a moonstruck mood.

Quite plain

There re-insisted, — ay, each prim stiff phrase

Of each old play, my still-new laughing-stock,

Had meaning, well worth poet's pains to state, Should life prove half true life's term, — death, the rest.
As for the other question, late so large
Now all at once so little, — he or I, Which better comprehended playwright craft, —
There, too, old admonition took fresh
point.
As clear recurred our last word-interchange Two years since, when I tried with 'Ploutos.' 'Vain!'
10 Saluted me the cold grave-bearded bard —
'Vain, this late trial, Aristophanes!
None baulks the genius with impunity!
You know what kind's the nobler, what makes grave
Or what makes grin; there's yet a nobler
still,
Possibly, — what makes wise, not grave, —
and glad,
Not grinning: whereby laughter joins with
tears,
Tragic and Comic Poet prove one power,
And Aristophanes becomes our Fourth — Nay, greatest! Never needs the Art stand
still,
20 But those Art leans on lag, and none like
you,
Her strongest of supports, whose step aside Undoes the march: defection checks advance Too late adventured! See the "Ploutos"
here!
This step decides your foot from old to
new — Proves you relinquish song and dance and jest,
Discard the beast, and, rising from all-fours, Fain would paint, manlike, actual human
life,
Make veritable men think, say and do.
Here's the conception: which to execute, 30 Where's the force? Spent! Ere the race began, was breath:
O' the runner squandered on each friendly
fool —
Wit-fireworks fizzed off while day craved no flame:
How should the night receive her due of fire Flared out in Wasps and Horses, Clouds and Birds, Prodigiously a-crackle? Rest content!
The new adventure for the novel man Born to that next success myself foresee
In right of where I reach before I rest.
At end of a long course, straight all the way,
Well may there tremble somewhat into ken 40 The untrod path, clouds veiled from earlier gaze!
None may live two lives: I have lived mine
through,

Die where I first stand still. You retrograde.
I leave my life's work. I compete with
you,
My last with your last, my Antiope — Phoinissai — with this Ploutos? No, I
think!
Ever shall great and awful Victory Accompany my life — in Maketis If not Athenai. Take my farewell,
friend!
Friend, — for from no consummate ex- 50 cellence
Like yours, whatever fault may countervail,
Do I profess estrangement: murk the marsh,
Yet where a solitary marble block Blanches the gloom, there let the eagle perch!
You show — what splinters of Pentelikos, Islanded by what ordure! Eagles fly, Rest on the right place, thence depart as
free;
But 'ware man's footstep, would it traverse mire Untainted! Mire is safe for worms that crawl.'
"Balaustion! Here are very many words, 60 All to portray one moment's rush of
thought, —
And much they do it! Still, you understand.
The Archon, the Feast-master, read their sum
And substance, judged the banquet-glow extinct,
So rose, discreetly if abruptly, crowned The parting cup, — 'To the Good Genius
then!'
"Up starts young Strattis for a final flash:
'Ay the Good Genius! To the Comic Muse,
She who evolves superiority,
Triumph and joy from sorrow, unsuccess 70
And all that's incomplete in human life;
Who proves such actual failure transient
wrong,
Since out of body uncouth, halt and maimed — Since out of soul grotesque, corrupt or blank —
Fancy, uplifted by the Muse, can flit
To soul and body, reinstate them Man: Beside which perfect man, how clear we
see Divergency from type was earth's effect!
Escaping whence by laughter, — Fancy's feat, —
We right man's wrong, establish true for 80
false, —
Above misshapen body, uncouth soul,

Reach the fine form, the clear intelligence —

Above unseemliness, reach decent law, —
By laughter: attestation of the Muse
That low-and-ugsome is not signed and sealed

Incontrovertibly man's portion here,
Or, if here, — why, still high-and-fair exists

In that ethereal realm where laughs our soul

Lift by the Muse. Hail thou her ministrant!

Hail who accepted no deformity

10 In man as normal and remediless, But rather pushed it to such gross extreme That, outraged, we protest by eye's recoil
The opposite proves somewhere rule and law!

Hail who implied, by limning Lamachos, Plenty and pastime wait on peace, not war!

Philokleon — better bear a wrong than plead,

Play the litigious fool to stuff the mouth Of dikast with the due three-obol fee!

The Paphlagonian — stick to the old sway 20 Of few and wise, not rabble-government!

Trugaïos, Pisthetairos, Strepsiades, — Why multiply examples? Hail, in fine,
The hero of each painted monster — so Suggesting the unpictured perfect shape!
Pour out! A laugh to Aristophanes!

"Stay, my fine Strattis" — and I stopped applause —

"To the Good Genius — but the Tragic Muse!

She who instructs her poet, bids man's soul

Play man's part merely nor attempt the gods'

30 Ill-guessed of! Task humanity to height, Put passion to prime use, urge will, unshamed

When will's last effort breaks in impotence!

No power forego, elude: no weakness, — plied

Fairly by power and will, — renounce, deny!

Acknowledge, in such miscalled weakness strength

Latent: and substitute thus things for words!

Make man run life's race fairly, — legs and feet,

Craving no false wings to o'erfly its length!

Trust on, trust ever, trust to end — in truth!

40 By truth of extreme passion, utmost will,
Shame back all false display of either force —

Barrier about such strenuous heat and glow,
That cowardice shall shirk contending, — cant,

Pretension, shrivel at truth's first approach!

Pour to the Tragic Muse's ministrant Who, as he pictured pure Hippolotos, Abolished our earth's blot Ariphraides;
Who, as he drew Bellerophon the bold, Proclaimed Kleonumos incredible; Who, as his Theseus towered up man once 50
more,

Made Alkibiades shrink boy again!

A tear — no woman's tribute, weak exchange

For action, water spent and heart's-blood saved —

No man's regret for greatness gone, ungraced

Perchance by even that poor meed, man's praise —

But some god's superabundance of desire, Yearning of will to 'scape necessity, —

Love's overbrimming for self-sacrifice, Whence good might be, which never else may be,

By power displayed, forbidden this strait 60 sphere, —

Effort expressible one only way — Such tear from me fall to Euripides!"

The Thasian! — All, the Thasian, I account!

Whereupon outburst the whole company Into applause and — laughter, would you think?

"The unrivalled one! How, never at a loss,

He turns the Tragic on its Comic side Else imperceptible! Here's death itself —

Death of a rival, of an enemy, — Scarce seen as Comic till the master-touch 70

Made it acknowledge Aristophanes!
Lo, that Euripidean laurel-tree

Struck to the heart by lightning! Sokrates Would question us, with buzz of how and why,

Wherefore the berry's virtue, the bloom's vice,

Till we all wished him quiet with his friend;

Agathon would compose an elegy, Lyric bewailment fit to move a stone,

And, stones responsive, we might wince 'tis like;

Nay, with most cause of all to weep the 80
least,

Sophokles ordains mourning for his sake
While we confess to a remorseful twinge: —

Suddenly, who but Aristophanes, Prompt to the rescue, puts forth solemn hand,

Singles us out the tragic tree's best branch,

Persuades it groundward and, at tip, appends,
For votive-visor, Faun's goat-grinning face!
Back it flies, evermore with jest a-top,
And we recover the true mood, and
laugh!"

"I felt as when some Nikias, — ninny-like Troubled by sunspot-portent, moon-eclipse, —

At fault a little, sees no choice but sound Retreat from foe-man; and his troops mistake

The signal, and hail onset in the blast, 10 And at their joyous answer, alalé, Back the old courage brings the scattered
wits;

He wonders what his doubt meant, quick confirms

The happy error, blows the charge amain.
So I repaired things.

"Both be praised" thanked I.

"You who have laughed with Aristophanes,

You who wept rather with the Lord of Tears!

Priest, do thou, president alike o'er each,
Tragic and Comic function of the god,
Help with libation to the blended twain!

20 Either of which who serving, only serves — Proclaims himself disqualified to pour

To that Good Genius — complex Poetry, Uniting each god-grace, including both:

Which, operant for body as for soul,
Masters alike the laughter and the tears,

Supreme in lowliest earth, sublimest sky.
Who dares disjoin these, — whether he ignores

Body or soul, whichever half destroys, — Maims the else perfect manhood, perpetrates

30 Again the inexpiable crime we curse — Hacks at the Hermai, halves each guardian shape

Combining, nowise vainly, prominence
Of august head and enthroned intellect,

With homelier symbol of asserted sense, — Nature's prime impulse, earthly appetite.

For, when our folly ventures on the freak,
Would fain abolish joy and fruitfulness,

Mutilate nature — what avails the Head Left solitarily predominant, —

40 Unbodied soul, — not Hermes, both in
one?

I, no more than our City, acquiesce In such a desecration, but defend Man's double nature — ay, wert thou its foe!

Could I once more, thou cold Euripides,

Encounter thee, in nought would I abate
My warfare, nor subdue my worst attack

On thee whose life-work preached 'Raise soul, sink sense!

Evirate Hermes!" — would avenge the god,

And justify myself. Once face to face, Thou, the argute and tricky, shouldst not 50 wrap,

As thine old fashion was, in silent scorn
The breast that quickened at the sting of
truth,

Nor turn from me, as, if the tale be true,
From Lais when she met thee in thy walks, And questioned why she had no rights as
thou:

Not so shouldst thou betake thee, be assured,

To book and pencil, deign me no reply!
I would extract an answer from those lips

So closed and cold, were mine the garden-
chance!

Gone from the world! Does none remain 60 to take

Thy part and ply me with thy sophist-skill?
No sun makes proof of his whole potency

For gold and purple in that orb we view:
The apparent orb does little but leave blind

The audacious, and confused the worshipping;

But, close on orb's departure, must succeed
The serviceable cloud, — must intervene,

Induce expenditure of rose and blue, Reveal what lay in him was lost to us.

So, friends, what hinders, as we homeward 70
go,

If, privileged by triumph gained to-day,
We clasp that cloud our sun left saturate,

The Rhodian rcsy with Euripides?
Not of my audience on my triumph-day,

She nor her husband! After the night's news Neither will sleep but watch; I know the mood.

Accompany! my crown declares my right!
And heré you stand with those warm golden eyes!

"In honest language, I am scarce too sure Whether I really felt, indeed expressed 80

Then, in that presence, things I now repeat:

Nor half, nor any one word, — will that
do?

May be, such eyes must strike conviction,
turn

One's nature bottom upwards, show the base —

The live rock latent under wave and foam: Superimposure these! Yet solid stuff

Will ever and anon, obeying star, (And what star reaches rock-nerve like an

eye?)

Swim up to surface, spout or mud or flame,
And find no more to do than sink as fast. 90

"Anyhow, I have followed happily The impulse, pledged my Genius with

effect, Since, come to see you, I am shown —
myself!"

I answered:

"One of us declared for both
'Welcome the glory of Aristophanes.'
The other adds: and, — if that glory
last,
Nor marsh-born vapour creep to veil the
same, —

Once entered, share in our solemnity!
Commemorate, as we, Euripides!"

"What?" he looked round, "I darken the bright house?
Profane the temple of your deity?
That's true! Else wherefore does he stand portrayed?"

30 What, Rhodian paint and pencil saved so
much,

Beard, freckled face, brow — all but breath, I hope!

Come, that's unfair: myself am somebody, Yet my pictorial fame's just potter's-
work, —

I merely figure on men's drinking-mugs!
I and the Flat-nose, Sophroniskos' son, Oft make a pair. But what's this lies
below?

His table-book and graver, playwright's tool!

And lo, the sweet psalterion, strung and screwed,

Whereon he tried those le-ê-ê-ê-ês 20 And ke-ê-ê-ê-ês and turns and trills, Lovely lark's tirra-lirra, lad's delight!
Aischulos' bronze-throat eagle-bark at
blood

Has somehow spoiled my taste for twitter-ings!

With . . . what, and did he leave you
'Herakles'?

The 'Frenzied Hero,' one unfractured sheet,

No pine-wood tablets smeared with treacherous wax —

Papuros perfect as e'er tempted pen!

This sacred twist of bay-leaves dead and sere

Must be that crown the fine work failed to catch, —

30 No wonder! This might crown 'Antiope.' 'Herakles' triumph? In your heart perhaps!

But elsewhere? Come now, I'll explain
the case,

Show you the main mistake. Give me the sheet!"

I interrupted:

"Aristophanes!

The stranger-woman sues in her abode —
'Be honoured as our guest!' But, call it — shrine,

Then 'No dishonour to the Daimon!' bids

The priestess, 'or expect dishonour's
due!"

You enter fresh from your worst infamy,
Last instance of long outrage; yet I pause, 46 Withhold the word a-tremble on my lip, Incline me, rather, yearn to reverence, —
So you but suffer that I see the blaze And not the bolt, — the splendid fancy-fling,

Not the cold iron malice, the launched lie Whence heavenly fire has withered; impotent,

Yet execrable, leave it 'neath the look Of yon impassive presence! What he scorned,

His life long, need I touch, offend my foot,
To prove that malice missed its mark, that 50
lie

Cumbers the ground, returns to whence it
came?

I marvel, I deplore, — the rest be mute!
But, throw off hate's celestuality, —

Show me, apart from song-flash and wit-
flame,

A mere man's hand ignobly clenched against

Yon supreme calmness, — and I interpose, Such as you see me! Silk breaks light-ning's blow!"

He seemed to scarce so much as notice me, Aught had I spoken, save the final phrase:
Arrested there. 60

"Euripides grown calm!
Calmness supreme means dead and therefore safe,"

He muttered; then more audibly began —

"Dead! Such must die! Could people comprehend!

There's the unfairness of it! So obtuse Are all: from Solon downward with his saw

'Let none revile the dead, — no, though the son,

Nay, far descendant, should revile thy-
self!' —

To him who made Elektra, in the act Of wreaking vengeance on her worst of foes,

Scruple to blame, since speech that blames 7 insults

Too much the very villain life-released.

Now, I say, only after death, begins

That formidable claim, — immunity

Of faultiness from fault's due punishment!

The living, who defame me, — why, they
live:

Fools, — I best prove them foolish by their
life,

Will they but work on, lay their work by
mine,

And wait a little, one Olympiad, say!
Then — where's the vital force, mine froze
beside?

The sturdy fibre, shamed my brittle stuff?
The school-correctness, sure of wise award
When my vagaries cease to tickle taste?
Where's censure that must sink me, judgment big

Awaiting just the word posterity Pants to pronounce? Time's wave breaks, buries — whom,

Fools, when myself confronts you four years hence?

10 But die, ere next Lenaia, — safely so You 'scape me, slink with all your ignorance,

Stupidity and malice, to that hole O'er which survivors croak 'Respect the
dead!'

Ay, for I needs must! But allow me clutch
Only a carrion-handful, lend it sense, (Mine, not its own, or could it answer me?) And question, 'You, I pluck from hiding-
place,

Whose cant was, certain years ago, my
'Clouds'

Might last until the swallows came with Spring —

20 Whose chatter, 'Birds' are unintelligible, Mere psychologic puzzling: poetry?

List, the true lay to rock a cradle with!
O man of Mitulene, wondrous wise!

— Would not I rub each face in its own filth To tune of 'Now that years have come and gone,

How does the fact stand? What's demonstrable

By time, that tries things? — your own test, not mine

Who think men are, were, ever will be fools,

Though somehow fools confute fools, — as these, you!

30 Don't mumble to the sheepish twos and threes

You cornered and called 'audience'!
Face this me

Who know, and can, and — helped by fifty years —

Do pulverise you pygmies, then as now!

"Ay, now as then, I pulverise the brood, Balaustion! Mindful, from the first,
where foe

Would hide head safe when hand had flung its stone,

I did not turn cheek and take pleasantry, But flogged while skin could purple and flesh start,

To teach fools whom they tried conclusions
with.

40 First face a-splutter at me got such splotch Of prompt slab mud as, filling mouth to maw,

Made its concern thenceforward not so
much

To criticise me as go cleanse itself.

The only drawback to which huge de-
light, —

(He saw it, how he saw it, that calm cold Sagacity you call Euripides!)

— Why, 'tis that, make a muckheap of a
man,

There, pillared by your prowess, he remains,

Immortally immerded. Not so he!
Men pelted him but got no pellet back.

50 He reasoned, I'll engage, — 'Acquaint
the world

Certain minuteness butted at my knee?
Dogface Eruxis, the small satirist, —

What better would the manikin desire Than to strut forth on tiptoe, notable

As who, so far up, fouled me in the flank?'
So dealt he with the dwarfs: we giants, too,

Why must we emulate their pin-point play?
Render imperishable — impotence,

For mud throw mountains? Zeus, by 60 mud unreached, —

Well, 'twas no dwarf he heaved Olumpos at!"

My heart burned up within me to my
tongue.

"And why must men remember, ages
hence,

Who it was rolled down rocks, but refuse
too —

Strattis might steal from! mixture-monument,

Recording what? 'I, Aristophanes,
Who boast me much inventive in my art,

Against Euripides thus volleyed muck Because, in art, he too extended bounds.

70 I — patriot, loving peace and hating war, —

Choosing the rule of few, but wise and good, Rather than mob-dictature, fools and

knaves
However multiplied their mastery, —

Despising most of all the demagogue, (Noisome air-bubble, buoyed up, borne along

By kindred breath of knave and fool below,

Whose hearts swell proudly as each puffing
face

Grows big, reflected in that glassy ball, Vacuity, just bellied out to break

And righteously bespatter friends the 80
first) —

I loathing, — beyond less puissant speech Than my own god-grand language to declare, —

The fawning, cozenage and calumny

Wherewith such favourite feeds the populace

That fan and set him flying for reward: —

I who, detecting what vice underlies Thought's superstructure, — fancy's sludge and slime
'Twixt fact's sound floor and thought's mere surface-growth Of hopes and fears which root no deeper
down
Than where all such mere fungi breed and bloat — Namely, man's misconception of the
God: —
I, loving, hating, wishful from my soul That truth should triumph, falsehood have defeat,
— Why, all my soul's supremacy of power 10 Did I pour out in volley just on him Who, his whole life long, championed every cause
I called my heart's cause, loving as I
loved,
Hating my hates, spurned falsehood, championed truth, — Championed truth not by flagellating foe
With simple rose and lily, gibe and jeer, Sly wink of boon-companion o'er his bowze Who, while he blames the liquor, smacks
the lip, Blames, doubtless, but leers condonation
too, —
No, the balled fist broke brow like thunderbolt, 20 Battered till brain flew! Seeing which descent,
None questioned that was first acquaintance-ship,
The avenger's with the vice he crashed through bone.
Still, he displeased me; and I turned from foe
To fellow-fighter, flung much stone, more mud, —
But missed him, since he lives aloof, I see.
Pah! stop more shame, deep-cutting glory
through,
Nor add, this poet, learned, — found no taunt
Tell like 'That other poet studies books!' Wise, — cried 'At each attempt to move
our hearts,
30 He uses the mere phrase of daily life!'
Witty, — 'His mother was a herb-woman!' Veracious, honest, loyal, fair and good, — 'It was Kephisophon who helped him
write!'
"Whence, — O the tragic end of comedy! — Balaustion pities Aristophanes.
For, who believed him? Those who laughed so loud?
They heard him call the sun Sicilian cheese!
Had he called true cheese — curd, would muscle move?

What made them laugh but the enormous
lie?
'Kephisophon wrote Herakles? ha, ha, 40 What can have stirred the wine-dregs, souring the soul
And set a-lying Aristophanes?
Some accident at which he took offence!
The Tragic Master in a moody muse Passed him unhailing, and it hurts — it hurts!
Beside, there's licence for the Wine-leessong!'"

Blood burnt the cheek-bone, each black eye flashed fierce.

"But this exceeds our licence! Stay awhile —
That's the solution! both are foreigners, The fresh-come Rhodian lady and her 50
spouse
The man of Phokis: newly resident, Nowise instructed — that explains it all!
No born and bred Athenian but would
smile,
Unless frown seemed more fit for ignorance.
These strangers have a privilege!

"You blame"
(Presently he resumed with milder mien)
"Both theory and practice — Comedy: Blame her from altitudes the Tragic
friend
Rose to, and upraised friends along with
him,
No matter how. Once there, all's cold and fine, Passionless, rational; our world beneath Shows (should you condescend to grace so
much
As glance at poor Athenai) grimly gross —
A population which, mere flesh and blood, Eats, drinks and kisses, falls to fisticuffs,
Then hugs as hugely: speaks too as it acts, Prodigiously talks nonsense, — townsmen needs
Must parley in their town's vernacular.
Such world has, of two courses, one to choose:
Unworld itself, — or else go blackening off 7
To its crow-kindred, leave philosophy Her heights serene, fit perch for owls like
you.
Now, since the world demurs to either
course,
Permit me, — in default of boy or girl, So they be reared Athenian, good and
true, —
To praise what you most blame! Hear Art's defence!
I'll prove our institution, Comedy, Coëval with the birth of freedom, matched So nice with our Republic, that its growth

Measures each greatness, just as its decline Would signalise the downfall of the pair.
Our Art began when Bacchos . . . never
mind!

You and your master don't acknowledge
gods:

'They are not, no, they are not!' well, —
began

When the rude instinct of our race out-
spoke,

Found, — on recurrence of festivity Occasioned by black mother-earth's good
will

To children, as they took her vintage-gifts, —

10 Found — not the least of many benefits — That wine unlocked the stiffest lip, and loosed

The tongue late dry and reticent of joke, Through custom's gripe which gladness thrusts aside.

So, emulating liberalities, Heaven joined with earth for that god's day
at least,

Renewed man's privilege, grown obsolete,
Of telling truth nor dreading punishment.
Whereon the joyous band disguised their forms

With skins, beast-fashion, daubed each phyz with dregs,

20 Then hollaed 'Neighbour, you are fool, you — knave,

You — hard to serve, you — stingy to reward!

The guiltless crowed, the guilty sunk their crest,

And good folk gained thereby, 'twas evident.

Whence, by degrees, a birth of happier
thought,

The notion came — not simply this to say,
But this to do — prove, put in evidence,

And act the fool, the knave, the harsh, the hunks,

Who did prate, cheat, shake fist, draw purse-string tight,

As crowd might see, which only heard
before.

30 "So played the Poet, with his man of parts;

And all the others, found unqualified To mount cart and be persons, made the
mob,

Joined choros, fortified their fellows' fun, Anticipated the community,

Gave judgment which the public ratified.
Suiting rough weapon doubtless to plain
truth,

They flung, for word-artillery, why — filth;

Still, folk who wiped the unsavoury salute From visage, would prefer the mess to wit —

Steel, poked through midriff with a civil 40
speech,

As now the way is: then, the kindlier
mode

Was — drub not stab, ribroast not scarify!
So did Sousarion introduce, and so

Did I, acceding, find the Comic Art: Club, — if I call it, — notice what's implied!

An engine proper for rough chastisement,
No downright slaying: with impunity — Provided crabtree, steeped in oily joke, Deal only such a bruise as laughter cures.
I kept the gained advantage: stickled 50
still

For club-law — stout fun and allowanced thumps:

Knocked in each knob a crevice to hold joke

As fig-leaf holds the fat-fry.

"Next, whom thrash?

Only the coarse fool and the clownish
knave?

Higher, more artificial, composite Offence should prove my prowess, eye and arm!

Not who robs henroost, tells of untaxed
figs,

Spends all his substance on stewed ellopsfish,

Or gives a pheasant to his neighbour's
wife:

No! strike malpractice that affects the 60
State,

The common weal — intriguer or poltroon, Venality, corruption, what care I

If shrewd or witless merely? — so the thing Lay sap to aught that made Athenai bright

And happy, change her customs, lead astray

Youth or age, play the demagogue at Pnux, The sophist in Palaistra, or — what's worst,

As widest mischief, — from the Theatre Preach innovation, bring contempt on oaths,

Adorn licentiousness, despise the Cult 70

Are such to be my game? Why, then there wants

Quite other cunning than a cudgel-sweep!
Grasp the old stout stock, but new tip with steel

Each boss, if I would bray — no callous
hide

Simply, but Lamachos in coat of proof,
Or Kleon cased about with impudence!

Shaft pushed no worse while point pierced sparkling so

That none smiled 'Sportive, what seems savagest,

— Innocuous anger, spiteless rustic mirth!
Yet spiteless in a sort, considered well, 80

Since I pursued my warfare till each wound

Went through the mere man, reached the principle

Worth purging from Athenai. Lamachos? No, I attacked war's representative; Kleon? No, flattery of the populace; Sokrates? No, but that pernicious seed Of sophists whereby hopeful youth is taught

To jabber argument, chop logic, pore On sun and moon, and worship Whirligig: O your tragedian, with the lofty grace, 10 Aims at no other and effects as much? Candidly: what's a polished period worth, Filed curt sententiousness of loaded line, When he who deals out doctrine, primly steps

From just that selfsame moon he maunders of,

And, blood-thinned by his pallid nutriment,

Proposes to rich earth-blood — purity?

In me, 'twas equal-balanced flesh rebuked Excess alike in stuff-guts Glauketes Or starveling Chairephon; I challenged both, — 20 Strong understander of our common life, I urged sustinment of humanity.

Whereas when your tragedian cries up Peace —

He's silent as to cheesecakes Peace may chew;

Seeing through rabble-rule, he shuts his eye To what were better done than crowding Pnux —

That's — dance 'Threttanelo, the Kuklops drunk!'

"My power has hardly need to vaunt itself! Opposers peep and mutter, or speak plain:

30 "No naming names in Comedy!" votes one, "Nor villifying live folk!" legislates

Another, "urge amendment on the dead!" "Don't throw away hard cash," supplies a third,

'But crib from actor's dresses, choros-treats!'

Then Kleon did his best to bully me:

Called me before the Law Court: 'Such a play

Satirised citizens with strangers there, Such other,' — why, its fault was in myself!

I was, this time, the stranger, privileged To act no play at all, — Egyptian, I —

40 Rhodian or Kameirensian, Aiginete, Lindian, or any foreigner he liked —

Because I can't write Attic, probably!

Go ask my rivals, — how they roughed my fleece,

And how, shorn pink themselves, the huddled sheep

Shiver at distance from the snapping shears!

Why must thy needs provoke me?

"All the same,

No matter for my triumph, I foretell Subsidence of the day-star: quench his beams

No Aias e'er was equal to the feat By throw of shield, tough-hided seven times 50 seven,

'Twixt sky and earth! 'tis dullards soft and sure

Who breathe against his brightest, here a sigh

And there a 'So let be, we pardon you!' Till the minute mist hangs a block, has tamed Noonblaze to 'twilight mild and equable,' Vote the old women spinning out of doors.

Give me the earth-spasm, when the lion ramped

And the bull gendered in the brave gold flare!

O you shall have amusement, — better still,

Instruction! no more horse-play, naming 60 names,

Taxing the fancy when plain sense will serve!

Thearion,¹ now, my friend who bakes you bread,

What's worthier limning than his household life?

His whims and ways; his quarrels with the spouse,

And how the son, instead of learning knead

Kilikian loaves, brings heart-break on his sire

By buying horseflesh branded Sun, each flank,

From shrewd Menippos who imports the ware:

While pretty daughter Kepphé too much haunts

The shop of Sporgilos the barber! brave! 70 Out with Thearion's meal-tub politics

In lieu of Pisthetairos, Strepsiades! That's your exchange? O Muse of Megara!

Advise the fools 'Feed babe on weasel-lap For wild-boar's marrow, Cheiron's heropap, And rear for man — Aripkrades, may-hap!'

Yes, my Balaustion, yes, my Euthukles, That's your exchange, — who, foreigners in fact

And fancy, would impose your squeamishness

On sturdy health, and substitute such 80 brat

For the right offspring of us Rocky Ones,² Because babe kicks the cradle, — crows, not mewls!

² Athenians.

'Which brings me to the prime fault, poison-speck

Whence all the plague springs — that first feud of all

'Twixt me and you and your Euripides.

'Unworld the world,' frowns he, my opposite.

I cry, 'Life!' 'Death,' he groans, 'our better Life!'

Despise what is — the good and graspable, Prefer the out of sight and in at mind,
To village-joy, the well-side violet-patch, The jolly club-feast when our field's in soak,

10 Roast thrushes, hare-soup, pea-soup, deep washed down

With Peparethian; the prompt paying off That black-eyed brown-skinned country-flavoured wench

We caught among our brushwood foraging:
On these look fig-juice, curdle up life's cream,

And fall to magnifying misery!
Or, if you condescend to happiness, Why, talk, talk, talk about the empty
name

While thing's self lies neglected 'neath your nose!

I need particular discourtesy

60 And private insult from Euripides

To render contest with him credible?

Say, all of me is outraged! one stretched
sense,

I represent the whole Republic, — gods,
Heroes, priests, legislators, poets, — prone,
And pummelled into insignificance,

If will in him were matched with power of stroke.

For see what he has changed or hoped to
change!

How few years since, when he began the fight,

Did there beat life indeed Athenai through!

30 Plenty and peace, then! Hellas thundersmote

The Persian. He himself had birth, you
say,

That morn salvation broke at Salamis, And heroes still walked earth. Themistokles —

Surely his mere back-stretch of hand could still

Find, not so lost in dark, Odusseus? — he Holding as surely on to Herakles, —

Who touched Zeus, link by link, the unruptured chain!

Were poets absent? Aischulos might hail —

With Pindaros, Theognis, — whom for sire?

40 Homeros' self, departed yesterday!

While Hellas, saved and sung to, then and
thus, —

Ah, people, — ah, lost antique liberty!

We lived, ourselves, undoubted lords of
earth:

Wherever olives flourish, corn yields crop
To constitute our title — ours such land!
Outside of oil and breadstuff, — barbarism!
What need of conquest? Let barbarians starve!

Devote our whole strength to our sole
defence,

Content with peerless native products,
home,

Beauty profuse in earth's mere sights and 50
sounds,

Such men, such women, and such gods their guard!

The gods? he worshipped best who feared them most,

And left their nature uninquied into,
— Nature? their very names! pay reverence,

Do sacrifice for our part, theirs would be To prove benignantest of playfellows.

With kindly humanism they countenanced
Our emulation of divine escapes

Through sense and soul: soul, sense are made to use;

Use each, acknowledging its god the while! 60 Crush grape, dance, drink, indulge, for Bacchos' sake!

'Tis Aphrodité's feast-day — frisk and
fling,

Provided we observe our oaths, and house Duly the stranger: Zeus takes umbrage

else!

Ah, the great time — had I been there to taste!

Perikles, right Olumpian, — occupied
As yet with getting an Olumpus reared

Marble and gold above Akropolis, Wisely so spends what thrifty fools amassed

For cut-throat projects. Who carves Pro- 70 machos?!

Who writes the Oresteia?

"Ah, the time!

For, all at once, a cloud has blanched the
blue,

A cold wind creeps through the close vineyard-rank,

The olive-leaves curl, violets crisp and
close

Like a nymph's wrinkling at the bath's first splash

On breast. (Your pardon!) There's a restless change,

Deterioration. Larks and nightingales Are silenced, here and there a gor-crow

grim

Flaps past, as scenting opportunity.

Where Kimon passaged to the Boulé once, 80 A starveling crew, unkempt, unshorn, unwashed,

! A famous bronze statue in Athens of Athene Promachos, visible from afar.

Occupy altar-base and temple-step,
Are minded to indoctrinate our youth!
How call these carrion kill-joys that intrude?
'Wise men,' their nomenclature! Prodikos — Who scarce could, unassisted, pick his steps From way Theseia to the Tripods' way, —
This empty noddle comprehends the sun, —
How he's Aigina's bigness, wheels no whit His way from east to west, nor wants a steed!
10 And here's Protagoras sets wrongheads right, Explains what virtue, vice, truth, falsehood mean, Makes all we seem to know prove ignorance
Yet knowledge also, since, on either side Of any question, something is to say, Nothing to 'stablish, all things to disturb!
And shall youth go and play at kottabos, Leaving unsettled whether moon-spots breed?
Or dare keep Choes ere the problem's solved —
Why should I like my wife who dislikes me?
15 'But sure the gods permit this, censure that?'
So tell them! straight the answer's in your teeth:
'You relegate these points, then, to the gods?
What and where are they?' What my sire supposed,
And where yon cloud conceals them!
'Till they 'scape
And scramble down to Leda, as a swan, Europa, as a bull! why not as — ass
To somebody? Your sire was Zeus perhaps!
Either — away with such ineptitude!
Or, wanting energy to break your bonds, 20 Stick to the good old stories, think the rain Is — Zeus distilling pickle through a sieve!
Think thunder's thrown to break Theoros' head For breaking oaths first! Meanwhile let ourselves Instruct your progeny you prate like fools
Of father Zeus, who's but the atmosphere, Brother Poseidon, otherwise called — sea,
And son Hephaistos — fire and nothing else!
Over which nothings there's a something still,
'Necessity,' that rules the universe 40 And cares as much about your Choes-feast Performed or intermitted, as you care Whether gnats sound their trump from head or tail!
When, stupefied at such philosophy,

We cry — Arrest the madmen, governor!
Pound hemlock and pour bull's-blood, Perikles! —
Would you believe? The Olumpian bends his brow,
Scarce pauses from his building! 'Say they thus?
Then, they say wisely. Anaxagoras, I had not known how simple proves eclipse
But for thy teaching! Go, fools, learn like me!
'Well, Zeus nods: man must reconcile himself,
So, let the Charon's-company harangue,
And Anaxagoras be — as we wish!
A comfort is in nature: while grass grows
And water runs, and sesame pricks tongue,
And honey from Brilesian hollow melts On mouth, and Bacchis' flavorful lip beats both,
You will not be untaught life's use, young man?
Pho! My young man just proves that panniered ass Said to have borne Youth strapped on his 60 stout back,
With whom a serpent bargained, bade him swap
The priceless boon for — water to quench thirst!
What's youth to my young man? In love with age,
He Spartanizes, argues, fasts and frowns, Denies the plainest rules of life, long since Proved sound; sets all authority aside, Must simply recommence things, learn ere act,
And think out thoroughly how youth should pass — Just as if youth stops passing, all the same!
'One last resource is left us — poetry! 70 Vindicate nature, prove Plataian help, Turn out, a thousand strong, all right and tight,
To save Sense, poet! Bang the sophist-brood Would cheat man out of wholesome sustenance
By swearing wine is water, honey — gall, Saperdion! — the Empousa! 2. Panic-smit, Our juveniles abstain from Sense and starve:
Be yours to disenchant them! Change things back!
Or better, strain a point the other way And handsomely exaggerate wronged 80
truth!
Lend wine a glory never gained from grape,

* A famous beauty.

* A horror — a ghoul.

Help honey with a snatch of him we style
The Muses' Bee, bay-bloom-fed Sophokles,
And give Saperdion a Kimberic robe!

"I, his successor,' gruff the answer grunts,
'Incline to poetise philosophy, Extend it rather than restrain; as thus — Are heroes men? No more, and scarce as
much, Shall mine be represented. Are men
poor?
Behold them ragged, sick, lame, halt and
blind!
10 Do they use speech? Ay, street-terms, market-phrase!
Having thus drawn sky earthwards, what comes next
But dare the opposite, lift earth to sky?
Mere puppets once, I now make woman-
kind.
For thinking, saying, doing, match the male.
Lift earth? I drop to, dally with, earth's dung!
— Recognise in the very slave — man's mate, Declare him brave and honest, kind and
true,
And reasonable as his lord, in brief.
I paint men as they are — so runs my
boast — 20 Not as they should be: paint — what's part of man
— Women and slaves — not as, to please your pride,
They should be, but your equals, as they are.
O and the Gods! Instead of abject mien, Submissive whisper, while my Choros cants
"Zeus, — with thy cubit's length of attributes, —
May I, the ephemeral, ne'er scrutinise Who made the heaven and earth and all things there!" Myself shall say' . . . Ay, Herakles may
help!
Give me, — I want the very words, — attend!"

30 He read. Then "Murder's out, — 'There are no Gods.'
Man has no master, owns, by consequence, No right, no wrong, except to please or plague
His nature: what man likes be man's sole
law!
Still, since he likes Saperdion, honey, figs, Man may reach freedom by your roundabout.
'Never believe yourselves the freer thence!
There are no gods, but there's "Necessity," —
Duty enjoined you, fact in pigment's place,

Throned on no mountain, native to the
mind!
Therefore deny yourselves Saperdion, figs 40 And honey, for the sake of — what I
dream,
A-sitting with my legs up!"

"Infamy!
The poet casts in calm his lot with these Assailants of Apollon! Sworn to serve Each Grace, the Furies call him minister — He, who was born for just that roseate
world Renounced so madly, where what's false is
fact,
Where he makes beauty out of ugliness, Where he lives, life itself disguised for
him
As immortality — so works the spell, 50
The enthusiastic mood which marks a
man Muse-mad, dream-drunken, wrapt around by verse, Encircled with poetic atmosphere,
As lark emballed by its own crystal song,
Or rose enmisted by that scent it makes!
No, this were unreality! the real He wants, not falsehood, — truth alone he seeks,
Truth, for all beauty! Beauty, in all
truth
That's certain somehow! Must the eagle lilt
Lark-like, needs fir-tree blossom rose-like? 60
No!
Strength and utility charm more than
grace,
And what's most ugly proves most beautiful.
So much assistance from Euripides!
"Whereupon I betake me, since needs
must,
To a concluding — 'Go and feed the crows!
Do! Spoil your art as you renounce your
life,
Poetise your so precious system, do,
Degrade the hero, nullify the god,
Exhibit women, slaves and men as peers, —
Your castigation follows prompt enough! 70 When all's concocted upstairs, heels o'er
head,
Down must submissive drop the master-
piece
For public praise or blame: so, praise
away,
Friend Sokrates, wife's-friend Kephiso-
phon!
Boast innovations, cramp phrase, uncouth
song,
Hard matter and harsh manner, gods, men, slaves
And women jumbled to a laughing-stock

Which Hellas shall hold sides at lest she split!
Hellas, on these, shall have her word to
say!

"She has it and she says it — there's the curse! —

She finds he makes the shag-rag hero-race, The noble slaves, wise women, move as
much

Pity and terror as true tragic types:
Applauds inventiveness — the plot so new,
The turn and trick subsidiary so strange!
She relishes that homely phrase of life,

1. That common town-talk, more than trumpet-blasts:

Accords him right to chop and change a myth:

What better right had he, who told the tale
In the first instance, to embellish fact?

This last may disembellish yet improve!
Both find a block: this man carves back to bull

What first his predecessor cut to sphynx:
Such genuine actual roarer, nature's brute, Intelligible to our time, was sure The old-world artist's purpose, had he worked

20 To mind; this both means and makes the
thing!

If, past dispute, the verse slips oily-bathed In unctuous music — say, effeminate —
We also say, like Kuthereia's¹ self, A lulling effluence which enswathes some isle

Where hides a nymph, not seen but felt the more.

That's Hellas' verdict!

"Does Euripides

Even so far absolved, remain content?

Nowise! His task is to refine, refine, Divide, distinguish, subtilise away

30 Whatever seemed a solid planting-place For foot-fall, — not in that phantasmal sphere

Proper to poet, but on vulgar earth Where people used to tread with confidence.

There's left no longer one plain positive Enunciation incontestable Of what is good, right, decent here on earth.

Nobody now can say 'this plot is mine, Though but a plethron square,² — my duty!' — 'Yours?

Mine, or at least not yours,' snaps somebody!

40 And, whether the dispute be parent-right Or children's service, husband's privilege Or wife's submission, there's a snarling
straight,

One hundred feet square.

Smart passage of opposing 'yea' and 'nay,'
'Should,' 'should not,' till, howe'er the contest end,

Spectators go off sighing — Clever thrust!
Why was I so much hurried to pay debt, Attend my mother, sacrifice an ox,
And set my name down 'for a trireme,
good'?

Something I might have urged on t'other
side!

No doubt, Chresphontes or Bellerophon 50 We don't meet every day; but Stab-and-stitch

The tailor — ere I turn the drachmas o'er I owe him for a chiton, as he thinks,
I'll pose the blockhead with an argument!

"So has he triumphed, your Euripides!
Oh, I concede, he rarely gained a prize: That's quite another matter! cause for
that!

Still, when 'twas got by Ions, Iophons, Off he would pace confoundedly superb, Supreme, no smile at movement on his 60
mouth

Till Sokrates winked, whispered: out it broke!

And Aristullos jotted down the jest, While Iophons or Ions, bay on brow, Looked queerly, and the foreigners — like
you —

Asked o'er the border with a puzzled smile — 'And so, you value Ions, Iophons, Euphorions! How about Euripides?' (Eh, brave bard's-champion? Does the anger boil?

Keep within bounds a moment, — eye and lip

Shall loose their doom on me, their fiery 70
worst!)

What strangers? Archelaos heads the file!

He sympathises, he concerns himself,
He pens epistle, each successful play;
'Athenai sinks effete; there's younger
blood

In Makedonia. Visit where I rule!
Do honour to me and take gratitude!
Live the guest's life, or work the poet's way, Which also means the statesman's: he who wrote

Erechtheus may seem rawly politic
At home where Kleophon is ripe; but here 80 My council-board permits him choice of seats.'

"Now this was operating, — what should
prove

A poison-tree, had flowered far on to fruit
For many a year, — when I was moved,
first man,

To dare the adventure, down with root and branch.

So, from its sheath I drew my Comic steel,

And dared what I am now to justify.
A serious question first, though!

"Once again!

Do you believe, when I aspired in youth,
I made no estimate of power at all,
Nor paused long, nor considered much,
what class

Of fighters I might claim to join, beside That class wherewith I cast in company?
Say, you — profuse of praise no less than
blame —

Could not I have competed — franker
phrase

10 Might trulier correspond to meaning — still, Competed with your Tragic paragon?
Suppose me minded simply to make verse,
To fabricate, parade resplendent arms, Flourish and sparkle out a Trilogy, — Where was the hindrance? But my soul bade 'Fight!

Leave flourishing for mock-foe, pleasure-
time;

Prove arms efficient on real heads and hearts!

How? With degeneracy sapping fast
The Marathonian muscle, nerved of old 20 To maul the Mede, now strung at best to
help

— How did I fable? — War and Hubbub mash

To mincemeat Fatherland and Brotherhood,

Pound in their mortar Hellas, State by State,

That greed might gorge, the while frivolity Rubbed hands and smacked lips o'er the dainty dish!

Authority, experience — pushed aside By any upstart who pleads throng and press

O' the people! 'Think, say, do thus!'
Wherefore, pray?

'We are the people: who impugns our
right

30 Of choosing Kleon that tans hide so well, Huperbolos that turns out lamps so trim,
Hemp-seller Eukrates or Lusikles

Sheep-dealer, Kephalos the potter's son, Diitriphe who weaves the willow-work
To go round bottles, and Nausikudes The meal-man? Such we choose and more, their mates,

To think and say and do in our behalf!
While sophistry wagged tongue, emboldened still,

10 Found matter to propose, contest, defend,
'Stablish, turn topsy-turvy, — all the same,
No matter what, provided the result Were something new in place of something
old, —

Set wagging by pure insolence of soul Which needs must pry into, have warrant for Each right, each privilege good policy Protects from curious eye and prating

mouth!

Everywhere lust to shape the world anew, Spurn this Athenai as we find her, build A new impossible Clouduckooburg
For feather-headed birds, once solid men, 50
Where rules, discarding jolly habitude, Nourished on myrtle-berries and stray ants, King Tereus who, turned Hoopoe Triple-
Crest,
Shall terrify and bring the gods to terms!

"Where was I? Oh! Things ailing thus
— I ask,

What cure? Cut, thrust, hack, hew at heap-on-heaped

Abomination with the exquisite Palaistra-tool¹ of polished Tragedy?
Erechtheus shall harangue Amphiktuon,
And incidentally drop word of weight 60

On justice, righteousness, so turn aside
The audience from attacking Sicily! —

The more that Choros, after he recounts How Phrixos rode the ram, the far-famed

Fleece,
Shall add — at last fall of grave dancing-
foot —

'Agression never yet was helped by Zeus!
That helps or hinders Alkibiades?

As well expect, should Pheidias carve Zeus'
self

And set him up, some half a mile away, His frown would frighten sparrows from 70 your field!

Eagles may recognise their lord, belike, But as for vulgar sparrows, — change the
god,

And plant some big Priapos with a pole!
I wield the Comic weapon rather — hate!

Hate! honest, earnest and directest hate — Warfare wherein I close with enemy,

Call him one name and fifty epithets, Remind you his great-grandfather sold bran,

Describe the new exomion, sleeveless coat
He knocked me down last night and robbed 80 me of,

Protest he voted for a tax on air!
And all this hate — if I write Comedy —

Finds tolerance, most like — applause,
perhaps

True veneration; for I praise the god Present in person of his minister,

And pay — the wilder my extravagance —
The more appropriate worship to the Power

Adulterous, night-roaming, and the rest:
Otherwise, — that originative force

Of nature, impulse stirring death to life, 90
Which, underlying law, seems lawlessness, Yet is the outbreak which, ere order be Used in wrestling.

Must thrill creation through, warm stocks and stones, Phales Iacchos.

"Comedy for me!

Why not for you, my Tragic masters?
Sneaks

Whose art is mere desertion of a trust!
Such weapons lay to hand, the ready club,
The clay-ball, on the ground a stone to snatch, —

Arms fit to bruise the boar's neck, break the chine

O' the wolf, — and you must impiously — despise?

No, I'll say, furtively let fall that trust b Consigned you! 'Twas not 'take or leave alone,'

But 'take and, wielding, recognise your
god

In his prime attributes!' And though full soon

You sneaked, subsided into poetry, Nor met your due reward, still, — heroise
And speechify and sing-song and forego Far as you may your function, — still its
part

Endures, one piece of early homage still Exacted of you; after your three bouts

At hoitytoity, great men with long words, 20 And so forth, — at the end, must tack itself
The genuine sample, the Satyric Play, Concession, with its wood-boys' fun and freak,

To the true taste of the mere multitude.
Yet, there again! What does your Still-at-itch,

Always-the-innovator? Shrugs and shirks!
Out of his fifty Trilogies, some five

Are somehow suited: Satyrs dance and sing,

Try merriment, a grimly prank or two, Sour joke squeezed through pursed lips and teeth on edge,

30 Then quick on top of toe to pastoral
sport,

Goat-tending and sheep-herding, cheese and cream,

Soft grass and silver rillets, country-fare —
When throats were promised Thasian!

Five such feats, — Then frankly off he threw the yoke: next Droll,

Next festive drama, covenanted fun,
Decent reversion to indecency,

Proved — your 'Alkestis'! There's quite fun enough,

Herakles drunk! From out fate's blackening wave

Calamitous, just zigzags some shot star, 40 Poor promise of faint joy, and turns the
laugh

On dupes whose fears and tears were all in waste!

"For which sufficient reasons, in truth's
name,

I closed with whom you count the Meaner
Muse,

Classed me with Comic Poets who should weld

Dark with bright metal, show their blade may keep

Its adamantine birthright though ablaze
With poetry, the gold, and wit, the gem, And strike mere gold, unstiffened out by
steel,

Or gem, no iron joints its strength around,
From hand of — posturer, not combatant! 56

"Such was my purpose: it succeeds, I say!
Have not we beaten Kallikratidas,

Not humbled Sparté? Peace awaits our
word,

Spite of Theramenes, and fools his like.
Since my previsions, — warranted too well

By the long war now waged and worn to
end —

Had spared such heritage of misery,
My after-counsels scarce need fear repulse.

Athenai, taught prosperity has wings, Cages the glad recapture. Demos, see, 60

From folly's premature decrepitude Boiled young again, emerges from the stew

Of twenty-five years' trouble, sits and sways,

One brilliance and one balsam, — sways and sits

Monarch of Hellas! ay and, sage again,
No longer jeopardises chieftainship,

No longer loves the brutish demagogue Appointed by a bestial multitude

But seeks out sound advisers. Who are
they?

Ourselves, of parentage proved wise and 70
good!

To such may hap strains thwarting quality, (As where shall want its flaw mere human stuff?)

Still, the right grain is proper to right
race;

What's contrary, call curious accident!
Hold by the usual! Orchard-grafted

tree,
Not wilding, race-horse-sired, not rounceyborn,

Aristocrat, no sausage-selling snob!
Nay, why not Alkibiades, come back

Filled by the Genius, freed of petulance, Frailty, — mere youthfulness that's all at 80

fault, —
Advanced to Perikles and something more?

— Being at least our duly born and bred, — Curse on what chaunoproct¹ first gained his ear

And got his . . . well, once true man in right place,

Our commonalty soon content themselves
 With doing just what they are born to do, Eat, drink, make merry, mind their own affairs
 And leave state-business to the larger brain.
 I do not stickle for their punishment;
 But certain culprits have a cloak to twitch,
 A purse to pay the piper: flog, say I,
 Your fine fantastics, paragons of parts, Who choose to play the important! Far from side
 With us, their natural supports, allies,— And, best by brain, help who are best by birth
 To fortify each weak point in the wall Built broad and wide and deep for permanence Between what's high and low, what's rare and vile,—
 They cast their lot perversely in with low
 And vile, lay flat the barrier, lift the mob To dizzy heights where Privilege stood firm.
 And then, simplicity become conceit,— Woman, slave, common soldier, artisan, Crazy with new-found worth, new-fangled claims,— These must be taught next how to use their heads
 And hands in driving man's right to mob's rule!
 What fellows thus inflame the multitude?
 Your Sokrates, still crying 'Understand!' Your Aristullos, — 'Argue!' Last and
 worst,
 Should, by good fortune, mob still hesitate, Remember there's degree in heaven and
 earth,
 Cry 'Aischulos enjoined us fear the gods,
 And Sophokles advised respect the kings!' Why, your Euripides informs them —
 'Gods?
 They are not! Kings? They are, but . . . do not I,
 In Suppliants, make my Theseus, — yours,
 no more, —
 Fire up at insult of who styles him King?
 Play off that Herald, I despise the most,
 As patronising king's prerogative Against a Theseus proud to dare no step Till he consult the people?'
 "Such as these —
 Ah, you expect I am for strangling straight?
 Nowise, Balaustion! All my roundabout Ends at beginning, with my own defence.
 I dose each culprit just with — Comedy.
 Let each be doctored in exact the mode Himself prescribes: by words, the word-monger —
 My words to his words, — my lies, if you
 like,
 To his lies. Sokrates I nickname thief, Quack, necromancer; Aristullos, — say,

Male Kirké who bewitches and bewrays And changes folk to swine; Euripides, — Well, I acknowledge! Every word is
 false,
 Looked close at; but stand distant and 50 stare through,
 All's absolute indubitable truth
 Behind lies, truth which only lies declare!
 For come, concede me truth's in thing not
 word, Meaning not manner! Love smiles
 'rogue' and 'wretch'
 When 'sweet' and 'dear' seem vapid: Hate adopts Love's 'sweet' and 'dear' when 'rogue'
 and 'wretch' fall flat: Love, Hate — are truths, then, each, in sense not sound.
 Further: if Love, remaining Love, fell
 back
 On 'sweet' and 'dear,' — if Hate, though Hate the same,
 Dropped down to 'rogue' and 'wretch,' — 60 each phrase were false.
 Good! and now grant I hate no matter whom With reason: I must therefore fight my
 foe,
 Finish the mischief which made enmity.
 How? By employing means to most hurt
 him Who much harmed me. What way did he do harm?
 Through word or deed? Through word?
 with word, wage war!
 Word with myself directly? As direct Reply shall follow: word to you, the wise, Whence indirectly came the harm to me?
 What wisdom I can muster waits on such. 70 Word to the populace which, misconceived
 By ignorance and incapacity, Ends in no such effect as follows cause
 When I, or you the wise, are reasoned with,
 So damages what I and you hold dear?
 In that event, I ply the populace With just such word as leavens their whole lump
 To the right ferment for my purpose.
 They
 Arbitrate properly between us both?
 They weigh my answer with his argument, 80 Match quip with quibble, wit with eloquence?
 All they attain to understand is — blank!
 Two adversaries differ: which is right And which is wrong, none takes on him to say,
 Since both are unintelligible. Pooh!
 Swear my foe's mother vended herbs she stole,
 They fall a-laughing! Add, — his household drudge
 Of all-work justifies that office well, Kisses the wife, composing him the play, —

They grin at whom they gaped in wonderment,

And go off — 'was he such a sorry scrub?
'This other seems to know! we praised too fast!'

Why then, my lies have done the work of truth,

Since 'scrub,' improper designation, means Exactly what the proper argument

— Had such been comprehensible — proposed

To proper audience — were I graced with such —

Would properly result in; so your friend

10 Gets an impartial verdict on his verse
'The tongue swears, but the soul remains unsworn!'

"There, my Balaustion! All is summed and said.

No other cause of quarrel with yourself!

Euripides and Aristophanes

Differ: he needs must round our difference Into the mob's ear; with the mob I plead.

You angrily start forward 'This to me?' No speck of this on you the thrice refined!

20 Could parley be restricted to us two,
My first of duties were to clear up doubt

As to our true divergence each from each. Does my opinion so diverge from yours?

Probably less than little — not at all! To know a matter, for my very self

And intimates — that's one thing; to imply

By 'knowledge' — loosing whatsoe'er I know

Among the vulgar who, by mere mistake, May brain themselves and me in consequence, —

That's quite another. 'O the daring flight!

30 This only bard maintains the exalted brow, Nor grovels in the slime nor fears the gods!'

Did I fear — I play superstitious fool, Who, with the due proviso, introduced,

Active and passive, their whole company As creatures too absurd for scorn itself?

Zeus? I have styled him — 'slave, mere thrashing-block!'

I'll tell you: in my very next of plays,
At Bacchos' feast, in Bacchos' honour, full

In front of Bacchos' representative,

40 I mean to make main-actor — Bacchos' self!

Forth shall he strut, apparent, first to last,
A blockhead, coward, braggart, liar, thief,

Demonstrated all these by his own mere Xanthias the man-slave: such man shows such god

Shamed to brute-beastship by comparison!

And when ears have their fill of his abuse,
And eyes are sated with his pummelling, —

My Choros taking care, by, all the while,

Singing his glory, that men recognise A god in the abused and pummelled 50
beast, —

Then, should one ear be stopped of auditor,

Should one spectator shut revolted eye, — Why, the Priest's self will first raise outraged voice

'Back, thou barbarian, thou ineptitude!

Does not most licence hallow best our day,
And least decorum prove its strictest rite?

Since Bacchos bids his followers play the fool,

And there's no fooling like a majesty Mocked at, — who mocks the god, obeys

the law —
Law which, impute but indiscretion to, 60

And . . . why, the spirit of Euripides Is evidently active in the world!'

Do I stop here? No! feat of flightier force!
See Hermes! what commotion raged, — reflect! —

When imaged god alone got injury

By drunkards' frolic! How Athenai stared

Aghast, then fell to frenzy, fit on fit, — Ever the last the longest! At this hour,

The craze abates a little; so, my Play Shall have up Hermes: and a Karion, 70

slave, (Since there's no getting lower) calls our

friend
The profitable god, we honour so,

Whatever contumely fouls the mouth —
Bids him go earn more honest livelihood

By washing tripe in well-trough — wash he does,

Duly obedient! Have I dared my best?
Asklepios, answer! — deity in vogue,

Who visits Sophokles familiarly,
If you believe the old man, — at his age,

Living is dreaming, and strange guests 80 haunt door

Of house, belike, peep through and tap at times

When a friend yawns there waiting to be fetched, —

At any rate, to memorise the fact,
He has spent money, set an altar up

In the god's temple, now in much repute.
That temple-service trust me to describe —

Cheaters and choused, the god, his brace of girls,

Their snake, and how they manage to snap gifts

'And consecrate the same into a bag,'
For whimsies done away with in the dark! 90

As if, a stone's throw from that theatre Whereon I thus unmask their dupery,

The thing were not religious and august!

"Of Sophokles himself — nor word nor sign

Beyond a harmless parody or so!

He founds no anti-school, upsets no faith,
 But, living, lets live, the good easy soul
 Who, — if he saves his cash, unpoetlike, Loves wine and — never mind what other
 sport,
 Boasts for his father just a sword-blade-smith,
 Proves but queer captain when the people
 claim,
 For one who conquered with 'Antigone,' The right to undertake a squadron's
 charge, —
 And needs the son's help now to finish
 plays, 10 Seeing his dotage calls for governance And Iophon to share his property, — Why, of all this, reported true, I breathe Not one word — true or false, I like the
 man.
 Sophokles lives and lets live: long live he!
 Otherwise, — sharp the scourge and hard
 the blow!
 "And what's my teaching but — accept the
 old,
 Contest the strange! acknowledge work
 that's done, Misdoubt men who have still their work
 to do!
 Religions, laws and customs, poetries, 20 Are old? So much achieved victorious
 truth!
 Each work was product of a life-time, wrung From each man by an adverse world: for
 why?
 He worked, destroying other older work Which the world loved and so was loth to lose.
 Whom the world beat in battle — dust and ash!
 Who beat the world, left work in evidence,
 And wears its crown till new men live new lives,
 And fight new fights, and triumph in their
 turn.
 I mean to show you on the stage: you'll see 30 My Just Judge only venture to decide Between two suitors, which is god, which
 man,
 By thrashing both of them as flesh can bear.
 You shall agree, — whichever bellows first,
 He's human; who holds longest out,
 divine:
 That is the only equitable test.
 Cruelty? Pray, who pricked them on to
 court
 My thong's award? Must they needs dominate?
 Then I — rebel. Their instinct grasps the new?
 Mine bids retain the old: a fight must be,
 40 And which is stronger the event will show.
 O but the pain! Your proved divinity

Still smarts all reddened? And the right-lier served!
 Was not some man's-flesh in him, after all?
 Do let us lack no frank acknowledgment There's nature common to both gods and
 men!
 All of them — spirit? What so winced was clay.
 Away pretence to some exclusive sphere Cloud-nourishing a sole selected few Fume-fed with self-superiority!
 I stand up for the common coarse-as-clay 50 Existence, — stamp and ramp with heel and hoof
 On solid vulgar life, you fools disown.
 Make haste from your unreal eminence, And measure lengths with me upon that
 ground
 Whence this mud-pellet sings and summons you!
 I know the soul, too, how the spark ascends
 And how it drops apace and dies away.
 I am your poet-peer, man thrice your
 match.
 I too can lead an airy life when dead, Fly like Kinesias when I'm cloudward 60
 bound;
 But here, no death shall mix with life it mars.
 "So, my old enemy who caused the fight, Own I have beaten you, Euripides!
 Or, — if your advocate would contravene, —
 Help him, Balaustion! Use the rosy
 strength!
 I have not done my utmost, — treated you
 As I might Aristullos, mint-perfumed, — Still, let the whole rage burst in brave attack!
 Don't pay the poor ambiguous compliment
 Of fearing any pearl-white knuckled fist 70
 Will damage this broad buttress of a brow!
 Fancy yourself my Aristonumos, Ameipsias or Sannurion: punch and pound!
 Three cuckoos who cry 'cuckoo'! much
 I care!
 They boil a stone! Neblaretai! Rattei!"
 —————
 Cannot your task have end here, Euthukles!
 Day by day glides our galley on its path:
 Still sunrise and still sunset, Rhodes half reached,
 And still, my patient scribe! no sunset's
 peace
 Descends more punctual than that brow's 80 incline
 O'er tablets which your serviceable hand Prepares to trace. Why treasure up, forsooth,
 These relics of a night that make me rich, But, half-remembered merely, leave so
 poor

Each stranger to Athenai and her past?
 For — how remembered! As some greedy hind Persuades a honeycomb, beyond the due,
 To yield its hoarding, — heedless what alloy
 Of the poor bee's own substance taints the gold Which, unforced, yields few drops, but purity, —
 So would you fain relieve of load this brain, Though the hived thoughts must bring away, with strength What words and weakness, strength's receptacle — 10 Wax from the store! Yet, — aching soothed away, — Accept the compound! No suspected scent But proves some rose was rifled, though its ghost Scarce lingers with what promised musk and myrrh.
 No need of farther squeezing. What remains
 Can only be Balaustion, just her speech.

Ah, but — because speech serves a purpose still! —

He ended with that flourish. I replied,

Fancy myself your Aristonumos?
 Advise me, rather, to remain myself, 20 Balaustion, — mindful what mere mouse confronts
 The forest-monarch Aristophanes!
 I who, a woman, claim no quality Beside the love of all things loveable Created by a power pre-eminent In knowledge, as in love I stand perchance, — You, the consummately-creative! How Should I, then, dare deny submissive trust To any process aiming at result Such as you say your songs are pregnant
 with?
 30 Result, all judge: means, let none scrutinise Save those aware how glory best is gained By daring means to end, ashamed of
 shame,
 Constant in faith that only good works
 good,
 While evil yields no fruit but impotence!
 Graced with such plain good, I accept the means.
 Nay, if result itself in turn become Means, — who shall say? — to ends still loftier yet, — Though still the good prove hard to understand,
 The bad still seemingly predominate, — 40 Never may I forget which order bears
 The burden, toils to win the great reward,

And finds, in failure, the grave punish-
 ment,
 So, meantime, claims of me a faith I yield!
 Moreover, a mere woman, I recoil From what may prove man's-work permissible, Imperative. Rough strokes surprise:
 what then?
 Some lusty armsweep needs must cause the crash
 Of thorn and bramble, ere those shrubs, those flowers,
 We fain would have earth yield exclusively,
 Are sown, matured and garlanded for boys 50
 And girls, who know not how the growth was gained,
 Finally, am I not a foreigner?
 No born and bred Athenian, — isled about,
 I scarce can drink, like you, at every breath,
 Just some particular doctrine which may
 best Explain the strange thing I revolt against — How — by involvement, who may extricate? —
 Religion perks up through impiety, Law leers with licence, folly wise-like frowns,
 The seemly lurks inside the abominable. 60
 But opposites, — each neutralises each Haply by mixture: what should promise
 death,
 May haply give the good ingredient force, Disperse in fume the antagonistic ill.
 This institution, therefore, — Comedy, —
 By origin, a rite, — by exercise, Proved an achievement tasking poet's
 power
 To utmost, eking legislation out Beyond the legislator's faculty, 70 Playing the censor where the moralist Declines his function, far too dignified For dealing with minute absurdities:
 By efficacy, — virtue's guard, the scourge Of vice, each folly's fly-flap, arm in aid Of all that's righteous, customary, sound And*wholesome; sanctioned therefore, — better say,
 Prescribed for fit acceptance of this age
 By, not alone the long recorded roll Of earlier triumphs but, success to-day — (The multitude as prompt recipient still 80
 Of good gay teaching from that monitor They crowned this morning — Aristoph-anes —
 As when Sousarion's car first traversed street) —
 This product of Athenai — I dispute, Impugn? There's just one only circumstance
 Explains that! I, poor critic, see, hear, feel;
 But eyes, ears, senses prove me — foreigner!

Who shall gainsay that the raw new-come guest Blames oft, too sensitive? On every side Of — larger than your stage — life's spectacle, Convention here permits and there forbids Impulse and action, nor alleges more Than some mysterious "So do all, and so Does no one," which the hasty stranger blames Because, who bends the head unquestioning, Transgresses, turns to wrong what else were right,
 By failure of a reference to law Beyond convention; blames unjustly,
 too —
 As if, through that defect, all gained were lost
 And slave-brand set on brow indelibly; — Blames unobservant or experienceless That men, like trees, if stout and sound and sane,
 Show stem no more affected at the root
 By bough's exceptional submissive dip Of leaf, and bell, light danced at end of spray
 To windy fitfulness in wayward sport — No more lie prostrate — than low files of flower
 Which, when the blast goes by, unruffled raise
 Each head again o'er ruder meadow-wreck
 Of thorn and thistle that refractory Demurred to cower at passing wind's caprice.
 Why shall not guest extend like charity, Conceive how, — even when astounded
 most
 That natives seem to acquiesce in much Changed by prescription, they affirm, to
 gold, —
 Such may still bring to test, still bear away Safely and surely much of good and true Though latent ore, themselves unspecked, unspoiled?
 Fresh bathed i' the icebrook, any hand may
 pass
 A placid moment through the lamp's fierce flame:
 And who has read your Lemnians, seen
 The Hours,
 Heard Female-Playhouse-seat-Preoccupants,
 May feel no worse effect than, once a year, Those who leave decent vesture, dress in rags
 And play the mendicant, conform thereby To country's rite, and then, no beggartaint Retained, don vesture due next morrow-
 day.
 What if I share the stranger's weakness
 then?

Well, could I also show his strength, his
 sense Untutored, ay! — but then untampered
 with!

I fancy, though the world seems old
 enough,
 Though Hellas be the sole unbarbarous
 land,
 Years may conduct to such extreme of age,
 And outside Hellas so isles new may lurk, That haply, — when and where remain a dream! —
 In fresh days when no Hellas fills the world, In novel lands as strange where, ail the 50
 same,
 Their men and women yet behold, as we,
 Blue heaven, black earth, and love, hate,
 hope and fear,
 Over again, unhelped by Attiké — Haply some philanthropic god steers bark, Gift-laden, to the lonely ignorance Islanded, say, where mist and snow mass
 hard
 To metal — ay, those Kassiterides!
 Then asks: "Ye apprehend the human form.
 What of this statue, made to Pheidias'
 mind,
 This picture, as it pleased our Zeuxis paint? 60 Ye too feel truth, love beauty: judge of
 these!"
 Such strangers may judge feebly, stranger-
 like:
 "Each hair too indistinct — for, see our
 own!
 Hands, not skin-coloured as these hands we have,
 And lo, the want of due decorum here!
 A citizen, arrayed in civic garb,
 Just as he walked your streets apparently, Yet wears no sword by side, adventures
 thus,
 In thronged Athenai! foolish painter'sfreak!
 While here's his brother-sculptor found at 70
 fault Still more egregiously, who shames the
 world,
 Shows wrestler, wrestling at the public games, Atrociously exposed from head to foot!"
 Sure, the Immortal would impart at once Our slow-stored knowledge, how small truths suppressed Conduce to the far greater truth's display, —
 Would replace simple by instructed sense,
 And teach them how Athenai first so tamed
 The natural fierceness that her progeny Discarded arms nor feared the beast in 80
 man:
 Wherefore at games, where earth's wise gratitude,

- Proved by responsive culture, claimed the prize For man's mind, body, each in excellence, —
 When mind had bared itself, came body's turn,
 And only irreligion grudged the gods
 One naked glory of their master-work Where all is glorious rightly understood, — The human frame; enough that man mistakes:
 Let him not think the gods mistaken too!
- But, peradventure, if the stranger's eye 10 Detected . . . Ah, too high my fancy-flight!
 Pheidias, forgive, and Zeuxis bear with me — How, on your faultless should I fasten fault Of my own framing, even? Only say, — Suppose the impossible were realised,
 And some as patent incongruity, Unseemliness, — of no more warrant, there And then, than now and here, whate'er the time And place, — I say, the Immortal — who can doubt? — Would never shrink, but own "The blot escaped 20 Our artist: thus he shows humanity."
 May stranger tax one peccant part in thee, Poet, three-parts divine? May I proceed?
- "Comedy is prescription and a rite." Since when? No growth of the blind antique time,
 "It rose in Attiké with liberty; When freedom falls, it too will fall."
 Scarce so!
 Your games, — the Olympian, Zeus gave birth to these;
 Your Pythian, — these were Phoibos' institute.
 Isthmian, Nemeian, — Theseus, Herakles 30 Appointed each, the boys and barbers say!
 Earth's day is growing late: where's Comedy?
 "Oh, that commenced an age since, — two, belike, — In Megara, whence here they brought the thing!"
 Or I misunderstand, or here's the fact — Your grandsire could recall that rustic song, How suchanone was thief, and miser such
 And how, — immunity from chastisement Once promised to bold singers of the same By daylight on the drunkard's holiday, — 40 The clever fellow of the joyous troop Tried acting what before he sang about,
 Acted and stole, or hoarded, acting too:
 While his companions ranged a-row, closed up For Choros, — bade the general rabblement
- Sit, see, hear, laugh, — not join the dance themselves.
 Soon, the same clever fellow found a mate,
 And these two did the whole stage-mimicking, Still closer in approach to Tragedy, —
 So led the way to Aristophanes, Whose grandsire saw Sousarion, and whose sire — Chionides; yourself wrote "Banqueters" When Aischulos had made "Prometheus,"
 nay,
 All of the marvels; Sophokles, — I'll cite,
 "Oidipous" — and Euripides — I bend
 The head — "Medeia" henceforth awed
 the world!
 "Banqueters," "Babylonians" — next come you!
 Surely the great days that left Hellas free Happened before such advent of huge help, Eighty-years-late assistance? Marathon, 60 Plataia, Salamis were fought, I think,
 Before new educators stood reproved, Or foreign legates blushed, excepted to!
 Where did the helpful rite pretend its rise?
 Did it break forth, as gifts divine are wont, Plainly authentic, incontestably Adequate to the helpful ordinance?
 Founts, dowered with virtue, pulse out pure from source;
 'Tis there we taste the god's benign intent:
 Not when, — fatigued away by journey, foul With brutish trampling, — crystal sinks to 70 slime,
 And lymph forgets the first salubriousness.
 Sprang Comedy to light thus crystal-pure?
 "Nowise!" yourself protest with vehemence;
 "Gross, bestial, did the clowns' diversion break;
 Every successor paddled in the slush;
 Nay, my contemporaries one and all Gay played the mudlark till I joined their game;
 Then was I first to change buffoonery
 For wit, and stupid filth for cleanly sense, Transforming pointless joke to purpose 80
 fine,
 Transfusing rude enforcement of home-law —
 'Drop knave's-tricks, deal more neighbour-like, ye boors!' — With such new glory of poetic breath
 As, lifting application far past use O' the present, launched it o'er men's lowly
 heads
 To future time, when high and low alike Are dead and done with, while my airy
 power Flies disengaged, as vapour from what stuff
 It — say not, dwelt in — fittier, dallied
 with

- To forward work, which done, — deliverance brave, —
It soars away, and mud subsides to dust.
Say then, myself invented Comedy!"
- So mouths full many a famed Parabasis!
Agreed! No more, then, of prescriptive use, Authorisation by antiquity,
For what offends our judgment! 'Tis your work, Performed your way: not work delivered you Intact, intact producible in turn.
10 Everywhere have you altered old to new — Your will, your warrant: therefore, work must stand Or stumble by intrinsic worth. What worth?
- Its aim and object! Peace you advocate,
And war would fain abolish from the land:
Support religion, lash irreverence, Yet laughingly administer rebuke
To superstitious folly, — equal fault!
While innovating rashness, lust of change,
New laws, new habits, manners, men and things, 20 Make your main quarry, — "oldest" meaning "best."
You check the fretful litigation-itch, Withstand mob-rule, expose mob-flattery, Punish mob-favourites; most of all press hard On sophists who assist the demagogue,
And poets their accomplices in crime.
Such your main quarry: by the way, you strike Ignobler game, mere miscreants, snob or scamp, Cowardly, gluttonous, effeminate:
Still with a bolt to spare when dramatist 30 Proves haply unproficient in his art.
Such aims — alone, no matter for the means — Declare the unexampled excellence Of their first author — Aristophanes!
- Whereat — Euripides, oh, not thyself — Augustlier than the need! — thy century Of subjects dreamed and dared and done,
before
"Banqueters" gave dark earth enlightenment, Or "Babylonians" played Prometheus here, —
These let me summon to defend thy cause!
40 Lo, as indignantly took life and shape Labour by labour, all of Herakles, — Palpably fronting some o'erbold pretence
"Eurustheus slew the monsters, purged the world!"
So shall each poem pass you and imprint Shame on the strange assurance. You praised Peace?
- Sing him full-face, Kresphontes! "Peace" the theme?
"Peace, in whom depths of wealth lie, — of the blest Immortals beauteousest, — Come! for the heart within me dies away,
So long dost thou delay!
50 O I have feared lest old age, much annoy, Conquer me, quite outstrip the tardy joy, Thy gracious triumph-season I would see,
The song, the dance, the sport, profuse of crowns to be But come! for my sake, goddess great and dear, Come to the city here!
Hateful Sedition drive thou from our homes,
With Her who madly roams Rejoicing in the steel against the life That's whetted — banish Strife!" 60
- Shall I proceed? No need of next and next!
That were too easy, play so presses play, Trooping tumultuous, each with instance apt,
Each eager to confute the idle boast.
What virtue but stands forth panegyrised,
What vice, unburned by stigma, in the books Which bettered Hellas, — beyond graven gold Or gem-indenture, sung by Phoibos' self And saved in Kunthia's mountain treasure-house — Ere you, man, moralist, were youth or boy? 70
— Not praise which, in the proffer, mocks the praised By sly admixture of the blameworthy And enforced coupling of base fellowship, —
Not blame which gloats the while it frowning laughs,
"Allow one glance on horrors — laughable!" —
This man's entire of heart and soul, discharged Its love or hate, each unalloyed by each,
On objects worthy either; earnestness,
Attribute him, and power! but novelty?
Nor his nor yours a doctrine — all the 80 world's!
What man of full-grown sense and sanity Holds other than the truth, — wide Hellas through, — Though truth, he acts, discredit truth he holds?
What imbecile has dared to formulate "Love war, hate peace, become a litigant!" —
And so preach on, reverse each rule of right Because he quarrels, combats, goes to law?
No, for his comment runs, with smile or sigh

According to heart's temper, "Peace were best,

Except occasions when we put aside Peace, and bid all the blessings in her gift Quick join the crows, for sake of Marathon!"

"Nay," you reply; for one, whose mind withstands

His heart, and, loving peace, for conscience' sake

Wants war, — you find a crowd of hypocrites

Whose conscience means ambition, grudge and greed.

On such, reproof, sonorous doctrine, melts 20 Distilled like universal but thin dew

Which all too sparsely covers country:
dear,

No doubt, to universal crop and clown, Still, each bedewed keeps his own headgear dry

With upthrust skiadeion, shakes adroit
The droppings to his neighbour. No!
collect

All of the moisture, leave unhurt the heads Which nowise need a washing, save and store

And dash the whole condensed to one fierce spout

On some one evildoer, sheltered close, — o The fool supposed, — till you beat guard
away,

And showed your audience, not that war was wrong,

But Lamachos absurd, — case, crests and
all, —

Not that democracy was blind of choice,
But Kleon and Huperbolos were shams:
Not superstition vile, but Nikias crazed, — The concrete for the abstract: that's the
way!

What matters Choros crying "Hence, impure!"

You cried, "Ariphrades does thus and
thus!"

Now, earnestness seems never earnest
more

30 Than when it dons for garb — indifference;

So there's much laughing: but, compensative,

When frowning follows laughter, then
indeed

Scout innuendo, sarcasm, irony! — Wit's polished warfare glancing at first graze

From off hard headpiece, coarsely-coated brain

O' the commonalty — whom, unless you prick

To purpose, what avails that finer pates Succumb to simple scratching? Those — not these —

'Tis Multitude, which, moved, fines Lamachos,

Banishes Kleon and burns Sokrates, 4

House over head, or, better, poisons him.
Therefore in dealing with King Multitude, Club-drub the callous numskulls! In and in

Beat this essential consequential fact That here they have a hater of the three,
Who hates in word, phrase, nickname, epithet

And illustration, beyond doubt at all!
And similarly, would you win assent

To — Peace, suppose? You tickle the tough hide

With good plain pleasure her concomi- 5
tant —

And, past mistake again, exhibit Peace — Peace, vintager and festive, cheesecake-
time,

Hare-slice-and-pea-soup-season, household
joy:

Theoria's¹ beautiful belongings match
Opора's¹ lavish condescendings: brief, Since here the people are to judge, you press
Such argument as people understand:
If with exaggeration — what care you?

Have I misunderstood you in the main?
No! then must answer be, such argument, 6

Such policy, no matter what good love
Or hate it help, in practice proves absurd, Useless and null: henceforward intercepts Sober effective blow at what you blame,
And renders nugatory rightful praise

Of thing or person. The coarse brush has daubed —

What room for the fine limner's pencil-
mark?

Blame? You curse, rather, till who blames must blush —

Lean to apology or praise, more like!
Does garment, simpered o'er as white, 7 prove grey?

"Black, blacker than Acharnian charcoal,
black

Beyond Kimmerian, Stugian blackness
black,"

You bawl, till men sigh "nearer snowi-
ness!"

What follows? What one faint-rewarding
fall

Of foe belaboured ne'er so lustily?
Laugh Lamachos from out the people's
heart?

He died, commanding, "hero," say your-
self!

Gibe Nikias into privacy? — nay, shake Kleon a little from his arrogance

By cutting him to shoe-sole-shreds? I 8
think,

He ruled his life long and, when time was ripe,

- Died fighting for amusement, — good tough hide!
- Sokrates still goes up and down the streets, And Aristullos puts his speech in book, When both should be abolished long ago. Nay, wretchedest of rags, Aripkrades — You have been fouling that redoubtable Harp-player, twenty years, with what effect?
- Still he strums on, strums ever cheerily, And earns his wage, — "Who minds a joke?" men say.
- 10 No, friend! The statues stand — mud-stained at most —
- Titan or pygmy: what achieves their fall Will be, long after mud is flung and spent, Some clear thin spirit-thrust of lightning — truth
- Your praise, then — honey-smearing helps your friend, More than blame's ordure-smirch hurts foe, perhaps?
- Peace, now, misunderstood, ne'er prized enough, You have interpreted to ignorance Till ignorance opes eye, bat-blind before, And for the first time knows Peace means the power
- 20 On maw of pan-cake, cheese-cake, barley-cake, No stop nor stint to stuffing. While, in camp, Who fights chews rancid tunny, onions raw, Peace sits at cosy feast with lamp and fire, Complaisant smooth-sleeked flute-girls giggling gay.
- How thick and fast the snow falls, freezing War
- Who shrugs, campaigns it, and may break a shin
- Or twist an ankle! come, who hesitates To give Peace, over War, the preference?
- 30 Ah, friend — had this indubitable fact Happly occurred to poor Leonidas, How had he turned tail on Thermopulai! It cannot be that even his few wits Were addled to the point that, so advised, Preposterous he had answered — "Cakes are prime, Hearth-sides are snug, sleek dancing-girls have worth, And yet — for country's sake, to save our gods Their temples, save our ancestors their tombs, Save wife and child and home and liberty, I would chew sliced-salt-fish, bear snow — nay, starve,
- 40 If need were, — and by much prefer the choice!"
- Why, friend, your genuine hero, all the while,
- Has been — who served precisely for your butt —
- Kleonumos that, wise, cast shield away On battle-ground; cried "Take my buckler be, Embossed with cream-clot! peace, not war, I choose, Holding with Dikaiopolis!" Comedy Shall triumph, Dikaiopolis win assent, When Miltiades shall next shirk Marathon, Themistokles swap Salamis for — cake, And Kimon grunt "Peace, grant me 50 dancing-girls!"
- But sooner, hardly! twenty-five years since,
- The war began, — such pleas for Peace have reached
- A reasonable age. The end shows all. And so with all the rest you advocate! "Wise folk leave litigation! 'ware the wasps!
- Whoso loves law and lawyers, heliast-like, Wants hemlock!" None shows that so funnily.
- But, once cure madness, how comports himself Your same exemplar, what's our gain thereby?
- Philokleon turns Bdelukleon! just this 60 change, —
- New sanity gets straightway drunk as sow,
- Cheats baker-wives, brawls, kicks, cuffs, curses folk,
- Parades a shameless flute-girl, bandies filth
- With his own son who cured his father's cold
- By making him catch fever — funnily!
- But as for curing love of lawsuits — faugh!
- And how does new improve upon the old — Your boast — in even abusing? Rough, may be —
- Still, honest was the old mode. "Call thief — thief!"
- But never call thief even — murderer! 70
- Much less call fop and fribble, worse one whit
- Than fribble and fop! Spare neither! beat your brains
- For adequate invective, — cut the life Clean out each quality, — but load your lash
- With no least lie, or we pluck scourge from hand!
- Does poet want a whipping, write bad verse,
- Inculcate foul deeds? There's the fault to flog!
- You vow "The rascal cannot read nor write,
- Spends more in buying fish than Morsimos,

- Somebody helps his Muse and courts his wife,
His uncle deals in crockery, and last, — Himself's a stranger!" That's the cap and crown Of stinging-nettle, that's the master-stroke!
What poet-rival, — after "housebreaker,"
"Fish-gorging," "midnight footpad" and so forth, — Proves not, beside, "a stranger"? Chased from charge To charge, and, lie by lie, laughed out of court, — Lo, wit's sure refuge, satire's grand resource — 10 All, from Kratinos downward — "strangers" they!
Pity the trick's too facile! None so raw Among your playmates but have caught the ball
And sent it back as briskly to — yourself!
You too, my Attic, are styled "stranger" — Rhodes, Aigina, Lindos or Kameiros, — nay,
'Twas Egypt reared, if Eupolis be right,
Who wrote the comedy (Kratinos vows) Kratinos helped a little! Kleon's self Was nigh promoted Comic, when he haled 20 My poet into court, and o'er the coals Hauled and re-hauled "the stranger, — insolent, Who brought out plays, usurped our privilege!"
Why must you Comics one and all take stand On lower ground than truth from first to last?
Why all agree to let folk disbelieve,
So laughter but reward a funny lie?
Repel such onslaughts — answer, sad and grave,
Your fancy-fleerings — who would stoop so low?
Your own adherents whisper, — when disgust 30 Too magnificently thrills Logeion through At — Perikles invents this present war Because men robbed his mistress of three maids — Or — Sokrates wants burning, house o'er head, —
"What, so obtuse, not read between the lines?
Our poet means no mischief! All should know — Ribaldry here implies a compliment!
He deals with things, not men, — his men are things —
Each represents a class, plays figure-head And names the ship: no meaner than the first 40 Would serve; he styles a trireme 'Sokrates' Fears 'Sokrates' may prove unseaworthy (That's merely — 'Sophists are the bane of boys') Rat-riddled ('they are capable of theft'), Rotten or whatso'er shows ship-disease, ('They war with gods and worship whirligig').
You never took the joke for earnest?
Scarce
Supposed mere figure-head meant entire ship,
And Sokrates — the whole fraternity?"
- This then is Comedy, our sacred song, Censor of vice, and virtue's guard as sure: 50 Manners-instructing, morals' stop-estrays, Which, born a twin with public liberty, Thrives with its welfare, dwindles with its wane!
Liberty? what so exquisitely framed And fitted to suck dry its life of life
To last faint fibre? — since that life is truth.
You who profess your indignation swells
At sophistry, when specious words confuse Deeds right and wrong, distinct before,
you say —
(Though all that's done is — dare veracity, 60 Show that the true conception of each deed Affirmed, in vulgar parlance, "wrong" or "right," Proves to be neither, as the hasty hold,
But, change your side, shoots light, where dark alone Was apprehended by the vulgar sense)
You who put sophistry to shame, and shout
'There's but a single side to man and thing;
A side so much more big than thing or man Possibly can be, that — believe 'tis true?
Such were too marvellous simplicity!" — 70 Confess, those sophists whom yourself depict, (— Abide by your own painting!) what they teach,
They wish at least their pupil to believe,
And, what believe, to practise! Did you wish Hellas should haste, as taught, with torch in hand,
And fire the horrid Speculation-shop?
Straight the shop's master rose and showed the mob
What man was your so monstrous Sokrates; Himself received amusement, why not they?
Just as did Kleon first play magistrate 80
And bid you put your birth in evidence — Since no unbadged buffoon is licensed here To shame us all when foreign guests may mock — Then, — birth established, fooling licensed you, —
He, duty done, resumed mere auditor,

Laughed with the loudest at his Lamia-
shape,
Kukloboros-roaring, and the camel-rest.
Nay, Aristullos, — once your volley spent On the male-Kirké and her swinish crew, — PLATON, — so others call the youth we
love, —

Sends your performance to the curious
king —

"Do you desire to know Athenai's knack At turning seriousness to pleasantry?

Read this! One Aristullos means myself.

The author is indeed a merry grig!"

Nay, it would seem as if yourself were bent On laying down the law "Tell lies I
must —

Aforethought and of purpose, no mistake!" When forth yourself step, tell us from the stage

"Here you behold the King of Comedy — Me, who, the first, have purged my every
piece

From each and all my predecessors' filth, Abjured those satyr-adjuncts sown to bid
The boys laugh, satyr-jokes whereof not
one

Least sample but would make my hair turn grey

Beyond a twelvemonth's ravage! I renounce

Mountebank-claptrap, such as firework-fizz

And torchflare, or else nuts and barleycorns

Scattered among the crowd, to scramble
for

And stop their mouths with; no such stuff shames me!

Who, — what's more serious, — know both when to strike

And when to stay my hand: once dead, my
foe,

Why, done, my fighting! I attack a corpse?

I spare the corpse-like even! punish age?

I pity from my soul that sad effete

Toothless old mumbler called Kratinos!
once

My rival, — now, alack, the dotard slinks Ragged and hungry to what hole's his
home;

Ay, slinks thro' byways where no passenger Flings him a bone to pick. You formerly Adored the Muses' darling: dotard now, Why, he may starve! O mob most mutable!"

So you harangued in person; while, — to point

Precisely out, these were but lies you launched, —

Prompt, a play followed primed with satyr-frisks,

No spice spared of the stomach-turning stew,

Full-fraught with torch-display, and barley-throw,

And Kleon, dead enough, bedaubed
afresh;

While daft Kratinos — home to hole trudged he,

Wrung dry his wit to the last vinous dregs, Decanted them to "Bottle," — beat, next

year, —

"Bottle" and dregs — your best of "Clouds" and dew!

Where, Comic King, may keenest eye detect

Improvement on your predecessors' work Except in lying more audaciously?

Why — genius! That's the grandeur, that's the gold

That's you — superlatively true to touch — Gold, leaf or lump — gold, anyhow the mass

Takes manufacture and proves Pallas' casque

Or, at your choice, simply a cask to keep Corruption from decay. Your rivals' hoard

May ooze forth, lacking such preservative:
Yours cannot — gold plays guardian far too well!

Genius, I call you: dross, your rivals
share;

Ay, share and share alike, too! says the
world,

However you pretend supremacy
In aught beside that gold, your very own.

Satire? "Kratinos for our satirist!"
The world cries. Elegance? "Who elegant

As Eupolis?" resounds as noisily.
Artistic fancy? Choros-creatures quaint?

Magnes invented "Birds" and "Frogs"
enough,

Archippos punned, Hegemon parodied, To heart's content, before you stepped on stage.

Moral invective? Eupolis exposed

"That prating beggar, he who stole the cup,"

Before your "Clouds" rained grime on Sokrates;

Nay, what beat "Clouds" but "Konnos," muck for mud?

Courage? How long before, well-masked, you poured

Abuse on Eukrates and Lusikles, Did Telekleides and Hermippos pelt

Their Perikles and Kumon? standing
forth,

Bareheaded, not safe crouched behind a
name, —

Philonides or else Kallistratos, Put forth, when danger threatened, — mask for face, To bear the brunt, — if blame fell, take the

blame, —

- If praise . . . why, frank laughed Aristophanes
 "They write such rare stuff? No, I promise you!" Rather, I see all true improvements, made Or making, go against you — tooth and nail Contended with; 'tis still Moruchides,
 'Tis Euthumenes, Surakosios, nay, Argurrios and Kinesias, — common sense
 And public shame, these only cleanse your style!
 Coerced, prohibited, — you grin and bear,
 And, soon as may be, hug to heart again
 The banished nastiness too dear to drop!
 Krates could teach and practise festive song
 Yet scorn scurrility; as gay and good, Pherekrates could follow. Who loosed hold,
 Must let fall rose-wreath, stoop to muck once more?
 Did your particular self advance in aught, Task the sad genius — steady slave the while
 To further — say, the patriotic aim?
 No, there's deterioration manifest Year by year, play by play! survey them all,
 From that boy's-triumph when "Acharnes" dawned,
 To "Thesmophoriazousai," — this man's-shame!
 There, truly, patriot zeal so prominent Allowed friends' plea perhaps: the baser stuff Was but the nobler spirit's vehicle.
 Who would imprison, unvolatilise
 A violet's perfume, blends with fatty oils Essence too fugitive in flower alone;
 So, calling unguent — violet, call the play — Obscenity impregnated with "Peace"!
 But here's the boy grown bald, and here's the play With twenty years' experience: where's one spice
 Of odour in the hog's-lard? what pretends To aught except a grease-pot's quality?
 Friend, sophist-hating! know, — worst sophistry
 Is when man's own soul plays its own self false, Reasons a vice into a virtue, pleads
 "I detail sin to shame its author" — not
 "I shame Aripkrades for sin's display"! —
 "I show Opéra to commend Sweet Home" —
 Not "I show Bacchis for the striplings' sake!" Yet all the same — O genius and O gold — Had genius ne'er diverted gold from use Worthy the temple, to do copper's work
- And coat a swine's trough — which abundantly Might furnish Phoibos' tripod, Pallas' throne!
 Had you, I dream, discarding all the base,
 The brutish, spurned alone convention's watch And ward against invading decency Disguised as licence, law in lawlessness,
 And so, re-ordinating outworn rule,
 Made Comedy and Tragedy combine, Prove some new Both-yet-neither, all one bard, Euripides with Aristophanes
 Co-operant! this, reproducing Now
 As that gave Then existence: Life to-day,
 This, as that other — Life dead long ago!
 The mob decrees such feat no crown, perchance,
 But — why call crowning the reward of quest?
 Tell him, my other poet, — where thou walk'st
 Some rarer world than e'er Ilissos washed!
 But dream goes idly in the air. To earth!
 Earth's question just amounts to — which succeeds,
 Which fails of two life-long antagonists?
 Suppose my charges all mistake! assume Your end, despite ambiguous means, the best —
 The only! you and he, a patriot-pair,
 Have striven alike for one result — say, Peace!
 You spoke your best straight to the arbiters —
 Our people: have you made them end this war
 By dint of laughter and abuse and lies And postures of Opéra? Sadly — No!
 This war, despite your twenty-five years' work,
 May yet endure until Athenai falls,
 And freedom falls with her. So much for you!
 Now, the antagonist Euripides — Has he succeeded better? Who shall say?
 He spoke quite o'er the heads of Kleon's crowd
 To a dim future, and if there he fail, Why, you are fellows in adversity.
 But that's unlike the fate of wise words launched By music on their voyage. Hail, Depart, Arrive, Glad Welcome! Not my single wish — Yours also wafts the white sail on its way, Your nature too is kingly. All beside I call pretension — no true porentate, Whatever intermediary be crowned,
 Zeus or Poseidon, where the vulgar sky

Lacks not Triballo¹ to complete the group I recognise, — behind such phantom-crew, —

Necessity, Creation, Poet's Power, Else never had I dared approach, appeal To poetry, power, Aristophanes!
But I trust truth's inherent kingliness, Trust who, by reason of much truth, shall reign

More or less royally — may prayer but push

His sway past limit, purge the false from
true!

Nor, even so, had boldness nerved my
tongue

10 But that the other king stands suddenly,
In all the grand investiture of death, Bowing your knee beside my lowly head — Equals one moment!

Now, arise and go!

Both have done homage to Euripides!

Silence pursued the words: till he broke out —

"Scarce so! This constitutes, I may believe,

Sufficient homage done by who defames Your poet's foe since you account me
such;

But homage-proper, — pay it by defence 10 Of him, direct defence and not oblique, Not by mere mild admonishment of me!"

Defence? The best, the only! I replied.
A story goes — When Sophokles, last year, Cited before tribunal by his son (A poet — to complete the parallel) Was certified unsound of intellect,
And claimed as only fit for tutelage, Since old and doating and incompetent To carry on this world's work, — the defence

30 Consisted just in his reciting (calm As the verse bore, which sets our heart
a-swell

And voice a-heaving too tempestuously) That choros-chant "The station of the steed,

Stranger! thou comest to, — Kolonos
white!"

Then he looked round and all revolt was
dead.

You know the one adventure of my life —
What made Euripides Balaustion's friend.
When I last saw him, as he bade farewell,
"I sang another 'Herakles,'" smiled he;

40 "It gained no prize: your love be prize I
gain!

Take it — the tablets also where I traced
The story first with stulos pendent still — Nay, the psalterion may complete the gift,

: A clownish god.

So, should you croon the ode bewailing
Age,

Yourselves shall modulate — same notes, same strings —

With the old friend who loved Balaustion
once."

There they lie! When you broke our solitude,

We were about to honour him once more
By reading the consummate Tragedy.

Night is advanced; I have small mind to 50
sleep;

May I go on, and read, — so make defence,
So test true godship? You affirm, not I,

Beating the god, affords such test: I hold

That when rash hands but touch divinity, The chains drop off, the prison-walls dispart,

And — fire — he fronts mad Pentheus!
Dare we try?

Accordingly I read the perfect piece.

HERAKLES.

AMPHITRUON.

Zeus' Couchmate, — who of mortals knows not me,

Argive Amphitruon whom Alkaios sired
Of old, as Perseus him, I — Herakles? 60 My home, this Thebai where the earth-born spike

Of Sown-ones burgeoned: Ares saved from these

A handful of their seed that stocks to-day With children's children Thebai, Kadmos built.

Of these had Kreon birth, Menoikeus'
child,

King of the country, — Kreon that became The father of this woman, Megara, Whom, when time was, Kadmeians one
and all

Pealed praise to, marriage-songs with fluted help,

While to my dwelling that grand Herakles 70 Bore her, his bride. But, leaving Thebes — where I

Abode perforce — this Megara and those Her kinsmen, the desire possessed my son Rather to dwell in Argos, that walled work, Kuklopiian city, which I fly, myself,

Because I slew Elektruon. Seeking so
To ease away my hardships and once more Inhabit his own land, for my return

Heav'n the price he pays Eurustheus
there —

The letting in of light on this choked 80
world!

Either he promised, vanquished by the goad

Of Heré, or because fate willed it thus.
The other labours — why, he toiled them through;

But for this last one — down by Tainaros, Its mouth, to Haides' realm descended he
To drag into the light the three-shaped hound

Of Hell: whence Herakles returns no more.
Now, there's an old-world tale, Kadmeians have,

How Dirké's husband was a Lukos once, Holding the seven-towered city here in sway 30 Before they ruled the land, white-steeded pair,

The children Amphion, Zethos, born to Zeus.
This Lukos' son, — named like his father too,

No born Kadmeian but Euboiá's gift, — Comes and kills Kreon, lords it o'er the land,

Falling upon our town sedition-sick.
To us, akin to Kreon, just that bond Becomes the worst of evils, seemingly;

For, since my son is in the earth's abyssms,
This man of valour, Lukos, lord and king, 20 Seeks now to slay these sons of Herakles, And slay his wife as well, — by murder thus

Thinking to stamp out murder, — slay too me,

(If me 'tis fit you count among men still, — Useless old age) and all for fear lest these,
Grown men one day, exact due punishment
Of bloodshed and their mother's father's fate.

I therefore, since he leaves me in these domes,

The children's household guardian, — left, when earth's

Dark dread he underwent, that son of mine, —

30 I, with their mother, lest his boys should die,

Sit at this altar of the saviour Zeus Which, glory of triumphant spear, he raised

Conquering — my nobly-born! — the Minuai.

Here do we guard our station, destitute
Of all things, drink, food, raiment, on bare ground

Couched side by side: sealed out of house and home

Sit we in a resourcelessness of help.

Our friends — why, some are no true friends, I see!

The rest, that are true, want the means to aid.

40 So operates in man adversity:
Whereof may never anybody — no,
Though half of him should really wish me well, —

Happen to taste! a friend-test faultless; that!

MEGARA.

Old man, who erst didst raze the Taphian town,

Illustriously, the army-leader, thou,
Of speared Kadmeians — how gods play men false!

I, now, missed nowise fortune in my sire,
Who, for his wealth, was boasted mighty once,

Having supreme rule, — for the love of which

Leap the long lances forth at favoured 50 breasts, —

And having children too: and me he gave Thy son, his house with that of Herakles Uniting by the far-famed marriage-bed.

And now these things are dead and flown away,

While thou and I await our death, old man,
These Herakleian boys too, whom — my chicks —

I save beneath my wings like brooding bird.

But one or other falls to questioning.
"O mother," cries he, "where in all the world

Is father gone to? What's he doing? 60 when Will he come back?" At fault through tender years,

They seek their sire. For me, I put them off,

Telling them stories; at each creak of doors,

All wonder "Does he come?" — and all a-foot

Make for the fall before the parent knee.
Now then, what hope, what method of escape

Facilitatest thou? — for, thee, old man,
I look to, — since we may not leave by stealth

The limits of the land, and guards, more strong

Than we, are at the outlets: nor in friends 70

Remain to us the hopes of safety more.

Therefore, whatever thy decision be,
Impart it for the common good of all!

Lest now should prove the proper time to die,

Though, being weak, we spin it out and live.

AMPHITRUON.

Daughter, it scarce is easy, do one's best,
To blurt out counsel, things at such a pass.

MEGARA.

You want some sorrow more, or so love life?

AMPHITRUON.

I both enjoy life, and love hopes beside.

MEGARA.

And I; but hope against hope — no, old man!

AMPHITRUON.

In these delayings of an ill lurks cure.

MEGARA.

But bitter is the meantime, and it bites.

AMPHITRUON.

O there may be a run before the wind
From out these present ills, for me and thee,

Daughter, and yet may come my son, thy spouse!

But hush! and from the children take away

Their founts a flow with tears, and talk them calm,

Steal them by stories — sad theft, all the same!

For, human troubles — they grow weary too;

Neither the wind-blasts always have their strength

Nor happy men keep happy to the end:
Since all things change — their natures part in twain;

And that man's bravest, therefore, who hopes on,

Hopes ever: to despair is coward-like.

CHOROS.

These domes that overroof,
This long-used couch, I come to, having made

A staff my prop, that song may put to proof

The swan-like power, age-whitened, — poet's aid

Of sobbed-forth dirges — words that stand aloof

From action now: such am I — just a shade

With night for all its face, a mere night-dream —

And words that tremble too: howe'er they seem,

Devoted words, I deem.

O, of a father ye unfathered ones,
O thou old man, and thou whose groaning stuns —

Unhappy mother — only us above, Nor reaches him below in Haides' realm, thy love!

— (Faint not too soon, urge forward foot and limb

Way-weary, nor lose courage — as some horse

Yoked to the car whose weight recoils on him

Just at the rock-ridge that concludes his course!

Take by the hand, the peplos, anyone Whose foothold fails him, printless and fordone!

Aged, assist along me aged too,
Who, — mate with thee in toils when life was new,

And shields and spears first made acquaintanceship, —

Stood by thyself and proved no bastard-slip

Of fatherland when loftiest glory grew.) —

See now, how like the sire's Each eyeball fiercely fires!

What though ill-fortune have not left his race?

Neither is gone the grand paternal grace!
Hellas! O what — what combatants, destroyed

In these, wilt thou one day seek — seek, and find all void!

Pause! for I see the ruler of this land, Lukos, now passing through the palace-gate.

LUKOS.

The Herakleian couple — father, wife —
If needs I must, I question: "must" forsooth?

Being your master — all I please, I ask.

To what time do you seek to spin out life?
What hope, what help see, so as not to die?

Is it you trust the sire of these, that's sunk
In Haides, will return? How past the pitch,

Suppose you have to die, you pile the woe —

Thou, casting, Hellas through, thy empty vaunts

As though Zeus helped thee to a god for son;

And thou, that thou wast styled our best man's wife!

Where was the awful in his work wound up,

If he did quell and quench the marshy snake

Or the Nemeian monster whom he snared

And — says, by throttlings of his arm, he slew?

With these do you outwrestle me? Such feats

Shall save from death the sons of Herakles Who got praise, being nought, for bravery

In wild-beast-battle, otherwise a blank?
No man to throw on left arm buckler's weight,

Not he, nor get in spear's reach! bow he bore —

True coward's-weapon: shoot first and then fly!

No bow-and-arrow proves a man is brave,

But who keeps rank, — stands, one unwinking stare

As, plunging up, the darts come, — brave is he.

My action has no impudence, old man! Providence, rather: for I own I slew Kreon, this woman's sire, and have his seat.

Nowise I wish, then, to leave, these grown up,

Avengers on me, payment for my deeds.

AMPHITRUON.

As to the part of Zeus in his own child, Let Zeus defend that! As to mine, 'tis me

10 The care concerns to show by argument The folly of this fellow, — Herakles, Whom I stand up for! since to hear thee styled —

Cowardly — that is unendurable.

First then, the infamous (for I account Amongst the words denied to human speech, Timidity ascribed thee, Herakles!)

This I must put from thee, with gods in proof.

Zeus' thunder I appeal to, those four steeds

Whereof he also was the charioteer

120 When, having shot down the earth's Giant-growth —

(Never shaft flew but found and fitted flank)

Triumph he sang in common with the gods.

The Kentaur-race, four footed insolence — Go ask at Pholoë, vilest thou of kings,

Whom they would pick out and pronounce best man,

If not my son, "the seeming-brave," say'st thou!

But Dirphus, thy Abantid mother-town, Question her, and she would not praise, I think!

For there's no spot, where having done some good,

30 Thy country thou mightst call to witness worth.

Now, that all-wise invention, archer's-gear,

Thou blamest: hear my teaching and grow sage!

A man in armour is his armour's slave, And, mixed with rank and file that want to run,

He dies because his neighbours have lost heart.

Then, should he break his spear, no way remains

Of warding death off, — gone that body-guard,

His one and only; while, whatever folk Have the true bow-hand, — here's the one main good, —

Though he have sent ten thousand shafts 49 abroad,

Others remain wherewith the archer saves His limbs and life, too, — stands afar and wards

Away from flesh the foe that vainly stares Hurt by the viewless arrow, while himself Offers no full front to those opposite, But keeps in thorough cover: there's the point

That's capital in combat — damage foe, Yet keep a safe skin — foe not out of reach

As you are! Thus my words contrast with thine,

And such, in judging facts, our difference. 50 These children, now, why dost thou seek to slay?

What have they done thee? In a single point

I count thee wise — if, being base thyself, Thou dread'st the progeny of nobleness. Yet this bears hard upon us, all the same, If we must die — because of fear in thee —

A death 'twere fit thou suffer at our hands, Thy betters, did Zeus rightly judge us all.

If therefore thou art bent on sceptre-sway, Thyself, here — suffer us to leave the land, 60

Fugitives! nothing do by violence, Or violence thyself shalt undergo

When the gods' gale may chance to change for thee!

Alas, O land of Kadmos, — for 'tis thee I mean to close with, dealing out the due Revilement, — in such sort dost thou defend Herakles and his children? Herakles Who, coming, one to all the world, against The Minuai, fought them and left Thebes an eye Unblinded henceforth to front freedom 70 with!

Neither do I praise Hellas, nor shall brook Ever to keep in silence that I count

Towards my son, craven of cravens — her Whom it behoved go bring the young ones here

Fire, spears, arms — in exchange for seas made safe,

And cleansings of the land — his labour's price.

But fire, spears, arms, — O children, neither Thebes

Nor Hellas has them for you! 'Tis myself, A feeble friend, ye look to: nothing now

But a tongue's murmur, for the strength is 84 gone

We had once, and with age are limbs a-shake

And force a-flicker! Were I only young, Still with the mastery o'er bone and thew, Grasping first spear that came, the yellow locks

Of this insulter would I bloody so — Should send him skipping o'er the Atlantic bounds
Out of my arm's reach through poltroonery!

CHOROS.

Have not the really good folk starting-points
For speech to purpose, — though rare talkers they?

LUKOS.

Say thou against us words thou towerest
with!

I, for thy words, will deal thee blows, their
due.

Go, some to Helikon, to Parnasos Some, and the clefts there! Bid the woodmen fell to Oak-trunks, and, when the same are brought inside

The city, pile the altar round with logs, Then fire it, burn the bodies of them all,
That they may learn thereby, no dead man rules

The land here, but 'tis I, by acts like these!
As for you, old sirs, who are set against My judgments, you shall groan for — not alone

The Herakleian children, but the fate
Of your own house beside, when faring ill
By any chance: and you shall recollect to Slaves are you of a tyranny that's mine!

CHOROS.

O progeny of earth, — whom Ares sowed
When he laid waste the dragon's greedy jaw —

Will ye not lift the staves, right-hand supports,

And bloody this man's irreligious head?
Who, being no Kadmeian, rules, — the wretch, —

Our easy youth: an interloper too!
But not of me, at least, shalt thou enjoy Thy lordship ever; nor my labour's
fruit, —

Hand worked so hard for, — have!
A curse with thee,

30 Whence thou didst come, there go and tyrannise!

For never while I live shalt thou destroy The Herakleian children: not so deep Hides he below ground, leaving thee their
lord!

But we bear both of you in mind, — that
thou,

The land's destroyer, dost possess the
land,

While he who saved it, loses every right.
I play the busybody — for I serve

My dead friends when they need friends' service most?

O right-hand, how thou yearnest to snatch spear
And serve indeed! in weakness dies the 40
wish,
Or I had stayed thee calling me a slave,
And nobly drawn my breath at home in Thebes
Where thou exultest! — city that's insane, Sick through sedition and bad government, Else never had she gained for master —
thee!

MEGARA.

Old friends, I praise you: since a righteous wrath

For friend's sake well becomes a friend.
But no!

On our account in anger with your lord, Suffer no injury! Hear my advice, Amphitruon, if I seem to speak aright. 50
O yes, I love my children! how not love What I brought forth, what toiled for? and to die —

Sad I esteem too; still, the fated way
Who stiffens him against, that man I count Poor creature; us, who are of other mood, Since we must die, behoves us meet our
death

Not burnt to cinders, giving foes the
laugh —

To me, worse ill than dying, that! We owe

Our houses many a brave deed, now to pay.

Thee, indeed, gloriously men estimate 60
For spear-work, so that unendurable Were it that thou shouldst die a death of shame.

And for my glorious husband, where wants
he

A witness that he would not save his boys
If touched in their good fame thereby?
Since birth

Bears ill with baseness done for children's
sake,

My husband needs must be my pattern
here.

See now thy hope — how much I count thereon!

Thou thinkest that thy son will come to
light:

And, of the dead, who came from Haides 70
back?

But we with talk this man might mollify:
Never! Of all foes, fly the foolish one!
Wise, well-bred people, make concession
to!

Sooner you meet respect by speaking soft.
Already it was in my mind — perchance We might beg off these children's banish-
ment;

But even that is sad, involving them
In safety, ay — and piteous poverty!
Since the host's visage for the flying friend

Has, only one day, the sweet look, 'tis said.
Dare with us death, which waits thee, dared or no!
We call on thine ancestral worth, old man!
For who outlabours what the gods appoint Shows energy, but energy gone mad.
Since what must — none e'er makes what must not be.

CHOROS.

Had anyone, while yet my arms were
strong,
Been scorning thee, he easily had ceased.
But we are nought, now; thine henceforth to see — 10 Amphitruon, how to push aside these fates!

AMPHITRUON.

Nor cowardice nor a desire of life Stops me from dying: but I seek to save My son his children. Vain! I set my
heart,
It seems, upon impossibility.
See, it is ready for the sword, this throat To pierce, divide, dash down from precipice!
But one grace grant us, king, we suppli-
cate!
Slay me and this unhappy one before The children, lest we see them — impious sight! —
20 Gasping the soul forth, calling all the while On mother and on father's father! Else, Do as thy heart inclines thee! No resource
Have we from death, and we resign ourselves.

MEGARA.

And I too supplicate: add grace to grace,
And, though but one man, doubly serve us
both!
Let me bestow adornment of the dead Upon these children! Throw the palace wide!
For now we are shut out. Thence these shall share
At least so much of wealth was once their sire's!

LUKOS.

30 These things shall be. Withdraw the bolts, I bid My servants! Enter and adorn your-
selves!
I grudge no peploi; but when these ye wind
About your bodies, — that adornment
done, —
Then I shall come and give you to the grave.

MEGARA.

O children, follow this unhappy foot,
Your mother's, into your ancestral home,

Where others have the power, are lords in
truth,
Although the empty name is left us yet!

AMPHITRUON.

O Zeus, in vain I had thee marriage-mate,
In vain I called thee father of my child! 40 Thou wast less friendly far than thou didst seem.

I, the mere man, o'ermatch in virtue thee
The mighty god: for I have not betrayed
The Herakleian children, — whereas thou Hadst wit enough to come clandestinely Into the chamber, take what no man gave,
Another's place; and when it comes to help Thy loved ones, there thou lackest wit
indeed!

Thou art some stupid god or born unjust.

CHOROS.

Even a dirge, can Phoibos suit 50
In song to music jubilant
For all its sorrow: making shoot His golden plectron o'er the lute, Melodious ministrant.
And I, too, am of mind to raise,
Despite the imminence of doom,
A song of joy, outpour my praise
To him — what is it rumour says? — Whether — now buried in the ghostly gloom Below ground, — he was child of Zeus 60
indeed,
Or mere Amphitruon's mortal seed — To him I weave the wreath of song, his labour's meed.
For, is my hero perished in the feat?
The virtues of brave toils, in death complete,
These save the dead in song, — their glory-garland meet!

First, then, he made the wood
Of Zeus a solitude, Slaying its lion-tenant; and he spread The tawiness behind — his yellow head Enmuffled by the brute's, backed by 70 that grin of dread.
The mountain-roving savage Kentaur-race He strewed with deadly bow about their
place,
Slaying with winged shafts: Peneios knew, Beauteously-eddyng, and the long tracts
too
Of pasture trampled fruitless, and as well Those desolated haunts Mount Pelion
under,
And, grassy up to Homolé, each dell Whence, having filled their hands with pine-tree plunder, Horse-like was wont to prance from, and subdue
The land of Thessaly, that bestial crew. 80

The golden-headed spot-back'd stag he slew,
That robber of the rustics: glorified Therewith the goddess who in hunter's pride

Slaughters the game along Oinoë's side.
And, yoked abreast, he brought the chariot-breed

To pace submissive to the bit, each steed
That in the bloody cribs of Diomede Champed and, unbridled, hurried down that gore

For grain, exultant the dread feast before —

10 Of man's flesh: hideous feeders they of yore!

All as he crossed the Hebros' silver-flow Accomplished he such labour, toiling so For Mukenaian tyrant; ay, and more — He crossed the Melian shore
And, by the sources of Amauros, shot To death that strangers'-pest Kuknos, who dwelt in Amphanaia: not Of fame for good to guest!

And next, to the melodious maids he came, 20 Inside the Hesperian court-yard: hand must aim

At plucking gold fruit from the appled
leaves,

Now he had killed the dragon, backed like
flame,

Who guards the unapproachable he weaves Himself all round, one spire about the
same.

And into those sea-troughs of ocean dived
The hero, and for mortals calm contrived, Whatever oars should follow in his wake.
And under heaven's mid-seat his hands thrust he,

At home with Atlas: and, for valour's sake, 30 Held the gods up their star-faced mansionry.

Also, the rider-host of Amazons About Maiotis many-streamed, he went To conquer through the billowy Euxin
once,

Having collected what an armament
Of friends from Hellas, all on conquest bent Of that gold-garnished cloak, dread girdlechase!

So Hellas gained the girl's barbarian grace And at Mukenai saves the trophy still — Go wonder there, who will!

40 And the ten thousand-headed hound
Of many a murder, the Lernaian snake He burned out, head by head, and cast
around

His darts a poison thence, — darts soon to slake

Their rage in that three-bodied herdsman's gore

Of Erutheia. Many a running more

He made for triumph and felicity,
And, last of toils, to Haides, never dry Of tears, he sailed: and there he, luckless,
ends

His life completely, nor returns again.
The house and home are desolate of friends, 50
And where the children's life-path leads them, plain

I see, — no step retraceable, no god Availing, and no law to help the lost!
The oar of Charon marks their period, Waits to end all. Thy hands, these roofs accost! —

To thee, though absent, look their utter-most!

But if in youth and strength I flourished
still,
Still shook the spear in fight, did power match will

In these Kadmeian co-mates of my age, They would, — and I, — when warfare 60 was to wage,

Stand by these children; but I am bereft Of youth now, lone of that good genius left!

But hist, desist! for here come these, — Draped as the dead go, under and over, — Children long since, — now hard to discover, —

Of the once so potent Herakles!
And the loved wife dragging, in one tether
About her feet, the boys together;
And the hero's aged sire comes last!

Unhappy that I am! Of tears which 70
rise, —

How am I all unable to hold fast, Longer, the aged fountains of these eyes!

MEGARA.

Be it so! Who is priest, who butcher here
Of these ill-fated ones, or stops the breath Of me, the miserable? Ready, see,
The sacrifice — to lead where Haides lives!
O children, we are led — no lovely team Of corpses — age, youth, motherhood, all mixed!

O sad fate of myself and these my sons Whom with these eyes I look at, this last 80
time!

I, indeed, bore you: but for enemies
I brought you up to be a laughing-stock, Matter for merriment, destruction-stuff!
Woe's me!

Strangely indeed my hopes have struck me
down

From what I used to hope about you
once —

The expectation from your father's talk:
For thee, now, thy dead sire dealt Argos to:
Thou wast to have Eurustheus' house one
day,

And rule Pelasgia where the fine fruits
grow;

And, for a stole of state, he wrapped about Thy head with that the lion-monster bore, That which himself went wearing armour-
wise.

And thou wast King of Thebes — such chariots there!

Those plains I had for portion — all for
thee,

As thou hadst coaxed them out of who gave
birth

To thee, his boy: and into thy right hand
He thrust the guardian-club of Daïdalos, — Poor guardian proves the gift that plays thee false!

10 And upon thee he promised to bestow Oichalia — what, with those far-shooting shafts,

He ravaged once; and so, since three you were,

With threefold kingdoms did he build you
up

To very towers, your father, — proud
enough

Prognosticating, from your manliness In boyhood, what the manhood's self would
be.

For my part, I was picking out for you Brides, suiting each with his alliance —
this

From Athens, this from Sparté, this from Thebes —

20 Whence, suited — as stern-cables steady
ship —

You might have hold on life gods bless.
All gone!

Fortune turns round and gives us — you,
the Fates

Instead of brides — me, tears for nuptial baths,

Unhappy in my hoping! And the sire Of your sire — he prepares the marriage-feast

Befitting Haides who plays father now — Bitter relationship! Oh me! which first — Which last of you shall I to bosom fold?
To whom shall I fit close, his mouth to
mine?

30 Of whom shall I lay hold and ne'er let go?
How would I gather, like the brown-winged bee,

The groans from all, and, gathered into
one,

Give them you back again, a crowded tear!
Dearest, if any voice be heard of men Dungeoned in Haides, thee — to thee I
speak!

Here is thy father dying, and thy boys!
And I too perish, famed as fortunate By mortals once, through thee! Assist them! Come!

But come! though just a shade, appear to
me!

40 For, coming, thy ghost-grandeur would suffice,

Such cowards are they in thy presence,
these

Who kill thy children now thy back is turned!

AMPHITRUON.

Ay, daughter, bid the powers below assist!
But I will rather, raising hand to heaven, Call thee to help, O Zeus, if thy intent
Be, to these children, helpful anyway, Since soon thou wilt be valueless enough!
And yet thou hast been called and called;
in vain

I labour: for we needs must die, it seems.
Well, aged brothers — life's a little thing! 5
Such as it is, then, pass life pleasantly From day to night, nor once grieve all the while!

Since Time concerns him not about our hopes, —

To save them, — but his own work done, flies off.

Witness myself, looked up to among men, Doing noteworthy deeds! when here comes
fate

Lifts me away, like feather skyward borne,
In one day! Riches then and glory, — whom

These are found constant to, I know not.
Friends,

Farewell! the man who loved you all so 6
much,

Now, this last time, my mates, ye look upon!

MEGARA.

Ha!
O father, do I see my dearest? Speak!

AMPHITRUON.

No more than thou canst, daughter — dumb like thee!

MEGARA.

Is this he whom we heard was under
ground?

AMPHITRUON.

Unless at least some dream in day we see!

MEGARA.

What do I say? what dreams insanely
view?

This is no other than thy son, old sire!
Here, children! hang to these paternal robes,

Quick, haste, hold hard on him, since 7 here's your true

Zeus that can save — and every whit as well.

HERAKLES.

O hail, my palace, my hearth's propula, —
How glad I see thee as I come to light!

Ha, what means this? My children I behold

Before the house in garments of the grave, Chapleted, and, amid a crowd of men,
My very wife — my father weeping too, Whatever the misfortune! Come, best
take

My station nearer these and learn it all!
Wife, what new sorrow has approached our home?

MEGARA.

O dearest! light flashed on thy father
now!

Art thou come? art thou saved and dost thou fall

On friends in their supreme extremity?

HERAKLES.

How say'st thou? Father! what's the trouble here?

MEGARA.

Undone are we! — but thou, old man, forgive

If first I snatch what thou shouldst say to
him!

For somehow womanhood wakes pity
more.

Here are my children killed and I undone!

HERAKLES.

Apollon, with what preludes speech begins!

MEGARA.

Dead are my brothers and old father too.

HERAKLES.

How say'st thou? — doing what? — by spear-stroke whence?

MEGARA.

Lukos destroyed them — the land's noble
king!

HERAKLES.

Met them in arms? or through the land's disease?

MEGARA.

Sedition: and he sways seven-gated Thebes.

HERAKLES.

Why then came fear on the old man and
thee?

MEGARA.

He meant to kill thy father, me, our boys.

HERAKLES.

How say'st thou? Fearing what from orphanage?

MEGARA.

Lest they should some day pay back Kreon's death.

HERAKLES.

And why trick out the boys corpse-fashion
thus?

MEGARA.

These wraps of death we have already donned.

HERAKLES.

And you had died through violence?
Woe's me!

MEGARA.

Left bare of friends: and thou wast dead, we heard.

HERAKLES.

And whence came on you this faintheartedness?

MEGARA.

The heralds of Eurustheus brought the 30 news.

HERAKLES.

And why was it you left my house and hearth?

MEGARA.

Forced thence; thy father — from his very couch!

HERAKLES.

And no shame at insulting the old man?

MEGARA.

Shame, truly! no near neighbours he and Shame!

HERAKLES.

And so much, in my absence, lacked I
friends?

MEGARA.

Friends, — are there any to a luckless
man?

HERAKLES.

The Minuai-war I waged, — they spa-forth these?

MEGARA.

Friendless, — again I tell thee, — is ill-luck.

HERAKLES.

Will not you cast these hell-wraps from your hair

And look on light again, and with your 40
eyes

Taste the sweet change from nether dark to-day?

While I — for now there needs my handi-
work —

First I shall go, demolish the abodes Of these new lordships; next hew off the
head

Accurst and toss it for the dogs to trail.

Then, such of the Kadmeians as I find Were craven though they owed me gratitude, —

Some I intend to handle with this club Renowned for conquest; and with winged shafts

Scatter the others, fill Ismenos full With bloody corpses, — Dirké's flow so
white

Shall be incarnadined. For, whom, I
pray,

Behoves me rather help than wife and child And aged father? Farewell, "Labours"
mine!

10 Vainly I wrought them: my true work lay
here!

My business is to die defending these, —
If for their father's sake they meant to die.
Or how shall we call brave the battling it With snake and lion, as Eurustheus bade, If yet I must not labour death away From my own children? "Conquering
Herakles"

Folk will not call me as they used, I think!
The right thing is for parents to assist Children, old age, the partner of the couch.

AMPHITRUON.

20 True, son! thy duty is — be friend to
friends

And foe to foes: yet — no more haste than needs!

HERAKLES.

Why, father, what is over hasty here?

AMPHITRUON.

Many a pauper, — seeming to be rich,
As the word goes, — the king calls partisan.
Such made a riot, ruined Thebes to rob Their neighbour: for, what good they had at home

Was spent and gone — flew off through idleness.

You came to trouble Thebes, they saw:
since seen,

Beware lest, raising foes, a multitude,

30 You stumble where you apprehend no harm.

HERAKLES.

If all Thebes saw me, not a whit care I.
But seeing as I did a certain bird Not in the lucky seats, I knew some woe Was fallen upon the house: so, purposely, By stealth I made my way into the land.

AMPHITRUON.

And now, advancing, hail the hearth with
praise

And give the ancestral home thine eye to
see!

For he himself will come, thy wife and sons

To drag-forth — slaughter — slay me too, — this king!

But, here remaining, all succeeds with 40
thee —

Gain lost by no false step. So, this thy
town

Disturb not, son, ere thou right matters
here!

HERAKLES.

Thus will I do, for thou say'st well; my
home

Let me first enter! Since at the due time Returning from the unsunned depths where dwells

Haides' wife Koré, let me not affront Those gods beneath my roof I first should hail!

AMPHITRUON.

For didst thou really visit Haides, son?

HERAKLES.

Ay — dragged to light, too, his threeheaded beast.

AMPHITRUON.

By fight didst conquer, or through Koré's 50 gift?

HERAKLES.

Fight: well for me, I saw the Orgies first!

AMPHITRUON.

And is he in Eurustheus' house, the brute?

HERAKLES.

Chthonía's grove, Hermion's city, hold him now.

AMPHITRUON.

Does not Eurustheus know thee back on earth?

HERAKLES.

No: I would come first and see matters
here.

AMPHITRUON.

But how wast thou below ground such a time?

HERAKLES.

I stopped, from Haides, bringing Theseus
up.

AMPHITRUON.

And where is he? — bound o'er the plain for home?

HERAKLES.

Gone glad to Athens — Haides' fugitive!
But, up, boys! follow father into house! 60

There's a far better going-in for you Truly, than going-out was! Nay, take heart.

And let the eyes no longer run and run!
And thou, O wife, my own, collect thy soul Nor tremble now! Leave grasping, all of
you,
My garments! I'm not winged, nor fly from friends!

Ah, —
No letting go for these, who all the more Hang to my garments! Did you foot
indeed

The razor's edge? Why, then I'll carry
them —

Take with my hands these small craft up, and tow

10 Just as a ship would. There! don't fear
I shirk

My children's service! this way, men are
men,

No difference! best and worst, they love their boys

After one fashion: wealth they differ in — Some have it, others not; but each and
all

Combine to form the children-loving race.

CHOROS.

Youth is a pleasant burthen to me;
But age on my head, more heavily Than the crags of Aitna, weighs and weighs,
And darkening cloaks the lids and intercepts the rays.

20 Never be mine the preference
Of an Asian empire's wealth, nor yet
Of a house all gold, to youth, to youth That's beauty, whatever the gods dispense!
Whether in wealth we joy, or fret Paupers, — of all God's gifts most beautiful, in truth!

But miserable murderous age I hate!
Let it go to wreck, the waves adown, Nor ever by rights plague tower or town Where mortals bide, but still elate 30 With wings, on ether, precipitate, Wander them round — nor wait!

But if the gods, to man's degree, Had wit and wisdom, they would bring Mankind a twofold youth, to be Their virtue's sign-mark, all should see,
In those with whom life's winter thus grew
spring.

For when they died, into the sun once more Would they have traversed twice life's race-course o'er;

40 While ignobility had simply run Existence through, nor second life begun.
And so might we discern both bad and good As surely as the starry multitude Is numbered by the sailors, one and one.
But now the gods by no apparent line Limit the worthy and the base define;
Only, a certain period rounds, and so Brings man more wealth, — but youthful vigour, no!

Well, I am not to pause Mingling together—wine and wine in cup—
The Graces with the Muses up — 5c Most dulcet marriage: loosed from music's laws,

No life for me!

But where the wreaths abound, there ever may I be!

And still, an aged bard, I shout Mnemo-suné —

Still chant of Herakles the triumph-chant, Companioned by the seven-stringed tortoise shell

And Libuan flute, and Bromios' self as well, God of the grape, with man participant!
Not yet will we arrest their glad advance —

The Muses who so long have led me forth 60 to dance!

A paian — hymn the Delian girls indeed, Weaving a beauteous measure in and out His temple-gates, Latona's goodly seed;
And paians — I too, these thy domes
about,

From these grey cheeks, my king, will swan-like shout —

Old songster! Ay, in song it starts off brave —

"Zeus' son is he!" and yet, such grace of
birth

Surpassing far, to man his labours gave Existence, one calm flow without a wave, Having destroyed the beasts, the terrors 70 of the earth.

LUKOS.

From out the house Amphitruon comes — in time!

For 'tis a long while now since ye bedecked
Your bodies with the dead-folk's finery.
But, quick! the boys and wife of Herakles—Bid them appear outside this house, keep
part

To die, and need no bidding but your own!

AMPHITRUON.

King! you press hard on me sore-pressed
enough,

And give me scorn — beside my dead ones
here.

Meet in such matters were it, though you
reign,

To temper zeal with moderation. Since 80
You do impose on us the need to die —

Needs must we love our lot, obey your will.

LUKOS.

Where's Megara, then? Alkmené's grandsons, where?

AMPHITRUON.

She, I think, — as one figures from outside, —

LUKOS.

Well, this same thinking, — what affords its ground?

AMPHITRUON.

— Sits suppliant on the holy altar-steps, —

LUKOS.

Idly indeed a suppliant to save life!

AMPHITRUON.

— And calls on her dead husband, vainly
too!

LUKOS.

For he's not come, nor ever will arrive.

AMPHITRUON.

Never — at least, if no god raise him up.

LUKOS.

Go to her, and conduct her from the house!

AMPHITRUON.

I should partake the murder, doing that.

LUKOS.

We, — since thou hast a scruple in the case, —

10 Outside of fears, we shall march forth these lads, —

Mother and all. Here, follow me, my folk —

And gladly so remove what stops our toils!

AMPHITRUON.

Thou — go then! March where needs must! What remains —

Perhaps concerns another. Doing ill, Expect some ill be done thee!

Ha, old friends!

On he strides beautifully! in the toils

O' the net, where swords spring forth, will he be fast —

Minded to kill his neighbours — the arch-knave!

I go, too — I must see the falling corpse!

20 For he has sweets to give — a dying man, Your foe, that pays the price of deeds he did.

CHOROS.

Troubles are over! He the great king once Turns the point, tends for Haides, goal of
life!

O justice, and the gods' back-flowing fate!

AMPHITRUON.

Thou art come, late indeed, where death pays crime —

These insults heaped on better than thyself!

CHOROS.

Joy gives this outburst to my tears! Again Come round those deeds, his doing, which
of old

He never dreamed himself was to endure — King of the country! But enough, old 31
man!

Indoors, now, let us see how matters
stand —

If somebody be faring as I wish!

LUKOS.

Ah me — me!

CHOROS.

This strikes the keynote — music to my
mind,

Merry i' the household! Death takes up the tune!

The king gives voice, groans murder's prelude well!

LUKOS.

O, all the land of Kadmos! slain by guile!

CHOROS.

Ay, for who slew first? Paying back thy
due,

Resign thee! make, for deeds done, mere amends!

Who was it grazed the gods through law- 40 lessness —

Mortal himself, threw up his fool's-conceit Against the blessed heavenly ones — as though

Gods had no power? Old friends, the impious man

Exists not any more! The house is mute.
Turn we to song and dance! For, those

I love, Those I wish well to, well fare they, to wish!

Dances, dances and banqueting

To Thebes, the sacred city through,

Are a care! for, change and change

Of tears to laughter, old to new,

Our lays, glad birth, they bring, they bring! 50

He is gone and past, the mighty king!

And the old one reigns, returned — O

strange!

From the Acherontian harbour too!
Advent of hope, beyond thought's widest range!

To the gods, the gods, are crimes a care,

And they watch our virtue, well aware

That gold and that prosperity drive man

Out of his mind — those charioteers who hale

Might-without-right behind them: face 60 who can

Fortune's reverse which time prepares.

nor quail?

— He who evades law and in lawlessness Delights him, — he has broken down his trust —

The chariot, riches haled — now blackening in the dust!

Ismenos, go thou garlanded!
Break into dance, ye ways, the polished bed O' the seven-gated city! Dirké, thou Fair-flowing, with the Asopiad sisters all, Leave your sire's stream, attend the festival

Of Herakles, one choir of nymphs, sing triumph now!

10 O woody rock of Puthios¹ and each home O' the Helikonian Muses, ye shall come With joyous shouting to my walls, my
town

Where saw the light that Spartan race, those "Sown,"

Brazen-shield-bearing chiefs, whercof the band

With children's children renovates our land,

To Thebes a sacred light!

O combination of the marriage rite — Bed of the mortal-born and Zeus, who couched

Beside the nymph of Perscus' progeny!

20 For credible, past hope, becomes to me That nuptial story long ago avouched, O Zeus! and time has turned the dark to bright,

And made one blaze of truth the Hera-kleidan might —

His, who emerged from earth's pavilion,
left

Plouton's abode, the nether palace-cleft.
Thou wast the lord that nature gave me —
not

That baseness born and bred — my king, by lot!

— Baseness made plain to all, who now regard

The match of sword with sword in fight, —

30 If to the gods the Just and Right Still pleasing be, still claim the palm's award.

Horror!

Are we come to the self-same passion of
fear,

Old friends? — such a phantasm fronts me
here

Visible over the palace-roof!

In flight, in flight, the laggard limb

Bestir! and haste aloof

From that on the roof there — grand and grim!

O Paian, king!

40 Be thou my safeguard from the woeful
thing!

IRIS.

Courage, old men! beholding here — Night's birth —

Madness, and me the handmaid of the gods, Iris since to your town we come, no
plague —

Wage war against the house of but one man From Zeus and from Alkmené sprung, they
say.

Now, till he made an end of bitter toils, Fate kept him safe, nor did his father Zeus Let us once hurt him, Heré nor myself.

But, since he has toiled through Eurustheus' task,

Heré desires to fix fresh blood on him — 50 Slaying his children: I desire it too.

Up then, collecting the unsoftened heart, Unwedded virgin of black Night! Drive, drag

Frenzy upon the man here — whirls of
brain

Big with child-murder, while his feet leap
gay!

Let go the bloody cable its whole length!

So that, — when o'er the Acherousian ford

He has sent floating, by self-homicide,

His beautiful boy-garland, — he may know

First, Heré's anger, what it is to him, 60

And then learn mine. The gods are vile

indeed

And mortal matters vast, if he 'scape free!

MADNESS.

Certes, from well-born sire and mother too Had I my birth, whose blood is Night's and Heaven's;

But here's my glory, — not to grudge the
good!

Nor love I raids against the friends of man.

I wish, then, to persuade, — before I see

You stumbling, you and Heré! trust my

words!

This man, the house of whom ye hound me to,

Is not unfamed on earth nor gods among; 70

Since, having quelled waste land and savage sea,

He alone raised again the falling rights

Of gods — gone ruinous through impious

men.

Desire no mighty mischief, I advise!

IRIS.

Give thou no thought to Heré's faulty schemes!

MADNESS.

Changing her step from faulty to fault-free!

IRIS.

Not to be wise, did Zeus' wife send thee
here.

MADNESS.

Sun, thee I cite to witness — doing what I loathe to do!
But since indeed to Heré and thyself I must subserve,
And follow you quick, with a whizz, as the hounds a-hunt with the huntsman, — Go I will! and neither the sea, as it groans with its waves so furiously, Nor earthquake, no, nor the bolt of thunder gasping out heaven's labour-throe, Shall cover the ground as I, at a bound, rush into the bosom of Herakles!
And home I scatter, and house I batter, Having first of all made the children fall, —
And he who felled them is never to know 10 He gave birth to each child that received
the blow,
Till the Madness, I am, have let him go!

Ha, behold! already he rocks his head — he is off from the starting-place!
Not a word, as he rolls his frightful orbs, from their sockets wrenched in the ghastly race!
And the breathings of him he tempers and times no more than a bull in act to toss, And hideously he bellows invoking the Keres, daughters of Tartaros.
Ay, and I soon will dance thee madder, and pipe thee quite out of thy mind with
fear!
So, up with the famous foot, thou Iris, march to Olumpus, leave me here!
Me and mine, who now combine, in the dreadful shape no mortal sees,
And now are about to pass, from without, inside of the home of Herakles!

CHOROS.

20 Otototoi, — groan!
Away is mown
Thy flower, Zeus' offspring, City!
Unhappy Hellas, who dost cast (the pity!)
Who worked thee all the good,
Away from thee, — destroyest in a mood Of madness him, to death whom pipings dance!
There goes she, in her chariot, — groans, her brood, —
And gives her team the goad, as though adrift
For doom, Night's Gorgon, Madness, she whose glance 30 Turns man to marble! with what hissings lift
Their hundred heads the snakes, her head's inheritance!
Quick has the god changed fortune:
through their sire
Quick will the children, that he saved, expire!
O miserable me! O Zeus! thy child —

Childless himself — soon vengeance, hunger-wild, Craving for punishment, will lay how low — Loaded with many a woe!

O palace-roofs! your courts about,
A measure begins all unrejoiced
By the tympanies and the thyrsos hoist 44
Of the Bromian revel-rout!
O ye domes! and the measure proceeds For blood, not such as the cluster bleeds
Of the Dionusian pouring-out!

Break forth, fly, children! fatal this — Fatal the lay that is piped, I wis!
Ay, for he hunts a children-chase — Never shall Madness lead her revel
And leave no trace in the dwelling-place!
Ai ai, because of the evil! 50 Ai ai, the old man — how I groan
For the father, and not the father alone!
She who was nurse of his children, —
small
Her gain that they ever were born at all!

See! See!
A whirlwind shakes hither and thither
The house — the roof falls in together!
Ha, ha, what dost thou, son of Zeus?
A trouble of Tartaros broke loose, Such as once Pallas on the Titan thun- 60 dered, Thou sendest on thy domes, roof-shattered and wall-sundered!

MESSENGER.

O bodies white with age! —

CHOROS.

What cry, to me — What, dost thou call with?

MESSENGER.

There's a curse-indoors.

CHOROS.

I shall not bring a prophet: you suffice.

MESSENGER.

Dead are the children.

CHOROS.

Ai ai!

MESSENGER.

Groan! for, groans Suit well the subject. Dire the children's
death,
Dire too the parent's hands that dealt the
fate.
No one could tell worse woe than we have borne.

CHOROS.

How dost thou that same curse — curse, cause for groan —
 The father's on the children, make appear?
 Tell in what matter they were hurled from
 heaven
 Against the house — these evils; and recount
 The children's hapless fate, O Messenger!

MESSENGER.

The victims were before the hearth of Zeus,
 A household-expiation: since the king O' the country, Herakles had killed and cast
 From out the dwelling; and a beauteous choir
 Of boys stood by his sire, too, and his wife.
 And now the basket had been carried round
 The altar in a circle, and we used The consecrated speech. Alkmené's son, — Just as he was about, in his right hand, To bear the torch, that he might dip into The cleansing-water, — came to a stand-
 still;
 And, as their father yet delayed, his boys Had their eyes on him. But he was himself
 No longer: lost in rollings of the eyes; Outthrusting eyes — their very roots — like blood!
 Froth he dropped down his bushy-bearded cheek,
 And said — together with a madman's
 laugh —
 "Father! why sacrifice, before I slay Eurustheus? why have twice the lustral
 fire,
 And double pains, when 'tis permitted me To end, with one good hand-sweep, matters
 here?
 Then, — when I hither bring Eurustheus'
 head, —
 Then for these just slain, wash hands once for all!
 Now, — cast drink-offerings forth, throw baskets down!
 Who gives me bow and arrows, who my club?
 I go to that Mukanai. One must match Crowbars and mattocks, so that — those sunk stones
 The Kuklops squared with picks and plumb-line red —
 I, with my bent steel, may o'ertumble
 town."
 Which said, he goes and — with no car to have —
 Affirms he has one! mounts the chariot-board,
 And strikes, as having really goad in hand!
 And two ways laughed the servants — laugh with awe;
 And one said, as each met the other's stare,

"Playing us boys' tricks? or is master 40
 mad?"

But up he climbs, and down along the roof,
 And, dropping into the men's place, maintains

He's come to Nisos city, when he's come Only inside his own house! then reclines On floor, for couch, and, as arrived indeed, Makes himself supper; goes through some brief stay,

Then says he's traversing the forest-flats
 Of Isthmos; thereupon lays body bare Of bucklings, and begins a contest with — No one! and is proclaimed the con- 50 queror —

He by himself — having called out to hear — Nobody! Then, if you will take his
 word,

Blaring against Eurustheus horribly, He's at Mukanai. But his father laid Hold of the strong hand and addressed him thus:

"O son, what ails thee? Of what sort is
 this

Extravagance? Has not some murdercraze,

Bred of those corpses thou didst just dispatch,

Danced thee drunk?" But he, — taking him to crouch,

Eurustheus' sire, that apprehensive touched 60
 His hand, a suppliant, — pushes him aside, Gets ready quiver, and bends bow against His children — thinking them Eurustheus'
 boys

He means to slay. They, horrified with
 fear,

Rushed here and there, — this child, into the robes

O' the wretched mother — this, beneath the shade

O' the column, — and this other, like a bird,

Cowered at the altar-foot. The mother shrieks

"Parent — what dost thou? — kill thy children?" So

Shriek the old sire and crowd of servitors. 70
 But he, outwinding him, as round about The column ran the boy, — a horrid whirl

O' the lathe his foot described! — stands opposite,

Strikes through the liver; and supine the boy

Bedews the stone shafts, breathing out his
 life.

But "Victory!" he shouted — boasted
 thus:

"Well, this one nestling of Eurustheus —
 dead —

Falls by me, pays back the paternal hate!" Then bends bow on another who was crouched

At base of altar — overlooked, he thought — 80

And now prevents him, falls at father's knee,
Throwing up hand to beard and cheek
above.
"O dearest!" cries he; "father, kill me
not!
Yours I am — your boy: not Eurustheus'
boy
You kill now!" But he, rolling the wild
eye
Of Gorgon, — as the boys stood all too
close
For deadly bowshot, — mimicry of smith Who batters red-hot iron, — hand o'er
head
Heaving his club, on the boy's yellow hair 10 Hurls it and breaks the bone. This second caught, —
He goes, would slay the third, one sacrifice
He and the couple; but, beforehand here,
The miserable mother catches up, Carries him inside house and bars the
gate.
Then he, as he were at those Kuklops'
work,
Digs at, heaves doors up, wrenches door-posts out, Lays wife and child low with the selfsame shaft.
And this done, at the old man's death he drives;
But there came, as it seemed to us who
saw,
20 A statue — Pallas with the crested head, Swinging her spear — and threw a stone which smote Herakles' breast and stayed his slaughter-rage,
And sent him safe to sleep. He falls to
ground — Striking against the column with his
back — Column which, with the falling of the roof,
Broken in two, lay by the altar-base.
And we, foot-free now from our several flights,
Along with the old man, we fastened bonds Of rope-noose to the column, so that he, 30 Ceasing from sleep, might not go adding deeds
To deeds done. And he sleeps a sleep,
poor wretch,
No gift of any god! since he has slain Children and wife. For me, I do not know What mortal has more misery to bear.

CHOROS.

A murder there was which Argolis Holds in remembrance, Hellas through,
As, at that time, best and famous:
Of those, the daughters of Danaos slew.
A murder indeed was that! but this

Outstrips it, straight to the goal has pressed. 4
I am able to speak of a murder done To the hapless Zeus-born offspring, too — Prokne's son, who had but one — Or a sacrifice to the Muses, say Rather, who Itus sing away, Her single child. But thou, the sire Of children three — O thou consuming
fire! —
In one outrageous fate hast made them all expire.
And this outrageous fate —
What groan, or wail, or deadmen's dirge, 5 Or choric dance of Hades shall I urge The Muse to celebrate?

Woe! woe! behold!
The portalled palace lies unrolled,
This way and that way, each prodigious
fold!
Alas for me! these children, see, Stretched, hapless group, before their father — he
The all-unhappy, who lies sleeping out
The murder of his sons, a dreadful sleep!
And bonds, see, all about, — 6 Rope-tangle, ties and tether, — these Tightenings around the body of Herakles To the stone columns of the house made fast!

But — like a bird that grieves For callow nestlings some rude hand be-reaves —
See, here, a bitter journey overpast, The old man — all too late — is here at
last!

AMPHITRUON.

Silently, silently, aged Kadmeians!
Will ye not suffer my son, diffused Yonder, to slide from his sorrows in sleep? 7

CHOROS.

And thee, old man, do I, groaning, weep,
And the children too, and the head there — used
Of old to the wreaths and paians!

AMPHITRUON.

Farther away! Nor beat the breast, Nor wail aloud, nor rouse from rest
The slumberer — asleep, so best!

CHOROS.

Ah me — what a slaughter!

AMPHITRUON.

Refrain — refrain!

Ye will prove my perdition.

CHOROS.

Unlike water,
Bloodshed rises from earth again.

AMPHITRUON.

Do I bid you bate your breath, in vain — Ye elders? Lament in a softer strain!
Lest he rouse himself, burst every chain,
And bury the city in ravage — bray Father and house to dust away!

CHOROS.

I cannot forbear — I cannot forbear!

AMPHITRUON.

Hush! I will learn his breathings: there!
I will lay my ears close.

CHOROS.

What, he sleeps?

AMPHITRUON.

Ay, — sleeps! A horror of slumber keeps The man who has piled On wife and child
Death and death, as he shot them down With clang o' the bow.

CHOROS.

Wail —

AMPHITRUON.

Even so!

CHOROS.

— The fate of the children —

AMPHITRUON.

Triple woe!

CHOROS.

— Old man, the fate of thy son!

AMPHITRUON.

Hush, hush! Have done!
He is turning about!
He is breaking out!
Away! I steal
And my body conceal, Before he arouse,
In the depths of the house.

CHOROS.

Courage! The Night
Maintains her right On the lids of thy son there, sealed from sight!

AMPHITRUON.

See, see! To leave the light
And, wretch that I am, bear one last ill, I do not avoid; but if he kill Me his own father, and devise Beyond the present miseries A misery more ghastly still —
And to haunt him, over and above

Those here who, as they used to love, Now hate him, what if he have with these My murder, the worst of Erinues?

CHOROS.

Then was the time to die, for thee,
When ready to wreak in the full degree Vengeance on those Thy consort's foes
Who murdered her brothers! glad, life's
close,
With the Taphiqi down,
And sacked their town Clustered about with a wash of sea!

AMPHITRUON.

To flight — to flight!
Away from the house, troop off, old men!
Save yourselves out of the maniac's sight!
He is rousing himself right up: and then,
Murder on murder heaping anew,
He will revel in blood your city through!

CHOROS.

O Zeus, why hast, with such unmeasured
hate,
Hated thy son, whelmed in this sea of woes?

HERAKLES.

Ha, —
In breath indeed I am — see things I ought — Æther, and earth, and these the sunbeamshafts!
But then — some billow and strange whirl of sense
I have fallen into! and breathings hot I breathe —
Smoked upwards, not the steady work from lungs.
See now! Why bound, — at moorings like a ship, —
About my young breast and young arm, to this Stone piece of carved work broke in half, do I Sit, have my rest in corpses' neighbourhood?
Strewn on the ground are winged darts, and bow
Which played my brother-shieldman, held in hand, — Guarded my side, and got my guardian-
ship!
I cannot have gone back to Haides — twice Begun Eurustheus' race I ended thence?
But I nor see the Sisuphran stone, Nor Plouton, nor Demeter's sceptred maid!
I am struck witless sure! Where can I be?
Ho there! what friend of mine is near or far —
Some one to cure me of bewilderment?
For nought familiar do I recognize.

AMPHITRUON.

Old friends, shall I go close to these my woes!

CHOROS.

Ay, and let me too, — nor desert your ills!

HERAKLES.

Father, why weepest thou, and buriest up Thine eyes, aloof so from thy much-loved son?

AMPHITRUON.

O child! — for, faring badly, mine thou art!

HERAKLES.

Do I fare somehow ill, that tears should flow?

AMPHITRUON.

Ill, — would cause any god who bore, to groan!

HERAKLES.

That's boasting, truly! still, you state no hap.

AMPHITRUON.

For, thyself seest — if in thy wits again.

HERAKLES.

10 Heyday! How riddlingly that hint returns!

AMPHITRUON.

Well, I am trying — art thou sane and sound!

HERAKLES.

Say if thou lay'st aught strange to my life's charge!

AMPHITRUON.

If thou no more art Haides-drunk, — I tell!

HERAKLES.

I bring to mind no drunkenness of soul.

AMPHITRUON.

Shall I unbind my son, old men, or what?

HERAKLES.

And who was binder, tell! — not that, my deed!

AMPHITRUON.

Mind that much of misfortune — pass the rest!

HERAKLES.

Enough! from silence, I nor learn nor wish.

AMPHITRUON.

O Zeus, dost witness here throned Heré's work?

HERAKLES.

But have I had to bear aught hostile
thence?

AMPHITRUON.

Let be the goddess — bury thine own guilt!

HERAKLES.

Undone! What is the sorrow thou wilt
say?

AMPHITRUON.

Look! See the ruins of thy children here!

HERAKLES.

Ah me! What sight do wretched I behold?

AMPHITRUON.

Unfair fight, son, this fight thou fastenedst On thine own children!

HERAKLES.

What fight? Who slew these?

AMPHITRUON.

Thou and thy bow, and who of gods was
cause.

HERAKLES.

How say'st? What did I? Ill-announcing sire!

AMPHITRUON.

— Go mad! Thou askest a sad clearing up.

HERAKLES.

And am I also murderer of my wife? 30

AMPHITRUON.

All the work here was just one hand's work — thine!

HERAKLES.

Ai ai — for groans encompass me — a cloud!

AMPHITRUON.

For these deeds' sake do I begroan thy fate.

HERAKLES.

Did I break up my house or dance it down?

AMPHITRUON.

I know just one thing — all's a woe with thee.

HERAKLES.

But where did the craze catch me? where destroy?

AMPHITRUON.

When thou didst cleanse hands at the altar-flame.

HERAKLES.

Ah me! why is it then I save my life — Proved murderer of my dearest ones, my boys?

Shall not I rush to the rock-level's leap,
Or, darting sword through breast and all, become

My children's blood-avenger? or, this flesh Burning away with fire, so thrust away The infamy, which waits me there, from
life?

Ah but, — a hindrance to my purposed
death,

Theseus arrives, my friend and kinsman,
here!

10 Eyes will be on me! my child-murder-plague

In evidence before friends loved so much!
O me, what shall I do? Where, taking wing

Or gliding underground, shall I seek out A solitariness from misery?

I will pull night upon my muffled head!
Let this wretch here content him with his curse

Of blood: I would pollute no innocents.

THESEUS.

I come, — with others who await beside Asopos' stream, the armed Athenian
youth, —

20 Bring thy son, old man, spear's fight-fellowship!

For a bruit reached the Erechtheidai's
town

That, having seized the sceptre of this realm,

Lukos prepares you battle-violence.

So, paying good back, — Herakles began, Saving me down there, — I have come, old
man,

If aught, of my hand or my friends', you want.

What's here? Why all these corpses on the ground?

Am I perhaps behindhand — come too
late

For newer ill? Who killed these children
now?

30 Whose wife was she, this woman I behold?

Boys, at least, take no stand in reach of spear!

Some other woe than war, I chance upon.

AMPHITRUON.

O thou, who sway'st the olive-bearing height! —

THESEUS.

Why hail'st thou me with woeful prelude
thus?

AMPHITRUON.

Dire sufferings have we suffered from the gods.

THESEUS.

These boys, — who are they thou art weeping o'er?

AMPHITRUON.

He gave them birth, indeed, my hapless
son!

Begot, but killed them — dared their bloody death.

THESEUS.

Speak no such horror!

AMPHITRUON.

Would I might obey!

THESEUS.

O teller of dread tidings!

40

AMPHITRUON.

Lost are we —

Lost — flown away from life!

THESEUS.

What sayest thou?

What did he?

AMPHITRUON.

Erring through a frenzy-fit,

He did all, with the arrows dipt in dye
Of hundred-headed Hudra.

THESEUS.

Heré's strife!

But who is this among the dead, old man?

AMPHITRUON.

Mine, mine, this progeny — the labour-plagued,

Who went with gods once to Phlegruia's
plain,

And in the giant-slaying war bore shield.

THESEUS.

Woe — woe! What man was born mis-chanceful thus!

AMPHITRUON.

Thou couldst not know another mortal's
man

Toil-weary, more outworn by wanderings,

THESEUS.

And why i' the peploi hides he his sad head?

AMPHITRUON.

Not daring meet thine eye, thy friendliness And kinship, — nor that children's-blood about.

THESEUS.

But I come to who shared my woe with
me!
Uncover him!

AMPHITRUON.

O child, put from thine eyes
The peplos, throw it off, show face to sun!
Woe's weight well matched contends with tears in thee.

I supplicate thee, falling at thy cheek
And knee and hand, and shedding this old tear!

10 O son, remit the savage lion's mood, Since to a bloody, an unholy race Art thou led forth, if thou be resolute
To go on adding ill to ill, my child!

THESEUS.

Let me speak! Thee, who sittest — seated woe —

I call upon to show thy friends thine eye!
For there's no darkness has a cloud so black May hide thy misery thus absolute.
Why, waving hand, dost sign me — murder's done?

Lest a pollution strike me, from thy speech?

20 Nought care I to — with thee, at least — fare ill:

For I had joy once! Then, — soul rises
to, —

When thou didst save me from the dead to
light!

Friends' gratitude that tastes old age, I loathe,

And him who likes to share when things look fine,

But, sail along with friends in trouble —
no!

Arise, uncover thine unhappy head!

Look on us! Every man of the right race Bears what, at least, the gods inflict, nor shrinks.

HERAKLES.

Theseus, hast seen this match — my boys with me?

THESEUS.

30 I heard of, now I see the ills thou sign'st.

HERAKLES.

Why then hast thou displayed my head to sun?

THESEUS.

Why? mortals bring no plague on aught divine.

HERAKLES.

Fly, O unhappy, this my impious plague!

THESEUS.

No plague of vengeance flits to friends from friends.

HERAKLES.

I praise thee. But I helped thee, — that is truth.

THESEUS.

And I, advantaged then, now pity thee.

HERAKLES.

-- The pitiable, — my children's murderer!

THESEUS.

I mourn for thy sake, in this altered lot.

HERAKLES.

Hast thou found others in still greater woe?

THESEUS.

Thou, from earth, touchest heaven, one 4 huge distress!

HERAKLES.

Accordingly, I am prepared to die.

THESEUS.

Think'st thou thy threats at all import the gods?

HERAKLES.

Gods please themselves: to gods I give their like.

THESEUS.

Shut thy mouth, lest big words bring bigger woe!

HERAKLES.

I am full fraught with ills — no stowing
more!

THESEUS.

Thou wilt do — what, then? Whither moody borne?

HERAKLES.

Dying, I go below earth whence I came.

THESEUS.

Thou hast used words of — what man turns up first!

HERAKLES.

While thou, being outside sorrow, schoolest
me.

THESEUS.

The much-enduring Herakles talks thus? —

HERAKLES.

Not the so much-enduring: measure's past.

THESEUS.

— Mainstay to mortals, and their mighty friend?

HERAKLES.

They nowise profit me: but Heré rules.

THESEUS.

Hellas forbids thou shouldst ineptly die.

HERAKLES.

But hear, then, how I strive by arguments Against thy teachings! I will ope thee
out

My life — past, present — as unliveable.
First, I was born of this man, who had slain

His mother's aged sire, and, sullied so,
Married Alkmené, she who gave me birth.
Now, when the basis of a family Is not laid right, what follows needs must
fall;

And Zeus, whoever Zeus is, formed me foe
To Heré (take not thou offence, old man!
Since father, in Zeus' stead, account I thee),
And, while I was at suck yet, frightful
snakes,

She introduced among my swaddling clothes, —

That bedfellow of Zeus! — to end me so.
But when I gained the youthful garb of
flesh,

The labours I endured: — what need to tell?

What lions ever, or three-bodied brutes, Tuphons or giants, or the four-legg'd swarms

Of Kentaur-battle, did not I end out?
And that hound, headed all about with
heads

Which cropped up twice, the Hudra, having slain —

I both went through a myriad other toils
In full drove, and arrived among the dead
To convoy, as Eurústheus bade, to light Haides' three-headed dog and doorkeeper.
But then I, — wretch, — dared this last labour — see!

Slew my sons, keystone-coped my house with ill.

To such a strait I come! nor my dear
Thebes

Dare I inhabit: and, suppose I stay?
Into what fane or festival of friends

Am I to go? My curse scarce courts
accost!

Shall I seek Argos? How, if fled from
home?

But say — I hurry to some other town:
And there they eye me, as notorious now, — Kept by sharp tongue-taunts under lock ⁴⁶ and key —

"Is not this he, Zeus' son, who murdered
once

Children and wife? Let him go rot elsewhere!"

To any man renowned as happy once, Reverses are a grave thing; but to whom Evil is old acquaintance, there's no hurt
To speak of, he and misery are twins.

To this degree of woe I think to come:
For earth will utter voice forbidding me To touch the ground, and sea — to pierce the wave,

The river-springs — to drink, and I shall ⁵⁰
play

Ixion's part quite out, the chained and wheeled!

And best of all will be, if so I 'scape Sight from one man of those Hellenes, —
once

I lived among, felicitous and rich!

Why ought I then to live? What gain accrues

From good-for-nothing, wicked life I lead?
In fine, let Zeus' brave consort dance and sing,

Stamp foot, the Olumpian Zeus' own sandal-trick!

What she has willed, that brings her will to
pass —

The foremost man of Hellas pedestalled, ⁶⁰ Up, over, and down whirling! Who would pray

To such a goddess? — that, begrudging
Zeus

Because he loved a woman, ruins me —
Lover of Hellas, faultless of the wrong!

THESEUS.

This strife is from no other of the gods Than Zeus' wife; rightly apprehend, as
well,

Why, to no death — thou meditatest now I would persuade thee, but to bear thy woes!

None, none of mortals boasts a fate un-
mixed,

Nor gods — if poets' teaching be not false. ⁷⁰
Have not they joined in wedlock against
law

With one another? not, for sake of rule, Branded their sires in bondage? Yet they house,

All the same, in Olumpus, carry heads High there, notorious sinners though they
be!

What wilt thou say, then, if thou, mortal-
born,

Bearest outrageously fate gods endure?
Leave Thebes, now, pay obedience to the
law

And follow me to Pallas' citadel!
There, when thy hands are purified from stain,

House will I give thee, and goods shared alike.

What gifts I hold too from the citizens For saving twice seven children, when I slew

The Knosian bull, these also give I thee.
And everywhere about the land are plots 10 Apportioned me: these, named by thine own name,

Shall be henceforward styled by all men —
thine,

Thy life long; but at death, when Haides-
bound,

All Athens shall uphold the honoured one With sacrifices, and huge marble heaps:
For that's a fair crown our Hellenes grant Their people — glory, should they help the brave!

And I repay thee back this grace for thine That saved me, now that thou art lorn of
friends —

Since, when the gods give honour, friends may flit:

20 For, a god's help suffices, if he please.

HERAKLES.

Ah me, these words are foreign to my woes!

I neither fancy gods love lawless beds, Nor, that with chains they bind each other's
hands,

Have I judged worthy faith, at any time;
Nor shall I be persuaded — one is born His fellows' master! since God stands in need —

If he is really God — of nought at all.
These are the poets' pitiful conceits!
But this it was I pondered, though woewhelmed —

30 "Take heed lest thou be taxed with cowardice

Somehow in leaving thus the light of day!"
For whoso cannot make a stand against These same misfortunes, neither could withstand

A mere man's dart, oppose death, strength to strength.

Therefore unto thy city I will go
And have the grace of thy ten thousand gifts.

There! I have tasted of ten thousand toils

As truly — never waived a single one, Nor let these runnings drop from out my
eyes:

40 Nor ever thought it would have come to
this —

That I from out my eyes do drop tears.
Well!

At present, as it seems, one bows to fate.
So be it! Old man, thou seest my exile —

Seest, too, me — my children's murderer!
These give thou to the tomb, and deck the
dead,

Doing them honour with thy tears — since me

Law does not sanction. Propping on her
breast,

And giving them into their mother's arms,
— Re-institute the sad community

Which I, unhappy, brought to nothing- 50
ness —

Not by my will! And, when earth hides
the dead,

Live in this city! — sad, but, all the same,
Force thy soul to bear woe along with me!
O children, who begat and gave you
birth —

Your father — has destroyed you! nought you gain

By those fair deeds of mine I laid you up,
As by main-force I laboured glory out To give you, — that fine gift of fatherhood!

And thee, too, O my poor one, I destroyed,

Not rendering like for like, as when thou 60 kept'st

My marriage-bed inviolate, — those long Household-seclusions draining to the dregs

Inside my house! O me, my wife, my boys —

And — O myself, how, miserably moved, Am I dysoked now from both boys and
wife!

O bitter those delights of kisses now —
And bitter these my weapons' fellowship!
For I am doubtful whether shall I keep Or cast away these arrows which will clang

Ever such words out, as they knock my 70
side —

"Us — thou didst murder wife and children with!

Us — child-destroyers — still thou keepest
thine!"

Ha, shall I bear them in my arms, then?
What

Say for excuse? Yet, naked of my darts Wherewith I did my bravest, Hellas
through,

Throwing myself beneath foot to my foes, Shall I die basely? No! relinquishment Of these must never be, — companions
once,

We sorrowfully must observe the pact.

In just one thing, co-operate with me. 80

Thy sad friend, Theseus! Go along with
him

To Argos, and in concert get arranged The price my due for bringing there the Hound!

O land of Kadmos, Theban people all, Shear off your locks, lament one wide lament,

Go to my children's grave and, in one strain,

Lament the whole of us — my dead and
me —

Since all together are fordone and lost, Smitten by Heré's single stroke of fate!

THESEUS.

Rise up now from thy dead ones! Tears
enough,
to Poor friend!

HERAKLES.

I cannot: for my limbs are fixed.

THESEUS.

Ay: even these strong men fate overthrows.

HERAKLES.

Woe!

Here might I grow a stone, nor mind woes
more!

THESEUS

Cease! Give thy hand to friendly helpmate now!

HERAKLES.

Nay, but I wipe off blood upon thy robes.

THESEUS.

Squeeze out and spare no drop! I take it all!

HERAKLES.

Of sons bereaved, I have thee like my son.

THESEUS.

Give to my neck thy hand! 'tis I will lead.

HERAKLES.

Yoke-fallows friendly — one heart-broken,
though!

20 O father, such a man we need for friend!

AMPHITRUON.

Certes the land that bred him boasts good sons.

HERAKLES.

Turn me round, Theseus — to behold my boys!

THESEUS.

What? will the having such a love-charm soothe?

HERAKLES.

I want it, and to press my father's breast.

AMPHITRUON.

See here, O son! for, what I love thou seek'st.

THESEUS.

Strange! Of thy labours no more memory?

HERAKLES.

All those were less than these, those ills I bore.

THESEUS.

Who sees thee grow a woman, — will not praise.

HERAKLES.

I live low to thee? Not so once, I think.

THESEUS.

Too low by far! "Famed Herakles" — 30 where's he?

HERAKLES.

Down amid evils, of what kind wast thou?

THESEUS.

As far as courage — least of all mankind!

HERAKLES.

How say'st, then, I in evils shrink to nought?

THESEUS.

Forward!

HERAKLES.

Farewell, old father!

AMPHITRUON.

Thou too, son!

HERAKLES.

Bury the boys as I enjoined!

AMPHITRUON.

Who will be found to bury now, my child? And me —

HERAKLES.

Myself.

AMPHITRUON.

When, coming?

HERAKLES.

When thy task is done.

AMPHITRUON.

How?

HERAKLES.

I will have thee carried forth from 40
Thebes
To Athens. But bear in the children,
earth

Is burthened by! Myself, — who with these shames
Have cast away my house, — a ruined hulk,
I follow — trailed by Theseus — on my
way;
And whoso rather would have wealth and
strength
Than good friends, reasons foolishly therein.

CHOROS.

And we depart, with sorrow at heart,
Sobs that increase with tears that start;
The greatest of all our friends of yore
We have lost for evermore!

- 10 When the long silence ended, — "Our best friend — Lost, our best friend!" he muttered musingly.
Then, "Lachares the sculptor" (half aloud)
"Sinned he or sinned he not? 'Outrageous sin!'
Shuddered our elders, 'Pallas should be clothed:
He carved her naked.' 'But more beautiful!'
Answers this generation: 'Wisdom formed For love not fear!' And there the statue stands,
Entraps the eye severer art repels.
Moreover, Pallas wields the thunderbolt 20 Yet has not struck the artist all this while.
Pheidias and Aischulos? Euripides And Lachares? But youth will have its
way.
The ripe man ought to be as old as young — As young as old. I too have youth at
need.
Much may be said for stripping wisdom
bare.
"And who's 'our best friend'? You play kottabos; Here's the last mode of playing. Take a sphere
With orifices at due interval, Through topmost one of which, a throw adroit 30 Sends wine from cup, clean passage, from outside
To where, in hollow midst, a manikin Suspended ever bobs with head erect Right underneath whatever hole's a-top When you set orb a-rolling: plumb, he gets Ever this benediction of the splash.
An other-fashioned orb presents him
fixed:
Of all the outlets, he fronts only one,

And only when that one, — and rare the
chance, — Comes uppermost, does he turn upward
too:
He can't turn all sides with the turning 40
orb.
Inside this sphere of life, — all objects,
sense
And soul perceive, — Euripides hangs
fixed,
Gets knowledge through the single aperture
Of High and Right: with visage fronting
these
He waits the wine thence ere he operate,
Work in the world and write a tragedy.
When that hole happens to revolve to
point,
In drops the knowledge, waiting meets reward.
But, duly in rotation, Low and Wrong —
When these enjoy the moment's altitude, 50 His heels are found just where his head should be!
No knowledge that way! I am move-
able, —
To slightest shift of orb make prompt response,
Face Low and Wrong and Weak and all
the rest,
And still drink knowledge, wine-drenched every turn, — Equally favoured by their opposites.
Little and Bad exist, are natural:
Then let me know them, and be twice as great
As he who only knows one phase of life!
So doubly shall I prove 'best friend of 60
man,'
If I report the whole truth — Vice, perceived
While he shut eyes to all but Virtue there.
Man's made of both: and both must be of use
To somebody: if not to him, to me.
While, as to your imaginary Third Who, stationed (by mechanics past my guess)
So as to take in every side at once,
And not successively, — may reconcile
The High and Low in tragi-comic verse, —
He shall be hailed superior to us both 70 When born — in the Tin-islands! Meantime, here
In bright Athenai, I contest the claim, Call myself Iostephanos 'best friend,' Who took my own course, worked as I descried
Ordainment, stuck to my first faculty.
"For listen! There's no failure breaks
the heart, Whate'er be man's endeavour in this
world,

Like the rash poet's when he — nowise fails

By poetising badly, — Zeus or makes Or mars a man, so — at it, merrily!
But when, — made man, — much like myself, — equipt

For such and such achievement, — rash he turns

Out of the straight path, bent on snatch of feat

From — who's the appointed fellow born thereto, —

Crows take him! — in your Kassiterides?
Half-doing his work, leaving mine untouched,

10 That were the failure. Here I stand, heart-whole,
No Thamuris!

“Well thought of, Thamuris Has zeal, pray, for ‘best friend’ Euripi-des

Allowed you to observe the honour done
His elder rival, in our Poikilé?

You don't know? Once and only once, trod stage,

Sang and touched lyre in person, in his
youth,

Our Sophokles, — youth, beauty, dedicate
To Thamuris who named the tragedy.

The voice of him was weak; face, limbs and lyre,

20 These were worth saving: Thamuris stands yet

Perfect as painting helps in such a case.
At least you know the story, for ‘best
friend’

Enriched his ‘Rhesos’ from the Blind Bard's store;

So haste and see the work, and lay to
heart

What it was struck me when I eyed the
piece!

Here stands a poet punished for rash
strife

With Powers above his power, who see with sight

Beyond his vision, sing accordingly
A song, which he must needs dare emu-
late.

30 Poet, remain the man nor ape the Muse!

“But — lend me the psalterion! Nay, for once —

Once let my hand fall where the other's lay!

I see it, just as I were Sophokles,
That sunrise and combustion of the east!”

And then he sang — are these unlike the
words?

Thamuris marching, — lyre and song of Thrace —

(Perpend the first, the worst of woes that were

Allotted lyre and song, ye poet-race!)

Thamuris from Oichalia, feasted there By kingly Eurutos of late, now bound 40
For Dorion at the uprise broad and bare

Of Mount Pangaios (ore with earth en-wound

Glittered beneath his footstep) — marching gay

And glad, Thessalia through, came, robed
and crowned,

From triumph on to triumph, mid a ray Of early morn, — came, saw and knew the spot

Assigned him for his worst of woes, that
day.

Balura — happier while its name was
not —

Met him, but nowise menaced; slipt aside, Obsequious river to pursue its lot 50

Of solacing the valley — say, some wide Thick busy human cluster, house and
home,

Embanked for peace, or thrift that thanks
the tide.

Thamuris, marching, laughed “Each flake of foam”

(As sparkingly the ripple raced him by) “Mocks slower clouds adrift in the blue dome!”

For Autumn was the season; red the sky
Held morn's conclusive signet of the sun

To break the mists up, bid them blaze and
die.

Morn had the mastery as, one by one 60 All pomps produced themselves along the tract

From earth's far ending to near heaven begun.

Was there a ravaged tree? it laughed compact

With gold, a leaf-ball crisp, high-brandished now,

Tempting to onset frost which late attacked.

Was there a wizened shrub, a starveling
bough,

A fleecy thistle filched from by the wind,
A weed, Pan's trampling hoof would disallow?

Each, with a glory and a rapture twined :
About it, joined the rush of air and light 70

And force: the world was of one joyous mind.

Say not the birds flew! they forebore their right —

Swam, revelling onward in the roll of things.

Say not the beasts' mirth bounded! that was flight —

How could the creatures leap, no lift of wings?

Such earth's community of purpose, such The ease of earth's fulfilled imaginings, —

So did the near and far appear to touch I' the moment's transport, — that an interchange ro Of function, far with near, seemed scarce too much;

And had the rooted plant aspired to range With the snake's licence, while the insect yearned

To grow fixed as the flower, it were not strange —

No more than if the fluttery tree-top turned

To actual music, sang itself aloft; Or if the wind, impassioned chantress, earned

The right to soar embodied in some soft Fine form all fit for cloud-companionship, And, blissful, once touch beauty chased so oft.

20 Thamuris, marching, let no fancy slip Born of the fiery transport; lyre and song Were his, to smite with hand and launch from lip —

Peerless recorded, since the list grew long Of poets (saith Homeros) free to stand Pedestalled mid the Muses' temple-throng,

A statued service, laurelled, lyre in hand, (Ay, for we see them) — Thamuris of Thrace Predominating foremost of the band.

Therefore the morn-ray that enriched his face,

30 If it gave lambent chill, took flame again From flush of pride; he saw, he knew the place.

What wind arrived with all the rhythms from plain, Hill, dale, and that rough wildwood interspersed?

Compounding these to one consummate strain,

It reached him, music; but his own outburst

Of victory concluded the account, And that grew song which was mere music erst.

"Be my Parnassos, thou Pangaian mount!

And turn thee, river, nameless hitherto! Famed shalt thou vie with famed Pieria's 40 fount!

"Here I await the end of this ado: Which wins — Earth's poet or the Heavenly Muse." . . .

But song broke up in laughter. "Tell the rest

Who may! I have not spurned the common life,

Nor vaunted mine a lyre to match the Muse

Who sings for gods, not men! Accordingly,

I shall not decorate her vestibule — Mute marble, blind the eyes and quenched the brain,

Loose in the hand a bright, a broken lyre! — Not Thamuris but Aristophanes! 50

"There! I have sung content back to myself,

And started subject for a play beside.

My next performance shall content you both.

Did 'Prelude-Battle' maul 'best friend' too much?

Then 'Main-Fight' be my next song, fairness' self!

Its subject — Contest for the Tragic Crown.

Ay, you shall hear none else but Aischulos Lay down the law of Tragedy, and prove 'Best friend' a stray-away, — no praise denied

His manifold deservings, never fear — 60 Nor word more of the old fun! Death defends.

Sound admonition has its due effect.

Oh, you have uttered weighty words, believe!

Such as shall bear abundant fruit, next year, In judgment, regular, legitimate.

Let Bacchos' self preside in person! Ay — For there's a buzz about those 'Bacchanals'

Rumour attributes to your great and dead For final effort: just the prodigy

Great dead men leave, to lay survivors 70 low!

— Until we make acquaintance with our fate

And find, fate's worst done, we, the same, survive

Perchance to honour more the patron-god, Fittier inaugurate a festal year.

Now that the cloud has broken, sky laughs
blue,

Earth blossoms youthfully. Athenai breathes.

After a twenty-six years' wintry blank Struck from her life, — war-madness, one long swoon,

She wakes up: Arginousai bids good cheer.

We have disposed of Kallikratidas; Once more will Sparté sue for terms, —
who knows?

10 Cede Dekeleia, as the rumour runs:
Terms which Athenai, of right mind again, Accepts — she can no other. Peace declared,

Have my long labours borne their fruit or
no?

Grinned coarse buffoonery so oft in vain?
Enough — it simply saved you. Saved ones, praise

Theoria's beauty and Opora's breadth!
Nor, when Peace realises promised bliss,

Forget the Bald Bard, Envy! but go burst
As the cup goes round and the cates abound,

20 Collops of hare with roast spinks¹ rare!
Confess my pipings, dancings, posings served

A purpose: guttlings, guzzlings, had their use!

Say whether light Muse, Rosy-finger-tips, Or 'best friend's' heavy-band, Mel-pomené,

Touched lyre to purpose, played Am-phion's part,

And built Athenai to the skies once more!
Farewell, brave couple! Next year, welcome me!"

No doubt, in what he said that night, sincere!

One story he referred to, false or fact,

30 Was not without adaptability.

They do say — Lais the Corinthian once Chancing to see Euripides (who paced

Composing in a garden, tablet book

In left hand, with appended stulos prompt)

"Answer me," she began, "O Poet, —
this!

What didst intend by writing in thy play Go hang, thou filthy doer?" Struck on

heap,

Euripides, at the audacious speech —

"Well now," quoth he, "thyself art just the one

40 I should imagine fit for deeds of filth!"

She laughingly retorted his own line

"What's filth, — unless who does it, thinks it so?"

¹ Chaffinches.

So might he doubtless think. "Fare- 40 well," said we.

And he was gone, lost in the morning-grey,
Rose-streaked and gold to eastward.

Did we dream?

Could the poor twelve-hours hold this argument

We render durable from fugitive,
As duly at each sunset's droop of sail,

Delay of oar, submission to sea-might,
I still remember, you as duly dint 50

Remembrance, with the punctual rapid
style,

Into — what calm cold page!

Thus soul escapes

From eloquence made captive: thus mere
words

— Ah, would the lifeless body stay! But
no:

Change upon change till, — who may recognize

What did soul service, in the dusty heap?

What energy of Aristophanes

Inflames the wreck Balaustion saves to
show?

Ashes be evidence how fire — with smoke —

All night went lamping on! But morn 60 must rise.

The poet — I shall say — burned up and,
blank

Smouldered this ash, now white and cold
enough.

Nay, Euthukles! for best, though mine
it be,

Comes yet. Write on, write ever, wrong
no word!

Add, first, — he gone, if jollity went too,
Some of the graver mood, which mixed and marred,

Departed likewise. Sight of narrow scope Has this meek consolation: neither ill

We dread, nor joys we dare anticipate, Perform to promise. Each soul sows a 70

seed —

Euripides and Aristophanes;

Seed bears crop, scarce within our little
lives;

But germinates, — perhaps enough to judge, —

Next year?

Whereas, next year brought harvest
time!

For, next year came, and went not, but is
now,

Still now, while you and I are bound for Rhodes

That's all but reached — and harvest has it brought,

Dire as the homicidal dragon-crop.
 Sophokles had dismissal ere it dawned, Happy as ever; though men mournfully Plausive, — when only soul could triumph
 now,
 And Iophon produced his father's play, Crowned the consummate song where Oidipous Dared the descent mid earthquake-thundering,
 And hardly Theseus' hands availed to guard Eyes from the horror, as their grove dis-gorged 10 Its dread ones, while each daughter sank to ground.

Then Aristophanes, on heel of that, Triumphant also, followed with his "Frogs." Produced at next Lenaia, — three months
 since, —
 The promised Main-Fight, loyal, licence-
 free!
 As if the poet, primed with Thasian juice, (Himself swore — wine that conquers every kind
 For long abiding in the head) could fix Thenceforward any object in its truth, Through eyeballs bathed by mere Castalian dew, 20 Nor miss the borrowed medium, — vinous drop
 That colours all to the right crimson pitch When mirth grows mockery, censure takes the tinge
 Of malice!

All was Aristophanes:

There blazed the glory, there shot black the
 shame.
 Ay, Bacchos did stand forth, the Tragic
 God
 In person! and when duly dragged through mire, — Having lied, filched, played fool, proved coward, flung
 The boys their dose of fit indecency, And finally got trounced to heart's content,
 30 At his own feast, in his own theatre (— Oh never fear! 'Twas consecrated
 sport,
 Exact tradition, warranted no whit Offensive to instructed taste, — indeed, Essential to Athenai's liberty, Could the poor stranger understand!) why,
 then —
 He was pronounced the rarely-qualified To rate the work, adjust the claims to
 worth,
 Of Aischulos (of whom, in other mood,
 This same appreciative poet pleased 40 To say "He's all one stiff and gluey piece Of back of swine's neck!") — and of Chatterbox

 Who, "twisting words like wool," usurped his seat
 In Plouton's realm: "the arch-roogue, liar, scamp
 That lives by snatching-up of altar-orts,"
 — Who failed to recognise Euripides?

Then came a contest for supremacy — Crammed full of genius, wit and fun and freak.
 No spice of undue spite to spoil the dish
 Of all sorts, — for the Mystics matched the Frogs
 In poetry, no Siren sang so sweet! — 50 Till, pressed into the service (how dispense With Phaps-Elaphion and free foot-display?)
 The Muse of dead Euripides danced frank, Rattled her bits of tile, made all too plain How baby-work like "Herakles" had
 birth!
 Last, Bacchos, — candidly disclaiming brains
 Able to follow finer argument, — Confessed himself much moved by three main facts:
 First, — if you stick a "Lost his flask of oil"
 At pause of period, you perplex the sense — 60
 Were it the Elegy for Marathon!
 Next, if you weigh two verses, "car" —
 the word,
 Will outweigh "club" — the word, in each packed line!
 And — last, worst fact of all! — in rivalry
 The younger poet dared to improvise Laudation less distinct of — Triphales?
 (Nay, that served when ourself abused the
 youth!) Pheidippides? (nor that's appropriate
 now!)
 Then, — Alkibiades, our city's hope, Since times change and we Comics should 70 change too!
 These three main facts, well weighed, drew judgment down, Conclusively assigned the wretch his
 fate —
 "Fate due" admonished the sage Mystic
 choir,
 "To sitting, prate-apace, with Sokrates, Neglecting music and each tragic aid!"
 — All wound-up by a wish "We soon may cease
 From certain griefs, and warfare, worst of
 them!"
 — Since, deaf to Comedy's persistent
 voice, War still raged, still was like to rage. In vain
 Had Sparté cried once more "But grant us 80
 Peace

We give you Dekeleia back!" Too shrewd Was Kleophon to let escape, forsooth,
The enemy — at final gasp, besides!

So, Aristophanes obtained the prize,
And so Athenai felt she had a friend Far better than her "best friend," lost
last year;

And so, such fame had "Frogs" that,
when came round

This present year, those Frogs croaked gay again

At the great Feast, Elaphebolion-month,¹ 10 Only — there happened Aigispotamoi!

And, in the midst of the frog-merriment, Plump o' the sudden, pounces stern King Stork

On the light-hearted people of the marsh!
Spartan Lusandros swooped precipitate, Ended Athenai, rowed her sacred bay With oars which brought a hundred triremes back Captivē!

And first word of the conqueror Was "Down with those Long Walls, Peiraios' pride!

Destroy, yourselves, your bulwarks! Peace needs none!"

20 And "We obey" they shuddered in their
dream.

But, at next quick imposure of decree —
"No longer democratic government!
Henceforth such oligarchy as ourselves Please to appoint you!" — then the horror stung

Dreamers awake; they started up a-stare At the half-helot captain and his crew — Spartans, "men used to let their hair grow long,

To fast, be dirty, and just — Sokratize" — Whose word was "Trample on Themistokles!"

30 So, as the way is with much misery, The heads swam, hands refused their office,
hearts

Sunk as they stood in stupor. "Wreck the Walls?

Ruin Peiraios? — with our Pallas armed For interference? — Herakles apprised, And Theseus hasting? Lay the Long Walls low?"

Three days they stood, stared, — stonier than their walls.

Whereupon, sleep who might, Lusandros woke:

Saw the prostration of his enemy,

Utter and absolute beyond belief, Past hope of hatred even. I surmise
He also probably saw fade in fume Certain fears, bred of Bakis²-prophecy, Nor apprehended any more that gods And heroes, — fire, must glow forth, guard
the ground

Where prone, by sober day-dawn, corpse-like lay

Powerless Athenai, late predominant Lady of Hellas, — Spartē's slave-prize
now!

Where should a menace lurk in those slack limbs?

What was to move his circumspection?
Why

Demolish just Peiraios?

"Stay!" bade he:

"Already promise-breakers? True to type, Athenians! past and present and to
come —

The fickle and the false! No stone dislodged,
No implement applied, yet three days'
grace

Expire! Forbearance is no longer-lived.
By breaking promise, terms of peace you
break —

Too gently framed for falsehood, ficklen-
ness!

All must be reconsidered — yours the
fault!"

Wherewith, he called a council of allies.
Pent-up resentment used its privilege, — 60 Outburst at ending: this the summed result.

"Because we would avenge no transient
wrong

But an eternity of insolence, Aggression, — folly, no disasters mend, Pride, no reverses teach humility, —

Because too plainly were all punishment, Such as comports with less obdurate
crime,

Evadable by falsehood, fickleness, Experience proves the true Athenian type, —

Therefore, 'tis need we dig deep down 70 into

The root of evil; lop nor bole nor branch.
Look up, look round and see, on every
side,

What nurtured the rank tree to noisome
fruit!

We who live hutted (so they laugh) not housed,

Build barns for temples, prize mud-monuments,

² Bakis was a foolish soothsayer, an Athenian "red-faced Nixon."

Nor show the sneering stranger aught but — men, —

Spartans take insult of Athenians just Because they boast Akropolis to mount,
And Propylaia to make entry by,
Through a mad maze of marble arrogance Such as you see — such as let none see
more!

Abolish the detested luxury!
Leave not one stone upon another, raze Athenai to the rock! Let hill and plain 10 Become a waste, a grassy pasture-ground Where sheep may wander, grazing goats depend From shapeless crags once columns! so
at last Shall peace inhabit there, and peace
enough."

Whereon, a shout approved "Such peace bestow!"

Then did a Man of Phokis rise — O
heart!

Rise — when no bolt of Zeus disparted
sky, No omen-bird from Pallas scared the crew,

Rise — when mere human argument could stem

No foam-fringe of the passion surging fierce,

20 Baffle no wrath-wave that o'er barrier broke —

Who was the Man of Phokis rose and flung

A flower i' the way of that fierce foot's
advance,

Which — stop for? — nay, had stamped down sword's assault!

Could it be He stayed Sparté with the snatch

"Daughter of Agamemnon, late my liege, Elektra, palaced once, a visitant To thy poor rustic dwelling, now I come?"

Ay, facing fury of revenge, and lust

Of hate, and malice moaning to appease 30 Hunger on prey presumptuous, prostrate
now —

Full in the hideous faces — last resource,
You flung that choric flower, my Euthukles!

And see, as through some pinhole, should the wind

Wedgingly pierce but once, in with a rush Hurries the whole wild weather, rends to rags

The weak sail stretched against the outside storm —

So did the power of that triumphant play
Pour in, and oversweep the assembled foe!
Triumphant play, wherein our poet first Dared bring the grandeur of the Tragic

Two

Down to the level of our common life,
Close to the beating of our common heart.
Elektra? 'Twas Athenai, Sparté's ice Thawed to, while that sad portraiture appealed —

Agamemnonian lady, lost by fault Of her own kindred, cast from house and
home,

Despoiled of all the brave inheritance, Dowered humbly as befits a herdsman's
mate,

Partaker of his cottage, clothed in rags,
Patient performer of the poorest chares, Yet mindful, all the while, of glory past When she walked darling of Mekenai,
dear

Beyond Orestes to the King of Men!

So, because Greeks are Greeks, though Sparté's brood,

And hearts are hearts, though in Lusandros' breast,

And poetry is power, and Euthukles Had faith therein to, full-face, fling the
same —

Sudden, the ice-thaw! The assembled
foe,

Heaving and swaying with strange friendliness,

Cried "Reverence Elektra!" — cried "Abstain

Like that chaste Herdsman, nor dare violate

The sanctity of such reverse! Let stand Athenai!"

Mindful of that story's close, Perchance, and how, — when he, the Herdsman chaste,

Needs apprehend no break of tranquil
sleep, —

All in due time, a stranger, dark, disguised,

Knocks at the door: with searching glance, notes keen,

Knows quick, through mean attire and disrespect,

The ravaged princess! Ay, right on, the clutch

Of guiding retribution has in charge
The author of the outrage! While one

hand,
Elektra's, pulls the door behind, made fast

On fate, — the other strains, prepared to push

The victim-queen, should she make frightened pause

Before that serpentine blood which steals
Out of the darkness where, a pace beyond,

Above the slain Aigisthos, bides his blow Dreadful Orestes!

Klutaïmnestra, wise
This time, forbore; Elektra held her own; Saved was Athenai through Euripides, Through Euthukles, through — more than ever — me, Balaustion, me, who, Wild-pomegranate-
flower,
Felt my fruit triumph, and fade proudly
so!

But next day, as ungracious minds are wont,
The Spartan, late surprised into a grace, Grew sudden sober at the enormity, And grudged, by daybreak, midnight's easy gift;
Splenetically must repay its cost
By due increase of rigour, doglike snatch At aught still left dog to concede like
man.
Rough sea, at flow of tide, may lip, per-
chance,
Smoothly the land-line reached as for repose —
Lie indolent in all unquestioned sway;
But ebbing, when needs must, all thwart and loth,
Sea claws at sand relinquished strugglingly.
So, harsh Lusandros — pinioned to inflict
The lesser penalty alone — spoke harsh,
As minded to embitter scathe by scorn.

"Athenai's self be saved then, thank the Lyre!
If Tragedy withdraws her presence —
quick,
If Comedy replace her, — what more
just?
Let Comedy do service, frisk away,
Dance off stage these indomitable stones, Long Walls, Peiraian bulwarks! Hew and heave, Pick at, pound into dust each dear defence!
Not to the Kommos¹ — eleleleu With breast bethumped, as Tragic lyre prefers,
But Comedy shall sound the flute, and crow
At kordax-end — the hearty slapping-dance!
Collect those flute-girls — trash who flattered ear
With whistlings and fed eye with caper-cuts While we Lakonians supped black broth or crunched Sea-urchin, conchs and all, unpricked — coarse brutes!
Command they lead off step, time steady

To spade and pickaxe, till demolished lie Athenai's pride in power!"

Done that day —
That sixteenth famed day of Munuchion- 40
month!
The day when Hellas fought at Salamis,
The very day Euripides was born, Those flute-girls — Phaps-Elaphion at their head — Did blow their best, did dance their worst, the while Sparté pulled down the walls, wrecked wide the works,
Laid low each merest molehill of defence,
And so the Power, Athenai, passed away!
We would not see its passing. Ere I knew
The issue of their counsels, — crouching
low
And shrouded by my peplos, — I con- 50
ceived,
Despite the shut eyes, the stopped ears,
— by count
Only of heart-beats, telling the slow
time, —
Athenai's doom was signed and signified in that assembly, — ay, but knew there watched
One who would dare and do, nor bate at
all
The stranger's licensed duty, — speak
the word
Allowed the Man from Phokis! Nought remained But urge departure, flee the sights and sounds,
Hideous exultings, wailings worth contempt,
And press to other earth, new heaven, by 60
sea
That somehow ever prompts to 'scape despair.

Help rose to heart's wish; at the harbour-
side,
The old grey mariner did reverence To who had saved his ship, still weather-tight
As when with prow gay-garlanded she praised
The hospitable port and pushed to sea.
"Convoy Balaustion back to Rhodes, for
sake
Of her and her Euripides!" laughed he.
Rhodes, — shall it not be there, my Euthukles,
Till this brief trouble of a life-time end, 70
That solitude — two make so populous! — For food finds memories of the past
suffice,

May be, anticipations, — hope so swells, —
Of some great future we, familiar once With who so taught, should hail and entertain?

He lies now in the little valley, laughed And moaned about by those mysterious streams,

Boiling and freezing, like the love and
hate

Which helped or harmed him through his earthly course.

They mix in Arethousa by his grave.

The warm spring, traveller, dip thine arms
into,

10 Brighten thy brow with! Life detests black cold.

I sent the tablets, the psalterion, so

Rewarded Sicily; the tyrant there

Bestowed them worthily in Phoibos' shrine.

A gold-graved writing tells — "I also loved

The poet, Free Athenai cheaply prized — King Dionusios, — Archelaos-like!"

And see if young Philemon, — sure one
day

To do good service and be loved himself, —

If he too have not made a votive verse!

"Grant, in good sooth, our great dead, all 26
the same,

Retain their sense, as certain wise men
say,

I'd hang myself — to see Euripides!"

Hands off, Philemon! nowise hang thy-
self,

But pen the prime plays, labour the right
life,

And die at good old age as grand men
use, —

Keeping thee, with that great thought, warm the while, —

That he does live, Philemon! Ay, most
sure!

"He lives!" hark, — waves say, winds sing out the same,

And yonder dares the citted ridge of Rhodes

Its headlong plunge from sky to sea, dis- 30
parts

North bay from south, — each guarded calm, that guest

May enter gladly, blow what wind there
will, —

Boiled round with breakers, to no other cry!

All in one chorus, — what the master-word They take up? — hark! "There are no gods, no gods!

Glory to God — who saves Euripides!"

THE RING AND THE BOOK.

1868-9.

["The Ring and the Book" appeared at the end of 1868, after a four years' silence since the publication of "Dramatis Personæ." It was issued in four volumes, which were published singly, the first in November 1868, the others between that date and February 1869. The composition of it had occupied the poet for more than three years since the "memorable day" in June 1862, when he picked up, at a stall in the Piazza San Lorenzo in Florence, the "square old yellow book" with the "crumpled vellum covers," containing the record of the murder, by Count Guido Franceschini, of Pompilia his wife and her reputed parents, Pietro and Violante Comparini, in January 1698. The story of the genesis of the poem is told in the first book, which also gives an outline of the whole work. Putting aside the first and last books, which serve as prologue and epilogue, it consists of ten dramatic monologues, in each of which the story of the murder, and of the events and motives which led up to it, is told from a different point of view. Books II. and III. reproduce the gossip of Rome, first on the side favourable to Guido, and next on that hostile to him — in both cases incomplete and inaccurate, but serving to introduce the reader to the general facts of the case. Book IV. gives the conversation of aristocratic society, indifferent, cynical, excusing and condemning both parties. The next three books rise to a higher level, alike of poetry and dramatic interest. The principals are brought upon the stage. In Book V. Count Guido makes his defence before his judges; in Book VI. Giuseppe Caponsacchi, the priest whom Guido charges with being Pompilia's lover, shrivels the accuser's sophistries with his indignant eloquence; in Book VII. Pompilia, dying in the hospital, tells her story in all simplicity and forgivingness. Books VIII. and IX. are devoted to the speeches of counsel on either side, whose sole object is to display their own ingenuity, without much regard to what their clients may have said; and, being full of law-Latin and classical allusions, may be scarcely intelligible to some readers, and can be omitted without much loss. Book X., on the other hand, is the fine soliloquy of the Pope, to whom, in the last resort, Guido makes appeal; while Book XI. shows Guido in his prison, the night before his execution, defiantly haranguing the two ecclesiastics who have been sent to administer to him the consolations of religion.

Throughout the poem Browning adheres closely to the facts as narrated in the book which first suggested the theme, and in a contemporary pamphlet, which he obtained shortly afterwards in London, giving a consecutive narrative of the murder and the execution. The meaning of the title is explained in the first lines of the poem.]

THE RING AND THE BOOK.

I. — THE RING AND THE BOOK.

Do you see this Ring?

'Tis Rome work, made to match (By Castellani's imitative craft) Etrurian circlets found, some happy morn,
After a dropping April; found alive Spark-like 'mid unearthed slope-side fig-tree-roots

That roof old tombs at Chiusi: soft, you
see,

Yet crisp as jewel-cutting. There's one trick,

(Craftsmen instruct me) one approved device

And but one, fits such slivers of pure gold As this was, — such mere oozings from the
mine,

Virgin as oval tawny pendent tear At beehive-edge when ripened combs o'er-
flow, —

To bear the file's tooth and the hammer's tap:

Since hammer needs must widen out the
round,

And file emboss it fine with lily-flowers, Ere the stuff grow a ring-thing right to wear.

That trick is, the artificer melts up wax With honey, so to speak; he mingles gold With gold's alloy, and, duly tempering
both,

Effects a manageable mass, then works: 23
But his work ended, once the thing a ring, Oh, there's reprimistination!¹ Just a spirit

¹ Reprimistination: restoration to its earlier nature.

O' the proper fiery acid o'er its face,
And forth the alloy unfastened flies in fume;

While, self-sufficient now, the shape remains,

The rondure brave, the liliated loveliness,
Gold as it was, is, shall be evermore:

Prime nature with an added artistry —
No carat lost, and you have gained a ring.

What of it? 'Tis a figure, a symbol, say;
A thing's sign: now for the thing signified.

10 Do you see this square old yellow Book, I toss

I' the air, and catch again, and twirl about By the crumpled vellum covers, — pure crude fact

Secreted from man's life when hearts beat
hard,

And brains, high-blooded, ticked two centuries since?

Examine it yourselves! I found this book, Gave a lira for it, eightpence English just,

(Mark the predestination!) when a Hand, Always above my shoulder, pushed me
once,

One day still fierce 'mid many a day struck calm,

20 Across a Square in Florence, crammed with booths,

Buzzing and blaze, noontide and market-
time,

Toward Baccio's marble,¹ — ay, the basement-ledge

O' the pedestal where sits and menaces John of the Black Bands with the upright

spear,
'Twixt palace and church, — Riccardi where they lived,

His race, and San Lorenzo where they lie.
This book, — precisely on that palace-step

Which, meant for lounging knaves o' the Medici,

Now serves re-venders to display their ware, —

30 'Mongst odds and ends of ravage, picture-frames

White through the worn gilt, mirror-sconces chipped,

Bronze angel-heads once knobs attached to chests,

(Handled when ancient dames chose forth brocade)

Modern chalk drawings, studies from the nude,

Samples of stone, jet, breccia, porphyry Polished and rough, sundry amazing busts

In baked earth, (broken, Providence be praised!)

¹ Baccio's marble: the statue of Giovanni delle Bande Nere (father of Cosimo de' Medici), by Baccio Bandinelli, in the Piazza San Lorenzo, between the Palazzo Riccardi (the palace of the Medici) and the church of San Lorenzo.

A wreck of tapestry, proudly-purposed web When reds and blues were indeed red and
blue,

Now offered as a mat to save bare feet 40 (Since carpets constitute a cruel cost)

Treading the chill scagliola² bedward:
then

A pile of brown-etched prints, two crazie³
each,

Stopped by a conch a-top from fluttering
forth

— Sowing the Square with works of one and the same

Master, the imaginative Siene⁴ Great in the scenic backgrounds — (name and fame

None of you know, nor does he fare the worse:)

From these . . . Oh, with a Lionard going cheap

If it should prove, as promised, that so Joconde⁵

Whereof a copy contents the Louvre! —
these

I picked this book from. Five compeers in flank

Stood left and right of it as tempting
more —

A dogs-eared Spicilegium, the fond tale O' the Frail One of the Flower,⁶ by young

Dumas, Vulgarised Horace for the use of schools,

The Life, Death, Miracles of Saint Some-
body,

Saint Somebody Else, his Miracles, Death
and Life, —

With this, one glance at the lettered back of which,

And "Stall!" cried I: a lira made it mine. 60

Here it is, this I toss and take again; Small-quarto size, part print part manuscript:

A book in shape but, really, pure crude
fact

Secreted from man's life when hearts beat
hard,

And brains, high-blooded, ticked two centuries since.

Give it me back! The thing's restorative I' the touch and sight.

That memorable day, (June was the month, Lorenzo named the Square)

I leaned a little and overlooked my prize

² Scagliola: marble or stone flooring.

³ Two crazie: about 1½d.

⁴ The imaginative Siene^{se}: Ademollo (see p. 654, l. 37).

⁵ Joconde: the portrait of Mona Lisa Gioconda, by Leonardo da Vinci, in the Louvre.

⁶ The Frail One of the Flower: La Dame aux Camélias.

By the low railing round the fountain-source Close to the statue, where a step descends:
 While clinked the cans of copper, as stooped and rose Thick-ankled girls who brimmed them, and made place
 For marketmen glad to pitch basket down, Dip a broad melon-leaf that holds the wet, And whisk their faded fresh. And on I read
 Presently, though my path grew perilous Between the outspread straw-work, piles of plait
 Soon to be flapping, each o'er two black
 eyes
 And swathe of Tuscan hair, on festas fine: Through fire-irons, tribes of tongs, shovels in sheaves, Skeleton bedsteads, wardrobe - drawers
 agape,
 Rows of tall slim brass lamps with dangling gear, —
 And worse, cast clothes a-sweetening in
 the sun:
 None of them took my eye from off my
 prize.
 Still read I on, from written title-page To written index, on, through street and
 street,
 At the Strozzi, at the Pillar, at the Bridge;
 Till, by the time I stood at home again
 In Casa Guidi by Felice Church, Under the doorway where the black begins With the first stone-slab of the staircase cold, I had mastered the contents, knew the whole truth
 Gathered together, bound up in this book, Print three-fifths, written supplement the
 rest.
 "Romana Homicidiorum" — nay, Better translate — "A Roman murder-
 case:
 "Position of the entire criminal cause
 "Of Guido Franceschini, nobleman, "With certain Four the cutthroats in his
 pay,
 "Tried, all five, and found guilty and put to death
 "By heading or hanging as befitted ranks,
 "At Rome on February Twenty Two,
 "Since our salvation Sixteen Ninety Eight:
 "Wherein it is disputed if, and when,
 "Husbands may kill adulterous wives, yet
 'scape
 "The customary forfeit."

Word for word,

So ran the title-page: murder, or else Legitimate punishment of the other crime, Accounted murder by mistake, — just that
 And no more, in a Latin cramp enough
 When the law had her eloquence to launch,

But interfilleted with Italian streaks When testimony stooped to mother-
 tongue, —
 That, was this old square y^ellow book
 about.

Now, as the ingot, ere the ring was forged, Lay gold, (beseech you, h^od that figure fast!)

So, in this book lay absolutely truth, Fanciless fact, the documents indeed, 50 Primary lawyer-pleadings for, against,
 The aforesaid Five; real summed-up circumstance

Adduced in proof of these on either side, Put forth and printed, as the practice was,
 At Rome, in the Apostolic Chamber's type,
 And so submitted to the eye o' the Court Presided over by His Reverence Rome's Governor and Criminal Judge, — the trial

Itself, to all intents, being then as now Here in the book and nowise out of it; 60 Seeing, there properly was no judgment-bar,

No bringing of accuser and accused,
 And whoso judged both parties, face to
 face

Before some court, as we conceive of courts.
 There was a Hall of Justice; that came
 last:

For Justice had a chamber by the hall Where she took evidence first, summed up
 the same,

Then sent accuser and accused alike,
 In person of the advocate of each,
 To weigh its worth, thereby arrange, array 70
 The battle. 'Twas the so-styled Fisc¹
 began,

Pleaded (and since he only spoke in print The printed voice of him lives now as
 then)

The public Prosecutor — "Murder's
 proved;

"With five . . . what we call qualities of bad,

"Worst, worst, and yet worse still, and still worse yet;

"Crest over crest crowning the cockatrice,
 "That beggar hell's regalia to enrich

"Count Guido Franceschini: punish
 him!"

Thus was the paper put before the court 80
 In the next stage, (no noisy work at all,)
 To study at ease. In due time like reply Came from the so-styled Patron of the Poor,

Official mouthpiece of the five accused Too poor to fee a better, — Guido's luck Or else his fellows', — which, I hardly
 know, —

¹ Fisc: i.e., Counsel for the Treasury, or Public Prosecutor.

An outbreak as of wonder at the world,
A fury-fit of outraged innocence,
A passion of betrayed simplicity:

"Punish Count Guido? For what crime, what hint

"O' the colour of a crime, inform us first!

"Reward him rather! Recognise, we say,

"In the deed done, a righteous judgment dealt!

"All conscience and all courage, — there's our Count

"Charactered in a word; and, what's more
strange,

to "He had companionship in privilege,

"Found four courageous conscientious
friends:

"Absolve, applaud all five, as props of law,
"Sustainers of society! — perchance

"A trifle over-hasty with the hand

"To hold her tottering ark, had tumbled
else;

"But that's a splendid fault whereat we wink,

"Wishing your cold correctness sparkled
so!"

Thus paper second followed paper first, Thus did the two join issue — nay, the 20 four,

Each pleader having an adjunct. "True,

ne killed
"— So to speak — in a certain sort — his

wife,
"But laudably, since thus it happened!"

quoth one:

Whereat, more witness and the case postponed.

"Thus it happened not, since thus he did the
deed,

"And proved himself thereby portentousest

"Of cutthroats and a prodigy of crime,

"As the woman that he slaughtered was a saint,

"Martyr and miracle!" quoth the other to
match:

Again, more witness, and the case postponed.

30 "A miracle, ay — of lust and impudence;
"Hear my new reasons!" interposed the

first:

"— Coupled with more of mine!" pursued his peer.

"Beside, the precedents, the authorities!"

From both at once a cry, with an echo,
that!

That was a firebrand at each fox's tail Unleashed in a cornfield: soon spread flare

enough,
As hurtled thither and there heaped themselves

From earth's four corners, all authority
And precedent for putting wives to death,

40 Or letting wives live, sinful as they seem.
How legislated, now, in this respect,

Solon and his Athenians? Quote the code

Of Romulus and Rome! Justinian speak!
Nor modern Baldo, Bartolo be dumb!

The Roman voice was potent, plentiful;
*Cornelia de Sicariis*¹ hurried to help

Pompeia de Parricidiis; Julia de

Something-or-other jostled Lex this-and-
that;

King Solomon confirmed Apostle Paul:
That nice decision of Dolabella, eh?

That pregnant instance of Theodoric, oh!
Down to that choice example *Ælian*² gives (An instance I find much insisted on)

Of the elephant who, brute-beast though he were,

Yet understood and punished on the spot

His master's naughty spouse and faithless
friend;

A true tale which has edified each child, Much more shall flourish favoured by our

court!
Pages of proof this way, and that way

proof,
And always — once again the cast postponed.

Thus wrangled, brangled, jangled they a
month,

Only on paper, pleadings all in print,
Nor ever was, except i' the brains of men,

More noise by word of mouth than you hear now —

Till the court cut all short with "Judged, your cause.

"Receive our sentence! Praise God!
We pronounce

"Count Guido devilish and damnable:
"His wife Pompilia in thought, word and

deed,
"Was perfect pure, he murdered her for

that:
"As for the Four who helped the One, all

Five —
"Why, let employer and hirelings share

alike
"In guilt and guilt's reward, the death their due!"

So was the trial at end, do you suppose?

"Guilty you find him, death you doom him
to?

"Ay, were not Guido, more than needs, a
priest,

"Priest and to spare!" — this was a shot reserved;

I learn this from epistles which begin Here where the print ends, — see the pen and ink

Of the advocate, the ready at a pinch! —

"My client boasts the clerkly privilege,"

"Has taken minor orders many enough,

homicide.

² Ælian: De Animalium Natura, xi. 15.

"Shows still sufficient chrism upon his pate
 "To neutralise a blood-stain: presbyter,¹ Primæ tonsuræ, subdiaconus, Sacerdos, so he slips from underneath
 "Your power, the temporal, slides inside the robe
 "Of mother Church: to her we make appeal
 "By the Pope, the Church's head!"

A parlous plea,
 Put in with noticeable effect, it seems;
 "Since straight," — resumes the zealous orator,
 Making a friend acquainted with the facts, —
 "Once the word 'clericality' let fall,
 "Procedure stopped and freer breath was drawn
 "By all considerate and responsible
 Rome."

Quality, took the decent part, of course;
 Held by the husband, who was noble too:
 Or, for the matter of that, a churl would
 side
 With too-refined susceptibility,
 And honour which, tender in the extreme, Stung to the quick, must roughly right
 itself
 At all risks, not sit still and whine for law As a Jew would, if you squeezed him to the wall,
 Brisk-trotting through the Ghetto. Nay,
 it seems,
 Even the Emperor's Envoy had his say To say on the subject; might not see, unmoved,
 Civility menaced throughout Christendom
 By too harsh measure dealt her champion
 here.
 Lastly, what made all safe, the Pope was
 kind,
 From his youth up, reluctant to take life,
 If mercy might be just and yet show grace;
 Much more unlikely then, in extreme age,
 To take a life the general sense bade spare.
 'Twas plain that Guido would go scatheless yet.

But human promise, oh, how short of shine!
 How topple down the piles of hope we rear!
 How history proves . . . nay, read Herodotus!²

Suddenly starting from a nap, as it were,
 A dog-sleep with one shut, one open orb,

¹ Presbyter, &c.: the names of orders in the Roman Church, of which the minor ones can be assumed without causing the holder to cease to be a layman; thus (a point of importance in Count Guido's case) they do not prevent him from marrying, yet they are sufficient to entitle him to appeal to the Pope, as head of the Church.

² Herodotus: e.g., the stories of Cræsus or of Xerxes.

Cried the Pope's³ great self, — Innocent by name

And nature too, and eighty-six years old, Antonio Pignatelli of Naples, Pope Who had trod many lands, known many
 deeds, 40

Probed many hearts, beginning with his
 own,

And now was far in readiness for God, —
 'Twas he who first bade leave those souls in
 peace,

Those Jansenists, re-nicknamed Molinists,⁴ ('Gainst whom the cry went, like a frowsy
 tune,

Tickling men's ears — the sect for a quarter of an hour

I' the teeth of the world which, clown-like, loves to chew

Be it but a straw 'twixt work and whistling-
 while,

Taste some vituperation, bite away, 50
 Whether at marjoram-sprig or garlic-clove, Aught it may sport with, spoil, and then spit forth)

"Leave them alone," bade he, "those Molinists!

"Who may have other light than we perceive,

"Or why is it the whole world hates them
 thus?"

Also he peeled off that last scandal-rag
 Of Nepotism; and so observed the poor That men would merrily say, "Halt, deaf and blind,

"Who feed on fat things, leave the master's
 self

"To gather up the fragments of his feast, 60

"These be the nephews of Pope Innocent! —

"His own meal costs but five carlines⁵ a
 day,

"Poor-priest's allowance, for he claims no
 more."

— He cried of a sudden, this great good old Pope,

When they appealed in last resort to him,
 "I have mastered the whole matter: I nothing doubt.

"Though Guido stood forth priest from head to heel,

"Instead of, as alleged, a piece of one, —

"And further, were he, from the tonsured scalp

³ The Pope: Innocent XII., pope 1691-1700.

⁴ Molinists: followers of Miguel Molinos, a Spaniard, who published at Rome in 1675 a work of mystical or "quietistic" theology, entitled the Guida Spirituale or Spiritual Guide, which attracted much attention, but was declared heretical by the heads of the Church. Allusions to the orthodox dislike or dread of Molinism at this time recur frequently in this poem.

⁵ Carlines: a small silver coin, worth about twopence.

"To the sandaled sole of him, my son and Christ's,
 "Instead of touching us by finger-tip
 "As you assert, and pressing up so close "Only to set a blood-smutch on our robe, —
 "I and Christ would renounce all right in him.
 "Am I not Pope, and presently to die,
 "And busied how to render my account,
 "And shall I wait a day ere I decide "On doing or not doing justice here?
 10 "Cut off his head to-morrow by this time,
 "Hang up his four mates, two on either hand,
 "And end one business more!"

So said, so done —

Rather so writ, for the old Pope bade this,
 I find, with his particular chirograph,
 His own no such infirm hand, Friday night;
 And next day, February Twenty Two,
 Since our salvation Sixteen Ninety Eight,
 — Not at the proper head-and-hanging-
 place
 On bridge-foot close by Castle Angelo, 20 Where custom somewhat staled the spectacle, ('Twas not so well i' the way of Rome,
 beside,
 The noble Rome, the Rome of Guido's rank)
 But at the city's newer gayer end, —
 The cavalcading promenading place Beside the gate and opposite the church Under the Pincian gardens green with Spring,
 'Neath the obelisk¹ 'twixt the fountains in the Square,
 Did Guido and his fellows find their fate, All Rome for witness, and — my writer adds — 30 Remonstrant in its universal grief, Since Guido had the suffrage of all Rome.

This is the bookful; thus far take the
 truth,
 The untempered gold, the fact untampered
 with,
 The mere ring-metal ere the ring be made!
 And what has hitherto come of it? Who preserves
 The memory of this Guido, and his wife Pompilia, more than Ademollo's name,
 The etcher of those prints, two crazie each, Saved by a stone from snowing broad the Square
 40 With scenic backgrounds? Was this truth of force?

¹ Obelisk: the obelisk brought from Egypt by Augustus and placed in the Circus Maximus; whence, having fallen down, it was removed by Pope Sixtus V. in 1589, and set up in the Piazza del Popolo, below the Monte Pincio,

Able to take its own part as truth should, Sufficient, self-sustaining? Why, if so — Yonder's a fire, into it goes my book, As who shall say me nay, and what the loss?
 You know the tale already: I may ask,
 Rather than think to tell you, more thereof, —
 Ask you not merely who were he and she,
 Husband and wife, what manner of man-
 kind,
 But how you hold concerning this and that Other yet-unnamed actor in the piece. 50
 The young frank handsome courtly Canon,
 now,
 The priest, declared the lover of the wife,
 He who, no question, did elope with her,
 For certain bring the tragedy about, Giuseppe Caponsacchi; — his strange
 course
 I' the matter, was it right or wrong or both?
 Then the old couple, slaughtered with the
 wife
 By the husband as accomplices in crime, Those Comparini, Pietro and his spouse, —
 What say you to the right or wrong of that, 60 When, at a known name whispered through the door
 Of a lone villa on a Christmas night,
 It opened that the joyous hearts inside Might welcome as it were an angel-guest Come in Christ's name to knock and enter, sup
 And satisfy the loving ones he saved;
 And so did welcome devils and their
 death?
 I have been silent on that circumstance
 Although the couple passed for close of kin To wife and husband, were by some ac- 70 counts Pompilia's very parents: you know best.
 Also that infant the great joy was for,
 That Gaetano, the wife's two-weeks' babe, The husband's first-born child, his son and heir,
 Whose birth and being turned his night to
 day —
 Why must the father kill the mother thus Because she bore his son and saved himself?
 Well, British Public, ye who like me not, (God love you!) and will have your proper
 laugh
 At the dark question, laugh it! I laugh 80
 first.
 Truth must prevail, the proverb vows; and
 truth
 — Here is it all i' the book at last, as first There it was all i' the heads and hearts of
 Rome
 Gentle and simple, never to fall nor fade Nor be forgotten. Yet, a little while,
 The passage of a century or so

Decads thrice five, and here's time paid his tax, Oblivion gone home with her harvesting,
 And all left smooth again as scythe could shave.
 Far from beginning with you London folk,
 I took my book to Rome first, tried truth's power On likely people. "Have you met such names?"
 "Is a tradition extant of such facts?"
 "Your law-courts stand, your records frown a-row:
 "What if I rove and rummage?" "— Why, you'll waste
 "Your pains and end as wise as you began!" Everyone snickered: "names and facts thus old
 "Are newer much than Europe news we find
 "Down in to-day's Diario. Records, quotha?
 "Why, the French burned them, what else do the French?
 "The rap-and-rending nation! And it tells "Against the Church, no doubt, — another gird
 "At the Temporality, your Trial, of course?"
 "— Quite otherwise this time," submitted I;
 "Clean for the Church and dead against the world,
 "The flesh and the devil, does it tell for once."
 "— The rarer and the happier! All the same,
 "Content you with your treasure of a book,
 "And waive what's wanting! Take a friend's advice!
 "It's not the custom of the country. Mend
 "Your ways indeed and we may stretch a point:
 "Go get you manned by Manning and new manned
 "By Newman and, mayhap, wise-manned to boot
 "By Wiseman, and we'll see or else we won't!
 "Thanks meantime for the story, long and strong,
 "A pretty piece of narrative enough,
 "Which scarce ought so to drop out, one would think,
 "From the more curious annals of our kind.
 "Do you tell the story, now, in off-hand style,
 "Straight from the book? Or simply here and there,
 "The while you vault it through the loose and large)
 "Hang to a hint? Or is there book at all,

"And don't you deal in poetry, make-believe,
 "And the white lies it sounds like?"

Yes and no!

From the book, yes; thence bit by bit I dug
 The lingot¹ truth, that memorable day, 4c Assayed and knew my piecemeal gain was gold, — Yes; but from something else surpassing that,
 Something of mine which, mixed up with the mass,
 Made it bear hammer and be firm to file.
 Fancy with fact is just one fact the more;
 To-wit, that fancy has informed, transpierced, Thridded and so thrown fast the facts else free,
 As right through ring and ring runs the djereed²
 And binds the loose, one bar without a break.
 I fused my live soul and that inert stuff, 5c Before attempting smithcraft, on the night After the day when, — truth thus grasped and gained, — The book was shut and done with and laid by On the cream-coloured massive agate, broad 'Neath the twin cherubs in the tarnished frame
 O' the mirror, tall thence to the ceiling-top.
 And from the reading, and that slab I leant
 My elbow on, the while I read and read,
 I turned, to free myself and find the world,
 And stepped out on the narrow terrace, 6c
 Over the street and opposite the church,
 And paced its lozenge-brickwork sprinkled cool;
 Because Felice - church - side stretched, aglow Through each square window fringed for festival, Whence came the clear voice of the cloistered ones Chanting a chant made for midsummer nights —
 I know not what particular praise of God, It always came and went with June. Beneath I' the street, quick shown by openings of the sky When flame fell silently from cloud to 7c
 cloud,

¹ Lingot: the same word as ingot; here = the solid mass of truth.

² Djereed: an Arab spear. The allusion is to a game analogous to tilting at a ring.

Richer than that gold snow¹ Jove rained on Rhodes,
 The townsmen walked by twos and threes,
 and talked,
 Drinking the blackness in default of air —
 A busy human sense beneath my feet: While in and out the terrace-plants, and
 round
 One branch of tall datura, waxed and waned
 The lamp-fly lured there, wanting the white flower.

Over the roof o' the lighted church I looked A bowshot to the street's end, north away 10 Out of the Roman gate to the Roman road
 By the river, till I felt the Apennine.
 And there would lie Arezzo,² the man's
 town,

The woman's trap and cage and torture-
 place,

Also the stage where the priest played his
 part,

A spectacle for angels, — ay, indeed,
 There lay Arezzo! Farther then I fared, Feeling my way on through the hot and dense,

Romeward, until I found the wayside inn
 By Castelnuovo's few mean hut-like homes 20 Huddled together on the hill-foot bleak, Bare, broken only by that tree or two Against the sudden bloody splendour poured

Cursewise in day's departure by the sun
 O'er the low house-roof of that squalid inn Where they three, for the first time and the
 last,

Husband and wife and priest, met face to
 face.

Whence I went on again, the end was near,
 Step by step, missing none and marking all,
 Till Rome itself, the ghastly goal, I reached.

30 Why, all the while, — how could it otherwise? —

The life in me ablished the death of things, Deep calling unto deep: as then and there Acted itself over again once more

The tragic piece. I saw with my own eyes In Florence as I trod the terrace, breathed
 The beauty and the fearfulness of night, How it had run, this round from Rome to
 Rome —

Because, you are to know, they lived at
 Rome,

Pompilia's parents, as they thought themselves,

40 Two poor ignoble hearts who did their best Part God's way, part the other way than God's,

To somehow make a shift and scramble
 through

¹ That gold snow: the shower of gold in which Jove visited Danaë.

² Arezzo: in Tuscany, about 40 miles southeast of Florence.

The world's mud, careless if it splashed and spoiled, Provided they might so hold high, keep — clean

Their child's soul, one soul white enough for three,

And lift it to whatever star should stoop, What possible sphere of purer life than theirs

Should come in aid of whiteness hard to save.

I saw the star stoop, that they strained to touch,

And did touch and depose their treasure on, 30
 As Guido Franceschini took away

Pompilia to be his for evermore, While they sang "Now let us depart in
 peace,

"Having beheld thy glory, Guido's wife!" I saw the star supposed, but fog o' the fen,

Gilded star-fashion by a glint from hell;
 Having been heaved up, haled on its gross
 way,

By hands unguessed before, invisible help
 From a dark brotherhood, and specially

Two obscure goblin creatures, fox-faced 60
 this,

Cat-clawed the other, called his next of kin By Guido the main monster, — cloaked and caped,

Making as they were priests, to mock God
 more, —

Abate Paul, Canon Girolamo.
 These who had rolled the starlike pest to
 Rome

And stationed it to suck up and absorb
 The sweetness of Pompilia, rolled again

That bloated bubble, with her soul inside, Back to Arezzo and a palace there —

Or say, a fissure in the honest earth 7 Whence long ago had curled the vapour
 first,

Brown big by nether fires to appal day:
 It touched home, broke, and blasted far and wide.

I saw the cheated couple find the cheat And guess what foul rite they were captured for, —

Too fain to follow over hill and dale That child of theirs caught up thus in the cloud

And carried by the Prince o' the Power of the Air

Whither he would, to wilderness or sea.
 I saw them, in the potency of fear,

Break somehow through the satyr-family 8 (For a grey mother with a monkey-mien, Mopping and mowing, was apparent too,
 As, confident of capture, all took hands And danced about the captives in a ring.)
 — Saw them break through, breathe safe, at Rome again,
 Saved by the selfish instinct, losing so

Their loved one left with haters. These I saw,
 In recrudescency of baffled hate, Prepare to wring the uttermost revenge From body and soul thus left them: all was sure,
 Fire laid and cauldron set, the obscene ring traced,
 The victim stripped and prostrate: what of
 God?
 The cleaving of a cloud, a cry, a crash, Quenched lay their cauldron, cowered i'
 the dust the crew,
 As, in a glory of armour like Saint George,
 Out again sprang the young good beautous priest
 Bearing away the lady in his arms, Saved for a splendid minute and no
 more.
 For, whom i' the path did that priest come upon,
 He and the poor lost lady borne so brave.
 — Checking the song of praise in me, had
 else
 Swelled to the full for God's will done on
 earth —
 Whom but a dusk misfeatured messenger,
 No other than the angel of this life, Whose care is lest men see too much at
 once.
 He made the sign, such God-glimpse must
 suffice, Nor prejudice the Prince o' the Power of the Air,
 Whose ministration piles us overhead What we call, first, earth's roof and, last, heaven's floor,
 Now grate o' the trap, then outlet of the cage:
 So took the lady, left the priest alone,
 And once more canopied the world with black.
 But through the blackness I saw Rome
 again,
 And where a solitary villa stood In a lone garden-quarter: it was eve,
 The second of the year, and oh so cold!
 Ever and anon there flittered through the air
 A snow-flake, and a scanty couch of snow Crusted the grass-walk and the garden-mould.
 All was grave, silent, sinister, — when,
 ha?
 Glimmeringly did a pack of were-wolves pad
 The snow, those flames were Guido's eyes
 in front,
 And all five found and footed it, the track,
 To where a threshold-streak of warmth and light
 Betrayed the villa-door with life inside, While an inch outside were those bloodbright eyes,
 And black lips wrinkling o'er the flash of teeth,
 And tongues that lolled — Oh God that madest man!
 They parleyed in their language. Then one whined —
 That was the policy and master-stroke — Deep in his throat whispered what seemed a name —
 "Open to Caponsacchi!" Guido cried:
 "Gabriell!" cried Lucifer at Eden-gate.
 Wide as a heart, opened the door at once,
 Showing the joyous couple, and their child
 The two-weeks' mother, to the wolves, the wolves To them: Close eyes! And when the corpses lay Stark-stretched, and those the wolves, their wolf-work done,
 Were safe-embosomed by the night again,
 I knew a necessary change in things;
 As when the worst watch of the night gives
 way,
 And there comes duly, to take cognisance,
 The scrutinising eye-point of some star —
 And who despairs of a new daybreak now?
 Lo, the first ray protruded on those five!
 It reached them, and each felon writhed transfixed
 Awhile they palpitated on the spear Motionless over Tophet: stand or fall?
 "I say, the spear should fall — should stand, I say!"
 Cried the world come to judgment, granting grace
 Or dealing doom according to world's wont, Those world's-bystanders grouped on Rome's cross-road
 At prick and summons of the primal curse
 Which bids man love as well as make a lie.
 There prattled they, discoursed the right and wrong,
 Turned wrong to right, proved wolves sheep and sheep wolves,
 So that you scarce distinguished fell from fleece;
 Till out spoke a great guardian of the fold, Stood up, put forth his hand that held the crook,
 And motioned that the arrested point decline:
 Horribly off, the wriggling dead-weight reeled,
 Rushed to the bottom and lay ruined there.
 Though still at the pit's mouth, despite the smoke
 O' the burning, tarriers turned again to talk
 And trim the balance, and detect at least A touch of wolf in what showed whitest sheep,
 A cross of sheep redeeming the whole wolf, —
 Vex truth a little longer: — less and less,

Because years came and went, and more
and more Brought new lies with them to be loved in
turn.

Till all at once the memory of the thing, —
The fact that, wolves or sheep, such creatures were, —

Which hitherto, however men supposed, Had somehow plain and pillar-like prevailed

In the midst of them, indisputably fact, Granite, time's tooth should grate against,
not graze, —

Why, this proved sandstone, friable, fast to fly

10 And give its grain away at wish o' the wind.
Ever and ever more diminutive,
Base gone, shaft lost, only entablature, Dwindled into no bigger than a book, Lay of the column; and that little, left By the roadside 'mid the ordure, shards and weeds.

Until I haply, wandering that lone way, Kicked it up, turned it over, and recognised,

For all the crumblement, this abacus,¹ This square old yellow book, — could calculate

20 By this the lost proportions of the style.

This was it from, my fancy with those
facts,

I used to tell the tale, turned gay to grave,
But lacked a listener seldom; such alloy,
Such substance of me interfused the gold Which, wrought into a shapely ring there-
with,

Hammèred and filed, fingered and favoured, last

Lay ready for the renovating wash O' the water. "How much of the tale was
true?"

I disappeared; the book grew all in all; 30 The lawyers' pleadings swelled back to their size, —

Doubled in two, the crease upon them yet, For more commodity of carriage, see! —
And these are letters, veritable sheets That brought posthaste the news to Florence, writ

At Rome the day Count Guido died, we
find,

To stay the craving of a client there, Who bound the same and so produced my book.

Lovers of dead truth, did ye fare the worse?
Lovers of live truth, found ye false my tale?

40 Well, now; there's nothing in nor out o'
the world

¹ Abacus: the upper part of the capital of a pillar, on which the architrave rests. In its earliest forms it is generally square in shape.

Good except truth: yet this, the something else,

What's this then, which proves good yet seems untrue?

This that I mixed with truth, motions of
mine

That quickened, made the inertness malleolable

O' the gold was not mine, — what's your name for this?

Are means to the end, themselves in part
the end?

Is fiction which makes fact alive, fact too?
The somehow may be thishow.

I find first

Writ down for very A B C of fact,
"In the beginning God made heaven and 50
earth;"

From which, no matter with what lisp, I spell

And speak you out a consequence — that
man,

Man, — as befits the made, the inferior
thing, —

Purposed, since made, to grow, not make in turn,

Yet forced to try and make, else fail to grow, —

Formed to rise, reach at, if not grasp and
gain

The good beyond him, — which attempt is growth, —

Repeats God's process in man's due degree,

Attaining man's proportionate result, — Creates, no, but resuscitates, perhaps. 60

Inalienable, the arch-prerogative Which turns thought, act — conceives, expresses too!

No less, man, bounded, yearning to be
free,

May so project his surplusage of soul
In search of body, so add self to self

Be owning what lay ownerless before, — So find, so fill full, so appropriate forms —

That, although nothing which had never
life

Shall get life from him, be, not having been,
Yet, something dead may get to live again, 70

Something with too much life or not
enough,

Which, either way imperfect, ended once:
An end whereat man's impulse intervenes,

Makes new beginning, starts the dead
alive,

Completes the incomplete and saves the
thing.

Man's breath were vain to light a virgin wick, —

Half-burned-out, all but quite-quenched wicks o' the lamp

Stationed for temple-service on this earth, These indeed let him breathe on and relume!

For such man's feat is, in the due degree,
 — Mimic creation, galvanism for life,
 But still a glory portioned in the scale.
 Why did the mage say, — feeling as we are wont
 For truth, and stopping midway short of
 truth,
 And resting on a lie, — "I raise a ghost"?
 "Because," he taught adepts, "man makes not man.
 "Yet by a special gift, an art of arts,
 "More insight and more oversight and much more
 "Will to use both of these than boast my mates,
 "I can detach from me, commission forth
 "Half of my soul; which in its pilgrimage "O'er old unwandered waste ways of the
 world,
 "May chance upon some fragment of a whole,
 "Rag of flesh, scrap of bone in dim disuse,
 "Smoking flax that fed fire once: prompt therein
 'I enter, spark-like, put old powers to
 play,
 "Push lines out to the limit, lead forth last
 "(By a moonrise through a ruin of a crypt)
 "What shall be mistily seen, murmuringly heard,
 "Mistakenly felt: then write my name with Faust's!" Oh, Faust, why Faust? Was not Elisha
 once? —
 Who bade them lay his staff on a corpse-
 face.
 There was no voice, no hearing: he went in Therefore, and shut the door upon them
 twain,
 And prayed unto the Lord: and he went
 up
 And lay upon the corpse, dead on the couch,
 And put his mouth upon its mouth, his
 eyes
 Upon its eyes, his hands upon its hands,
 And stretched him on the flesh; the flesh waxed warm:
 And he returned, walked to and fro the
 house,
 And went up, stretched him on the flesh
 again,
 And the eyes opened. 'Tis a credible feat
 With the right man and way.
 Enough of me!
 The Book! I turn its medicinable leaves In London now till, as in Florence erst, A spirit laughs and leaps through every limb,
 And lights my eye, and lifts me by the
 hair,
 Letting me have my will again with these — How title I the dead alive once more?

Count Guido Franceschini the Aretine, Descended of an ancient house, though
 poor,
 A beak-nosed bushy-bearded black-haired
 lord,
 Lean, pallid, low of stature yet robust,
 Fifty years old, — having four years ago Married Pompilia Comparini, young, Good, beautiful, at Rome, where she was born,
 And brought her to Arezzo, where they lived Unhappy lives, whatever curse the
 cause, —
 This husband, taking four accomplices, 50 Followed this wife to Rome, where she was fled
 From their Arezzo to find peace again,
 In convoy, eight months earlier, of a priest, Aretine also, of still nobler birth, Giuseppe Caponsacchi, — caught her there Quiet in a villa on a Christmas night, With only Pietro and Violante by,
 Both her putative parents; killed the three,
 Aged, they, seventy each, and she, seventeen,
 And, two weeks since, the mother of his 60
 babe
 First-born and heir to what the style was
 worth O' the Guido who determined, dared and did
 This deed just as he purposed point by
 point.
 Then, bent upon escape, but hotly pressed,
 And captured with his co-mates that same night,
 He, brought to trial, stood on this defence —
 Injury to his honour caused the act;
 And since his wife was false, (as manifest By flight from home in such companion-
 ship,) Death, punishment deserved of the false 70
 wife
 And faithless parents who abetted her I' the flight aforesaid, wronged nor God nor man.
 "Nor false she, nor yet faithless they,"
 replied
 The accuser; "cloaked and masked this murder glooms;
 "True was Pompilia, loyal too the pair;
 "Out of the man's own heart a monster curled
 "Which — crime coiled with connivancy at crime —
 "His victim's breast, he tells you, hatched and reared;
 "Uncoil we and stretch stark the worm of hell!"
 A month the trial swayed this way and that 80 Ere judgment settled down on Guido's
 guilt;

Then was the Pope, that good Twelfth Innocent, Appealed to: who well weighed what went
before,
Affirmed the guilt and gave the guilty
doom.

Let this old woe step on the stage again!
Act itself o'er anew for men to judge,
Not by the very sense and sight indeed — (Which take at best imperfect cognisance Since, how heart moves brain, and how both move hand,

What mortal ever in entirety saw?) 10 — No dose of purer truth than man digests, But truth with falsehood, milk that feeds
him now,
Not strong meat he may get to bear some
day. —

To-wit, by voices we call evidence, Upoar in the echo, live fact deadened
down, Talked over, bruited abroad, whispered
away,

Yet helping us to all we seem to hear:
For how else know we save by worth of
word?

Here are the voices presently shall sound In due succession. First, the world's outcry

20 Around the rush and ripple of any fact Fallen stonewise, plumb on the smooth face of things;

The world's guess, as it crowds the bank
o' the pool,

At what were figure and substance, by their splash:

Then, by vibrations in the general mind,
At depth of deed already out of reach.

This threefold murder of the day before, — Say, Half-Rome's feel after the vanished
truth;

Honest enough, as the way is: all the
same,

Harbouring in the centre of its sense

30 A hidden germ of failure, shy but sure,
To neutralise that honesty and leave That feel for truth at fault, as the way is
too.

Some prepossession such as starts amiss,
By but a hair's breadth at the shoulderblade,

The arm o' the feeler, dip he ne'er so bold;
So leads arm waveringly, lets fall wide

O' the mark its finger, sent to find and fix Truth at the bottom, that deceptive speck.

With this Half-Rome, — the source of swerving, call

40 Over-belief in Guido's right and wrong Rather than in Pompilia's wrong and
right:

Who shall say how, who shall say why?
'Tis there —

The instinctive theorising whence a fact Looks to the eye as the eye likes the look.
Gossip in a public place, a sample-speech.
Some worthy, with his previous hint to
find

A husband's side the safer, and no whit Aware he is not Æacus¹ the while, —

How such an one supposes and states fact
To whosoever of a multitude

Will listen, and perhaps prolong thereby 54

The not-unpleasant flutter at the breast, Born of a certain spectacle shut in

By the church Lorenzo opposite. So, they lounge

Midway the mouth o' the street, on Corso
side,

'Twixt palace Fiano and palace Ruspoli, Linger and listen; keeping clear o' the crowd,

Yet wishful one could lend that crowd one's eyes,

(So universal is its plague of squint)

And make hearts beat our time that flutter 64
false:

— All for the truth's sake, mere truth,
nothing else!

How Half-Rome found for Guido much excuse.

Next, from Rome's other half, the opposite feel

For truth with a like swerve, like unsuc-cess, —

Or if success, by no skill but more luck This time, through siding rather with the
wife,

Because a fancy-fit inclined that way, Than with the husband. One wears drab, one pink;

Who wears pink, ask him "Which shall win the race,

"Of coupled runners like as egg and egg?" 70

"— Why, if I must choose, he with the pink scarf."

Doubtless for some such reason choice fell here.

A piece of public talk to correspond
At the next stage of the story; just a day Let pass and new day brings the proper
change.

Another sample-speech i' the market-place
O' the Barberini by the Capucins;

Where the old Triton, at his fountain-
sport,

Bernini's creature plated to the paps, 84

Puffs up steel sleet which breaks to diamond dust,

A spray of sparkles snorted from his conch,

High over the caritellas, out o' the wav

¹ Æacus: the colleague of Minos and Rhadamanthus as judge of the nether world; hence a type of impartiality.

O' the motley merchandising multitude.
Our murder has been done three days ago,
The frost is over and gone, the south wind laughs,

And, to the very tiles of each red roof
A-smoke i' the sunshine, Rome lies gold and glad:

So, listen how, to the other half of Rome, Pompilia seemed a saint and martyr both!

Then, yet another day let come and go,
With pause prelusive still of novelty,

Hear a fresh speaker! — neither this nor
that

Half-Rome aforesaid; something bred of
both:

One and one breed the inevitable three.
Such is the personage harangues you next;
The elaborated product, tertium quid: Rome's first commotion in subsidence gives

The curd o' the cream, flower o' the wheat, as it were,

And finer sense o' the city. Is this plain?
You get a reasoned statement of the case, Eventual verdict of the curious few

Who care to sift a business to the bran
Nor coarsely bolt it like the simpler sort.
Here, after ignorance, instruction speaks;
Here, clarity of candour, history's soul,
The critical mind, in short: no gossip-
guess.

What the superior social section thinks,
In person of some man of quality Who, — breathing musk from lace-work and brocade,

His solitaire amid the flow of frill, Powdered peruke on nose, and bag at
back,

And cane dependent from the ruffled wrist, —

Harangues in silvery and selectest phrase
'Neath waxlight in a glorified saloon Where mirrors multiply the girandole:¹ Courting the approbation of no mob, But Eminence This and All-Illustrious
That

Who take snuff softly, range in well-bred ring,

Card-table-quitters for observance' sake,
Around the argument, the rational word — Still, spite its weight and worth, a sample-
speech.

How Quality dissertated on the case.

So much for Rome and rumour; smoke comes first:

Once let smoke rise untroubled, we descry Clearlier what tongues of flame may spire and spit

To eye and ear, each with appropriate

According to its food, or pure or foul.

The actors, no mere rumours of the act, Intervene. First you hear Count Guido's
voice,

In a small chamber that adjoins the court, Where Governor and Judges, summoned
thence,

Tommato, Venturini and the rest,

Find the accused ripe for declaring truth.
Soft-cushioned sits he; yet shifts seat, shirks touch,

As, with a twitchy brow and wincing lip And cheek that changes to all kinds of
white,

He proffers his defence, in tones subdued Near to mock-mildness now, so mournful seems

The obtuser sense truth fails to satisfy; Now, moved, from pathos at the wrong endured,

To passion; for the natural man is roused At fools who first do wrong then pour the
blame

Of their wrong-doing, Satan-like, on Job.
Also his tongue at times is hard to curb;
Incisive, nigh satiric bites the phrase, Rough-raw, yet somehow claiming privilege

— It is so hard for shrewdness to admit Folly means no harm when she calls black
white!

— Eruption momentary at the most,
Modified forthwith by a fall o' the fire, Sage acquiescence; for the world's the
world,

And, what it errs in, Judges rectify:
He feels he has a fist, then folds his arms Crosswise and makes his mind up to be meek.

And never once does he detach his eye From those ranged there to slay him or to save,

But does his best man's-service for himself,

Despite, — what twitches brow and makes lip wince, —

His limbs' late taste of what was called the Cord,

Or Vigil-torture more facetiously.

Even so; they were wont to tease the
truth

Out of loth witness (toying, trifling time) By torture: 'twas a trick, a vice of the
age,

Here, there and everywhere, what would you have?

Religion used to tell Humanity
She gave him warrant or denied him
course.

And since the course was much to his own
mind,

Of pinching flesh and pulling bone from bone

To unhusk truth a-hiding in its hulls, 54

70

8a

Nor whisper of a warning stopped the way,
He, in their joint behalf, the burly slave, Bestirred him, mauled and maimed all recusants,

While, prim in place, Religion overlooked;

And so had done till doomsday, never a sign Nor sound of interference from her mouth,
But that at last the burly slave wiped brow,
Let eye give notice as if soul were there, Muttered "'Tis a vile trick, foolish more than vile,

10 "Should have been counted sin; I make it so:

"At any rate no more of it for me —

"Nay, for I break the torture-engine
thus!"

Then did Religion start up, stare amain, Look round for help and see none, smile and say,

"What, broken is the rack? Well done of thee!

"Did I forget to abrogate its use?

"Be the mistake in common with us both!

"— One more fault our blind age shall answer for,

"Down in my book denounced though it must be

20 "Somewhere. Henceforth find truth by milder means!"

Ah but, Religion, did we wait for thee

To ope the book, that serves to sit upon,
And pick such place out, we should wait
indeed!

That is all history: and what is not now, Was then, defendants found it to their cost.

How Guido, after being tortured, spoke.

Also hear Caponsacchi who comes next, Man and priest — could you comprehend the coil! —

In days when that was rife which now is rare.

30 How, mingling each its multifarious wires, Now heaven, now earth, now heaven and earth at once,

Had plucked at and perplexed their puppet here,

Played off the young frank personable
priest;

Sworn fast and tonsured plain heaven's celibate,

And yet earth's clear-accepted servitor,
A courtly spiritual Cupid, squire of dames

By law of love and mandate of the mode.
The Church's own, or why parade her seal,

Wherefore that chrim and consecrative
work?

40 Yet verily the world's, or why go badged
A prince of sonneteers and lutanists,¹

Show colour of each vanity in vogue Borne with decorum due on blameless
breast?

All that is changed now, as he tells the
court

How he had played the part excepted at;
Tells it, moreover, now the second time:

Since, for his cause of scandal, his own share

I' the flight from home and husband of the wife,

He has been censured, punished in a sort
By relegation, — exile, we should say, 50

To a short distance for a little time, — Whence he is summoned on a sudden now,

Informed that she, he thought to save, is
lost,

And, in a breath, bidden re-tell his tale, Since the first telling somehow missed
effect,

And then advise in the matter. There stands he,

While the same grim black-panelled chamber blinks

As though rubbed shiny with the sins of
Rome

Told the same oak for ages — wave-washed wall

Against which sets a sea of wickedness. 60

There, where you yesterday heard Guido
speak,

Speaks Caponsacchi; and there face him
too

Tommato, Venturini and the rest

Who, eight months earlier, scarce repressed the smile,

Forewent the wink; waived recognition so
Of peccadillos incident to youth,

Especially youth high-born; for youth means love,

Vows can't change nature, priests are only
men,

And love likes stratagem and subterfuge Which age, that once was youth, should 70

recognise,

May blame, but needs not press too hard upon.

Here sit the old Judges then, but with no
grace

Of reverend carriage, magisterial port: For why? The accused of eight months since, — the same

Who cut the conscious figure of a fool, Changed countenance, dropped bashful gaze to ground,

While hesitating for an answer then, —
Now is grown judge himself, terrifies now

This, now the other culprit called a judge, Whose turn it is to stammer and look 80

strange,

As he speaks rapidly, angrily, speech that smites:

And they keep silence, bear blow after blow,

Because the seeming-solitary man, Speaking for God, may have an audience
too,
Invisible, no discreet judge provokes.
How the priest Caponsacchi said his say.

Then a soul sighs its lowest and its last After the loud ones, — so much breath remains

Unused by the four-days'-dying; for she lived

Thus long, miraculously long, 'twas
thought,

Just that Pompilia might defend herself.

10 How, while the hireling and the alien stoop,

Comfort, yet question, — since the time is brief,

And folk, allowably inquisitive,

Encircle the low pallet where she lies

In the good house that helps the poor to
die, —

Pompilia tells the story of her life.

For friend and lover, — leech and man of
law

Do service; busy helpful ministrants

As varied in their calling as their mind,

Temper and age: and yet from all of
these,

20 About the white bed under the arched
roof,

Is somehow, as it were, evolved a one, — Small separate sympathies combined and

large,
Nothings that were, grown something very
much:

As if the bystanders gave each his straw,
All he had, though a trifle in itself,

Which, plaited all together, made a Cross Fit to die looking on and praying with,

Just as well as if ivory or gold.

So, to the common kindness she speaks,

30 There being scarce more privacy at the
last

For mind than body: but she is used to
bear,

And only unused to the brotherly look.
How she endeavoured to explain her life.

Then, since a Trial ensued, a touch o' the
same

To sober us, flustered with frothy talk,
And teach our common sense its helpless-

ness.

For why deal simply with divining-rod,
Scrape where we fancy secret sources flow,

And ignore law, the recognised machine,

40 Elaborate display of pipe and wheel Framed into choke, pump up and pour apace

Truth till a flowery foam shall wash the
world?

The patent truth-extracting process, —
ha?

Let us make that grave mystery turn one wheel,

Give you a single grind of law at least!

One orator, of two on either side,

Shall teach us the puissance of the tongue — That is, o' the pen which simulated

tongue

On paper and saved all except the sound Which never was. Law's speech beside 50 law's thought?

That were too stunning, too immense an odds:

That point of vantage law lets nobly pass.
One lawyer shall admit us to behold

The manner of the making out a case, First fashion of a speech; the chick in egg,

The masterpiece law's bosom incubates.
How Don Giaicinto of the Arcangeli, Called Procurator of the Poor at Rome,

Now advocate for Guido and his mates, —

The jolly learned man of middle age, 60 Cheek and jowl all in laps with fat and
law,

Mirthful as mighty, yet, as great hearts
use,

Despite the name and fame that tempt our flesh,

Constant to that devotion of the hearth,
Still captive in those dear domestic ties! —

How he, — having a cause to triumph
with,

All kind of interests to keep intact,
More than one efficacious personage

To tranquillise, conciliate and secure,
And above all, public anxiety 70

To quiet, show its Guido in good hands, —
Also, as if such burdens were too light,

A certain family-feast to claim his care,
The birthday-banquet for the only son —

Paternity at smiling strife with law — How he brings both to buckle in one bond;

And, thick at throat, with waterish under-

eye,
Turns to his task and settles in his seat

And puts his utmost means in practice
now:

Wheezes out law-phrase, whiffles Latin 80
forth,

And, just as though roast lamb would never be,

Makes logic levigate¹ the big crime
small:

Rubs palm on palm, rakes foot with itchy
foot,

Conceives and inchoates the argument, Sprinkling each flower appropriate to the

time,
— Ovidian quip or Ciceronian crank,

A-bubble in the larynx while he laughs,
As he had fritters deep down frying there.

How he turns, twists, and tries the oily
thing
Shall be — first speech for Guido 'gainst the Fisc.

Then with a skip as it were from heel to
head,
Leaving yourselves fill up the middle bulk O' the Trial, reconstruct its shape august,
From such exordium clap we to the close;
Give you, if we dare wing to such a height,
The absolute glory in some full-grown
speech

On the other side, some finished butterfly, 10 Some breathing diamond-flake with leaf-gold fans,

That takes the air, no trace of worm it was,
Or cabbage-bed it had production from.
Giovambattista o' the Bottini, Fisc, Pompilia's patron by the chance of the hour,

To-morrow her persecutor, — composite,
he,

As becomes who must meet such various calls —

Odds of age joined in him with ends of
youth.

A man of ready smile and facile tear, Improvised hopes, despairs at nod and beck,

20 And language — ah, the gift of eloquence!
Language that goes, goes, easy as a glove, O'er good and evil, smoothen's both to one.
Rashness helps caution with him, fires the straw,

In free enthusiastic careless fit,
On the first proper pinnacle of rock
Which offers, as reward for all that zeal, To lure some bark to foundering and bring
gain:

While calm sits Caution, rapt with heavenward eye,

A true confessor's gaze, amid the glare 30 Beaconing to the breaker, death and hell.

"Well done, thou good and faithful!" she approves:

"Hadst thou let slip a faggot to the beach,
"The crew might surely spy thy precipice
"And save their boat; the simple and the slow

"Might so, forsooth, forestall the wrecker's fee!

"Let the next crew be wise and hail in
time!"

Just so compounded is the outside man,
Blue juvenile pure eye and pippin cheek,
And brow all prematurely soiled and seamed

40 With sudden age, bright devastated hair.
Ah, but you miss the very tones o' the
voice,

The scannell pipe that screams in heights of head,

As, in his modest studio, all alone,

The tall wight stands a-tiptoe, strives and strains,

Both eyes shut, like the cockerel that would crow,

Tries to his own self amorously o'er What never will be uttered else than so — Since to the four walls, Forum and Mars'
Hill,

Speaks out the poesy which, penned, turns prose.

Clavecinist¹ debarred his instrument, 50

He yet thrums — shirking neither turn nor trill,

With desperate finger on dumb table-
edge —

The sovereign rondo, shall conclude his Suite,

Charm an imaginary audience there,
From old Corelli to young Haendel, both I' the flesh at Rome, ere he perforce go print

The cold black score, mere music for the
mind —

The last speech against Guido and his gang,

With special end to prove Pompilia pure.
How the Fisc vindicates Pompilia's fame. 60

Then comes the all but end, the ultimate Judgment save yours. Pope Innocent the Twelfth,

Simple, sagacious, mild yet resolute, With prudence, probity — and what beside From the other world he feels impress² at times,

Having attained to fourscore years and six, —

How, when the court found Guido and the rest

Guilty, but law supplied a subterfuge
And passed the final sentence to the Pope,

He, bringing his intelligence to bear 70

This last time on what ball behoves him
drop

In the urn, or white or black, does drop a black,

Send five souls more to just precede his
own,

Stand him in stead and witness, if need
were,

How he is wont o do God's work on
earth.

The manner of his sitting out the dim Droop of a sombre February day

In the plain closet where he does such
work,

With, from all Peter's treasury, one stool,
One table and one lathen crucifix. 80

There sits the Pope, his thoughts for company;

Grave but not sad, — nay, something like a cheer

Leaves the lips free to be benevolent,

¹ Clavecinist: player on the harpsichord.

Which, all day long, did duty firm and fast.
 A cherishing there is of foot and knee, A chafing loose-skinned large-veined hand with hand, — What steward but knows when stewardship earns its wage,
 May levy praise, anticipate the lord?
 He reads, notes, lays the papers down at
 last,
 Muses, then takes a turn about the room; Unclasps a huge tome¹ in an antique
 guise,
 Primitive print and tongue half obsolete,
 That stands him in diurnal stead; opens page, Finds place where falls the passage to be conned
 According to an order long in use:
 And, as he comes upon the evening's
 chance,
 Starts somewhat, solemnises straight his
 smile,
 Then reads aloud that portion first to last,
 And at the end lets flow his own thoughts
 forth
 Likewise aloud, for respite and relief, Till by the dreary relics of the west Wan through the half-moon window, all his light,
 He bows the head while the lips move in
 prayer,
 Writes some three brief lines, signs and seals the same,
 Tinkles a hand-bell, bids the obsequious
 Sir
 Who puts foot presently o' the closet-sill He watched outside of, bear as superscribed
 That mandate to the Governor forthwith:
 Then heaves abroad his cares in one good
 sigh;
 Traverses corridor with no arm's help,
 And so to sup as a clear conscience should.
 The manner of the judgment of the Pope.

Then must speak Guido yet a second time, Satan's old saw being apt here — skin for skin,
 All a man hath that will he give for life.
 While life was graspable and gainable,
 And bird-like buzzed her wings round Guido's brow,
 Not much truth stiffened out the web of
 words
 He wove to catch her: when away she flew
 And death came, death's breath rivelled up the lies,
 Left bare the metal thread, the fibre fine Of truth, i' the spinning: the true words shone last.

How Guido, to another purpose quite, Speaks and despairs, the last night of his
 life,
 In that New Prison by Castle Angelo
 At the bridge foot: the same man, another
 voice.
 On a stone bench in a close fetid cell,
 Where the hot vapour of an agony, Struck into drops on the cold wall, runs
 down Horrible worms made out of sweat and
 tears —
 There crouch, well nigh to the knees in dungeon-straw, Lit by the sole lamp suffered for their
 sake,
 Two awe-struck figures, this a Cardinal, 50
 That an Abate, both of old styled friends O' the thing part man part monster in the midst,
 So changed is Franceschini's gentle blood.
 The tiger-cat screams now, that whined before,
 That pried and tried and trod so gingerly, Till in its silkiness the trap-teeth joined;
 Then you know how the bristling fury foams.
 They listen, this wrapped in his folds of red,
 While his feet fumble for the filth below;
 The other, as becoms a stouter heart, 60 Working his best with beads and cross to ban
 The enemy that comes in like a flood Spite of the standard set up, verily
 And in no trope at all, against him there:
 For at the prison-gate, just a few steps Outside, already, in the doubtful dawn, Thither, from this side and from that,
 slow sweep
 And settle down in silence solidly, Crow-wise, the frightful Brotherhood of
 Death.
 Black-hatted and black-hooded huddle 70
 they,
 Black rosaries a-dangling from each waist;
 So take they their grim station at the door, Torches lit, skull-and-cross-bones-banner
 spread,
 And that gigantic Christ with open arms, Grounded. Nor lacks there aught but that the group
 Break forth, intone the lamentable psalm,
 "Out of the deeps, Lord, have I cried to
 thee!" —
 When inside, from the true profound, a sign
 Shall bear intelligence that the foe is foiled, Count Guido Franceschini has confessed, 80
 And is absolved and reconciled with God.
 Then they, intoning, may begin their
 march,
 Make by the longest way for the People's Square,

¹ A huge tome: the history of the Popes;
 see the opening of Book X.

Carry the criminal to his crime's award:
A mob to cleave, a scaffolding to reach,
Two gallows and Mannaia¹ crowning all.
How Guido made defence a second time.

Finally, even as thus by step and step
I led you from the level of to-day
Up to the summit of so long ago, Here, whence I point you the wide prospect
round —

Let me, by like steps, slope you back to smooth,

to Land you on mother-earth, no whit the
worse,

'To feed o' the fat o' the furrow: free t.
dwell,

Taste our time's better things profusely spread

For all who love the level, corn and wine, Much cattle and the many-folded fleece.
Shall not my friends go feast again on sward,

Though cognisant of country in the clouds

Higher than wistful eagle's horny eye Ever unclosed for, 'mid ancestral crags, When morning broke and Spring was back once more,

20 And he died, heaven, save by his heart, unreached?

Yet heaven my fancy lifts to, ladder-like, —
As Jack reached, holpen of his beanstalkrungs!

A novel country: I might make it mine
By choosing which one aspect of the year Suited mood best, and putting solely that On panel somewhere in the House of Fame,

Landscaping what I saved, not what I
saw:

— Might fix you, whether frost in goblin-
time

Startled the moon with his abrupt bright
laugh,

30 Or, August's hair afloat in filmy fire, She fell, arms wide, face foremost on the
world,

Swooned there and so singed out the strength of things.

Thus were abolished Spring and Autumn
both,

The land dwarfed to one likeness of the
land,

Life cramped corpse-fashion. Rather learn and love

Each facet-flash of the revolving year! — Red, green and blue that whirl into a
white,

The variance now, the eventual unity, Which make the miracle. See it for your-
selves,

This man's act, changeable because alive! 41 Action now shrouds, now shows the informing thought;

Man, like a glass ball with a spark a-top,
Out of the magic fire that lurks inside,
Shows one tint at a time to take the eye:
Which, let a finger touch the silent sleep, Shifted a hair's-breadth shoots you dark for bright,

Suffuses bright with dark, and baffles so Your sentence absolute for shine or shade.
Once set such orbs, — white styled, black stigmatised, —

A-rolling, see them once on the other side 56 Your good men and your bad men every
one

From Guido Franceschini to Guy Faux, Oft would you rub your eyes and change your names.

Such, British Public, ye who like me not, (God love you!) — whom I yet have laboured for,

Perchance more careful whoso runs may
read

Than erst when all, it seemed, could read who ran, —

Perchance more careless whoso reads may
praise

Than late when he who praised and read and wrote

Was apt to find himself the self-same me, — 6
Such labour had such issue, so I wrought
This arc, by furtherance of such alloy,

And so, by one spirt, take away its trace Till, justifiably golden, rounds my ring.

A ring without a posy,² and that ring
mine?

O lyric Love, half angel and half bird
And all a wonder and a wild desire, — Boldest of hearts that ever braved the sun,

Took sanctuary within the holier blue,
And sang a kindred soul out to his face, — 70

Yet human at the red-ripe of the heart — When the first summons from the darkling
earth

Reached thee amid thy chambers, blanched their blue,

And bared them of the glory — to drop
down,

To toil for man, to suffer or to die, —
This is the same voice: can thy soul know
change?

Hail then, and hearken from the realms of
help!

Never may I commence my song, my due To God who best taught song by gift of
thee,

Except with bent head and beseeching 80
hand —

² Posy: a motto or rhyme, engraved inside a ring.

¹ Mannaia: a kind of guillotine.

That still, despite the distance and the dark,
 What was, again may be; some interchange Of grace, some splendour once thy very thought, Some benediction anciently thy smile:
 — Never conclude, but raising hand and head Thither where eyes, that cannot reach, yet yearn For all hope, all sustainment, all reward,
 Their utmost up and on, — so blessing back In those thy realms of help, that heaven thy home,
 Some whiteness which, I judge, thy face makes proud,
 Some wanness where, I think, thy foot may fall!

II. — HALF-ROME.

WHAT, you, Sir, come too? (Just the man I'd meet.)
 Be ruled by me and have a care o' the crowd:
 This way, while fresh folk go and get their gaze:
 I'll tell you like a book and save your shins.
 Fie, what a roaring day we've had!
 Whose fault?
 Lorenzo in Lucina, — here's a church
 To hold a crowd at need, accommodate All comers from the Corso! If this crush Make not its priests ashamed of what they show For temple-room, don't prick them to draw purse
 And down with bricks and mortar, eke us out The beggarly transept with its bit of apse Into a decent space for Christian ease, Why, to-day's lucky pearl is cast to swine.
 Listen and estimate the luck they've had!
 (The right man, and I hold him.)
 Sir, do you see,
 They laid both bodies in the church, this morn
 The first thing, on the chancel two steps up, Behind the little marble balustrade;
 Disposed them, Pietro the old murdered fool
 To the right of the altar, and his wretched wife
 On the other side. In trying to count stabs, People supposed Violante showed the most,
 Till somebody explained us that mistake;
 His wounds had been dealt out indifferent where,
 But she took all her stabbings in the face,

Since punished thus solely for honour's sake, Honoris causâ, that's the proper term.
 A delicacy there is, our gallants hold,
 When you avenge your honour and only then,
 That you disfigure the subject, fray the face,
 Not just take life and end, in clownish guise.
 It was Violante gave the first offence, Got therefore the conspicuous punishment:
 While Pietro, who helped merely, his mere death Answered the purpose, so his face went free.
 We fancied even, free as you please, that face Showed itself still intolerably wronged;
 Was wrinkled over with resentment yet,
 Nor calm at all, as murdered faces use,
 Once the worst ended: an indignant air O' the head there was — 'tis said the body turned Round and away, rolled from Violante's side Where they had laid it loving-husband-like.
 If so, if corpses can be sensitive,
 Why did not he roll right down altar-step,
 Roll on through nave, roll fairly out of church, Deprive Lorenzo of the spectacle, Pay back thus the succession of affronts Whereto this church had served as theatre?
 For see: at that same altar where he lies,
 To that same inch of step, was brought the babe For blessing after baptism, and there styled Pompilia, and a string of names beside,
 By his bad wife, some seventeen years ago,
 Who purchased her simply to palm on him,
 Flatter his dotage and defraud the heirs.
 Wait awhile! Also to this very step Did this Violante, twelve years afterward, Bring, the mock-mother, that child-cheat full-grown,
 Pompilia, in pursuance of her plot,
 And there brave God and man a second time
 By linking a new victim to the lie.
 There, having made a match unknown to him,
 She, still unknown to Pietro, tied the knot Which nothing cuts except this kind of knife;
 Yes, made her daughter, as the girl was held, Marry a man, and honest man beside,
 And man of birth to boot, — clandestinely Because of this, because of that, because O' the devil's will to work his worst for once, —

Confident she could top her part at need And, when her husband must be told in
turn,
Ply the wife's trade, play off the sex's trick
And, alternating worry with quiet qualms, Bravado with submissiveness, prettily fool
Her Pietro into patience: so it proved.
Ay, 'tis four years since man and wife they grew,

This Guido Franceschini and this same Pompilia, foolishly thought, falsely declared

10 A Comparini and the couple's child:
Just at this altar where, beneath the piece Of Master Guido Reni, Christ on cross, Second to nought observable in Rome,
That couple lie now, murdered yestereve.
Even the blind can see a providence here.

From dawn till now that it is growing dusk A multitude has flocked and filled the
church,
Coming and going, coming back again, Till to count crazed one. Rome was at the show.

20 People climbed up the columns, fought for spikes

O' the chapel-rail to perch themselves upon, Jumped over and so broke the wooden
work

Painted like porphyry to deceive the eye; Serve the priests right! The organ-loft was crammed,

Women were fainting, no few fights ensued,
In short, it was a show repaid your pains:
For, though their room was scant undoubtedly,

Yet they did manage matters, to be just,
A little at this Lorenzo. Body o' me!

30 I saw a body exposed once . . . never
mind!

Enough that here the bodies had their due.
No stinginess in wax, a row all round,
And one big taper at each head and foot.

So, people pushed their way, and took their turn,

Saw, threw their eyes up, crossed themselves, gave place

To pressure from behind, since all the world

Knew the old pair, could talk the tragedy
Over from first to last: Pompilia too, Those who had known her — what 'twas worth to them!

40 Guido's acquaintance was in less request;
The Count had lounged somewhat too long in Rome,

Made himself cheap; with him were hand and glove

Barbers and blear-eyed, as the ancient sings.

¹ The ancient: Horace (Sat. i. 7, 3, "Omnibus et lippis notum et tonsoribus").

Also he is alive and like to be:
Had he considerably died, — aha!

He jostled Luca Cini on his staff, Mute in the midst, the whole man one amaze, Staring amain and crossing brow and
breast.

"How now?" asked I. "'Tis seventy years," quoth he,

"Since I first saw, holding my father's
hand,

"Bodies set forth: a many have I seen,
"Yet all was poor to this I live and see.

"Here the world's wickedness seals up the sum:

"What with Molinos' doctrine and this
deed,

"Antichrist surely comes and doomsday's near.

"May I depart in peace, I have seen my sec."

"Depart then," I advised, "nor block the road

"For youngsters still behindhand with such sights!"

"Why no," rejoins the venerable sire,
"I know it's horrid, hideous past belief,

"Burdensome far beyond what eye can
bear;

"But they do promise, when Pompilia dies
"I' the course o' the day, — and she can't outlive night, —

"They'll bring her body also to expose

"Beside the parents, one, two, three a-breast;

"That were indeed a sight, which might
I see,

"I trust I should not last to see the like!"
Whereat I bade the senior spare his shanks,

Since doctors give her till to-night to live,
And tell us how the butchery happened. 70

"Ah,
"But you can't know!" sighs he, "I'll not despair:

"Beside I'm useful at explaining things —
"As, how the dagger laid there at the feet,

"Caused the peculiar cuts; I mind its
make,

"Triangular i' the blade, a Genoese,
"Armed with those little hook-teeth on the edge

"To open in the flesh nor shut again:
"I like to teach a novice: I shall stay!"

And stay he did, and stay be sure he will.

A personage came by the private door 80
At noon to have his look: I name no
names:

Well then, His Eminence the Cardinal, Whose servitor in honourable sort

Guido was once, the same who made the
match,

(Will you have the truth?) whereof we see effect.

No sooner whisper ran he was arrived Than up pops Curate Carlo, a brisk lad, Who never lets a good occasion slip,
And volunteers improving the event.
We looked he'd give the history's self some
help,

Treat us to how the wife's confession went (This morning she confessed her crime, we
know)

And, may-be, throw in something of the Priest —

If he's not ordered back, punished anew,
The gallant, Caponsacchi, Lucifer
I' the garden where Pompilia, Eve-like,
lured

Her Adam Guido to his fault and fall.
Think you we got a sprig of speech akin To this from Carlo, with the Cardinal
there?

Too wary he was, too widely awake, I trow.
He did the murder in a dozen words;
Then said that all such outrages crop forth
I' the course of nature when Molinos' tares Are sown for wheat, flourish and choke the Church:

So slid on to the abominable sect
And the philosophic sin — we've heard all
that,

And the Cardinal too, (who book-made on
the same)

But, for the murder, left it where he found.
Oh but he's quick, the Curate, minds his game!

And, after all, we have the main o' the fact:
Case could not well be simpler, — mapped,
as it were,

We follow the murder's maze from source to sea,

By the red line, past mistake: one sees
indeed

Not only how all was and must have been,
But cannot other than be to the end of time.
Turn out here by the Ruspoli! Do you hold

Guido was so prodigiously to blame?
A certain cousin of yours has told you so?
Exactly! Here's a friend shall set you
right,

Let him but have the handsel of your ear.

These wretched Comparini were once gay
And galliard, of the modest middle class:
Born in this quarter seventy years ago And married young, they lived the accustomed life,

Citizens as they were of good repute:
And, childless, naturally took their ease
With only their two selves to care about
And use the wealth for: wealthy is the word, Since Pietro was possessed of house and
land —

And specially one house, when good days smiled,

In Via Vittoria, the respectable street

Where he lived mainly: but another house
Of less pretension did he buy betimes,
The villa, meant for jaunts and jollity,
I' the Pauline district, to be private there — 50
Just what puts murder in an enemy's head.
Moreover, — here's the worm i' the core,
the germ

O' the rottenness and ruin which arrived, —

He owned some usufruct, had moneys' use Lifelong, but to determine with his life In heirs' default: so, Pietro craved an heir, (The story always old and always new) Shut his fool's-eyes fast on the visible good And wealth for certain, opened them owl-
wide

On fortune's sole piece of forgetfulness, 60
The child that should have been and would not be.

Hence, seventeen years ago, conceive his glee

When first Violante, 'twixt a smile and blush,

With touch of agitation proper too, Announced that, spite of her unpromising
age,

The miracle would in time be manifest,
An heir's birth was to happen: and it did.
Somehow or other, — how, all in good
time!

By a trick, a sleight of hand you are to hear, —

A child was born, Pompilia, for his joy, 70
Plaything at once and prop, a fairy-gift,
A saints' grace or, say, grant of the good
God, —

A fiddle-pin's end! What imbeciles are we!

Look now: if some one could have prophesied,

"For love of you, for liking to your wife,
"I undertake to crush a snake I spy

"Settling itself i' the soft of both your breasts.

"Give me yon babe to strangle painlessly!
"She'll soar to the safe: you'll have your crying out,

"Then sleep, then wake, then sleep, then 80 end your days

"In peace and plenty, mixed with mild regret,

"Thirty years hence when Christmas takes old folk" —

How had old Pietro sprung up, crossed
himself,

And kicked the conjurer! Whereas you and I,

Being wise with after-wit, had clapped our
hands;

Nay, added, in the old fool's interest,
"Strangle the black-eyed babe, so far so
good,

"But on condition you relieve the man

"O' the wife and throttle him Violante too —

"She is the mischief!"

We had hit the mark.

She, whose trick brought the babe into the world,

She it was, when the babe was grown a girl,
Judged a new trick should reinforce the old,

Send vigour to the lie now somewhat spent By twelve years' service; lest Eve's rule decline

Over this Adam of hers, whose cabbage-plot

Throve dubiously since turned fools'-paradise,

10 Spite of a nightingale on every stump.
Pietro's estate was dwindling day by day,
While he, rapt far above such mundane care,

Crawled all-fours with his baby pick-a-back,

Sat at serene cats'-cradle with his child,
Or took the measured tallness, top to toe,
Of what was grown a great girl twelve years old:

Till sudden at the door a tap discreet,
A visitor's premonitory cough,
And poverty had reached him in her rounds.

20 This came when he was past the working-time,

Had learned to dandle and forgot to dig,
And who must but Violante cast about,
Contrive and task that head of hers again?
She whd had caught one fish, could make that catch

A bigger still, in angler's policy:
So, with an angler's mercy for the bait,
Her minnow was set wriggling on its barb
And tossed to mid-stream; which means, this grown girl

With the great eyes and bounty of black hair

30 And first crisp youth that tempts a jaded taste,

Was whisked i' the way of a certain man, who snapped.

Count Guido Franceschini the Aretine¹
Was head of an old noble house enough,
Not over-rich, you can't have everything, But such a man as riches rub against,
Readily stick to, — one with a right to them

Born in the blood: 'twas in his very brow Always to knit itself against the world, Beforehand so, when that world stinted due 40 Service and suit: the world ducks and defers.

As such folks do, he had come up to Rome
To better his fortune, and, since many years,

Was friend and follower of a cardinal;
Waiting the rather thus on providence
That a shrewd younger poorer brother yet,
The Abate Paolo, a regular priest,
Had long since tried his powers and found he swam

With the deftest on the Galilean pool:
But then he was a web-foot, free o' the wave,

And no ambiguous dab-chick¹ atched to 50
strut,

Humbled by any fond attempt to swim
When fiercer fowl usurped his dunghill top —

A whole priest, Paolo, no mere piece of one

Like Guido tacked thus to the Church's tail!

Guido moreover, as the head o' the house,
Claiming the main prize, not the lesser luck,

The centre lily, no mere chickweed fringe.

He waited and learned waiting, thirty years;
Got promise, missed performance — what would you have?

No petty post rewards a nobleman 60
For spending youth in splendid lackey-work,

And there's concurrence for each rarer prize;

When that falls, rougher hand and readier foot

Push aside Guido spite of his black looks.
The end was, Guido, when the warning showed,

The first white hair i' the glass, gave up the game,

Determined on returning to his town,
Making the best of bad incurable, Patching the old palace up and lingering there

The customary life out with his kin, 70
Where honour helps to spice the scanty bread.

Just as he trimmed his lamp and girt his loins

To go his journey and be wise at home,
In the right mood of disappointed worth,
Who but Violante sudden spied her prey (Where was I with that angler-simile?) And threw her bait, Pompilia, where he sulked —

A gleam i' the gloom!

What if he gained thus much,
Wrung out this sweet drop from the bitter Past,

Bore off this rose-bud from the prickly 84 brake

To justify such torn clothes and scratched hands,
And, after all, brought something back from Rome?

Would not a wife serve at Arezzo well
To light the dark house, lend a look of youth

To the mother's face grown meagre, left alone

And famished with the emptiness of hope, Old Donna Beatrice? Wife you want
Would you play family-representative, Carry you elder-brotherly, high and right 10 O'er what may prove the natural petulance Of the third brother, younger, greedier still, Girolamo, also a fledgeling priest, Beginning life in turn with callow beak
Agape for luck, no luck had stopped and stilled.

Such were the pinks and greys about the bait

Persuaded Guido gulp down hook and all.

What constituted him so choice a catch,
You question? Past his prime and poor beside!

Ask that of any she who knows the trade.

20 Why first, here was a nobleman with friends,

A palace one might run to and be safe
When presently the threatened fate should fall,

A big-browed master to block door-way up, Parley with people bent on pushing by
And praying the mild Pietro quick clear scores:

Is birth a privilege and power or no?
Also, — but judge of the result desired,
By the price paid and manner of the sale.
The Count was made woo, win and wed at once:

30 Asked, and was haled for answer, lest the heat

Should cool, to San Lorenzo, one blind eye,
And had Pompilia put into his arms
O' the sly there, by a hasty candle-blink,
With sanction of some priest-confederate Properly paid to make short work and sure.

So did old Pietro's daughter change her style

For Guido Franceschini's lady-wife Ere Guido knew it well; and why this haste
And scramble and indecent secrecy?

40 "Lest Pietro, all the while in ignorance,
"Should get to learn, gainsay and break the match:

"His peevishness had promptly put aside
"Such honour and refused the proffered boon,

"Pleased to become authoritative once.
"She remedied the wilful man's mistake —"

Did our discreet Violante. Rather say,

Thus did she, lest the object of her game,
Guido the gulled one, give him but a chance,

A moment's respite, time for thinking twice,

Might count the cost before he sold himself, 50

And try the clink of coin they paid him with.

But coin I aid, bargain struck and business done,

Once the clandestine marriage over thus,
All parties made perform the best o' the fact;

Pietro could play vast indignation off,
Be ignorant and astounded, dupe, poor soul,

Please you, of daughter, wife and son-in-law,

While Guido found himself in flagrant fault,

Must e'en do suit and service, soothe, subdue

A father not unreasonably chafed 60

Bring him to terms by paying son's devoir.
Pleasant initiation!

The end, this:

Guido's broad back was saddled to bear all —

Pietro, Violante, and Pompilia too, — Three lots cast confidently in one lap, Three dead-weights with one arm to lift the three

Out of their limbo up to life again.

The Roman household was to strike fresh root

In a new soil, graced with a novel name, Gilt with an alien glory, Arcetina 70 Henceforth and never Roman any more,
By treaty and engagement; thus it ran:
Pompilia's dowry for Pompilia's self
As a thing of course, — she paid her own expense;

No loss nor gain there: but the couple, you see,

They, for their part, turned over first of all Their fortune in its rags and rottenness To Guido, fusion and confusion, he And his with them and theirs, — whatever rag

With coin residuary fell on floor 80

When Brother Paolo's energetic shake Should do the relics justice: since 'twas thought,

Once vulnerable Pietro out of reach,
That, left at Rome as representative,
The Abate, backed by a potent patron here,

And otherwise with purple flushing him,
Might play a good game with the creditor,
Make up a moiety which, great, or small,
Should go to the common stock — if any- 90
thing,

Guido's, so far repayment of the cost About to be, — and if, as looked more like, Nothing, — why, all the nobler cost were his Who guaranteed, for better or for worse,
To Pietro and Violante, house and home, Kith and kin, with the pick of company And life o' the fat o' the land while life should last.

How say you to the bargain at first blush?
Why did a middle-aged not-silly man 10 Show himself thus besotted all at once?
Quoth Solomon, one black eye does it all.

They went to Arezzo, — Pietro and his
spouse,
With just the dusk o' the day of life to spend,

Eager to use the twilight, taste a treat, Enjoy for once with neither stay nor stint
The luxury of lord-and-lady-ship,
And realise the stuff and nonsense long A-simmer in their noddles; vent the fume Born there and bred, the citizen's conceit 20 How fares nobility while crossing earth, What rampart or invisible body-guard Keeps off the taint of common life from
such.

They had not fed for nothing on the tales Of grantees who give banquets worthy Jove,
Spending gold as if Plutus paid a whim, Served with obeisances as when . . . what
God?

I'm at the end of my tether; 'tis enough You understand what they came primed to
see:

While Guido who should minister the sight, 30 Stay all this qualmish greediness of soul With apples and with flagons — for his
part,

Was set on life diverse as pole from pole:
Lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, — what
else

Was he just now awake from, sick and sage,
After the very debauch they would begin? — Suppose such stuff and nonsense really were.
That bubble, they were bent on blowing big,

He had blown already till he burst his cheeks,

And hence found soapsuds bitter to the
tongue.

40 He hoped now to walk softly all his days
In soberness of spirit, if haply so, Pinching and paring he might furnish
forth

A frugal board, bare sustenance, no more, Till times, that could not well grow worse, should mend.

Thus minded then, two parties mean to meet

And make each other happy. The first week,

And fancy strikes fact and explodes in full.

"This," shrieked the Comparini, "this the Count,

"The palace, the signorial privilege,

"The pomp and pageantry were promised 51
us?

"For this have we exchanged our liberty,

"Our competence, our darling of a child?

"To house as spectres in a sepulchre

"Under this black stone-heap, the street's disgrace,

"Grimmest as that is of the gruesome
town,

"And here pick garbage on a pewter plate

"Or cough at verjuice dripped from earthenware?

"Oh Via Vittoria, oh the other place

"I' the Pauline, did we give you up for
this?

"Where's the foregone housekeeping good 61
and gay,

"The neighbourliness, the companion-
ship,

"The treat and feast when holidays came
round,

"The daily feast that seemed no treat at all,

"Called common by the uncommon fools we were!

"Even the sun that used to shine at Rome,

"Where is it? Robbed and starved and frozen too,

"We will have justice, justice if there be!"

Did not they shout, did not the town re-
sound!

Guido's old lady-mother Beatrice, Who since her husband, Count Tommaso's 70
death,

Had held sole sway i' the house, — the doited crone

Slow to acknowledge, curtesy and abdi-
cate, —

Was recognised of true novercal type, Dragon and devil. His brother Girolamo Came next in order: priest was he? The worse!

No way of winning him to leave his mumps
And help the laugh against old ancestry
And formal habits long since out of date, Letting his youth be patterned on the mode

Approved of where Violante laid down law. 80

Or did he brighten up by way of change,

Dispose himself for affability?

The malapert, too complaisant by half

To the alarmed young novice of a bride!

Let him go buzz, betake himself elsewhere
Nor singe his fly-wings in the candle-flame!

Four months' probation of this purgatory, Dog-snap and cat-claw, curse and counter-
blast,

The devil's self were sick of his own din;

And Pietro, after trumpeting huge wrongs 91

At church and market-place, pillar and post, Square's corner, street's end, now the palace-step
 And now the wine-house bench — while, on her side, Violante up and down was voluble
 In whatsoever pair of ears would perk
 From goody, gossip, cater-cousin and sib, Curious to peep at the inside of things And catch in the act pretentious poverty
 At its wits' end to keep appearance up,
 To Make both ends meet, — nothing the vulgar loves Like what this couple pitched them right and left.
 Then, their worst done that way, both struck tent, marched:
 — Renounced their share o' the bargain, flung what dues Guido was bound to pay, in Guido's face, Left their hearts'-darling, treasure of the twain
 And so forth, the poor inexperienced bride,
 To her own devices, bade Arezzo rot, Cursed life signorial, and sought Rome once more.

I see the comment ready on your lip,
 "The better fortune, Guido's — free at least
 "By this defection of the foolish pair,
 "He could begin make profit in some sort "Of the young bride and the new quietness,
 "Lead his own life now, henceforth breathe unplagued." Could he? You know the sex like Guido's self.
 Learn the Violante-nature!

Once in Rome,
 By way of helping Guido lead such life,
 Her first act to inaugurate return Was, she got pricked in conscience: Jubilee Gave her the hint. Our Pope, as kind as just, Attained his eighty years, announced a boon Should make us bless the fact, held Jubilee — Short shrift, prompt pardon for the light offence,
 And no rough dealing with the regular crime
 So this occasion were not suffered slip — Otherwise, sins commuted as before,
 Without the least abatement in the price.
 Now, who had thought it? All this while, it seems,
 Our sage Violante had a sin of a sort
 She must compound for now or not at all.
 Now be the ready riddance! She confessed

Pompilia was a fable not a fact:
 She never bore a child in her whole life.
 Had this child been a changeling, that were grace
 In some degree, exchange is hardly theft,
 You take your stand on truth ere leap your lie:
 Here was all lie, no touch of truth at all,
 All the lie hers — not even Pietro guessed He was as childless still as twelve years since.
 The babe had been a find i' the filth-heap, 54
 Sir,
 Catch from the kennel! There was found at Rome,
 Down in the deepest of our social dregs,
 A woman who professed the wanton's trade
 Under the requisite thin coverture, Communis meretrix and washer-wife:
 The creature thus conditioned found by chance Motherhood like a jewel in the muck,
 And straightway either trafficked with her prize Or listened to the tempter and let be, — Made pact abolishing her place and part 60
 In womankind, beast-fellowship indeed.
 She sold this babe eight months before its birth To our Violante, Pietro's honest spouse, Well-famed and widely-instanced as that crown
 To the husband, virtue in a woman's shape.
 She it was, bought, paid for, passed off the thing
 As very flesh and blood and child of her Despite the flagrant fifty years, — and why?
 Partly to please old Pietro, fill his cup With wine at the late hour when lees are 70
 left,
 And send him from life's feast rejoicingly, — Partly to cheat the rightful heirs, agape, Each uncle's cousin's brother's son of him,
 For that same principal of the usufruct¹
 It vexed him he must die and leave behind.
 Such was the sin had come to be confessed.
 Which of the tales, the first or last, was true?
 Did she so sin once, or, confessing now, Sin for the first time? Either way you will.
 One sees a reason for the cheat: one sees 80
 A reason for a cheat in owning cheat Where no cheat had been. What of the revenge?
 What prompted the contrition all at once,
 Made the avowal easy, the shame slight?

¹ Principal of the usufruct: i.e., the principal sum, in which Pietro had only a life-interest or usufruct.

- Why, prove they but Pompilia not their
child,
No child, no dowry! this, supposed their
child,
Had claimed what this, shown alien to their
blood,
Claimed nowise: Guido's claim was through his wife, Null then and void with hers. The biter bit, Do you see! For such repayment of the
past,
One might conceive the penitential pair
Ready to bring their case before the courts, Publish their infamy to all the world 10 And, arm in arm, go chuckling thence content.
- Is this your view? 'Twas Guido's any-
how
And colourable: he came forward then, Protested in his very bride's behalf Against this lie and all it led to, least Of all the loss o' the dowry; no! From her
And him alike he would expunge the blot, Erase the brand of such a bestial birth, Participate in no hideous heritage Gathered from the gutter to be garnered up 20 And glorified in a palace. Peter and Paul!
But that who likes may look upon the pair Exposed in yonder church, and show his skill
By saying which is eye and which is mouth
'Thro' those stabs thick and threefold, — but for that —
A strong word on the liars and their lie Might crave expression and obtain it, Sir!
— Though prematurely, since there's more to come,
More that will shake your confidence in
things
Your cousin tells you, — may I be so bold?
- 30 This makes the first act of the farce, —
anon
The sombre element comes stealing in Till all is black or blood-red in the piece.
Guido, thus made a laughing-stock abroad,
A proverb for the market-place at home,
Left alone with Pompilia now, this graft
So reputable on his ancient stock, This plague-seed set to fester his sound
flesh,
What does the Count? Revenge him on his wife?
Unfasten at all risks to rid himself 40 The noisome lazar-badge, fall foul of fate, And, careless whether the poor rag was
'ware
O' the part it played, or helped unwittingly, Bid it go burn and leave his frayed flesh
free?
Plainly, did Guido open both doors wide,
- Spurn thence the cur-cast creature and clear scores
As man might, tempted in extreme like
this?
No, birth and breeding, and compassion
too Saved her such scandal. She was young,
he thought,
Not privy to the treason, punished most I' the proclamation of it; why make her 50 A party to the crime she suffered by?
Then the black eyes were now her very
own,
Not any more Violante's: let her live,
Lose in a new air, under a new sun,
The taint of the imputed parentage Truly or falsely, take no more the touch Of Pietro and his partner anyhow!
All might go well yet.
- So she thought, herself, It seems, since what was her first act and
deed
When news came how these kindly ones at 60
Rome
Had stripped her naked to amuse the
world
With spots here, spots there and spots everywhere?
— For I should tell you that they noised abroad
Not merely the main scandal of her birth But slanders written, printed, published
wide, Pamphlets which set forth all the pleas-antry
Of how the promised glory was a dream, The power a bubble, and the wealth — why, dust.
There was a picture, painted to the life,
Of those rare doings, that superlative 70 Initiation in magnificence Conferred on a poor Roman family
By favour of Arezzo and her first And famousest, the Franceschini there.
You had the Countship holding head aloft Bravely although bespattered, shifts and straits
In keeping out o' the way o' the wheels o'
the world,
The comic of those home-contrivances
When the old lady-mother's wit was taxed To find six clamorous mouths in food more 80 real Than fruit plucked off the cobwebbed family-tree,
Or acorns shed from its gilt mouldered
frame —
Cold glories served up with stale fame for saUCE.
What, I ask, — when the drunkenness of
hate Hiccapped return for hospitality, Befouled the table they had feasted on,

Or say, — God knows I'll not prejudice
 the case, —
 Grievances thus distorted, magnified, Coloured by quarrel into calumny, —
 What side did our Pompilia first espouse?
 Her first deliberate measure was — she wrote,
 Pricked by some loyal impulse, straight to
 Rome
 And her husband's brother the Abate there,
 Who, having managed to effect the match,
 Might take men's censure for its ill success.
 She made a clean breast also in her turn,
 And qualified the couple properly, Since whose departure, hell, she said, was
 heaven,
 And the house, late distracted by their peals,
 Quiet as Carmel where the lilies live.
 Herself had oftentimes complained: but
 why?
 All her complaints had been their prompting, tales
 Trumped up, devices to this very end.
 Their game had been to thwart her husband's love
 And cross his will, malign his words and
 ways,
 To reach this issue, furnish this pretence For impudent withdrawal from their bond, —
 Theft, indeed murder, since they meant no
 less
 Whose last injunction to her simple self Had been — what parents' precept do you
 think?
 That she should follow after with all speed.
 Fly from her husband's house clandestinely, Join them at Rome again, but first of all Pick up a fresh companion in her flight,
 So putting youth and beauty to fit use, — Some gay dare-devil cloak-and-rapier
 spark Capable of adventure, — helped by whom She, some fine eve when lutes were in the
 air,
 Having put poison in the posset-cup,
 Laid hands on money, jewels and the like,
 And, to conceal the thing with more effect,
 By way of parting benediction too, Fired the house, — one would finish famously
 I' the tumult, slip out, scurry off and away
 And turn up merrily at home once more.
 Fact this, and not a dream o' the devil,
 Sir!
 And more than this, a fact none dare dispute,
 Word for word, such a letter did she write,
 And such the Abate read, nor simply read But gave all Rome to ruminate upon,
 In answer to such charges as, I say,
 The couple sought to be beforehand with.

The cause thus carried to the courts at
 Rome,
 Guido away, the Abate had no choice But stand forth, take his absent brother's
 part,
 Defend the honour of himself beside. 50 He made what head he might against the pair, Maintained Pompilia's birth legitimate And all her rights intact — hers, Guido's
 now:
 And so far by his policy turned their flank, (The enemy being beforehand in the place)
 That, — though the courts allowed the cheat for fact,
 Suffered Violante to parade her shame, Publish her infamy to heart's content,
 And let the tale o' the feigned birth pass for proved, — Yet they stopped there, refused to inter- 60
 vene
 And dispossess the innocents, befooled
 By gifts o' the guilty, at guilt's new caprice.
 They would not take away the dowry now Wrongfully given at first, nor bar at all Succession to the aforesaid usufruct, Established on a fraud, nor play the game Of Pietro's child and now not Pietro's
 child
 As it might suit the gamester's purpose.
 Thus
 Was justice ever ridiculed in Rome:
 Such be the double verdicts favoured here 70
 Which send away both parties to a suit Nor puffed up nor cast down, — for each a crumb
 Of right, for neither of them the whole loaf.
 Whence, on the Comparini's part, appeal—Counter-appeal on Guido's, — that's the
 game:
 And so the matter stands, even to this hour, Bandied as balls are in a tennis-court,
 And so might stand, unless some heart broke first,
 Till doomsday.

Leave it thus, and now revert 80
 To the old Arezzo whence we moved to Rome.
 We've had enough o' the parents, false or
 true,
 Now for a touch o' the daughter's quality.
 The start's fair henceforth, every obstacle Out of the young wife's footpath, she's
 alone,
 Left to walk warily now: how does she walk?
 Why, once a dwelling's threshold marked in and crossed
 In rubric by the enemy on his rounds
 As eligible, as fit place of prey, Baffle him henceforth, keep him out who 90
 can!

Stop up the door at the first hint of hoof, Presently at the window taps a horn,
And Satan's by your fireside, never
fear!

Pompilia, left alone now, found herself;
Found herself young too, sprightly, fair
enough,

Matched with a husband old beyond his
age

(Though that was something like four times her own)

Because of cares past, present and to
come:

Found too the house dull and its inmates
dead,

10 So, looked outside for light and life.

And love
Did in a trice turn up with life and light, —
The man with the aureole, sympathy made flesh,

The all-consoling Caponsacchi, Sir!

A priest — what else should the consoler
be?

With goodly shoulderblade and proper leg,
A portly make and a symmetric shape,
And curls that clustered to the tonsure quite.

This was a bishop in the bud, and now A canon full-blown so far: priest, and
priest

20 Nowise exorbitantly overworked, The courtly Christian, not so much Saint
Paul

As a saint of Cæsar's household: there posed he

Sending his god-glance after his shot shaft,

Apollo's turned Apollo, while the snake Pompilia writhed transfixed through all her spires.

He, not a visitor at Guido's house, Scarce an acquaintance, but in prime request

With the magnates of Arezzo, was seen
here,

Heard there, felt everywhere in Guido's
path

30 If Guido's wife's path be her husband's
too.

Now he threw comfits at the theatre
Into her lap, — what harm in Carnival?
Now he pressed close till his foot touched her gown,

His hand brushed hers, — how help on promenade?

And, ever on weighty business, found his steps

Incline to a certain haunt of doubtful fame

Which fronted Guido's palace by mere
chance;

While — how do accidents sometimes combine! —

Pompilia chose to cloister up her charms

Just in a chamber that o'erlooked the
street,

Sat there to pray, or peep thence at man-
kind.

This passage of arms and wits amused the
town.

At last the husband lifted eyebrow, — bent
On day-book and the study how to wring Half the due vintage from the worn-out vines

At the villa, tease a quarter the old rent From the farmstead, tenants swore would tumble soon, —

Pricked up his ear a-singing day and night With "ruin, ruin;" — and so surprised at
last —

Why, what else but a titter? Up he jumps.

Back to mind come those scratchings at the grange,

Prints of the paw about the outhouse;
rife

In his head at once again are word and
wink,

Mum here and *budget*¹ there, the smell o'
the fox,

The musk o' the gallant. "Friends, there's falseness here!"

The proper help of friends in such a strait Is waggery, the world over. Laugh him
free

O' the regular jealous-fit that's incident To all old husbands that wed brisk young wives,

And he'll go duly docile all his days. 60

"Somebody courts your wife, Count?
Where and when?"

"How and why? Mere horn-madness:
have a care!"

"Your lady loves her own room, sticks to it,

"Locks herself in for hours, you say your-
self.

"And — what, it's Caponsacchi means you harm?"

"The Canon? We caress him, he's the world's,

"A man of such acceptance — never
dream,

"Though he were fifty times the fox you
fear,

"He'd risk his brush for your particular chick,

"When the wide town's his hen-roost! 7 Fie o' the fool!"

So they dispensed their comfort of a kind.
Guido at last cried, "Something is in the
air,

"Under the earth, some plot against my
peace.

¹ Mum, budget: see Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, V. ii. 7.

"The trouble of eclipse hangs overhead;
 "How it should come of that officious orb
 "Your Canon in my system, you must say:
 "I say — that from the pressure of this
 spring
 "Began the chime and interchange of bells,
 "Ever one whisper, and one whisper more,
 "And just one whisper for the silvery last,
 "Till all at once a-row the bronze-throats burst
 "Into a larum both significant "And sinister: stop it I must and will.
 "Let Caponsacchi take his hand away "From the wire! — disport himself in other paths
 "Than lead precisely to my palace-gate, —
 "Look where he likes except one window's
 way
 "Where, cheek on hand, and elbow set on sill,
 "Happens to lean and say her litanies
 "Every day and all day long, just my wife — "Or wife and Caponsacchi may fare the
 worse!"
 Admire the man's simplicity, "I'll do this,
 "I'll not have that, I'll punish and prevent!" —
 'Tis easy saying. But to a fray, you see, Two parties go. The badger shows his teeth:
 The fox nor lies down sheep-like nor dares fight.
 Oh, the wife knew the appropriate warfare
 well,
 The way to put suspicion to the blush!
 At first hint of remonstrance, up and out I' the face of the world, you found her:
 she could speak,
 State her case, — Franceschini was a name, Guido had his full share of foes and
 friends —
 Why should not she call these to arbitrate?
 She bade the Governor do governance, Cried out on the Archbishop, — why,
 there now,
 Take him for sample! Three successive
 times,
 Had he to reconduct her by main-force
 From where she took her station opposite His shut door, — on the public steps
 thereto,
 Wringing her hands, when he came out to sec,
 And shrieking all her wrongs forth at his
 foot, —
 Back to the husband and the house she fled:
 Judge if that husband warmed him in the
 face
 Of friends or frowned on foes as heretofore!
 Judge if he missed the natural grin of folk,

Or lacked the customary compliment
 Of cap and bells, the luckless husband's fit!
 So it went on and on till — who was right?
 One merry April morning, Guido woke After the cuckoo, so late, near noonday,
 With an inordinate yawning of the jaws, Ears plugged, eyes gummed together, palate, tongue
 And teeth one mud-paste made of poppy- 54
 milk;
 And found his wife flown, his scritoire the
 worse
 For a rummage, — jewelry that was, was
 not,
 Some money there had made itself wings
 too, —
 The door lay wide and yet the servants slept Sound as the dead, or dosed which does
 as well.
 In short, Pompilia, she who, candid soul,
 Had not so much as spoken all her life To the Canon, nay, so much as peeped at
 him Between her fingers while she prayed in
 church, —
 This lamb-like innocent of fifteen years 60 (Such she was grown to by this time of day)
 Had simply put an opiate in the drink Of the whole household overnight, and
 then Got up and gone about her work secure, Laid hand on this waif and the other stray,
 Spoiled the Philistine and marched out of doors
 In company of the Canon who, Lord's
 love,
 What with his daily duty at the church,
 Nightly devoir where ladies congregate, Had something else to mind, assure your- 70
 self,
 Beside Pompilia, paragon though she be,
 Or notice if her nose were sharp or blunt!
 Well, anyhow, albeit impossible,
 Both of them were together jollily Jaunting it Rome-ward, half-way there by
 this,
 While Guido was left go and get undrugged, Gather his wits up, groaningly give thanks When neighbours crowded round him to condole.
 "Ah," quoth a gossip, "well I mind me
 now,
 "The Count did always say he thought he 80 felt
 "He feared as if this very chance might
 fall!
 "And when a man of fifty finds his corns
 "Ache and his joints throb, and foresees a storm,
 "Though neighbours laugh and say the sky
 is clear,

- "Let us henceforth believe him weather-wise!"
- Then was the story told, I'll cut you short:
All neighbours knew: no mystery in the world.
- The lovers left at nightfall — over night Had Caponsacchi come to carry off Pompilia, — not alone, a friend of his,
One Guillichini, the more conversant With Guido's housekeeping that he was just A cousin of Guido's and might play a prank —
- 10 (Have not you too a cousin that's a wag?)
— Lord and a Canon also, — what would you have?
Such are the red-clothed milk-swollen poppy-heads
That stand and stiffen 'mid the wheat o'
the Church! —
- This worthy came to aid, abet his best.
And so the house was ransacked, booty bagged,
The lady led downstairs and out of doors
Guided and guarded till, the city passed,
A carriage lay convenient at the gate.
Good bye to the friendly Canon; the loving
one
- 20 Could peradventure do the rest himself.
In jumps Pompilia, after her the priest,
"Whip, driver! Money makes the mar to go,
"And we've a bagful. Take the Roman road!"
So said the neighbours. This was eight hours since.
- Guido heard all, swore the befitting oaths, Shook off the relics of his poison-drench, Got horse, was fairly started in pursuit With never a friend to follow, found the track Fast enough, 'twas the straight Perugia
way,
- 30 Trod soon upon their very heels, too late
By a minute only at Camoscia, reached Chiusi, Foligno, ever the fugitives Just ahead, just out as he galloped in, Getting the good news ever fresh and
fresh,
Till, lo, at the last stage of all, last post Before Rome, — as we say, in sight of
Rome
And safety (there's impunity at Rome For priests, you know) at — what's the little place? — What some call Castelnuevo, some just call
- 40 The Osteria, because o' the post-house inn, There, at the journey's all but end, it seems, Triumph deceived them and undid them
both,
Secure they might foretaste felicity
Nor fear surprisal: so, they were surprised.
- There did they halt at early evening, there Did Guido overtake them: 'twas day-
break;
He came in time enough, not time too
much,
Since in the courtyard stood the Canon's
self
Urging the drowsy stable-grooms to haste Harness the horses, have the journey end, 54
The trifling four-hours'-running, so reach
Rome.
And the other runaway, the wife? Upstairs,
Still on the couch where she had spent the
night,
One couch in one room, and one room for
both.
So gained they six hours, so were lost
thereby.
- Sir, what's the sequel? Lover and beloved Fall on their knees? No impudence serves
here?
They beat their breasts and beg for easy
death,
Confess this, that and the other? — any-
how Confess there wanted not some likelihood 60
To the supposition so preposterous, That, O Pompilia, thy sequestered eyes Had noticed, straying o'er the prayer-book's edge,
More of the Canon than that black his coat, Buckled his shoes were, broad his hat of brim:
And that, O Canon, thy religious care Had breathed too soft a benedicite
To banish trouble from a lady's breast
So lonely and so lovely, nor so lean!
This you expect? Indeed, then, much 70 you err.
Not to such ordinary end as this Had Caponsacchi flung the cassock far, Doffed the priest, donned the perfect cavalier.
The die was cast: over shoes over boots:
And just as she, I presently shall show, Pompilia, soon looked Helen to the life, Reclumbent upstairs in her pink and white,
So, in the inn-yard, bold as 'twere Troy-
town,
There strutted Paris in correct costume, Cloak, cap and feather, no appointment 80 missed,
Even to a wicked-looking sword at side,
He seemed to find and feel familiar at.
Nor wanted words as ready and as big As the part he played, the bold abashless
one.
"I interposed to save your wife from death,
"Yourself from shame, the true and only
shame:
"Ask your own conscience else! — or,
failing that,

- "What I have done I answer, anywhere,
 "Here, if you will; you see I have a sword:
 "Or, since I have a tonsure as you taunt,
 "At Rome, by all means, — priests to try a priest.
 "Only, speak where your wife's voice can reply!"
 And then he fingered at the sword again.
 So, Guido called, in aid and witness both.
 The Public Force. The Commissary
 came,
 Officers also; they secured the priest;
 Then, for his more confusion, mounted up With him, a guard on either side, the stair.
 To the bed-room where still slept or feigned
 a sleep
 His paramour and Guido's wife: in burst
 The company and bade her wake and rise.
 Her defence? This. She woke, saw, sprang upright
 I' the midst and stood as terrible as truth, Sprang to her husband's side, caught at the
 sword
 That hung there useless, — since they held each hand
 O' the lover, had disarmed him properly, —
 And in a moment out flew the bright thing Full in the face of Guido: but for help O' the guards who held her back and pinioned her
 With pains enough, she had finished you my tale
 With a flourish of red all round it, pinked her man
 Prettily; but she fought them one to six.
 They stopped that, — but her tongue continued free:
 She spat forth such invective at her spouse, O'erfrothed him with such foam of mur-derer, Thief, pandar — that the popular tide soon turned,
 The favour of the very sbirri, straight Ebb'd from the husband, set toward his
 wife, People cried! "Hands off, pay a priest respect!" And "persecuting fiend" and "martyred
 saint"
 Began to lead a measure from lip to lip.
 But facts are facts and flinch not; stubborn things,
 And the question, "Prithee, friend, how comes my purse
 "I' the poke of you?" — admits of no
 reply.
 Here was a priest found out in masquerade,
 A wife caught playing truant if no more;
 While the Count, mortified in mien enough,
 And, nose to face, an added palm in length, Was plain writ "husband" every piece of
 him:
- Capture once made, release could hardly be.
 Beside, the prisoners both made appeal,
 "Take us to Rome!"
 Taken to Rome they were;
 The husband trooping after, piteously, Tail between legs, no talk of triumph
 now —
 No honour set firm on its feet once more On two dead bodies of the guilty, — nay,
 No dubious salve to honour's broken pate From chance that, after all, the hurt might seem
 A skin-deep matter, scratch that leaves no scar:
 For Guido's first search, — ferreting, poor
 soul,
 Here, there and everywhere in the vile
 place
 Abandoned to him when their backs were turned,
 Found, — furnishing a last and best regale, —
 All the love-letters bandied 'twixt the pair
 Since the first timid trembling into life
 O' the love-star till its stand at fiery full.
 Mad prose, mad verse, fears, hopes,
 triumph, despair, Avowal, disclaimer, plans, dates, names, — was nought
 Wanting to prove, if proof consoles at all,
 That this had been but the fifth act o' the
 piece
 Whereof the due proemium, months ago These playwrights had put forth, and ever
 since
 Matured the middle, added 'neath his nose.
 He might go cross himself: the case was clear.
 Therefore to Rome with the clear case;
 there plead
 Each party its best, and leave law do each
 right, Let law shine forth and show, as God in
 heaven,
 Vice prostrate, virtue pedestalled at last,
 The triumph of truth! What else shall glad our gaze
 When once authority has knit the brow
 And set the brain behind it to decide Between the wolf and sheep turned litigants?
 "This is indeed a business!" law shook
 head:
 "A husband charges hard things on a wife,
 "The wife as hard o' the husband: whose fault here?
 "A wife that flies her husband's house, does wrong:
 "The male friend's interference looks
 amiss,
 "Lends a suspicion: but suppose the wife,
 "On the other hand, be jeopardised at
 home —

- "Nay, that she simply hold, ill-groundedly,
 "An apprehension she is jeopardised, —
 "And further, if the friend partake the fear,
 "And, in a commendable charity
 "Which trusteth all, trust her that she mis-trusts, —
 "What do they but obey law — natural
 law?
 "Pretence may this be and a cloak for sin,
 "And circumstances that concur i' the close "Hint as much, loudly — yet scarce loud
 enough 10 "To drown the answer 'strange may yet be true:'
 "Innocence often looks like guiltiness.
 "The accused declare that in thought,
 word and deed,
 "Innocent were they both from first to last
 "As male-babe haply laid by female-babe
 "At church on edge of the baptismal font
 "Together for a minute, perfect-pure.
 "Difficult to believe, yet possible,
 "As witness Joseph, the friend's patron-
 saint.
 "The night at the inn — there charity nigh chokes 20 "Ere swallow what they both asseverate;
 "Though down the gullet faith may feel it
 go,
 "When mindful of what flight fatigued the
 flesh
 "Out of its faculty and fleshliness,
 "Subdued it to the soul, as saints assure:
 "So long a flight necessitates a fall
 "On the first bed, though in a lion's den,
 "And the first pillow, though the lion's
 back:
 "Difficult to believe, get possible.
 "Last come the letters' bundled beastli-
 ness —
 30 "Authority repugns give glance to — nay, "Turns head, and almost lets her whiplash fall;
 "Yet here a voice cries 'Respite!' from the clouds —
 "The accused, both in a tale, protest, dis-
 claim,
 "Abominate the horror: 'Not my hand'
 "Asserts the friend — 'Nor mine' chimes in the wife,
 "Seeing I have no hand, nor write at all,
 "Illiterate — for she goes on to ask,
 "What if the friend did pen now verse now prose,
 "Commend it to her notice now and then?
 40 "Twas pearls to swine: she read no more than wrote,
 "And kept no more than read, for as they fell
 "She ever brushed the burr-like things
 away,
 "Or, better, burned them, quenched the fire in smoke.
 "As for this fardel, filth and foolishness,
- "She sees it now the first time: burn it
 too!
 "While for his part the friend vows ignorance
 "Alike of what bears his name and bears hers:
 "Tis forgery, a felon's masterpiece,
 "And, as 'tis said the fox still finds the stench,
 "Home-manufacture and the husband's
 work.
 "Though he confesses, the ingenuous
 friend,
 "That certain missives, letters of a sort,
 "Flighty and feeble, which assigned themselves
 "To the wife, no less have fallen, far too
 oft,
 "In his path: wherefrom he understood just this —
 "That were they verily the lady's own,
 "Why, she who penned them, since he never saw
 "Save for one minute the mere face of her,
 "Since never had there been the inter-
 change
 "Of word with word between them all 60
 their life,
 "Why, she must be the fondest of the frail,
 "And fit, she for the 'apage'¹ he flung,
 "Her letters for the flame they went to feed!
 "But, now he sees her face and hears her
 speech,
 "Much he repents him if, in fancy-freak
 "For a moment the minutest measurable,
 "He coupled her with the first flimsy word
 "O' the self-spun fabric some mean spider-
 soul
 "Furnished forth: stop his films and stamp on him!
 "Never was such a tangled knottiness, 70
 "But thus authority cuts the Gordian
 through,
 "And mark how her decision suits the need!
 "Here's troublesomeness, scandal on both sides,
 "Plenty of fault to find, no absolute crime:
 "Let each side own its fault and make amends!
 "What does a priest in cavalier's attire
 "Consorting publicly with vagrant wives
 "In quarters close as the confessional,
 "Though innocent of harm? 'Tis harm
 enough:
 "Let him pay it, — say, be relegate a good 80
 "Three years, to spend in some place not too far
 "Nor yet too near, midway 'twixt near and far,
 "Rome and Arezzo, — Civita we choose,
 "Where he may lounge away time, live at
 large,

* Apage: "away with thee!"

' I, the poor sinner, fear I should have left
 "Sir Priest no nose-tip to turn up at me!"
 You, Sir, who listen but interpose no word, Ask yourself, had you borne a baiting thus?
 Was it enough to make a wise man mad?
 Oh, but I'll have your verdict at the end!

Well, not enough, it seems: such mere hurt
 falls,

Frets awhile, aches long, then grows less and less,

And so gets done with. Such was not the scheme

10 O' the pleasant Comparini: on Guido's
 wound

Ever in due succession, drop by drop, Came slow distilment from the alembic
 here

Set on to simmer by Canidian¹ hate, Corrosives keeping the man's misery raw.
 First fire-drop, — when he thought to make the best

O' the bad, to wring from out the sentence passed,

Poor, pitiful, absurd although it were,
 Yet what might eke him out result enough And make it worth while to have had the right

20 And not the wrong i' the matter judged at Rome.

Inadequate her punishment, no less Punished in some slight sort his wife had been;

Then, punished for adultery, what else?

On such admitted crime he thought to seize,
 And institute procedure in the courts

Which cut corruption of this kind from
 man,

Cast loose a wife proved loose and casta-
 way:

He claimed in due form a divorce at least.

This claim was met now by a counter claim 30 Pompilia sought divorce from bed and

 board

Of Guido, whose outrageous cruelty.

Whose mother's malice and whose brother's
 hate

Were just the white o' the charge, such dreadful depths

Blackened its centre, — hints of worse than
 hate,

Love from that brother, by that Guido's
 guile,

That mother's prompting. Such reply was made,

So was the engine loaded, wound up, sprung

On Guido, who received bolt full in breast;
 But no less bore up, giddily perhaps.

40 He had the Abate Paolo still in Rome,

Brother and friend and fighter on his side:
 They rallied in a measure, met the foe Manlike, joined battle in the public courts,
 As if to shame supine law from her sloth:
 And waiting her award, let beat the while Arezzo's banter, Rome's buffoonery,
 On this ear and on that ear, deaf alike, Safe from worse outrage. Let a scorpion nip,

And never mind till he contorts his tail!
 But there was sting i' the creature; thus it struck.

Guido had thought in his simplicity —
 That lying declaration of remorse, That story of the child which was no child And motherhood no motherhood at all, — That even this sin might have its sort of
 good

Inasmuch as no question more could be, —
 Call it false, call the story true, — no claim Of further parentage pretended now:

The parents had abjured all right, at
 least,

I' the woman owned his wife: to plead right still

Were to declare the abjuration false:

He was relieved from an⁷ fear henceforth Their hands might touch, their breath defile again

 Pompilia with his name upon her yet.

Well, no: the next news was, Pompilia's
 health

Demanded change after full three long weeks

Spent in devotion with the Sisterhood, — Which rendered sojourn, — so the court opined, —

 Too irksome, since the convent's walls were high

 And windows narrow, nor was air enough

7 Nor light enough, but all looked prison-
 like,

The last thing which had come in the court's head.

Propose a new expedient therefore, —
 this!

She had demanded — had obtained indeed,
 By intervention of her pitying friends

Or perhaps lovers — (beauty in distress, Beauty whose tale is the town-talk beside,

Never lacks friendship's arm about her neck) —

Obtained remission of the penalty.
 Permitted transfer to some private place

8 Where better air, more light, new food might soothe —

Incarcerated (call it, all the same) At some sure friend's house she must keep

inside,
 Be found in at requirement fast enough, — Domus pro carcere, in Roman style.

You keep the house i' the main, as most men do

And all good women: but free otherwise,

¹ Canidian: from Canidia, described by Horace as a malicious witch.

Should friends arrive, to lodge them and what not?

And such a domum, such a dwelling-place, Having all Rome to choose from, where chose she?

What house obtained Pompilia's preference?

Why, just the Comparini's — just, do you mark,

Theirs who renounced all part and lot in her

So long as Guido could be robbed thereby,
And only fell back on relationship

And found their daughter safe and sound again

o When that might surelier stab him: yes, the pair

Who, as I told you, first had baited hook
With this poor gilded fly Pompilia-thing, Then caught the fish, pulled Guido to the shore

And gutted him, — now found a further use

For the bait, would trail the gauze wings yet again

I' the way of what new swimmer passed their stand.

They took Pompilia to their hiding-place —
Not in the heart of Rome as formerly,

Under observance, subject to control — 20 But out o' the way, — or in the way, who knows?

That blind mute villa lurking by the gate
At Via Paullina, not so hard to miss

By the honest eye, easy enough to find In twilight by marauders: where perchance

Some muffled Caponsacchi might repair, Employ odd moments when he too tried change,

Found that a friend's abode was pleasanter Than relegation, penance and the rest.

Come, here's the last drop does its worst to wound:

30 Here's Guido poisoned to the bone, you say,

Your boasted still's full strain and strength not so!

One master-squeeze from screw shall bring to birth

The hoard i' the heart o' the toad, hell's quintessence.

He learned the true convenience of the change,

And why a convent lacks the cheerful hearts

And helpful hands which female straits require,

When, in the blind mute villa by the gate, Pompilia — what? sang, danced, saw company?

— Gave birth, Sir, to a child, his son and heir,

40 Or Guido's heir and Caponsacchi's son.

I want your word now: what do you say to this?

What would say little Arezzo and great Rome,

And what did God say and the devil say One at each ear o' the man, the husband,

now
The father? Why, the overburdened mind

Broke down, what was a brain became a blaze.

In fury of the moment — (that first news Fell on the Count among his vines, it seems,

Doing his farm-work,) — why, he summoned steward,

Called in the first four hard hands and 50 stout hearts

From field and furrow, poured forth his appeal,

Not to Rome's law and gospel any more,

But this clown with a mother or a wife,
That clodpole with a sister or a son:

And, whereas law and gospel held their peace,

What wonder if the sticks and stones cried out?

All five soon somehow found themselves at Rome,

At the villa door: there was the warmth and light —

The sense of life so just an inch inside —
Some angel must have whispered "One 60 more chance!"

He gave it: bade the others stand aside: Knocked at the door, — "Who is it knocks?" cried one.

"I will make," surely Guido's angel urged,

"One final essay, last experiment,
"Speak the word, name the name from out all names

"Which, if, — as doubtless strong illusions are,

"And strange disguisings whereby truth seems false,

"And, since I am but man, I dare not do "God's work until assured I see with

God, —

"If I should bring my lips to breathe that 70 name

"And they be innocent, — nay, by one mere touch

"Of innocence redeemed from utter guilt, —

"That name will bar the door and bid fate pass.

"I will not say 'It is a messenger,
"A neighbour, even a belated man,

"Much less your husband's friend, your husband's self."

"At such appeal the door is bound to ope.

"But I will say" — here's rhetoric and to spare!

Why, Sir, the stumbling-block is cursed and kicked,

Block though it be; the name that brought offence

Will bring offence: the burnt child dreads the fire

Although that fire feed on some taper-wick Which never left the altar nor singed a fly:

And had a harmless man tripped you by chance,

How would you wait him, stand or step aside,

When next you heard he rolled your way? Enough.

10 "Giuseppe Caponsacchi!" Guido cried;
And open flew the door: enough again.
Vengeance, you know, burst, like a mountain-wave

That holds a monster in it, over the house,
And wiped its filthy four walls free at last

With a wash of hell-fire, — father, mother, wife,

Killed them all, bathed his name clean in their blood,

And, reeking so, was caught, his friends and he,

Haled hither and imprisoned yesternight O' the day all this was.

Now, Sir, tale is told,

20 Of how the old couple come to lie in state Though hacked to pieces, — never, the expert say, So thorough a study of stabbing — while the wife

(Viper-like, very difficult to slay) Writhes still through every ring of her,

poor wretch,
At the Hospital hard by — survives, we'll

hope,
To somewhat purify her putrid soul

By full confession, make so much amends While time lasts; since at day's end die she

must.

For Caponsacchi, — why, they'll have him here,

30 As hero of the adventure, who so fit To figure in the coming Carnival?
'Twill make the fortune of whate'er saloon

Hears him recount, with helpful cheek, and eye

Hotly indignant now, now dewy-dimmed,
The incidents of flight, pursuit, surprise,

Capture, with hints of kisses all between — While Guido, wholly unromantic spouse,

No longer fit to laugh at since the blood
Gave the broad farce an all too brutal air,

40 Why, he, and those four luckless friends of his

May tumble in the straw this bitter day —
Laid by the heels i' the New Prison, I hear,

To bide their trial, since trial, and for the life,

Follows if but for form's sake: yes, indeed!

But with a certain issue: no dispute,
"Try him," bids law: formalities oblige:

But as to the issue, — look me in the face! —

If the law thinks to find them guilty, Sir, Master or men — touch one hair of the five,

Then I say in the name of all that's left

Of honour in Rome, civility i' the world Whereof Rome boasts herself the central

source, —
There's an end to all hope of justice more.

Astræa's¹ gone indeed, let hope go too!
Who is it dares impugn the natural law,

Deny God's word "the faithless wife shall die"?

What, are we blind? How can we fail to learn

This crowd of miseries make the man a mark,

Accumulate on one devoted head For our example? — yours and mine who

read
Its lesson thus — "Henceforward let none

dare
"Stand, like a natural in the public way,
"Letting the very urchins twitch his beard

"And tweak his nose, to earn a nickname

so,
"Be styled male-Grissel or else modern Job!"

Had Guido, in the twinkling of an eye,

Summed up the reckoning, promptly paid himself,

That morning when he came up with the pair

At the wayside inn, — exacted his just debt

By aid of what first mattock, pitchfork, 70 axe

Came to hand in the helpful stable-yard,
And with that axe, if providence so pleased,

Cloven each head, by some Rolando-stroke,

In one clean cut from crown to clavicle,² — Slain the priest-gallant, the wife-paramour,

Sticking, for all defence, in each skull's cleft

The rhyme and reason of the stroke thus dealt,

To-wit, those letters and last evidence Of shame, each package in its proper

place, —
Bidding, who pitied, undistend the 80 skulls, —

¹ Astræa: daughter of Zeus and Themis, whose departure from earth marked the ending of the golden age.

² Clavicle: collar-bone.

I say, the world had praised the man.

But no!

That were too plain, too straight, too simply just!

He hesitates, calls law forsooth to help.

And law, distasteful to who calls in law
When honour is beforehand and would serve,

What wonder if law hesitate in turn,
Plead her disuse to calls o' the kind, reply (Smiling a little) "Tis yourself assess

"The worth of what's lost, sum of damage done.

"What you touched with so light a fingertip,

"You whose concern it was to grasp the thing,

"Why must law gird herself and grapple with?

"Law, alien to the actor whose warm blood

"Asks heat from law whose veins run luke-warm milk, —

"What you dealt lightly with, shall law make out

"Heinous forsooth?"

Sir, what's the good of law
In a case o' the kind? None, as she all but says.

Call in law when a neighbour breaks your fence,

Cribs from your field, tampers with rent or lease,

Touches the purse or pocket, — but woos your wife?

No: take the old way trod when men were men!

Guido preferred the new path, — for his pains,

Stuck in a quagmire, floundered worse and worse

Until he managed somehow scramble back

Into the safe sure rutted road once more, Revenged his own wrong like a gentleman.

Once back 'mid the familiar prints, no doubt

He made too rash amends for his first fault, Vaulted too loftily over what barred him late,

And lit i' the mire again, — the common chance,

The natural over-energy: the deed Maladroit yields three deaths instead of one,

And one life left: for where's the Canon's corpse?

All which is the worse for Guido, but, be frank —

The better for you and me and all the world,

Husbands of wives, especially in Rome.
The thing is put right, in the old place, —

ay,

The rod hangs on its nail behind the door,

Fresh from the brine: a matter I commend

To the notice, during Carnival that's near, 40
Of a certain what's-his-name and jackanapes

Somewhat too civil of eves with lute and song

About a house here, where I keep a wife.
(You, being his cousin, may go tell him so.)

III.—THE OTHER HALF-ROME

ANOTHER day that finds her living yet, Little Pompilia, with the patient brow

And lamentable smile on those poor lips,
And, under the white hospital-array,

A flower-like body, to frighten at a bruise You'd think, yet now, stabbed through 50 and through again,

Alive i' the ruins. 'Tis a miracle.

It seems that, when her husband struck her first,

She prayed Madonna just that she might live

So long as to confess and be absolved;
And whether it was that, all her sad life

long
Never before successful in a prayer,

This prayer rose with authority too dread, —

Or whether, because earth was hell to her,
By compensation, when the blackness

broke
She got one glimpse of quiet and the cool 60

blue,
To show her for a moment such things

were, —
Or else, — as the Augustinian Brother

thinks,
The friar who took confession from her lip, —

When a probationary soul that moved From nobleness to nobleness, as she,

Over the rough way of the world, succumbs,

Bloodies its last thorn with unflinching foot,

The angels love to do their work betimes, Staunch some wounds here nor leave so much for God.

Who knows? However it be, confessed, 70

absolved,
She lies, with overplus of life beside

To speak and right herself from first to last,

Right the friend also, lamb-pure, lion-brave, Care for the boy's concerns, to save the son

From the sire, her two-weeks' infant orphaned thus,

And — with best smile of all reserved for him —

Pardon that sire and husband from the heart.

A miracle, so tell your Molinists!

There she lies in the long white lazaret-house.
 Rome has besieged, these two days, never doubt, Saint Anna's where she waits her death, to hear Though but the chink o' the bell, turn o' the hinge When the reluctant wicket opes at last,
 Lets in, on now this and now that pretence,
 Too many by half, — complain the men of art, —
 For a patient in such plight. The lawyers first Paid the due visit — justice must be done; 10 They took her witness, why the murder was.
 Then the priests followed properly, — a soul
 To shrive; 'twas Brother Celestine's own right,
 The same who noises thus her gifts abroad.
 But many more, who found they were old friends, Pushed in to have their stare and take their talk
 And go forth boasting of it and to boast.
 Old Monna Baldi chatters like a jay, Swears — but that, prematurely trundled out Just as she felt the benefit begin, 20 The miracle was snapped up by somebody, — Her palsied limb 'gan prick and promise life
 At touch o' the bedclothes merely, — how much more Had she but brushed the body as she tried!
 Cavalier Carlo — well, there's some excuse For him — Maratta who paints Virgins so — He too must fee the porter and slip by With pencil cut and paper squared, and straight There was he figuring away at face:
 "A lovelier face is not in Rome," cried he, 30 "Shaped like a peacock's egg, the pure as pearl,
 "That hatches you anon a snow-white chick."
 Then, oh that pair of eyes, that pendent hair, Black this and black the other! Mighty fine —
 But nobody cared ask to paint the same, Nor grew a poet over hair and eyes Four little years ago when, ask and have,
 The woman who wakes all this rapture leaped Flower-like from out her window long enough,
 As much uncomplimented as uncropped 40 By comers and goers in Via Vittoria:
 eh?

'Tis just a flower's fate: past parterre we trip, Till peradventure someone plucks our sleeve —
 "Yon blossom at the briar's end, that's the rose
 "Two jealous people fought for yesterday
 "And killed each other: see, there's undisturbed
 "A pretty pool at the root, of rival red!"
 Then cry we "Ah, the perfect paragon!"
 Then crave we "Just one keepsake-leaf for us!"
 Truth lies between: there's anyhow a child Of seventeen years, whether a flower or weed, Ruined: who did it shall account to Christ — Having no pity on the harmless life
 And gentle face and girlish form he found,
 And thus flings back. Go practise if you please With men and women: leave a child alone
 For Christ's particular love's sake! — so I say.
 Somebody, at the bedside, said much more,
 Took on him to explain the secret cause O' the crime: quoth he, "Such crimes are very rife,
 "Explode nor make us wonder now-a-days,
 "Seeing that Antichrist disseminates
 "That doctrine of the Philosophic Sin:
 "Molinos' sect will soon make earth too hot!"
 "Nay," groaned the Augustinian, "what's there new?
 "Crime will not fail to flare up from men's hearts
 "While hearts are men's and so born criminal;
 "Which one fact, always old yet ever new,
 "Accounts for so much crime that, for my part,
 "Molinos may go whistle to the wind
 "That waits outside a certain church, you know!"
 Though really it does seem as if she here, Pompilia, living so and dying thus,
 Has had undue experience how much crime A heart can hatch. Why was she made to learn — Not you, not I, not even Molinos' self — What Guido Franceschini's heart could hold?
 Thus saintship is effected probably;
 No sparing saints the process! — which the more Tends to the reconciling us, no saints,
 To sinnership, immunity and all.

For see now: Pietro and Violante's life Till seventeen years ago, all Rome might note

And quote for happy — see the signs distinct

Of happiness as we yon Triton's¹ trump.
What could they be but happy? — balanced so,

Nor low i' the social scale nor yet too high,
Nor poor nor richer than comports with ease,

Nor bright and envied, nor obscure and scorned,

Nor so young that their pleasures fell too thick,

c Nor old past catching pleasure when it fell, Nothing above, below the just degree,
All at the mean where joy's components mix.
So again, in the couple's very souls
You saw the adequate half with half to match,

Each having and each lacking somewhat, both

Making a whole that had all and lacked nought.

The round and sound, in whose composure just

The acquiescent and recipient side Was Pietro's, and the stirring striving one Violante's: both in union gave the due Quietude, enterprise, craving and content, Which go to bodily health and peace of mind.

But, as 'tis said a body, rightly mixed,
Each element in equipoise, would last Too long and live for ever, — accordingly Holds a germ — sand-grain weight too much i' the scale —

Ordained to get predominance one day
And so bring all to ruin and release, — Not otherwise a fatal germ lurked here:
"With mortals much must go, but something stays;

"Nothing will stay of our so happy selves."

Out of the very ripeness of life's core
A worm was bred — "Our life shall leave no fruit."

Enough of bliss, they thought, could bliss bear seed,

Yield its like, propagate a bliss in turn
And keep the kind up; not supplant themselves

But put in evidence, record they were,
Show them, when done with, i' the shape of a child.

"'Tis in a child, man and wife grow complete, io "One flesh: God says so: let him do his work!"

¹ Yon Triton: see Book I. p. 660, l. 78. The speaker is represented as being in the Piazza Barberini, near Bernini's fountain, composed of a Triton supported by dolphins.

Now, one reminder of this gnawing want,
One special prick o' the maggot at the core,
Always befell when, as the day came round,
A certain yearly sum, — our Pietro being,
As the long name runs, an usufructuary, — Dropped in the common bag as interest Of money, his till death, not afterward, Failing an heir: an heir would take and take,

A child of theirs be wealthy in their place
To nobody's hurt — the stranger else³⁰ seized all.

Prosperity rolled river-like and stopped, Making their mill go; but when wheel wore out,

The wave would find a space and sweep on free

And, half-a-mile off, grind some neighbour's corn.

Adam-like, Pietro sighed and said no more:
Eve saw the apple was fair and good to taste,

So, plucked it, having asked the snake advice.

She told her husband God was merciful,
And his and her prayer granted at the last:
Let the old mill-stone moulder, — wheel⁶⁰ unworn,

Quartz from the quarry, shot into the stream

Adroitly, as before should go bring grist —
Their house continued to them by an heir,
Their vacant heart replenished with a child.

We have her own confession at full length Made in the first remorse: 'twas Jubilee Pealed in the ear o' the conscience and it woke.

She found she had offended God no doubt,
So much was plain from what had happened since,

Misfortune on misfortune; but she harmed⁷⁰ no one i' the world, so far as she could see.

The act had gladdened Pietro to the height,
Her spouse whom God himself must gladden so

Or not at all: thus much seems probable From the implicit faith, or rather say Stupid credulity of the foolish man Who swallowed such a tale nor strained a whit

Even at his wife's far-over-fifty years Matching his sixty-and-under. Him she blessed;

And as for doing any detriment⁸⁰
To the veritable heir, — why, tell her first Who was he? Which of all the hands held up

I' the crowd, one day would gather round their gate,

Did she so wrong by intercepting thus The due, spendthrift fortune thought to flit?

- For a scramble just to make the mob break shins?
She kept it, saved them kicks and cuffs
thereby.
While at the least one good work had she wrought,
Good, clearly and incontestably! Her cheat —
What was it to its subject, the child's self,
But charity and religion? See the girl!
A body most like — a soul too probably — Doomed to death, such a double death as waits
The illicit offspring of a common trull, 10 Sure to resent and forthwith rid herself
Of a mere interruption to sin's trade,
In the efficacious way old Tiber knows.
Was not so much proved by the ready sale O' the child, glad transfer of this irksome
chance?
Well then, she had caught up this castaway:
This fragile egg, some careless wild bird dropped,
She had picked from where it waited the foot-fall,
And put in her own breast till forth broke finch Able to sing God praise on mornings now.
20 What so excessive harm was done? — she asked.
To which demand the dreadful answer
comes —
For that same deed, now at Lorenzo's
church,
Both agents, conscious and unconscious,
lie;
While she, the deed was done to benefit,
Lies also, the most lamentable of things, Yonder where curious people count her breaths,
Calculate how long yet the little life Unspilt may serve their turn nor spoil the
show,
Give them their story, then the church its group.
30 Well, having gained Pompilia, the girl
grew
I' the midst of Pietro here, Violante there, Each, like a semicircle with stretched arms, Joining the other round her preciousness —
Two walls that go about a garden-plot Where a chance sliver, branchlet split from bole
Of some tongue-leaved eye-figured Eden
tree,
Filched by two exiles and borne far away, Patiently glorifies their solitude, — Year by year mounting, grade by grade surmount 40 The builded brick-work, yet is compassed
still,
Still hidden happily and shielded safe, —
- Else why should miracle have graced the
ground?
But on the twelfth sun that brought April
there What meant that laugh? The coping-stone was reached:
Nay, above towered a light tuft of bloom
To be toyed with by butterfly or bee, Done good to or else harm to from outside: Pompilia's root, stalk and a branch or
two Home enclosed still, the rest would be the world's.
All which was taught our couple though 5
obtuse,
Since walls have ears, when one day brought
a priest,
Smooth-mannered soft-speeched sleekcheeked visitor,
The notable Abate Paolo — known As younger brother of a Tuscan house Whereof the actual representative, Count Guido, had employed his youth and
age
In culture of Rome's most productive plant —
A cardinal: but years pass and change
comes,
In token of which, here was our Paolo brought To broach a weighty business. Might he 6
speak?
Yes — to Violante somehow caught alone
While Pietro took his after-dinner doze,
And the young maiden, busily as befits, Minded her broider-frame three chambers
off.
So — giving now his great flap-hat a gloss With flat o' the hand between-whiles, soothing now
The silk from out its creases o'er the calf, Setting the stocking clerical again,
But never disengaging, once engaged,
The thin clear grey hold of his eyes on
her —
He dissertated on that Tuscan house, Those Franceschini, — very old they
were —
Not rich however — oh, not rich, at least,
As people look to be who, low i' the scale
One way, have reason, rising all they can By favour of the money-bag! 'tis fair — Do all gifts go together? But don't suppose
That being not so rich means all so poor!
Say rather, well enough — i' the way, in-
deed,
Ha, ha, to fortune better than the best:
Since if his brother's patron-friend kept
faith,
Put into promised play the Cardinalate, Their house might wear the red cloth that keeps warm.

Would but the Count have patience — there's the point!

For he was slipping into years apace,
And years make men restless — they needs must spy

Some certainty, some sort of end assured, Some sparkle, tho' from topmost beacon-tip,

That warrants life a harbour through the haze.

In short, call him fantastic as you choose, Guido was home-sick, yearned for the old sights

And usual faces, — fain would settle himself

10 And have the patron's bounty when it fell Irrigate far rather than deluge near,
Go fertilise Arezzo, not flood Rome.

Sooth to say, 'twas the wiser wish: the
Count

Proved wanting in ambition, — let us avouch,

Since truth is best, — in callousness of
heart,

And winced at pin-pricks whereby honours hang

A ribbon o'er each puncture: his — no
soul

Ecclesiastic (here the hat was brushed) Humble but self-sustaining, calm and cold, 20 Having, as one who puts his hand to the plough,

Renounced the over-vivid family-feel — Poor brother Guido! All too plain, he pined

Amid Rome's pomp and glare for dingi-
ness

And that dilapidated palace-shell Vast as a quarry and, very like, as bare —

Since to this comes old grandeur now-a-
days —

Or that absurd wild villa in the waste O' the hill side, breezy though, for who likes air,

Vittiano, nor unpleasant with its vines, 30 Outside the city and the summer heats.

And now his harping on this one tense chord

The villa and the palace, palace this
And villa the other, all day and all night

Creaked like the implacable cicala's cry
And made one's ear-drum ache: nought else would serve

But that, to light his mother's visage up With second youth, hope, gaiety again,

He must find straightway, woo and haply win

And bear away triumphant back some wife.

40 Well now, the man was rational in his way
He, the Abate, — ought he to interpose?

Unless by straining still his tutelage (Priesthood leaps over elder-brothership)

Across this difficulty: then let go,

Leave the poor fellow in peace! Would that be wrong?

There was no making Guido great, it
seems,

Spite of himself: then happy be his dole!
Indeed, the Abate's little interest

Was somewhat nearly touched i' the case they saw:

Since if his simple kinsman so were bent, 50
Began his rounds in Rome to catch a wife,

Full soon would such unworldliness surprise

The rare bird, sprinkle salt on phoenix' tail,
And so secure the nest a sparrow-hawk.

No lack of mothers here in Rome, — no
dread

Of daughters lured as larks by lookingglass!

The first name-pecking credit-scratching fowl

Would drop her unfledged cuckoo in our nest

To gather greyness there, give voice at length

And shame the brood . . . but it was long 60
ago

When crusades were, and we sent eagles
forth!

No, that at least the Abate could forestall.
He read the thought within his brother's
word,

Knew what he purposed better than himself.

We want no name and fame — having our
own:

No worldly aggrandisement — such we
fly:

But if some wonder of a woman's-heart
Were yet untainted on this grimy earth,

Tender and true — tradition tells of such — Prepared to pant in time and tune with 70
ours —

If some good girl (a girl, since she must
take

The new bent, live new life, adopt new modes)

Not wealthy (Guido for his rank was poor)
But with whatever dowry came to hand, —

There were the lady-love predestinate!
And somehow the Abate's guardian eye —

Scintillant, rutilant, fraternal fire, — Roving round every way had seized the prize

— The instinct of us, we, the spirituality!
Come, cards on table; was it true or false 80

That here — here in this very tenement — Yea, Via Vittoria did a marvel hide,

Lily of a maiden, white with intact leaf Guessed thro' the sheath that saved it from the sun?

A daughter with the mother's hands still clasped

Over her head for fillet virginal,

A wife worth Guido's house and hand and heart?

He came to see; had spoken, he could no less —

(A final cherish of the stockinged calf)
If harm were, — well, the matter was off his mind.

Then with the great air did he kiss, devout, Violante's hand, and rise up his whole height

(A certain purple gleam about the black)
And go forth grandly, — as if the Pope came next.

And so Violante rubbed her eyes awhile, 10 Got up too, walked to wake her Pietro soon
And pour into his ear the mighty news
How somebody had somehow somewhere seen

Their tree-top-tuft of bloom above the wall,

And came now to apprise them the tree's self

Was no such crab-sort as should go feed swine,

But veritable gold, the Hesperian ball¹ Ordained for Hercules to haste and pluck,
And bear and give the Gods to banquet with —

Hercules standing ready at the door.

20 Whereon did Pietro rub his eyes in turn, Look very wise, a little woeful too,
Then, periwig on head, and cane in hand,

Sally forth dignifiedly into the Square Of Spain² across Babbuino the six steps, Toward the Boat-fountain where our idler's lounge, —

Ask, for form's sake, who Hercules might be,

And have congratulation from the world.

Heartily laughed the world in his fool's-face

And told him Hercules was just the heir

30 To the stubble once a corn-field, and brick-heap

Where used to be a dwelling-place now burned.

Guido and Franceschini; a Count, — ay:
But a cross³ i' the poke to bless the Countship? No!

All gone except sloth, pride, rapacity, Humours of the imposthume incident

¹ The Hesperian ball: the golden apple which Hercules was required to fetch from the garden of the Hesperides.

² The Square of Spain: the Piazza di Spagna, in the present "English quarter" of Rome. The Via del Babuino runs into it, and the "Boat-fountain" (Fontana della Barcaccia) stands in it.

³ Cross: i.e., a coin; an old expression, found in Goldsmith, Dryden, and earlier writers.

To rich blood that runs thin, — nursed to a head

By the rankly-salted soil — a cardinal's court

Where, parasite and picker-up of crumbs,
He had hung on long, and now, let go, said some,

Shaken off, said others, — but in any case 40

Tired of the trade and something worse for wear,

Was wanting to change town for country quick,

Go home again: let Pietro help him home!

The brother, Abate Paolo, shrewder mouse,

Had pricked for comfortable quarters, inched

Into the core of Rome, and fattened so;

But Guido, over-burly for rat's hole

Suited to clerical slimness, starved outside, Must shift for himself: and so the shift was this!

What, was the snug retreat of Pietro 50 tracked,

The little provision for his old age snuffed?

"Oh, make your girl a lady, an you list,

"But have more mercy on our wit than vaunt

"Your bargain as we burgesses who brag!

"Why, Goodman Dullard, if a friend must speak,

"Would the Count, think you, stoop to you and yours

"Were there the value of one penny-piece

"To rattle 'twixt his palms — or likelier laugh,

"Bid your Pompilia help you black his shoe?"

Home again, shaking oft the puzzled pate, 60

Went Pietro to announce a change indeed,

Yet point Violante where some solace lay

Of a rueful sort, — the taper, quenched so soon,

Had ended merely in a snuff, not stink —

Congratulate there was one hope the less

Not misery the more: and so an end.

The marriage thus impossible, the rest followed: our spokesman, Paolo, heard his fate,

Resignedly Count Guido bore the blow:

Violante wiped away the transient tear, 70

Renounced the playing Danaë to gold dreams,

Praised much her Pietro's prompt sagaciousness,

Found neighbours' envy natural, lightly laughed

At gossips' malice, fairly wrapped herself

In her integrity three folds about,

And, letting pass a little day or two,

Threw, even over that integrity,

Another wrappage, namely one thick veil

That hid her, matron-wise, from head to foot,

And, by the hand holding a girl veiled too,
Stood, one dim end of a December day,
In Saint Lorenzo on the altar-step — Just where she lies now and that girl will
lie —

Only with fifty candles' company
Now, in the place of the poor winking one Which saw, — doors shut and sacristan made sure, —

A priest — perhaps Abate Paolo — wed 10 Guido clandestinely, irrevocably To his Pompilia aged thirteen years And five months, — witness the church register, —

Pompilia, (thus become Count Guido's wife Clandestinely, irrevocably his,)

Who all the while had borne, from first to
last,

As brisk a part i' the bargain, as yon lamb, Brought forth from basket and set out for sale,

Bears while they chaffer, wary market-man And voluble housewife, o'er it, — each in
turn

20 Patting the curly calm unconscious head, With the shambles ready round the corner
there,

When the talk's talked out and a bargain
struck.

Transfer complete, why, Pietro was apprised.

Violante sobbed the sobs and prayed the prayers

And said the serpent tempted so she fell, Till Pietro had to clear his brow apace And make the best of matters: wrath at
first, —

How else? pacification presently, Why not? — could flesh withstand the impurpled one,

30 The very Cardinal, Paolo's patron-friend?
Who, justifiably surnamed "a hinge,"¹ Knew where the mollifying oil should drop To cure the creak o' the valve, — considerate

For frailty, patient in a naughty world.
He even volunteered to supervise The rough draught of those marriage-articles

Signed in a hurry by Pietro, since revoked:

Trust's politic, suspicion does the harm,
There is but one way to brow-beat this
world,

40 Dumb-founder doubt, and repay scorn in
kind, —

To go on trusting, namely, till faith move Mountains.

¹ A hinge: the title Cardinal is derived from cardo, "a hinge."

And faith here made the mountains move.

Why, friends whose zeal cried "Caution ere too late!" —

Bade "Pause ere jump, with both feet joined, on slough!" —

Counselled "If rashness then, now temperance!" —

Heard for their pains that Pietro had closed
eyes,

Jumped and was in the middle of the mire, Money and all, just what should sink a
man.

By the mere marriage, Guido gained forth-
with

Dowry, his wife's right; no rescinding 50
there:

But Pietro, why must he needs ratify One gift Violante gave, pay down one doit Promised in first fool's-flurry? Grasp the bag

Lest the son's service flag, — is reason and rhyme,

Above all when the son's a son-in-law.
Words to the wind! The parents cast their lot

Into the lap o' the daughter: and the son Now with a right to lie there, took what
fell,

Pietro's whole having and holding, house and field,

Goods, chattels and effects, his worldly 60
worth

Present and in perspective, all renounced In favour of Guido. As for the usufruct —
The interest now, the principal anon, Would Guido please to wait, at Pietro's
death:

Till when, he must support the couple's
charge,

Bear with them, housemates, pensionaries, pawned

To an alien for fulfilment of their pact.
Guido should at discretion deal them orts,²

Bread-bounty in Arezzo the strange
place, —

They who had lived deliciously and rolled 70 Rome's choicest comfit 'neath the tongue
before.

Into this quag, "jump" bade the Cardinal!
And neck-deep in a minute there flounced
they.

But they touched bottom at Arezzo:
there —

Four months' experience of how craft and greed

Quickened by penury and pretentious hate Of plain truth, brutify and bestialise, —

Four months' taste of apportioned insolence,

Cruelty graduated, dose by dose

² Orts: scraps.

- Of ruffianism dealt out at bed and board,
And lo, the work was done, success clapped
hands.
The starved, stripped, beaten brace of stupid dupes
Broke at last in their desperation loose, Fled away for their lives, and lucky so;
Found their account in casting coat afar
And bearing off a shred of skin at least:
Left Guido lord o' the prey, as the lion is,
And, careless what came after, carried their wrongs
- 10 To Rome, — I nothing doubt, with such remorse
As folly feels, since pain can make it wise, But crime, past wisdom, which is innocence,
Needs not be plagued with till a later day.
- Pietro went back to beg from door to door,
In hope that memory not quite extinct Of cheery days and festive nights would move
Friends and acquaintance — after the natural laugh,
And tributary "Just as we foretold —" To show some bowels, give the dregs o' the
cup,
- 20 Scraps of the trencher, to their host that
was,
Or let him share the mat with the mastiff,
he
Who lived large and kept open house so
long.
Not so Violante: ever ahead i' the march,
Quick at the bye-road and the cut-across,
She went first to the best adviser, God — Whose finger unmistakably was felt In all this retribution of the past.
Here was the prize of sin, luck of a lie!
But here too was what Holy Year would
help,
- 30 Bound to rid sinners of sin vulgar, sin Abnormal, sin prodigious, up to sin Impossible and supposed for Jubilee'
sake:
To lift the leadenest of lies, let soar
The soul unhampered by a feather-weight.
"I will" said she "go burn out this bad hole
"That breeds the scorpion, baulk the plague at least
"Of hope to further plague by progeny:
"I will confess my fault, be punished, yes,
"But pardoned too: Saint Peter pays for
all."
- 40 So, with the crowd she mixed, made for the
dome,
Through the great door new-broken for the nonce
Marched, muffled more than ever matron-
wise,
Up the left nave to the formidable throne,
- Fell into file with this the poisoner
And that the parricide, and reached in turn The poor repugnant Penitentiary Set at this gully-hole o' the world's discharge
To help the frightfullest of filth have vent, And then knelt down and whispered in his ear
How she had bought Pompilia, palmed the 54
babe
On Pietro, passed the girl off as their child To Guido, and defrauded of his due This one and that one, — more than she could name,
Until her solid piece of wickedness Happened to split and spread woe far and
wide: Contritely now she brought the case for cure.
- Replied the throne — "Ere God forgive the guilt,
"Make man some restitution! Do your
part!
"The owners of your husband's heritage,
"Barred thence by this pretended birth and 64
heir, —
"Tell them, the bar came so, is broken so,
"Theirs be the due reversion as before!
"Your husband who, no partner in the guilt,
"Suffers the penalty, led blindfold thus
"By love of what he thought his flesh and blood
"To alienate his all in her behalf, —
"Tell him too such contract is null and void!
"Last, he who personates your son-in-law,
"Who with sealed eyes and stopped ears, tame and mute
"Took at your hand that bastard of a 74
whore
"You called your daughter and he calls
his wife, —
"Tell him, and bear the anger which is just!
"Then, penance so performed, may pardon
be!"
- Who could gainsay this just and right
award?
Nobody in the world: but, out o' the world,
Who knows? — might tim'd intervention
be
From any makeshift of an angel-guide, Substitute for celestial guardianship, Pretending to take care of the girl's self:
"Woman, confessing crime is healthy work, 80
"And telling truth relieves a liar like you,
"But how of my quite unconsidered charge?
"No thought if, while this good befalls
yourself,
"Aught in the way of harm may find out
her?"

No least thought, I assure you: truth being
truth,
Tell it and shame the devil!
Said and done:
Home went Violante, disbosomed all:
And Pietro who, six months before, had borne
Word after word of such a piece of news Like so much cold steel inched through his breast-blade,
Now at its entry gave a leap for joy,
As who — what did I say of one in a quag? — Should catch a hand from heaven and spring thereby 10 Out of the mud, on ten toes stand once
more.
"What? All that used to be, may be again?
"My money mine again, my house, my
land,
"My chairs and tables, all mine evermore?
"What, the girl's dowry never was the girl's,
"And, unpaid yet, is never now to pay?
"Then the girl's self, my pale Pompilia
child
"That used to be my own with her great
eyes —
"He who drove us forth, why should he keep her
"When proved as very a pauper as himself?
20 "Will she come back, with nothing changed
at all,
"And laugh 'But how you dreamed uneasily!
"I saw the great drops stand here on your
brow —
"Did I do wrong to wake you with a kiss?
"No, indeed, darling! No, for wide awake
"I see another outburst of surprise:
"The lout-lord, bully-beggar, braggartsneak,
"Who not content with cutting purse, crops
ear —
"Assuredly it shall be salve to mine
"When this great news red-letters him, the rogue!
30 "Ay, let him taste the teeth o' the trap, this fox,
"Give us our lamb back, golden fleece and
all,
"Let her creep in and warm our breasts
again!
"Why care for the past? We three are our old selves,
"And know now what the outside world is
worth."
And so, he carried case before the courts;
And there Violante, blushing to the bone,
Made public declaration of her fault, Renounced her motherhood, and prayed
the law
To interpose, frustrate of its effect 40 Her folly, and redress the injury done.

Whereof was the disastrous consequence,
That though indisputably clear the case (For thirteen years are not so large a lapse,
And still six witnesses survived in Rome To prove the truth o' the tale) — yet, patent wrong Seemed Guido's; the first cheat had chanced on him:
Here was the pity that, deciding right, Those who began the wrong would gain
the prize.
Guido pronounced the story one long lie Lied to do robbery and take revenge: 54
Or say it were no lie at all but truth, Then, it both robbed the right heirs and shamed him Without revenge to humanise the deed:
What had he done when first they shamed him thus?
But that were too fantastic: losels they,
And leasing this world's-wonder of a lie, They lied to blot him though it brand themselves.
So answered Guido through the Abate's
mouth.
Wherefore the court, its customary way, Inclined to the middle course the sage 60 affect.
They held the child to be a changeling, —
good:
But, lest the husband got no good thereby,
They willed the dowry, though not hers at
all,
Should yet be his, if not by right then
grace —
Part-payment for the plain injustice done.
As for that other contract, Pietro's work, Renunciation of his own estate,
That must be cancelled — give him back his gifts,
He was no party to the cheat at least!
So ran the judgment: — whence a prompt 70
appeal
On both sides, seeing right is absolute.
Cried Pietro, "Is the child no child of
mine?
"Why give her a child's dowry?" — "Have I right
"To the dowry, why not to the rest as
well?"
Cried Guido, or cried Paolo in his name!
Till law said "Reinvestigate the case!"
And so the matter pends, to this same day.
Hence new disaster — here no outlet seemed;
Whatever the fortune of the battle-field, No path whereby the fatal man might 80
march Victorious, wreath on head and spoils in
hand,
And back turned full upon the baffled
foe, —

Nor cranny whence, desperate and disgraced, Stripped to the skin, he might be fain to crawl

Worm-like, and so away with his defeat
To other fortune and a novel prey.

No, he was pinned to the place there, left alone

With his immense hate and, the solitary Subject to satisfy that hate, his wife.

"Cast her off? Turn her naked out of doors?

"Easily said! But still the action pends, 10 "Still dowry, principal and interest,

"Pietro's possessions, all I bargained for, —

"Any good day, be but my friends alert,

"May give them me if she continue mine.

"Yet, keep her? Keep the puppet of my foci —

"Her voice that lisps me back their curse — her eye

"They lend their leer of triumph to — her lip

"I touch and taste their very filth upon?"

In short, he also took the middle course Rome taught him — did at last excogitate

20 How he might keep the good and leave the bad

Twined in revenge, yet extricable, — nay
Make the very hate's eruption, very rush

Of the unpent sluice of cruelty relieve

His heart first, then go fertilise his field.

What if the girl-wife, tortured with due care,

Should take, as though spontaneously, the road

It were impolitic to thrust her on?

If, goaded, she broke out in full revolt,
Followed her parents i' the face o' the world,

30 Branded as runaway not castaway, Self-sentenced and self-punished in the act?

So should the loathed form and detested face

Launch themselves into hell and there be lost

While he looked o'er the brink with folded arms;

So should the heaped-up shames go shuddering back

O' the head o' the heapers, Pietro and his wife,

And bury in the breakage three at once:
While Guido, left free, no one right renounced,

Gain present, gain prospective, all the gain,

40 None of the wife except her rights absorbed, Should ask law what it was law paused

about —

If law were dubious still whose word to take,
The husband's — dignified and derelict,

Or the wife's — the . . . what I tell you.

It should be.

Guido's first step was to take pen, indite
A letter to the Abate, — not his own,

His wife's, — she should re-write, sign, seal and send.

She liberally told the household-news,
Rejoiced her vile progenitors were gone, Revealed their malice — how they even 50 laid

A last injunction on her, when they fled,
That she should forthwith find a paramour,

Complot with him to gather spoil enough, Then burn the house down, — taking previous care

To poison all its inmates overnight, —

And so companioned, so provisioned too, Follow to Rome and there join fortunes

gay.

This letter, traced in pencil-characters;
Guido as easily got re-traced in ink

By his wife's pen, guided from end to end, 60
As if it had been just so much Chinese.

For why? That wife could broider, sing
perhaps,

Pray certainly, but no more read than write This letter "which yet write she must," he

said,
"Being half courtesy and compliment,

"Half sisterliness: take the thing on trust!"

She had as readily re-traced the words Of her own death-warrant, — in some sort 'twas so.

This letter the Abate in due course Communicated to such curious souls 70

In Rome as needs must pry into the cause Of quarrel, why the Comparini fled

The Franceschini, whence the grievance
grew,

What the hubbub meant: "Nay, — see the wife's own word,

"Authentic answer! Tell detractors too
"There's a plan formed, a programme figured here

"— Pray God no after-practice put to

proof,
"This letter cast no light upon, one day!"

So much for what should work in Rome:
back now

To Arezzo, follow up the project there, 80 Forward the next step with as bold a

foot,

And plague Pompilia to the height, you see!
Accordingly did Guido set himself

To worry up and down, across, around,
The woman, hemmed in by her household-

bars, — -
Chase her about the coop of daily life,

Having first stopped each outlet thence save one

Which, like bird with a ferret in her haunt,
She needs must seize as sole way of escape

Though there was tied and twittering a 90 decoy

To seem as if it tempted, — just the plume
O' the popinjay, not a real respite there From tooth and claw of something in the dark, —

Giuseppe Caponsacchi

Now begins

The tenebrific passage of the tale:
How hold a light, display the cavern's gorge?

How, in this phase of the affair, show truth?
Here is the dying wife who smiles and says
"So it was, — so it was not, — how it was,

10 "I never knew nor ever care to know —"
Till they all weep, physician, man of law, Even that poor old bit of battered brass Beaten out of all shape by the world's sins, Common utensil of the lazar-house — Confessor Celestino groans "'Tis truth, "All truth and only truth: there's something here,

"Some presence in the room beside us all,
"Something that every lie expires before:
"No question she was pure from first to last."

20 So far is well and helps us to believe:
But beyond, she the helpless, simple-sweet Or silly-sooth, unskilled to break one blow
At her good fame by putting finger forth, —
How can she render service to the truth?
The bird says "So I fluttered where a springe

"Caught me: the springe did not contrive
itself,

"That I know: who contrived it, God forgive!"

But we, who hear no voice and have dry
eyes,

Must ask, — we cannot else, absolving
her, —

30 How of the part played by that same decoy I' the catching, caging? Was himself caught first?

We deal here with no innocent at least,
No witless victim, — he's a man of the
age

And priest beside, — persuade the mocking
world

Mere charity boiled over in this sort!

He whose own safety too, — (the Pope's apprised —

Good-natured with the secular offence, The Pope looks grave on priesthood in a scrape)

Our priest's own safety therefore, may-be
life,

40 Hangs on the issue! You will find it hard.
Guido is here to meet you with fixed foot, Stiff like a statue — "Leave what went
before!

"My wife fled i' the company of a priest,
"Spent two days and two nights alone with
him:

"Leave what came after!" He stands hard to throw.

Moreover priests are merely flesh and
blood;

When we get weakness, and no guilt beside,
'Tis no such great ill-fortune: finding grey,
We gladly call that white which might be
black,

'Too used to the double-dye. So, if the 54
priest,

Moved by Pompilia's youth and beauty,
gave

Way to the natural weakness. . . . Anyhow Here be facts, character; what they spell Determine, and thence pick what sense you may!

There was a certain young bold handsome
priest

Popular in the city, far and wide Famed, since Arezzo's but a little place, As the best of good companions, gay and grave

At the decent minute; settled in his stall,
Or sidling, lute on lap, by lady's couch, 60

Ever the courtly Canon; see in him
A proper star to climb and culminate, Have its due handbreadth of the heaven at Rome,

Though meanwhile pausing on Arezzo's
edge,
As modest candle does 'mid mountain fog,
To rub off redness and rusticity

Ere it sweep chastened, gain the silver-
sphere!
Whether through Guido's absence or what
else,

This Caponsacchi, favourite of the town,
Was yet no friend of his nor free o' the 70
house,

Though both moved in the regular magnates' march:

Each must observe the other's tread and halt

At church, saloon, theatre, house of play.
Who could help noticing the husband's slouch,

The black of his brow — or miss the news that buzzed

Of how the little solitary wife Wept and looked out of window all day
long?

What need of minute search into such springs

As start men, set o' the move? — machinery

Old as earth, obvious as the noonday sun. 80 Why, take men as they come, — an instance now, —

Of all those who have simply gone to see Pompilia on her deathbed since four days, Half, at the least are, call it how you please, In love with her. — I don't except the priests

Nor even the old confessor whose eyes run

Over at what he styles his sister's voice

Who died so early and weaned him from
the world.
Well, had they viewed her ere the paleness pushed
The last o' the red o' the rose away, while
yet
Some hand, adventurous 'twixt the wind and her,
Might let shy life run back and raise the flower
Rich with reward up to the guardian's
face, —
Would they have kept that hand employed all day
At fumbling on with prayer-book pages?
No!
Men are men: why then need I say one
word 10 More than that our mere man the Canon
here
Saw, pitied, loved Pompilia?

This is why;

This startling why: that Caponsacchi's
self — Whom foes and friends alike avouch, for
good
Or ill, a man of truth whate'er betide, Intrepid altogether, reckless too How his own fame and fortune, tossed to the winds,
Suffer by any turn the adventure take, Nay, more — not thrusting, like a badge to hide,
'Twixt shirt and skin a joy which shown is shame —
20 But flirting flag-like i' the face o' the world This tell-tale kerchief, this conspicuous
love
For the lady, — oh, called innocent love,
I know!
Only, such scarlet fiery innocence As most folk would try muffle up in shade, —
— 'Tis strange then that this else abashless mouth Should yet maintain, for truth's sake which is God's,
That it was not he made the first advance, That, even ere word had passed between the two,
Pompilia penned him letters, passionate prayers,
o If not love, then so simulating love
That he, no novice to the taste of thyme, Turned from such over-luscious honey clot At end o' the flower, and would not lend his lip Till . . . but the tale here frankly out-soars faith:
There must be falsehood somewhere. For her part,
Pompilia quietly constantly avers
She never penned a letter in her life

Nor to the Canon nor any other man, Being incompetent to write and read:
Nor had she ever uttered word to him, 40 nor he
To her till that same evening when they met,
She on her window terrace, he beneath I' the public street, as was their fateful
chance,
And she adjured him in the name of God To find out, bring to pass where, when and
how Escape with him to Rome might be contrived.
Means were found, plan laid, time fixed,
she avers,
And heart assured to heart in loyalty,
All at an impulse! All extemporized
As in romance-books! Is that credible? 50 Well, yes: as she avers this with calm
mouth
Dying, I do think "Credible!" you'd cry — Did not the priest's voice come to break the spell.
They questioned him apart, as the custom
is,
When first the matter made a noise at Rome,
And he, calm, constant then as she is now,
For truth's sake did assert and re-assert Those letters called him to her and he
came,
— Which damns the story credible other-
wise.
Why should this man, — mad to devote 60
himself,
Careless what comes of his own fame, the
first, —
Be studious thus to publish and declare Just what the lightest nature loves to hide, So screening lady from the byword's laugh
"First spoke the lady, last the cavalier!"
— I say, — why should the man tell truth just now
When graceful lying meets such ready shrif?
Or is there a first moment for a priest
As for a woman, when invaded shame Must have its first and last excuse to show? 70
Do both contrive love's entry in the mind Shall look, i' the manner of it, a surprise, — That after, once the flag o' the fort hauled
down,
Effrontery may sink drawbridge, open gate,
Welcome and entertain the conqueror?
Or what do you say to a touch of the devil's
worst?
Can it be that the husband, he who wrote The letter to his brother I told you of,
I' the name of her it meant to criminate, —
What if he wrote those letters to the priest? 80
Further the priest says, when it first befell, This follow o' the letters, that he checked the flow,
Put them back lightly each with its reply.

Here again vexes new discrepancy:
 There never reached her eye a word from
 him:
 He did write but she could not read — could just Burn the offence to wifehood, womanhood,
 So did burn: never bade him come to her,
 Yet when it proved he must come, let him
 come,
 And when he did come though uncalled, — why, spoke Prompt by an inspiration: thus it chanced.
 Will you go somewhat back to understand?

- 10 When first, pursuant to his plan, there sprang,
 Like an uncaged beast, Guido's cruelty
 On soul and body of his wife, she cried To those whom law appoints resource for
 such,
 The secular guardian, — that's the Governor,
 And the Archbishop, — that's the spiritual guide,
 And prayed them take the claws from out her flesh.
 Now, this is ever the ill consequence Of being noble, poor and difficult, Ungainly, yet too great to disregard, — 20 This — that born peers and friends hereditary, —
 Though disinclined to help from their own
 store
 The opprobrious wight, put penny in his poke
 From private purse or leave the door ajar
 When he goes wistful by at dinner-time, — Yet, if his needs conduct him where they sit Smugly in office, judge this, bishop that, Dispensers of the shine and shade o' the
 place —
 And if, friend's door shut and friend's purse undrawn,
 Still potentates may find the office-seat 30 Do as good service at no cost — give help
 By-the-bye, pay up traditional dues at once Just through a feather-weight too much i'
 the scale,
 Or finger-tip forgot at the balance-tongue, —
 Why, only churls refuse, or Molinists.
 Thus when, in the first roughness of surprise
 At Guido's wolf-face whence the sheepskin
 fell,
 The frightened couple, all bewilderment, Rushed to the Governor, — who else rights wrong?
 Told him their tale of wrong and craved redress — 40 Why, then the Governor woke up to the
 fact
 That Guido was a friend of old, poor
 Count! —

So, promptly paid his tribute, promised
 the pair,
 Wholesome chastisement should soon cure their qualms.
 Next time they came, wept, prated and told lies:
 So stopped all prating, sent them dumb
 to Rome.
 Well, now it was Pompilia's turn to try:
 The troubles pressing on her, as I said, Three times she rushed, maddened by misery,
 To the other mighty man, sobbed out her
 prayer
 At footstool of the Archbishop — fast the 50
 friend
 Of her husband also! Oh, good friends of yore!
 So, the Archbishop, not to be outdone By the Governor, break custom more than
 he,
 Thrice bade the foolish woman stop her
 tongue, Unloosed her hands from harassing his gout, Coached her and carried her to the Count
 again,
 — His old friend should be master in his
 house,
 Rule his wife and correct her faults at need!
 Well, driven from post to pillar in this wise,
 She, as a last resource, betook herself 60 To one, should be no family-friend at
 least,
 A simple friar o' the city; confessed to him,
 Then told how fierce temptation of release
 By self-dealt death was busy with her soul,
 And urged that he put this in words, write
 plain
 For one who could not write, set down her
 prayer
 That Pietro and Violante, parent-like
 If somehow not her parents, should for love Come save her, pluck from out the flame the brand Themselves had thoughtlessly thrust in so 70 deep
 To send gay-coloured sparkles up and cheer
 Their seat at the chimney-corner. The good friar Promised as much at the moment; but,
 alack,
 Night brings discretion: he was no one's
 friend,
 Yet presently found he could not turn about Nor take a step i' the case and fail to tread
 On someone's toe who either was a friend, Or a friend's friend, or friend's friend thrice-removed,
 And woe to friar by whom offences come!
 So, the course being plain, — with a 80 general sigh
 At matrimony the profound mistake, —

He threw reluctantly the business up, Having his other penitents to mind.

If then, all outlets thus secured save one,
At last she took to the open, stood and stared

With her wan face to see where God might wait —

And there found Caponsacchi wait as well For the precious something at perdition's
edge,

He only was predestinate to save, —

And if they recognized in a critical flash 10 From the zenith, each the other, her need of him,

His need of . . . say, a woman to perish
for,

The regular way o' the world, yet break no
vow,

Do no harm save to himself, — if this were
thus?

How do you say? It were improbable;
So is the legend of my patron-saint.

Anyhow, whether, as Guido states the case, Pompilia, — like a starving wretch i' the
street

Who stops and rifles the first passenger

In the great right of an excessive wrong, — 20 Did somehow call this stranger and he
came, —

Or whether the strange sudden interview Blazed as when star and star must needs go close

Till each hurts each and there is loss in
heaven —

Whatever way in this strange world it
was, —

Pompilia and Caponsacchi met, in fine,
She at her window, he i' the street beneath,
And understood each other at first look.

All was determined and performed at once.
And on a certain April evening, late 30 I' the month, this girl of sixteen, bride and

wife

Three years and over, — she who hitherto Had never taken twenty steps in Rome Beyond the church, pinned to her mother's gown,

Nor, in Arezzo, knew her way through street

Except what led to the Archbishop's door, —
Such an one rose up in the dark, laid hand On what came first, clothes and a trinket or two,

Belongings of her own in the old day, — Stole from the side o' the sleeping spouse —
who knows?

40 Sleeping perhaps, silent for certain, — slid Ghost-like from great dark room to great dark room

In through the tapestries and out again
And onward, uncmbarrassed as a fate,

Descended staircase, gained last door of all,
Sent it wide open at first push of palm,
And there stood, first time, last and only
time,

At liberty, alone in the open street, — Unquestioned, unmolested found herself
At the city gate, by Caponsacchi's side, Hope there, joy there, life and all good 50
again,

The carriage there, the convoy there, light
there

Broadening ever into blaze at Rome And breaking small what long miles lay
between;

Up she sprang, in he followed, they were safe.

The husband quotes this for incredible,
All of the story from first word to last:

Seized the priest's hand throughout upholding hers,

Traces his foot to the alcove, that night, Whither and whence blindfold he knew the
way,

Proficient in all craft and stealthiness; 60
And cites for proof a servant, eye that watched

And ear that opened to purse secrets up, A woman-spy, — suborned to give and
take

Letters and tokens, do the work of shame
The more adroitly that herself, who helped Communion thus between a tainted pair,
Had long since been a leper thick in spot,
A common trull o' the town: she witnessed
all,

Helped many meetings, partings, took her wage

And then told Guido the whole matter. 70
Lies!

The woman's life confutes her word, — her word Confutes itself: "Thus, thus and thus I lied."

"And thus, no question, still you lie," we
say.

"Ay, but at last, e'en have it how you
will,

"Whatever the means whatever the way, explodes

"The consummation" — the accusers
shriek:

"Here is the wife avowedly found in flight,
"And the companion of her flight, a priest;
"She flies her husband, he the church his
spouse:

"What is this?"

80

Wife and priest alike reply
"This is the simple thing it claims to be,
"A course we took for life and honour's
sake,
"Very strange, very justifiable."

- She says, "God put it in my head to fly,
 "As when the martin migrates: autumn claps
 "Her hands, cries 'Winter's coming, will be here,
 "'Off with you ere the white teeth over-
 take!
 "'Flee!' So I fled: this friend was the warm day,
 "The south wind and whatever favours
 flight;
 "I took the favour, had the help, how else?
 "And so we did fly rapidly all night,
 "All day, all night — a longer night —
 again,
 10 "And then another day, longest of days,
 "And all the while, whether we fled or stopped,
 "I scarce know how or why, one thought filled both,
 "'Fly and arrive!' So long as I found
 strength
 "I talked with my companion, told him
 much,
 "Knowing that he knew more, knew me, knew God
 "And God's disposal of me, — but the
 sense
 "O' the blessed flight absorbed me in the main,
 "And speech became mere talking through
 a sleep,
 "Till at the end of that last longest night 20 "In a red daybreak, when we reached an inn
 "And my companion whispered 'Next stage — Rome!'
 "Sudden the weak flesh fell like piled-up cards,
 "All the frail fabric at a finger's touch,
 "And prostrate the poor soul, too, and I said "But though Count Guido were a furlong
 off,
 "Just on me, I must stop and rest awhile!
 "Then something like a huge white wave o' the sea
 "Broke o'er my brain and buried me in
 sleep
 "Blessedly, till it ebbed and left me loose, 30 "And where was I found but on a strange bed
 "In a strange room like hell, roaring with noise,
 "Ruddy with flame, and filled with men,
 in front
 "Who but the man you call my husband?
 ay —
 "Count Guido once more between heaven
 and me,
 "For there my heaven stood, my salvation,
 yes —
 "That Caponsacchi all my heaven of help,
 "Helpless himself, held prisoner in the
 hands
- "Of men who looked up in my husband's
 face
 "To take the fate thence he should signify,
 "Just as the way was at Arezzo. Then, 40
 "Not for my sake but his who had helped
 me —
 "I sprang up, reached him with one bound, and seized
 "The sword o' the felon, trembling at his
 side,
 "Fit creature of a coward, unsheathed the
 thing
 "And would have pinned him through the poison-bag
 "To the wall and left him there to palpi-
 tate,
 "As you serve scorpions, but men interposed —
 "Disarmed me, gave his life to him again
 "That he might take mine and the other lives,
 "And he has done so. I submit myself!" 50
 The priest says — oh, and in the main result
 The facts asseverate, he truly says,
 As to the very act and deed of him, However you mistrust the mind o' the
 man —
 The flight was just for flight's sake, no pretext
 For aught except to set Pompilia free.
 He says "I cite the husband's self's worst
 charge
 "In proof of my best word for both of us.
 "Be it conceded that so many times
 "We took our pleasure in his palace: then, 60
 "What need to fly at all? — or flying no
 less,
 "What need to outrage the lips sick and
 white
 "Of a woman, and bring ruin down beside,
 "By halting when Rome lay one stage beyond?"
 So does he vindicate Pompilia's fame, Confirm her story in all points but one — This; that, so fleeing and so breathing
 forth
 Her last strength in the prayer to halt
 awhile,
 She makes confusion of the reddening white Which was the sunset when her strength 70 gave way,
 And the next sunrise and its whitening
 red Which she revived in when her husband
 came:
 She mixes both times, morn and eve, in
 one,
 Having lived through a blank of night
 'twixt each
 Though dead-asleep, unaware as a corpse,
 She on the bed above; her friend below Watched in the doorway of the inn the
 while,

Stood i' the red o' the morn, that she mistakes,
In act to rouse and quicken the tardy crew
And hurry out the horses, have the stage
Over, the last league, reach Rome and be safe:
When up came Guido.

Guido's tale begins —

How he and his whole household, drunk to death

By some enchanted potion, poppied drugs Piled by the wife, lay powerless in gross sleep

And left the spoilers unimpeded way,

10 Could not shake off their poison and pursue,

Till noontide, then made shift to get on horse

And did pursue: which means he took his time,

Pressed on no more than lingered after, step

By step, just making sure o' the fugitives, Till at the nick of time, he saw his chance,
Seized it, came up with and surprised the pair.

How he must needs have gnawn lip and gnashed teeth,

Taking successively at tower and town,
Village and roadside, still the same report

20 "Yes, such a pair arrived an hour ago,
"Sat in the carriage just where now you stand,

"While we got horses ready, — turned deaf ear
"To all entreaty they would even alight;
"Counted the minutes and resumed their course."

Would they indeed escape, arrive at Rome, Leave no least loop-hole to let murder through,

But foil him of his captured infamy, Prize of guilt proved and perfect? So it seemed.

Till, oh the happy chance, at last stage, Rome

30 But two short hours off, Castelnuovo reached,

The guardian angel gave reluctant place,
Satan stepped forward with alacrity, Pompilia's flesh and blood succumbed, perforce

A halt was, and her husband had his will.
Perdue he couched, counted out hour by hour

Till he should spy in the east a signal-streak — Night had been, morrow was, triumph would be.

Do you see the plan deliciously complete?
The rush upon the unsuspecting sleep,

40 The easy execution, the outcry Over the deed "Take notice all the world!

"These two dead bodies, locked still in embrace, —

"The man is Caponsacchi and a priest,
"The woman is my wife: they fled me late,

"Thus have I found and you behold them thus,

"And may judge me: do you approve or no?"

Success did seem not so improbable,
But that already Satan's laugh was heard,
His black back turned on Guido — left i' the lurch

Or rather, balked of suit and service now, 50
Left to improve on both by one deed more, Burn up the better at no distant day,
Body and soul one holocaust to hell.

Anyhow, of this natural consequence Did just the last link of the long chain snap:

For an eruption was o' the priest, alive
And alert, calm, resolute and formidable,
Not the least look of fear in that broad brow —

One not to be disposed of by surprise, And armed moreover — who had guessed 60 as much?

Yes, there stood he in secular costume
Complete from head to heel, with sword at side,

He seemed to know the trick of perfectly.
There was no prompt suppression of the man

As he said calmly "I have saved your wife
"From death; there was no other way but this;

"Of what do I defraud you except death?
"Charge any wrong beyond, I answer it."

Guido, the valorous, had met his match,
Was forced to demand help instead of fight, 70

Bid the authorities o' the place lend aid
And make the best of a broken matter so.
They soon obeyed the summons — I suppose,

Apprised and ready, or not far to seek — Laid hands on Caponsacchi, found in fault,

A priest yet flagrantly accoutred thus, — Then, to make good Count Guido's further charge,

Proceeded, prisoner made lead the way,
In a crowd, upstairs to the chamber-door Where wax-white, dead asleep, deep be- 80
yond dream,

As the priest laid her, lay Pompilia yet.
And as he mounted step and step with the crowd

How I see Guido taking heart again!
He knew his wife so well and the way of her —

How at the outbreak she would shroud her shame

In hell's heart, would it mercifully yawn — How, failing that, her forehead to his
 foot
 She would crouch silent till the great doom
 fell,
 Leave him triumphant with the crowd to
 see
 Guilt motionless or writhing like a worm!
 No! Second misadventure, this worm
 turned,
 I told you: would have slain him on the spot
 With his own weapon, but they seized her
 hands:
 Leaving her tongue free, as it tolled the knell 10 Of Guido's hope so lively late. The past Took quite another shape now. She who shrieked
 "At least and for ever I am mine and God's,
 "Thanks to his liberating angel Death —
 "Never again degraded to be yours
 "The ignoble noble, the unmanly man,
 "The beast below the beast in brutish-
 ness!"
 This was the froward child, "the restif lamb
 "Used to be cherished in his breast," he groaned —
 "Eat from his hand and drink from out his
 cup, 20 "The while his fingers pushed their loving
 way
 "Through curl on curl of that soft coat —
 alas,
 "And she all silverly baaced gratitude
 "While meditating mischief!" — and so
 forth.
 He must invent another story now!
 The ins and outs o' the rooms were searched: he found Or showed for found the abominable
 prize —
 Love-letters from his wife who cannot
 write,
 Love-letters in reply o' the priest — thank
 God! —
 Who can write and confront his character 30 With this, and prove the false thing forged throughout:
 Spitting whereat, he needs must spatter whom But Guido's self? — that forged and falsified
 One letter called Pompilia's, past dispute: Then why not these to make sure still more sure?
 So was the case concluded then and there:
 Guido preferred his charges in due form,
 Called on the law to adjudicate, consigned The accused ones to the Prefect of the
 place

(Oh mouse-birth of that mountain like revenge!)
 And so to his own place betook himself 44
 After the spring that failed, — the wildcat's way.
 The captured parties were conveyed to
 Rome;
 Investigation followed here i' the court —
 Soon to review the fruit of its own work, From then to now being eight months and
 no more.
 Guido kept out of sight and safe at home:
 The Abate, brother Paolo, helped most At words when deeds were out of question, pushed Nearest the purple,¹ best played deputy,
 So, pleaded, Guido's representative 50 At the court shall soon try Guido's self, — what's more,
 The court that also took — I told you,
 Sir —
 That statement of the couple, how a cheat Had been i' the birth of the babe, no child of theirs.
 That was the prelude; this, the play's first act:
 Whereof we wait what comes, crown, close
 of all.
 Well, the result was something of a shade
 On the parties thus accused, — how otherwise?
 Shade, but with shine as unmistakable.
 Each had a prompt defence: Pompilia 60
 first —
 "Earth was made hell to me who did no
 harm:
 "I only could emerge one way from hell
 "By catching at the one hand held me, so "I caught at it and thereby stepped to
 heaven:
 "If that be wrong, do with me what you
 will!"
 Then Caponsacchi with a grave grand sweep
 O' the arm as though his soul warned base-ness off —
 "If as a man, then much more as a priest
 "I hold me bound to help weak innocence:
 "If so my worldly reputation burst, 74
 "Being the bubble it is, why, burst it may:
 "Blame I can bear though not blame-worthiness.
 "But use your sense first, see if the miscreant proved,
 "The man who tortured thus the woman,
 thus
 "Have not both laid the trap and fixed the lure
 "Over the pit should bury body and soul!
 "His facts are lies: his letters are the fact —
 "An infiltration flavoured with himself!

¹ The purple: the colour of the cardinals.

"As for the fancies — whether . . . what is it you say?

"The lady loves me, whether I love her

"In the forbidden sense of your surmise, —

"If, with the midday blaze of truth above,

"The unblinded eye of God awake, aware,

"You needs must pry about and trace the birth

"Of each stray beam of light may traverse night,

"To the night's sun that's Lucifer himself,

"Do so, at other time, in other place 10 "Not now, nor here! Enough that first to last

"I never touched her lip nor she my hand,

"Nor either of us thought a thought, much less

"Spoke a word which the Virgin might not hear.

"Be such your question, thus I answer it."

Then the court had to make its mind up, spoke.

"It is a thorny question, yea, a tale

"Hard to believe, but not impossible:

"Who can be absolute for either side?

"A middle course is happily open yet.

20 "Here has a blot surprised the social blank, —

"Whether through favour, feebleness or fault,

"No matter, leprosy has touched our robe

"And we unclean must needs be purified.

"Here is a wife makes holiday from home,

"A priest caught playing truant to his church

"In masquerade moreover: both allege

"Enough excuse to stop our lifted scourge

"Which else would heavily fall. On the other hand,

"Here is a husband, ay and man of mark,

30 "Who comes complaining here, demands redress

"As if he were the pattern of desert —

"The while those plaguy allegations frown,

"Forbid we grant him the redress he seeks.

"To all men be our moderation known!

"Rewarding none while compensating each,

"Hurting all round though harming nobody,

"Husband, wife, priest, scot-free not one shall 'scape,

"Yet priest, wife, husband, boast the unbroken head

"From application of our excellent oil:

40 "So that, whatever be the fact, in fine,

"We make no miss of justice in a sort.

"First, let the husband stomach as he may,

"His wife shall neither be returned him, no —

"Nor branded, whipped and caged, but just consigned

"To a convent and the quietude she craves;
"So is he rid of his domestic plague:

"What better thing can happen to a man?

"Next, let the priest retire — unshent, unshamed,

"Unpunished as for perpetrating crime,

"But relegated (not imprisoned, Sirs!) 50

"Sent for three years to clarify his youth

"At Civita, a rest by the way to Rome:

"There let his life skim off its last of lees

"Nor keep this dubious colour. Judged the cause:

"All parties may retire, content, we hope."

That's Rome's way, the traditional road of law;

Whither it leads is what remains to tell.

The priest went to his relegation-place,

The wife to her convent, brother Paolo

To the arms of brother Guido with the 60 news

And this beside — his charge was counter-charged;

The Comparini, his old brace of hates,

Were breathed and vigilant and venomous now —

Had shot a second bolt where the first stuck,

And followed up the pending dowry-suit

By a procedure should release the wife

From so much of the marriage-bond as barred

Escape when Guido turned the screw too much

On his wife's flesh and blood, as husband may.

No more defence, she turned and made 70 attack,

Claimed now divorce from bed and board, in short:

Pleaded such subtle strokes of cruelty,

Such slow sure siege laid to her body and soul,

As, proved, — and proofs seemed coming thick and fast, —

Would gain both freedom and the dowry back

Even should the first suit leave them in his grasp:

So urged the Comparini for the wife.

Guido had gained not one of the good things

He grasped at by his creditable plan

O' the flight and following and the rest: 80 the suit

That smouldered late was fanned to fury new,

This adjunct came to help with fiercer fire,

While he had got himself a quite new plague —

Found the world's face an universal grin

At this last best of the Hundred Merry Tales¹

Of how a young and spritely clerk devised To carry off a spouse that moped too
much,

And cured her of the vapours in a trice:
And how the husband, playing Vulcan's part,²

Told by the Sun, started in hot pursuit
To catch the lovers, and came halting up, Cast his net and then called the Gods to
see

The convicts in their rosy impudence — 10 Whereat said Mercury "Would that I were Mars!"

Oh it was rare, and naughty all the same!
Brief, the wife's courage and cunning, — the priest's show

Of chivalry and adroitness, — last not
least,

The husband — how he ne'er showed teeth
at all,

Whose bark had promised biting; but just sneaked

Back to his kennel, tail 'twixt legs, as 'twere, —

All this was hard to gulp down and digest.
So pays the devil his liegeman, brass for
gold.

But this was at Arezzo: here in Rome

6 Brave Paolo bore up against it all — Battled it out, nor wanting to himself Nor Guido nor the House whose weight he bore

Pillar-like, by no force of arm but brain.

He knew his Rome, what wheels to set to
work;

Plied influential folk, pressed to the ear
Of the efficacious purple, pushed his way To the old Pope's self, — past decency
indeed, —

Praying him take the matter in his hands
Out of the regular court's incompetence.

30 But times are changed and nephews out of date

And favouritism unfashionable: the Pope Said "Render Cæsar what is Cæsar's due!"

As for the Comparini's counter-plea,
He met that by a counter-plea again, Made Guido claim divorce — with help so
far

By the trial's issue: for, why punishment However slight unless for guiltiness

However slender? — and a molehill serves Much as a mountain of offence this
way.

¹ The Hundred Merry Tales: referring to the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, in which ten tales are told on each of ten days, many of them of the type described in the next lines.

² Vulcan's part: referring to Homer (Od. viii. 266 ff.), where Hephestus (Vulcan) is deceived by Aphrodite (Venus), his wife, and Ares (Mars), her lover.

So was he gathering strength on every 40
side

And growing more and more to menace — when

All of a terrible moment came the blow That beat down Paolo's fence, ended the
play

O' the foil and brought mannaia on the stage.

Five months had passed now since Pompilia's flight,

Months spent in peace among the Convert nuns.

This, — being, as it seemed, for Guido's
sake

Solely, what pride might call imprisonment

And quote as something gained, to friends
at home, —

This naturally was at Guido's charge: 50
Grudge it he might, but penitential fare,

Prayers, preachings, who but he defrayed the cost?

So, Paolo dropped, as proxy, do it by do it Like heart's blood, till — what's here?
What notice comes?

The convent's self makes application bland That, since Pompilia's health is fast o' the wane,

She may have leave to go combine her cure
Of soul with cure of body, mend her mind Together with her thin arms and sunk
eyes

That want fresh air outside the convent- 60
wall,

Say in a friendly house, — and which so fit

As a certain villa in the Pauline way,
That happens to hold Pietro and his wife,
The natural guardians? "Oh, and shift the care

"You shift the cost, too; Pietro pays in
turn,

"And lightens Guido of a load! And then,
"Villa or convent, two names for one
thing,

"Always the sojourn means imprison-
ment,

"*Domus pro carcere*³ — nowise we relax,
"Nothing abate: how answers Paolo?" 70

You,

What would you answer? All so smooth and fair,

Even Paul's astuteness sniffed no harm i'
the world.

He authorised the transfer, saw it made And, two months after, reaped the fruit of
the same,

Having to sit down, rack his brain and find

³ Domus pro carcere: "a house in place of a prison."

What phrase should serve him best to notify

Our Guido that by happy providence
A son and heir, a babe was born to him I' the villa, — go! tell sympathising
friends!

Yes, such had been Pompilia's privilege:
She, when she fled, was one month gone with child,

Known to herself or unknown, either way Availing to explain (say men of art)

10 The strange and passionate precipitance Of maiden startled into motherhood Which changes body and soul by nature's
law.

So when the she-dove breeds, strange yearnings come

For the unknown shelter by undreamedof shores,

And there is born a blood-pulse in her
heart

To fight if needs be, though with flap of wing,

For the wool-flock or the fur-tuft, though a hawk

Contest the prize, — wherefore, she knows not yet.

Anyhow, thus to Guido came the news.

"I shall have quitted Rome ere you arrive

20 "To take the one step left," — wrote Paolo.

Then did the winch o' the winepress of all
hate,

Vanity, disappointment, grudge and greed, Take the last turn that screws out pure
revenge

With a bright bubble at the brim beside — By an heir's birth he was assured at
once

O' the main prize, all the money in dispute: Pompilia's dowry might revert to her

Or stay with him as law's caprice should
point, —

But now — now — what was Pietro's shall be hers,

30 What was hers shall remain her own, — if hers,

Why then, — oh, not her husband's but — her heir's!

That heir being his too, all grew his at last By this road or by that road, since they join.

Before, why, push he Pietro out o' the
world, —

The current of the money stopped, you see,
Pompilia being proved no Pietro's child.

Or let it be Pompilia's life he quenched, Again the current of the money stopped, —

40 Guido debarred his rights as husband soon, So the new process threatened; — now, the
chance,

Now, the resplendent minute! Clear the
earth,

Cleanse the house, let the three but disappear

A child remains, depositary of all,
That Guido may enjoy his own again,
Repair all losses by a master-stroke,
Wipe out the past, all done all left undone,
Swell the good present to best evermore,
Die into new life, which let blood baptize!

So, i' the blue of a sudden sulphur-blaze,
Both why there was one step to take at 50
Rome,

And why he should not meet with Paolo
there,

He saw — the ins and outs to the heart of hell —

And took the straight line thither swift and
sure.

He rushed to Vittiano, found four sons o'
the soil,

Brutes of his breeding, with one spark i'
the clod

That served for a scul; the looking up to
him

Or aught called Franceschini as life,
death,

Heaven, hell, — lord paramount, assembled these,

Harangued, equipped, instructed, pressed each clod

With his will's imprint; then took horse, 60
plied spur,

And so arrived, all five of them, at Rome On Christmas-Eve, and forthwith found themselves

Installed i' the vacancy and solitude Left them by Paolo, the considerate

man

Who, good as his word, had disappeared at
once

As if to leave the stage free. A whole week

Did Guido spend in study of his part,
Then played it fearless of a failure. One,

Struck the year's clock whereof the hours are days,

And off was rung o' the little wheels the 70
chime

"Good will on earth and peace to man:"
but, two,

Proceeded the same bell and, evening
come,

The dreadful five felt finger-wise their
way

Across the town by blind cuts and black turns

To the little lone suburban villa; knocked — "Who may be outside?" called a well-known voice.

"A friend of Caponsacchi's bringing
friends

"A letter."
That's a test, the excusers say:
Ay, and a test conclusive, I return.

What? Had that name brought touch of guilt or taste
Of fear with it, ought to dash the present
joy
With memory of the sorrow just at end, —
She, happy in her parents' arms at length
With the new blessing of the two weeks'
babe, —
How had that name's announcement moved the wife?
Or, as the other slanders circulate,
Were Caponsacchi no rare visitant On nights and days whither safe harbour
lured,
What bait had been i' the name to ope the
door?
The promise of a letter? Stealthy guests
Have secret watchwords, private entrances:
The man's own self might have been found
inside
And all the scheme made frustrate by a
word.
No: but since Guido knew, none knew so
well,
The man had never since returned to
Rome
Nor seen the wife's face more than villa's
front,
So, could not be at hand to warn or save, —
For that, he took this sure way to the end.
"Come in," bade poor Violante cheerfully, Drawing the door-bolt: that death was the
first,
Stabbed through and through. Pietro, close on her heels,
Set up a cry — "Let me confess myself!
"Grant but confession!" Cold steel was the grant.
Then came Pompilia's turn.
Then they escaped.
The noise o' the slaughter roused the neighbourhood.
They had forgotten just the one thing more Which saves i' the circumstance, the ticket,
to-wit,
Which puts post-horses at a traveller's use:
So, all on foot, desperate through the dark Reeled they like drunkards along open
road,
Accomplished a prodigious twenty miles Homeward, and gained Baccano very near, Stumbled at last, deaf, dumb, blind through the feat,
Into a grange and, one dead heap, slept
there
Till the pursuers hard upon their trace Reached them and took them, red from head to heel,
And brought them to the prison where they
lie.
The couple were laid i' the church two days ago,
And the wife lives yet by miracle

All is told.
You hardly need ask what Count Guido
says, Since something he must say. "I own the deed —" (He cannot choose, — but —) "I declare
the same
"Just and inevitable, — since no way
else
"Was left me, but by this of taking life,
"To save my honour which is more than
life.
"I exercised a husband's rights." To
which
The answer is as prompt — "There was no fault
"In any one o' the three to punish thus:
"Neither i' the wife, who kept all faith to 5
you,
"Nor in the parents, whom yourself first duped,
"Robbed and maltreated, then turned out of doors.
"You wronged and they endured wrong;
yours the fault.
"Next, had endurance overpassed the mark "And turned resentment needing remedy, —
"Nay, put the absurd impossible case, for
once —
"You were all blameless of the blame alleged
"And they blameworthy where you fix all
blame,
"Still, why this violation of the law?
"Yourself elected law should take its 6
course,
"Avenge wrong, or show vengeance not your right;
"Why, only when the balance in law's
hand
"Trembles against you and inclines the
way
"O' the other party, do you make protest,
"Renounce arbitrament, flying out of
court,
"And crying 'Honour's hurt the sword must cure'?
"Aha, and so i' the middle of each suit "Trying i' the courts, — and you had three in play
"With an appeal to the Pope's self be-
side, —
"What, you may chop and change and 7 right your wrongs,
"Leaving the law to lag as she thinks fit?"

That were too temptingly commodious,
Count!

One would have still a remedy in reserve Should reach the safest oldest sinner, you
see!

One's honour forsooth? Does that take hurt alone

From the extreme outrage? I who have no wife,
Being yet sensitive in my degree
As Guido, — must discover hurt elsewhere Which, half compounded-for in days gone
by,
May profitably break out now afresh,
Need cure from my own expeditious hands.
The lie that was, as it were, imputed me When you objected to my contract's clause, —
The theft as good as, one may say, alleged,
10 When you, co-heir in a will, excepted, Sir,
To my administration of effects,
— Aha, do you think law disposed of these?
My honour's touched and shall deal death
around!
Count, that were too commodious, I repeat!
If any law be imperative on us all,
Of all are you the enemy: out with you From the common light and air and life of man!

IV.—TERTIUM QUID.

TRUE, Excellency — as his Highness says, Though she's not dead yet, she's as good as stretched 20 Symmetrical beside the other two; Though he's not judged yet, he's the same as judged,
So do the facts abound and superabound:
And nothing hinders that we lift the case Out of the shade into the shine, allow Qualified persons to pronounce at last, Nay, edge in an authoritative word Between this rabble's-brabble of dolts and
fools
Who make up reasonless unreasoning
Rome.
"Now for the Trial!" they roar: "the Trial to test 30 "The truth, weigh husband and weigh wife alike
"I' the scales of law, make one scale kick the beam!"
Law's a machine from which, to please the
mob,
Truth the divinity must needs descend And clear things at the play's fifth act — aha!
Hammer into their noddles who was who
And what was what. I tell the simpletons
"Could law be competent to such a feat
"Twere done already: what begins next
week
"Is end o' the Trial, last link of a chain 40 "Whereof the first was forged three years
ago
"When law addressed herself to set wrong
right,

"And proved so slow in taking the first step
"That ever some new grievance, — tort, retort,
"On one or the other side, — o'ertook i'
the game,
"Retarded sentence, till this deed of
death
"Is thrown in, as it were, las. bale to boat "Crammed to the edge with cargo — or passengers?
"Trecentos inseris: ¹ ohe, jam satis est!
"Huc appelle!" — passengers, the word
must be."
Long since, the boat was loaded to my
eyes.
To hear the rabble and brabble, you'd call
the case
Fused and confused past human finding
out.
One calls the square round, t'other the round square —
And pardonably in that first surprise O' the blood that fell and splashed the diagram:
But now we've used our eyes to the violent hue Can't we look through the crimson and trace lines?
It makes a man despair of history, Eusebius and the established fact — fig's
end!
Oh, give the fools their Trial, rattle away With the leash of lawyers, two on either
side —
One barks, one bites, — Masters Arcangeli
And Spreti, — that's the husband's ultimate hope
Against the Fisc and the other kind of Fisc, Bound to do barking for the wife: bow — wow!
Why, Excellency, we and his Highness
here
Would settle the matter as sufficiently As ever will Advocate This and Fiscal That And Judge the Other, with even — a word and a wink —
We well know who for ultimate arbiter.
Let us beware o' the basset-table ² — lest We jog the elbow of Her Eminence, ³ Jostle his cards, — he'll rap you out a . . . st!
By the window-seat! And here's the Marquis too!
Indulge me but a moment: if I fail

¹ Trecentos inseris, &c.: Horace, Sat. I. 5. 12.

² Basset: a game of cards, fashionable in the seventeenth century.

³ Her Eminence: an imitation of the Italian idiom, in which "His Eminence," as we should say, becomes "Sua Eminenza." Browning uses this idiom occasionally in the present book (g.g., p. 726, ll. 65, 67), but not regularly.

— Favoured with such an audience, understand! —
To set things right, why, class me with the mob
As understander of the mind of man!

The mob, — now, that's just how the error comes!
Bethink you that you have to deal with plebs,
The commonalty; this is an episode
In burgess-life, — why seek to aggrandise, Idealise, denaturalise the class?
People talk, just as if they had to do With a noble pair that . . . Excellency, your ear!
Stoop to me, Highness, — listen and look yourselves!
This Pietro, this Violante, live their life At Rome in the easy way that's far from worst Even for their betters, — themselves love
themselves,
Spend their own oil in feeding their own lamp
That their own faces may grow bright
thereby.
They get to fifty and over: how's the lamp?
Full to the depth o' the wick, — moneys so
much;
And also with a remnant, — so much
more
Of moneys, — which there's no consuming
now,
But, when the wick shall moulder out some day,
Failing fresh twist of tow to use up
dregs,
Will lie a prize for the passer-by, — to-wit Anyone that can prove himself the heir, Seeing, the couple are wanting in a child:
Meantime their wick swims in the safe broad bowl
O' the middle rank, — not raised a beacon's height
For wind to ravage, nor dropped till lamp graze ground Like cresset, mudlarks poke now here now there, Going their rounds to probe the ruts i' the
road
Or fish the luck o' the puddle. Pietro's
soul
Was satisfied when cronies smirked, "No
wine Like Pietro's, and he drinks it every
day!"
His wife's heart sweiled her boddice, joyed its fill
When neighbours turned heads wistfully at church, Sighed at the load of lace that came to pray.

Well, having got through fifty years of flare,
They burn out so, indulge so their dear
selves,
That Pietro finds himself in debt at last,
As he were any lordling of us all: 40
And, now that dark begins to creep on day, Creditors grow uneasy, talk aside,
Take counsel, then importune all at once.
For if the good fat rosy careless man,
Who has not laid a ducat by, decease — Let the lamp fall, no heir at hand to catch — Why, being childless, there's a spilth i' the
street
O' the remnant, there's a scramble for the dregs
By the stranger: so, they grant him no long
day
But come in a body, clamour to be paid. 50

What's his resource? He asks and straight obtains
The customary largess, dole dealt out To, what we call our "poor dear shame-faced ones,"
In secret once a month to spare the shame O' the slothful and the spendthrift, — pauper-saints
The Pope puts meat i' the mouth of, ravens
they,
And providence he — just what the mob admires!
That is, instead of putting a prompt foot On selfish worthless human slugs whose slime
Has failed to lubricate their path in life, 60 Why, the Pope picks the first ripe fruit that falls
And gracious puts it in the vermin's way.
Pietro could never save a dollar? Straight He must be subsidised at our expense:
And for his wife — the harmless household sheep
One ought not to see harassed in her age — Judge, by the way she bore adversity, O' the patient nature you ask pity for!
How long, now, would the roughest marketman, Handling the creatures huddled to the 70
knife,
Harass a mutton ere she made a mouth Or menaced biting? Yet the poor sheep
here,
Violante, the old innocent burgess-wife,
In her first difficulty showed great teeth Fit to crunch up and swallow a good round
crime.
She meditates the tenure of the Trust, Fidei commissum is the lawyer-phrase, These funds that only want an heir to
take —
Goes o'er the gamut o' the creditor's cry

By semitones from whine to snarl high up And growl down low, one scale in sundry keys, —
 Pauses with a little compunction for the face Of Pietro frustrate of its ancient cheer, — Never a bottle now for friend at need, — Comes to a stop on her own frittered lace
 And neighbourly condolences thereat, Then makes her mind up, sees the thing
 to do:
 And so, deliberate, snaps house-book clasp,
 to Posts off to vespers, missal beneath arm, Passes the proper San Lorenzo by,
 Dives down a little lane to the left, is lost
 In a labyrinth of dwellings best unnamed, Selects a certain blind one, black at base, Blinking at top, — the sign of we know
 what, —
 One candle in a casement set to wink Streetward, do service to no shrine inside, —
 Mounts thither by the filthy flight of stairs, Holding the cord by the wall, to the tip-top,
 to Gropes for the door i' the dark, ajar of
 course,
 Raps, opens, enters in: up starts a thing Naked as needs be — "What, you rogue,
 'tis you?"
 "Back, — how can I have taken a farthing
 yet?"
 "Mercy on me, poor sinner that I am!
 "Here's . . . why, I took you for Madonna's self
 "With all that sudden swirl of silk i' the
 place!
 "What may your pleasure be, my bonny dame?"
 Your Excellency supplies aught left obscure?
 One of those women that abound in Rome, 30 Whose needs oblige them eke out one poor trade
 By another vile one: her ostensible work Was washing clothes, out in the open air
 At the cistern by Citorio; her true trade — Whispering to idlers, when they stopped and praised
 The ankles she let liberally shine In kneeling at the slab by the fountain-
 side,
 That there was plenty more to criticise At home, that eve, i' the house where candle blinked Decorously above, and all was done 40 I' the holy fear of God and cheap beside.
 Violante, now, had seen this woman wash,
 Noticed and envied her propitious shape, Tracked her home to her house-top, noted
 too,
 And now was come to tempt her and propose

A bargain far more shameful than the first Which trafficked her virginity away For a melon and three pauls at twelve years old.
 Five minutes' talk with this poor child of Eve, Struck was the bargain, business at an
 end —
 "Then, six months hence, that person whom you trust,
 "Comes, fetches whatsoever babe it be
 "I keep the price and secret, you the
 babe,
 "Paying beside for mass to make all
 straight:
 "Meantime, I pouch the earnest-money-
 piece."
 Down stairs again goes fumbling by the rope Violante, triumphing in a flourish of fire From her own brain, self-lit by such success, —
 Gains church in time for the "Magnificat" And gives forth "My reproof is taken
 away,
 "And blessed shall mankind proclaim me
 now,"
 So that the officiating priest turns round To see who proffers the obstreperous
 praise:
 Then home to Pietro, the enraptured
 much But puzzled-more when told the wondrous news —
 How orisons and works of charity, (Beside that pair of pinners and a coif, Birth-day surprise last Wednesday was five weeks)
 Had borne fruit in the autumn of his life, —
 They, or the Orvioto in a double dose.
 Anyhow, she must keep house next six months,
 Lie on the settle, avoid the three-legged stool,
 And, chiefly, not be crossed in wish or whim,
 And the result was like to be an heir.
 Accordingly, when time was come about,
 He found himself the sire indeed of this Francesca Vittoria Pompilia and the rest O' the names whereby he sealed her his,
 next day.
 A crime complete in its way is here, I
 hope?
 Lies to God, lies to man, every way lies
 To nature and civility and the mode:
 Flat robbery of the proper heirs thus foiled O' the due succession, — and, what followed thence,
 Robbery of God, through the confessor's
 ear

Debarred the most noteworthy incident When all else done and undone twelvemonth through

Was put in evidence at Easter-time.
All other peccadillos! — but this one To the priest who comes next day to dine with us?

'Twere inexpedient; decency forbade.

Is so far clear? You know Violante now, Compute her capability of crime By this authentic instance? Black hard cold

Crime like a stone you kick up with your
foot

I' the middle of a field?

I thought as much.

But now, a question, — how long does it
lie,

The bad and barren bit of stuff you kick, Before encroached on and encompassed
round

With minute moss, weed, wild-flower — made alive

By worm, and fly, and foot of the free bird?

Your Highness, — healthy minds let bygones be,

Leave old crimes to grow young and vir-tuous-like

I' the sun and air; so time treats ugly
deeds:

They take the natural blessing of all
change.

There was the joy o' the husband silly-
sooth,

The softening of the wife's old wicked
heart,

Virtues to right and left, profusely paid If so they might compensate the saved sin.

And then the sudden existence, dewy-dear, O' the rose above the dunghheap, the pure
child

As good as new created, since withdrawn From the horror of the pre-appointed lot

With the unknown father and the mother known

Too well, — some fourteen years of squalid
youth,

And then libertinage, disease, the grave —
Hell in life here, hereafter life in hell:

Look at that horror and this soft repose!

Why, moralist, the sin has saved a soul!

Then, even the palpable grievance to the heirs —

'Faith, this was no frank setting hand to throat

And robbing a man, but . . . Excellency, by your leave,

How did you get that marvel of a gem,
The sapphire with the Graces grand and Greck?

The story is, stooping to pick a stone

From the pathway through a vineyard no man's land

To pelt a sparrow with, you chanced on
this:

Why now, do those five clowns o' the family

O' the vinedresser digest their porridge
worse

That not one keeps it in his goatskin pouch

To do flint's-service with the tinder-box?

Don't cheat me, don't cheat you, don't cheat a friend,

But are you so hard on who jostles just A stranger with no natural sort of claim

To the havings and the holdings (here's the 54
point)

Unless by misadventure, and defect Of that which ought to be — nay, which there's none

Would dare so much as wish to profit by — Since who dares put in just so many words

"May Pietro fail to have a child, please
God!

"So shall his house and goods belong to
me,

"The sooner that his heart will pine be-
times"?

Well then, God doesn't please, nor heart shall pine!

Because he has a child at last, you see,
Or selfsame thing as though a child it were, 60

He thinks, whose sole concern it is to
think:

If he accepts it why should you demur?

Moreover, say that certain sin there seem,
The proper process of unsinning sin

Is to begin well-doing somehow else.

Pietro, — remember, with no sin at all I' the substitution, — why, this gift of God

Flung in his lap from over Paradise

Steadied him in a moment, set him straight On the good path he had been straying 70
from.

Henceforward no more wilfulness and
waste,

Cuppings, carousings, — these a sponge wiped out.

All sort of self-denial was easy now For the child's sake, the chatelaine to be,

Who must want much and might want who knows what?

And so, the debts were paid, habits reformed,

Expense curtailed, the dowry set to grow.
As for the wife, — I said, hers the whole
sin:

So, hers the exemplary penance. 'Twas a text

Whereon folk preached and praised, the 80 district through:

"Oh, make us happy and you make us
good!

"It all comes of God giving her a child:
 "Such graces follow God's best earthly gift!"

Here you put by my guard, pass to my
 heart

By the home-thrust — "There's a lie at base of all."

Why, thou exact Prince, is it a pearl or no, Yon globe upon the Principessa's neck?

That great round glory of pellucid stuff,

A fish secreted round a grain of grit!

Do you call it worthless for the worthless core?

10 (She doesn't, who well knows what she changed for it.)

So, 'to our brace of burgesses again!

You see so far i' the story, who was right,

Who wrong, who neither, don't you?

What, you don't?

Eh? Well, admit there's somewhat dark i' the case,

Let's on — the rest shall clear, I promise
 you.

Leap over a dozen years: you find, these
 past,

An old good easy creditable sire,

A careful housewife's beaming bustling
 face,

Both wrapped up in the love of their one
 child,

20 The strange tall pale beautiful creature grown

Lily-like out o' the cleft i' the sun-smit rock

To bow its white miraculous birth of buds

I' the way of wandering Joseph and his spouse, —

So painters fancy: here it was a fact.

And this their lily, — could they but transplant

And set in vase to stand by Solomon's porch

'Twixt lion and lion! — this Pompilia of
 theirs,

Could they see worthily married, well bestowed,

In house and home! And why despair of
 this

30 With Rome to choose from, save the topmost rank?

Themselves would help the choice with heart and soul,

Throw their late savings in a common
 heap

To go with the dowry, and be followed in
 time

By the heritage legitimately hers:

And when such paragon was found and
 fixed,

Why, they might chant their "Nunc dimittis" straight.

Indeed the prize was simply full to a fault, Exorbitant for the suitor they should seek,
 And social class should choose among, these cits.

Yet there's a latitude: exceptional white Amid the general brown o' the species, lurks

A burgess nearly an aristocrat, Legitimately in reach: look out for him!

What banker, merchant, has seen better
 days,

What second-rate painter a-pushing up, Poet a-slipping down, shall bid the best For this young beauty with the thumping purse?

Alack, were it but one of such as these So like the real thing that they pass for it,
 All had gone well! Unluckily, poor souls,
 It proved to be the impossible thing itself, Truth and not sham: hence ruin to them
 all.

For, Guido Franceschini was the head
 Of an old family in Arezzo, old
 To that degree they could afford be poor Better than most: the case is common too.
 Out of the vast door 'scutcheoned over-
 head,

Creeps out a serving-man on Saturdays
 To cater for the week, — turns up anon
 I' the market, chaffering for the lamb's least leg,

Or the quarter-fowl, less entrails, claws and comb:

Then back again with prize, — a liver begged

Into the bargain, gizzard overlooked.
 He's mincing these to give the beans a
 taste,

When, at your knock, he leaves the simmering soup,

Waits on the curious stranger-visitant, Napkin in half-wiped hand, to show the rooms,

 Point pictures out have hung their hundred years,

"Priceless," he tells you, — puts in his place at once

The man of money: yes, you're banker-
 king

Or merchant-kaiser, wallow in your wealth While patron, the house-master, can't afford

 To stop our ceiling-hole that rain so rots:

But he's the man of mark, and there's his
 shield,

And yonder's the famed Rafael, first in
 kind,

The painter painted for his grandfather,
 And you have paid to see: "Good morning, Sir!"

Such is the law of compensation. Still The poverty was getting nigh acute;

There gaped so many noble mouths to feed,
 Beans must suffice unflavoured of the fowl.
 The mother, — hers would be a spun-out life
 I' the nature of things; the sisters had done well
 And married men of reasonable rank:
 But that sort of illumination stops, Throws back no heat upon the parent-heart.
 The family instinct felt out for its fire
 To the Church, — the Church tradition-ally helps A second son: and such was Paolo, Established here at Rome these thirty years,
 Who played the regular game, — priest and Abate, Made friends, owned house and land, became of use
 To a personage: his course lay clear enough.
 The youngest caught the sympathetic flame,
 And, though unfledged wings kept him still i' the cage, Yet he shot up to be a Canon, so Clung to the higher perch and crowed in hope.
 Even our Guido, eldest brother, went As far i' the way o' the Church as safety seemed,
 He being Head o' the House, ordained to wive, — So, could but dally with an Order or two And testify good-will i' the cause: he clipped His top-hair and thus far affected Christ.
 But main promotion must fall otherwise, Though still from the side o' the Church: and here was he At Rome, since first youth, worn thread-bare of soul
 By forty-six years' rubbing on hard life, Getting fast tired o' the game whose word is — "Wait!"
 When one day, — he too having his Cardinal
 To serve in some ambiguous sort, as serve To draw the coach the plumes o' the horses' heads, —
 The Cardinal saw fit to dispense with him, Ride with one plume the less; and off it dropped.

Guido thus left, — with a youth spent in vain
 And not a penny in purse to show for it, — Advised with Paolo, bent no doubt in chafe
 The black brows somewhat formidably, growled

"Where is the good I came to get at Rome?
 "Where the repayment of the servitude 40
 "To a purple popinjay, whose feet I kiss,
 "Knowing his father wiped the shoes of mine?"
 "Patience," pats Paolo the recalcitrant —
 "You have not had, so far, the proper luck,
 "Nor do my gains suffice to keep us both:
 "A modest competency is mine, not more.
 "You are the Count, however, yours the style,
 "Heirdom and state, — you can't expect all good.
 "Had I, now, held your hand of cards . . . well, well —
 "What's yet unplayed, I'll look at, by your 50 leave,
 "Over your shoulder, — I who made my game,
 "Let's see, if I can't help to handle yours.
 "Fie on you, all the Honours in your fist,
 "Countship, Househeadship, — how have you misdealt!
 "Why, in the first place, these will marry a man!
 "Notum tonsoribus! ¹ To the Tonsor then!
 "Come, clear your looks, and choose your freshest suit,
 "And, after function's done with, down we go "To the woman-dealer in perukes, a wench
 "I and some others settled in the shop 60
 "At Place Colonna: she's an oracle. Hmm!
 "Dear, 'tis my brother: brother, 'tis my dear.
 "Dear, give us counsel! Whom do you suggest "As properest party in the quarter round
 "For the Count here? — he is minded to take wife,
 "And further tells me he intends to slip
 "Twenty zecchines under the bottom scalp
 "Of his old wig when he sends it to revive
 "For the wedding: and I add a trifle too.
 "You know what personage I'm potent 70 with."
 And so plumped out Pompilia's name the first.
 She told them of the household and its ways,
 The easy husband and the shrewder wife
 In Via Vittoria, — how the tall young girl, With hair black as yon patch and eyes as big

 See note on line 43, p. 668.

As yon pomander to make freckles fly, Would have so much for certain, and so much more

In likelihood, — why, it suited, slipped as smooth

As the Pope's pantoufle does on the Pope's
foot.

"I'll to the husband!" Guido ups and cries.

"Ay, so you'd play your last court-card, no doubt!"

10 "Puts Paolo in with a groan — "Only, you
see,

"'Tis I, this time, that supervise your lead.

"Priests play with women, maids, wives, mothers — why?

10 "These play with men and take them off our hands.

"Did I come, counsel with some cut-beard
gruff

"Or rather this sleek young-old barberess?

"Go, brother, stand you rapt in the anteroom

"Of Her Efficacy my Cardinal

"For an hour, — he likes to have lord-suits lounge, —

"While I betake myself to the grey mare,

"The better horse, — how wise the people's word! —

"And wait on Madam Violante."

Said and done.

He was at Via Vittoria in three skips:

20 Proposed at once to fill up the one want O' the burgess-family which, wealthy
enough,

And comfortable to heart's desire, yet
crouched

Outside a gate to heaven, — locked, bolted, barred,

Whereof Count Guido had a key he kept Under his pillow, but Pompilia's hand

Might slide behind his neck and pilfer
thence.

The key was fairy; its mere mention made Violante feel the thing shoot one sharp ray

That reached the womanly heart: so —
"I assent!

30 "Yours be Pompilia, hers and ours that key

"To all the glories of the greater life!

"There's Pietro to convince: leave that to
me!"

Then was the matter broached to Pietro;
then

Did Pietro make demand and get response

That in the Countship was a truth, but in The counting up of the Count's cash, a lie.

He thereupon stroked grave his chin, looked great,

Declined the honour. Then the wife wiped tear,

Winked with the other eye turned Paolo-
ward,

Whispered Pompilia, stole to church at
eve,

Found Guido there and got the marriage
done,

And finally begged pardon at the feet
Of her dear lord and master. Whereupon Quoth Pietro — "Let us make the best of

things!"

"I knew your love would license us," quoth she:

Quoth Paolo once more, "Mothers, wives and maids,

"These be the tools wherewith priests manage men."

Now, here take breath and ask, — which bird o' the brace

Decoyed the other into clapnet? Who Was fool, who knave? Neither and both,

perchance.

There was a bargain mentally proposed On each side, straight and plain and fair

enough;

Mind knew its own mind: but when mind must speak,

The bargain have expression in plain terms,

There came the blunder incident to words,
And in the clumsy process, fair turned foul.

The straight backbone-thought of the crooked speech

Were just — "I Guido truck my name and rank

"For so much money and youth and female charms. —

"We Pietro and Violante give our child

"And wealth to you for a rise i' the world
thereby."

Such naked truth while chambered in the brain

Shocks nowise; walk it forth by way of
tongue, —

Out on the cynical unseemliness!
Hence was the need, on either side, of a lie

To serve as decent wrappage: so, Guido
gives

Money for money, — and they, bride for groom,

Having, he, not a doit, they, not a child Honestly theirs, but this poor waif and stray.

According to the words, each cheated each;
But in the inexpressive barter of thoughts,

Each did give and did take the thing designed,

The rank on this side and the cash on
that —

Attained the object of the traffic, so.

The way of the world, the daily bargain
struck

In the first market! Why sells Jack his ware?
 "For the sake of serving an old customer." Why does Jill buy it? "Simply not to break
 "A custom, pass the old stall the first time."
 Why, you know where the gist is of the exchange: Each sees a profit, throws the fine words in.
 Don't be too hard o' the pair! Had each pretence Been simultaneously discovered, stript From off the body o' the transaction, just As—when a cook (will Excellency forgive?) Strips away those long rough superfluous legs From either side the crayfish, leaving folk
 A meal all meat henceforth, no garnishry, (With your respect, Prince!)—balance had been kept,
 No party blamed the other, — so, starting fair,
 All subsequent fence of wrong returned by wrong
 I' the matrimonial thrust and parry, at least Had followed on equal terms. But, as it chanced, One party had the advantage, saw the cheat
 Of the other first and kept its own concealed:
 And the luck o' the first discovery fell, beside,
 To the least adroit and self-possessed o' the pair.
 'Twas foolish Pietro and his wife saw first The nobleman was penniless, and screamed
 "We are cheated!"

Such unprofitable noise
 Angers at all times: but when those who plague,
 Do it from inside your own house and home, Gnats which yourself have closed the curtain round, Noise goes too near the brain and makes you mad.
 The gnats say, Guido used the candle-flame Unfairly, — worsened that first bad of his,
 By practising all kinds of cruelty To oust them and suppress the wail and whine, —
 That speedily he so scared and bullied them, Fain were they, long before five months had passed,

To beg him grant, from what was once their wealth,
 Just so much as would help them back to Rome Where, when they finished paying the last doit.
 O' the dowry, they might beg from door to door.
 So say the Comparini — as if it came 40
 Of pure resentment for this worse than bad,
 That then Violante, feeling conscience prick, Confessed her substitution of the child Whence all the harm fell, — and that Pietro first Bethought him of advantage to himself
 I' the deed, as part revenge, part remedy For all miscalculation in the pact.

On the other hand "Not so!" Guido retorts —
 "I am the wronged, solely, from first to last,
 "Who gave the dignity I engaged to give, 50
 "Which was, is, cannot but continue gain.
 "My being poor was a bye-circumstance,
 "Miscalculated piece of untowardness,
 "Might end to-morrow did heaven's windows ope,
 "Or uncle die and leave me his estate.
 "You should have put up with the minor flaw,
 "Getting the main prize of the jewel. If wealth,
 "Not rank, had been prime object in your thoughts,
 "Why not have taken the butcher's son, the boy
 "O' the baker or candlestick-maker? In 60 all the rest
 "It was yourselves broke compact and played false,
 "And made a life in common impossible.
 "Show me the stipulation of our bond
 "That you should make your profit of being inside
 "My house, to hustle and edge me out o' the same,
 "First make a laughing-stock of mine and me,
 "Then round us in the ears from morn to night
 "(Because we show wry faces at your mirth)
 "That you are robbed, starved, beaten and what not!
 "You fled a hell of your own lighting-up, 70
 "Pav for your own miscalculation too:
 "You thought nobility, gained at any price,
 "Would suit and satisfy, — find the mistake,

"And now retaliate, not on yourselves, but me.
 "And how? By telling me, i' the face of
 the world,
 "I it is have been cheated all this while,
 "Abominably and irreparably, — my
 name
 "Given to a cur-cast mongrel, a drab's brat,
 "A beggar's bye-blow, — thus depriving
 me
 "Of what yourselves allege the whole and sole
 "Aim on my part i' the marriage, — money, to-wit.
 "This thrust I have to parry by a
 guard 10 "Which leaves me open to a counter-
 thrust
 "On the other side, — no way but there's a pass
 "Clean through me. If I prove, as I hope
 to do,
 "There's not one truth in this your odious
 tale
 "O' the buying, selling, substituting —
 prove
 "Your daughter was and is your daughter, — well,
 "And her dowry hers and therefore mine, — what then?
 "Why, where's the appropriate punishment for this "Enormous lie hatched for mere malice'
 sake
 "To ruin me? Is that a wrong or no?
 20 "And if I try revenge for remedy, "Can I well make it strong and bitter
 enough?"

I anticipate however — only ask, Which of the two here sinned most? A nice point!
 Which brownness is least black, — decide
 who can,
 Wager-by-battle-of-cheating! What do you say,
 Highness? Suppose, your Excellency, we leave
 The question at this stage, proceed to the
 next,
 Both parties step out, fight their prize upon,
 In the eye o' the world?
 They brandish law 'gainst law; 30 The grinding of such blades, each parry of
 each,
 Throws terrible sparks off, over and above the thrusts,
 And makes more sinister the fight, to the
 eye,
 Than the very wounds that follow. Beside the tale
 Which the Comparini have to re-assert,

They needs must write, print, publish all abroad
 The straitnesses of Guido's household life —
 The petty nothings we bear privately But break down under when fools flock to jeer.
 What is it all to the facts o' the couple's
 case, How helps it prove Pompilia not their
 child,
 If Guido's mother, brother, kith and kin Fare ill, lie hard, lack clothes, lack fire.
 lack food?
 That's one more wrong than needs.

On the other hand, Guido, — whose cue is to dispute the
 truth
 O' the tale, reject the shame it throws on
 him, —
 He may retaliate, fight his foe in turn And welcome, we allow. Ay, but he can't!
 He's at home, only acts by proxy here:
 Law may meet law, — but all the gibes and jeers,
 The superfluity of naughtiness, Those libels on his House, — how reach at them?
 Two hateful faces, grinning all a-glow, Not only make parade of spoil they filched,
 But foul him from the height of a tower,
 you see.
 Unluckily temptation is at hand —
 To take revenge on a trifle overlooked,
 A pet lamb they have left in reach outside, Whose first bleat, when he plucks the wool
 away,
 Will strike the grinners grave: his wife remains
 Who, four months earlier, some thirteen years old,
 Never a mile away from mother's house
 And petted to the height of her desire, Was told one morning that her fate had
 come,
 She must be married — just as, a month
 before,
 Her mother told her she must comb her
 hair
 And twist her curls into one knot behind.
 These fools forgot their pet lamb, fed with
 flowers,
 Then 'ticed as usual by the bit of cake
 Out of the bower into the butchery.
 Plague her, he plagues them threefold:
 but how plague?
 The world may have its word to say to
 that:
 You can't do some things with impunity.
 What remains . . . well, it is an ugly
 thought . . .

But that he drive herself to plague herself —

Herself disgrace herself and so disgrace Who seek to disgrace Guido?

There's the clue

To what else seems gratuitously vile,
If, as is said, from this time forth the rack Was tried upon Pompilia: 'twas to wrench Her limbs into exposure that brings shame.
The aim o' the cruelty being so crueller
still,

That cruelty almost grows compassion's
self

Could one attribute it to mere return O' the parents' outrage, wrong avenging
wrong.

They see in this a deeper deadlier aim,
Not to vex just a body they held dear,
But blacken too a soul they boasted white,
And show the world their saint in a lover's
arms,
No matter how driven thither, — so they
say.

On the other hand, so much is easily said,
And Guido lacks not an apologist.

The pair had nobody but themselves to
blame.

Being selfish beasts throughout, no less,
no more:

— Cared for themselves, their supposed good, nought else,

And brought about the marriage; good proved bad,

As little they cared for her its victim —
nay,

Meant she should stay behind and take the chance,

If haply they might wriggle themselves free.
They baited their own hook to catch a fish

With this poor worm, failed o' the prize,
' and then

Sought how to unbait tackle, let worm float

Or sink, amuse the monster while they
'scaped.

Under the best stars Hymen brings above,
Had all been honesty on either side,

A common sincere effort to good end, Still, this would prove a difficult problem,

Prince!

— Given, a fair wife, aged thirteen years,
A husband poor, care-bitten, sorrow-sunk,

Little, long-nosed, bush-bearded, lanternjawed,

Forty-six years old, — place the two grown
one,

She, cut off sheer from every natural aid,
In a strange town with no familiar face —

He, in his own parade-ground or retreat If need were, free from challenge, much less check

To an irritated, disappointed will —

How evolve happiness from such a match?

'Twere hard to serve up a congenial dish
Out of these ill-agreeing morsels, Duke,
By the best exercise of the cook's craft,
Best interspersions of spice, salt and sweet!
But let two ghastly scullions concoct mess With brimstone, pitch, vitriol and devil'sdung —

Throw in abuse o' the man, his body and 50
soul,

Kith, kin and generation, shake all slab
At Rome, Arezzo, for the world to nose, Then end by publishing, for fiend's arch-
prank,

That, over and above sauce to the meat's
self,

Why, even the meat, bedevilled thus in dish,

Was never a pheasant but a carrion-crow —

Prince, what will then the natural loathing
be?

What wonder if this? — the compound plague o' the pair

Pricked Guido, — not to take the course they hoped,

That is, submit him to their statement's 60
truth,

Accept its obvious promise of relief,
And thrust them out of doors the girl

again
Since the girl's dowry would not enter

there,
— Quit of the one if balked of the other:

no!

Rather did rage and hate so work on him,
Their product proved the horrible conceit

That he should plot and plan and bring to pass

His wife might, of her own free will and
deed,

Relieve him of her presence, get her gone,
And yet leave all the dowry safe behind, 70

Confirmed his own henceforward past dispute,

While blotting out, as by a belch of hell,
Their triumph in her misery and death.

You see, the man was Aretine, had touch
O' the subtle air that breeds the subtle wit;

Was noble too, of old blood thrice-refined

That shrinks from clownish coarseness in disgust:

Allow that such an one may take revenge,
You don't expect he'll catch up stone and

fling,
Or try cross-buttock, or whirl quarter- 80
staff?

Instead of the honest drubbing clowns
bestow,

When out of temper at the dinner spoilt,

On meddling mother-in-law and tiresome wife, — Substitute for the clown a nobleman,
 And you have Guido, practising, 'tis said, Immitigably from the very first,
 The finer vengeance: this, they say, the fact O' the famous letter shows — the writing traced At Guido's instance by the timid wife Over the pencilled words himself writ first — Wherein she, who could neither write nor read, 10 Was made unblushingly declare a tale
 To the brother, the Abate then in Rome, How her putative parents had impressed,
 On their departure, their enjoinment; bade
 "We being safely arrived here, fellow, you!
 "Poison your husband, rob, set fire to all,
 "And then by means o' the gallant you procure
 "With ease, by helpful eye and ready tongue,
 "Some brave youth ready to dare, do and die,
 "You shall run off and merrily reach Rome 20 "Where we may live like flies in honey-pot:" — Such being exact the programme of the course Imputed her as carried to effect.

They also say, — to keep her straight therein,
 All sort of torture was piled, pain on pain,
 On either side Pompilia's path of life,
 Built round about and over against by fear, Circumvallated month by month, and week
 By week, and day by day, and hour by hour, Close, closer and yet closer still with pain, 30 No outlet from the encroaching pain save just Where stood one saviour like a piece of heaven, Hell's arms would strain round but for this blue gap.
 She, they say further, first tried every chink, Every imaginable break i' the fire,
 As way of escape: ran to the Commissary,
 Who bade her not malign his friend her spouse;
 Flung herself thrice at the Archbishop's feet,
 Where three times the Archbishop let her lie, Spend her whole sorrow and sob full heart forth, 40 And then took up the slight load from the ground

And bore it back for husband to chastise, Mildly of course, — but natural right is right.
 So went she slipping ever yet catching at help, Missing the high till come to lowest and last,
 To wit a certain friar of mean degree,
 Who heard her story in confession, wept, Crossed himself, showed the man within the monk.
 "Then, will you save me, you the one i' the world?
 "I cannot even write my woes, nor put "My prayer for help in words a friend may read, —
 "I no more own a coin than have an hour
 "Free of observance, — I was watched to church,
 "Am watched now, shall be watched back presently, —
 "How buy the skill of scribe i' the marketplace?
 "Pray you, write down and send whatever I say
 "O' the need I have my parents take me hence!"
 The good man rubbed his eyes and could not choose — Let her dictate her letter in such a sense That parents, to save breaking down a wall, Might lift her over: she went back, heaven in heart.
 Then the good man took counsel of his couch, Woke and thought twice, the second thought the best:
 "Here am I, foolish body that I be,
 "Caught all but pushing, teaching, who but I,
 "My betters their plain duty, — what, I dare
 "Help a case the Archbishop would not help,
 "Mend matters, peradventure, God loves mar?
 "What hath the married life but strifes and plagues
 "For proper dispensation? So a fool
 "Once touched the ark, — poor Uzzah that I am!
 "Oh married ones, much rather should I bid,
 "In patience all of ye possess your souls!
 "This life is brief and troubles die with it:
 "Where were the prick to soar up homeward else?"
 So saying, he burnt the letter he had writ,
 Said Ave for her intention, in its place, Took snuff and comfort, and had done with all.
 Then the grim arms stretched yet a little more

And each touched each, all but one streak
 i' the midst,
 Whereat stood Caponsacchi, who cried,
 "This way,
 "Out by me! Hesitate one moment more
 "And the fire shuts out me and shuts in
 you!
 "Here my hand holds you life out!"
 Whereupon
 She clasped the hand, which closed on hers and drew Pompilia out o' the circle now complete.
 Whose fault or shame but Guido's? — ask her friends.

But then this is the wife's — Pompilia's
 tale — Eve's . . . no, not Eve's, since Eve, to speak the truth, Was hardly fallen (our candour might pronounce)
 When simply saying in her own defence
 "The serpent tempted me and I did eat."
 So much of paradisal nature, Eve's!
 Her daughters ever since prefer to urge "Adam so starved me I was fain accept
 "The apple any serpent pushed my way."
 What an elaborate theory have we here, Ingeniously nursed up, pretentiously Brought forth, pushed forward amid trumpet-blast,
 To account for the thawing of an icicle,
 Show us there needed Ætna vomit flame Ere run the crystal into dew-drops! Else, How, unless hell broke loose to cause the
 step,
 How could a married lady go astray?
 Bless the fools! And 'tis just this way they are blessed,
 And the world wags still, — because fools are sure
 — Oh, not of my wife nor your daughter!
 No!
 But of their own: the case is altered quite.
 Look now, — last week, the lady we all
 love, —
 Daughter o' the couple we all venerate, Wife of the husband we all cap before, Mother o' the babes we all breathe blessings on, —
 Was caught in converse with a negro page.
 Hell thawed that icicle, else "Why was it —
 "Why?" asked and echoed the fools.
 "Because, you fools, —"
 So did the dame's self answer, she who could,
 With that fine candour only forthcoming When 'tis no odds whether withheld or
 no —
 "Because my husband was the saint you
 say,
 "And, — with that childish goodness, absurd faith,

"Stupid self-satisfaction, you so praise, —
 "Saint to you, insupportable to me.
 "Had he, — instead of calling me fine
 names,
 "Lucretia and Susanna and so forth,
 "And curtaining Correggio carefully
 "Lest I be taught that Leda had two legs, —
 "— But once never so little tweaked my nose
 "For peeping through my fan at Carnival, "Confessing thereby 'I have no easy 50
 task —
 "I need use all my powers to hold you
 mine,
 "And then, — why 'tis so doubtful if they serve,
 "That — take this, as an earnest of despair!"
 "Why, we were quits: I had wiped the harm away,
 "Thought 'The man fears me!' and foregone revenge."
 We must not want all this elaborate work To solve the problem why young Fancyand-flesh
 Slips from the dull side of a spouse in years, Betakes it to the breast of Brisk-and-bold Whose love-scrapes furnish talk for all the 60
 town!

Accordingly one word on the other side Tips over the piled-up fabric of a tale.
 Guido says — that is, always, his friends
 say —
 It is unlikely, from the wickedness,
 That any man treat any woman so.
 The letter in question was her very own, Unprompted and unaided: she could
 write —
 As able to write as ready to sin, or free,
 When there was danger, to deny both facts.
 He bids you mark, herself from first to last 70 Attributes all the so-styled torture just To jealousy, — jealousy of whom but just This very Caponsacchi! How suits here
 This with the other alleged motive,
 Prince?
 Would Guido make a terror of the man He meant should tempt the woman, as they charge?
 Do you fright your hare that you may catch your hare?
 Consider too, the charge was made and met At the proper time and place where proofs were plain — Heard patiently and disposed of thor- 80 oughly
 By the highest powers, possessors of most
 light,
 The Governor for the law, and the Archbishop
 For the gospel: which acknowledged primacies,

'Tis impudently pleaded, he could warp
 Into a tacit partnership with crime — He being the while, believe their own account,
 Impotent, penniless and miserable!
 He further asks — Duke, note the knotty
 point! —
 How he, — concede him skill to play such
 part
 And drive his wife into a gallant's arms, —
 Could bring the gallant to play his part too
 And stand with arms so opportunely wide?
 10 How bring this Caponsacchi, — with whom, friends
 And foes alike agree, throughout his life
 He never interchanged a civil word Nor lifted courteous cap to — him how bend
 To such observancy of beck and call,
 — To undertake this strange and perilous feat
 For the good of Guido, using, as the lure, Pompilia whom, himself and she avouch,
 He had nor spoken with nor seen, indeed, Beyond sight in a public theatre, 20 When she wrote letters (she that could not write!)
 The importunate shamelessly-protested
 love
 Which brought him, though reluctant, to her feet,
 And forced on him the plunge which,
 howsoe'er
 She might swim up i' the whirl, must bury
 him
 Under abysmal black: a priest contrive
 No better, no amour to be hushed up,
 But open flight and noon-day infamy?
 Try and concoct defence for such revolt!
 Take the wife's tale as true, say she was wronged, —
 30 Pray, in what rubric of the breviary Do you find it registered — the part of a
 priest
 Is — that to right wrongs from the church he skip,
 Go journeying with a woman that's a wife,
 And be pursued, o'ertaken and captured
 . . . how?
 In a lay-dress, playing the kind sentinel Where the wife sleeps (says he who best should know)
 And sleeping, sleepless, both have spent the night!
 Could no one else be found to serve at
 need —
 No woman — or if man, no safer sort 40 Than this not well-reputed turbulence?
 Then, look into his own account o' the
 case!
 He, being the stranger and astonished one,
 Yet received protestations of her love
 From lady neither known nor cared about:

Love, so protested, bred in him disgust
 After the wonder, — or incredulity, Such impudence seeming impossible.
 But, soon assured such impudence might
 be,
 When he had seen with his own eyes at last Letters thrown down to him i' the very street
 From behind lattice where the lady lurked, And read their passionate summons to her
 side —
 Why then, a thousand thoughts swarmed up and in, — How he had seen her once, a moment's
 space,
 Observed she was both young and beautiful,
 Heard everywhere report she suffered much From a jealous husband thrice her age, — in short
 There flashed the propriety, expediency Of treating, trying might they come to terms,
 — At all events, granting the interview Prayed for, one so adapted to assist Decision as to whether he advance, Stand or retire, in his benevolent mood!
 Therefore the interview befell at length;
 And at this one and only interview,
 He saw the sole and single course to take — Bade her dispose of him, head, heart and
 hand,
 Did her behest and braved the consequence,
 Not for the natural end, the love of man For woman whether love be virtue or vice,
 But, please you, altogether for pity's
 sake —
 Pity of innocence and helplessness!
 And how did he assure himself of both?
 Had he been the house-inmate, visitor, Eye-witness of the described martyrdom,
 So, competent to pronounce its remedy Ere rush on such extreme and desperate
 course —
 Involving such enormity of harm, Moreover, to the husband judged thus,
 doomed
 And damned without a word in his defence?
 Not he! the truth was felt by instinct here,
 — Process which saves a world of trouble and time.
 There's the priest's story: what do you say to it,
 Trying its truth by your own instinct too,
 Since that's to be the expeditious mode?
 "And now, do hear my version," Guido
 cries:
 "I accept argument and inference both.
 "It would indeed have been miraculous
 "Had such a confidency sprung to birth
 "With no more fanning from acquaintanceship

"Than here avowed by my wife and this priest.

"Only, it did not: you must substitute

"The old stale unromantic way of fault,

"The commonplace adventure, mere intrigue

"In prose form with the unpoetic tricks,

"Cheatings and lies: they used the hackney chair

"Satan jaunts forth with, shabby and serviceable,

"No gilded gimcrack-novelty from below,

"To bowl you along thither, swift and sure.

"That same officious go-between, the wench

"Who gave and took the letters of the two.

"Now offers self and service back to me:

"Bears testimony to visits night by night

"When all was safe, the husband far and away,

"To many a timely slipping out at large

"By light o' the morning-star, ere he should wake.

"And when the fugitives were found at last,

"Why, with them were found also, to belie

"What protest they might make of innocence,

"All documents yet wanting, if need were,

"To establish guilt in them, disgrace in me —

The chronicle o' the converse from its rise

"To culmination in this outrage: read!

"Letters from wife to priest, from priest to wife, —

"Here they are, read and say where they chime in

"With the other tale, superlative purity

"O' the pair of saints! I stand or fall by these."

But then on the other side again, — how say

The pair of saints? That not one word is theirs —

No syllable o' the batch or writ or sent

Or yet received by either of the two.

"Found," says the priest, "because he needed them,

"Failing all other proofs, to prove our fault:

"So, here they are, just as is natural.

"Oh yes — we had our missives, each of us!

"Not these, but to the full as vile, no doubt:

"Hers as from me, — she could not read, so burnt, —

"Mine as from her, — I burnt because I read.

"Who forged and found them? Cui profuerint!"¹

¹ Cui profuerint: "he who would profit by them?"

(I take the phrase out of your Highness' ⁴⁶ mouth)

"He who would gain by her fault and my fall,

"The trickster, schemer and pretender — he

"Whose whole career was lie entailing lie

"Sought to be sealed truth by the worst lie last!"

Guido rejoins — "Did the other end o' the tale

"Match this beginning! 'Tis alleged I prove

"A murderer at the end, a man of force

"Prompt, indiscriminate, effectual: good!

"Then what need all this trifling woman's-work,

"Letters and embassies and weak intrigue, ⁵⁰

"When will and power were mine to end at once

"Safely and surely? Murder had come first

"Not last with such a man, assure yourselves!

"The silent acquella,² stilling at command —

"A drop a day i' the wine or soup, the dose, —

"The shattering beam that breaks above the bed

"And beats out brains, with nobody to blame

"Except the wormy age which eats even oak, —

"Nay, the staunch steel or trusty cord, — who cares

"I' the blind old palace, a pitfall at each ⁶ step,

"With none to see, much more to interpose

"O' the two, three, creeping house-dog-servant-things

"Born mine and bred mine? Had I willed gross death,

"I had found nearer paths to thrust him prey

"Than this that goes meandering here and there

"Through half the world and calls down in its course

"Notice and noise, — hate, vengeance, should it fail,

"Derision and contempt though it succeed!

"Moreover, what o' the future son and heir?

"The unborn babe about to be called ⁷⁰ mine, —

"What end in heaping all this shame on him,

"Were I indifferent to my own black share?

² Acquella: a kind of slow poison.

"Would I have tried these crookednesses,
say,
"Willing and able to effect the straight?"
"Ay, would you!" — one may hear the priest retort,
"Being as you are, i' the stock, a man of
guile,
"And ruffianism but an added graft.
"You, a horn coward, try a coward's arms,
"Trick and chicane, — and only when these fail
"Does violence follow, and like fox you bite
"Caught out in stealing. Also, the disgrace 10 "You hardly shrunk at, wholly shrivelled
her:
"You plunged her thin white delicate hand i' the flame
"Along with your coarse horny brutish fist,
"Held them a second there, then drew out
both
"— Yours roughed a little, hers ruined through and through.
"Your hurt would heal forthwith at oint-ment's touch
"Namely, succession to the inheritance
"Which bolder crime had lost you: let things change,
"The birth o' the boy warrant the bolder
crime,
"Why, murder was determined, dared and
done.
20 "For me," the priest proceeds with his reply,
"The look o' the thing, the chances of mistake,
"All were against me, — that, I knew the
first:
"But, knowing also what my duty was,
"I did it: I must look to men more skilled "In reading hearts than ever was the
world."

Highness, decide! Pronounce, Her Excellency!
Or . . . even leave this argument in
doubt,
Account it a fit matter, taken up With all its faces, manifold enough, 30 To ponder on — what fronts us, the next
stage,
Next legal process? Guido, in pursuit, Coming up with the fugitives at the inn,
Caused both to be arrested then and there And sent to Rome for judgment on the
case —
Thither, with all his armoury of proofs, Betook himself: 'tis there we'll meet him
now,
Waiting the further issue.

Here you smile

"And never let him henceforth dare to plead. —

"Of all pleas and excuses in the world "For any deed hereafter to be done, — 4
"His irrepressible wrath at honour's
wound!
"Passion and madness irrepressible?
"Why, Count and cavalier, the husband
comes
"And catches foe i' the very act of shame!
"There's man to man, — nature must have her way, —
"We look he should have cleared things on the spot.
"Yes, then, indeed — even tho' it prove he erred —
"Though the ambiguous first appearance, mount
"Of solid injury, melt soon to mist,
"Still, — had he slain the lover and the
wife —
"Or, since she was a woman and his wife,
"Slain him, but stript her naked to the skin
"Or at best left no more of an attire
"Than patch sufficient to pin paper to,
"Some one love-letter, infamy and all,
"As passport to the Paphos¹ fit for such,
"Safe-conduct to her natural home the stews, —
"Good! One had recognized the power o' the pulse.
"But when he stands, the stock-fish, — sticks to law —
"Offers the hole in his heart, all fresh and warm,
"For scrivener's pen to poke and play
about —
"Can stand, can stare, can tell his beads
perhaps,
"Oh, let us hear no syllable o' the rage!
"Such rage were a convenient afterthought "For one who would have shown his teeth
belike,
"Exhibited unbridled rage enough,
"Had but the priest been found, as was to
hope,
"In serge, not silk, with crucifix, not
sword:
"Whereas the grey innocuous grub, of yore,
"Had hatched a hornet, tickle to the
touch,
"The priest was metamorphosed into knight.
"And even the timid wife, whose cue was
— shriek,
"Bury her brow beneath his trampling
foot, —
"She too sprang at him like a pythoness.
"So, gulp down rage, passion must be postponed,

¹ Paphos: Paphos, in Cyprus, was the headquarters of the worship of Aphrodite, which was there accompanied by licentious rites and practices.

- "Calm be the word! Well, cur word is — we brand
"This part o' the business, howsoever the rest
"Befall."
"Nay," interpose as prompt his friends,
"This is the world's way! So you adjudge reward
"To the forbearance and legality
"Yourselves begin by inculcating — ay,
"Exacting from us all with knife at throat!
"This one wrong more you add to wrong's amount, —
"You publish all, with the kind comment
here, 10 "Its victim was too cowardly for revenge."
Make it your own case, — you who stand
apart!
The husband wakes one morn from heavy
sleep,
With a taste of poppy in his mouth, —
rubs eyes,
Finds his wife flown, his strong box ransacked too,
Follows as he best can, overtakes i' the end.
You bid him use his privilege: well, it
seems He's scarce cool-blooded enough for the right move —
Does not shoot when the game were sure, but stands
Bewildered at the critical minute, — since 20 He has the first flash of the fact alone To judge from, act with, not the steady lights
Of after-knowledge, — yours who stand at ease
To try conclusions: he's in smother and
smoke,
You outside, with explosion at an end:
The sulphur may be lightning or a squib — He'll know in a minute, but till then, he doubts.
Back from what you know to what he knew not!
Hear the priest's lofty "I am innocent."
The wife's as resolute "You are guilty!"
Come!
30 Are you not staggered? — pause, and you lose the move!
Nought left you but a low appeal to law,
"Coward!" tied to your tail for compli-
ment!
Another consideration: have it your way!
Admit the worst: his courage failed the
Count,
He's cowardly like the best o' the burgesses He's grown incorporate with, — a very cur,
Kick him from out your circle by all means!
Why, trundled down this reputable stair,
- Still, the Church-door lies wide to take him
in,
And the Court-porch also: in he sneaks 40 to each, —
"Yes, I have lost my honour and my wife,
"And, being moreover an ignoble hound,
"I dare not jeopardize my life for them!"
Religion and Law lean forward from their chairs,
"Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" Ay, Not only applaud him that he scorned the
world,
But punish should he dare do otherwise.
If the case be clear or turbid, — you must
say!
- Thus, anyhow, it mounted to the stage In the law-courts, — let's see clearly from 50 this point! —
Where the priest tells his story true or false,
And the wife her story, and the husband
his,
All with result as happy as before.
The courts would nor condemn nor yet acquit
This, that or the other, in so distinct a sense
As end the strife to either's absolute loss:
Pronounced, in place of something definite,
"Each of the parties, whether goat or sheep
"I' the main, has wool to show and hair to hide.
"Each has brought somehow trouble, is 60 somehow cause
"Of pains enough, — even though no worse were proved.
"Here is a husband, cannot rule his wife
"Without provoking her to scream and scratch
"And scour the fields, — causelessly, it may be:
"Here is that wife, — who makes her sex our plague,
"Wedlock, our bugbear, — perhaps with cause enough:
"And here is the truant priest o' the trio,
worst
"Or best — each quality being conceivable.
"Let us impose a little mulct on each.
"We punish youth in state of pupillage 70
"Who talk at hours when youth is bound to
sleep,
"Whether the prattle turn upon Saint Rose
"Or Donna Olimpia of the Vatican:
"Tis talk, talked wisely or unwisely talked,
"I' the dormitory where to talk at all,
"Transgresses, and is mulct: as here we mean.
"For the wife, — let her betake herself, for rest,
"After her run, to a House of Convertites —
"Keep there, as good as real imprisonment:

- "Being sick and tired, she will recover so.
 "For the priest, spritely strayer out of bounds,
 "Who made Arezzo hot to hold him, — Rome
 "Profits by his withdrawal from the scene.
 "Let him be relegate to Civita,
 "Circumscribed by its bounds till matters mend:
 "There he at least lies out o' the way of harm
 "From foes — perhaps from the too friendly fair.
 "And finally for the husband, whose rash rule o "Has but itself to blame for this ado, —
 "If he be vexed that, in our judgments dealt,
 "He fails obtain what he accounts his right,
 "Let him go comforted with the thought, no less,
 "That, turn each sentence howsoever he may,
 "There's satisfaction to extract therefrom.
 "For, does he wish his wife proved innocent?
 "Well, she's not guilty, he may safely urge,
 "Has missed the stripes dishonest wives endure —
 "This being a fatherly pat o' the cheek, no more.
 20 "Does he wish her guilty? Were she otherwise "Would she be locked up, set to say her prayers,
 "Prevented intercourse with the outside world,
 "And that suspected priest in banishment,
 "Whose portion is a further help i' the case?
 "Oh, ay, you all of you want the other thing
 "The extreme of law, some verdict neat, complete, —
 "Either, the whole o' the dowry in your poke
 "With full release from the false wife, to boot,
 "And heading, hanging for the priest, beside — 30 "Or, contrary, claim freedom for the wife,
 "Repayment of each penny paid her spouse, Amends for the past, release for the future! Such
 "Is wisdom to the children of this world;
 "But we've no mind, we children of the light,
 "To miss the advantage of the golden mean,
 "And push things to the steel point."
 Thus the courts.
- X Is it settled so far? Settled or disturbed, Console yourselves: 'tis like . . . an instance, now!
 You've seen the puppets, of Place Navona, play, — Punch and his mate, — how threats pass, 40 blows are dealt,
 And a crisis comes: the crowd or clap or hiss Accordingly as disposed for man or wife —
 When down the actors duck awhile perdue, Donning what novel rag-and-feather trim Best suits the next adventure, new effect:
 And, — by the time the mob is on the move,
 With something like a judgment pro and con, —
 There's a whistle, up again the actors pop
 In t'other tatter with fresh-tinseled staves,
 To re-engage in one last worst fight more 50
 Shall show, what you thought tragedy was farce.
 Note, that the climax and the crown of things Invariably is, the devil appears himself, Armed and accoutred, horns and hoofs and tail!
 Just so, nor otherwise it proved — you'll see:
 Move to the murder, never mind the rest!
 Guido, at such a general duck-down,
 I' the breathing-space, — of wife to convent here, Priest to his relegation, and himself To Arezzo, — had resigned his part per- 60
 force
 To brother Abate, who bustled, did his best, Retrieved things somewhat, managed the three suits —
 Since, it should seem, there were three suits-at-law Behoved him look to, still, lest bad grow worse:
 First civil suit, — the one the parents brought,
 Impugning the legitimacy of his wife,
 Affirming thence the nullity of her rights:
 This was before the Rota, — Molinès, That's judge there, made that notable decree Which partly leaned to Guido, as I said, — 70
 But Pietro had appealed against the same To the very court will judge what we judge now — Tommati and his fellows, — Suit the first.
 Next civil suit, — demand on the wife's part Of separation from the husband's bed On plea of cruelty and risk to life — Claims restitution of the dowry paid, Immunity from paying any more:
 This second, the Vicegerent has to judge

Third and last suit, — this time, a criminal
one, —

Answer to, and protection from, both
these, —

Guido's complaint of guilt against his wife In the Tribunal of the Governor,

Venturini, also judge of the present cause.
Three suits of all importance plaguing him,

Beside a little private enterprise
Of Guido's, — essay at a shorter cut.

For Paolo, knowing the right way at Rome, 10 Had, even while superintending these three suits

I' the regular way, each at its proper court, Ingenuously made interest with the Pope

To set such tedious regular forms aside, And, acting the supreme and ultimate

judge,
Declare for the husband and against the

wife.
Well, at such crisis and extreme of straits, —

The man at bay, buffeted in this wise, —

Happened the strangest accident of all.
"Then," sigh friends, "the last feather broke his back, 20 "Made him forget all possible remedies

"Save one — he rushed to, as the sole relief
"From horror and the abominable thing."

"Or rather," laugh foes, "then did there befall

"The luckiest of conceivable events,
"Most pregnant with impunity for him,

"Which henceforth turned the flank of all attack,

"And bade him do his wickedest and worst."

— The wife's withdrawal from the Convertites,

Visit to the villa where her parents lived, 30 And birth there of his babe. Divergence
here!

I simply take the facts, ask what they show.
First comes this thunderclap of a surprise:

Then follow all the signs and silences Premonitory of earthquake. Paolo first

Vanished, was swept off somewhere, lost to
Rome:

(Wells dry up, while the sky is sunny and blue.)

Then Guido girds himself for enterprise, Hies to Vittiano, counsels with his steward,

Comes to terms with four peasants young and bold,

40 And starts for Rome the Holy, reaches her At very holiest, for 'tis Christmas Eve, And makes straight for the Abate's dried-up font,

The lodge where Paolo ceased to work the pipes.

And then, rest taken, observation made

And plan completed, all in a grim week,
The five proceed in a body, reach the place,

— Pietro's, at the Paolina, silent, lone,
And stupefied by the propitious snow.

'Tis one i' the evening: knock: a voice
"Who's there?"

"Friends with a letter from the priest your 50
friend."

At the door, straight smiles old Violante's
self.

She falls, — her son-in-law stabs through and through,

Reaches through her at Pietro — "With your son

"This is the way to settle suits, good
sire!"

He bellows "Mercy for heaven, not for
earth!

"Leave to confess and save my sinful soul,
"Then do your pleasure on the body of

me!"
— "Nay, father, soul with body must take its chance!"

He presently got his portion and lay still.

And last, Pompilia rushes here and there 60 Like a dove among the lightnings in her

brake,
Falls also: Guido's, this last husband's-

act.
He lifts her by the long dishevelled hair,

Holds her away at arm's length with one
hand,

While the other tries if life come from the mouth —

Looks out his whole heart's hate on the shut eyes,

Draws a deep satisfied breath, "So — dead at last!"

Throws down the burden on dead Pietro's knees,

And ends all with "Let us away, my
boys!"

And, as they left by one door, in at the other 70 Tumbled the neighbours — for the shrieks had pierced

To the mill and the grange, this cottage and that shed.

Soon followed the Public Force; pursuit

began Though Guido had the start and chose the road:

So, that same night was he, with the other four,

Overtaken near Baccano — where they sank

By the way-side, in some shelter meant for beasts,

And now lay heaped together, nuzzling

swine,
Each wrapped in bloody cloak, each grasping still His unwiped weapon, sleeping all the 80

same

The sleep o' the just, — a journey of twenty miles

Brought just and unjust to a level, you see.
The only one i' the world that suffered aught

By the whole night's toil and trouble, flight and chase,

Was just the officer who took them, Head
O' the Public Force,—Patrizj, zealous soul,
Who, having but duty to sustain weak flesh,
Got heated, caught a fever and so died:

A warning to the over-vigilant, —Virtue in a chafe should change her linen quick,

10 Lest pleurisy get start of providence.
(That's for the Cardinal, and told, I
think!)

Well, they bring back the company to
Rome.

Says Guido, "By your leave, I fain would ask

"How you found out 'twas I who did the
deed?

"What put you on my trace, a foreigner,
"Supposed in Arezzo,—and assuredly safe
"Except for an oversight: who told you,
pray?"

"Why, naturally your wife!" Down Guido drops

O' the horse he rode,—they have to steady and stay,

20 At either side the brute that bore him,
bound,

So strange it seemed his wife should live and speak!

She had prayed—at least so people tell you now—

For but one thing to the Virgin for herself, Not simply,—as did Pietro 'mid the stabs,—

Time to confess and get her own soul saved—

But time to make the truth apparent,
truth

For God's sake, lest men should believe a
lie:

Which seems to have been about the single
prayer

She ever put up, that was granted her.

40 With this hope in her head, of telling
truth,—

Being familiarized with pain, beside,— She bore the stabbing to a certain pitch Without a useless cry, was flung for dead
On Pietro's lap, and so attained her point.
Her friends subjoin this—have I done with them?—

And cite the miracle of continued life (She was not dead when I arrived just now)
As attestation to her probity.

Does it strike your Excellency? Why, your Highness,

40 The self-command and even the final
prayer,

Our candour must acknowledge explicable
As easily by the consciousness of guilt.

So, when they add that her confession runs
She was of wifehood one white innocence In thought, word, act, from first of her short life

To last of it; praying, i' the face of death,
That God forgive her other sins—not this,
She is charged with and must die for,
that she failed

Anyway to her husband: while thereon Comments the old Religious—"So much 50
good,

"Patience beneath enormity of ill,

"I hear to my confusion, woe is me,

"Sinner that I stand, shamed in the walk and gait

"I have practised and grown old in, by a
child!"—

Guido's friends shrug the shoulder, "Just this same

"Prodigious absolute calm in the last hour

"Confirms us,—being the natural result "Of a life which proves consistent to the close.

"Having braved heaven and deceived earth
throughout,

"She braves still and deceives still, gains 60
thereby

"Two ends, she prizes beyond earth or
heaven:

"First sets her lover free, imperilled sore

"By the new turn things take: he answers
yet

"For the part he played: they have summoned him indeed:

"The past ripped up, he may be punished
still:

"What better way of saving him than this?

"Then,—thus she dies revenged to the utmost

"On Guido, drags him with her in the
dark,

"The lower still the better, do you doubt?

"Thus, two ways, does she love her love 70 to the end,

"And hate her hate,—death, hell is no such price

"To pay for these,—lovers and haters
hold."

But there's another parry for the thrust.

"Confession," cry folks—"a confession,
think!

"Confession of the moribund is true!"

Which of them, my wise friends? This public one,

Or the private other we shall never know?

The private may contain,—your casuists teach,—

The acknowledgment of, and the penitence
for,

That other public one, so people say.

80 However it be,—we trench on delicate
ground,

Her Eminence is peeping o'er the cards, — Can one find nothing in behalf of this Catastrophe? Deaf folks accuse the dumb!
 You criticize the drunken reel, fool's speech, Maniacal gesture of the man, — we grant!
 But who poured poison in his cup, we ask?
 Recall the list of his excessive wrongs,
 First cheated in his wife, robbed by her kin, Rendered anon the laughing-stock o' the
 world 10 By the story, true or false, of his wife's
 birth, —
 The last seal publicly apposed to shame By the open flight of wife and priest, — why, Sirs,
 Step out of Rome a furlong, would you
 know
 What another guess tribunal than ours here, Mere worldly Court without the help of
 grace,
 Thinks of just that one incident o' the
 flight?
 Guido preferred the same complaint before The court at Arezzo, bar of the Granduke, — In virtue of it being Tuscany 20 Where the offence had rise and flight
 began, —
 Self-same complaint he made in the sequel
 here Where the offence grew to the full, the
 flight
 Ended: offence and flight, one fact judged twice
 By two distinct tribunals, — what result?
 There was a sentence passed at the same
 time
 By Arezzo and confirmed by the Granduke, Which nothing baulks of swift and sure
 effect
 But absence of the guilty, (flight to Rome Frees them from Tuscan jurisdiction now) 30 — Condemns the wife to the opprobrious
 doom
 Of all whom law just lets escape from
 death.
 The Stinche, House of Punishment, for
 life, —
 That's what the wife deserves in Tuscany:
 Here, she deserves — remitting with a
 smile
 To her father's house, main object of the
 flight!
 The thief presented with the thing he steals!
 At this discrepancy of judgments — mad,
 The man took on himself the office, judged
 And the only argument against the use 40 O' the law he thus took into his own hands Is . . . what, I ask you? — that, revenging wrong,
 He did not revenge sooner, kill at first Whom he killed last! That is the final charge.

Sooner? What's soon or late i' the case? — ask we.
 A wound i' the flesh no doubt wants prompt redress;
 It smarts a little to-day, well in a week, Forgotten in a month; or never, or now,
 revenge!
 But a wound to the soul? That rankles worse and worse.
 Shall I comfort you, explaining — “Not this once “But now it may be some five hundred 50
 times “I, called you ruffian, pandar, liar and rogue:
 “The injury must be less by lapse of time?”
 The wrong is a wrong, one and immortal
 too,
 And that you bore it these five hundred
 times,
 Let it rankle unrevengeed five hundred
 years,
 Is just five hundred wrongs the more and
 worse!
 Men, plagued this fashion, get to explode
 this way,
 If left no other.

“But we left this man “Many another way, and there's his fault,” 'Tis answered — “He himself preferred 60 our arm “O' the law to fight his battle with. No
 doubt “We did not open him an armoury “To pick and choose from, use, and then reject.
 “He tries one weapon and fails, — he tries the next “And next: he flourishes wit and common
 sense,
 “They fail him, — he plies logic doughtily, “It fails him too, — thereon, discovers last “He has been blind to the combustibles — “That all the while he is aglow with ire, “Boiling with irrepressible rage, and so 70 “May try explosives and discard cold
 steel, —
 “So hires assassins, plots, plans, executes!
 “Is this the honest self-forgetting rage “We are called to pardon? Does the furious bull “Pick out four help-mates from the grazing herd
 “And journey with them over hill and dale “Till he find his enemy?”

What rejoinder? save
 That friends accept our bull-similitude.
 Bull-like, — the indiscriminate slaughter,
 rude
 And reckless aggravation of revenge, 8c Were all i' the way o' the brute who never
 once

Ceases, amid all provocation more,
To bear in mind the first tormentor, first Giver o' the wound that goaded him to fight:

And, though a dozen follow and reinforce The aggressor, wound in front and wound in flank,

Continues undisturbedly pursuit,
And only after prostrating his prize Turns on the pettier, makes a general prey.

So Guido rushed against Violante, first 10 Author of his wrongs, fons et origo Malorum — drops first, deluge since, — which done,

He finished with the rest. Do you blame a bull?

In truth you look as puzzled as ere I preached!

How is that? There are difficulties perhaps

On any supposition, and either side.
Each party wants too much, claims sympathy

For its object of compassion, more than just.

Cry the wife's friends, "O the enormous
crime

"Caused by no provocation in the world!"

20 "Was not the wife a little weak?" — inquire —

"Punished extravagantly, if you please,

"But meriting a little punishment?

"One treated inconsiderately, say,

"Rather than one deserving not at all

"Treatment and discipline o' the harsher sort?"

No, they must have her purity itself,
Quite angel, — and her parents angels too Of an aged sort, immaculate, word and
deed:

At all events, so seeming, till the fiend, 30 Even Guido, by his folly, forced from them The untoward avowal of the trick o' the
birth,

Which otherwise were safe and secret now.
Why, here you have the awfulest of crimes For nothing! Hell broke loose on a butterfly

A dragon born of rose-dew and the moon!
Yet here is the monster! Why he's a mere
man —

Born, bred and brought up in the usual
way.

His mother loves him, still his brothers stick To the good fellow of the boyish games;

40 The Governor of his town knows and approves,

The Archbishop of the place knows and assists:

Here he has Cardinal This to vouch for the past,

Cardinal That to trust for the future, —
match

And marriage were a Cardinal's making, —
in short,

What if a tragedy be acted here Impossible for malice to improve,
And innocent Guido with his innocent four Be added, all five, to the guilty three,
That we of these last days be edified With one full taste o' the justice of the 50
world?

The long and the short is, truth seems what I show: —

Undoubtedly no pains ought to be spared
To give the mob an inkling of our lights.
It seems unduly harsh to put the man
To the torture, as I hear the court intends, Though readiest way of twisting out the
truth;

He is noble, and he may be innocent.

On the other hand, if they exempt the man (As it is also said they hesitate

On the fair ground, presumptive guilt is 60
weak

I' the case of nobility and privilege), — What crime that ever was, ever will be, Deserves the torture? Then abolish it!
You see the reduction ad absurdum, Sirs?

Her Excellency must pronounce, in fine!

What, she prefers going and joining play?

Her Highness finds it late, intends retire?

I am of their mind: only, all this talk talked,

'Twas not for nothing that we talked, I
hope?

Both know as much about it, now, at least, 70

As all Rome: no particular thanks, I beg!

(You'll see, I have not so advanced myself, After my teaching the two idiots here!)

V. — COUNT GUIDO FRANCESCHINI.

THANKS, Sir, but, should it please the reverend Court,

I feel I can stand somehow, half sit down Without help, make shift to even speak, you
see,

Fortified by the sip of . . . why, 'tis wine, Velletri, — and not vinegar and gall,

So changed and good the times grow!
Thanks, kind Sir!

Oh, but one sip's enough! I want my head 80
To save my neck, there's work awaits me
still.

How cautious and considerate . . . aie,
aie, aie,

Nor your fault, sweet Sir! Come, you take to heart

An ordinary matter. Law is law.

Noblemen were exempt, the vulgar thought,
From racking; but, since law thinks other-
wise,

I have been put to the rack: all's over now,

And neither wrist — what men style, out of joint:
If any harm be, 'tis the shoulder-blade,
The left one, that seems wrong i' the socket,
— Sirs, Much could not happen, I was quick to faint,
Being past my prime of life, and out of health.
In short, I thank you, — yes, and mean the
word.
Needs must the Court be slow to understand
How this quite novel form of taking pain,
This getting tortured merely in the flesh, Amounts to almost an agreeable change
In my case, me fastidious, plied too much With opposite treatment, used (forgive the joke)
To the rasp-tooth toying with this brain of
mine,
And, in and out my heart, the play o' the probe.
Four years have I been operated on I' the soul, do you see — its tense or tremulous part —
My self-respect, my care for a good name, Pride in an old one, love of kindred — just A mother, brothers, sisters, and the like,
That looked up to my face when days were dim,
And fancied they found light there — no one spot,
Foppishly sensitive, but has paid its pang.
That, and not this you now oblige me with,
That was the Vigil-torment, if you please!
The poor old noble House that drew the rags
O' the Franceschini's once superb array Close round her, hoped to slink unchallenged by, — Pluck off these! Turn the drapery inside
out
And teach the tittering town how scarlet wears!
Show men the lucklessness, the improvi-
dence
Of the easy-natured Count before this
Court,
The father I have some slight feeling for,
Who let the world slide, nor foresaw that
friends
Then proud to cap and kiss their patron's shoe,
Would, when the purse he left held spiderwebs, Properly push his child to wall one
day!
Mimic the tetchy humour, furtive glance,
And brow where half was furious, half fatigued,
O' the same son got to be of middle age, Sour, saturnine, — your humble servant
here, —

When things go cross and the young wife, he finds
Take to the window at a whistle's bid,
And yet demurs thereon, preposterous
fool! —
Whereat the worthies judge he wants advice
And beg to civilly ask what's evil here, Perhaps remonstrate on the habit they deem He's given unduly to, of beating her:
. . . Oh, sure he beats her — why says John so else,
Who is cousin to George who is sib to Tecla's self
Who cooks the meal and combs the lady's 50
hair?
What! 'Tis my wrist you merely dislocate For the future when you mean me martyrdom?
— Let the old mother's ecoromy alone,
How the brocade-strips saved o' the steamy
side
O' the wedding-gown buy raiment for a
year?
— How she can dress and dish up — lordly dish Fit for a duke, lamb's head and purte-nance —
With her proud hands, feast household so a week?
No word o' the wine rejoicing God and
man
The less when three-parts water? Then, 60
I say,
A trifle of torture to the flesh, like yours, While soul is spared such foretaste of hell-fire,
Is naught. But I curtail the catalogue Through policy, — a rhetorician's trick, — Because I would reserve some choicer points
O' the practice, more exactly parallel (Having an eye to climax) with what
gift,
Eventual grace the Court may have in store I' the way of plague — what crown of punishments.
When I am hanged or headed, time enough 70
To prove the tenderness of only that, Mere heading, hanging, — not their counterpart,
Not demonstration public and precise That I, having married the mongrel of a drab,
Am bound to grant that mongrel-brat, my
wife,
Her mother's birthright-licence as is just, — Let her sleep undisturbed, i' the family
style,
Her sleep out in the embraces of a priest,
Nor disallow their bastard as my heir!
Your sole mistake, — dare I submit so 80
much

To the reverend Court? — has been in all this pains
To make a stone roll down hill, — rack and wrench
And rend a man to pieces, all for what?
Why — make him ope mouth in his own
defence,

Show cause for what he has done, the irregular deed, (Since that he did it, scarce dispute can
be)

And clear his fame a little, beside the luck
Of stopping even yet, if possible, Discomfort to his flesh from noose or axe —

10 For that, out come the implements of
law!

May it content my lords the gracious Court To listen only half so patient-long As I will in that sense profusely speak, And — fie, they shall not call in screws to
help!

X I killed Pompilia Franceschini, Sirs; Killed too the Comparini, husband, wife,
Who called themselves, by a notorious lie,
Her father and her mother to ruin me.
There's the irregular deed: you want no
more

20 Than right interpretation of the same,
And truth so far — am I to understand?
To that then, with convenient speed, — because

Now I consider, — yes, despite my boast,
There is an ailing in this omoplat¹
May clip my speech all too abruptly short, Whatever the good-will in me. Now for
truth!

I' the name of the indivisible Trinity!
Will my lords, in the plenitude of their
light,

Weigh well that all this trouble has come on me

30 Through my persistent treading in the paths

Where I was trained to go, — wearing that yoke

My shoulder was predestined to receive,
Born to the hereditary stoop and crease?
Noble, I recognised my nobler still;
The Church, my suzerain; no mock-mistress, she;

The secular owned the spiritual: mates of
mine

Have thrown their careless hoofs up at her
call

"Forsake the clover and come drag my wain!"

There they go cropping: I protruded nose

40 To halter, bent my back of docile beast, And now am wheeled, one wide wound all
of me,

For being found at the eleventh hour o' the
day

Padding the mill-track, not neck-deep in grass:

— My one fault, I am stiffened by my
work,

— My one reward, I help the Court to
smile!

I am representative of a great line,
One of the first of the old families In Arezzo, ancientest of Tuscan towns.
When my worst foe is fain to challenge this,
His worst exception runs — not first in 50
rank

But second, noble in the next degree
Only; not malice's self maligns me more.
So, my lord opposite has composed, we
know,

A marvel of a book, sustains the point That Francis boasts the primacy 'mid saints;

Yet not inaptly hath his argument Obtained response from yon my other lord In thesis published with the world's applause

— Rather 'tis Dominic such post befits: Why, at the worst, Francis stays Francis 60
still,

Second in rank to Dominic it may be,
Still, very saintly, very like our Lord;
And I at least descend from Guido once Homager to the Empire, nought below — Of which account as proof that, none o' the line

Having a single gift beyond brave blood, Or able to do ought but give, give, give In blood and brain, in house and land and cash,

Not get and garner as the vulgar may,
We became poor as Francis or our Lord. 70
Be that as it likes you, Sirs, — whenever it chanced

Myself grew 'capable anyway of remark, (Which was soon — penury makes wit premature)

This struck me, I was poor who should be rich

Or pay that fault to the world which trifles
not

When lineage lacks the flag yet lifts the pole:

On, therefore, I must move forthwith, transfer

My stranded self, born fish with gill and fin Fit for the deep sea, now left flap bare-backed

In slush and sand, a show to crawlers vile 80 Reared of the low-tide and aright therein.

The enviable youth with the old name, Wide chest, stout arms, sound brow and pricking veins,

A heartful of desire, man's natural load,
A brainful of belief, the noble's lot, —

All this life, cramped and gasping, high and dry

- I the wave's retreat, — the misery, good
my lords,
Which made you merriment at Rome of
late, —
It made me reason, rather — muse, demand
— Why our bare dropping palace, in the street Where such-an-one whose grandfather sold tripe
Was adding to his purchased pile a fourth Tall tower, could hardly show a turret
sound?
Why Countess Beatrice, whose son I am, Cowered in the winter-time as she spun flax,
14 Blew on the earthen basket of live ash, Instead of jaunting forth in coach and six Like such-another widow who ne'er was
wed?
I asked my fellows, how came this about?
"Why, Jack, the suttler's child, perhaps the camp's,
"Went to the wars, fought sturdily, took a town
"And got rewarded as was natural.
"She of the coach and six — excuse me
there!
"Why, don't you know the story of her
friend?
"A clown dressed vines on somebody's estate.
20 "His boy recoiled from muck, liked Latin
more,
"Stuck to his pen and got to be a priest,
"Till one day . . . don't you mind that telling tract
"Against Molinos, the old Cardinal wrote?
"He penned and dropped it in the patron's desk
"Who, deep in thought and absent much of
mind,
"Licensed the thing, allowed it for his
own;
"Quick came promotion, — sum cuique,
Count!
"Oh, he can pay for coach and six, be
sure!"
"— Well, let me go, do likewise: war's the
word.— 30 "That way the Franceschini worked at
first,
"I'll take my turn, try soldiership."—
"What, you?
"The eldest son and heir and prop o' the
house,
"So do you see your duty? Here's your post,
"Hard by the hearth and altar. (Roam from roof,
"This youngster, play the gipsy out of doors,
"And who keeps kith and kin that fall on us?)
- "Stand fast, stick tight, conserve your gods
at home!"
"— Well then, the quiet course, the contrary trade!
"We had a cousin amongst us once was Pope,
"And minor glories manifold. Try the 40
Church,
"The tonsure, and, — since heresy's but half-slain
"Even by the Cardinal's tract he thought he wrote, —
"Have at Molinos!" — "Have at a fool's
head!
"You a priest? How were marriage possible?
"There must be Franceschini till time
ends —
"That's your vocation. Make your brothers priests,
"Paul shall be porporate,¹ and Girolamo
step
"Red-stockinged in the presence when you choose,
"But save one Franceschini for the age!
"Be not the vine but dig and dung its 51
root,
"Be not a priest but gird up priesthood's loins,
"With one foot in Arezzo stride to Rome,
"Spend yourself there and bring the purchase back!
"Go hence to Rome, be guided!"
- So I was.
- I turned alike from the hill-side zig-zag thread
Of way to the table-land a soldier takes, Alike from the low-lying pasture-place Where churchmen graze, recline and ruminate,
— Ventured to mount no platform like
my lords
Who judge the world, bear brain I dare not 60 brag —
But stationed me, might thus the expression serve,
As who should fetch and carry, come and
go, Meddle and make i' the cause my lords love
most —
The public weal, which hangs to the law, which holds
By the Church, which happens to be through God himself.
Humbly I helped the Church till here I
stand, —
Or would stand but for the omoplat, you
see!
Bidden qualify for Rome, I, having a field, Went, sold it, laid the sum at Peter's foot:
- ¹ Porporate' wearing purple, the colour of a cardinal.

Which means — I settled home-accounts with speed,
Set apart just a modicum should suffice
To hold the villa's head above the waves
Of weed inundating its oil and wine,
And prop roof, stanchion wall o' the palace
so

As to keep breath i' the body, out of heart Amid the advance of neighbouring lofti-
ness —

(People like building where they used to beg) —

Till succoured one day, — shared the residue

10 Between my mother and brothers and sisters there,

Black-eyed babe Donna This and Donna
That,

As near to starving as might decently be,
— Left myself journey-charges, change of suit,

A purse to put i' the pocket of the Groom O' the Chamber of the patron, and a glove
With a ring to it for the digits of the niece Sure to be helpful in his household, — then Started for Rome, and led the life prescribed.

Close to the Church, though clean of it, I assumed

20 Three or four orders of no consequence, — They cast out evil spirits and exorcise,
For example; bind a man to nothing more,
Give clerical savour to his layman's-salt, Facilitate his claim to loaf and fish Should miracle leave, beyond what feeds
the flock,

Fragments to brim the basket of a friend — While, for the world's sake, I rode, danced and gamed,

Quitted me like a courtier, measured mine
With whatsoever blade had fame in fence,

30 — Ready to let the basket go its round Even though my turn was come to help
myself,

Should Dives count on me at dinner-time
As just the understander of a joke
And not immoderate in repartee.

Utrique sic paratus,¹ Sirs, I said,

"Here," (in the fortitude of years fifteen, So good a pedagogue is penury)

"Here wait, do service, — serving and to serve!

"And, in due time, I nowise doubt at all,

40 "The recognition of my service comes.

"Next year I'm only sixteen. I can wait."

I waited thirty years, may it please the
Court:

Saw meanwhile many a denizen o' the dung Hop, skip, jump o'er my shoulder, make him wings

¹ Utrique sic paratus: "thus prepared for either (Church or world)."

And fly aloft, — succeed, in the usual
phrase,

Every one soon or late comes round by
Rome:

Stand still here, you'll see all in turn succeed.

Why, look you, so and so, the physician
here,

My father's lacquey's son we sent to school, Doctored and dosed this Eminence and 50

that,
Salved the last Pope his certain obstinate sore,

Soon bought land as became him, names it
now:

I grasp bell at his griffin-guarded gate, Traverse the half-mile avenue, — a term,²

A cypress, and a statue, three and three, — Deliver message from my Monsignor,

With varlety at lounge i' the vestibule I'm barred from who bear mud upon my shoe.

My father's chaplain's nephew, Chamberlain, —

Nothing less, please you! — courteous all 60
the same,

— He does not see me though I wait an hour

At his staircase-landing 'twixt the brace of busts,

A noseless Sylla, Marius maimed to match,
My father gave him for a hexastich³

Made on my birthday, — but he sends me
down,

To make amends, that relic I prize most —
The unburnt end o' the very candle, Sirs,

Purpled with paint so prettily round and
round,

He carried in such state last Peter's-day, —
In token I, his gentleman and squire, 70

Had held the bridle, walked his managed mule

Without a tittup the procession through.
Nay, the official, — one you know, sweet lords! —

Who drew the warrant for my transfer late To the New Prisons from Tordinona, —

Graciously had remembrance — "Francesc . . . ha?

"His sire, now — how a thing shall come
about! —

"Paid me a dozen florins above the fee,
"For drawing deftly up a deed of sale

"When troubles fell so thick on him, good 80
heart,

"And I was prompt and pushing! By all
means!

"At the New Prisons be it his son shall
lie, —

² Term: a figure of Terminus, the god of boundaries, consisting of only a bust, ending in a rectangular pedestal.

³ Hexastich: stanza of six lines.

"Anything for an old friend!" and thereat Signed name with triple flourish underneath.

These were my fellows, such their fortunes
now,

While I — kept fasts and feasts innumerable,

Matins and vespers, functions to no end
I' the train of Monsignor and Eminence, As gentleman-squire, and for my zeal's
reward

Have rarely missed a place at the table-
foot

Except when some Ambassador, or such
like,

20 Brought his own people. Brief, one day I felt

The tick of time inside me, turning-point And slight sense there was now enough of
this:

That I was near my seventh climacteric, Hard upon, if not over, the middle life,
And, although fed by the east-wind, fulsome-fine

With foretaste of the Land of Promise, still My gorge gave symptom it might play me
false;

Better not press it further, — be content With living and dying only a nobleman,

20 Who merely had a father great and rich,
Who simply had one greater and richer yet,
And so on back and back till first and best Began i' the night; I finish in the day.

"The mother must be getting old," I said;

"The sisters are well wedded away, our
name

"Can manage to pass a sister off, at need,
"And do for dowry: both my brothers thrive —

"Regular priests they are, nor, bat-like,
'bide

"Twixt flesh and fowl with neither privilege.

30 "My spare revenue must keep me and mine.

"I am tired: Arezzo's air is good to breathe:

"Vittiano; — one limes flocks of thrushes
there;

"A leathern coat costs little and lasts long:

"Let me bid hope good-bye, content at
home!"

Thus, one day, I disbosomed me and bowed.

Whereat began the little buzz and thrill O' the gazers round me; each face brightened up:

As when at your Casino, deep in dawn,
A gamester says at last, "I play no more,

40 "Forego gain, acquiesce in loss, withdraw

"Anyhow:" and the watchers of his ways,
A trifle struck compunctious at the word, Yet sensible of relief, breathe free once
more,

Break up the ring, venture polite advice —

"How, Sir? So scant of heart and hope
indeed?

"Retire with neither cross nor pile from
play? —

"So incurious, so short-casting? — give your chance

"To a younger, stronger, bolder spirit be-
like,

"Just when luck turns and the fine throw sweeps all?"

Such was the chorus: and its goodwill 50 meant —

"See that the loser leave door handsomely!

"There's an ill look, — it's sinister, spoils
sport,

"When an old bruised and battered year-by-year

"Fighter with fortune, not a penny in poke,

"Reels down the steps of our establishment

"And staggers on broad daylight and the
world,

"In shagrag beard and doleful doublet, drops

"And breaks his heart on the outside:
people prate

"Such is the profit of a trip upstairs!"

"Contrive he sidle forth, baulked of the 60
blow

"Best dealt by way of moral, bidding down

"No curse but blessings rather on our heads

"For some poor prize he bears at tattered
breast,

"Some palpable sort of kind of good to set

"Over and against the grievance: give him
quick!"

Whereon protested Paul, "Go hang yourselves!

"Leave him to me. Count Guido and brother of mine,

"A word in your ear! Take courage, since faint heart

"Ne'er won . . . aha, fair lady, don't men say?

"There's a sors, there's a right Virgilian dip! 70

"Do you see the happiness o' the hint?
At worst,

"If the Church want no more of you, the
Court

"No more, and the Camp as little, the in-grates, — come,

"Count you are counted: still you've coat to back,

"Not cloth of gold and tissue, as we hoped,
"But cloth with sparks and spangles on its frieze

"From Camp, Court, Church, enough to make a shine,

"Entitle you to carry home a wife

"With the proper dowry, let the worst betide!

"Why, it was just a wife you meant to 80
take!"

Now, Paul's advice was weighty: priests should know:

And Paul apprised me, ere the week was out,

That Pietro and Violante, the easy pair,
The cits enough, with stomach to be more,
Had just the daughter and exact the sum To truck for the quality of myself: "She's young,

"Pretty and rich: you're noble, classic,
choice.

"Is it to be a match?" "A match," said I.
Done! He proposed all, I accepted all,

10 And we performed all. So I said and did Simply. As simply followed, not at first But with the outbreak of misfortune, still One comment on the saying and doing —
"What?

"No blush at the avowal you dared buy
"A girl of age beseems your granddaughter,

"Like ox or ass? Are flesh and blood a ware?

"Are heart and soul a chattel?"

Softly, Sirs!

Will the Court of its charity teach poor me Anxious to learn, of any way i' the world, 20 Allowed by custom and convenience, save This same which, taught from my youth up, I trod?

Take me along with you; where was the wrong step?

If what I gave in barter, style and state
And all that hangs to Franceschinihood, Were worthless, — why, society goes to
ground,

Its rules are idiot's-rambling. Honour of
birth, —

If that thing has no value, cannot buy Something with value of another sort, You've no reward nor punishment to give

30 I' the giving or the taking honour; straight Your social fabric, pinnacle to base, Comes down a-clatter like a house of cards.
Get honour, and keep honour free from flaw,

Aim at still higher honour, — gabble o' the goose!

Go bid a second blockhead like myself Spend fifty years in guarding bubbles of
breath,

Soapsuds with air i' the belly, gilded brave, Guarded and guided, all to break at touch O' the first young girl's hand and first old fool's purse!

40 All my privation and endurance, all Love, loyalty and labour dared and did, Fiddle-de-dee! — why, doer and darer
both, —

Count Guido Franceschini had hit the mark

Far better, spent his life with more effect,
As a dancer or a prizer, trades that pay!

On the other hand, bid this buffoonery
cease,

Admit that honour is a privilege,
The question follows, privilege worth
what?

Why, worth the market-price, — now up,
now down,

Just so with this as with all other ware: 50

Therefore essay the market, sell your name, Style and condition to who buys them best!

"Does my name purchase," had I dared inquire,

"Your niece, my lord?" there would have been rebut!

Though courtesy, your Lordship cannot
else

"Not altogether! Rank for rank may
stand:

"But I have wealth beside, you — poverty;

"Your scale flies up there: bid a second bid

"Rank too and wealth too!" Reasoned like yourself!

But was it to you I went with goods to sell? 60

This time 'twas my scale quietly kissed the
ground,

Mere rank against mere wealth — some youth beside,

Some beauty too, thrown into the bargain,
just

As the buyer likes or lets alone. I thought To deal o' the square: others find fault, it
seems:

The thing is, those my offer most concerned,

Pietro, Violante, cried they fair or foul?

What did they make o' the terms? Preposterous terms?

Why then accede so promptly, close with
such

Nor take a minute to chaffer? Bargain 70
struck,

They straight grew bilious, wished their money back,

Repented them, no doubt: why, so did I,
So did your Lordship, if town-talk be true,
Of paying a full farm's worth for that
piece

By Pietro of Cortona — probably His scholar Ciro Ferri may have re-
touched —

You caring more for colour than design —
Getting a little tired of cupids too.

That's incident to all the folk who buy!

I am charged, I know, with gilding fact by 80 fraud;

I falsified and fabricated, wrote Myself down roughly richer than I prove, Rendered a wrong revenue, — grant it all!
Mere grace, mere coquetry such fraud, I
say:

A flourish round the figures of a sum

For fashion's sake, that deceives nobody.
 The veritable back-bone, understood Essence of this same bargain, blank and
 bare,
 Being the exchange of quality for wealth, What may such fancy-flights be? Flecks of oil Flirted by chapmen where plain dealing grates.
 I may have dripped a drop — "My name
 I sell;
 "Not but that I too boast my wealth" — as they,
 "— We bring you riches; still our ancestor 10 "Was hardly the rapsallion folk saw flogged,
 "But heir to we know who, were rights of force!"
 They knew and I knew where the backbone lurked
 I' the writhings of the bargain, lords, believe!
 I paid down all engaged for, to a doit, Delivered them just that which, their life
 long,
 They hungered in the hearts of them to
 gain — Incorporation with nobility thus In word and deed: for that they gave me
 wealth.
 But when they came to try their gain, my
 gift, 20 Quit Rome and qualify for Arezzo, take The tone o' the new sphere that absorbed
 the old,
 Put away gossip Jack and goody Joan
 And go become familiar with the Great, Greatness to touch and taste and handle
 now, —
 Why then, — they found that all was vānity,
 Vexation, and what Solomon describes!
 The old abundant city-fare was best,
 The kindly warmth o' the commons, the glad clap
 Of the equal on the shoulder, the frank grin
 30 Of the underling at all so many spoons Fire-new at neighbourly treat, — best, best and best Beyond compare! — down to the loll itself O' the pot-house settle, — better such a bench
 Than the stiff crucifixion by my dais
 Under the piecemeal damask canopy
 With the coroneted coat of arms a-top!
 Poverty and privation for pride's sake, All they engaged to easily brave and
 bear, —
 With the fit upon them and their brains a-work, — 40 Proved unendurable to the sobered sots.
 A banished prince, now, will exude a juice

And salamander-like support the flame:
 He dines on chestnuts, chucks the husks to
 help
 The broil o' the brazier, pays the due baioc,¹ Goes off light-hearted: his grimace begins At the funny humours of the christening-
 feast
 Of friend the money-lender, — then he's touched
 By the flame and frizzles at the babe to kiss!
 Here was the converse trial, opposite mind:
 Here did a petty nature split on rock 56 Of vulgar wants predestinate for such — One dish at supper and weak wine to boot!
 The prince had grinned and borne: the citizen shrieked, Summoned the neighbourhood to attest the
 wrong,
 Made noisy protest he was murdered, — stoned
 And burned and drowned and hanged, — then broke away,
 He and his wife, to tell their Rome the rest.
 And this you admire, you men o' the world,
 my lords?
 This moves compassion, makes you doubt my faith?
 Why, I appeal to . . . sun and moon? 60
 Not I!
 Rather to Plautus, Terence, Boccaccio's
 Book,
 My townsman, frank Ser Franco's² merry Tales, —
 To all who strip a vizard from a face,
 A body from its padding, and a soul
 From froth and ignorance it styles itself, —
 If this be other than the daily hap Of purblind greed that dog-like still drops
 bone,
 Grasps shadow, and then howls the case is hard!

So much for them so far: now for myself,
 My profit or loss i' the matter: married 70
 am I: Text whereon friendly censurs burst to preach.
 Ay, at Rome even, long ere I was left To regulate her life for my young bride Alone at Arezzo, friendliness outbroke (Sifting my future to predict its fault)
 "Purchase and sale being thus so plain a
 point,
 "How of a certain soul bound up, may-be,

² Ser Franco: apparently Sacchetti, see p. 741, l. 17. Petrarch, to whom the term "townsman" better applies (since Sacchetti, though a Tuscan, was a Florentine), wrote nothing that can be described as "merry tales."

"I' the barter with the body and money-bags?

"From the bride's soul what is it you expect?"

Why, loyalty and obedience, — wish and will

To settle and suit her fresh and plastic mind

To the novel, not disadvantageous mould!

Father and mother shall the woman leave,

Cleave to the husband, be it for weal or woe:

There is the law: what sets this law aside
In my particular case? My friends submit 15 "Guide, guardian, benefactor, — fee, faw, fum,

"The fact is you are forty-five years old,

"Nor very comely even for that age:

"Girls must have boys." Why, let girls say so then,

Nor call the boys and men, who say the same,

Brute this and beast the other as they do!

Come, cards on table! When you chaunt us next

Epithalamium full to overflow

With praise and glory of white womanhood,

The chaste and pure — troll no such lies o'er lip!

20 Put in their stead a crudity or two,
Such short and simple statement of the case

As youth chalks on our walls at spring of year!

No! I shall still think nobler of the sex, Believe a woman still may take a man

For the short period that his soul wears flesh,

And, for the soul's sake, understand the fault

Of armour frayed by fighting. Tush, it tempts

One's tongue too much! I'll say — the law's the law:

With a wife I look to find all wifeliness,

30 As when I buy, timber and twig, a tree —
I buy the song o' the nightingale inside.

Such was the pact: Pompilia from the first Broke it, refused from the beginning day

Either in body or soul to cleave to mine,
And published it forthwith to all the world.

No rupture, — you must join ere you can break, —

Before we had cohabited a month
She found I was a devil and no man, —

Made common cause with those who found as much,

40 Her parents, Pietro and Violante, — moved Heaven and earth to the rescue of all three.

In four months' time, the time o' the parents' stay

Arezzo was a-ringing, bells in a blaze,
With the unimaginable story rife

I' the mouth of man, woman and child — to-wit

My misdemeanour. First the lighter side, Ludicrous face of things, — how very poor

The Franceschini had become at last,
The meanness and the misery of each shift

To save a soldo,¹ stretch and make ends meet.

Next, the more hateful aspect, — how myself

With cruelty beyond Caligula's Had stripped and beaten, robbed and murdered them,

The good old couple, I decoyed, abused, Plundered and then cast out, and happily so,

Since, — in due course the abominable comes, —

Woe worth the poor young wife left lonely here!

Repugnant in my person as my mind,
I sought, — was ever heard of such revenge?

— To lure and bind her to so cursed a couch,

Such co-embrace with sulphur, snake and toad,

That she was fain to rush forth, call the stones

O' the common street to save her, not from hate

Of mine merely, but . . . must I burn my lips

With the blister of the lie? . . . the satyr-love

Of who but my own brother, the young priest,

Too long enforced to lenten fare belike,
Now tempted by the morsel tossed him full

I' the trencher where lay bread and herbs at best.

Mark, this yourselves say! — this, none disallows,

Was charged to me by the universal voice
At the instigation of my four-months' wife! —

And then you ask "Such charges so preferred,

"(Truly or falsely, here concerns us not) "Pricked you to punish now if not before? —

"Did not the harshness double itself, the hate

"Harden?" I answer "Have it your way and will!"

Say my resentment grew apace: what then?

- Do you cry out on the marvel? When I
 find
 That pure smooth egg which, laid within my nest,
 Could not but hatch a comfort to us all,
 Issues a cockatrice for me and mine,
 Do you stare to see me stamp o' it?
 Swans are soft:
 Is it not clear that she you call my wife,
 That any wife of any husband, caught Whetting a sting like this against his
 breast, —
 Speckled with fragments of the fresh-broke shell,
- 10 Married a month and making outcry
 thus, —
 Proves a plague-prodigy to God and man?
 She married: what was it she married for,
 Counted upon and meant to meet thereby?
 "Love" suggests some one, "love, a little
 word
 "Whereof we have not heard one syllable."
 So, the Pompilia, child, girl, wife, in one, Wanted the beating pulse, the rolling eye,
 The frantic gesture, the devotion due From Thyrsis to Neëra! Guido's love —
- 20 Why not Provençal roses in his shoe, Plume to his cap, and trio of guitars At casement, with a bravo close beside?
 Good things all these are, clearly claimable When the fit price is paid the proper
 way.
 Had it been some friend's wife, now, threw her fan
 At my foot, with just this pretty scrap attached,
 "Shame, death, damnation — fall these as they may,
 "So I find you, for a minute! Come this eve!"
 — Why, at such sweet self-sacrifice, —
 who knows?
- 30 I might have fired up, found me at my
 post,
 Ardent from head to heel, nor feared catch cough.
 Nay, had some other friend's . . . say, daughter, tripped
 Upstairs and tumbled flat and frank on me, Bareheaded and barefooted, with loose
 hair
 And garments all at large, — cried "Take me thus!
 "Duke So-and-So, the greatest man in Rome —
 "To escape his hand and heart have I broke bounds,
 "Traversed the town and reached you!"
 — then, indeed,
 The lady had not reached a man of ice!
- 40 I would have rummaged, ransacked at the
 word
 Those old odd corners of an empty heart
- For remnants of dim love the long disused, And dusty crumbings of romance! But
 here,
 We talk of just a marriage, if you please —
 The every-day conditions and no more;
 Where do these bind me to bestow one
 drop
 Of blood shall dye my wife's true-love-knot pink?
 Pompilia was no pigeon, Venus' pet,
 That shuffled from between her pressing paps
 To sit on my rough shoulder, — but a 50 hawk,
 I bought at a hawk's price and carried
 home
 To do hawk's service — at the Rotunda,
 say,
 Where, six o' the callow nestlings in a row, You pick and choose and pay the price for
 such.
 I have paid my pound, await my penny's
 worth,
 So, hoodwink, starve and properly train
 my bird,
 And, should she prove a haggard, — twist her neck!
 Did I not pay my name and style, my hope And trust, my all? Through spending these amiss
 I am here! 'Tis scarce the gravity of the 60
 Court
 Will blame me that I never piped a tune, Treated my falcon-gentle like my finch.
 The obligation I incurred was just To practise mastery, prove my master-
 ship: —
 Pompilia's duty was — submit herself, Afford me pleasure, perhaps cure my bile.
 Am I to teach my lords what marriage
 means,
 What God ordains thereby and man fulfils Who, docile to the dictate, treads the
 house?
 My lords have chosen the happier part 70 with Paul And neither marry nor burn, — yet priestliness
 Can find a parallel to the marriage-bond
 In its own blessed special ordinance Whereof indeed was marriage made the type:
 The Church may show her insubordinate, As marriage her refractory. How of the Monk
 Who finds the claustral regimen too sharp After the first month's essay? What's the mode
 With the Deacon who supports indifferently
 The rod o' the Bishop when he tastes its 80 smart

Full four weeks? Do you straightway slacken hold

Of the innocents, the all-unwary ones Who, eager to profess, mistook their
mind? —

Remit a fast-day's rigour to the Monk Who fancied Francis' manna meant roast quails, —

Concede the Deacon sweet society, He never thought the Levite-rule renounced, —

Or rather prescribe short chain and sharp scourge

Corrective of such peccant humours?
This —

10 I take to be the Church's mode, and mine.
If I was over-harsh, — the worse i' the wife Who did not win from harshness as she ought,

Wanted the patience and persuasion, lore
Of love, should cure me and console her-
self.

Put case that I mishandle, flurry and fright

My hawk through clumsiness in sportsman-
ship,

Twitch out five pens where plucking one would serve —

What, shall she bite and claw to mend the
case?

20 And, if you find I pluck five more for that, Shall you weep "How he roughs the turtle
there"?

Such was the starting; now of the further
step.

In lieu of taking penance in good part,
The Monk, with hue and cry, summons a mob

To make a bonfire of the convent, say, —
And the Deacon's pretty piece of virtue (save

The ears o' the Court! I try to save my
head)

Instructed by the ingenuous postulant, Taxes the Bishop with adultery, (mud Needs must pair off with mud, and filth with filth) —

30 Such being my next experience. Who knows not —

The couple, father and mother of my wife, Returned to Rome, published before my
lords,

Put into print, made circulate far and wide That they had cheated me who cheated
them?

Pompilia, I supposed their daughter, drew Breath first 'mid Rome's worst rankness, through the deed

Of a drab and a rogue, was by-blow bastard-babe

Of a nameless strumpet, passed off, palm'd on me

As the daughter with the dowry. Daughter? Dirt

O' the kennel! Dowry? Dust o' the 40 street! Nought more, Nought less, nought else but — oh — ah — assuredly

A Franceschini and my very wife!
Now take this charge as you will, for false or true, —

This charge, preferred before your very
selves

Who judge me now, — I pray you, adjudge again,

Classing it with the cheats or with the lies,
By which category I suffer most!

But of their reckoning, theirs who dealt
with me

In either fashion, — I reserve my word, Justify that in its place; I am now to 50
say,

Whichever point o' the charge might poison most,

Pompilia's duty was no doubtful one.
You put the protestation in her mouth

"Henceforward and forevermore, avault "Ye fiends, who drop disguise and glare revealed

"In your own shape, no longer father
mine

"Nor mother mine! Too nakedly you hate

"Me whom you locked as if you loved once, — me

"Whom, whether true or false, your tale now damns,

"Divulged thus to my public infamy, 60
"Private perdition, absolute overthrow.

"For, hate my husband to your hearts'
content,

"I, spoil and prey of you from first to last,
"I, who have done you the blind service,
lured

"The lion to your pitfall, — I, thus left "To answer for my ignorant bleating
there,

"I should have been remembered and withdrawn

"From the first o' the natural fury, not flung loose

"A proverb and a by-word men will
mouth

"At the cross-way, in the corner, up and 70
down

"Rome and Arezzo, — there, full in my
face,

"If my lord, missing them and finding
me,

"Content himself with casting his reproach
"To drop i' the street where such impostors
die.

"Ah, but — that husband, what the wonder were! —

"If, far from casting thus away the rag

"Smeared with the plague his hand had chanced upon,
"Sewn to his pillow by Locusta's¹ wile, —
"Far from abolishing, root, stem and branch,
"The misgrowth of infectious mistletoe
"Foisted into his stock for honest graft, —
"If he repudiate not, renounce nowise,
"But, guarding, guiding me, maintain my
cause
"By making it his own, (what other way?)
" — To keep my name for me, he call it
his,
"Claim it of who would take it by their
lie, —
"To save my wealth for me — or babe of
mine
"Their lie was framed to beggar at the
birth —
"He bid them loose grasp, give our gold
again:
"If he become no partner with the pair
"Even in a game which, played adroitly,
gives
"It's winner life's great wonderful new
chance, —
"Of marrying, to-wit, a second time, —
"Ah, if he did thus, what a friend were he!
"Anger he might show, — who can stamp out flame
"Yet spread no black o' the brand? — yet, rough albeit
"In the act, as whose bare feet feel embers scorch,
"What grace were his, what gratitude were mine!"
Such protestation should have been my wife's.
Looking for this, do I exact too much?
Why, here's the, — word for word, so much, no more, — Avowal she made, her pure spontaneous
speech
To my brother the Abate at first blush, Ere the good impulse had begun to fade:
So did she make confession for the pair,
So pour forth praises in her own behalf.
"Ay, the false letter," interpose my lords —
"The simulated writing, — 'twas a trick:
"You traced the signs, she merely marked
the same,
"The product was not hers but yours."
Alack,
I want no more impulsion to tell truth
From the other trick, the torture inside
there!
I confess all — let it be understood — And deny nothing! If I baffle you so,
Can so fence, in the plenitude of right,
That my poor lathen dagger puts aside

¹ Locusta: the name of a notorious female poisoner at Rome in the first century; hence typical of any poisoner.

Each pass o' the Bilboa, beats you all the
same, —
What matters inefficiency of blade?
Mine and not hers the letter, — conceded,
lords!
Impute to me that practice! — take as proved
I taught my wife her duty, made her see What it behoved her see and say and do, Feel in her heart and with her tongue
declare,
And, whether sluggish or recalcitrant, Forced her to take the right step, I myself
Was marching in marital rectitude!
Why who finds fault here, say the tale be
true?
Would not my lords commend the priest whose zeal
Seized on the sick, morose or moribund,
By the palsy-smitten finger, made it cross His brow correctly at the critical time?
— Or answered for the inarticulate babe At baptism, in its stead declared the faith, And saved what else would perish unpro-fessed?
True, the incapable hand may rally yet, Renounce the sign with renovated 60
strength, —
The babe may grow up man and Molinist, —
And so Pompilia, set in the good path
And left to go alone there, soon might see That too frank-forward, all too simple-
straight
Her step was, and decline to tread the rough,
When here lay, tempting foot, the mead-owside,
And there the coppice rang with singing-birds!
Soon she discovered she was young and
fair,
That many in Arezzo knew as much.
Yes, this next cup of bitterness, my lords, 70
Had to begin go filling, drop by drop,
Its measure up of full disgust for me, Filtered into by every noisome drain — Society's sink toward which all moisture runs.
Would not you prophesy — "She on whose brow is stamped
"The note of the imputation that we
know, —
"Rightly or wrongly mothered with a whore, —
"Such an one, to disprove the frightful
charge,
"What will she but exaggerate chastity,
"Err in excess of wifehood, as it were, 80
"Renounce even levities permitted youth "Though not youth struck to age by a thunderbolt?

"Cry 'wolf' i' the sheepfold, where's the sheep dares bleat,
 "Knowing the shepherd listens for a growl?"

So you expect. How did the devil decree?
 Why, my lords, just the contrary of course!
 It was in the house from the window, at the church

From the hassock, — where the theatre lent its lodge,

Or staging for the public show left space,
 That still Pompilia needs must find herself Launching her looks forth, letting looks reply

10 As arrows to a challenge; on all sides Ever new contribution to her lap, Till one day, what is it knocks at my clenched teeth

But the cup full, curse-collected all for me?
 And I must needs drink, drink this galling's praise,

That minion's prayer, the other fop's reproach,

And come at the dregs to — Caponsacchi! Sirs,

I, — chin-deep in a marsh of misery,
 Struggling to extricate my name and fame
 And fortune from the marsh would drown them all,

20 My face the sole unstrangled part of me, —
 I must have this new gad-fly in that face, Must free me from the attacking lover too!
 Men say I battled ungracefully enough —
 Was harsh, uncouth and ludicrous beyond
 The proper part o' the husband: have it so!
 Your lordships are considerate at least —
 You order me to speak in my defence Plainly, expect no quavering tuneful trills
 As when you bid a singer solace you, —

30 Nor look that I shall give it, for a grace, Stans pede in uno:¹ — you remember well
 In the one case, 'tis a plainsong too severe,
 This story of my wrongs, — and that I ache

And need a chair, in the other. Ask you me

Why, when I felt this trouble flap my face, Already pricked with every shame could perch, —

When, with her parents, my wife plagued me too —

Why I enforced not exhortation mild
 To leave whore's-tricks and let my brows alone,

40 With mulct of comfits, promise of perfume?

"Far from that! No, you took the opposite course,

"Breathed threatnings, rage and slaughter!" What you will!

¹ Stans pede in uno — "standing on one foot," a metaphor descriptive of anything done easily or off-hand; from Horace, Sat. I. 4. 10.

And the end has come, the doom is verily here,

Unhindered by the threatening. See fate's flare

Full on each face of the dead guilty three!
 Look at them well, and now, lords, look at this!

Tell me: if on that day when I found first That Caponsacchi thought the nearest way
 To his church was some half-mile round by my door,

And that he so admired, shall I suppose, 5
 The manner of the swallows' come-and-go Between the props o' the window overhead, —

That window happening to be my wife's, —
 As to stand gazing by the hour on high,
 Of May-eves, while she sat and let him smile, —

If I, — instead of threatening, talking big, Showing hair-powder, a prodigious pinch,
 For poison in a bottle, — making believe
 At desperate doings with a bauble-sword,
 And other bugaboo-and-baby-work, — 6

Had, with the vulgarest household implement,

Calmly and quietly cut off, clean thro' bone

But one joint of one finger of my wife, Saying "For listening to the serenade,
 "Here's your ring-finger shorter a full third:

"Be certain I will slice away next joint,
 "Next time that anybody underneath
 "Seems somehow to be sauntering as he hoped

"A flower would eddy out of your hand to his

"While you please fidget with the branch 7
 above

"O' the rose-tree in the terrace!" — had I done so,

Why, there had followed a quick sharp scream, some pain,

Much calling for plaister, damage to the dress,

A somewhat sulky countenance next day,
 Perhaps reproaches, — but reflections too!
 I don't hear much of harm that Malchus did

After the incident of the ear, my lords!
 Saint Peter took the efficacious way;
 Malchus was sore but silenced for his life:
 He did not hang himself i' the Potter's 8
 Field

Like Judas, who was trusted with the bag
 And treated to sops after he proved a thief.
 So, by this time, my true and obedient wife

Might have been telling beads with a gloved hand;

Awkward a little at pricking hearts and darts

On sampler possibly, but well otherwise:
Not where Rome shudders now to see her
lie.

I give that for the course a wise man takes;
I took the other however, tried the fool's,
The lighter remedy, brandished rapier
dread

With cork-ball at the tip, boxed Malchus'
ear

Instead of severing the cartilage, Called her a terrible nickname, and the
like,

And there an end: and what was the end of that?

What was the good effect o' the gentle
course?

Why, one night I went drowsily to bed, Dropped asleep suddenly, not suddenly woke,

But did wake with rough rousing and loud
cry,

To find noon in my face, a crowd in my room,

Fumes in my brain, fire in my throat, my
wife

Gone God knows whither, — rifled vesture-chest,

And ransacked money-coffer. "What does it mean?"

The servants had been drugged too, stared and yawned

"It must be that our lady has eloped!"

— "Whither and with whom?" — "With whom but the Canon's self?

"One recognizes Caponsacchi there!" — (By this time the admiring neighbourhood joined chorus round me while I rubbed my
eyes)

"'Tis months since their intelligence
began, —

"A comedy the town was privy to, —

"He wrote and she wrote, she spoke, he replied,

"And going in and out your house last night

"Was easy work for one . . . to be plain with you . . .

"Accustomed to do both, at dusk and dawn

"When you were absent, — at the villa,
you know,

"Where husbandry required the master-
mind.

"Did not you know? Why, we all knew,
you see!"

And presently, bit by bit, the full and true Particulars of the tale were volunteered

With all the breathless zeal of friendship —
"Thus

"Matters were managed: at the seventh hour of night" . . .

— "Later, at daybreak" . . . "Caponsacchi came" . . .

— "While you and all your household slept like death,

"Drugged as your supper was with drowsy
stuff" . . .

— "And your own cousin Guillichini too — 40

"Either or both entered your dwelling-
place,

"Plundered it at their pleasure, made prize
of all,

"Including your wife . . ." — "Oh, your wife led the way,

"Out of doors, on to the gate . . ." —
"But gates are shut,

"In a decent town, to darkness and such
deeds:

"They climbed the wall — your lady must be lithe —

"At the gap, the broken bit . . ." —
— "Torrione, true!

"To escape the questioning guard at the proper gate,

"Clemente, where at the inn, hard by,
'the Horse,'

"Just outside, a calash in readiness 50

"Took the two principals, all alone at
last,

"To gate San Spirito, which o'erlooks the
road,

"Leads to Perugia, Rome and liberty."
Bit by bit thus made-up mosaic-wise,

Flat lay my fortune, — tessellated floor, Imperishable tracery devils should foot

And frolic it on, around my broken gods,
Over my desecrated hearth.

So much
For the terrible effect of threatening, Sirs!

Well, this way I was shaken wide awake, 60

Doctored and drenched, somewhat un-poisoned so.

Then, set on horseback, and bid seek the
lost,

I started alone, head of me, heart of me Fire, and each limb as languid . . . ah, sweet lords,

Bethink you! — poison-torture, try persuade

The next refractory Molinist with that! . . .
Floundered thro' day and night, another
day

And yet another night, and so at last,
As Lucifer kept falling to find hell,

Tumbled into the court-yard of an inn 70

At the end, and fell on whom I thought to
find,

Even Caponsacchi, — what part once was
priest,

Cast to the winds now with the cassockrags.

In cape and sword a cavalier confessed,
There stood he chiding dilatory grooms, Chafing that only horseflesh and no team

Of eagles would supply the last relay,

Whirl him along the league, the one post
more

Between the couple and Rome and liberty.
'Twas dawn, the couple were rested in a
sort,

And though the lady, tired, — the tender sex, —

Still lingered in her chamber, — to adjust The limp hair, look for any blush astray, —
She would descend in a twinkling, —

"Have you out

"The horses therefore!"

So did I find my wife.

Is the case complete? Do your eyes here see with mine?

10 Even the parties dared deny no one Point out of all these points.

What follows next?

"Why, that then was the time," you inter-
pose,

"Or then or never, while the fact was fresh,

"To take the natural vengeance: there
and thus

"They and you, — somebody had stuck a
sword

"Beside you while he pushed you on your horse, —

"'Twas requisite to slay the couple,
Count!"

Just so my friends say. "Kill!" they cry in a breath,

Who presently, when matters grow to a head

20 And I do kill the offending ones indeed, —
When crime of theirs, only surmised before,
Is patent, proved indisputably now, —

When remedy for wrong, untried at the
time,

Which law professes shall not fail a
friend,

Is thrice tried now, found threefold worse than null, —

When what might turn to transient shade,
who knows?

Solidifies into a blot which breaks Hell's black off in pale flakes for fear of

mine, —

Then, when I claim and take revenge —
"So rash?"

30 They cry — "so little reverence for the
law?"

Listen, my masters, and distinguish here!
At first, I called in law to act and help:

Seeing I did so, "Why, 'tis clear," they
cry,

"You shrank from gallant readiness and risk,

"Were coward: the thing's inexplicable
else."

Sweet my lords, let the thing be! I fall flat,

Play the reed, not the oak, to breath of
man.

Only inform my ignorance! Say I stand Convicted of the having been afraid, Proved a poltroon, no lion but a lamb, —
Does that deprive me of my right of lamb And give my fleece and flesh to the first wolf?

Are eunuchs, women, children, shieldless quite

Against attack their own timidity tempts?
Cowardice were misfortune and no crime!

— Take it that way, since I am fallen so
low

I scarce dare brush the fly that blows my
face,

And thank the man who simply spits not
there, —

Unless the Court be generous, comprehend

How one brought up at the very feet of law
As I, awaits the grave Gamaliel's nod

Ere he clench fist at outrage, — much less, stab!

— How, ready enough to rise at the right
time,

I still could recognise no time mature Unsanctioned by a move o' the judgment-
seat,

So, mute in misery, eyed my masters here Motionless till the authoritative word

Pronounced amercement. There's the riddle solved:

This is just why I slew nor her nor him, But called in law, law's delegate in the
place,

And bade arrest the guilty couple, Sirs!

We had some trouble to do so — you have heard

They braved me, — he with arrogance and scorn,

She, with a volubility of curse,
A conversancy in the skill of tooth

And claw to make suspicion seem absurd, Nay, an alacrity to put to proof

At my own throat my own sword, teach me so

To try conclusions better the next time, —
Which did the proper service with the mob.

They never tried to put on mask at all:
Two avowed lovers forcibly torn apart,

Upbraided the tyrant as in a playhouse scene, Ay, and with proper clapping and applause

From the audience that enjoys the bold and
free.

I kept still, said to myself, "There's law!"
Anon

We searched the chamber where they passed the night,

Found what confirmed the worst was feared before,

However needless confirmation now —
The witches' circle intact, charms undisturbed

That raised the spirit and succubus, — letters, to-wit, Love-laden, each the bag o' the bee that bore
 Honey from lily and rose to Cupid's hive, —
 Now, poetry in some rank blossom-burst, Now, prose, — "Come here, go there, wait such a while,
 "He's at the villa, now he's back again:
 "We are saved, we are lost, we are lovers
 all the same!"
 All in order, all complete, — even to a clue
 To the drowsiness that happed so oppor-
 tune —
 No mystery, when I read "Of all things,
 find
 "What wine Sir Jealousy decides to drink —
 "Red wine? Because a sleeping-potion,
 dust
 "Dropped into white, discolours wine and shows."
 — "Oh, but we did not write a single word!
 "Somebody forged the letters in our
 name!" —
 Both in a breath protested presently.
 Aha, Sacchetti¹ again! — "Dame," — quoth the Duke,
 "What meaneth this epistle, counsel me,
 "I pick from out thy placket and peruse,
 "Wherein my page averreth thou art
 white
 "And warm and wonderful 'twixt pap and pap?"
 "Sir," laughed the Lady, "'tis a counterfeit!"
 "Thy page did never stroke but Dian's
 breast,
 "The pretty hound I nurture for thy sake:
 "To lie were losel, — by my fay, no
 more!"
 And no more say I too, and spare the
 Court.

Ah, the Court! yes, I come to the Court's
 self;
 Such the case, so complete in fact and
 proof,
 I laid at the feet of law, — there sat my
 lords,
 Here sit they now, so may they ever sit
 In easier attitude than suits my haunch!
 In this same chamber did I bare my sores O' the soul and not the body, — shun no
 shame,
 Shrink from no probing of the ulcerous
 part,
 Since confident in Nature, — which is
 God, —

That she who, for wise ends, concocts a
 plague,
 Curbs, at the right time, the plague's virulence too:
 Law renovates even Lazarus, — cures me!
 Cæsar thou seekest? To Cæsar thou shalt go!
 Cæsar's at Rome: to Rome accordingly! 40

The case was soon decided: both weights,
 cast
 I' the balance, vibrate, neither kicks the beam,
 Here away, there away, this now and now
 that.
 To every one o' my grievances law gave Redress, could purblind eye but see the
 point.
 The wife stood a convicted runagate From house and husband, — driven to such a course
 By what she somehow took for cruelty, Oppression and imperilment of life —
 Not that such things were, but that so they 50
 seemed:
 Therefore, the end conceded lawful, (since To save life there's no risk should stay our leap)
 It follows that all means to the lawful end Are lawful likewise, — poison, theft and
 flight.
 As for the priest's part, did he meddle or
 make,
 Enough that he too thought life jeopardised;
 Concede him then the colour charity Casts on a doubtful course, — if blackish
 white
 Or whitish black, will charity hesitate?
 What did he else but act the precept out, 60 Leave, like a provident shepherd, his safe flock
 To follow the single lamb and strayaway?
 Best hope so and think so, — that the ticklish time
 I' the carriage, the tempting privacy, the
 last Somewhat ambiguous accident at the inn,
 — All may bear explanation: may?
 then, must!
 The letters, — do they so incriminate?
 But what if the whole prove a prank o' the pen,
 Flight of the fancy, none of theirs at all,
 Bred of the vapours of my brain belike, 70
 Or at worst mere exercise of scholar's-wit In the courtly Caponsacchi: verse, convict?
 Did not Catullus write less seemly once?
 Yet doctus and unblemished he abides.
 Wherefore so ready to infer the worst?
 Still, I did righteously in bringing doubts For the law to solve, — take the solution
 now!

¹ Sacchetti: Franco Sacchetti, who lived about 1335-1410, author of stories in the manner of Boccaccio.

"Seeing that the said associates, wife and priest,

"Bear themselves not without some touch of blame

" — Else why the pother, scandal and outcry

"Which trouble our peace and require chaatiseement?

"We, for complicity in Pompilia's flight

"And deviation, and carnal intercourse

"With the same, do set aside and relegate

"The Canon Caponsacchi for three years

"At Civita in the neighbourhood of Rome:

10 "And we consign Pompilia to the care "Of a certain Sisterhood of penitents

"I' the city's self, expert to deal with such."

Word for word, there's your judgment!

Read it, lords,

Re-utter your deliberate penalty

For the crime yourselves establish! Your award —

Who chop a man's right-hand off at the wrist

For tracing with forefinger words in wine

O' the table of a drinking-booth that bear

Interpretation as they mocked the Church!

20 — Who brand a woman black between the breasts

For sinning by connection with a Jew:

While for the Jew's self — pudency be dumb!

You mete out punishment such and such, yet so

Punish the adultery of wife and priest!

Take note of that, before the Molinists do,

And read me right the riddle, since right must be!

While I stood rapt away with wonderment,

Voices broke in upon my mood and muse.

"Do you sleep?" began the friends at either ear,

30 "The case is settled, — you willed it should be so —

"None of our counsel, always recollect!

"With law's award, budge! Back into your place!

"Your betters shall arrange the rest for you.

"We'll enter a new action, claim divorce:

"Your marriage was a cheat themselves allow:

"You erred i' the person, — might have married thus

"Your sister or your daughter unaware.

"We'll gain you, that way, liberty at least,

"Sure of so much by law's own showing.

Up

40 "And off with you and your unluckiness —

"Leave us to bury the blunder, sweep things smooth!"

I was in humble frame of mind, be sure!

I bowed, betook me to my place again.

Station by station I retraced the road,

Touched at this hostel, passed this post-house by,

Where, fresh-remembered yet, the fugitives

Had risen to the heroic stature: still —

"That was the bench they sat on, — there's the board

"They took the meal at, — yonder garden ground

"They leaned across the gate of," — ever a word

O' the Helen and the Paris, with "Ha!

you're he,

"The . . . much-commiserated husband?" Step

By step, across the pelting, did I reach

Arezzo, underwent the archway's grin,

Traversed the length of sarcasm in the street,

Found myself in my horrible house once more,

And after a colloquy . . . no word assists!

With the mother and the brothers, stifened me

Straight out from head to foot as dead man does,

And, thus prepared for life as he for hell,

Marched to the public Square and met the world.

Apologize for the pincers, palliate screws?

Ply me with such toy-trifles, I entreat!

Trust who has tried both sulphur and sops-in-wine!

I played the man as I best might, bade friends

Put non-essentials by and face the fact.

"What need to hang myself as you advise?

"The paramour is banished, — the ocean's width,

Or the suburb's length, — to Ultima Thule, say,

"Or Proxima Civitas, what's the odds of name

"And place? He's banished, and the fact's the thing.

"Why should law banish innocence an inch?

"Here's guilt then, what else do I care to know?

"The adulteress lies imprisoned, — whether in a well

"With bricks above and a snake for company,

"Or tied by a garter to a bed-post, — much

"I mind what's little, — least's enough and to spare!

"The little fillip on the coward's cheek

"Serves as though crab-tree cudgel broke his pate.

- "Law has pronounced there's punishment, less or more:
"And I take note o' the fact and use it
thus —
"For the first flaw in the original bond,
"I claim release. My contract was to wed
"The daughter of Pietro and Violante.
Both
"Protest they never had a child at all.
"Then I have never made a contract:
good!
"Cancel me quick the thing pretended one.
"I shall be free. What matter if hurried over o "The harbour-boom by a great favouring tide,
"Or the last of a spent ripple that lifts and leaves?
"The Abate is about it. Laugh who wins!
"You shall not laugh me out of faith in
law!
"I listen, through all your noise, to Rome!"
- Rome spoke.
In three months letters thence admonished
me,
"Your plan for the divorce is all mistake.
"It would hold, now, had you, taking thought to wed
"Rachel of the blue eye and golden hair,
"Found swarth-skinned Leah cumber couch next day:
o "But Rachel, blue-eyed golden-haired
aright,
"Proving to be only Laban's child, not Lot's,
"Remains yours all the same for ever
more.
"No whit to the purpose is your plea: you err
"I' the person and the quality — nowise
"In the individual, — that's the case in point!
"You go to the ground, — are met by a cross-suit
"For separation, of the Rachel here,
"From bed and board, — she is the injured one,
"You did the wrong and have to answer it.
o "As for the circumstance of imprisonment "And colour it lends to this your new attack,
"Never fear, that point is considered too!
"The durance is already at an end;
"The convent-quiet preyed upon her
health,
"She is transferred now to her parents'
house
" — No-parents, when that cheats and plunders you,
"But parentage again confessed in full,
"When such confession pricks and plagues you more —
- "As now — for, this their house is not the
house
"In Via Vittoria wherein neighbours' 4c
watch
"Might incommode the freedom of your
wife,
"But a certain villa smothered up in vines
"At the town's edge by the gate i' the Pauline Way,
"Out of eye-reach, out of ear-shot, little and lone,
"Whither a friend, — at Civita, we hope,
"A good half-dozen-hours' ride off, — might, some eve,
"Betake himself, and whence ride back,
some morn,
"Nobody the wiser: but be that as it may,
"Do not afflict your brains with trifles
now.
"You have still three suits to manage, all 50
and each
"Ruinous truly should the event play
false.
"It is indeed the likelier so to do,
"That brother Paul, your single prop and stay,
"After a vain attempt to bring the Pope
"To set aside procedures, sit himself
"And summarily use prerogative,
"Afford us the infallible finger's tact
"To disentwine your tangle of affairs,
"Paul, — finding it moreover past his
strength
"To stem the irruption, bear Rome's 60 ridicule
"Of . . . since friends must speak . . .
to be round with you . . .
"Of the old outwitted husband, wronged and wroth,
"Pitted against a brace of juveniles —
"A brisk priest who is versed in Ovid's art
"More than his Summa, and a gamesome
wife
"Able to act Corinna without book,
"Beside the waggish parents who played dupes
"To dupe the duper — (and truly divers scenes
"Of the Arezzo palace, tickle rib
"And tease eye till the tears come, so we 70
laugh;
"Nor wants the shock at the inn its comic
force,
"And then the letters and poetry — merum sal!)
" — Paul, finally, in such a state of things,
"After a brief temptation to go jump
"And join the fishes in the Tiber, drowns
"Sorrow another and a wiser way:
"House and goods, he has sold all off, is
gone,
"Leaves Rome, — whether for France or Spain, who knows?
"Or Britain almost divided from our orb.

"You have lost him anyhow."

Now, — I see my lords Shift in their seat, — would I could do the
same!

They probably please expect my bile was moved

To purpose, nor much blame me: now, they judge,

The fiery titillation urged my flesh Break through the bonds. By your pardon, no, sweet Sirs!

I got such missives in the public place;
When I sought home, — with such news, mounted stair

And sat at last in the sombre gallery, to ("Twas Autumn, the old mother in bed betimes,

Having to bear that cold, the finer frame Of her daughter-in-law had found intolerable —

The brother, walking misery away
O' the mountain-side with dog and gun
belike)

As I supped, ate the coarse bread, drank the wine

Weak once, now acrid with the toad'shead-squeeze,

My wife's bestowment, — I broke silence
thus:

"Let me, a man, manfully meet the fact,
"Confront the worst o' the truth, end, and have peace!

20 "I am irremediably beaten here, —

"The gross illiterate vulgar couple, — bah!

"Why, they have measured forces, mastered mine,

"Made me their spoil and prey from first to last.

"They have got my name, — 'tis nailed now fast to theirs,

"The child or changeling is anyway my
wife;

"Point by point as they plan they execute,
"They gain all, and I lose all — even to the lure

"That led to loss, — they have the wealth
again

"They hazarded awhile to hook me with, 30 "Have caught the fish and find the bait entire:

"They even have their child or changeling
back

"To trade with, turn to account a second
time.

"The brother presumably might tell a tale
"Or give a warning, — he, too, flies the field,

"And with him vanish help and hope of
help.

"They have caught me in the cavern where I fell,

"Covered my loudest cry for human aid

"With this enormous paving-stone of
shame.

"Well, are we demigods or merely clay?

"Is success still attendant on desert? 40

"Is this, we live on, heaven and the final
state,

"Or earth which means probation to the
end?

"Why claim escape from man's predestined lot

"Of being beaten and baffled? — God's decree,

"In which I, bowing bruised head, acquiesce.

"One of us Franceschini fell long since "I the Holy Land, betrayed, tradition
runs,

"To Paynims by the feigning of a girl
"He rushed to free from ravisher, and
found

"Lay safe enough with friends in am- 50 buscade

"Who flayed him while she clapped her hands and laughed:

"Let me end, falling by a like device.
"It will not be so hard. I am the last

"O' my line which will not suffer any more.
"I have attained to my full fifty years,

"(About the average of us all, 'tis said,
"Though it seems longer to the unlucky
man)

" — Lived through my share of life; let all end here,

"Me and the house and grief and shame
at once.

"Friends my informants, — I can bear 60 your blow!"

And I believe 'twas in no unmeet match For the stoic's mood, with something like a smile,

That, when morose December roused me
next,

I took into my hand, broke seal to read
The new epistle from Rome. "All to no
use!

"Whate'er the turn next injury take," smiled I,

"Here's one has chosen his part and knows his cue.

"I am done with, dead now; strike away, good friends!

"Are the three suits decided in a trice?
"Against me, — there's no question! 70
How does it go?

"Is the parentage of my wife demonstrated

"Infamous to her wish? Parades she now "Loosed of the cincture that so irked the loin?

"Is the last penny extracted from my purse

"To mulct me for demanding the first pound

"Was promised in return for value paid?

- "Has the priest, with nobody to court be-
side,
"Courtèd the Muse in exile, hitched my
hap
"Into a rattling ballad-rhyme which, bawled
"At tavern-doors, wakes rapture every-
where,
"And helps cheap wine down throat this Christmas time,
"Beating the bagpipes? Any or all of these!
"As well, good friends, you cursed my palace here
"To its old cold stone face, — struck your cap for crest
"Over the shield that's extant in the Square, —
"Or spat on the statue's cheek, the impatient world
"Sees cumber tomb-top in our family
church:
"Let him creep under covert as I shall do,
"Half below-ground already indeed.
Good-bye!
"My brothers are priests, and childless so;
that's well —
"And, thank God most for this, no child leave I —
"None after me to bear till his heart
break
"The being a Franceschini and my son!"
- "Nay," said the letter, "but you have just
that!
"A babe, your veritable son and heir —
"Lawful, — 'tis only eight montins since your wife
"Left you, — so, son and heir, your babe was born
"Last Wednesday in the villa, — you see the cause
"For quitting Convent without beat of drum,
"Stealing a hurried march to this retreat
"That's not so savage as the Sisterhood "To slips and stumbles: Pietro's heart is soft,
"Violante leans to pity's side, — the pair
"Ushered you into life a bouncing boy:
"And he's already hidden away and safe 30 "From any claim on him you mean to make —
"They need him for themselves, — don't fear, they know
"The use o' the bantling, — the nerve thus laid bare
"To nip at, new and nice, with fingernail!"
- Then I rose up like fire, and fire-like roared.
What, all is only beginning not ending
now?
- The worm which wormed its way from skin through flesh
To the bone and there lay biting, did its
best, —
What, it goes on to scrape at the bone's
self,
Will wind to inmost marrow and madden
me?
There's to be yet my representative, 44
Another of the name shall keep displayed
The flag with the ordure on it, brandish
still
The broken sword has served to stir a jakes?
Who will he be, how will you call the man?
A Franceschini, — when who cut my
purse,
Filched my name, hemmed me round, hustled me hard
As rogues at a fair some fool they strip i'
the midst,
When these count gains, vaunt pillage presently: —
But a Caponsacchi, oh, be very sure!
When what demands its tribute of applause 50
Is the cunning and impudence o' the pair of cheats,
The lies and lust o' the mother, and the brave Bold carriage of the priest, worthily
crowned
By a witness to his feat i' the following
age, —
And how this three-fold cord could hook and fetch
And land leviathan that king of pride!
Or say, by some mad miracle of chance,
Is he indeed my flesh and blood, this babe?
Was it because fate forged a link at last Betwixt my wife and me, and both alike 60 Found we had henceforth some one thing to love,
Was it when she could damn my soul indeed
She unlatched door, let all the devils o' the
dark Dance in on me to cover her escape?
Why then, the surplusage of disgrace, the spilth
Over and above the measure of infamy, Failing to take effect on my coarse flesh Seasoned with scorn now, saturate with
shame, —
Is saved to instil on and corrode the brow,
The baby-softness of my first-born child — 70
The child I had died to see though in a
dream,
The child I was bid strike out for, beat the wave
And baffle the tide of troubles where I swam,
So I might touch shore, lay down life at
last
At the feet so dim and distant and divine

Of the apparition, as 'twere Mary's Babe Had held, through night and storm, the torch aloft, —

Born now in very deed to bear this brand On forehead and curse me who could not save!

Rather be the town-talk true, square's jest, street's jeer

True, my own inmost heart's confession
true,

And he the priest's bastard and none of
mine!

Ay, there was cause for flight, swift flight and sure!

The husband gets unruly, breaks all
bounds

10 When he encounters some familiar face, Fashion of feature, brow and eyes and lips

Where he least looked to find them, — time to fly!

This bastard then, a nest for him is made,
As the manner is of vermin, in my flesh:

Shall I let the filthy pest buzz, flap and sting,

Busy at my vitals and, nor hand nor foot Lift, but let be, lie still and not resigned?

No, I appeal to God, — what says Him-
self,

How lessons Nature when I look to learn?

20 Why, that I am alive, am still a man With brain and heart and tongue and right-hand too —

Nay, even with friends, in such a cause as
this,

To right me if I fail to take my right.

No more of law; a voice beyond the law Enters my heart, *Quis est pro Domino?*¹

Myself, in my own Vittiano, told the tale To my own serving-people summoned
there:

Told the first half of it, scarce heard to
end

By judges who got done with judgment
quick

30 And clamoured to go execute her 'hest — Who cried "Not one of us that dig your soil

"And dress your vineyard, prune your olive-trees,

"But would have brained the man debauched our wife,

"And staked the wife whose lust allured
the man,

"And paunched the Duke, had it been possible,

"Who ruled the land yet barred us such revenge!"

I fixed on the first whose eyes caught mine, some four

Resolute youngsters with the heart still fresh,

Filled my purse with the residue o' the coin

Uncaught-up by my wife whom haste made blind,

Donned the first rough and rural garb I
found,

Took whatsoever weapon came to hand,
And out we flung and on we ran or reeled Romeward. I have no memory of our

way,

Only that, when at intervals the cloud
Of horror about me opened to let in life,

I listened to some song in the ear, some snatch

Of a legend, relic of religion, stray Fragment of record very strong and old

Of the first conscience, the anterior right, 5
The God's-gift to mankind, impulse to quench

The antagonistic spark of hell and tread Satan and all his malice into dust,

Declare to the world the one law, right is
right.

Then the cloud re-encompassed me, and
so

I found myself, as on the wings of winds, Arrived: I was at Rome on Christmas

Eve.

Festive bells — everywhere the Feast o'
the Babe,

Joy upon earth, peace and good will to
men!

I am baptized. I started and let drop 6
The dagger. "Where is it, His promised
peace?"

Nine days o' the Birth-Feast did I pause and pray

To enter into no temptation more.
I bore the hateful house, my brother's

once,
Deserted, — let the ghost of social joy

Mock and make mouths at me from empty room

And idle door that missed the master's
step, —

Bore the frank wonder of incredulous eyes,
As my own people watched without a word,

Waited, from where they huddled round 7 the hearth

Black like all else, that nod so slow to
come.

I stopped my ears even to the inner call Of the dread duty, only heard the song

"Peace upon earth," saw nothing but the
face

O' the Holy Infant and the halo there Able to cover yet another face

Behind it, Satan's which I else should
see.

But, day by day joy waned and withered
off:

¹ Quis est pro Domino: "Who is on the Lord's
side?"

The Babe's face, premature with peak and pine, Sank into wrinkled ruinous old age,
 Suffering and death, then mist-like disappeared,
 And showed only the Cross at end of all,
 Left nothing more to interpose 'twixt me
 And the dread duty: for the angels' song,
 "Peace upon earth," louder and louder pealed
 "O Lord, how long, how long be unavenged?"
 On the ninth day, this grew too much for man.
 I started up — "Some end must be!"
 At once,
 Silence; then, scratching like a death-watch-tick,
 Slowly within my brain was syllabled,
 "One more concession, one decisive way
 "And but one, to determine thee the
 truth, —
 "This way, in fine, I whisper in thy ear:
 "Now doubt, anon decide, thereupon
 act!"
 "That is a way, thou whisperest in my
 ear!
 "I doubt, I will decide, then act," said
 I — Then beckoned my companions: "Time is come!"
 And so, all yet uncertain save the will To do right, and the daring aught save
 leave
 Right undone, I did find myself at last I' the dark before the villa with my
 friends,
 And made the experiment, the final test, Ultimate chance that ever was to be For the wretchedness inside. I knocked, pronounced
 The name, the predetermined touch for
 truth,
 "What welcome for the wanderer? Open
 straight —"
 To the friend, physician, friar upon his rounds,
 Traveller belated, beggar lame and blind?
 No, but — "to Caponsacchi!" And the door Opened.
 And then, — why, even then, I think,
 I' the minute that confirmed my worst of fears, Surely, — I pray God that I think
 aright! —
 Had but Pompilia's self, the tender thing Who once was good and pure, was once my lamb
 And lay in my bosom, had the well-known
 shape

Fronted me in the door-way, — stood there faint
 With the recent pang perhaps of giving
 birth
 To what might, though by miracle, seem 40
 my child, —
 Nay more, I will say, had even the aged
 fool
 Pietro, the dotard, in whom folly and age Wrought, more than enmity or malevolence,
 To practise and conspire against my
 peace, —
 Had either of these but opened, I had paused.
 But it was she the hag, she that brought
 hell
 For a dowry with her to her husband's
 house,
 She the mock-mother, she that made the
 match
 And married me to perdition, spring and source
 O' the fire inside me that boiled up from 50
 heart
 To brain and hailed the Fury gave it
 birth, —
 Violante Comparini, she it was,
 With the old grin amid the wrinkles yet,
 Opened: as if in turning from the Cross, With trust to keep the sight and save my
 soul,
 I had stumbled, first thing, on the serpent's
 head
 Coiled with a leer at foot of it.
 There was the end!
 Then was I rapt away by the impulse, one Immeasurable everlasting wave of a need To abolish that detested life. 'Twas 60
 done:
 You know the rest and how the folds o'
 the thing,
 Twisting for help, involved the other two More or less serpent-like: how I was
 mad,
 Blind, stamped on all, the earth-worms with the asp,
 And ended so.
 You came on me that night, Your officers of justice, — caught the
 crime
 In the first natural frenzy of remorse?
 Twenty miles off, sound sleeping as a child On a cloak i' the straw which promised shelter first,
 With the bloody arms beside me, — was it 70 not so?
 Wherefore not? Why, how else should I be found?
 I was my own self, had my sense again, My soul safe from the serpents. I could
 sleep:
 Indeed and, dear my lords, I shall sleep
 now,

Spite of my shoulder, in five minutes' space,

When you dismiss me, having truth enough!

It is but a few days are passed, I find,
Since this adventure. Do you tell me, four?

Then the dead are scarce quiet where they lie,

Old Pietro, old Violante, side by side

At the church Lorenzo, — oh, they know it well!

So do I. But my wife is still alive,

Has breath enough to tell her story yet,

10 Her way, which is not mine, no doubt at all.

And Caponsacchi, you have summoned him, —

Was he so far to send for? Not at hand?

I thought some few o' the stabs were in his heart,

Or had not been so lavish: less had served.

Well, he too tells his story, — florid prose
As smooth as mine is rough. You see, my lords,

There will be a lying intoxicating smoke Born of the blood, — confusion probably, —

For lies breed lies — but all that rests with you!

20 The trial is no concern of mine; with me
The main of the care is over: I at least

Recognise who took that huge burthen off,

Let me begin to live again. I did

God's bidding and man's duty, so, breathe free;

Look you to the rest! I heard Himself prescribe,

That great Physician, and dared lance the core

Of the bad ulcer; and the rage abates,
I am myself and whole now: I prove cured

By the eyes that see, the ears that hear again,

30 The limbs that have relearned their youthful play,

The healthy taste of food and feel of clothes

And taking to our common life once more,
All that now urges my defence from death.

The willingness to live, what means it else?
Before, — but let the very action speak!

Judge for yourselves, what life seemed worth to me

Who, not by proxy but in person, pitched Head-foremost into danger as a fool

That never cares if he can swim or no —

40 So he but find the bottom, braves the brook.

No man omits precaution, quite neglects Secresy, safety, schemes not how retreat,

Having schemed he might advance. Did I so scheme?

Why, with a warrant which 'tis ask and have,

With horse thereby made mine without a word,

I had gained the frontier and slept safe that night.

Then, my companions, — call them what you please,

Slave or stipendiary, — what need of one
To me whose right-hand did its owner's work?

Hire an assassin yet expose yourself?
As well buy glove and then thrust naked hand

I' the thorn-bush. No, the wise man stays at home,

Sends only agents out, with pay to earn:
At home, when they come back, — he straight discards

Or else disowns. Why use such tools at all

When a man's foes are of his house, like mine,

Sit at his board, sleep in his bed? Why noise,

When there's the acquetta and the silent way?

Clearly my life was valueless.

But now

Health is returned, and sanity of soul Nowise indifferent to the body's harm.

I find the instinct bids me save my life;
My wits, too, rally round me; I pick up

And use the arms that strewed the ground before,

Unnoticed or spurned aside: I take my stand,

Make my defence. God shall not lose a life

May do Him further service, while I speak And you hear, you my judges and last hope!

You are the law: 'tis to the law I look.
I began life by hanging to the law,

To the law it is I hang till life shall end.
My brother made appeal to the Pope, 'tis true,

To stay proceedings, judge my cause himself

Nor trouble law, — some fondness of conceit

That rectitude, sagacity sufficed
The investigator in a case like mine,

Dispensed with the machine of law. The Pope

Knew better, set aside my brother's plea
And put me back to law, — referred the cause

Ad iudices meos, — doubtlessly did well. 80
Here, then, I clutch my judges, — I claim law —

Cry, by the higher law thereof your law
O' the land is humbly representative, —

Cry, on what point is it, where either accuse, I fail to furnish you defence? I stand Acquitted, actually or virtually,
 By every intermediate kind of court
 That takes account of right or wrong in man, Each unit in the series that begins With God's throne, ends with the tribunal here.
 God breathes, not speaks, his verdicts, felt not heard,
 Passed on successively to each court I call Man's conscience, custom, manners, all that make More and more effort to promulgate, mark God's verdict in determinable words, Till last come human jurists — solidify Fluid result, — what's fixable lies forged, Statute, — the residue escapes in fume, Yet hangs aloft, a cloud, as palpable
 To the finer sense as word the legist welds.
 Justinian's Pandects only make precise What simply sparkled in men's eyes
 before, Twitched in their brow or quivered on their lip, Waited the speech they called but would not come.
 These courts then, whose decree your own confirms, —
 Take my whole life, not this last act alone, Look on it by the light reflected thence!
 What has Society to charge me with?
 Come, unreservedly, — favour none nor
 fear, —
 I am Guido Franceschini, am I not?
 You know the courses I was free to take?
 I took just that which let me serve the Church,
 I gave it all my labour in body and soul
 Till these broke down i' the service.
 "Specify?"
 Well, my last patron was a Cardinal.
 I left him unconvicted of a fault —
 Was even helped, by way of gratitude, Into the new life that I left him for,
 This very misery of the marriage, — he Made it, kind soul, so far as in him lay — Signed the deed where you yet may see his
 name.
 He is gone to his reward, — dead, being my friend
 Who could have helped here also, — that,
 of course!
 So far, there's my acquittal, I suppose.
 Then comes the marriage itself — no question, lords,
 Of the entire validity of that!
 In the extremity of distress, 'tis true,
 For after-reasons, furnished abundantly,
 I wished the thing invalid, went to you Only some months since, set you duly
 forth

My wrong and prayed your remedy, that a cheat
 Should not have force to cheat my whole life long.
 "Annul a marriage? 'Tis impossible! 54
 "Though ring about your neck be brass not gold,
 "Needs must it clasp, gangrene you all the
 same!"
 Well, let me have the benefit, just so far, O' the fact announced, — my wife then is my wife,
 I have allowance for a husband's right.
 I am charged with passing right's due bound, — such acts
 As I thought just, my wife called cruelty, Complained of in due form, — convoked no court
 Of common gossipry, but took her wrongs —
 And not once, but so long as patience 60
 served —
 To the town's top, jurisdiction's pride of
 place,
 To the Archbishop and the Governor.
 These heard her charge with my reply, and
 found
 That futile, this sufficient: they dismissed
 The hysteric querulous rebel, and confirmed
 Authority in its wholesome exercise,
 They, with directest access to the facts.
 "— Ay, for it was their friendship favoured
 you,
 "Hereditary alliance against a breach
 "I' the social order: prejudice for the 70
 name
 "Of Franceschini!" — So I hear it said:
 But not here. You, lords, never will you
 say
 "Such is the nullity of grace and truth,
 "Such the corruption of the faith, such lapse
 "Of law, such warrant have the Molinists
 "For daring reprehend us as they do, —
 "That we pronounce it just a common
 case,
 "Two dignitaries, each in his degree
 "First, foremost, this the spiritual head, and that
 "The secular arm o' the body politic, 80
 "Should, for mere wrongs' love and injustice' sake,
 "Side with, aid and abet in cruelty
 "This broken beggarly noble, — bribed
 perhaps
 "By his watered wine and mouldy crust of bread —
 "Rather than that sweet tremulous flower-like wife
 "Who kissed their hands and curled about their feet
 "Looking the irresistible loveliness

"In tears that takes man captive, turns"
... enough!

Do you blast your predecessors? What forbids

Posterity to trebly blast yourselves Who set the example and instruct their
tongue?

You dreaded the crowd, succumbed to the popular cry,

Or else, would nowise seem defer thereto And yield to public clamour though i' the
right!

You ridded your eye of my unseemliness, The noble whose misfortune wearied
you, —

10 Or, what's more probable, made common
cause

With the cleric section, punished in myself Maladroit uncomplaisant laity, Defective in behaviour to a priest

Who claimed the customary partnership I' the house and the wife. Lords, any lie will serve!

Look to it, — or allow me freed so far!

Then I proceed a step, come with clean
hands

Thus far, re-tell the tale told eight months
since.

The wife, you allow so far, I have not wronged,

20 Has fled my roof, plundered me and decamped

In company with the priest her paramour:
And I gave chase, came up with, caught
the two

At the wayside inn where both had spent
the night,

Found them in flagrant fault, and found as
well,

By documents with name and plan and date,

The fault was furtive then that's flagrant
now,

Their intercourse a long established crime.
I did not take the licence law's self gives To slay both criminals o' the spot at the
time,

30 But held my hand, — preferred play prodigy

Of patience which the world calls cowardice,

Rather than seem anticipate the law
And cast discredit on its organs, — you.
So, to your bar I brought both criminals, And made my statement: heard their counter-charge,

Nay, — their corroboration of my tale, Nowise disputing its allegements, not I' the main, not more 'than nature's decency

Compels men to keep silence in this
kind, —

Only contending that the deeds avowed Would take another colour and bear excuse.

You were to judge between us; so you did.
You disregard the excuse, you breathe
away

The colour of innocence and leave guilt
black,

"Guilty" is the decision of the court,
And that I stand in consequence un-
touched,

One white integrity from head to heel.
Not guilty? Why then did you punish
them?

True, punishment has been inadequate —
'Tis not I only, not my friends that joke,

My foes that jeer, who echo "inadequate" —

For, by a chance that comes to help for
once,

The same case simultaneously was judged
At Arezzo, in the province of the Court Where the crime had its beginning but not
end.

They then, deciding on but half o' the
crime,

The effraction, robbery, — features of the
fault

I never cared to dwell upon at Rome, —
What was it they adjudged as penalty

To Pompilia, — the one criminal o' the pair

Amenable to their judgment, not the priest Who is Rome's? Why, just imprisonment for life

I' the Stinche. There was Tuscany's award

To a wife that robs her husband: you at
Rome —

Having to deal with adultery in a wife And, in a priest, breach of the priestly
vow —

Give gentle sequestration for a month
In a manageable Convent, then release,

You call imprisonment, in the very house
O' the very couple, which the aim and end

Of the culprits' crime was — just to reach and rest

And there take solace and defy me: well, — This difference 'twixt their penalty and yours

Is immaterial: make your penalty less — Merely that she should henceforth wear black gloves

And white fan, she who wore the opposite — Why, all the same the fact o' the thing subsists.

Reconcile to your conscience as you may,
Be it on your own heads, you pronounced but half

O' the penalty for heinousness like hers
And his, that pays a fault at Carnival

Of comfit-pelting past discretion's law,

Or accident to handkerchief in Lent Which falls perversely as a lady kneels Abruptly, and but half conceals her neck!
I acquiesce for my part: punished, though By a pin-point scratch, means guilty:
guilty means — What have I been but innocent hitherto?
Anyhow, here the offence, being punished
ends.

Ends? — for you deemed so, did you not,
sweet lords?
That was throughout the veritable aim — O' the sentence light or heavy, — to redress Recognized wrong? You righted me, I
think?
Well then, — what if I, at this last of all, Demonstrate you, as my whole pleading
proves,
No particle of wrong received thereby One atom of right? — that cure grew worse disease?
That in the process you call "justice
done"
All along you have nipped away just inch By inch the creeping climbing length of plague Breaking my tree of life from root to branch,
And left me, after all and every act Of your interference, — lightened of what load?
At liberty wherein? Mere words and
wind!
"Now I was saved, now I should feel no
more
"The hot breath, find a respite from fixed
eye
"And vibrant tongue!" Why, scarce your back was turned,
There was the reptile, that feigned death at
first,
Renewing its detested spire and spire Around me, rising to such heights of hate That, so far from mere purpose now to crush
And coil itself on the remains of me, Body and mind, and there flesh fang content,
Its aim is now to evoke life from death,
Make me anew, satisfy in my son
The hunger I may feed but never sate, Tormented on to perpetuity, — My son, whom, dead, I shall know, understand,
Feel, hear, see, never more escape the sight In heaven that's turned to hell, or hell returned (So rather say) to this same earth again, — Moulded into the image and made one, Fashioned of soul as featured like in
face,

First taught to laugh and ^{lie} and stand and
go
By that thief, poisoner and adulteress
I call Pompilia, he calls . . . sacred name, Be unpronounced, be unpolluted here!
And last led up to the ^{story} and prize of
hate
By his . . . foster-father, Caponsacchi's
self,
The perjured priest, pink of conspirators, Tricksters and knaves, yet polished, super-
fine,
Manhood to model adolescence by! 50 Lords, look on me, declare, — when, what I show,
Is nothing more nor less than what you deemed
And doled me out for justice, — what did you say?
For reparation, restitution and more, — Will you not thank, praise, bid me to your breasts
For having done the thing you thought
to do,
And thoroughly trampled out sin's life at
last?
I have heightened phrase to make your soft speech serve, Doubled the blow you but essayed to strike,
Carried into effect your mandate here 60
That else had fallen to ground: mere duty
done,
Oversight of the master just supplied By zeal i' the servant. I, being used to serve,
Have simply . . . what is it they charge me with?
Blackened again, made legible once more
Your own decree, not permanently writ, Rightly conceived but all too faintly
traced.
It reads efficient, now, comminatory,
A terror to the wicked, answers so The mood o' the magistrate, the mind of 70
law.
Absolve, then, me, law's mere executant!
Protect your own defender, — save me,
Sirs!
Give me my life, give me my liberty,
My good name and my civic rights again!
It would be too fond, too complacent play Into the hands o' the devil, should we lose
The game here, I for God: a soldier-bee That yields his life, exenterate¹ with the stroke
O' the sting that saves the hive. I need that life.
Oh, never fear! I'll find life plenty use 80 Though it should last five years more, aches
and all!

¹ Exenterate: dii embowelled.

- For, first thing, there's the mother's age to help — Let her come break her heart upon my breast,
 Not on the blank stone of my nameless tomb!
 The fugitive brother has to be bidden back To the old routine, repugnant to the tread, Of daily suit and service to the Church, — Thro' gibe and jest, those stones that Shi-mei flung!
- Ay, and the spirit-broken youth at home,
 The awe-struck altar-ministrant, shall make
- 10 Amends for faith now palsied at the source, Shall see truth yet triumphant, justice yet
 A victor in the battle of this world!
 Give me — for last, best gift — my son again,
 Whom law makes mine, — I take him at your word, Mine be he, by miraculous mercy, lords!
 Let me lift up his youth and innocence
 To purify my palace, room by room Purged of the memories, lend from his bright brow Light to the old proud paladin my sire
- 20 Shrunk now for shame into the darkest shade
 O' the tapestry, showed him once and shrouds him now!
 Then may we, — strong from that re-kindled smile, —
 Go forward, face new times, the better day.
 And when, in times made better through your brave Decision now, — might but Utopia be! — Rome rife with honest women and strong men, Manners reformed, old habits back once more,
 Customs that recognize the standard worth, —
 The wholesome household rule in force again,
- 30 Husbands once more God's representative, Wives like the typical Spouse once more, and Priests
 No longer men of Belial, with no aim At leading silly women captive, but Of rising to such duties as yours now, — Then will I set my son at my right-hand
 And tell his father's story to this point, Adding "The task seemed superhuman, still
 "I dared and did it, trusting God and law:
 "And they approved of me: give praise to both!"
- 40 And if, for answer, he shall stoop to kiss My hand, and peradventure start thereat, —

I engage to smile "That was an accident
 "I' the necessary process, — just a trip
 "O' the torture-irons in their search for truth, —
 "Hardly misfortune, and no fault at all."

VI. — GIUSEPPE CAPONSACCHI.

ANSWER you, Sirs? Do I understand aright?
 Have patience! In this sudden smoke from hell, —
 So things disguise themselves, — I cannot see My own hand held thus broad before my face And know it again. Answer you? Then 5 that means Tell over twice what I, the first time, told Six months ago: 'twas here, I do believe, Fronting you same three in this very room,
 I stood and told you: yet now no one laughs,
 Who then . . . nay, dear my lords, but laugh you did,
 As good as laugh, what in a judge we style Laughter — no levity, nothing indecorous, lords!
 Only, — I think I apprehend the mood:
 There was the blameless shrug, permissible smirk,
 The pen's pretence at play with the pursed 6
 mouth,
 The titter stifled in the hollow palm Which rubbed the eyebrow and caressed the nose,
 When I first told my tale: they meant, you know,
 "The sly one, all this we are bound believe!
 "Well, he can say no other than what he says.
 "We have been young, too, — come, there's greater guilt!
 "Let him but decently disembroil himself,
 "Scramble from out the scrape nor move the mud, —
 "We solid ones may risk a finger-stretch!"
 And now you sit as grave, stare as aghast 70
 As if I were a phantom: now 'tis —
 "Friend,
 "Collect yourself!" — no laughing matter more —
 "Counsel the Court in this extremity.
 "Tell us again!" — tell that, for telling which,
 I got the jocular piece of punishment,
 Was sent to lounge a little in the place:
 Whence now of a sudden here you summon me
 To take the intelligence from just — your lips!

You, Judge Tommati, who then tittered most, —
 That she I helped eight months since to escape
 Her husband, was retaken by the same,
 Three days ago, if I have seized your sense, — (I being disallowed to interfere, Meddle or make in a matter none of mine,
 For you and law were guardians quite enough O' the innocent, without a pert priest's help) —
 And that he has butchered her accordingly, As she foretold and as myself believed, —
 And, so foretelling and believing so,
 We were punished, both of us, the merry way:
 Therefore, tell once again the tale! For what?
 Pompilia is only dying while I speak!
 Why does the mirth hang fire and miss the smile?
 My masters, there's an old book, you should con
 For strange adventures, applicable yet,
 'Tis stuffed with. Do you know that there was once This thing: a multitude of worthy folk Took recreation, watched a certain group Of soldiery intent upon a game, —
 How first they wrangled, but soon fell to play, Threw dice, — the best diversion in the world.
 A word in your ear, — they are now casting lots, Ay, with that gesture quaint and cry uncouth,
 For the coat of One murdered an hour ago!
 I am a priest, — talk of what I have learned.
 Pompilia is bleeding out her life belike, Gasping away the latest breath of all,
 This minute, while I talk — not while you laugh?
 Yet, being sobered now, what is it you ask
 By way of explanation? There's the fact!
 It seems to fill the universe with sight
 And sound, — from the four corners of this earth Tells itself over, to my sense at least.
 But you may want it lower set i' the scale, —
 Too vast, too close it clangs in the ear, perhaps;
 You'd stand back just to comprehend it more.
 Well then, let me, the hollow rock, condense
 The voice o' the sea and wind, interpret you

The mystery of this murder. God above!
 It is too paltry, such a transference
 O' the storm's roar to the cranny of the stone!

This deed, you saw begin — why does its end Surprise you? Why should the event enforce The lesson, we ourselves learned, she and I,
 From the first o' the fact, and taught you, all in vain?
 This Guido from whose throat you took my grasp,
 Was this man to be favoured, now, or feared, Let do his will, or have his will restrained, so In the relation with Pompilia? Say!
 Did any other man need interpose
 — Oh, though first comer, though as strange at the work As fribble must be, coxcomb, fool that's near To knave as, say, a priest who fears the world Was he bound brave the peril, save the doomed,
 Or go on, sing his snatch and pluck his flower,
 Keep the straight path and let the victim die?
 I held so; you decided otherwise, Saw no such peril, therefore no such need 60
 To stop song, loosen flower, and leave path. Law, Law was aware and watching, would suffice, Wanted no priest's intrusion, palpably Pretence, too manifest a subterfuge!
 Whereupon I, priest, coxcomb, fribble and fool, Ensconced me in my corner, thus rebuked,
 A kind of culprit, over-zealous hound Kicked for his pains to kennel; I gave place
 To you, and let the law reign paramount:
 I left Pompilia to your watch and ward, 70
 And now you point me — there and thus she lies!

Men, for the last time, what do you want with me?
 Is it, — you acknowledge, as it were, a use,
 A profit in employing me? — at length
 I may conceivably help the august law?
 I am free to break the blow, next hawk that swoops
 On next dove, nor miss much of good repute?
 Or what if this your summons, after all,
 Be but the form of mere release, no more,
 Which turns the key and lets the captive 80 go?

I have paid enough in person at Civita, Am free, — what more need I concern me
with?

Thank you! I am rehabilitated then,
A very reputable priest. But she —
The glory of life, the beauty of the world,
The splendour of heaven, . . . well, Sirs, does no one move?

Do I speak ambiguously? The glory, I
say,

And the beauty, I say, and splendour, still say I,

Who, priest and trained to live my whole life long

10 On beauty and splendour, solely at their source,

God! — have thus recognised my food in
her,

You tell me, that's fast dying while we
talk,

Pompilia! How does lenity to me, Remit one death-bed pang to her? Come,
smile!

The proper wink at the hot-headed youth Who lets his soul show, through transparent words,

The mundane love that's sin and scandal
too!

You are all struck acquiescent now, it seems:

20 It seems the oldest, gravest signor here, Even the redoubtable Tommati, sits

Chop-fallen, — understands how law might
take

Service like mine, of brain and heart and
hand,

In good part. Better late than never, law
You understand of a sudden, gospel too

Has a claim here, may possibly pronounce Consistent with my priesthood, worthy

Christ,
That I endeavoured to save Pompilia?

Then,

You were wrong, you see: that's well to see, though late:

That's all we may expect of man, this side

30 The grave: his good is — knowing he is bad:
Thus will it be with us when the books ope

And we stand at the bar on judgment-day.
Well then, I have a mind to speak, see
cause

To relume the quenched flax by this dreadful light,

Burn my soul out in showing you the truth.
I heard, last time I stood here to be judged

What is priest's duty, — labour to pluck tares

And weed the corn of Molinism; let me Make you hear, this time, how, in such a
case,

40 Man, be he in the priesthood or at plough, Mindful of Christ or marching step by

step

With . . . what's his style, the other potentate

Who bids have courage and keep honour
safe,

Nor let minuter admonition tease? —
How he is bound, better or worse, to act.

Earth will not end through this misjudgment, no!

For you and the others like you sure to
come,

Fresh work is sure to follow, — wickedness

That wants withstanding. Many a man of blood,

Many a man of guile will clamour yet, 57 Bid you redress his grievance, — as he clutched

The prey, forsooth a stranger stepper
between,

And there's the good gripe in pure waste
My part

Is done; i' the doing it, I pass away Out of the world. I want no more with
earth.

Let me, in heaven's name, use the very snuff

O' the taper in one last spark shall show
truth

For a moment, show Pompilia who was
true!

Not for her sake, but yours: if she is dead,
Oh, Sirs, she can be loved by none of you 60

Most or least priestly! Saints, to do us
good,

Must be in heaven, I seem to understand;
We never find them saints before, at least.

Be her first prayer then presently for you —
She has done the good to me . . .

What is all this?

There, I was born, have lived, shall die, a
fool!

This is a foolish outset: — might with
cause

Give colour to the very lie o' the man, The murderer, — make as if I loved his
wife,

In the way he called love. He is the fool 70
there!

Why, had there been in me the touch of taint,

I had picked up so much of knaves'-policy As hide it, keep one hand pressed on the
place

Suspected of a spot would damn us both.
Or no, not her! — not even if any of you

Dares think that I, i' the face of death, her
death

That's in my eyes and ears and brain and
heart,

Lie, — if he does, let him! I mean to say, So he stop there, stay thought from smirching her

The snow-white soul that angels fear to 8
take

Untenderly. But, all the same, I know
 I too am taintless, and I bare my breast.
 You can't think, men as you are, all of you,
 But that, to hear thus suddenly such an end Of such a wonderful white soul, that comes Of a man and murderer calling the white
 black,
 Must shake me, trouble and disadvantage.
 Sirs,
 Only seventeen!

Why, good and wise you are!

You might at the beginning stop my
 mouth:

So, none would be to speak for her, that
 knew.

I talk impertinently, and you bear,
 All the same. This it is to have to do With honest hearts: they easily may err,
 But in the main they wish well to the truth.
 You are Christians; somehow, no one ever plucked

A rag, even, from the body of the Lord, To wear and mock with, but, despite himself,

He looked the greater and was the better.

Yes,

I shall go on now. Does she need or not I keep calm? Calm I'll keep as monk that croons

Transcribing battle, earthquake, famine,
 plague,

From parchment to his cloister's chronicle.
 Not one word more from the point now!

I begin.

Yes, I am one of your body and a priest.

Also I am a younger son o' the House

Oldest now, greatest once, in my birth-
 town

Arezzo, I recognise no equal there — (I want all arguments, all sorts of arms That seem to serve, — use this for a reason, wait!)

Not therefore thrust into the Church, because

'Tis the piece of bread one gets there. We were first

Of Fiesole, that rings still with the fame
 Of Capo-in-Sacco our progenitor:

When Florence ruined Fiesole, our folk Migrated to the victor-city, and there Flourished, — our palace and our tower attest,

In the Old Mercato, — this was years ago, Four hundred, full, — no, it wants fourteen just.

Our arms are those of Fiesole itself,
 The shield quartered with white and red:
 a branch

Are the Salviati of us, nothing more.
 That were good help to the Church? But better still —

Not simply for the advantage of my birth

I' the way of the world, was I proposed for
 priest;

But because there's an illustration, late I' the day, that's loved and looked to as a saint

Still in Arezzo, he was bishop of,
 Sixty years since: he spent to the last doitt
 His bishop's revenue among the poor,
 And used to tend the needy and the sick, 50 Barefoot, because of his humility.
 He it was, — when the Granduke Ferdinand¹

Sware he would raze our city, plough the
 place

And sow it with salt, because we Aretines Had tied a rope about the neck, to hale
 The statue of his father from its base For hate's sake, — he availed by prayers and tears

To pacify the Duke and save the town.
 This was my father's father's brother.

You see,

For his sake, how it was I had a right 60
 To the self-same office, bishop in the egg, So, grew I' the garb and prattled in the school,

Was made expect, from infancy almost,
 The proper mood o' the priest; till time ran by

And brought the day when I must read the vows,

Declare the world renounced and undertake

To become priest and leave probation, — leap

Over the ledge into the other life, Having gone trippingly hitherto up to the height

O'er the wan water. Just a vow to read! 70

I stopped short awe-struck. "How shall holiest flesh

"Engage to keep such vow inviolate, "How much less mine? I know myself too
 weak,

"Unworthy! Choose a worthier stronger
 man!"

And the very Bishop smiled and stopped my mouth

In its mid-protestation. "Incapable?
 "Qualmish of conscience? Thou ingenuous boy!

"Clear up the clouds and cast thy scruples
 far!

"I satisfy thee there's an easier sense "Wherein to take such vow than suits the 80
 first

"Rough rigid reading. Mark what makes all smooth,

"Nay, has been even a solace to myself!

"The Jews who needs must, in their synagogue,

 Tuscany 1621-1670, one of the Medici.

- "Utter sometimes the holy name of God,
 "A thing their superstition boggles at,
 "Pronounce aloud the ineffable sacrosanct, —
 "How does their shrewdness help them?
 In this wise:
 "Another set of sounds they substitute,
 "Jumble so consonants and vowels — how "Should I know? — that there grows from out the old
 "Quite a new word that means the very
 same —
 "And o'er the hard place slide they with a
 smile.
 10 "Giuseppe Maria Caponsacchi mine,
 "Nobody wants you in these latter days
 "To prop the Church by breaking your back-bone, —
 "As the necessary way was once, we know,
 "When Diocletian flourished and his like.
 "That building of the buttress-work was
 done
 "By martyrs and confessors: let it bide,
 "Add not a brick, but, where you see a chink,
 "Stick in a sprig of ivy or root a rose
 "Shall make amends and beautify the pile!
 20 "We profit as you were the painfulest
 "O' the martyrs, and you prove yourself a
 match
 "For the cruelest confessor ever was,
 "If you march boldly up and take your
 stand
 "Where their blood soaks, their bones yet strew the soil,
 "And cry 'Take notice, I the young and
 free
 "'And well-to-do i' the world, thus leave
 the world,
 "'Cast in my lot thus with no gay young
 world
 "'But the grand old Church: she tempts me of the two!
 "Renounce the world? Nay, keep and give it us!
 30 "Let us have you, and boast of what you bring.
 "We want the pick o' the earth to practise
 with,
 "Not its offscouring, halt and deaf and
 blind
 "In soul and body. There's a rubble-
 stone
 "Unfit for the front o' the building, stuff to stow
 "In a gap behind and keep us weather-
 tight;
 "There's porphyry for the prominent place. Good luck!
 "Saint Paul has had enough and to spare, I trow,
 "Of ragged run-away Onesimus:
 "He wants the right-hand with the signet-
 ring
- "Of King Agrippa, now, to shake and use. 41
 "I have a heavy scholar cloistered up,
 "Close under lock and key, kept at his task
 "Of letting Fénelon know the fool he is,
 "In a book I promise Christendom next Spring.
 "Why, if he covets so much meat, the clown,
 "As a lark's wing next Friday, or, any day,
 "Diversion beyond catching his own fleas,
 "He shall be properly swinged, I promise
 him.
 "But you, who are so quite another paste
 "Of a man, — do you obey me? Cultivate 50 vate
 "Assiduous that superior gift you have
 "Of making madrigals — (who told me?
 Ah!)
 "Get done a Marinesque Adoniad¹
 straight
 "With a pulse o' the blood a-pricking, here and there,
 "That I may tell the lady: 'And he's ours!'
- So I became a priest: those terms changed all,
 I was good enough for that, nor cheated so;
 I could live thus and still hold head erect.
 Now you see why I may have been before A fribble and coxcomb, yet, as priest, break 60
 word Nowise, to make you disbelieve me now.
 I need that you should know my truth.
 Well, then,
 According to prescription did I live, — Conformed myself, both read the breviary
 And wrote the rhymes, was punctual to my
 place
 I' the Pieve,² and as diligent at my post Where beauty and fashion rule. I throve apace,
 Sub-deacon, Canon, the authority
 For delicate play at tarocs,³ and arbiter O' the magnitude of fan-mounts: all the 70
 while Wanting no whit the advantage of a hint Benignant to the promising pupil, — thus:
 "Enough attention to the Countess now,
 "The young one; 'tis her mother rules the roast,
 "We know where, and puts in a word: go
 pay
 "Devoir to-morrow morning after mass!
 "Break that rash promise to preach, Passion-week!

² Pieve: Sta. Maria della Pieve, one of the principal churches in Arezzo.

³ Tarocs: a card game.

"Has it escaped you the Archbishop grunts
 "And snuffles when one grieves to tell his Grace

 "Arezzo's just a haven midway Rome —
 "Rome's the eventual harbour, — make for port,
 "Crowd sail, crack cordage! And your cargo be "A polished presence, a genteel manner, wit
 "At will, and tact at every pore of you!
 "I sent our lump of learning, Brother Clout,
 "And Father Slouch, our piece of piety,
 "To see Rome and try suit the Cardinal.
 "Thither they clump-clumped, beads and book in hand, to "And ever since 'tis meat for man and maid

 "Now go to duty: brisk, break Priscian's head!
 "By reading the day's office — there's no help.
 "You've Ovid in your poke to plaster that;
 "Amen! at the end of all: then sup with me!"

Well, after three or four years of this life,
 In prosecution of my calling, I

* Break Priscian's head: break the rules of classical Latin grammar, on which Priscian was the most famous ancient authority.

Found myself at the theatre one night
 With a brother Canon, in a mood and mind Proper enough for the place, amused or no: 40
 When I saw enter, stand, and scat herself A lady, young, tall, beautiful, strange and sad.

It was as when, in our cathedral once,
 As I got yawningly through matin-song,
 I saw *facchini*² bear a burden up, Base it on the high-altar, break away
 A board or two, and leave the thing inside Lofty and lone: and lo, when next I looked,

There was the Rafael! I was still one stare, When — "Nay, I'll make her give you 50 back your gaze" —

Said Canon Conti; and at the word he tossed

A paper-twist of comfits to her lap,
 And dodged and in a trice was at my back Nodding from over my shoulder. Then she turned,

Looked our way, smiled the beautiful sad strange smile.

"Is not she fair? 'Tis my new cousin," said he:

"The fellow lurking there i' the black o' the box

"Is Guido, the old scapegrace: she's his wife,

"Married three years since: how his Countship sulks!

"He has brought little back from Rome 6
 beside,

"After the bragging, bullying. A fair face,

"And — they do say — a pocketful of gold
 "When he can worry both her parents dead.

"I don't go much there, for the chamber's cold

"And the coffee pale. I got a turn at first "Paying my duty: I observed they crouched

"— The two old frightened family spectres — close

"In a corner, each on each like mouse on mouse

"I' the cat's cage: ever since, I stay at home.

"Hallo, there's Guido, the black, mean and 70
 small,

"Bends his brows on us — please to bend your own

"On the shapely nether limbs of Light-skirts there

"By way of a diversion! I was a fool
 "To fling the sweetmeats. Prudence, for God's love!

"To-morrow I'll make my peace, e'en tell some fib,

"Try if I can't find means to take you there."

* Facchini: porters.

That night and next day did the gaze endure,
Burnt to my brain, as sunbeam thro' shut eyes,
And not once changed the beautiful sad strange smile.

At vespers Conti leaned beside my seat
I' the choir, — part said, part sung —

"In ex-cel-sis —

*"All's to no purpose; I have louted low,
"But he saw you staring — quia sub —* don't incline

"To know you nearer: him we would not hold

"For Hercules, — the man would lick your shoe

10 *"If you and certain efficacious friends
"Managed him warily, — but there's the wife:*

*"Spare her, because he beats her, as it is,
"She's breaking her heart quite fast enough — jam tu —*

"So, be you rational and make amends "With little Light-skirts yonder — in secula

"Secu-lo-o-o-rum. Ah, you rogue! Every one knows

"What great dame she makes jealous: one against one,

"Play, and win both!"

Sirs, ere the week was out,
I saw and said to myself, "Light-skirts hides teeth

20 "Would make a dog sick, — the great dame shows spite

"Should drive a cat mad: 'tis but poor work this —

"Counting one's fingers till the sonnet's crowned.

"I doubt much if Marino really be "A better bard than Dante after all.

"'Tis more amusing to go pace at eve

"I' the Duomo, — watch the day's last gleam outside

*"Turn, as into a skirt of God's own robe,
"Those lancet-windows' jewelled miracle, —*

"Than go eat the Archbishop's ortolans, 30 "Digest his jokes. Luckily Lent is near:

*"Who cares to look will find me in my stall
"At the Pieve, constant to this faith at least —*

"Never to write a canzonet any more."

So, next week, 'twas my patron spoke abrupt,

In altered guise. "Young man, can it be
true

"That after all your promise of sound
fruit,

"You have kept away from Countess young or old

"And gone play truant in church all day
long?

"Are you turning Molinist?" I answered
quick:

"Sir, what if I turned Christian? It might 40
be.

"The fact is, I am troubled in my mind,
"Beset and pressed hard by some novel thoughts.

"This your Arezzo is a limited world;

"There's a strange Pope, — 'tis said, a priest who thinks.

"Rome is the port, you say: to Rome I go.

"I will live alone, one does so in a crowd,

"And look into my heart a little." "Lent

"Ended," — I told friends — "I shall go to Rome."

One evening I was sitting in a muse Over the opened "Summa,"¹ darkened 50
round

By the mid-March twilight, thinking how my life

Had shaken under me, — broke short
indeed

And showed the gap 'twixt what is, what should be, —

And into what abysm the soul may slip,
Leave aspiration here, achievement there,

Lacking omnipotence to connect extremes —

Thinking moreover . . . oh, thinking, if you like,

How utterly dissociated was I

A priest and celibate, from the sad strange
wife

Of Guido, — just as an instance to the 60
point,

Nought more, — how I had a whole store of strengths

Eating into my heart, which craved employ,

And she, perhaps, need of a finger's help, —
And yet there was no way in the wide
world

To stretch out mine and so relieve myself, —

How when the page o' the Summa preached its best,

Her smile kept glowing out of it, as to mock

The silence we could break by no one
word, —

There came a tap without the chamber-
door,

And a whisper; when I bade who tapped 70 speak out.

And, in obedience to my summons, last
In glided a masked muffled mystery,

Laid lightly a letter on the opened book, Then stood with folded arms and foot demure,

Pointing as if to mark the minutes' flight.

Aquinas.

I took the letter, read to the effect That she, I lately flung the comforts to,
Had a warm heart to give me in exchange,
And gave it, — loved me and confessed it
thus,
And bade me render thanks by word of
mouth,
Going that night to such a side o' the house Where the small terrace overhangs a street Blind and deserted, not the street in front:
Her husband being away, the surly patch, 10 At his villa of Vittiano.

"And you?" — I asked:
"What may you be?" "Count Guido's kind of maid —
"Most of us have two functions in his
house.
"We all hate him, the lady suffers much,
"Tis just we show compassion, furnish
help,
"Specially since her choice is fixed so well.
"What answer may I bring to cheer the sweet
"Pompilia?"

Then I took a pen and wrote
"No more of this! That you are fair, I
know:
"But other thoughts now occupy my mind.
20 "I should not thus have played the insensible
"Once on a time. What made you, — may one ask, —
"Marry your hideous husband? 'Twas a fault,
"And now you taste the fruit of it. Farewell."

"There!" smiled I as she snatched it and was gone —
"There, let the jealous miscreant, — Guido's self,
"Whose mean soul grins through this transparent trick, —
"Be balked so far, defrauded of his aim!
"What fund of satisfaction to the knave,
"Had I kicked this his messenger down
stairs,
30 "Trussed to the middle of her impudence,
"And set his heart at ease so! No, indeed!
"There's the reply which he shall turn and twist
"At pleasure, snuff at till his brain grow
drunk,
"As the bear does when he finds a scented glove
"That puzzles him, — a hand and yet no
hand,
"Of other perfume than his own foul paw!
"Last month, I had doubtless chosen to play the dupe,
"Accepted the mock-invitation, kept

"The sham appointment, cudgel beneath cloak

"Prepared myself to pull the appointer's
self

"Out of the window from his hiding-place

"Behind the gown of this part-messenger

"Part-mistress who would personate the
wife.

"Such had seemed once a jest permissible:

"Now I am not i' the mood."

Back next morn brought

The messenger, a second letter in hand.

"You are cruel, Thyrsis, and Myrtilla moans

"Neglected but adores you, makes request

"For mercy: why is it you dare not come?

"Such virtue is scarce natural to your age. 50

"You must love someone else; I hear you
do,

"The Baron's daughter or the Advocate's
wife,

"Or both, — all's one, would you make me the third —

"I take the crumbs from table gratefully

"Nor grudge who feasts there. 'Faith, I blush and blaze!

"Yet if I break all bounds, there's reason
sure.

"Are you determinedly bent on Rome?

"I am wretched here, a monster tortures
me:

"Carry me with you! Come and say you
will!

"Concert this very evening! Do not write! 60

"I am ever at the window of my room

"Over the terrace, at the Ave. Come!"

I questioned — lifting half the woman's mask

To let her smile loose. "So, you gave my line

"To the merry lady?" "She kissed off the wax,

"And put what paper was not kissed away,

"In her bosom to go burn: but merry, no!

"She wept all night when evening brought no friend,

"Alone, the unkind missive at her breast;

"Thus Philomel, the thorn at her breast too, 70

"Sings" . . . "Writes this second letter?"

"Even so!

"Then she may peep at vespers forth?" —

"What risk

"Do we run o' the husband?" — "Ah, — no risk at all!

"He is more stupid even than jealous.
Ah —

"That was the reason? Why, the man's
away!

"Beside, his bugbear is that friend of yours,

"Fat little Canon Conti. He fears him,

"How should he dream of you? I told 84 you truth:

"He goes to the villa at Vittiano — 'tis

"The time when Spring-sap rises in the vine —
 "Spends the night there. And then his wife's a child:
 "Does he think a child outwits him? A mere child:
 "Yet so full grown, a dish for any duke.
 "Don't quarrel longer with such cates, but come!"

I wrote "In vain do you solicit me.
 "I am a priest: and you are wedded wife,
 "Whatever kind of brute your husband prove.
 "I have scruples, in short. Yet should you really show
 "Sign^l at the window . . . but nay, best be good!
 "My thoughts are elsewhere." "Take her that!"

"Again
 "Let the incarnate meanness, cheat and spy,
 "Mean to the marrow of him, make his heart
 "His food, anticipate hell's worm once more!
 "Let him watch shivering at the window — ay,
 "And let this hybrid, this his light-of-love
 "And lackey-of-lies, — a sage economy,
 "Paid with embracings for the rank brass coin, —
 "Let her report and make him chuckle o'er so "The break-down of my resolution now,

 "And lour at disappointment in good time!
 "— So tantalise and so enrage by turns,
 "Until the two fall each on the other like
 "Two famished spiders, as the coveted fly
 "That toys long, leaves their net and them at last!"

And so the missives followed thick and fast
 For a month, say, — I still came at every turn

On the soft sly adder, endlong 'neath my tread.

I was met i' the street, made sign to in the church,

30 A slip was found i' the door-sill, scribbled word

'Twixt page and page o' the prayer-book in my place.

A crumpled thing dropped even before my feet,

Pushed through the blind, above the terrace-rail,

As I passed, by day, the very window once.
 And ever from corners would be peering up

The messenger, with the self-same demand,
 "Obdurate still, no flesh but adamant?"

"Nothing to cure the wound, assuage the throe

"O' the sweetest lamb that ever loved a bear?"

And ever my one answer in one tone — 44

"Go your ways, temptress! Let a priest read, pray,

"Unplagued of vain talk, visions not for him!

"In the end, you'll have your will and ruin me!"

One day, a variation: thus I read:

"You have gained little by timidity.

"My husband has found out my love at length,

"Sees cousin Conti was the stalking-horst,
 "And you the game he covered, poor fat soul!

"My husband is a formidable foe,
 "Will stick at nothing to destroy you. 50

Stand
 "Prepared, or better, run till you reach Rome!

"I bade you visit me, when the last place

"My tyrant would have turned suspicious at,

"Or cared to seek you in, was . . . why say, where?

"But now all's changed: beside, the season's past

"At the villa, — wants the master's eye no more.

"Anyhow, I beseech you, stay away
 "From the window! He might well be posted there."

I wrote — "You raise my courage, or call up

"My curiosity, who am but man. 60

"Tell him he owns the palace, not the street
 "Under — that's his and yours and mine alike.

"If it should please me pad the path this eve,

"Guido will have two troubles, first to get "Into a rage and then get out again.

"Be cautious, though: at the Ave!"
 You of the Court!

When I stood question here and reached this point

O' the narrative, — search notes and see and say

If someone did not interpose with smile
 And sneer, "And prithee why so confident? 70

"That the husband must, of all needs, not the wife,

"Fabricate thus, — what if the lady loved?
 "What if she wrote the letters?"

Learned Sir,
 I told you there's a picture in our church.

Well, if a low-browed verger sidled up Bringing me, like a blotch, on his prod's point,

A transfixed scorpion, let the reptile writhe,

And then said "See a thing that Rafael made —

'This venom issued from Madonna's mouth!'

I should reply, "Rather, the soul of you
"Has issued from your body, like from like,
"By way of the ordure-corner!"

But no less,

I tired of the same long black teasing lie Obtruded thus at every turn; the pest Was far too near the picture, anyhow:

One does Madonna service, making clowns Remove their hung-deap from the sacristy.
"I will to the window, as he tempts," said I:

"Yes, whom the easy love has failed allure,
"This new bait of adventure tempts, — thinks he.

"Though the imprisoned lady keeps afar,
"There will they lie in ambush, heads alert,

"Kith, kin, and Count mustered to bite my heel.

"No mother nor brother viper of the brood
"Shall scuttle off without the instructive bruise!"

So I went: crossed street and street:
"The next street's turn,

"I stand beneath the terrace, see, above,
"The black of the ambush-window. Then, in place

"Of hand's throw of soft prelude over lute,
"And cough that clears way for the ditty
last," —

I began to laugh already — "he will have "Out of the hole you hide in, on to the front,

"Count Guido Franceschini, show yourself!

"Hear what a man thinks of a thing like
you,

"And after, take this foulness in your
face!"

The words lay living on my lip, I made

The one-turn more — and there at the window stood,
Framed in its black square length, with lamp in hand,

Pompilia; the same great, grave, grievful
air

As stands i' the dusk, on altar that I know, Left alone with one moonbeam in her cell, Our Lady of all the Sorrows. Ere I kneelt —

Assured myself that she was flesh and
blood —

She had looked one look and vanished.

I thought — "Just so:

"It was herself, they have set her there to watch —

"Stationed to see some wedding-band go
by,

"On fair pretence that she must bless the 4c
bride,

"Or wait some funeral with friends wind
past,

"And crave peace for the corpse that claims its due.

"She never dreams they used her for a snare,

"And now withdraw the bait has served its
turn.

"Well done, the husband, who shall fare the worse!"

"And on my lip again was — "Out with
thee,

"Guido!" When all at once she re-appeared;

But, this time, on the terrace overhead,
So close above me, she could almost touch My head if she bent down; and she did 5c
bend,

While I stood still as stone, all eye, all
ear.

She began — "You have sent me letters,
Sir:

"I have read none, I can neither read nor
write;

"But she you gave them to, a woman here,
"One of the people in whose power I am,

"Partly explained their sense, I think, to
me

"Obliged to listen while she inculcates
"That you, a priest, can dare love me, a
wife,

"Desire to live or die as I shall bid,
"She makes me listen if I will or no) 6c

"Because you saw my face a single time.
"It cannot be she says the thing you mean;

"Such wickedness were deadly to us both:
"But good true love would help me now so
much —

"I tell myself, you may mean good and
true.

"You offer me, I seem to understand,
"Because I am in poverty and starve,

"Much money, where one piece would save my life.

"The silver cup upon the altar-cloth
"Is neither yours to give nor mine to take; 7c

"But I might take one bit of bread there-
from,

"Since I am starving, and return the rest,
"Yet do no harm: this is my very case.

"I am in that strait, I may not dare abstain "From so much of assistance as would bring

"The guilt of theft on neither you nor me;
"But no superfluous particle of aid.

"I think, if you will let me state my case,
"Even had you been so fancy-fevered here,

"Not your sound self, you must grow 8c healthy now —

"Care only to bestow what I can take.
"That it is only you in the wide world,

"Knowing me nor in thought nor word nor deed,

"Who, all unprompted save by your own heart,

"Come proffering assistance now, — were strange

"But that my whole life is so strange: as strange

"It is, my husband whom I have not wronged

"Should hate and harm me. For his own soul's sake,

"Hinder the harm! But there is something more,

"And that the strangest: it has got to be

"Somehow for my sake too, and yet not mine, to "— This is a riddle — for some kind of sake

"Not any clearer to myself than you,

"And yet as certain as that I draw breath, —

"I would fain live, not die — oh no, not die!

"My case is, I was dwelling happily

"At Rome with those dear Comparini, called

"Father and mother to me; when at once

"I found I had become Count Guido's wife:

"Who then, not waiting for a moment, changed

"Into a fury of fire, if once he was 20 "Merely a man: his face threw fire at mine,

"He laid a hand on me that burned all peace,

"All joy, all hope, and last all fear away,

"Dipping the bough of life, so pleasant once,

"In fire which shrivelled leaf and bud alike,

"Burning not only present life but past,

"Which you might think was safe beyond his reach.

"He reached it, though, since that beloved pair,

"My father once, my mother all those years,

"That loved me so, now say I dreamed a dream 30 "And bid me wake, henceforth no child of theirs,

"Never in all the time their child at all.

"Do you understand? I cannot: yet so it is.

"Just so I say of you that proffer help:

"I cannot understand what prompts your soul,

"I simply needs must see that it is so,

"Only one strange and wonderful thing more.

"They came here with me, those two dear ones, kept

"All the old love up, till my husband, till

"His people here so tortured them, they fled.

"And now, is it because I grow in flesh 44

"And spirit one with him their torturer,

"That they, renouncing him, must cast off me?

"If I were graced by God to have a child,

"Could I one day deny God graced me so?

"Then, since my husband hates me, I shall break

"No law that reigns in this fell house of hate,

"By using — letting have effect so much "Of hate as hides me from that whole of hate

"Would take my life which I want and must have —

"Just as I take from your excess of love 50

"Enough to save my life with, all I need.

"The Archbishop said to murder me were sin:

"My leaving Guido were a kind of death

"With no sin, — more death, he must answer for.

"Hear now what death to him and life to you

"I wish to pay and owe. Take me to Rome!

"You go to Rome, the servant makes me hear.

"Take me as you would take a dog, I think,

"Masterless left for strangers to maltreat:

"Take me home like that — leave me in 60 the house

"Where the father and the mother are; and soon

"They'll come to know and call me by my name,

"Their child once more, since child I am, for all

"They now forget me, which is the worst o' the dream —

"And the way to end dreams is to break them, stand,

"Walk, go: then help me to stand, walk and go!

"The Governor said the strong should help the weak:

"You know how weak the strongest women are.

"How could I find my way there by myself?

"I cannot even call out, make them hear — 70

"Just as in dreams: I have tried and proved the fact.

"I have told this story and more to good great men,

"The Archbishop and the Governor: they smiled.

"Stop your mouth, fair one! — presently they frowned,

"Get you gone, disengage you from our feet!

"I went in my despair to an old priest,

"Only a friar, no great man like these two,

"But good, the Augustinian, people name
"Romano, — he confessed me two months
since:

"He fears God, why then needs he fear the
world?

"And when he questioned how it came
about

"That I was found in danger of a sin —
"Despair of any help from providence, —

"Since, though your husband outrage you,' said he,

"That is a case too common, the wives
die

"Or live, but do not sin so deep as this' —

10 "Then I told — what I never will tell you —

"How, worse than husband's hate, I had to bear

"The love, — soliciting to shame called
love, —

"Of his brother, — the young idle priest i' the house

"With only the devil to meet there. 'This is grave —

"Yes, we must interfere: I counsel, —
write

"To those who used to be your parents
once,

"Of dangers here, bid them convey you
hence!"

"But," said I, 'when I neither read nor
write?"

"Then he took pity and promised 'I will write.'

20 "If he did so, — why, they are dumb or
dead:

"Either they give no credit to the tale,
"Or else, wrapped wholly up in their own
joy

"Of such escape, they care not who cries,
still

"I' the clutches. Anyhow, no word arrives.

"All such extravagance and dreadfulness "Seems incident to dreaming, cured one
way, —

"Wake me! The letter I received this
morn,

"Said — if the woman spoke your very
sense —

"You would die for me:' I can believe it
now:

30 "For now the dream gets to involve yourself.

"First of all, you seemed wicked and not
good,

"In writing me those letters: you came in "Like a thief upon me. I this morning
said

"In my extremity, entreat the thief!
"Try if he have in him no honest touch!

"A thief might save me from a murderer.
"Twas a thief said the last kind word to Christ:

"Christ took the kindness and forgave the theft:

"And so did I prepare what I now say.

"But now, that you stand and I see your 40
face,

"Though you have never uttered word yet, — well, I know,

"Here too has been dream-work, delusion
too,

"And that at no time, you with the eyes
here,

"Ever intended to do wrong by me, "Nor wrote such letters therefore. It is
false,

"And you are true, have been true, will be
true.

"To Rome then, — when is it you take me there?

"Each minute lost is mortal. When? — I ask."

I answered, "It shall be when it can be.
"I will go hence and do your pleasure, find 50
"The sure and speedy means of travel, then "Come back and take you to your friends in Rome.

"There wants a carriage, money and the
rest, —

"A day's work by to-morrow at this time.
"How shall I see you and assure escape?"

She replied, "Pass, to-morrow at this hour.
"If I am at the open window, well:

"If I am absent, drop a handkerchief "And walk by! I shall see from where I
watch,

"And know that all is done. Return next 60
eve,

"And next, and so till we can meet and
speak!"

"To-morrow at this hour I pass," said I.
She was withdrawn.

Here is another point
I bid you pause at. When I told thus far, Someone said, subtly, "Here at least was
found

"Your conviction in error, — you perceived

"The spirit of the letters, in a sort,
"Had been the lady's, if the body should
be

"Supplied by Guido: say, he forged them
all!

"Here was the unforged fact — she sent 70
for you,

"Spontaneously elected you to help,
"— What men call, loved you: Guido read her mind,

"Gave it expression to assure the world
"The case was just as he foresaw: he wrote,

"She spoke."

Sirs, that first simile serves still, —

That falsehood of a scorpion hatched, I
 say, Nowhere i' the world but in Madouna's
 mouth.
 Go on! Suppose, that falsehood foiled, next eve Pictured Madonna raised her painted
 hand,
 Fixed the face Rafael bent above the Babe,
 On my face as I flung me at her feet:
 Such miracle vouchsafed and manifest, Would that prove the first lying tale was
 true?

Pomplia spoke, and I at once received, 10 Accepted my own fact, my miracle Self-authorised and self-explained, — she chose

To summon me and signify her choice.
 Afterward, — oh! I gave a passing glance To a certain ugly cloud-shape, goblin-shred
 Of hell-smoke hurrying past the splendid moon

Out now to tolerate no darkness more,
 And saw right through the thing that tried
 to pass

For truth and solid, not an empty lie:

“So, he not only forged the words for her 20 “But words for me, made letters he called
 mine:

“What I sent, he retained, gave these in
 place,

“All by the mistress-messenger! As I “Recognised her, at potency of truth, “So she, by the crystalline soul, knew me, “Never mistook the signs. Enough of this —

“Let the wraith go to nothingness again, “Here is the orb, have only thought for
 her!”

“Thought?” nay, Sirs, what shall follow was not thought:

I have thought sometimes, and thought long and hard.

30 I have stood before, gone round a serious
 thing,

Tasked my whole mind to touch and clasp it close,

As I stretch forth my arm to touch this bar.
 God and man, and what duty I owe both, — I dare to say I have confronted these In thought: but no such faculty helped
 here.

I put forth no thought, — powerless, all that night

I paced the city: it was the first Spring.
 By the invasion I lay passive to,
 In rushed new things, the old were rapt
 away;

40 Alike abolished — the imprisonment Of the outside air, the inside weight o' the
 world

That pulled me down. Death meant, to spurn the ground,

Soar to the sky, — die well and you do that.
 The very immolation made the bliss; Death was the heart of life, and all the
 harm

My folly had crouched to avoid, now proved a veil

Hiding all gain my wisdom strove to grasp:
 As if the intense centre of the flame Should turn a heaven to that devoted fly Which hitherto, sophist alike and sage, 54 Saint Thomas¹ with his sober grey goosequill,

And sinner Plato by Cephisian reed,² Would fain, pretending just the insect's
 good,

Whisk off, drive back, consign to shade
 again.

Into another state, under new rule
 I knew myself was passing swift and sure;
 Whereof the initiatory pang approached, Felicitous annoy, as bitter-sweet

As when the virgin-band, the victors chaste Feel at the end the earthly garments 60
 drop,

And rise with something of a rosy shame Into immortal nakedness: so I

Lay, and let come the proper throe would thrill

Into the ecstasy and outthrob pain.

I' the grey of dawn it was I found myself Facing the pillared front o' the Pieve —
 mine,

My church: it seemed to say for the first
 time

“But am not I the Bride, the mystic love “O' the Lamb, who took thy plighted troth, my priest,

“To fold thy warm heart on my heart of 70
 stone

“And freeze thee nor unfasten any more?

“This is a fleshly woman, — let the free “Bestow their life-blood, thou art pulse-less now!”

See! Day by day I had risen and left this church

At the signal waved me by some foolish fan,

With half a curse and half a pitying smile
 For the monk I stumbled over in my haste, Prostrate and corpse-like at the altar-foot Intent on his corona: then the church Was ready with her quip, if word conduced, 80
 To quicken my pace nor stop for prating —

“There!

“Be thankful you are no such ninny, go “Rather to teach a black-eyed novice cards

 l. 70.

² Cephisian reed: the reeds of Cephisus, one of the rivers of Athens.

"Than gabble Latin and protrude that
nose

"Smoothed to a sheep's through no brains and much faith!"

That sort of incentive! Now the church changed tone —

Now, when I found out first that life and
death

Are means to an end, that passion uses
both,

Indisputably mistress of the man

Whose form of worship is self-sacrifice:

Now, from the stone lungs sighed the scranell voice

"Leave that live passion, come be dead
with me!"

10 As if, i' the fabled garden,¹ I had gone On great adventure, plucked in ignorance

Hedge-fruit, and feasted to satiety,

Laughing at such high fame for hips and
haws,

And scorned the achievement: then come all at once

O' the prize o' the place, the thing of perfect gold,

The apple's self: and, scarce my eye on
that,

Was 'ware as well o' the seven-fold dragon's
watch.

Sirs, I obeyed. Obedience was too
strange, —

This new thing that had been struck into
me

20 By the look o' the lady, — to dare disobey
The first authoritative word. 'Twas God's.

I had been lifted to the level of her,
Could take such sounds into my sense. I

said

"We two are cognisant o' the Master now;

"She it is bids me bow the head: how true,

"I am a priest! I see the function here;

"I thought the other way self-sacrifice:

"This is the true, seals up the perfect sun.

"I pay it, sit down, silently obey."

30 So, I went home. Dawn broke, noon broadened, I —

I sat stone-still, let time run over me.

The sun slanted into my room, had reached

The west. I opened book, — Aquinas blazed

With one black name only on the white page.

I looked up, saw the sunset: vespers rang:

"She counts the minutes till I keep my
word

"And come say all is ready. I am a priest.

"Duty to God is duty to her: I think

"God, who created her, will save her too

¹ The fabled garden: of the Hesperides, where the golden apple was guarded by a dragon.

"Some new way, by one miracle the more, 40

"Without me. Then, prayer may avail
perhaps."

I went to my own place i' the Pieve, read

The office: I was back at home again

Sitting i' the dark. "Could she but know

— but know

"That, were there good in this distinct from God's,

"Really good as it reached her, though procured

"By a sin of mine, — I should sin: God forgives.

"She knows it is no fear withholds me:
fear?

"Of what? Suspense here is the terrible
thing.

"If she should, as she counts the minutes, 50
come

"On the fantastic notion that I fear

"The world now, fear the Archbishop, fear
perhaps

"Count Guido, he who, having forged the
lies,

"May wait the work, attend the effect, —
I fear

"The sword of Guido! Let God see to
that —

"Hating lies, let not her believe a lie!"

Again the morning found me. "I will
work,

"Tie down my foolish thoughts. Thank God so far!

"I have saved her from a scandal, stopped the tongues

"Had broken else into a cackle and hiss 60

"Around the noble name. Duty is still "Wisdom: I have been wise." So the day wore.

At evening — "But, achieving victory,

"I must not blink the priest's peculiar
part,

"Nor shrink to counsel, comfort: priest and friend —

"How do we discontinue to be friends?

"I will go minister, advise her seek "Help at the source, — above all, not despair:

"There may be other happier help at hand.

"I hope it, — wherefore then neglect to 70
say?"

There she stood — leaned there, for the second time,

Over the terrace, looked at me, then spoke:

"Why is it you have suffered me to stay

"Breaking my heart two days more than was need?

"Why delay help, your own heart yearns to give?

"You are again here, in the self-same mind

"I see here, steadfast in the face of you, —
 "You grudge to do no one thing that I ask.
 "Why then is nothing done? You know my need.
 "Still, through God's pity on me, there is time
 "And one day more: shall I be saved or no?" I answered — "Lady, waste no thought, no word
 "Even to forgive me! Care for what I care —
 "Only! Now follow me as I were fate!
 "Leave this house in the dark to-morrow night, 10 "Just before daybreak: — there's new moon this eve —
 "It sets, and then begins the solid black.
 "Descend, proceed to the Torrione, step
 "Over the low dilapidated wall,
 "Take San Clemente, there's no other gate
 "Unguarded at the hour: some paces thence
 "An inn stands; cross to it; I shall be there."

She answered, "If I can but find the way.
 "But I shall find it. Go now!"

I did go,
 Took rapidly the route myself prescribed, 20 Stopped at Torrione, climbed the ruined place, Proved that the gate was practicable, reached The inn, no eye, despite the dark, could miss, Knocked there and entered, made the host secure:
 "With Caponsacchi it is ask and have;
 "I know my betters. Are you bound for Rome?
 "I get swift horse and trusty man," said he.

Then I retraced my steps, was found once more
 In my own house for the last time: there lay The broad pale opened Summa. "Shut his book, 30 "There's other showing! 'Twas a Thomas too "Obtained, — more favoured than his namesake here, —
 "A gift, tied faith fast, foiled the tug of doubt, —
 "Our Lady's girdle; down he saw it drop
 "As she ascended into heaven, they say:
 "He kept that safe and bade all doubt adieu.
 "I too have seen a lady and hold a grace."

I know not how the night passed: morning broke; Presently came my servant. "Sir, this eve —
 "Do you forget?" I started. "How forget?
 "What is it you know?" "With due sub- 40 mission, Sir,
 "This being last Monday in the month but one
 "And a vigil, since to-morrow is Saint George,
 "And feast day, and moreover day for copes,
 "And Canon Conti now away a month,
 "And Canon Crispi sour because, forsooth,
 "You let him sulk in stall and bear the brunt
 "Of the octave . . . Well, Sir, 'tis important!"
 "True!"
 "Hearken, I have to start for Rome this night.
 "No word, lest Crispi overboil and burst!
 "Provide me with a laic dress. Throw 50 dust
 "I' the Canon's eye, stop his tongue's scandal so!
 "See there's a sword in case of accident."
 I knew the knave, the knave knew me.

And thus
 Through each familiar hindrance of the day Did I make steadily for its hour and end, — Felt time's old barrier-growth of right and fit Give way through all its twines, and let me go.
 Use and wont recognised the excepted man, Let speed the special service, — and I sped Till, at the dead between midnight and 60 morn,
 There was I at the goal, before the gate,
 With a tune in the ears, low leading up to loud,
 A light in the eyes, faint that would soon be flare, Ever some spiritual witness new and new In faster frequency, crowding solitude
 To watch the way o' the warfare, — till, at last,
 When the ecstatic minute must bring birth Began a whiteness in the distance, waxed Whiter and whiter, near grew and more near,
 Till it was she: there did Pompilia come: 70
 The white I saw shine through her was her soul's, Certainly, for the body was one black.
 Black from head down to foot. She did not speak.

Glided into the carriage, — so a cloud Gathers the moon up. "By San Spirito, "To Rome, as if the road burned underneath!

"Reach Rome, then hold my head in pledge, I pay

"The run and the risk to heart's content!"
Just that

I said, — then, in another tick of time, Sprang, was beside her, she and I alone.

So it began, our flight thro' dusk to clear, Through day and night and day again to night

10 Once more, and to last dreadful dawn of
all.

Sirs, how should I lie quiet in my grave Unless you suffer me wring, drop by
drop,

My brain dry, make a riddance of the drench

Of minutes with a memory in each, Recorded motion, breath or look of hers, Which poured forth would present you one pure glass,

Mirror you plain, — as God's sea, glassed in gold,

His saints, — the perfect soul Pompilia?
Men,

You must know that a man gets drunk with
truth

20 Stagnant inside him! Oh, they've killed her, Sirs!

Can I be calm?

Calmly! Each incident

Proves, I maintain, that action of the flight For the true thing it was. The first faint scratch

O' the stone will test its nature, teach its
worth

To idiots who name Parian — coprolite.
After all, I shall give no glare — at best

Only display you certain scattered lights Lamping the rush and roll of the abyss:
Nothing but here and there a fire-point pricks

30 Wavelet from wavelet: well!

For the first hour
We both were silent in the night, I know:
Sometimes I did not see nor understand.
Blackness engulfed me, — partial stupor, say —

Then I would break way, breathe through the surprise,

And be aware again, and see who sat In the dark vest with the white face and
hands.

I said to myself — "I have caught it, I conceive

"The mind o' the mystery: 'tis the way they wake

"And wait, two martyrs somewhere in a tomb

40 "Each by each as their blessing was to die;

"Some signal they are promised and expect, —

"When to arise before the trumpet scares:

"So, through the whole course of the world they wait

"The last day, but so fearless and so safe!

"No otherwise, in safety and not fear,

"I lie, because she lies too by my side."

You know this is not love, Sirs, — it is
faith,

The feeling that there's God, he reigns and rules

Out of this low world: that is all; no
harm!

At times she drew a soft sigh — music 50
seemed

Always to hover just above her lips,
Not settle, — break a silence music too.

In the determined morning, I first found Her head erect, her face turned full to
me,

Her soul intent on mine through two wide
eyes.

I answered them. "You are saved hither-
to.

"We have passed Perugia, — gone round by the wood,

"Not through, I seem to think, — and opposite

"I know Assisi; this is holy ground."

Then she resumed. "How long since we 60 both left

"Arezzo?" "Years — and certain hours
beside."

It was at . . . ah, but I forget the names!
'Tis a mere post-house and a hovel or
two;

I left the carriage and got bread and wine And brought it her. "Does it detain to eat?"

"They stay perforce, change horses, — therefore eat!

"We lose no minute: we arrive, be sure!"
This was — I know not where — there's a great hill

Close over, and the stream has lost its bridge,

One fords it. She began — "I have 70 heard say

"Of some sick body that my mother knew,
"Twas no good sign when in a limb discased

"All the pain suddenly departs, — as if "The guardian angel discontinued pain

"Because the hope of cure was gone at
last:

"The limb will not again exert itself,

"It needs be pained no longer: so with me,
"— My soul whence all the pain is past at
once:

"All pain must be to work some good in the end.

"True, this I feel now, this may be that good,
 "Pain was because of, — otherwise, I fear!"

She said, — a long while later in the day,

When I had let the silence be, — abrupt —
 "Have you a mother?" "She died, I was born."

"A sister then?" "No sister." "Who was it —"

"What woman were you used to serve this way,

"Be kind to, till I called you and you came?"

I did not like that word. Soon afterward — to "Tell me, are men unhappy, in some kind "Of mere unhappiness at being men,

"As women suffer, being womanish?"

"Have you, now, some unhappiness, I mean,

"Born of what may be man's strength overmuch,

"To match the undue susceptibility,

"The sense at every pore when hate is close?"

"It hurts us if a baby hides its face

"Or child strikes at us punily, calls names

"Or makes a mouth, — much more if stranger men so "Laugh or frown, — just as that were much to bear!

"Yet rocks split, — and the blow-ball does no more,

"Quivers to feathery nothing at a touch;

"And strength may have its drawback weakness 'scapes."

Once she asked "What is it that made you smile,

"At the great gate with the eagles and the snakes,

"Where the company entered, 'tis a long time since?"

" — Forgive — I think you would not understand:

"Ah, but you ask me, — therefore it was this.

"That was a certain bishop's villa-gate, 30 "I knew it by the eagles, — and at once "Remembered this same bishop was just he

"People of old were wont to bid me please

"If I would catch preferment: so, I smiled

"Because an impulse came to me, a whim —

"What if I prayed the prelate leave to speak,

"Began upon him in his presence-hall

" — 'What, still at work so grey and obsolete?

"Still roched and mitred more or less?"

"Don't you feel all that out of fashion now?"

"I find out when the day of things is done!"

At eve we heard the angelus: she turned —

"I told you I can neither read nor write.

"My life stopped with the play-time; I will learn,

"If I begin to live again: but you —

"Who are a priest — wherefore do you not read

"The service at this hour? Read Gabriel's song,

"The lesson, and then read the little prayer

"To Raphael, proper for us travellers!"

I did not like that, neither, but I read.

When we stopped at Foligno it was dark. 50
 The people of the post came out with lights:

The driver said, "This time to-morrow, may

"Saints only help, relays continue good,

"Nor robbers hinder, we arrive at Rome."

I urged, "Why tax your strength a second night?"

"Trust me, alight here and take brief repose!

"We are out of harm's reach, past pursuit: go sleep

"If but an hour! I keep watch, guard the while

"Here in the doorway." But her whole face changed,

1 he misery grew again about her mouth, 60
 The eyes burned up from faintness, like the fawn's

Tired to death in the thicket, when she feels

The probing spear o' the huntsman. "Oh, no stay!"

She cried, in the fawn's cry, "On to Rome, on, on —

"Unless 'tis you who fear, — which cannot be!"

We did go on all night; but at its close

She was troubled, restless, moaned low, talked at whites

To herself, her brow on quiver with the dream:

Once, wide awake, she menaced, at arms' length

Waved away something — "Never again 70
 with you!

"My soul is mine, my body is my soul's:

"You and I are divided ever more

"In soul and body: get you gone!" Then I —

"Why, in my whole life I have never prayed!

"Oh, if the God, that only can, would help!
 "Am I his priest with power to cast out fiends?
 "Let God arise and all his enemies
 "Be scattered!" By morn, there was peace, no sigh Out of the deep sleep.

When she woke at last,
 I answered the first look — "Scarce twelve hours more,
 "Then, Rome! There probably was no pursuit,
 "There cannot now be peril: bear up brave!
 "Just some twelve hours to press through to the prize:
 "Then, no more of the terrible journey!"
 "Then,
 "No more o' the journey: if it might but last!
 "Always, my life-long, thus to journey still!
 "It is the interruption that I dread, —
 "With no dread, ever to be here and thus!
 "Never to see a face nor hear a voice!
 "Yours is no voice; you speak when you are dumb;
 "Nor face, I see it in the dark. I want
 "No face nor voice that change and grow unkind."
 That I liked, that was the best thing she said.

In the broad day, I dared entreat, "Descend!"
 I told a woman, at the garden-gate
 By the post-house, white and pleasant in the sun,
 "It is my sister, — talk with her apart!
 "She is married and unhappy, you perceive;
 "I take her home because her head is hurt;
 "Comfort her as you women understand!"
 So, there I left them by the garden-wall, Paced the road, then bade put the horses to,
 Came back, and there she sat: close to her knee,
 A black-eyed child still held the bowl of milk, Wondered to see how little she could drink,
 And in her arms the woman's infant lay.
 She smiled at me, "How much good this has done!
 "This is a whole night's rest and how much more!
 "I can proceed now, though I wish to stay.
 "How do you call that tree with the thick top
 "That holds in all its leafy green and gold

"The sun now like an immense egg of fire?" (It was a million-leaved mimosa.) "Take "The babe away from me and let me go!" 41
 And in the carriage, "Still a day, my friend!
 "And perhaps half a night, the woman fears.
 "I pray it finish since it cannot last:
 "There may be more misfortune at the close,
 "And where will you be? God suffice me then!"
 And presently — for there was a roadside-shrine —
 "When I was taken first to my own church
 "Lorenzo in Lucina, being a girl,
 "And bid confess my faults, I interposed
 "But teach me what fault to confess and 50 know!"
 "So, the priest said — 'You should be-think yourself:
 "Each human being needs must have done wrong!"
 "Now, be you candid and no priest but friend
 "Were I surprised and killed here on the spot,
 "A runaway from husband and his home,
 "Do you account it were in sin I died?
 "My husband used to seem to harm me, not . . .
 "Not on pretence he punished sin of mine,
 "Nor for sin's sake and lust of cruelty,
 "But as I heard him bid a farming-man 60
 "At the villa take a lamb once to the wood
 "And there ill-treat it, meaning that the wolf
 "Should hear its cries, and so come, quick be caught,
 "Enticed to the trap: he practised thus with me
 "That so, whatever were his gain thereby,
 "Others than I might become prey and spoil.
 "Had it been only between our two selves, —
 "His pleasure and my pain, — why, pleasure him
 "By dying, nor such need to make a coil!
 "But this was worth an effort, that my 70 pain
 "Should not become a snare, prove pain threefold
 "To other people — strangers — or unborn —
 "How should I know? I sought release from that — "I think, or else from, — dare I say, some cause
 "Such as is put into a tree, which turns
 "Away from the north wind with what nest it holds, —

"The woman said that trees so turn: now, friend,
 "Tell me, because I cannot trust myself!
 "You are a man: what have I done amiss?"
 You must conceive my answer, — I forget — Taken up wholly with the thought, perhaps,
 This time she might have said, — might, did not say —
 "You are a priest." She said, "my friend."

Day wore,

We passed the places, somehow the calm went,
 Again the restless eyes began to rove 10 In new fear of the foe mine could not see.
 She wandered in her mind, — addressed me once
 "Gaetano!"¹ — that is not my name: whose name?
 I grew alarmed, my head seemed turning too.
 I quickened pace with promise now, now threat:
 Bade drive and drive, nor any stopping more.
 "Too deep i' the thick of the struggle, struggle through!
 "Then drench her in repose though death's self pour
 "The plenitude of quiet, — help us, God,
 "Whom the winds carry!"

Suddenly I saw

20 The old tower, and the little white-walled clump Of buildings and the cypress-tree or two, — "Already Castelnuovo — Rome!" I cried,
 "As good as Rome, — Rome is the next stage, think!
 "This is where travellers' hearts are wont to beat.
 "Say you are saved, sweet lady!" Up she woke.
 The sky was fierce with colour from the sun setting. She screamed out "No, I must not die!
 "Take me no farther, I should die: stay here!

"I have more life to save than mine!"

She swooned.

30 We seemed safe: what was it foreboded so?
 Out of the coach into the inn I bore
 The motionless and breathless pure and pale Pompilia, — bore her through a pitying group
 And laid her on a couch, still calm and cured By deep sleep of all woes at once. The host

Was urgent "Let her stay an hour or two!

"Leave her to us, all will be right by morn!"

Oh, my foreboding! But I could not choose.

I paced the passage, kept watch all night long.

I listened, — not one movement, not one sigh.

"Fear not: she sleeps so sound!" they said: but I Feared, all the same, kept fearing more and more,

Found myself throb with fear from head to foot,

Filled with a sense of such impending woe,

That, at first pause of night, pretence of grey,

I made my mind up it was morn. — "Reach Rome,

"Lest hell reach her! A dozen miles to make,

"Another long breath, and we emerge!" I stood

I' the court-yard, roused the sleepy grooms. "Have out

"Carriage and horse, give haste, take gold!" said I.

While they made ready in the doubtful morn, —

'Twas the last minute, — needs must I ascend

And break her sleep; I turned to go.

And there

Faced me Count Guido, there posed the mean man

As master, — took the field, encamped his rights,

Challenged the world: there leered new triumph, there

Scowled the old malice in the visage bad

And black o' the scamp. Soon triumph supplied the tongue

A little, malice glued to his dry throat, And he part howled, part hissed . . . oh, 6

how he kept Well out o' the way, at arm's length and to spare! —

"My salutation to your priestship! What?

"Matutinal, busy with book so soon

"Of an April day that's damp as tears that now

"Deluge Arezzo at its darling's flight? — "Tis unfair, wrongs femininity at large,

"To let a single dame monopolise "A heart the whole sex claims, should share alike:

"Therefore I overtake you, Canon! Come! "The lady, — could you leave her side so soon?

'You have not yet experienced at her hands
 'My treatment, you lay down undrugged, I see!
 'Hence this alertness — hence no death-in-life
 'Like what held arms fast when she stole from mine.
 'To be sure, you took the solace and repose
 'That first night at Foligno! — news abound
 'O' the road by this time, — men regaled me much,
 'As past them I came halting after you,
 'Vulcan pursuing Mars, as poets sing, —
 'Still at the last here pant I, but arrive,
 'Vulcan — and not without my Cyclops too,
 'The Commissary and the unpoisoned arm
 'O' the Civil Force, should Mars turn mutineer.
 'Enough of fooling: capture the culprits, friend!
 'Here is the lover in the smart disguise
 'With the sword, — he is a priest, so mine lies still.
 'There upstairs hides my wife the run-away,
 'His leman: the two plotted, poisoned first,
 'Plundered me after, and eloped thus far
 'Where now you find them. Do your duty quick!
 'Arrest and hold him! That's done: now catch her!' — During this speech of that man, — well, I stood Away, as he managed, — still, I stood as near The throat of him, — with these two hands, my own, —
 As now I stand near yours, Sir, — one quick spring, One great good satisfying gripe, and lo!
 There had he lain abolished with his lie, Creation purged o' the miscreate, man re-deemed,
 A spittle wiped off from the face of God!
 I, in some measure, seek a poor excuse For what I left undone, in just this fact That my first feeling at the speech I quote
 Was — not of what a blasphemy was dared,
 Not what a bag of venom'd purulence Was split and noisome, — but how splendidly Mirthful, how ludicrous a lie was launched!
 Would Molière's self wish more than hear such man Call, claim such woman for his own, his wife,
 Even though, in due amazement at the boast,
 He had stammered, she moreover was ⁴⁰ divine?
 She to be his, — were hardly less absurd Than that he took her name into his mouth, Licked, and then let it go again, the beast, Signed with his slaver. Oh, she poisoned him, Plundered him, and the rest! Well, what I wished Was, that he would but go on, say once more So to the world, and get his meed of men,
 The fist's reply to the filth. And while I mused,
 The minute, oh the misery, was gone!
 On either idle hand of me there stood ⁵⁰ Really an officer, nor laughed i' the least:
 Nay, rendered justice to his reason, laid Logic to heart, as 'twere submitted them
 "Twice two makes four."
 "And now, catch her!" he cried.
 That sobered me. "Let myself lead the way —
 "Ere you arrest me, who am somebody,
 "Being, as you hear, a priest and privileged, — "To the lady's chamber! I presume you — men
 "Expert, instructed how to find out truth,
 "Familiar with the guise of guilt. Detect ⁶⁰
 "Guilt on her face when it meets mine, then judge
 "Between us and the mad dog howling there!"
 Up we all went together, in they broke O' the chamber late my chapel. There she lay, Composed as when I laid her, that last eve, O' the couch, still breathless, motionless, sleep's self,
 Wax-white, seraphic, saturate with the sun
 O' the morning that now flooded from the front And filled the window with a light like blood.
 "Behold the poisoner, the adulteress, ⁷⁰
 "— And feigning sleep too! Seize, bind!" Guido hissed.
 She started up, stood erect, face to face With the husband: back he fell, was but-tressed there By the window all a flame with morning-red,
 He the black figure, the opprobrious blur Against all peace and joy and light and life.
 "Away from between me and hell!" she cried:
 "Hell for me, no embracing any more!
 "I am God's, I love God, God — whose knees I clasp,

- "Whose utterly most just award I take,
 "But bear no more love-making devils:
 hence!"
 I may have made an effort to reach her
 side
 From where I stood i' the door-way, — anyhow
 I found the arms, I wanted, pinioned fast, Was powerless in the clutch to left and
 right
 O' the rabble pouring in, rascality Enlisted, rampant on the side of hearth Home and the husband, — pay in prospect too!
- 20 They heaped themselves upon me. "Ha!
 — and him
 "Also you outrage? Him, too, my sole
 friend,
 "Guardian and saviour? That I baulk you of,
 "Since — see how God can help at last and worst!"
 She sprang at the sword that hung beside him, seized, Drew, brandished it, the sunrise burned for joy O' the blade, "Die," cried she, "devil, in God's name!"
 Ah, but they all closed round her, twelve to one
 — The unmanly men, no woman-mother
 made,
 Spawned somehow! Dead-white and disarmed she lay.
- 30 No matter for the sword, her word sufficed To spike the coward through and through:
 he shook,
 Could no longer spit between the teeth — "You
 see?"
 "You hear? Bear witness, then! Write down . . . but no —
 "Carry these criminals to the prison-house,
 "For first thing! I begin my search mean-
 while
 "After the stolen effects, gold, jewels, plate,
 "Money and clothes, they robbed me of and fled,
 "With no few amorous pieces, verse and
 prose,
 "I have much reason to expect to find."
- 30 When I saw that — no more than the first mad speech,
 Made out the speaker mad and a laughing-
 stock,
 So neither did this next device explode
 One listener's indignation, — that a scribe Did sit down, set himself to write indeed, While sundry knaves began to peer and pry
 In corner and hole, — that Guido, wiping
 brow
 And getting him a countenance, was fast
- Losing his fear, beginning to strut free O' the stage of his exploit, snuff here, sniff there, —
 Then I took truth in, guessed sufficiently The service for the moment. "What I
 say,
 "Slight at your peril! We are aliens here,
 "My adversary and I, called noble both;
 "I am the nobler, and a name men
 know.
 "I could refer our cause to our own Court
 "In our own country, but prefer appeal "To the nearer jurisdiction. Being a
 priest,
 "Though in a secular garb, — for reasons
 good
 "I shall adduce in due time to my peers, —
 "I demand that the Church I serve, decide
 "Between us, right the slandered lady
 there.
 "A Tuscan noble, I might claim the Duke:
 "A priest, I rather choose the Church, — bid Rome
 "Cover the wronged with her inviolate shield."
- There was no refusing this: they bore me
 off,
 They bore her off, to separate cells o' the
 same Ignoble prison, and, separate, thence to
 Rome.
 Pompilia's face, then and thus, looked on
 me
 The last time in this life: not one sight
 since,
 Never another sight to be! And yet I thought I had saved her. I appealed to Rome:
 It seems I simply sent her to her death.
 You tell me she is dying now, or dead;
 I cannot bring myself to quite believe This is a place you torture people in:
 What if this your intelligence were just A subtlety, an honest wile to work On a man at unawares? 'Twere worthy
 you.
 No, Sirs, I cannot have the lady dead!
 That erect form, flashing brow, fulgorant
 eye,
 That voice immortal (oh, that voice of hers!)
 That vision in the blood-red day-break —
 that Leap to life of the pale electric sword Angels go armed with, — that was not the
 last O' the lady! Come, I see through it, you
 find —
 Know the manœuvre! Also herself said I had saved her: do you dare say she spoke
 false?
 Let me see for myself if it be so!

Though she were dying, a Priest might be of use,
The more when he's a friend too, — she called me Far beyond "friend." Come, let me see her — indeed
It is my duty, being a priest: I hope I stand confessed, established, proved a
priest?
My punishment had motive that, a priest
I, in a laic garb, a mundane mode, Did what were harmlessly done otherwise.
I never touched her with my finger-tip Except to carry her to the couch, that eve; Against my heart, beneath my head,
bowed low,
As we priests carry the paten: that is why — To get leave and go see her of your
grace —
I have told you this whole story over again, Do I deserve grace? For I might lock lips,
Laugh at your jurisdiction: what have you To do with me in the matter? I suppose You hardly think I donned a bravo's dress To have a hand in the new crime; on the
old, Judgment's delivered, penalty imposed, I was chained fast at Civita hand and
foot —
She had only you to trust to, you and Rome, Rome and the Church, and no pept meddling priest
Two days ago, when Guido, with the right, Hacked her to pieces. One might well be wroth;
I have been patient, done my best to help:
I come from Civita and punishment As friend of the Court — and for pure friendship's sake
Have told my tale to the end, — nay, not
the end —
For, wait — I'll end — not leave you that excuse!
When we were parted, — shall I go on
there?
I was presently brought to Rome — yes, here I stood Opposite yonder very crucifix — And there sat you and you, Sirs, quite the
same.
I heard charge, and bore question, and told tale Noted down in the book there, — turn and see If, by one jot or tittle, I vary now!
P' the colour the tale takes, there's change
perhaps;
'Tis natural, since the sky is different, Eclipse in the air now; still, the outline stays.
I showed you how it came to be my part To save the lady. Then your clerk produced

Papers, a pack of stupid and impure Banalities called letters about love — Love, indeed, — I could teach who styled them so,
Better, I think, though priest and loveless
both!
"— How was it that a wife, young, innocent,
"And stranger to your person, wrote this page?" —
"— She wrote it when the Holy Father
wrote
"The bestiality that posts thro' Rome, 54
"Put in his mouth by Pasquin." "Nor
perhaps
"Did you return these answers, verse and prose,
"Signed, sealed and sent the lady?
There's your hand!"
"— This precious piece of verse, I really
judge,
"Is meant to copy my own character,
"A clumsy mimic; and this other prose,
"Not so much even; both rank forgery:
"Verse, quotha? Bembo's² verse! When Saint John wrote
"The tract 'De Tribus,'³ I wrote this to
match."
"— How came it, then, the documents 60 were found
"At the inn on your departure?" — "I opine,
"Because there were no documents to find
"In my presence, — you must hide before you find.
"Who forged them hardly practised in my
view;
"Who found them waited till I turned my
back."
"— And what of the clandestine visits paid,
"Nocturnal passage in and out the house
"With its lord absent? 'Tis alleged you climbed . . ."
"— Flew on a broomstick to the man i'
the moon!
"Who witnessed or will testify this trash?" 70
"— The trusty servant, Margherita's self,
"Even she who brought you letters, you confess,
"And, you confess, took letters in reply:
"Forget not we have knowledge of the facts!"
"— Sirs, who have knowledge of the facts, defray

¹ Pasquin: the name given to a statue in Rome (from Pasquino, a cobbler, whose shop opposite to it was a centre of gossip) on which anonymous squibs were posted.

² Bembo: secretary to Pope Leo X., and a well-known man of letters (1470-1547).

³ De Tribus: the tract "De Tribus Impostoribus" (Moses, Mahomet, and Christ), often referred to in the Middle Ages:

"The expenditure of wit I waste in vain,
 "Trying to find out just one fact of all!
 "She who brought letters from who could not write,

"And took back letters to who could not read, —

"Who was that messenger, of your charity?"

"— Well, so far favours you the circumstance

"That this same messenger . . . how shall we say? . . .

"Sub imputatione meretricis

"Laborat,¹ — which makes accusation null:

10 "We waive this woman's: nought makes void the next.

"Borsi, called Venerino, he who drove,
 "O' the first night when you fled away, at length

"Deposes to your kissings in the coach,
 "— Frequent, frenetic . . ." "When deposed he so?"

"After some weeks of sharp imprison-
 ment . . ."

"— Granted by friend the Governor, I engage —"

"— For his participation in your flight!
 "At length his obduracy melting made "The avowal mentioned . . ." "Was dismissed forthwith

20 "To liberty, poor knave, for recompense.
 "Sirs, give what credit to the lie you
 can!

"For me, no word in my defence I speak,
 "And God shall argue for the lady!"

So

Did I stand question, and make answer,
 still

With the same result of smiling disbelief, Polite impossibility of faith

In such affected virtue in a priest;
 But a showing fair play, an indulgence, even,

To one no worse than others after all —

30 Who had not brought disgrace to the order, played

Discreetly, ruffled gown nor ripped the cloth

In a bungling game at romps: I have told you, Sirs —

If I pretended simply to be pure Honest and Christian in the case, — absurd!

As well go boast myself above the needs O' the human nature, careless how meat smells,

Wine tastes, — a saint above the smack!
 But once

Abate my crest, own flaws i' the flesh, agree To go with the herd, be hog no more nor
 less,

¹ Sub imputatione meretricis laborat: "labours under the imputation of unchastity."

Why, hogs in common herd have common rights:

I must not be unduly borne upon,
 Who just romanced a little, sowed wild oats,

But 'scaped without a scandal, flagrant
 fault.

My name helped to a mirthful circumstance:

"Joseph" would do well to amend his plea:

Undoubtedly — some toying with the wife,
 But as for ruffian violence and rape,

Potiphar pressed too much on the other
 side!

The intrigue, the elopement, the disguise,
 — well charged!

The letters and verse looked hardly like the truth.

Your apprehension was — of guilt enough
 To be compatible with innocence,

So, punished best a little and not too much.
 Had I struck Guido Franceschini's face, You had counselled me withdraw for my own sake,

Baulk him of bravo-hiring. Friends came
 round,

Congratulated, "Nobody mistakes!
 "The pettiness o' the forfeiture defines

"The peccadillo: Guido gets his share:
 "His wife is free of husband and hook-nose,
 "The mouldy viands and the mother-in-
 law.

"To Civita with you and amuse the time,
 "Travesty us 'De Raptu Helenæ'"

"A funny figure must the husband cut "When the wife makes him skip, — too ticklish, eh?"

"Do it in Latin, not the Vulgar, then!
 "Scazons² — we'll copy and send his Eminence.

"Mind — one iambus in the final foot!
 "He'll rectify it, be your friend for life!"

Oh, Sirs, depend on me for much new light Thrown on the justice and religion here By this proceeding, much fresh food for thought!

And I was just set down to study these
 In relegation, two short days ago, Admiring how you read the rules, when,
 clap,

A thunder comes into my solitude —
 I am caught up in a whirlwind and cast
 here,

Told of a sudden, in this room where so
 late

You dealt out law adroitly, that those scales,

I meekly bowed to, took my allotment
 from,

And I was just set down to study these

² Scazons: iambic verses, with a spondee in the final foot instead of an iambus.

Guido has snatched at, broken in your hands, Metes to himself the murder of his wife,
 Full measure, pressed down, running over now!
 Can I assist to an explanation? — Yes,
 I rise in your esteem, sagacious Sirs, Stand up a renderer of reasons, not The officious priest would personate Saint George For a mock Princess in undragoned days.
 What, the blood startles you? What, after all The priest who needs must carry sword on thigh May find imperative use for it? Then, there was A Princess, was a dragon belching flame,
 And should have been a Saint George also? Then,
 There might be worse schemes than to break the bonds
 At Arezzo, lead her by the little hand, Till she reached Rome, and let her try to live?
 But you were law and gospel, — would one please Stand back, allow your faculty elbow-room?
 You blind guides who must needs lead eyes that see!
 Fools, alike ignorant of man and God!
 What was there here should have perplexed your wit
 For a wink of the owl-eyes of you? How miss, then, What's now forced on you by this flare of fact —
 As if Saint Peter failed to recognise Nero as no apostle, John or James, Till someone burned a martyr, made a torch O' the blood and fat to show his features by!
 Could you fail read this cartulary aright
 On head and front of Franceschini there, Large-lettered like hell's masterpiece of print, —
 That he, from the beginning pricked at heart
 By some lust, letch of hate against his wife, Plotted to plague her into overt sin
 And shame, would slay Pompilia body and soul,
 And save his mean self — miserably caught I' the quagmire of his own tricks, cheats and lies?
 — That himself wrote those papers, — from himself To himself, — which, i' the name of me and her,
 His mistress-messenger gave her and me,
 Touching us with such pustules of the soul

That she and I might take the taint, be shown To the world and shuddered over, speckled so?
 — That the agent put her sense into my words, Made substitution of the thing she hoped,
 For the thing she had and held, its opposite,
 While the husband in the background bit his lips
 At each fresh failure of his precious plot?
 — That when at the last we did rush each on each,
 By no chance but because God willed it so —
 The spark of truth was struck from out our 54 souls —
 Made all of me, descried in the first glance, Seem fair and honest and permissible love
 O' the good and true — as the first glance told me
 There was no duty patent in the world Like daring try be good and true myself, Leaving the shows of things to the Lord of Show And Prince o' the Power of the Air. Our very flight, Even to its most ambiguous circumstance, Irrefragably proved how futile, false . . .
 Why, men — men and not boys — boys 60 and not babes — Babes and not beasts — beasts and not stocks and stones! —
 Had the liar's lie been true one pin-point speck, Were I the accepted suitor, free o' the place, Disposer of the time, to come at a call And go at a wink as who should say me nay, —
 What need of flight, what were the gain therefrom
 But just damnation, failure or success?
 Damnation pure and simple to her the wife And me the priest — who bartered private bliss
 For public reprobation, the safe shade 74 For the sunshine which men see to pelt me by:
 What other advantage, — we who led the days
 And nights alone i' the house, — was flight to find?
 In our whole journey did we stop an hour, Diverge a foot from straight road till we reached Or would have reached — but for that fate of ours —
 The father and mother, in the eye of Rome,
 The eye of yourselves we made aware of us

At the first fall of misfortune? And indeed You did so far give sanction to our flight, Confirm its purpose, as lend helping hand, Deliver up Pompilia not to him
She fled, but those the flight was ventured
for.

Why then could you, who stopped short, not go on

One poor step more, and justify the means, Having allowed the end? — not see and
say

“Here’s the exceptional conduct that should claim

10 “To be exceptionally judged on rules

“Which, understood, make no exception
here” —

Why play instead into the devil’s hands By dealing so ambiguously as gave Guido the power to intervene like me, Prove one exception more? I saved his
wife

Against law: against law he slays her now:
Deal with him!

I have done with being judged.
I stand here guiltless in thought, word and
deed,

To the point that I apprise you, — in contempt

20 For all misapprehending ignorance

O’ the human heart, much more the mind of Christ, —

That I assuredly did bow, was blessed By the revelation of Pompilia. There!
Such is the final fact I fling you, Sirs,
To mouth and mumble and misinterpret:
there!

“The priest’s in love,” have it the vulgar
way!

Unpriest me, rend the rags o’ the vestment,
do —

Degrade deep, disenfranchise all you
dare —

Remove me from the midst, no longer
priest

30 And fit companion for the like of you — Your gay Abati with the well-turned leg And rose i’ the hat-rim, Canons, cross at neck

And silk mask in the pocket of the gown.
Brisk Bishops with the world’s musk still unbrushed

From the rochet; I’ll no more of these good things:

There’s a crack somewhere, something that’s unsound

I’ the rattle!

For Pompilia — be advised, Build churches, go pray! You will find
me there,

I know, if you come, — and you will come,
I know.

Why, there’s a Judge weeping! Did not I
say

You were good and true at bottom? You see the truth —

I am glad I helped you: she helped me just so.

But for Count Guido, — you must counsel
there!

I bow my head, bend to the very dust,
Break myself up in shame of faultiness.

I had him one whole moment, as I said —
As I remember, as will never out

O’ the thoughts of me, — I had him in arm’s reach

There, — as you stand, Sir, now you cease to sit, —

I could have killed him ere he killed his
wife,

And did not: he went off alive and well
And then effected this last feat — through
me!

Me — not through you — dismiss that fear! ’Twas you

Hindered me staying here to save her, —
not

From leaving you and going back to him And doing service in Arezzo. Come,

Instruct me in procedure! I conceive — In all due self-abasement might I speak —

How you will deal with Guido: oh, not
death!

Death, if it let her life be: otherwise Not death, — your lights will teach you clearer! I

Certainly have an instinct of my own I’ the matter: bear with me and weigh its
worth!

Let us go away — leave Guido all alone Back on the world again that knows him
now!

I think he will be found (indulge so far)!
Not to die so much as slide out of life, Pushed by the general horror and common
hate

Low, lower, — left o’ the very ledge of
things,

I seem to see him catch convulsively
One by one at all honest forms of life,

At reason, order, decency and use —
To cramp him and get foothold by at least;

And still they disengage them from his clutch.

“What, you are he, then, had Pompilia
once

“And so forwent her? Take not up with us!”

And thus I see him slowly and surely edged

Off all the table-land whence life upsprings Aspiring to be immortality,

As the snake, hatched on hill-top by mis-
chance,

Despite his wriggling, slips, slides, slidders
 down Hill-side, lies low and prostrate on the smooth
 Level of the outer place, lapsed in the vale:
 So I lose Guido in the loneliness, Silence and dusk, till at the doleful end,
 At the horizontal line, creation's verge,
 From what just is to absolute nothing-
 ness —
 Whom is it, straining onward still, he meets?
 What other man deep further in the fate,
 Who, turning at the prize of a footfall
 To flatter him and promise fellowship, Discovers in the act a frightful face — Judas, made monstrous by much solitude!
 The two are at one now! Let them love their love
 That bites and claws like hate, or hate their hate
 That mops and mows and makes as it were
 love!
 There, let them each tear each in devil'sfun,
 Or fondle this the other while malice aches —
 Both teach, both learn detestability!
 Kiss him the kiss, Iscariot! Pay that
 back,
 That smatch o' the slaver blistering on your lip,
 By the better trick, the insult he spared
 Christ —
 Lure him the lure o' the letters, Aretine!
 Lick him o'er slimy-smooth with jelly-filth O' the verse-and-prose pollution in love's
 guise!
 The cockatrice is with the basilisk!
 There let them grapple, denizens o' the
 dark,
 Foes or friends, but indissolubly bound,
 In their one spot out of the ken of God
 Or care of man, for ever and ever more!

 Why, Sirs, what's this? Why, this is sorry and strange!
 Futility, divagation: this from me
 Bound to be rational, justify an act Of sober man! — whereas, being moved
 so much,
 I give you cause to doubt the lady's mind:
 A pretty sarcasm for the world! I fear You do her wit injustice, — all through
 me!
 Like my fate all through, — ineffective
 help!
 A poor rash advocate I prove myself.
 You might be angry with good cause: but
 sure
 At the advocate, — only at the undue zeal

That spoils the force of his own plea, I
 think?
 My part was just to tell you how things
 stand,
 State facts and not be flustered at their
 fume.
 But then 'tis a priest speaks: as for love, —
 no!
 If you let buzz a vulgar fly like that About your brains, as if I loved, forsooth, Indeed, Sirs, you do wrong! We had no
 thought
 Of such infatuation, she and I:
 There are many points that prove it: do 50 be just!
 I told you, — at one little roadside-place
 I spent a good half-hour, paced to and fro
 The garden; just to leave her free awhile, I plucked a handful of Spring herb and
 bloom:
 I might have sat beside her on the bench Where the children were: I wish the thing had been,
 Indeed: the event could not be worse, you
 know:
 One more half-hour of her saved! She's dead now, Sirs!
 While I was running on at such a rate, Friends should have plucked me by the 60 sleeve: I went Too much o' the trivial outside of her face And the purity that shone there — plain to
 me,
 Not to you, what more natural? Nor am I Infatuated, — oh, I saw, be sure!
 Her brow had not the right line, leaned too
 much,
 Painters would say; they like the straight-up Greek:
 This seemed bent somewhat with an invisible crown
 Of martyr and saint, not such as art approves.
 And how the dark orbs dwelt deep under-
 neath,
 Looked out of such a sad sweet heaven 70
 on me!
 The lips, compressed a little, came forward too,
 Careful for a whole world of sin and pain.
 That was the face, her husband nakes his plea,
 He sought just to disfigure, — no offence Beyond that! Sirs, let us be rational!
 He needs must vindicate his honour, — ay, Yet shirks, the coward, in a clown's dis-
 guise,
 Away from the scene, endeavours to escape.
 Now, had he done so, slain and left no trace
 O' the slayer, — what were vindicated, 80
 pray?

You had found his wife disfigured or a corpse,
 For what and by whom? It is too palpable!
 Then, here's another point involving law:
 I use this argument to show you meant No calumny against us by that title —
 O' the sentence, — liars try to twist it so:
 What penalty it bore, I had to pay Till further proof should follow of innocence —

Probationis ob defectum,¹ — proof?

10 How could you get proof without trying us?

You went through the preliminary form, Stopped there, contrived this sentence to amuse

The adversary. If the title ran For more than fault imputed and not proved,

That was a simple penman's error, else
 A slip i' the phrase, — as when we say of you

"Charged with injustice" — which may either be

Or not be, — 'tis a name that sticks meanwhile.

Another relevant matter: fool that I am!

20 Not what I wish true, yet a point friends urge:

It is not true, — yet, since friends think it helps, —

She only tried me when some others failed —

Began with Conti, whom I told you of,
 And Guillichini, Guido's kinsfolk both,
 And when abandoned by them, not before, Turned to me. That's conclusive why she turned.

Much good they got by the happy cowardice!

Conti is dead, poisoned a month ago:
 Does that much strike you as a sin? Not much,

30 After the present murder, — one mark more

On the Moor's skin, — what is black by blacker still?

Conti had come here and told truth. And so

With Guillichini; he's condemned of course

To the galleys, as a friend in this affair, Tried and condemned for no one thing i' the world,

A fortnight since by who but the Governor? —

The just judge, who refused Pompilia help

At first blush, being her husband's friend, you know.

There are two tales to suit the separate courts,

Arezzo and Rome: he tells you here, we 40 fled

Alone, unhelpt, — lays stress on the main fault,

The spiritual sin, Rome looks to: but elsewhere

He likes best we should break in, steal, bear off,

Be fit to brand and pillory and flog — That's the charge goes to the heart of the Governor

If these unpriest me, you and I may yet converse, Vincenzo Marzi-Medici!

Oh, Sirs, there are worse men than you, I say!

More easily duped, I mean; this stupid lie, Its liar never dared propound in Rome, 50

He gets Arezzo to receive, — nay more, Gets Florence and the Duke to authorise!

This is their Rota's sentence, their Granduke

Signs and seals! Rome for me henceforward — Rome,

Where better men are, — most of all, that man

The Augustinian of the Hospital, Who writes the letter, — he confessed, he says,

Many a dying person, never one So sweet and true and pure and beautiful.

A good man! Will you make him Pope 60 one day?

Not that he is not good too, this we have — But old, — else he would have his word to speak,

His truth to teach the world: I thirst for truth,

But shall not drink it till I reach the source.

Sirs, I am quiet again. You see, we are So very pitiable, she and I,

Who had conceivably been otherwise. Forget distemperature and idle heat!

Apart from truth's sake, what's to move so much?

Pompilia will be presently with God; I am, on earth, as good as out of it,

A relegated priest; when exile ends, I mean to do my duty and live long.

She and I are mere strangers now: but priests

Should study passion; how else cure mankind,

Who come for help in passionate extremes? I do but play with an imagined life

Of who, unfettered by a vow, unblessed By the higher call, — since you will have it so, —

Leads it companioned by the woman there. 8 To live, and see her learn, and learn by her,

Out of the low obscure and petty world — Or only see one purpose and one will Evolve themselves i' the world, change wrong to right:

To have to do with nothing but the true,
The good, the eternal — and these, not alone

In the main current of the general life,
But small experiences of every day,
Concerns of the particular hearth and home:

To learn not only by a comet's rush
But a rose's birth, — not by the grandeur,
God —

But the comfort, Christ. All this, how far away!

Mere delectation, meet for a minute's dream! —

Just as a drudging student trims his lamp, Opens his Plutarch, puts him in the place Of Roman, Grecian; draws the patched gown close,

Dreams, "Thus should I fight, save or rule the world!" —

Then smilingly, contentedly, awakes
To the old solitary nothingness.

So I, from such communion, pass content . . .

O great, just, good God! Miserable me!

VII. — POMPILIA.

[In this Book scarcely any explanatory notes are necessary. With dramatic appropriateness, the speech of Pompilia is expressed in language of exceptional simplicity and directness.]

I AM just seventeen years and five months old,

And, if I lived one day more, three full weeks;

'Tis writ so in the church's register, Lorenzo in Lucinia, all my names

At length, so many names for one poor child, — Francesca Camilla Vittoria Angela Pompilia Comparini, — laughable!

Also 'tis writ that I was married there ¹³ four years ago: and they will add, I hope, When they insert my death, a word or two, —

Omitting all about the mode of death, —
This, in its place, this which one cares to know,

That I had been a mother of a son Exactly two weeks. It will be through

grace
O' the Curate, not through any claim I have;

Because the boy was born at, so baptized
Close to, the Villa, in the proper church:
A pretty church, I say no word against,
Yet stranger-like, — while this Lorenzo seems

My own particular place, I always say.
I used to wonder, when I stood scarce high As the bed here, what the marble lion ⁴⁰
meant,

With half his body rushing from the wall, Eating the figure of a prostrate man — (To the right, it is, of entry by the door)
An ominous sign to one baptized like me, Married, and to be buried there, I hope.
And they should add, to have my life complete,

He is a boy and Gaetan by name — Gaetano for a reason, — if the friar Don Celestine will ask this grace for me
Of Curate Ottoboni: he it was ⁵⁰ Baptized me: he remembers my whole life
As I do his grey hair.

All these few things I know are true, — will you remember them?

Because time flies. The surgeon cared for me,

To count my wounds, — twenty-two dagger-wounds,

Five deadly, but I do not suffer much — Or too much pain, — and am to die to-night.

Oh how good God is that my babe was born,

— Better than born, baptized and hid away

Before this happened, safe from being hurt! ⁶⁰
That had been sin God could not well forgive:

He was too young to smile and save himself.

When they took, two days after he was born,

My babe away from me to be baptized
And hidden awhile, for fear his foe should find, —

The country-woman, used to nursing babes,

Said "Why take on so? where is the great loss?"

"These next three weeks he will but sleep and feed,

"Only begin to smile at the month's end;
"He would not know you, if you kept him ⁷⁰
here,

"Sooner than that; so, spend three merry weeks

"Snug in the Villa, getting strong and stout,
"And then I bring him back to be your

own,
"And both of you may steal to — we know where!"

The month — there wants of it two weeks this day!

Still, I half fancied when I heard the knock At the Villa in the dusk, it might prove she —

Come to say "Since he smiles before the time,

"Why should I cheat you out of one good hour?

'Back I have brought him; speak to him and judge!"

Now I shall never see him; what is worse, When he grows up and gets to be my age, He will seem hardly more than a great boy; And if he asks "What was my mother like?"

"People may answer "Like girls of seventeen" —

And how can he but think of this and that, 10 Lucias, Marias, Sofias, who titter or blush When he regards them as such boys may do?

Therefore I wish someone will please to say

I looked already old though I was young; Do I not . . . say, if you are by to speak . . .

Look nearer twenty? No more like, at least,

Girls who look arch or redden when boys laugh,

Than the poor Virgin that I used to know At our street-corner in a lonely niche, — The babe, that sat upon her knees, broke off, —

20 Thin white glazed clay, you pitied her the more:

She, not the gay ones, always got my rose.

How happy those are who know how to write!

Such could write what their son should read in time,

Had they a whole day to live out like me. Also my name is not a common name,

"Pompilia," and may help to keep apart A little the thing I am from what girls are.

But then how far away, how hard to find Will anything about me have become,

30 Even if the boy bethink himself and ask! No father that he ever knew at all,

Nor never had — no, never had, I say! That is the truth, — nor any mother left,

Out of the little two weeks that she lived, Fit for such memory as might assist:

As good too as no family, no name, Not even poor old Pietro's name, nor hers,

Poor kind unwise Violante, since it seems They must not be my parents any more.

40 That is why something put it in my head To call the boy "Gaetano" — no old name For sorrow's sake; I looked up to the sky

And took a new saint¹ to begin anew. One who has only been made saint — how long?

Twenty-five years: so, carefuller, perhaps,

¹ A new saint: St. Gaetan or Cajetan, founder of the order of Theatins, who lived 1480-1547, and was canonised by Clement X. in 1671.

To guard a namesake than those old saints grow,

Tired out by this time, — see my own five saints!

On second thoughts, I hope he will regard The history of me as what someone dreamed,

And get to disbelieve it at the last: Since to myself it dwindles fast to that, Sheer dreaming and impossibility, Just in four days too! All the seventeen years,

Not once did a suspicion visit me How very different a lot is mine From any other woman's in the world.

The reason must be, 'twas by step and step It got to grow so terrible and strange.

These strange woes stole on tiptoe, as it were,

Into my neighbourhood and privacy, 60 Sat down where I sat, laid them where I lay

And I was found familiarised with fear, When friends broke in, held up a torch and cried

"Why, you Pompilia in the cavern thus, "How comes that arm of yours about a wolf?

"And the soft length, — lies in and out your feet

"And laps you round the knee, — a snake it is!"

And so on.

Well, and they are right enough, By the torch they hold up now: for first, observe, I never had a father, — no, nor yet

A mother: my own boy can say at least "I had a mother whom I kept two weeks!"

Not I, who little used to doubt . . . I doubt

Good Pietro, kind Violante, gave me birth? They loved me always as I love my babe (— Nearly so, that is — quite so could not be —)

Did for me all I meant to do for him, Till one surprising day, three years ago,

They both declared, at Rome, before some judge

In some Court where the people flocked to 80 hear,

That really I had never been their child, Was a mere castaway, the careless crime

Of an unknown man, the crime and care too much

Of a woman known too well, — little to these,

Therefore, of whom I was the flesh and blood:

What then to Pietro and Violante, both No more my relatives than you or you?

Nothing to them! You know what they declared.

So with my husband, — just such a surprise,

Such a mistake, in that relationship! Everyone says that husbands love their wives,

Guard them and guide them, give them happiness;

'Tis duty, law, pleasure, religion: well, You see how much of this comes true in mine!

People indeed would fain have somehow proved

He was no husband: but he did not hear, Or would not wait, and so has killed us all. Then there is . . . only let me name one more!

There is the friend, — men will not ask about,

But tell untruths of, and give nicknames to, And think my lover, most surprise of all! Do only hear, it is the priest they mean, Giuseppe Caponsacchi: a priest — love, And love me! Well, yet people think he did.

I am married, he has taken priestly vows, They know that, and yet go on, say, the same,

"Yes, how he loves you!" "That was love" — they say,

When anything is answered that they ask: Or else "No wonder you love him" — they say.

They shake heads, pity much, scarcely blame —

As if we neither of us lacked excuse, And anyhow are punished to the full, And downright love atones for everything! Nay, I heard read out in the public Court Before the judge, in presence of my friends, Letters 'twas said the priest had sent to me, And other letters sent him by myself, We being lovers!

Listen what this is like!

When I was a mere child, my mother . . . that's Violante, you must let me call her so Nor waste time, trying to unlearn the word . . .

She brought a neighbour's child of my own age

To play with me of rainy afternoons; And, since there hung a tapestry on the wall,

We two agreed to find each other out Among the figures. "Tisbe, that is you,

"With half-moon on your hair-knot, spear in hand,

"Flying, but no wings, only the great scarf "Blown to a bluish rainbow at your back:

"Call off your hound and leave the stag alone!"

"— And there are you, Pompilia, such green leaves

"Flourishing out of your five finger-ends,

"And all the rest of you so brown and rough:

"Why is it you are turned a sort of tree?" You know the figures never were ourselves Though we nicknamed them so. Thus, all my life, —

As well what was, as what, like this, was not, —

Looks old, fantastic and impossible: 54

I touch a fairy thing that fades and fades. — Even to my babe! I thought, when he was born,

Something began for once that would not end,

Nor change into a laugh at me, but stay For evermore, eternally quite mine.

Well, so he is, — but yet they bore him off,

The third day, lest my husband should lay traps

And catch him, and by means of him catch me.

Since they have saved him so, it was well done:

Yet thence comes such confusion of what 60 was

With what will be, — that late seems long ago,

And, what years should bring round, already come,

Till even he withdraws into a dream As the rest do: I fancy him grown great,

Strong, stern, a tall young man who tutors me,

Frowns with the others, "Poor imprudent child!

"Why did you venture out of the safe street?

"Why go so far from help to that lone house?

"Why open at the whisper and the knock?"

Six days ago when it was New Year's-day, 70

We bent above the fire and talked of him, What he should do when he was grown and great.

Violante, Pietro, each had given the arm I leant on, to walk by, from couch to chair

And fireside, — laughed, as I lay safe at last,

"Pompilia's march from bed to board is made,

"Pompilia back again and with a babe, "Shall one day lend his arm and help her walk!"

Then we all wished each other more New Years.

Pietro began to scheme — "Our cause is 84 gained;

"The law is stronger than a wicked man: "Let him henceforth go his way, leave us ours!

"We will avoid the city, tempt no more "The greedy ones by feasting and parade, —

"Live at the other villa, we know where

"Still farther off, and we can watch the babe

"Grow fast in the good air; and wood is cheap

"And wine sincere outside the city gate.

"I still have two or three old friends will grope

"Their way along the mere half-mile of road,

"With staff and lantern on a moonless night

"When one needs talk: they'll find me, never fear,

"And I'll find them a flask of the old sort yet!"

Violante said "You chatter like a crow:

10 "Pompilia tires o' the tattle, and shall to bed:

"Do not too much the first day, — somewhat more

"To-morrow, and, the next, begin the cape

"And hood and coat! I have spun wool enough."

Oh what a happy friendly eve was that!

And, next day, about noon, out Pietro went —

He was so happy and would talk so much, Until Violante pushed and laughed him forth Sight-seeing in the cold, — "So much to see

"I' the churches! Swathe your throat three times!" she cried, 20 "And, above all, beware the slippery ways,

"And bring us all the news by supper-time!"

He came back late, laid by cloak, staff and hat,

Powdered so thick with snow it made us laugh,

Rolled a great log upon the ash o' the hearth,

And bade Violante treat us to a flask,

Because he had obeyed her faithfully,

Gone sight-seeing through the seven, and found no church

To his mind like San Giovanni — "There's the fold,

"And all the sheep together, big as cats!

30 "And such a shepherd, half the size of life,

"Starts up and hears the angel" — when, at the door,

A tap: we started up: you know the rest.

Pietro at least had done no harm, I know;

Nor even Violante, so much harm as makes Such revenge lawful. Certainly she erred —

Did wrong, how shall I dare say otherwise? —

In telling that first falsehood, buying me

From my poor faulty mother at a price,

To pass off upon Pietro as his child.

40 If one should take my babe, give him a

name,

Say he was not Gaetano and my own, But that some other woman made his mouth

And hands and feet, — how very false were that!

No good could come of that; and all harm did.

Yet if a stranger were to represent

"Needs must you either give your babe to me

"And let me call him mine for evermore,

"Or let your husband get him" — ah, my God,

That were a trial I refuse to face!

Well, just so here: it proved wrong but seemed right

To poor Violante — for there lay, she said,

My poor real dying mother in her rags,

Who put me from her with the life and all,

Poverty, pain, shame and disease at once,

To die the easier by what price I fetched —

Also (I hope) because I should be spared

Sorrow and sin, — why may not that have helped?

My father, — he was no one, any one, —

The worse, the likelier, — call him — he who came,

Was wicked for his pleasure, went his way,

And left no trace to track by; there remained

Nothing but me, the unnecessary life,

To catch up or let fall, — and yet a thing

She could make happy, be made happy

with,

This poor Violante, — who would frown thereat?

Well, God, you see! God plants us where we grow.

It is not that because a bud is born

At a wild brier's end, full i' the wild beast's way,

We ought to pluck and put it out of reach

On the oak-tree top, — say "There the bud belongs!"

She thought, moreover, real lies were lies

told

For harm's sake; whereas this had good at heart,

Good for my mother, good for me, and

good

For Pietro who was meant to love a babe,

And needed one to make his life of use,

Receive his house and land when he should die.

Wrong, wrong and always wrong! how plainly wrong!

For see, this fault kept pricking, as faults do,

All the same at her heart: this falsehood hatched,

She could not let it go nor keep it fast.

She told me so, — the first time I was found Locked in her arms once more after the pain,

 When the nuns let me leave them and go
 home,
 And both of us cried all the cares away, —
 This it was set her on to make amends, This brought about the marriage — simply
 this!
 Do let me speak for her you blame so
 much!
 When Paul, my husband's brother, found me out, Heard there was wealth for who should marry me,
 So, came and made a speech to ask my
 hand
 For Guido, — she, instead of piercing
 straight
 Through the pretence to the ignoble truth, Fancied she saw God's very finger point, Designate just the time for planting me (The wild-briar slip she plucked to love and wear)
 In soil where I could strike real root, and
 grow,
 And get to be the thing I called myself:
 For, wife and husband are one flesh, God
 says,
 And I, whose parents seemed such and were none,
 Should in a husband have a husband now, Find nothing, this time, but was what it seemed,
 — All truth and no confusion any more.
 I know she meant all good to me, all pain To herself, — since how could it be aught but pain
 To give me up, so, from her very breast, The wilding flower-tree-branch that, all those years,
 She had got used to feel for and find fixed?
 She meant well: has it been so ill i' the
 main?
 That is but fair to ask: one cannot judge
 Of what has been the ill or well of life,
 The day that one is dying, — sorrows
 change
 Into not altogether sorrow-like;
 I do see strangeness but scarce misery,
 Now it is over, and no danger more.
 My child is safe; there seems not so much pain.
 It comes, most like, that I am just absolved, Purged of the past, the foul in me, washed
 fair, —
 One cannot both have and not have, you
 know, —
 Being right now, I am happy and colour
 things.
 Yes, everybody that leaves life sees all Softened and bettered: so with other
 sights:

To me at least was never evening yet But seemed far beautifuller than its day,
 For past is past.

There was a fancy came,
 When somewhere, in the journey with my
 friend,
 We stepped into a hovel to get food;
 And there began a yelp here, a bark
 there, — Misunderstanding creatures that were wroth
 And vexed themselves and us till we retired.
 The hovel is life: no matter what dogs bit Or cats scratched in the hovel I break 50
 from,
 All outside is lone field, moon and such
 peace —
 Flowing in, filling up as with a sea Whereon comes Someone, walks fast on the white, Jesus Christ's self, Don Celestine declares,
 To meet me and calm all things back again.

Beside, up to my marriage, thirteen years Were, each day, happy as the day was
long:

This may have made the change too terrible.

I know that when Violante told me first The cavalier — she meant to bring next 60
 morn,

Whom I must also let take, kiss my
 hand —

Would be at San Lorenzo the same eve And marry me, — which over, we should go

Home both of us without him as before,
 And, till she bade speak, I must hold my
 tongue,

Such being the correct way with girl-brides,

From whom one word would make a father blush, —

I know, I say, that when she told me this — Well, I no more saw sense in what she
 said

Than a lamb does in people clipping wool; 70
 Only lay down and let myself be clipped.

And when next day the cavalier who
 came —

(Tisbe had told me that the slim young
 man

With wings at head, and wings at feet, and
 sword

Threatening a monster, in our tapestry, Would eat a girl else, — was a cavalier) When he proved Guido Franceschini, —
 old

And nothing like so tall as I myself, Hook-nosed and yellow in a bush of beard,

Much like a thing I saw on a boy's wrist.
 He called an owl and used for catching birds, —
 And when he took my hand and made a
 smile —
 Why, the uncomfortableness of it all Seemed hardly more important in the case Than, — when one gives you, say, a coin to spend, —
 Its newness or its oldness; if the piece Weigh properly and buy you what you
 wish,
 No matter whether you get grimie or glare!
 10 Men take the coin, return you grapes and figs.
 Here, marriage was the coin, a dirty piece Would purchase me the praise of those I loved:
 About what else should I concern myself?

So, hardly knowing what a husband meant,
 I supposed this or any man would serve,
 No whit the worse for being so uncouth:
 For I was ill once and a doctor came With a great ugly hat, no plume thereto, Black jerkin and black buckles and black
 sword, 20 And white sharp beard over the ruff in
 front,
 And oh so lean, so sour-faced and austere!
 Who felt my pulse, made me put out my
 tongue,
 Then oped a phial, dripped a drop or two Of a black bitter something, — I was cured!
 What mattered the fierce beard or the grim
 face?
 It was the physic beautified the man, Master Malpichi, — never met his match In Rome, they said, — so ugly all the
 same!

However, I was hurried through a storm, 30 Next dark eve of December's dearest
 day — How it rained! — through our street and the Lion's-mouth
 And the bit of Corso, — cloaked round, covered close,
 I was like something strange or contraband, —
 Into blank San Lorenzo, up the aisle,
 My mother keeping hold of me so tight,
 I fancied we were come to see a corpse Before the altar which she pulled me toward.
 There we found waiting an unpleasant
 priest
 Who proved the brother, not our parish
 friend, 40 But one with mischief-making mouth and
 eye,

Paul, whom I know since to my cost
 And then
 I heard the heavy-church-door lock out
 help
 Behind us: for the customary warmth,
 Two tapers shivered on the altar.
 "Quick —
 "Lose no time!" cried the priest. And straightway down From . . . what's behind the altar where he hid — Hawk-nose and yellowness and bush and
 all,
 Stepped Guido, caught my hand, and there was I O' the chancel, and the priest had opened
 book, Read here and there, made me say that 5 and this,
 And after, told me I was now a wife, Honoured indeed, since Christ thus weds
 the Church,
 And therefore turned he water into wine,
 To show I should obey my spouse like
 Christ.
 Then the two slipped aside and talked
 apart,
 And I, silent and scared, got down again And joined my mother who was weeping
 now.
 Nobody seemed to mind us any more,
 And both of us on tiptoe found our way To the door which was unlocked by this, 6
 and wide.
 When we were in the street, the rain had stopped,
 All things looked better. At our own house-
 door, Violante whispered "No one syllable "To Pietro! Girl-brides never breathe a
 word!"
 "— Well treated to a wetting, draggle-tails!" Laughed Pietro as he opened — "Very near
 "You made me brave the gutter's roaring
 sea
 "To carry off from roost old dove and
 young,
 "Trussed up in church, the cote, by me,
 the kite!
 "What do these priests mean, praying folk 7
 to death
 "On stormy afternoons, with Christmas
 close
 "To wash our sins off nor require the rain?"
 Violante gave my hand a timely squeeze, Madonna saved me from immodest speech,
 I kissed him and was quiet, being a bride.
 When I saw nothing more, the next three weeks,

Of Guido — "Nor the Church sees Christ" thought I:

"Nothing is changed, however, wine is wine

"And water only water in our house.

"Nor did I see that ugly doctor since "That cure of the illness: just as I was cured,

"I am married, — neither scarecrow will return."

Three weeks, I chuckled — "How would Giulia stare,

"And Tecla smile and Tisbe laugh out-
right,

"Were it not impudent for brides to talk!" —

Until one morning, as I sat and sang

At the broidery-frame alone i' the chamber, — loud

Voices, two, three together, sobbings too,
And my name, "Guido," "Paolo," flung like stones

From each to the other! In I ran to see.
There stood the very Guido and the priest With sly face, — formal but nowise afraid, —

While Pietro seemed all red and angry, scarce

Able to stutter out his wrath in words;

And this it was that made my mother sob, As he reproached her — "You have murdered us,

"Me and yourself and this our child beside!"

Then Guido interposed "Murdered or not,
"Be it enough your child is now my wife!

"I claim and come to take her." Paul put in,

"Consider — kinsman, dare I term you
so? —

"What is the good of your sagacity

"Except to counsel in a strait like this?

"I guarantee the parties man and wife

"Whether you like or loathe it, bless or ban.

"May spilt milk be put back within the bowl —

"The done thing, undone? You, it is, we look

"For counsel to, you fittest will advise!

"Since milk, though spilt and spoilt, does marble good,

"Better we down on knees and scrub the floor,

"Than sigh, 'the waste would make a syllabub!"

"Help us so turn disaster to account,

"So predispose the groom, he needs shall
grace

"The bride with favour from the very first,

"Not begin marriage an embittered man!"

o He smiled, — the game so wholly in his hands!

While fast and faster sobbed Violante —
"Ay,

"All of us murdered, past averting now!
"O my sin, O my secret!" and such like.

Then I began to half surmise the truth; Something had happened, low, mean, underhand,

False, and my mother was to blame, and I To pity, whom all spoke of, none addressed:

I was the chattel that had caused a crime.
I stood mute, — those who tangled must untie

The embroilment. Pietro cried "With- 50 draw, my child!

"She is not helpful to the sacrifice

"At this stage, — do you want the victim by

"While you discuss the value of her blood?

"For her sake, I consent to hear you talk:

"Go, child, and pray God help the innocent!"

I did go and was praying God, when came Violante, with eyes swollen and red enough, But movement on her mouth for make-believe

Matters were somehow getting right again.
She bade me sit down by her side and hear. 60

"You are too young and cannot understand,

"Nor did your father understand at first.

"I wished to benefit all three of us,

"And when he failed to take my meaning,
— why,

"I tried to have my way at unaware —

"Obtained him the advantage he refused.

"As if I put before him wholesome food

"Instead of broken victual, — he finds
change

"I' the viands, never cares to reason why,

"But falls to blaming me, would fling the 70
plate

"From window, scandalise the neighbourhood,

"Even while he smacks his lips, — men's way, my child!

"But either you have prayed him unperverse

"Or I have talked him back into his wits:

"And Paolo was a help in time of need, —

"Guido, not much — my child, the way of
men!

"A priest is more a woman than a man,

"And Paul did wonders to persuade. In short,

"Yes, he was wrong, your father sees and says;

"My scheme was worth attempting: and 80 bears fruit,

"Gives you a husband and a noble name,

"A palace and no end of pleasant things.

"What do you care about a handsome
youth?

"They are so volatile, and tease their wives?"

"This is the kind of man to keep the house.

"We lose no daughter, — gain a son, that's all:

"For 'tis arranged we never separate,

"Nor miss, in our grey time of life, the tints

"Of you that colour eve to match with morn.

"In good or ill, we share and share alike,

"And cast our lots into a common lap,

"And all three die together as we lived!

to "Only, at Arezzo, — that's a Tuscan town,

"Not so large as this noisy Rome, no doubt,

"But older far and finer much, say folk, —

"In a great palace where you will be queen,

"Know the Archbishop and the Governor,

"And we see homage done you ere we die.

"Therefore, be good and pardon!" —

"Pardon what?"

"You know things, I am very ignorant:

"All is right if you only will not cry!"

And so an end! Because a blank begins

30 From when, at the word, she kissed me hard and hot,

And took me back to where my father leaned

Opposite Guido — who stood eyeing him, As eyes the butcher the cast panting ox

That feels his fate is come, nor struggles more, —

While Paul looked archly on, pricked brow at whiles

With the pen-point as to punish triumph there, —

And said "Count Guido, take your lawful wife

"Until death part you!"

All since is one blank, Over and ended; a terrific dream.

30 It is the good of dreams — so soon they go! Wake in a horror of heart-beats, you may —

Cry "The dread thing will never from my thoughts!"

Still, a few daylight doses of plain life, Cock-crow and sparrow-chirp, or bleat and bell

Of goats that trot by, tinkling, to be milked;

And when you rub your eyes awake and wide,

Where is the harm o' the horror? Gone! So here.

I know I wake, — but from what? Blank, I say!

This is the note of evil: for good lasts.

40 Even when Don Celestine bade "Search and find!"

"For your soul's sake, remember what is past,

"The better to forgive it," — all in vain! What was fast getting indistinct before,

Vanished outright. By special grace perhaps,

Between that first calm and this last, four years

Vanish, — one quarter of my life, you know.

I am held up, amid the nothingness, By one or two truths only — thence I hang,

And there I live, — the rest is death or dream,

All but those points of my support. I think

Of what I saw at Rome once in the Square O' the Spaniards, opposite the Spanish

House:

There was a foreigner had trained a goat, A shuddering white woman of a beast,

To climb up, stand straight on a pile of sticks

Put close, which gave the creature room enough:

When she was settled there he, one by one, Took away all the sticks, left just the four Whereon the little hoofs did really rest, There she kept firm, all underneath was air.

So, what I hold by, are my prayer to God, My hope, that came in answer to the

prayer,

Some hand would interpose and save me — hand

Which proved to be my friend's hand: and, — blest bliss, —

That fancy which began so faint at first, That thrill of dawn's suffusion through my

dark,

Which I perceive was promise of my child, The light his unborn face sent long before, —

God's way of breaking the good news to flesh.

That is all left now of those four bad years. Don Celestine urged "But remember

more!

"Other men's faults may help me find your own.

"I need the cruelty exposed, explained, "Or how can I advise you to forgive?"

He thought I could not properly forgive Unless I ceased forgetting, — which is

true:

For, bringing back reluctantly to mind My husband's treatment of me, — by a

light

That's later than my life-time, I review And comprehend much and imagine more,

And have but little to forgive at last. For now, — be fair and say, — is it not true

He was ill-used and cheated of his hope To get enriched by marriage? Marriage
gave

Me and no money, broke the compact so:
He had a right to ask me on those terms,
As Pietro and Violante to declare They would not give me: so the bargain
stood:

They broke it, and he felt himself aggrieved,

Became unkind with me to punish them.
They said 'twas he began deception first,

10 Nor, in one point whereto he pledged himself,

Kept promise: what of that, suppose it
were?

Echces die off, scarcely reverberate For ever, — why should ill keep echoing
ill,

And never let our ears have done with noise?

Then my poor parents took the violent way To thwart him, — he must needs retaliate, — wrong,

Wrong, and all wrong, — better say, all
blind!

As I myself was, that is sure, who else
Had understood the mystery: for his wife

20 Was bound in some sort to help somehow
there.

It seems as if I might have interposed, Blunted the edge of their resentment so, Since he vexed me because they first vexed
him;

"I will entreat them to desist, submit,
"Give him the money and be poor in
peace, —

"Certainly not go tell the world: perhaps
"He will grow quiet with his gains."

Yes, say

Something to this effect and you do well!
But then you have to see first: I was blind.

30 That is the fruit of all such wormy ways,
The indirect, the unapproved of God:

You cannot find their author's end and
aim,

Not even to substitute your good for bad,
Your straight for the irregular; you stand Stupefied, profitless, as cow or sheep That miss a man's mind, anger him just twice

By trial at repairing the first fault.
Thus, when he blamed me, "You are a coquette,

"A lure-owl posturing to attract birds, 40 "You look love-lures at theatre and

church,

"In walk, at window!" — that, I knew,
was false:

But why he charged me falsely, whither sought

To drive me by such charge, — how could
I know?

So, unaware, I only made things worse.
I tried to soothe him by abjuring walk, Window, church, theatre, for good and
all,

As if he had been in earnest: that, you
know,

Was nothing like the object of his charge.
Yes, when I got my maid to supplicate

The priest, whose name she read when she 50 would read

Those feigned false letters I was forced to hear

Though I could read no word of, — he should cease

Writing, — nay, if he minded prayer of
mine,

Cease from so much as even pass the street Whereon our house looked, — in my ignorance

I was just thwarting Guido's true intent;
Which was, to bring about a wicked change Of sport to earnest, tempt a thoughtless
man

To write indeed, and pass the house, and
more,

Till both of us were taken in a crime. 60

He ought not to have wished me thus act
lies,

Simulate folly: but, — wrong or right, the wish, —

I failed to apprehend its drift. How
plain

It follows, — if I fell into such fault,
He also may have overreached the mark,
Made mistake, by perversity of brain, I' the whole sad strange plot, the grotesque intrigue

To make me and my friend unself our-
selves,

Be other man and woman than we were!
Think it out, you who have the time! for 70

me, —
I cannot say less; more I will not say.

Leave it to God to cover and undo!
Only, my dulness should not prove too
much!

— Not prove that in a certain other point Wherein my husband blamed me, — and

you blame,

If I interpret smiles and shakes of head, —
I was dull too. Oh, if I dared but speak!

Must I speak? I am blamed that I for-
went

A way to make my husband's favour come.
That is true: I was firm, withstood, re- 80

fused . . .
— Women as you are, how can I find the
words?

I felt there was just one thing Guido claimed

I had no right to give nor he to take;
We being in estrangement, soul from soul:

Till, when I sought help, the Archbishop smiled,
Inquiring into privacies of life, — Said I was blameable — (he stands for God)

Nowise entitled to exemption there.
Then I obeyed, — as surely had obeyed Were the injunction "Since your husband bids,
"Swallow the burning coal he proffers
you!"

But I did wrong, and he gave wrong advice

Though he were thrice Archbishop, — that, I know! —

10 Now I have got to die and see things clear.
Remember I was barely twelve years old —
A child at marriage: I was let alone For weeks, I told you, lived my child-life
still

Even at Arezzo, when I woke and found First . . . but I need not think of that
again —

Over and ended! Try and take the sense Of what I signify, if it must be so.

After the first, my husband, for hate's
sake,

Said one eve, when the simpler cruelty 10 Seemed somewhat dull at edge and fit to
bear,

"We have been man and wife, six months almost:

"How long is this your comedy to last?

"Go this night to my chamber, not your
own!"

At which word, I did rush — most true the charge —

And gain the Archbishop's house — he stands for God —

And fall upon my knees and clasp his feet, Praying him hinder what my estranged
soul

Refused to bear, though patient of the
rest:

"Place me within a convent," I implored —

30 "Let me henceforward lead the virgin life
"You praise in Her you bid me imitate!" What did he answer? "Folly of ignorance!

"Know, daughter, circumstances make or mar

"Virginity, — 'tis virtue or 'tis vice.

"That which was glory in the Mother of God

"Had been, for instance, damnable in Eve
"Created to be mother of mankind.

"Had Eve, in answer to her Maker's
speech

"'Be fruitful, multiply, replenish earth'—

10 "Pouted" But I choose rather to remain

"'Single' — why, she had spared herself forthwith

"Further probation by the apple and snake,

"Been pushed straight out of Paradise!
For see —

"If motherhood be qualified impure,
"I catch you making God command Eve
sin!

"— A blasphemy so like these Molinists',
"I must suspect you dip into their books." Then he pursued "'Twas in your covenant!"

No! There my husband never used deceit.

He never did by speech nor act imply "Because of our soul's yearning that we meet

"And mix in soul through flesh, which yours and mine

"Wear and impress, and make their visible selves,

"— All which means, for the love of you
and me,

"Let us become one flesh, being one soul!"
He only stipulated for the wealth;

Honest so far. But when he spoke as
plain —

Dreadfully honest also — "Since our souls

"Stand each from each, a whole world's width between,

"Give me the fleshly vesture I can reach 6

"And rend and leave just fit for hell to burn!" —

Why, in God's name, for Guido's soul's own sake

Imperilled by polluting mine, — I say,
I did resist; would I had overcome!

My heart died out at the Archbishop's
smile;

— It seemed so stale and worn a way o'
the world,

As though 'twere nature frowning —
"Here is Spring,

"The sun shines as he shone at Adam's
fall,

"The earth requires that warmth reach
everywhere:

"What, must your patch of snow be saved 7
forsooth

"Because you rather fancy snow than flowers?"

Something in this style he began with me.
Last he said, savagely for a good man,

"This explains why you call your husband harsh,

"Harsh to you, harsh to whom you love.
God's Bread!

"The poor Count has to manage a mere
child

"Whose parents leave untaught the simplest things

"Their duty was and privilege to teach, —
 "Goodwives' instruction, gossips' lore:
 they laugh
 "And leave the Count the task, — or leave it me!"

Then I resolved to tell a frightful thing.

"I am not ignorant, — know what I say,
 "Declaring this is sought for hate, not
 love.

"Sir, you may hear things like almighty
 God.

"I tell you that my housemate, yes — the
priest

"My husband's brother, Canon Giro-lamo —

o "Has taught me what depraved and misnamed love

"Means, and what outward signs denote the sin,

"For he solicits me and says he loves,

"The idle young priest with nought else
 to do.

"My husband sees this, knows this, and lets be.

"Is it your counsel I bear this beside?"

" — More scandal, and against a priest this time!

"What, 'tis the Canon now?" — less snap-pishly —

"Rise up, my child, for such a child you
 are,

"The rod were too advanced a punishment!

o "Let's try the honeyed cake. A parable!
 "Without a parable spake He not to
 them."

"There was a ripe round long black tooth-some fruit,

"Even a flower-fig, the prime boast of May.

"And, to the tree, said . . . either the spirit o' the fig,

"Or, if we bring in men, the gardener,

"Archbishop of the orchard — had I time

"To try o' the two which fits in best:
 indeed

"It might be the Creator's self, but then

"The tree should bear an apple, I suppose, —

o "Well, anyhow, one with authority said

"Ripe fig, burst skin, regale the figpecker —

"The bird whereof thou art a perquisite!"

"Nay," with a founce, replied the restif fig,

"I much prefer to keep my pulp myself:

"He may go breakfastless and dinnerless,

"Supperless of one crimson seed, for me!"

"So, back she flopped into her bunch of leaves.

"He flew off, left her, — did the natural
 lord, —

"And lo, three hundred thousand bees and wasps

"Found her out, feasted on her to the 40 shuck:

"Such gain the fig's that gave its bird no bite!

"The moral, — fools elude their proper lot,

"Tempt other fools, get ruined all alike.

"Therefore go home, embrace your husband quick!

"Which if his Canon brother chance to see,

"He will the sooner back to book again."

So, home I did go; so, the worst befell:

So, I had proof the Archbishop was just
 man,

And hardly that, and certainly no more.

For, miserable consequence to me, 50

My husband's hatred waxed nor waned at
 all,

His brother's boldness grew effrontery
 soon,

And my last stay and comfort in myself Was forced from me: henceforth I looked to God

Only, nor cared my desecrated soul Should have fair walls, gay windows for

the world.

God's glimmer, that came through the ruin-top.

Was witness why all lights were quenched
 inside:

Henceforth I asked God counsel, not man-
 kind.

So, when I made the effort, freed myself, 60

They said — "No care to save appearance
 here!

"How cynic, — when, how wanton, were
 enough!"

— Adding, it all came of my mother's
 life —

My own real mother, whom I never knew, Who did wrong (if she needs must have done wrong)

Through being all her life, not my four
 years,

At mercy of the hateful: every beast O' the field was wont to break that fountain-fence,

Trample the silver into mud so murk Heaven could not find itself reflected there. 70

Now they cry "Out on her, who, plashy pool,

"Bequeathed turbidity and bitterness
 "To the daughter-stream where Guido dipt and drank!"

Well, since she had to bear this brand — let me!

The rather do I understand her now,
 From my experience of what hate calls

love, —

Much love might be in what their love called hate.

If she sold . . . what they call, sold . . .
me, her child —

I shall believe she hoped in her poor heart
That I at least might try be good and pure, Begin to live untempted, not go doomed And done with ere once found in fault, as
she.

Oh and, my mother, it all came to this?
Why should I trust those that speak ill of
you,

When I mistrust who speaks even well of
them?

Why, since all bound to do me good, did
harm,

10 May not you, seeming as you harmed me
most,

Have meant to do most good — and feed your child

From bramble-bush, whom not one orchard-tree

But drew bough back from, nor let one fruit fall?

This it was for you sacrificed your babe?
Gained just this, giving your heart's hope
away

As I might give mine, loving it as you, If . . . but that never could be asked of
me!

There, enough! I have my support again, Again the knowledge that my babe was, is, 20 Will be mine only. Him, by death, I give straight to God, without a further care, — but not to any parent in the world. —

So to be safe: why is it we repine?

What guardianship were safer could we choose?

All human plans and projects come to
nought:

My life, and what I know of other lives, Prove that; no plan nor project! God shall care!

And now you are not tired? How patient
then

All of you, — Oh yes, patient this long
while

30 Listening, and understanding, I am sure!
Four days ago, when I was sound and

well

And like to live, no one would understand.
People were kind, but smiled "And what
of him,

"Your friend, whose tonsure the rich dark-brown hides?

"There, there! — your lover, do we dream he was?

"A priest too — never were such naughti-
ness!

"Still, he thinks many a long think, never
fear,

"After the shy pale lady, — lay so light

"For a moment in his arms, the lucky
one!"

And so on: wherefore should I blame you
much?

So we are made, such difference in minds, Such difference too in eyes that see the minds!

That man, you misinterpret and misprise —

The glory of his nature, I had thought, Shot itself out in white light, blazed the
truth

Through every atom of his act with me:
Yet where I point you, through the crystal

shrine,
Purity in quintessence, one dew-drop,

You all descry a spider in the midst.
One says "The head of it is plain to see," 50

And one, "They are the feet by which I
judge,"

All say, "Those films were spun by nothing
else."

Then, I must lay my babe away with God, Nor think of him again, for gratitude.

Yes, my last breath shall wholly spend
itself

In one attempt more to disperse the stain, The mist from other breath fond mouths have made,

About a lustrous and pellucid soul:
So that, when I am gone but sorrow stays,

And people need assurance in their doubt 60
If God yet have a servant, man a friend,

The weak a saviour and the vile a foe, —
Let him be present, by the name invoked,

Giuseppe-Maria Caponsacchi!

There,
Strength comes already with the utterance!
I will remember once more for his sake
The sorrow: for he lives and is belied.
Could he be here, how he would speak for
me!

I had been miserable three drear years
In that dread palace and lay passive now, 70 When I first learned there could be such a
man.

Thus it fell: I was at a public play,
In the last days of Carnival last March, Brought there I knew not why, but now know well.

My husband put me where I sat, in front; Then crouched down, breathed cold through me from behind,

Stationed i' the shadow, — none in front could see, —

I, it was, faced the stranger-throng be-
neath,

The crowd with upturned faces, eyes one stare,

Voices one buzz. I looked but to the 80
stage,

Whereon two lovers sang and interchanged

"True life is only love, love only bliss:
 "I love thee — thee I love!" then they embraced.
 I looked thence to the ceiling and the walls, —
 Over the crowd, those voices and those
 eyes, —
 My thoughts went through the roof and out, to Rome On wings of music, waft of measured
 words, —
 Set me down there, a happy child again Sure that to-morrow would be festa-day, Hearing my parents praise past festas
 more,
 And seeing they were old if I was young, Yet wondering why they still would end discourse With "We must soon go, you abide your
 time,
 "And, — might we haply see the proper
 friend
 "Throw his arm over you and make you safe!"

Sudden I saw him; into my lap there fell A foolish twist of comfits, broke my dream And brought me from the air and laid me
 low,
 As ruined as the soaring bee that's reached (So Pietro told me at the Villa once) By the dust-handful. There the comfits
 lay:
 I looked to see who flung them, and I faced
 This Caponsacchi, looking up in tu.n.
 Ere I could reason out why, I felt sure, Whoever flung them, his was not the
 hand, —
 Up rose the round face and good-natured grin
 Of one who, in effect, had played the
 prank,
 From covert close beside the earnest
 face, —
 Fat waggish Conti, friend of all the world.
 He was my husband's cousin, privileged To throw the thing: the other, silent,
 grave,
 Solemn almost, saw me, as I saw him.

There is a psalm Don Celestine recites, "Had I a dove's wings, how I fain would flee!"
 The psalm runs not "I hope, I pray for wings," —
 Not "If wings fall from heaven, I fix them
 fast," —
 Simply "How good it were to fly and rest,
 "Have hope now, and one day expect content!
 "How well to do what I shall never do!"
 So I said "Had there been a man like that,

"To lift me with his strength out of all ad-strife
 "Into the calm, how I could fly and rest!
 "I have a keeper in the garden here
 "Whose sole employment is to strike me
 low
 "If ever I, for solace, seek the sun.
 "Life means with me successful feigning
 death,
 "Lying stone-like, eluding notice so,
 "Forgoing here the turf and there the sky.
 "Suppose that man had been instead of
 this!"

Presently Conti laughed into my ear, — Had tripped up to the raised place 50 where I sat —
 "Cousin, I flung them brutishly and hard!
 "Because you must be hurt, to look austere
 "As Caponsacchi yonder, my tall friend
 "A-gazing now. Ah, Guido, you so close?
 "Keep on your knees, do! Beg her to forgive!
 "My cornet¹ battered like a cannon-ball.
 "Good-bye, I'm gone!" — nor waited the reply.

That night at supper, out my husband
 broke,
 "Why was that throwing, that buffoonery?
 "Do you think I am your dupe? What 60 man would dare
 "Throw comfits in a stranger lady's lap?
 "Twas knowledge of you bred such insolence
 "In Caponsacchi; he dared shoot the bolt,
 "Using that Conti for his stalking-horse.
 "How could you see him this once and no
 more,
 "When he is always haunting hereabout
 "At the street-corner or the palace-side, "Publishing my shame and your impu-
 dence?
 "You are a wanton, — I a dupe, you
 think?
 "O Christ, what hinders that I kill her 70
 quick?"
 Whereat he drew his sword and feigned a thrust.

All this, now, — being not so strange to
 me,
 Used to such misconception day by day And broken-in to bear, — I bore, this
 time,
 More quietly than woman should perhaps; Repeated the mere truth and held my
 tongue.

¹ Cornet: a piece of paper twisted into a conical shape (such as is commonly used by grocers).

Then he said, "Since you play the ignorant
"I shall instruct you. This amour — commenced

"Or finished or midway in act, all's
one, —

"Tis the town-talk; so my revenge shall
be.

"Does he presume because he is a priest?

"I warn him that the sword I wear shall pink

"His lily-scented cassock through and
through,

"Next time I catch him underneath your eaves!"

But he had threatened with the sword so oft

10 And, after all, not kept his promise. All I said was "Let God save the innocent!

"Moreover death is far from a bad fate.

"I shall go pray for you and me, not him;

"And then I look to sleep, come death or,
worse,

"Life." So, I slept.

There may have elapsed a week, When Margherita, — called my waiting-
maid,

Whom it is said my husband found too
fair —

Who stood and heard the charge and the
reply,

Who never once would let the matter rest

20 From that night forward, but rang changes
still

On this the thrust and that the shame, and
how

Good cause for jealousy cures jealous fools,
And what a paragon was this same priest

She talked about until I stopped my ears, —

She said, "A week is gone; you comb your hair,

"Then go mope in a corner, cheek on palm,

"Till night comes round again, — so, waste a week

"As if your husband menaced you in sport.

"Have not I some acquaintance with his tricks?

30 "Oh no, he did not stab the serving-man "Who made and sang the rhymes about me
once!

"For why? They sent him to the wars
next day.

"Nor poisoned he the foreigner, my friend

"Who wagered on the whiteness of my
breast, —

"The swarth skins of our city in dispute:
"For, though he paid me proper compli-
ment,

"The Count well knew he was besotted with

"Somebody else, a skin as black as ink,

"(As all the town knew save my foreigner)

"He found and wedded presently, — 4

"Why need

"Better revenge?" — the Count asked.

But what's here?

"A priest that does not fight, and cannot
wed,

"Yet must be dealt with! If the Count took fire

"For the poor pastime of a minute, —
me —

"What were the conflagration for yourself,
"Countess and lady-wife and all the rest?

"The priest will perish; you will grieve too late:

"So shall the city-ladies' handsomest

"Frankest and liberalest gentleman

"Die for you, to appease a scurvy dog

"Hanging's too good for. Is there no escape?

"Were it not simple Christian charity

"To warn the priest be on his guard, — save him

"Assured death, save yourself from causing it?

"I meet him in the street. Give me a
glove,

"A ring to show for token! Mum's the
word!"

I answered "If you were, as styled, my
maid,

"I would command you: as you are, you
say,

"My husband's intimate, — assist his
wife

"Who can do nothing but entreat 'Be 6
still!'

"Even if you speak truth and a crime is planned,

"Leave help to God as I am forced to do!

"There is not other help or we should craze,

"Seeing such evil with no human cure.

"Reflect that God, who makes the storm desist,

"Can make an angry violent heart sub-
side.

"Why should we venture teach Him governance?

"Never address me on this subject more!"

Next night she said "But I went, all the
same,

" — Ay, saw your Caponsacchi in his 7
house,

"And come back stuffed with news I must outpour.

"I told him 'Sir, my mistress is a stone:

"Why should you harm her for no good you get?

"For you do harm her — prowl about our place

"With the Count never distant half the
street,

"Lurking at every corner, would you look!
 "'Tis certain she has witched you with a spell.
 "'Are there not other beauties at your beck?
 "'We all know, Donna This and Monna That "'Die for a glance of yours, yet here you gaze!
 "'Go make them grateful, leave the stone its cold!
 "'And he — oh, he turned first white and then red,
 "'And then — 'To her behest I bow myself,
 "'Whom I love with my body and my soul;
 "'Only a word i' the bowing! See, I write
 "'One little word, no harm to see or hear!
 "'Then, fear no further!' This is what he wrote.
 "'I know you cannot read, — therefore, let me!
 "'My idol!" . . .

But I took it from her hand And tore it into shreds. "Why join the rest
 "Who harm me? Have I ever done you wrong?
 "People have told me 'tis you wrong myself:
 "Let it suffice I either feel no wrong
 "Or else forgive it, — yet you turn my foe!
 "The others hunt me and you throw a noose!"
 She muttered "Have your wilful way!"
 I slept.

Whereupon . . . no, I leave my husband out!
 It is not to do him more hurt, I speak.
 Let it suffice, when misery was most,
 One day, I swooned and got a respite so,
 She stooped as I was slowly coming to,
 This Margherita, ever on my trace,
 And whispered — "Caponasacchi!"

If I drowned,
 But woke afloat i' the wave with upturned eyes, And found their first sight was a star! I turned —
 For the first time, I let her have her will, Heard passively, — "The imposthume at such head,
 "One touch, one lancet-puncture would relieve, —
 "And still no glance the good physician's way
 "Who rids you of the torment in a trice!

"Still he writes letters you refuse to hear.
 "He may prevent your husband, kill himself,
 "So desperate and all fordone is he!
 "Just hear the pretty verse he made to-day!
 "A sonnet from Mirtillo. 'Peerless 40
fair . . .
 "All poetry is difficult to read,
 " — The sense of it is, anyhow, he seeks
 "Leave to contrive you an escape from hell,
 "And for that purpose asks an interview.
 "I can write, I can grant it in your name,
 "Or, what is better, lead you to his house.
 "Your husband dashes you against the stones;
 "This man would place each fragment in a shrine:
 "You hate him, love your husband!"

I returned
 "It is not true I love my husband, — no, 50
 "Nor hate this man. I listen while you speak,
 " — Assured that what you say is false, the same:
 "Much as when once, to me a little child,
 "A rough gaunt man in rags, with eyes on fire,
 "A crowd of boys and idlers at his heels,
 "Rushed as I crossed the Square, and held my head
 "In his two hands, 'Here's she will let me speak!
 "You little girl, whose eyes do good to mine,
 "I am the Pope, am Sextus, now the Sixth;
 "And that Twelfth Innocent, proclaimed 60
 to-day,
 "Is Lucifer disguised in human flesh!
 "The angels, met in conclave, crowned me!' — thus "He gibbered and I listened; but I knew
 "All was delusion, ere folk interposed
 "Unfasten him, the maniac!' Thus I know
 "All your report of Caponsacchi false,
 "Folly or dreaming; I have seen so much
 "By that adventure at the spectacle,
 "The face I fronted that one first, last time:
 "He would belie it by such words and 70
 thoughts.
 "Therefore while you profess to show him me,
 "I ever see his own face. Get you gone!"
 " — That will I, nor once open mouth again, —
 "No, by Saint Joseph and the Holy Ghost!
 "On your head be the damage, so adieu!"

And so more days, more deeds I must forget,

Till . . . what a strange thing now is to declare!

Since I say anything, say all if true!

And how my life seems lengthened as to serve!

It may be idle or inopportune,

But, true? — why, what was all I said but truth,

Even when I found that such as are untrue

Could only take the truth in through a lie?

Now — I am speaking truth to the Truth's self:

10 God will lend credit to my words this time.

It had got half through April. I arose
One vivid daybreak, — who had gone to bed

In the old way my wont those last three years,

Careless until, the cup drained, I should die.

The last sound in my ear, the over-night,

Had been a something let drop on the sly

In prattle by Margherita, "Soon enough

"Gaieties end, now Easter's past: a week,

"And the Archbishop gets him back to Rome, —

20 "Everyone leaves the town for Rome, this Spring, —

"Even Caponsacchi, out of heart and hope,

"Resigns himself and follows with the flock."

I heard this drop and drop like rain outside Fast-falling through the darkness while she spoke:

So had I heard with like indifference,

"And Michael's pair of wings will arrive first

"At Rome, to introduce the company,

"And bear him from our picture where he fights

"Satan, — expect to have that dragon loose

30 "And never a defender!" — my sole thought

Being still, as night came, "Done, another day!

"How good to sleep and so get nearer death!" —

When, what, first thing at daybreak, pierced the sleep

With a summons to me? Up I sprang alive,

Light in me, light without me, everywhere Change! A broad yellow sunbeam was let fall

From heaven to earth, — a sudden draw-bridge lay,

Along which marched a myriad merry notes,

Mocking the flies that crossed them and recrossed

In rival dance, companions new-born too. 40

On the house-eaves, a dripping shag of weed

Shook diamonds on each dull grey lattice-square,

As first one, then another bird leapt by,
And light was off, and lo was back again,

Always with one voice, — where are two such joys? —

The blessed building-sparrow! I stepped forth,

Stood on the terrace, — o'er the roofs such sky!

My heart sang, "I too am to go away,
"I too have something I must care about,

"Carry away with me to Rome, to Rome! 50

"The bird brings hither sticks and hairs and wool,

"And nowhere else i' the world; what fly breaks rank,

"Falls out of the procession that befits,
"From window here to window there, with all

"The world to choose, — so well he knows his course?

"I have my purpose and my motive too,
"My march to Rome, like any bird or fly!

Had I been dead! How right to be alive!

Last night I almost prayed for leave to die,

Wished Guido all his pleasure with the sword.

Or the poison, — poison, sword, was but a trick,

"Harmless, may God forgive him the poor jest!

"My life is charmed, will last till I reach Rome!

"Yesterday, but for the sin, — ah, nameless be "The deed I could have dared against myself!

"Now — see if I will touch an unripe fruit,

"And risk the health I want to have and use!

"Not to live, now, would be the wickedness, —

"For life means to make haste and go to Rome

"And leave Arezzo, leave all woes at once!"

Now, understand here, by no means mistake!

Long ago had I tried to leave that house
When it seemed such procedure would stop sin;

And still failed more the more I tried — at first

The Archbishop, as I told you, — next, our lord
The Governor, — indeed I found my way,
I went to the great palace where he rules, Though I knew well 'twas he who, — when I gave A jewel or two, themselves had given me.
Back to my parents, — since they wanted
bread,
They who had never let me want a nosegay, — he Spoke of the jail for felons, if they kept What was first theirs, then mine, so doubly
theirs,
Though all the while my husband's most
of all!
I knew well who had spoke the word wrought this:
Yet, being in extremity, I fled To the Governor, as I say, — scarce opened lip
When — the cold cruel snicker close behind —
Guido was on my trace, already there, Exchanging nod and wink for shrug and
smile,
And I — pushed back to him and, for my pains Paid with . . . but why remember what is past?
I sought out a poor friar the people call The Roman, and confessed my sin which
came
Of their sin, — that fact could not be repressed, —
The frightfulness of my despair in God:
And, feeling, through the grate, his horror shake, Implored him, "Write for me who cannot
write,
"Apprise my parents, make them rescue
me!
"You bid me be courageous and trust God:
"Do you in turn dare somewhat, trust and
write
"Dear friends, who used to be my parents
once,
"And now declare you have no part in
me,
"This 's some riddle I want wit to solve,
"Since you must love me with no difference.
"Even suppose you altered, — there's your hate,
"To ask for: hate of you two dearest
ones
"I shall find liker love than love found
here,
"If husbands love their wi es. Take me
away
"And hate me as you do the gnats and fleas,
"Even the scorpions! How I shall rejoice!"

"Write that and save me!" And he promised — wrote
Or did not write; things never changed at
all:
He was not like the Augustinian here! 40
Last, in a desperation I appealed To friends, whoever wished me better
days,
To Guillichini, that's of kin, — "What,
I —
"Travel to Rome with you? A flying gout "Bids me deny my heart and mind my leg!"
Then I tried Conti, used to brave — laugh back
The louring thunder when his cousin scowled
At me protected by his presence: "You — "Who well know what you cannot save me
from, —
"Carry me off! What frightens you, a 50
priest?"
He shook his head, looked grave —
"Above my strength!"
"Guido has claws that scratch, shows feline teeth;
"A formidabler foe than I dare fret:
"Give me a dog to deal with, twice the size!
"Of course I am a priest and Canon too,
"But . . . by the bye . . . though both, not quite so bold
'As he, my fellow-Canon, brother-priest,
"The personage in such ill odour here "Because of the reports — pure birth o' the brain!
"Our Caponsacchi, he's your true Saint 60
George
"To slay the monster, set the Princess free,
"And have the whole High-Altar to himself:
"I always think so when I see that piece
"I' the Pieve, that's his church and mine,
you know:
"Though you drop eyes at mention of his
name!"

That name had got to take a half-grotesque
Half-ominous, wholly enigmatic sense, Like any by-word, broken bit of song Born with a meaning, changed by mouth and mouth
That mix it in a sneer or smile, as chance 70
Bids, till it now means nought but ugliness And perhaps shame.

— All this intends to say,
That, over-night, the notion of escape Had seemed distemper, dreaming; and the name, —
Not the man, but the name of him, thus
made

Into a mockery and disgrace, — why, she Who uttered it persistently, had laughed, “I name his name, and there you start and wince

“As criminal from the red tongs’ touch!” — yet now, Now, as I stood letting morn bathe me
bright, Choosing which butterfly should bear my news, —

The white, the brown one, or that tinier
blue, —

The Margherita, I detested so,
In she came — “The fine day, the good Spring time!

10 “What, up and out at window? That is best.

“No thought of Caponsacchi? — who stood there

“All night on one leg, like the sentry crane, “Under the pelting of your water-spout — “Looked last look at your lattice ere he leave

“Our city, bury his dead hope at Rome.

“Ay, go to looking-glass and make you
fine,

“While he may die ere touch one least loose hair

“You drag at with the comb in such a rage!”

I turned — “Tell Caponsacchi he may
come!”

20 “Tell him to come? Ah, but, for charity, “A truce to fooling! Come? What, — come this eve?

“Peter and Paul! But I see through the trick!

“Yes, come, and take a flower-pot on his
head,

“Flung from your terrace! No joke, sincere truth?”

How plainly I perceived hell flash and fadc

O’ the face of her, — the doubt that first paled joy,

Then, final reassurance I indeed
Was caught now, never to be free again!
What did I care? — who felt myself of
force

30 To play with silk, and spurn the horsehair-springe.

“But — do you know that I have bade him come,

“And in your own name? I presumed so
much,

“Knowing the thing you needed in your heart.

“But somehow — what had I to show in proof?

“He would not come: half-promised, that was all,

“And wrote the letters you refused to read.
“What is the message that shall move him
now?”

“After the Ave Maria, at first dark, “I will be standing on the terrace, say!”

“I would I had a good long lock of hair “Should prove I was not lying! Never
mind!”

Off she went — “May he not refuse, that’s
all —

“Fearing a trick!”

I answered, “He will come.”

And, all day, I sent prayer like incense up To God the strong, God the beneficent, God ever mindful in all strife and strait,
Who, for our own good, makes the need extreme,

Till at the last He puts forth might and saves.

An old rhyme came into my head and rang
Of how a virgin, for the faith of God, 5 Hid herself, from the Paynims that pursued,

In a cave’s heart; until a thunderstorm, Wrapped in a flame, revealed the couch and prey

And they laughed — “Thanks to lightning, ours at last!”

And she cried “Wrath of God, assert His
love!

“Servant of God, thou fire, befriend His
child!”

And lo, the fire she grasped at, fixed its flash,

Lay in her hand a calm cold dreadful
sword

She brandished till pursuers strewed the
ground,

So did the souls within them die away, 6
As o’er the prostrate bodies, sworded,
safe,

She walked forth to the solitudes and
Christ:

So should I grasp the lightning and be saved!

And still, as the day wore, the trouble
grew Whereby I guessed there would be born a star,

Until at an intense throe of the dusk,
I started up, was pushed, I dare to say,
Out on the terrace, leaned and looked at
last

Where the deliverer waited me: the same Silent and solemn face, I first descried At the spectacle, confronted mine once
more.

So was that minute twice vouchsafed me, so The manhood, wasted then, was still at
watch
To save me yet a second time: no change Here, though all else changed in the changing world!

I spoke on the instant, as my duty bade,
In some such sense as this, whatever the
phrase.

"Friend, foolish words were borne from you to me;

"Your soul behind them is the pure strong
wind,

"Not dust and feathers which its breath may bear:

"These to the witless seem the wind it-
self,

"Since proving thus the first of it they feel.

"If by mischance you blew offence my
way,

"The straws are dropt, the wind desists no
whit,

"And how such strays were caught up in the street

"And took a motion from you, why inquire?

"I speak to the strong soul, no weak disguise.

"If it be truth, — why should I doubt it
truth? —

"You serve God specially, as priests are
bound,

"And care about me, stranger as I am,

"So far as wish my good, — that miracle,

"I take to intimate He wills you serve

"Py saving me, — what else can He direct?

"Here is the service. Since a long while
now,

"I am in course of being put to death:

"While death concerned nothing but me, I bowed

"The head and bade, in heart, my husband strike.

"Now I imperil something more, it seems,

"Something that's truelier me than this
myself,

"Something I trust in God and you to save.

"You go to Rome, they tell me: take me
there,

"Put me back with my people!"

He replied —

The first word I heard ever from his lips,
All himself in it, — an eternity

Of speech, to match the immeasurable depth

O' the soul that then broke silence — "I am yours."

So did the star rise, soon to lead my step, Lead on, nor pause before it should stand
still

Above the House o' the Babe, — my babe
to be,

That knew me first and thus made me know him,

That had his right of life and claim on 4
mine,

And would not let me die till he was born,
But pricked me at the heart to save us both,

Saying "Have you the will? Leave God the way!"

And the way was Caponsacchi — "mine," thank God!

He was mine, he is mine, he will be mine.

No pause i' the leading and the light! 1
know,

Next night there was a cloud came, and not
he:

But I prayed through the darkness till it broke

And let him shine. The second night, he came.

"The plan is rash; the project desperate: 50
"In such a flight needs must I risk your
life,

"Give food for falsehood, folly or mistake,
"Ground for your husband's rancour and revenge" —

So he began again, with the same face.
I felt that, the same loyalty — one star

Turning now red that was so white before — One service apprehended newly: just

A word of mine and there the white was
back!

"No, friend, for you will take me! 'Tis yourself

"Risk all, not I, — who let you, for I trust 60
"In the compensating great God: enough!

"I know you: when is it that you will
come?"

"To-morrow at the day's dawn." Then I heard

What I should do: how to prepare for flight

And where to fly.

That night my husband bade
— You, whom I loathe, beware you break my sleep

"This whole night! Couch beside me like the corpse

"I would you were!" The rest you know,
I think —

How I found Caponsacchi and escaped.

And this man, men call sinner? Jesus 70
Christ!

Of whom men said, with mouths Thyself mad'st once,

"He hath a devil" — say he was Thy saint, My Caponsacchi! Shield and show — unshroud

- In Thine own time the glory of the soul If aught obscure, — if ink-spot, from vile pens Scribbling a charge against him — (I was glad Then, for the first time, that I could not
 write) —
 Flirted his way, have flecked the blaze!
 For me,
 'Tis otherwise: let men take, sift my thoughts
 — Thoughts I throw like the flax for sun to bleach!
 I did pray, do pray, in the prayer shall die,
 "Oh, to have Caponsacchi for my guide!" 10 Ever the face upturned to mine, the hand Holding my hand across the world, — a
 sense
 That reads, as only such can read, the mark God sets on woman, signifying so She should — shall peradventure — be divine;
 Yet 'ware, the while, how weakness mars the print
 And makes confusion, leaves the thing men
 see,
 — Not this man sees, — who from his soul, rewrites
 The obliterated charter, — love and strength Mending what's marred. "So kneels a votarist, 20 "Weeds some poor waste traditionary plot "Where shrine once was, where temple yet may be,
 "Purging the place but worshipping the
 while,
 "By faith and not by sight, sight clearest
 so, —
 "Such way the saints work," — says Don Celestine.
 But I, not privileged to see a saint Of old when such walked earth with crown and palm,
 If I call "saint" what saints call something
 else —
 The saints must bear with me, impute the
 fault
 To a soul i' the bud, so starved by ignorance, 30 Stinted of warmth, it will not blow this year Nor recognise the orb which Spring-flowers know.
 But if meanwhile some insect with a heart Worth floods of lazy music, spendthrift
 joy —
 Some fire-fly renounced Spring for my dwarfed cup,
 Crept close to me, brought lustre for the
 dark, Comfort against the cold, — what though excess
 Of comfort should miscall the creature —
 sun?
 What did the sun to hinder while harsh
 hands
- Petal by petal, crude and colourless, Tore me? This one heart gave me all the 46
 Spring!
- Is all told? There's the journey: and where's time
 To tell you how that heart burst out in shine?
 Yet certain points do press on me too hard.
 Each place must have a name, though I forget:
 How strange it was — there where the plain begins
 And the small river mitigates its flow — When eve was fading fast, and my soul
 sank,
 And he divined what surge of bitterness,
 In overtaking me, would float me back Whence I was carried by the striding day — 50
 So, — "This grey place was famous once," said he —
 And he began that legend of the place
 As if in answer to the unspoken fear,
 And told me all about a brave man dead,
 Which lifted me and let my soul go on!
 How did he know too, — at that town's approach
 By the rock-side, — that in coming near the signs
 Of life, the house-roofs and the church and tower,
 I saw the old boundary and wall o' the
 world
 Rise plain as ever round me, hard and cold, 60
 As if the broken circlet joined again, Tightened itself about me with no break, —
 As if the town would turn Arezzo's self, — The husband there, — the friends my enemies,
 All ranged against me, not an avenue
 To try, but would be blocked and drive me
 back
 On him, — this other, . . . oh the heart in that!
 Did not he find, bring, put into my arms
 A new-born babe? — and I saw faces
 beam
 Of the young mother proud to teach me 70
 joy,
 And gossips round expecting my surprise At the sudden hole through earth that lets in heaven.
 I could believe himself by his strong will Had woven around me what I thought the
 world
 We went along in, every circumstance, Towns, flowers and faces, all things helped so well!
 For, through the journey, was it natural Such comfort should arise from first to
 last?
 As I look back, all is one milky way; Still bettered more, the more remembered, 80
 so

Do new stars bud while I but search for old,
 And fill all gaps i' the glory, and grow him—
 Him I now see make the shine everywhere.
 Even at the last when the bewildered flesh,
 The cloud of weariness about my soul Clogging too heavily, sucked down all
 sense, —
 Still its last voice was, "He will watch and care;
 "Let the strength go, I am content: he stays!"
 I doubt not he did stay and care for all —
 From that sick minute when the head swam
 round,
 And the eyes looked their last and died on
 him,
 As in his arms he caught me, and, you say, Carried me in, that tragical red eve,
 And laid me where I next returned to life In the other red of morning, two red plates That crushed together, crushed the time between,
 And are since then a solid fire to me, — When in, my dreadful husband and the
 world
 Broke, — and I saw him, master, by hell's
 right,
 And saw my angel helplessly held back By guards that helped the malice — the lamb prone,
 The serpent towering and triumphant —
 then Came all the strength back in a sudden swell,
 I did for once see right, do right, give
 tongue
 The adequate protest: for a worm must
 turn
 If it would have its wrong observed by God.
 I did spring up, attempt to thrust aside That ice-block 'twixt the sun and me, lay
 low
 The neutraliser of all good and truth.
 If I sinned so, — never obey voice more O' the Just and Terrible, who bids us —
 "Bear!" Not — "Stand by, bear to see my angels
 bear!"
 I am clear it was on impulse to serve God Not save myself, — no — nor my child unborn!
 Had I else waited patiently till now? —
 Who saw my old kind parents, silly-sooth And too much trustful, for their worst of faults, Cheated, brow-beaten, stripped and starved, cast out Into the kennel: I remonstrated, Then sank to silence, for, — their woes at
 end, Themselves gone, — only I was left to plague.
 If only I was threatened and belied,

What matter? I could bear it and did
 bear;
 It was a comfort, still one lot for all:
 They were not persecuted for my sake
 And I, estranged, the single happy one.
 But when at last, all by myself I stood Obeying the clear voice which bade me rise,
 Not for my own sake but my babe unborn,
 And take the angel's hand was sent to 50
 help —
 And found the old adversary athwart the path —
 Not my hand simply struck from the angel's, but
 The very angel's self made foul i' the face By the fiend who struck there, — that I would not bear,
 That only I resisted! So, my first
 And last resistance was invincible.
 Prayers move God; threats, and nothing else, move men!
 I must have prayed a man as he were God
 When I implored the Governor to right My parents' wrongs: the answer was a 60
 smile.
 The Archbishop, — did I clasp his feet
 enough,
 Hide my face hotly on them, while I told More than I dared make my own mother
 know?
 The profit was — compassion and a jest.
 This time, the foolish prayers were done with, right Used might, and solemnised the sport at
 once.
 All was against the combat: vantage,
 mine?
 The runaway avowed, the accomplice-wife,
 In company with the plan-coniving
 priest?
 Yet, shame thus rank and patent, I struck, 70
 bare,
 At foe from head to foot in magic mail,
 And off it withered, cobweb-armoury Against the lightning! 'Twas truth singed the lies
 And saved me, not the vain sword nor weak
 speech!
 You see, I will not have the service fail!
 I say, the angel saved me: I am safe!
 Others may want and wish, I wish nor want One point o' the circle plainer, where I
 stand Traced round about with white to front
 the world.
 What of the calumny I came across, 80 What o' the way to the end? — the end crowns all.
 The judges judged aright i' the main, gave
 me
 The uttermost of my heart's desire, a truce
 From torture and Arezzo, balm for hurt,

- With the quiet nuns, — God recompense the good!
Who said and sang away the ugly past.
And, when my final fortune was revealed,
What safety while, amid my parents' arms, My babe was given me! Yes, he saved my babe:
It would not have peeped forth, the bird-like thing,
Through that Arezzo noise and trouble:
back
Had it returned nor ever let me see!
But the sweet peace cured all, and let me
live
10 And give my bird the life among the leaves God meant him! Weeks and months of quietude,
I could lie in such peace and learn so
much —
Begin the task, I see how needful now,
Of understanding somewhat of my past, — Know life a little, I should leave so soon.
Therefore, because this man restored my
soul,
All has been right; I have gained my gain, enjoyed
As well as suffered, — nay, got foretaste
too
Of better life beginning where this ends — 20 All through the breathing-while allowed me thus,
Which let good premonitions reach my
soul
Unthwarted, and benignant influence flow
And interpenetrate and change my heart, Uncrossed by what was wicked, — nay, unkind.
For, as the weakness of my time drew nigh, Nobody did me one disservice more, Spoke coldly or looked strangely, broke the love
I lay in the arms of, till my boy was born, Born all in love, with nought to spoil the bliss
30 A whole long fortnight: in a life like mine A fortnight filled with bliss is long and
much.
All women are not mothers of a boy, Though they live twice the length of my whole life,
And, as they fancy, happily all the same.
There I lay, then, all my great fortnight
long,
As if it would continue, broaden out Happily more and more, and lead to
heaven:
Christmas before me, — was not that a
chance?
I never realised God's birth before — 40 How he grew likest God in being born.
This time I felt like Mary, had my babe Lying a little on my breast like hers.
So all went on till, just four days ago —
The night and the tap.
- Oh it shall be success To the whole of our poor family! My
friends
. . . Nay, father and mother, — Give me back my word!
They have been rudely stripped of life, disgraced
Like children who must needs go clothed too fine,
Carry the garb of Carnival in Lent.
If they too much affected frippery, 50
They have been punished and submit themselves,
Say no word: all is over, they see God
Who will not be extreme to mark their fault Or He had granted respite: they are safe.
For that most woeful man my husband
once,
Who, needing respite, still draws vital
breath,
I — pardon him? So far as lies in me,
I give him for his good the life he takes,
Praying the world will therefore acquiesce.
Let him make God amends, — none, none 60
to me
Who thank him rather that, whereas strange
fate
Mockingly styled him husband and me wife, Himself this way at least pronounced divorce, Blotted the marriage-bond: this blood of
mine
Flies forth exultingly at any door, Washes the parchment white, and thanks
the blow.
We shall not meet in this world nor the
next,
But where will God be absent? In His
face
Is light, but in His shadow healing too:
Let Guido touch the shadow and be healed! 70
And as my presence was importunate, —
My earthly good, temptation and a snare, — Nothing about me but drew somehow down His hate upon me, — somewhat so excused Therefore, since hate was thus the truth of him, —
May my evanishment for evermore Help further to relieve the heart that cast Such object of its natural loathing forth!
So he was made; he nowise made himself:
I could not love him, but his mother did. 80
His soul has never lain beside my soul:
But for the unresisting body, — thanks!
He burned that garment spotted by the
flesh.
Whatever he touched is rightly ruined:
plague
It caught, and disinfection it had craved Still but for Guido; I am saved through
him
So as by fire; to him — thanks and fare-
well!

Even for my babe, my boy, there's safety
thence —
From the sudden death of me, I mean:
we poor Weak souls, how we endeavour to be strong!
I was already using up my life, —
This portion, now, should do him such a
good,
This other go to keep off such an ill!
The great life; see, a breath and it is gone!
So is detached, so left all by itself
The little life, the fact which means so
much.
to Shall not God stoop the kindlier to His
work,
His marvel of creation, foot would crush,
Now that the hand He trusted to receive
And hold it, lets the treasure fall perforce?
The better; He shall have in orphanage
His own way all the clearer: if my babe Outlived the hour — and he has lived two weeks —
It is through God who knows I am not by.
Who is it makes the soft gold hair turn
black,
And sets the tongue, might lie so long at
rest, 20 Trying to talk? Let us leave God alone!
Why should I doubt He will explain in
time
What I feel now, but fail to find the words?
My babe nor was, nor is, nor yet shall be Count Guido Franceschini's child at all — Only his mother's, born of love not hate!
So shall I have my rights in after-time.
It seems absurd, impossible to-day;
So seems so much else, not explained but
known!
Ah! Friends, I thank and bless you every
one!
30 No more now: I withdraw from earth and
man
To my own soul, compose myself for God.
Well, and there is more! Yes, my end of breath
Shall bear away my soul in being true!
He is still here, not outside with the world,
Here, here, I have him in his rightful place!
'Tis now, when I am most upon the move,
I feel for what I verily find — again
The face, again the eyes, again, through all,
The heart and its immeasurable love 40 Of my one friend, my only, all my own, Who put his breast between the spears and
me.
Ever with Caponsacchi! Otherwise
Here alone would be failure, loss to me — How much more loss to him, with life debarred From giving life, love locked from love's display,

The day-star stopped its task that makes night morn!
O lover of my life, O soldier-saint,
No work begun shall ever pause for death Love will be helpful to me more and more I' the coming course, the new path I must 54 tread —
My weak hand in thy strong hand, strong for that!
Tell him that if I seem without him now, That's the world's insight! Oh, he understands!
He is at Civita — do I once doubt
The world again is holding us apart?
He had been here, displayed in my behalf The broad brow that reverberates the
truth,
And flashed the word God gave him, back to man!
I know where the free soul is flown! My
fate
Will have been hard for even him to bear: 63
Let it confirm him in the trust of God, Showing how holily he dared the deed!
And, for the rest, — say, from the deed, no
touch
Of harm came, but all good, all happiness, Not one faint fleck of failure! Why explain?
What I see, oh, he sees and how much
more!
Tell him, — I know not wherefore the true word Should fade and fall unuttered at the
last —
It was the name of him I sprang to meet When came the knock, the summons and 70
the end.
"My great heart, my strong hand are back
again!"
I would have sprung to these, beckoning across Murder and hell gigantic and distinct O' the threshold, posted to exclude me
heaven:
He is ordained to call and I to come!
Do not the dead wear flowers when dressed for God?
Say, — I am all in flowers from head to
foot!
Say, — not one flower of all he said and did,
Might seem to flit unnoticed, fade unknown,
But dropped a seed, has grown a balsam- 84
tree
Whereof the blossoming perfumes the place At this supreme of moments! He is a
priest;
He cannot marry therefore, which is right:
I think he would not marry if he could.
Marriage on earth seems such a counterfeit,

Mere imitation of the inimitable:

In heaven we have the real and true and sure.

'Tis there they neither marry nor are given In marriage but are as the angels: right, Oh how right that is, how like Jesus Christ To say that! Marriage-making for the
earth,

With gold so much, — birth, power, repute
so much,

Or beauty, youth so much, in lack of these!
Be as the angels rather, who, apart,

12 Know themselves into one, are found at length

Married, but marry never, no, nor give In marriage; they are man and wife at
once

When the true time is: here we have to wait

Not so long neither! Could we by a wish Have what we will and get the future now, Would we wish aught done undone in the
past?

So, let him wait God's instant men call
years;

Meantime hold hard by truth and his great
soul,

Do out the duty! Through such souls
alone

20 God stooping shows sufficient of His light For us i' the dark to rise by. And I rise.

VIII.—DOMINUS HYACINTHUS DE ARCHANGELIS,

PAUPERUM PROCURATOR.¹

[This Book is so full of Latin, and the humour of it turns so much upon Latin phrases, as had better to repay the trouble of reading to any one not acquainted with that language. Under these circumstances, it would seem to be merely cumbrous and ineffective to give a translation throughout.]

Ah, my Giacinto, he's no ruddy rogue, Is not Cinone?² What, to-day we're eight?

Seven and one's eight, I hope, old curly-pate!

— Branches me out his verb-tree on the slate,

Amo —as —avi —atum —are —ans,
Up to —aturus, person, tense, and mood, Quies me cum subjunctivo (I could cry)

of criminals, as the "Fisc" is the official prosecutor.

² Cinone: a pet diminutive of Giacinto, as are Cinozzo, Cinoncello, Cinino, and various other forms occurring in this Book.

And chews Corderius³ with his morning crust!

Look eight years onward, and he's perched, 30 he's perched

Dapper and deft on stool beside this chair, Cinozzo, Cinoncello, who but he?

— Trying his milk-teeth on some crusty
case

Like this, papa shall triturate full soon
To smooth Papinianian⁴ pulp!

It trots
Already through my head, though noon

be now, Does supper-time and what belongs to

eve.
Dispose, O Don, o' the day, first work then

play!
— The proverb bids. And "then" means,

won't we hold
Our little yearly lovesome frolic feast, 40

Cinuolo's birth-night, Cinicello's own,
That makes gruff January grin perforce!

For too contagious grows the mirth, the warmth

Escaping from so many hearts at once — When the good wife, buxom and bonny

yet,
Jokes the hale grandsire, — such are just the sort

To go off suddenly, — he who hides the key

O' the box beneath his pillow every night — Which box may hold a parchment (someone thinks)

Will show a scribbled something like a 50

name
"Cinino, Ciniccino," near the end,

"To whom I give and I bequeath my lands,
"Estates, tenements, hereditaments,

"When I decease as honest grandsire ought."

Wherefore — yet this one time again perhaps —

Shan't my Orvieto fuddle his old nose!
Then, uncles, one or the other, well i' the

world,
May — drop in, merely? — trudge through rain and wind, Rather! The smell-feasts rouse them at the hint

There's cookery in a certain dwelling-place 60

Gossips, too, each with keepsake in his poke,

Will pick the way, thrird lane by lantern-
light,

And so find door, put galligaskin off
At entry of a decent domicile

³ Corderius: Mathurin Cordier, author of the most popular Latin school-book of the sixteenth century, the Colloquia Scholastica.

⁴ Papinianian: from Papinius, a Roman jurist of the beginning of the third century.

Cornered in snug Condotti, — all for love,
All to crush cup with Cinucciatolo!

Well,

Let others climb the heights o' the court,
the camp!

How vain are chambering and wantonness, Revel and rout and pleasures that make
mad!

Commend me to home-joy, the family
board,

Altar and hearth! These, with a brisk career,

A source of honest profit and good fame, Just so much work as keeps the brain from rust,

10 Just so much play as lets the heart expand, Honouring God and serving man, — I say,
These are reality, and all else, — fluff, Nutshell and naught, — thank Flaccus¹ for the phrase!

Suppose I had been Fisc, yet bachelor!
Why, work with a will, then! Wherefore lazy now?

Turn up the hour-glass, whence no sand-grain slips

But should have done its duty to the saint O' the day, the son and heir that's eight years old!

20 Let law come dimple Cinoncino's cheek,
And Latin duple Cinarello's chin,
The while we spread him fine and toss him
flat

This pulp that makes the pancake, trim our mass

Of matter into Argument the First,
Prime Pleading in defence of our accused, Which, once a-waft on paper wing, shall soar,

Shall signalise before applausive Rome
What study, and mayhap some mother-wit, Can do toward making Master fop and Fisc

Old bachelor Bottinius bite his thumb.

30 Now, how good God is! How falls plumb
to point

This murder, gives me Guido to defend Now, of all days i' the year, just when the boy

Verges on Virgil, reaches the right age
For some such illustration from his sire, Stimulus to himself! One might wait
years

And never find the chance which now finds
me!

The fact is, there's a blessing on the hearth,
A special providence for fatherhood!
Here's a man, and what's more, a noble, kills

40 — Not sneakingly but almost with parade—

¹ Flaccus: Horace, Sat. II, 5, 35, quassa nuce, a proverbial expression for something worthless.

Wife's father and wife's mother and wife's
self

That's mother's self of son and heir (like
mine!)

— And here stand I, the favoured advocate,

Who pluck this flower o' the field, no
Solomon

Was ever clothed in glorious gold to match,
And set the same in Cinoncino's cap!

I defend Guido and his comrades — I!
Pray God, I keep me humble: not to me —

Non nobis, Domine, sed tibi laus!

How the fop chuckled when they made 50 him Fisc!

We'll beat you, my Bottinius, all for love,
All for our tribute to Cinotto's day.

Why, 'sbuddikins, old Innocent himself May rub his eyes at the bustle, — ask

"What's this

"Rolling from out the rostrum, as a gust
"O' the *Pro Milone*² had been prisoned
there,

"And rattled Rome awake?" Awaken
Rome,

How can the Pope doze on in decency?
He needs must wake up also, speak his
word,

Have his opinion like the rest of Rome, 60
About this huge, this hurly-burly case:

He wants who can excogitate the truth, Give the result in speech, plain black and
white,

To mumble in the mouth and make his
own

— A little changed, good man, a little changed!

No matter, so his gratitude be moved,
By when my Giacintino gets of age, Mindful of who thus helped him at a pinch, Archangelus Procurator Pauperum — And proved Hortensius³ Redivivus! 70

Whew!
To earn the Est-est, merit the minced herb That mollifies the liver's leathery slice, With here a goose-foot, there a cock's-comb stuck,

Cemented in an element of cheese!

I doubt if dainties do the grandsire good:

Last June he had a sort of strangling . . .
bah!

He's his own master, and his will is made.
So—liver fizz, law flit and Latin fly

As we rub hands o'er dish by way of
grace!

May I lose cause if I vent one word more 80

Except, — with fresh-cut quill we ink the
white, —

P-r-o-pro Guidone et Sociis. There!

² Pro Milone: Cicero's great speech in defence of Milo on a charge of murder.

³ Hortensius: the great Roman orator, contemporary with Cicero.

Count Guido married — or, in Latin due, What? Duxit in uxorem? — common-
place!

Tædas jugales iniit, subiit, — ha!

He underwent the matrimonial torch?

Connubio stabili sibi iunxit, — hum!

In stable bond of marriage bound his own?

That's clear of any modern taint: and
yet . . .

Virgil is little help to who writes prose.

He shall attack me Terence with the dawn, 10 Shall Cinuccino! Mum, mind business,
Sir!

Thus circumstantially evolve we facts,

Ita se habet ideo series facti:

He wedded, — ah, with owls for augury!

Nupserat, heu sinistris avibus,

One of the blood Arezzo boasts her best,

Dominus Guido, nobili genere ortus,

Pompilia . . .

But the version afterward!

Curb we this ardour! Notes alone, to-day,

The speech to-morrow and the Latin last:

20 Such was the rule in Farinacci's time.

Indeed I hitched it into verse and good.

Unluckily, law quite absorbs a man,

Or else I think I too had poetised.

"Law is the pork substratum of the fry,

"Goose-foot and cock's-comb are Latin-
ity," —

And in this case, if circumstance assist,

We'll garnish law with idiom, never fear!

Out-of-the-way events extend our scope:

For instance, when Bottini brings his
charge,

30 "That letter which you say Pompilia
wrote, —

"To criminate her parents and herself

"And disengage her husband from the coil, —

"That, Guido Franceschini wrote, say we:

"Because Pompilia could nor read nor
write,

"Therefore he pencilled her such letter first,

"Then made her trace in ink the same
again."

-- Ha, my Bottini, have I thee on hip?

How will he turn this and break Tully's pate?

"Existimandum" (don't I hear the dog!)

40 "Quod Guido designaverit elementa"

"Dictæ epistolæ, quæ fuerint

"(Superinducto ab ea calamo)

"Notato atramento" — there's a style! —

"Quia ipsa scribere nesciebat." Boh!

Now, my turn! Either, Insulse! (I outburst)

Stupidly put! Inane is the response,

Inanis est responsio, or the like —

To-wit, that each of all those characters, Quod singula elementa epistolæ,

Had first of all been traced for her by him, 50

Fuerant per eum prius designata,

And then, the ink applied atop of that,

Et deinde, superinducta calamo,

The piece, she says, became her handiwork,

Per eam, efformata, ut ipsa asserit.

Inane were such response! (a second time:)

Her husband outlined her the whole, forsooth?

Vir ejus lineabat epistolam?

What, she confesses that she wrote the
thing,

Faetur eam scripsisse, (scorn that scatches!) 60

That she might pay obedience to her lord?

Ut viro obtemperaret, apices

(Here repeat charge with proper varied phrase)

Eo designante, ipsaque calamum

Super inducente? By such argument,

Ita pariter, she seeks to show the same,

(Ay, by Saint Joseph and what saints you please)

Epistolam ostendit, medius fidius,

No voluntary deed but fruit of force!

Non voluntarie sed coacte scriptam! 70

That's the way to write Latin, friend my

Fisc!

Bottini is a beast, one barbarous:

Look out for him when he attempts to say

"Armed with a pistol, Guido followed her!"

Will not I be beforehand with my Fisc,

Cut away phrase by phrase from under-
foot!

Guido Pompiliam — Guido thus his wife

Following with igneous engine, shall I have Armis munitus igneis persequens —

Arma sulphurea gestans, sulphury arms, 80

Or, might one style a pistol — popping-
piece?

Armatus breviori sclopolo?

We'll let him have been armed so, though it make

Somewhat against us: I had thought to
own —

Provided with a simple travelling-sword,

Ense solummodo viatorio

Instructus: but we'll grant the pistol here:

Better we lost the cause than lacked the gird

At the Fisc's Latin, lost the Judge's laugh!

It's Venturini that decides for style. 90

Tommati rather goes upon the law.

So, as to law, —

Ah, but with law ne'er hope

To level the fellow, — don't I know his trick!

How he draws up, ducks under, twists
aside!

He's a lean-gutted hectic rascal, fine

As pale-haired red-eyed ferret which pretends

'Tis ermine, pure soft snow from tail to snout.

He eludes law by piteous looks aloft,
Lets Latin glance off as he makes appeal To saint that's somewhere in the ceiling-
top:

Do you suppose I don't conceive the beast?
Plague of the ermine-vermin! For it takes,

It takes, and here's the fellow Fisc, you see,
And Judge, you'll not be long in seeing
next!

Confound the fop — he's now at work like
me:

Enter his study, as I seem to do,
Hear him read out his writing to himself!
I know he writes as if he spoke: I hear The hoarse shrill throat, see shut eyes, neck shot-forth,

— I see him strain on tiptoe, soar and pour Eloquence out, nor stay nor stint at all — Perorate in the air, then quick to press With the product! What abuse of type and sheet!

He'll keep clear of my cast, my logic-throw,
Let argument slide, and then deliver swift Some bowl from quite an unguessed point of stand —

Having the luck o' the last word, the reply!
A plaguy cast, a mortifying stroke:
You face a fellow — cries "So, there you
stand?"

'But I discourteous jump clean o'er your
head!

"You take ship-carpentry for pilotage,
"Stop rat-holes, while a sea sweeps through the breach, —

"Hammer and fortify at puny points?
"Do, clamp and tenon, make all tight and safe!

"'Tis here and here and here you ship a
sea,

"No good of your stopped leaks and little-
ness!"

Yet what do I name "little and a leak"?
The main defence o' the murder's used to
death,

By this time, dry bare bones, no scrap we pick:

Safer I worked the new, the unforeseen, The nice by-stroke, the fine and improv-vised

Point that can titillate the brain o' the Bench

Torpid with over-teaching, long ago!
As if Tommati (that has heard, reheard And heard again, first this side and then
that —

Guido and Pietro, Pietro and Guido, din And deafen, full three years, at each long ear)

Don't want amusement for instruction
now,

Won't rather feel a flea run o'er his ribs,

Than a daw settle heavily on his head!
Oh I was young and had the trick of fence, Knew subtle pass and push with careless
right —

My left arm ever quiet behind back, With dagger ready: not both hands to blade!

Puff and blow, put the strength out, Blun-derbore!

There's my subordinate, young Spreti, now Pedant and prig, — he'll pant away a 50
proof,

That's his way!

Now for mine — to rub some life Into one's choppy fingers this cold day!

I trust Cinuzzo ties on tippet, guards
The precious throat on which so much depends!

Guido must be all goose-flesh in his hole, Despite the prison-straw: bad Carnival For captives! no sliced fry for him, poor
Count!

Carnival-time, — another providence!

The town a-swarm with strangers to amuse,
To edify, to give one's name and fame 60

In charge of, till they find, some future day, Cintino come and claim it, his name too,
Pledge of the pleasantness they owe papa — Who else was it cured Rome of her great qualms,

When she must needs have her own judgment? — ay,

When all her topping wits had set to work, Pronounced already on the case: mere
boys,

Twice Cineruggiolo's age with half his
sense,

As good as tell me, when I cross the court,
"Master Arcangeli!" (plucking at my 70 gown)

"We can predict we comprehend your play,
"We'll help you save your client." Tra-la-la!

I've travelled ground, from childhood to this hour,

To have the town anticipate my track?
The old fox takes the plain and velvet
path,

The young hound's predilection, — prints
the dew,

Don't he, to suit their pulpy pads of paw?
No! Burying nose deep down i' the briery bush,

Thus I defend Count Guido.

Where are we weak?
First, which is foremost in advantage too, 80
Our murder, — we call, killing, — is a
fact

Confessed, defended, made a boast of:
good!

To think the Fisc claimed use of torture
here,

And got thereby avowal plump and plain That gives me just the chance I wanted, — scope

Not for brute-force but ingenuity, Explaining matters, not denying them!
One may dispute, — as I am bound to do,
And shall, — validity of process here:
Inasmuch as a noble is exempt From torture which plebeians undergo In such a case: for law is lenient, lax,

- 10 Remits the torture to a nobleman Unless suspicion be of twice the strength Attaches to a man born vulgarly:
We don't card silk with comb that dresses wool.

Moreover 'twas severity undue
In this case, even had the lord been loud.
What utters, on this head, our oracle,
Our Farinacci,¹ my Gamaliel erst, In those immortal "Questions"? This I quote:

- "Of all the tools at Law's disposal, sure 20 "That named Vigiliarum is the best — "That is, the worst — to whoso needs must bear:

"Lasting, as it may do, from some seven hours

"To ten; (beyond ten, we've no precedent;

"Certain have touched their ten, but, bah, they died!")

"It does so efficaciously convince,
"That, — speaking by much observation
here, —

"Out of each hundred cases, by my count,
"Never I knew of patients beyond four

- "Withstand its taste, or less than ninety-six 30 "End by succumbing: only martyrs four,
"Of obstinate silence, guilty or no, —
against

"Ninety-six full confessors, innocent
"Or otherwise, — so shrewd a tool have
we!"

No marvel either: in unwary hands,
Death on the spot is no rare consequence:
As indeed all but happened in this case
To one of ourselves, our young tough peasant-friend

The accomplice called Baldeschi: they were rough,

Dosed him with torture as you drench a
horse,

- 40 Not modify your treatment to a man:
So, two successive days he fainted dead,
And only on the third essay, gave up, Confessed like flesh and blood. We could reclaim, —

author of a volume of Varia Quaestiones and other legal treatises, which were regarded as of very high authority during the seventeenth century. In 1590 he defended Beatrice Cenci on the charge of murdering her father,

Blockhead Bottini giving cause enough!
But no, — we'll take it as spontaneously Confessed: we'll have the murder beyond
doubt.

Ah, fortunate (the poet's word² reversed)
Inasmuch as we know our happiness!

Had the antagonist left dubiety, Here were we proving murder a mere myth, 50 And Guido innocent, ignorant, absent, —
ay,

Absent! He was — why, where should Christian be? —

Engaged in visiting his proper church,
The duty of us all at Christmas-time,

When Caponsacchi, the seducer, stung
To madness by his relegation, cast

About him and contrived a remedy In murder: since opprobrium broke

afresh,
By birth o' the babe, on him the imputed

sire,
He it was quietly sought to smother up 60
His shame and theirs together, — killed the three,

And fled — (go seek him where you please to search) —

Just at the time when Guido, touched by
grace,

Devotions ended, hastened to the spot,
Meaning to pardon his convicted wife,

"Neither do I condemn thee, go in
peace!" —

And thus arrived i' the nick of time to catch

The charge o' the killing, though great-heartedly

He came but to forgive and bring to life.
Doubt ye the force of Christmas on the 70
soul?

"Is thine eye evil because mine is good?"

So, doubtless, had I needed argue here But for the full confession round and sound!

Thus might you wrong some kingly al-chemist, —

Whose concern should not be with showing brass

Transmuted into gold, but triumphing, Rather, about his gold changed out of

brass,
Not vulgarly to the mere sight and touch,

But in the idea, the spiritual display,
The apparition buoyed by winged words 80 Hovering above its birth-place in the

brain, —
Thus would you wrong this excellent personage

Forced, by the gross need, to gird apron
round,

² The poet's word: "O fortunatos nimium, sua si bona norint, Agricolas" (Virgil, Georg.
II. 458).

Plant forge, light fire, ply bellows, — in a word, Demonstrate: when a faulty pipkin's crack May disconcert you his presumptive truth! Here were I hanging to the testimony Of one of these poor rustics — four, ye gods!
 Whom the first taste of friend the Fiscal's cord May drive into undoing my whole speech, Undoing, on his birthday, — what is worse, —
 My son and heir!

I wonder, all the same,
 10 Not so much at those peasants' lack of heart;
 But — Guido Franceschini, nobleman, Bear pain no better! Everybody knows It used once, when my father was a boy,
 To form a proper, nay, important point
 P' the education of our well-born youth,
 That they took torture handsomely at need,
 Without confessing in this clownish guise.
 Each noble had his rack for private use,
 And would, for the diversion of a guest, 20 Bid it be set up in the yard of arms,
 And take thereon his hour of exercise, —
 Command the varletry stretch, strain their best, While friends looked on, admired my lord could smile
 'Mid tugging which had caused an ox to roar.
 Men are no longer men!

— And advocates

No longer Farinacci, let us add,
 If I one more time fly from point proposed!
 So, Vindicatio, — here begins the speech!
Honoris causa; thus we make our stand: 30 Honour in us had injury, we prove.
 Or if we fail to prove such injury
 More than misprision of the fact, — what then?

It is enough, authorities declare,
 If the result, the deed in question now,
 Be caused by confidence that injury Is veritable and no figment: since,
 What, though proved fancy afterward, Seemed fact
 At the time, they argue shall excuse result.
 That which we do, persuaded of good cause 40 For what we do, hold justifiable! —
 So casuists bid: man, bound to do his best,
 They would not have him leave that best undone
 And mean to do his worst, — though fuller light Show best was worst and worst would have been best.

Act by the present light! — they ask of man.

Ultra quod hic non agitur, besides It is not anyway our business here,
De probatione adulterii,
 To prove what we thought crime was crime indeed, Ad irrogandam penam, and require 50
 Its punishment: such nowise do we seek:
Sed ad effectum, but 'tis our concern,
Excusandi, here to simply find excuse, Occidore, for who did the killing-work, Et ad illius defensionem, (mark The difference) and defend the man, just that!

Quo casu levior probatio Exuberaret, to which end far lighter proof Suffices than the prior case would claim:
 It should be always harder to convict, 60
 In short, than to establish innocence.
 Therefore we shall demonstrate first of all That Honour is a gift of God to man Precious beyond compare: which natural sense Of human rectitude and purity, — Which white, man's soul is born with, — brooks no touch:
 Therefore, the sensitivest spot of all,
 Wounded by any wafture breathed from black,
 Is, — honour within honour, like the eye Centred i' the ball, — the honour of our 70
 wife.

Touch us o' the pupil of our honour, then,
 Not actually, — since so you slay outright, —

But by a gesture simulating touch, Presumable mere menace of such taint, —
 This were our warrant for eruptive ire
 "To whose dominion I impose no end."

(Virgil, now, should not be too difficult To Cinoncinio, — say, the early books.
 Pen, truce to further gambols! Pescimur!)

Nor can revenge of injury done here 80
 To the honour proved the life and soul of us,

Be too excessive, too extravagant:
 Such wrong seeks and must have complete revenge.

Show we this, first, on the mere natural ground:

Begin at the beginning, and proceed Incontrovertibly. Theodoric,²
 In an apt sentence Cassiodorus cites, Propounds for basis of all household law —
 I hardly recollect it, but it ends,

¹ To whose dominion, &c.: "His ego nec metas rerum nec tempora pono; Imperium sine fine dedi" (Virgil, Æn. I. 278, 279).

² Theodoric: the Goth, king of Italy, 493 526. Cassiodorus was his secretary.

"Bird mates with bird, beast genders with his like,
'And brooks no interference." Bird and
beast?

The very insects . . . if they wive or no,
How dare I say when Aristotle doubts?
But the presumption is they likewise wive,
At least the nobler sorts; for take the bee
As instance, — copying King Solomon, — Why that displeasure of the bee to aught Which savours of incontinency, makes 10 The unchaste a very horror to the hive?

Whence comes it bees obtain their epithet
Of castæ apes, notably "the chaste"?
Because, ingeniously saith Scaliger, (The young sage, — see his book of Table-talk)

"Such is their hatred of immodest act, "They fall upon the offender, sting to
death."

I mind a passage much confirmative I' the Idyllist (though I read him Latinised)

"Why," asks a shepherd, "is this bank unfit

20 "For celebration of our vernal loves?"

"Oh swain," returns the instructed shepherdess,

"Bees swarm here, and would quick resent our warmth!"

Only cold-blooded fish lack instinct here, Nor gain nor guard connubiality:

But beasts, quadrupedal, mammiferous,
Do credit to their beasthood: witness him
That Ælian¹ cites, the noble elephant, (Or if not Ælian, somebody as sage)

30 Who seeing, much offence beneath his nose, His master's friend exceed in courtesy
The due allowance to his master's wife, Taught them good manners and killed
both at once,

Making his master and the world admire.
Indubitably, then, that master's self, Favoured by circumstance, had done the
same

Or else stood clear rebuked by his own
beast.

Adeo, ut qui honorem pernit, thus,
Who values his own honour not a straw, — Et non recuperare curat, nor 40 Labours by might and main to salve its

wound,

Se ulciscendo, by revenging him,
Nil differat a belluis, is a brute, Quinimo irrationabilior Ipsismet belluis, nay, contrariwise, Much more irrational than brutes themselves,

Should be considered, reputetur! How?
If a poor animal feel honour smart, Taught by blind instinct nature plants in
him,

Shall man, — confessed creation's master-stroke,

Nay, intellectual glory, nay, a god, 51
Nay, of the nature of my Judges here, — Shall man prove the insensible, the block, The blot of the earth he crawls on to disgrace?

(Come, that's both solid and poetic!) Man Derogate, live for the low tastes alone,
Mean creeping cares about the animal life?
Absit such homage to vile flesh and blood!

(May Gigia have remembered, nothing stings

Fried liver out of its monotony
Of richness, like a root of fennel, chopped 60 Fine with the parsley: parsley-sprigs, I
said —

Was there need I should say "and fennel
too"?

But no, she cannot have been so obtuse!
To our argument! The fennel will be chopped.)

From beast to man next mount we — ay, but, mind,

Still mere man, not yet Christian, — that,
in time!

Not too fast, mark you! 'Tis on Heathen grounds

We next defend our act: then, fairly urge —

If this were done of old, in a green tree, Allowed in the Spring rawness of our kind, 70
What may be licensed in the Autumn dry
And ripe, the latter harvest-tide of man?
If, with his poor and primitive half-lights, The Pagan, whom our devils served for
gods,

Could stigmatise the breach of marriage-
vow

As that which blood, blood only might efface, —

Absolve the husband, outraged, whose
revenge

Anticipated law, plied sword himself, — How with the Christian in full blaze of noon?

Shall not he rather double penalty, 81
Multiply vengeance, than, degenerate,

Let privilege he minished, droop, decay?
Therefore set forth at large the ancient law!
Superabundant the examples be

To pick and choose from. The Athenian Code,

Solon's, the name is serviceable, — then,
The Laws of the Twelve Tables, that fifteenth, —

"Romulus" likewise rolls out round and
large;

The Julian; the Cornelian;² Gracchus'
Law:

¹ Ælian: in his De Nat. Anim. XI. 15.

² The Julian; the Cornelian: see Book I.
p. 11. 46. 47.

So old a chime, the bells ring of themselves !
 Spreti can set that going if he please,
 I point you, for my part, the belfry plain,
 Intent to rise from dusk, diluculum,
 Into the Christian day shall broaden next.

First, the fit compliment to His Holiness Happily reigning: then sustain the point —
 All that was long ago declared as law
 By the natural revelation, stands confirmed

10 By Apostle and Evangelist and Saint, — To-wit — that Honour is man's supreme
 good.

Why should I baulk Saint Jerome of his
 phrase?

Ubi honor non est, where no honour is,
Ibi contemptus est; and where contempt, Ibi injuria frequens; and where that,
 The frequent injury, ibi et indignatio;
 And where the indignation, ibi quies
Nulla: and where there is no quietude, Why, ibi, there, the mind is often cast 20 Down from the heights where it proposed to dwell,

Mens a proposito sæpe dejicitur.
 And naturally the mind is so cast down, Since harder 'tis, quum difficilius sit,
Iram cohibere, to coerce one's wrath, Quam miracula facere, than work miracles, —

So Gregory smiles in his First Dialogue.
 Whence we infer, the ingenuous soul, the
 man

Who makes esteem of honour and repute, Whenever honour and repute are touched, 30 Arrives at term of fury and despair, Loses all guidance from the reason-check:

As in delirium or a frenzy-fit,
 Nor fury nor despair he satiates, — no,
 Not even if he attain the impossible, O'erturn the hinges of the universe To annihilate — not whoso caused the smart

Solely, the author simply of his pain,
 But the place, the memory, vituperii,
 O' the shame and scorn: quia, — says
 Solomon,

40 (The Holy Spirit speaking by his mouth In Proverbs, the sixth chapter near the
 end)

— Because, the zeal and fury of a man, Zelus et juror viri, will not spare,
Non parcat, in the day of his revenge,
In die vindictæ, nor will acquiesce, Nec acquiescet, through a person's prayers, Cujuslam precibus, — nec suscipiet, Nor yet take, pro redemptione, for Redemption, dona plurium, gifts of friends, 50 Mere money-payment to compound for ache.

Who recognises not my client's case?
 Whereto, as strangely consentaneous here,

Adduce Saint Bernard in the Epistle writ To Robertulus, his nephew: "Too much
 grief,

"Dolor quippe nimius non deliberat,

"Does not excogitate propriety,

"Non verecundatur, nor knows shame at
 all,

"Non consulit rationem, nor consults

"Reason, non dignitatis metuit

"Damnum, nor dreads the loss of dignity; 60

"Modum et ordinem, order and the mode,

"Ignorat, it ignores:" why, trait for trait,

Was ever portrait limned so like the life?

(By Cavalier Maratta, shall I say?

I hear he's first in reputation now.)

Yes, that of Samson in the Sacred Text

That's not so much the portrait as the man!

Samson in Gaza was the antetype

Of Guido at Rome: observe the Nazarite!

Blinded he was, — an easy thing to bear: 70

Intrepidly he took imprisonment,

Gyves, stripes and daily labour at the mill:

But when he found himself, i' the public

place,

Destined to make the common people

sport,

Disdain burned up with such an impetus

I' the breast of him that, all the man one

fire,

Moriatur, roared he, let my soul's self die,

Anima mea, with the Philistines!

Sp, pulled down pillar, roof, and death

and all,

Multosque plures interfecit, ay, 80

And many more he killed thus, moriens,

Dying, quam vivus, than in his whole life,

Occiderat, he ever killed before.

Are these things writ for no example, Sirs?

One instance more, and let me see who doubts!

Our Lord Himself, made all of mansue-

tude,

Sealing the sum of sufferance up, received

Opprobrium, contumely and buffeting

Without complaint: but when He found

Himself

Touched in His honour never so little for 90

once,

Then outbroke indignation pent before —

"Honorem meum nemini dabo!" "No,

"My honour I to nobody will give!"

And certainly the example so hath wrought,

That whosoever, at the proper worth,

Apprises worldly honour and repute,

Esteems it nobler to die honoured man

Beneath Mannaia, than live centuries

Disgraced in the eye o' the world. We find Saint Paul

No recreant to this faith delivered once: 100

"Far worthier were it that I died," cries

he,

Expediit mihi magis mori, "than

"That anyone should make my glory void,"

Quam ut gloriam meam quis evacuet!

See, ad Corinthenses: whereupon Saint Ambrose makes a comment with much fruit,

Doubtless my Judges long since laid to heart,

So I desist from bringing forward here. (I can't quite recollect it.)

Have I proved

Satis superque, both enough and to spare, That Revelation old and new admits 10 The natural man may effervesce in ire, O'erflood earth, o'erfroth heaven with foamy rage,

At the first puncture to his self-respect?

Then, Sirs, this Christian dogma, this law-bud

Full-blown now, soon to bask the absolute flower

Of Papal doctrine in our blaze of day, — Bethink you, shall we miss one promise-streak,

One doubtful birth of dawn crepuscular, One dew-drop comfort to humanity, Now that the chalice teems with noonday wine?

20 Yea, argue Molinists who bar revenge — Referring just to what makes out our case! Under old dispensation, argue they, The doom of the adulterous wife was death, Stoning by Moses' law. "Nay, stone her not,

"Put her away!" next legislates our Lord; And last of all, "Nor yet divorce a wife!" Ordains the Church, "she typifies ourself, "The Bride no fault shall cause to fall from Christ."

Then, as no jot nor tittle of the Law

30 Has passed away — which who presumes to doubt?

As not one word of Christ is rendered vain —

Which, could it be though heaven and earth should pass?

— Where do I find my proper punishment For my adulterous wife, I humbly ask Of my infallible Pope, — who now remits Even the divorce allowed by Christ in lieu Of lapidation Moses licensed me?

The Gospel checks the Law which throws the stone,

The Church tears the divorce-bill Gospel grants:

40 Shall wives sin and enjoy impunity?

What profits me the fulness of the days, The final dispensation, I demand, Unless Law, Gospel and the Church sub-join

"But who hath barred thee primitive revenge,

"Which, like fire damped and dammed up, burns more fierce?"

"Use thou thy natural privilege of man, "Else wery thou found like those old ingrate Jews,

"Despite the manna-banquet on the board,

"A-longing after melons, cucumbers,

"And such like trash of Egypt left behind!" 50

(There was one melon had improved our soup:

But did not Cinoncino need the rind To make a boat with? So I seem to think.)

Law, Gospel and the Church — from these we leap

To the very last revelation, easy rule Befitting the well-born and thorough-bred O' the happy day we live in, not the dark O' the early rude and acorn-eating race.

"Behold," quoth James, "we bridle in a horse

"And turn his body as we would thereby!" 60

Yea, but we change the bit to suit the growth, And rasp our colt's jaw with a rugged spike

We hasten to remit our managed steed Who wheels round at persuasion of a touch. Civilisation bows to decency, The acknowledged use and wont: 'tis manners, — mild

But yet imperative law, — which make the man.

Thus do we pay the proper compliment To rank, and that society of Rome, Hath so obliged us by its interest, Taken our client's part instinctively, As unaware defending its own cause.

What dictum doth Society lay down I' the case of one who hath a faithless wife? Wherewithal should the husband cleanse his way?

Be patient and forgive? Oh, language fails, —

Shrinks from depicting his turpitude! For if wronged husband raise not hue and cry,

Quod si maritus de adulterio non Conqueretur, he's presumed a — foh! 80

Presumitur leno: so, complain he must. But how complain? At your tribunal, lords?

Far weightier challenge suits your sense, I wot!

You sit not to have gentlemen propose Questions gentility can itself discuss.

Did not you prove that to our brother Paul?

The Abate, quum judicialiter Prosequeretur, when he tried the law,

Guidonis causam, in Count Guido's case, Accidit ipsi, this befell himself, Quod risum moverit et cachinnos, that He moved to mirth and cachinnation, all Or nearly all, jere in omnibus Etiā sensatis et cordatis, men Strong-sensed, sound-hearted, nay, the very Court,

Ipsimet in iudiciis, I might add,
Non tamen dicam. In a cause like this,
 So multiplied were reasons pro and con, Delicate, intertwined and obscure,
 That Law refused loan of a finger-tip
 To unravel, readjust the hopeless twine, Since, half-a-dozen steps outside Law's
 seat,

There stood a foolish trifler with a tool
 A-dangle to no purpose by his side,
 Had clearly cut the embroilment in a trice.
Asserunt enim unanimiter Doctores, for the Doctors all assert,
 So That husbands, quod mariti, must be held Viles, cornuti repulantur, vile, Fronts branching forth a florid infamy, Si propriis manibus, if with their own
 hands,

Non sumunt, they fail straight to take
 revenge,

Vindictam, but expect the deed be done
 By the Court — expectant illam feri Per iudices, qui summopere vident, which Gives an enormous guffaw for reply, Et cachinnantur. For he ran away,

Deliquit enim, just that he might 'scape
 The censure of both counsellors and crowd,

Ut vulgi et doctorum evitaret Censuram, and lest so he superadd
 To loss of honour ignominy too, Et sic ne istam quoque ignominiam Amissio honori superadderet.

My lords, my lords, the inconsiderate step Was — we referred ourselves to Law at all!
 Twit me not with "Law else had punished
 you!"

So Each punishment of the extra-legal step,
 To which the high-born preferably revert,
 Is ever for some oversight, some slip I' the taking vengeance, not for vengeance' self.

A good thing, done unhandsomely, turns
 ill;

And never yet lacked ill the law's rebuke.
 For pregnant instance, let us contemplate
 The luck of Leonardus, — see at large Of Sicily's Decisions sixty-first.

This Leonard finds his wife is false: what
 then?

50 He makes her own son snare her, and entice

Out of the town walls to a private walk Wherein he slays her with commodity.
 They find her body half-devoured by dogs:
 Leonard is tried, convicted, punished, sent To labour in the galleys seven years long:

Why? For the murder? Nay, but for the mode!

Malus modus occidendi, ruled the Court,
 An ugly mode of killing, nothing more!
 Another fructuous sample, — see "De Re
 "Criminali," in Matthæus' divine piece. 60

Another husband, in no better plight, Simulates absence, thereby tempts his wife;
 On whom he falls, out of sly ambuscade, Backed by a brother of his, and both of
 them

Armed to the teeth with arms that law had blamed.

Nimis dolose, overwily, Fuisse operatum, did they work, Pronounced the law: had all been fairly
 done

Law had not found him worthy, as she did,
 Of four years' exile. Why cite more? 70
 Enough

Is good as a feast — (unless a birthday-
 feast

For one's Cinuccio) so, we finish here.
 My lords, we rather need defend our-
 selves

Inasmuch as, for a twinkling of an eye,
 We hesitatingly appealed to law, —
 Than need deny that, on mature advice, We blushing bethought us, bade revenge

Back to its simple proper private way
 Of decent self-dealt gentlemanly death.
 Judges, here is the law, and here beside, 80
 The testimony! Look to it!

Pause and breathe!
 So far is only too plain; we must watch:
 Bottini will scarce hazard an attack
 Here: best anticipate the fellow's play,
 And guard the weaker places — warily
 ask,

What if considerations of a sort, Reasons of a kind, arise from out the strange

Peculiar unforeseen new circumstance
 Of this our (candour owns) abnormal act,
 To bar the right of us revenging so? 90
 "Impunity were otherwise your meed:

"Go slay your wife and welcome," — may be urged, —

"But why the innocent old couple slay,
 "Pietro, Violante? You may do enough,
 "Not too much, not exceed the golden
 mean:

"Neither brute-beast nor Pagan, Gentile, Jew,

"Nor Christian, no nor votarist of the mode,

"Is justified to push revenge so far."

No, indeed? Why, thou very sciolist!
 The actual wrong, Pompilia seemed to 100
 do,

Was virtual wrong done by the parents
 here —

Imposing her upon us as their child — Themselves allow: then, her fault was their fault,

Her punishment be theirs accordingly!
But wait a little, sneak not off so soon!
Was this cheat solely harm to Guido,
pray?

The precious couple you call innocent, — Why, they were felons that Law failed to clutch,

Qui ut fraudarent, who that they might rob,

Legitime vocatos, folk law called,

20 Ad fidei commissum, true heirs to the Trust,

Partum supposuerunt, feigned this birth, Immemores reos factos esse, blind

To the fact that, guilty, they incurred
thereby,

Ultimi supplicii, hanging or what's worse.
Do you blame us that we turn Law's instruments,

Not mere self-seekers, — mind the public weal,

Nor make the private good our sole concern?

That having — shall I say — secured a thief,

Not simply we recover from his pouch

20 The stolen article our property, But also pounce upon our neighbour's
purse

We opportunely find reposing there, And do him justice while we right ourselves?

He owes us, for our part, a drubbing say, But owes our neighbour just a dance i' the
air

Under the gallows: so, we throttle him.

That neighbour's Law, that couple are the Thief,

We are the over ready to help Law —

Zeal of her house hath eaten us up: for
which,

30 Can it be, Law intends to eat up us, Crudum Priamum,¹ devour poor Priam
raw,

('Twas Jupiter's own joke) with babes to boot,

Priamique pisinnos, in Homeric phrase?
Shame! — and so ends my period prettily.

But even, — prove the pair not culpable, Free as unborn babe from connivance at,

Participation in, their daughter's fault:
Ours the mistake. Is that a rare event?

Non semel, it is anything but rare,

10 In contingentia facti, that by chance,

Impunes evaserunt, go scot-free, Qui, such well-meaning people as our-
selves,

Iusto dolore moti, who aggrieved
With cause, apposuerunt manus, lay Rough hands, in innocentes, on wrong
heads.

Cite me an illustrative case in point:

Mulier Smirnea quædam, good my lords,
A gentlewoman lived in Smyrna once, Virum et filium ex eo conceptum, who Both husband and her son begot by him Killed, interfecerat, ex quo, because, 5 Vir filium suum perdidit, her spouse Had been beforehand with her, killed her
son,

Matrimonii primi, of a previous bed.

Deinde accusata, then accused,

Apud Dolabellam, before him that sat

Proconsul, nec duabus cædibus

Contaminatam liberare, nor

To liberate a woman doubly-dyed

With murder, voluit, made he up his mind, 6

Nec condemnare, nor to doom to death,

Iusto dolore impulsam, one impelled

By just grief; sed remisit, but sent her up

Ad Areopagum, to the Hill of Mars,

Sapientissimorum judicium

Cælum, to that assembly of the sage

Paralleled only by my judges here;

Ubi, cognito de causa, where, the cause

Well weighed, responsum est, they gave
reply,

Ut ipsa et accusator, that both sides 7

O' the suit, redirent, should come back
again,

Post centum annos, after a hundred years,

For judgment; et sic, by which sage decree,

Duplici parricidio rea, one

Convicted of a double parricide,

Quamvis etiam innocentem, though in
truth

Out of the pair, one innocent at least

She, occidisset, plainly had put to death,

Undequaque, yet she altogether 'scaped,

Evasit impunis. See the case at length 8

In Valerius, fittingly styled Maximus,

That eighth book of his Memorable Facts.

Nor Cyriacus cites beside the mark:

Similiter uxor quæ mandaverat,

Just so, a lady who had taken care,

Homicidium viri, that her lord be killed,

Ex denegatione debiti,

For denegation of a certain debt,

Matrimonialis, he was loth to pay,

Fuit pecuniaria multa, was Amerced in a pecuniary mulct,

Punita, et ad penam, and to pains,

Temporalem, for a certain space of time,

In monasterio, in a convent.

(Ay,

In monasterio! He mismanages

¹ Crudum Priamum . . . Priamique pisinnos: a line from a translation of Homer by Attius Labeo. The translation as a whole is lost, but this line (Il. IV. 35) is preserved by a scholiast on Persius.

In with the ablative, the accusative!
I had hoped to have hitched the villain into verse
For a gift, this very day, a complete list
O' the prepositions each with proper case, Telling a story, long was in my head.
"What prepositions take the accusative?
Ad to or at — who saw the cat? — down to Ob, for, because of, keep her claws off!" Tush!

Law in a man takes the whole liberty:
The muse is fettered: just as Ovid found it)

And now, sea widens and the coast is clear.
What of the dubious act you bade excuse?
Surely things broaden, brighten, till at length
Remains — so far from act that needs defence —

Apology to make for act delayed
One minute, let alone eight mortal months Of hesitation! "Why procrastinate?"
(Out with it, my Bottinius, ease thyself!)
"Right, promptly done, is twice right: right delayed

"Turns wrong. We grant you should have killed your wife,

"But killed o' the moment, at the meeting
her

"In company with the priest: then did the
tongue

"O' the Brazen Head give licence, 'Time is
now!'

"Wait to make mind up? 'Time is past' it peals.

"Friend, you are competent to mastery
"O' the passions that confessedly explain

"An outbreak: you allow an interval,
"And then break out as if time's clock still clanged.

"You have forfeited your chance, and flat you fall

"Into the commonplace category
"Of men bound to go softly all their days,
"Obeying Law."

Now, which way make response?
What was the answer Guido gave, himself?
— That so to argue came of ignorance

How honour bears a wound. "For, wound," said he,

"My body, and the smart soon mends and
ends:

"While, wound my soul where honour sits and rules,

"Longer the sufferance, stronger grows the
pain,

"Being ex incontinenti, fresh as first."

But try another tack, urge common sense By way of contrast: say — Too true, my lords!

We did demur, awhile did hesitate: Since husband sure should let a scruple
speak

Ere he slay wife, — for his own safety,
lords!

Carpers abound in this misjudging world:
Moreover, there's a nicety in law

That seems to justify them should they carp.

Suppose the source of injury a son, —
Father may slay such son yet run no risk:

Why graced with such a privilege? Be- 54
cause

A father so incensed with his own child, Or must have reason, or believe he has:

Quia semper, seeing that in such event, Presumitur, the law is bound suppose,

Quod capiat pater, that the sire must take,
Bonum consilium pro filio,

The best course as to what befits his boy, Through instinct, ex instinctu, of mere
love,

Amoris, and, paterni, fatherhood;
Quam confidentiam, which confidence, 62

Non habet, law declines to entertain, De viro, of the husband: where finds he

An instinct that compels him love his wife?
Rather is he presumably her foe.

So, let him ponder long in this bad world
Ere do the simplest act of justice.

But

Again — and here we brush Bottini's
breast —

Object you, "See the danger of delay!
"Suppose a man murdered my friend last
month:

"Had I come up and killed him for his 70
pains

"In rage, I had done right, allows the
law:

"I meet him now and kill him in cold
blood,

"I do wrong, equally allows the law:
"Wherein do actions differ, yours and
mine?"

In plenitudine intellectus es?
Hast thy wits, Fisc? To take such slayer's life,

Returns it life to thy slain friend at all?
Had he stolen ring instead of stabbing
friend, —

To-day, to-morrow or next century, Meeting the thief, thy ring upon his 84
thumb,

Thou justifiably hadst wrung it thence:
So, couldst thou wrench thy friend's life back again,

Though prisoned in the bosom of his foe.
Why, law would look complacent on thy wrath.

Our case is, that the thing we lost, we
found:

The honour, we were robbed of eight months since,

Being recoverable at any day
By death of the delinquent. Go thy ways!

Ere thou hast learned law, will be much
to do,
As said the gaby while he shod the goose.
Nay, if you urge me, interval was none!
From the inn to the villa — blank or else a bar

Of adverse and contrarious incident Solid between us and our just revenge!
What with the priest who flourishes his
blade,

The wife who like a fury flings at us,
The crowd — and then the capture, the appeal

10 To Rome, the journey there, the jaunting
thence

To shelter at the House of Convertites, The visits to the Villa, and so forth, Where was one minute left us all this while
To put in execution that revenge We planned o' the instant? — as it were, plumped down

O' the spot, some eight months since, which round sound egg, Rome, more propitious than our nest, should hatch!

Object not, "You reached Rome on Christmas-eve,

20 "And, despite liberty to act at once,
"Waited a whole and indecorous week!"
Hath so the Molinism, the canker, lords, Eaten to our bone? Is no religion left?
No care for aught held holy by the Church?
What, would you have us skip and miss those Feasts

O' the Natal Time, must we go prosecute Secular business on a sacred day?
Should not the merest charity expect,
Setting our poor concerns aside for once,
We hurried to the song matutinal

30 I' the Sistine, and pressed forward for the Mass

The Cardinal that's Camerlengo¹ chaunts, Then rushed on to the blessing of the Hat

And Rapier, which the Pope sends to what prince

Has done most detriment to the Infidel — And thereby whetted courage if 'twere blunt?

Meantime, allow we kept the house a
week,

Suppose not we were idle in our mew!
Picture us raging here and raving there — "Money?" I need none. "Friends?"
The word is null.

40 "Restore the white was on that shield of
mine

"Borne at" . . . wherever might be shield to bear.

"I see my grandsire, he who fought so well

¹ Camerlengo: the chamberlain of the Pope, who ranks highest among the cardinals, and presides during a vacancy in the Holy See.

"At" . . . here find out and put in time and place,
Or else invent the fight his grandsire fought:

"I see this! I see that!"

(See nothing else,
Or I shall scarce see lamb's fry in an hour!
What to the uncle, as I bid advance The smoking dish? "Fry suits a tender tooth!"

"Behoves we care a little for our kin —

"You, Sir, — who care so much for cousin-
ship

"As come to your poor loving nephew's feast!"

He has the reversion of a long lease yet — Land to bequeath! He loves lamb's fry, I know!)

Here fall to be considered those same six Qualities; what Bottini needs must call
So many aggravations of our crime, Parasite-growth upon mere murder's
back.

We summarily might dispose of such By some off-hand and jaunty fling, some skit —

"So, since there's proved no crime to aggravate,

"A fico for your aggravations, Fisc!" No, — handle mischief rather, — play with spells

Were meant to raise a spirit, and laugh
the while

We show that did he rise we stand his
match!

Therefore, first aggravation: we made
up —

Over and above our simple murderous
selves —

A regular assemblage of armed men, Coadunatio armatorum, — ay, Unluckily it was the very judge

That sits in judgment on our cause to-day Who passed the law as Governor of Rome:

"Four men armed," — though for lawful purpose, mark!

Much more for an acknowledged crime, —
"shall die."

We five were armed to the teeth, meant murder too?

Why, that's the very point that saves us,
Fisc!

Let me instruct you. Crime nor done nor meant, —

You punish still who arm and congregate:
For wherefore use bad means to a good
end?

Crime being meant not done, — you punish still

The means to crime, whereon you haply
pounce,

Though accident have baulked them of effect.
 But crime not only compassed but complete, Meant and done too? Why, since you have the end,
 Be that your sole concern, nor mind those means No longer to the purpose! Murdered we?
 (— Which, that our luck was in the present case, Quod contigisse in presenti casu,
 Is palpable, manibus palpatum est —)
 Make murder out against us, nothing else!
 Of many crimes committed with a view
 To one main crime, Law overlooks the less, Intent upon the large. Suppose a man Having in view commission of a theft, Climbs the town-wall: 'tis for the theft he hangs,
 In case he stands convicted of such theft:
 Law remits whipping, due to who clomb wall Through bravery or wantonness alone,
 Just to dislodge a daw's nest, plant a flag.
 So I interpret you the manly mind
 Of him about to judge both you and me, —
 Our Governor, who, being no Fisc, my Fisc, Cannot have blundered on ineptitude!
 Next aggravation, — that the arms themselves Were specially of such forbidden sort Through shape or length or breadth, as, prompt, Law plucks From single hand of solitary man, Making him pay the carriage with his life:
Delatio armorum, arms against the rule, Contra formam constitutionis, of Pope Alexander's blessed memory.
 Such are the poignards with the double prong, Horn-like, when tines make bold the antlered buck,
 Each prong of brittle glass — wherewith to stab
 And break off short and so let fragment stick Fast in the flesh to baffle surgery:
 Such being the Genoese blade with hooked edge That did us service at the villa here.
Sed parcat mihi tam eximius vir,
 But, — let so rare a personage forgive, — Fisc, thy objection is a foppery!
 Thy charge runs that we killed three innocents: Killed, dost see? Then, if killed, what matter how?
 By stick or stone, by sword or dagger, tool Long or tool short, round or triangular —

Poor slain folk find small comfort in the choice!
 Means to an end, means to an end, my Fisc!
 Nature cries out, "Take the first arms you find!"
*Furor ministrat arma:*¹ where's a stone?
*Unde mihi lapidem?*² where darts for me?
Unde sagittas? But subdue the bard 50
 And rationalise a little. Eight months since,
 Had we, or had we not, incurred your blame For letting 'scape unpunished this bad pair?
 I think I proved that in last paragraph!
 Why did we so? Because our courage failed.
 Wherefore? Through lack of arms to fight the foe:
 We had no arms or merely lawful ones,
 An unimportant sword and blunderbuss, Against a foe, pollent in potency,
 The amasius, and our vixen of a wife. 60
 Well then, how culpably do we gird loin
 And once more undertake the high emprise, Unless we load ourselves this second time
 With handsome superfluity of arms, Since better is "too much" than "not enough,"
 And "plus non viliat," too much does no harm, Except in mathematics, sages say.
 Gather instruction from the parable!
 At first we are advised — "A lad hath here "Seven barley loaves and two small 70 fishes: what "Is that among so many?" Aptly asked:
 But put that question twice and, quite as apt,
 The answer is "Fragments, twelve baskets full!"
 And, while we speak of superabundance, fling
 We word by the way to fools who cast their flout On Guido — "Punishment were pardoned him,
 "But here the punishment exceeds offence:
 "He might be just, but he was cruel too!"
 Why, grant there seems a kind of cruelty In downright stabbing people he could 80 maim,
 (If so you stigmatise the stern and strict) Still, Guido meant no cruelty — may plead Transgression of his mandate, over-zeal
 O' the part of his companions: all he craved

¹ Furor arma ministrat: Virgil, Æn. I. 150.
² Unde mihi lapidem . . . unde sagittas: Hora'e, Sat. II. 7, 116.

Was, they should fray the faces of the folk,
Merely disfigure, nowise make them die.
Solummodo jassus est, he owns no more,
Dedisse mandatum, than that he desired,
Ad sfrisandum, dicam, that they hack And hew, i' the customary phrase, his
wife,

Uxorem tantum, and no harm beside.
If his instructions then be misconceived, Nay, disobeyed, impute you blame to
him?

30 Cite me no Panicollus to the point, As adverse! Oh, I quite expect his case — How certain noble youths of Sicily Having good reason to mistrust their wives, Killed them and were absolved in consequence:

While others who had gone beyond the
need

By mutilation of each paramour —
As Galba in the Horatian satire¹ grieved — These were condemned to the galleys, cast for guilt

Exceeding simple murder of a wife.

20 But why? Because of ugliness, and not Cruely, in the said revenge, I trow!
Ex causa abscissionis partium;
Qui nempe id facientes reputantur Naturæ inimici, man revolts Against them as the natural enemy.

Pray, grant to one who meant to slit the
nose

And slash the cheek and slur the mouth, at most,

A somewhat more humane award than
these

Obtained, these natural enemies of man!

30 *Objectum funditus corrui*t, flat you fall, My Fisc! I waste no kick on you, but
pass.

Third aggravation: that our act was
done —

Not in the public street, where safety lies,
Not in the byc-place, caution may avoid, Wood, cavern, desert, spots contrived for
crime, —

But in the very house, home, nook and
nest,

O' the victims, murdered in their dwelling-
place,

In domo ac habitatione propria,
Where all presumably is peace and joy.

40 The spider, crime, pronounce we twice a pest

When, creeping from congenial cottage,
she

Taketh hold with her hands, to horrify His household more, i' the palace of the
king.

All three were housed and safe and confident.

Moreover, the permission that our wife
Should have at length domum pro carcere,
Her own abode in place of prison — why,
We ourselves granted, by our other self
And proxy Paolo did we make such grant, Meaning a lure? — elude the vigilance O' the jailor, lead her to commodious
death,

While we ostensibly relented?

Ay,
Just so did we, nor otherwise, my Fisc!
Is vengeance lawful? We demand our
right,

But find it will be questioned or refused By jailor, turnkey, hangdog, — what know we?

Pray, how is it we should conduct ourselves?

To gain our private right — break public
peace,

Do you bid us? — trouble order with our broils?

Endanger . . . shall I shrink to own . . . 60 ourselves? —

Who want no broken head nor bloody
nose

(While busied slitting noses, breaking heads)

From the first tipstaff that may interfere!
Nam quicquid sit, for howsoever it be,

An de consensu nostro, if with leave
Or not, a monasterio, from the nuns,

Educta esset, she had been led forth, *Potui*mus id dissimulare, we May well have granted leave in pure pretence,

Ut aditum habere, that thereby

An entry we might compass, a free move Potuissemus, to her easy death,

Ad eam occidendam. Privacy
O' the hearth, and sanctitude of home,

say you?
Shall we give man's abode more privilege Than God's? — for in the churches where

He dwells,

In quibus assistit Regum Rex, by means Of His essence, per essentiam, all the same,

Et nihilominus, therein, in eis,
Ex justa via delinquens, whoso dares 80

To take a liberty on ground enough,
Is pardoned, excusatur: that's our case

Delinquent through befitting cause. You hold,

To punish a false wife in her own house
Is graver than, what happens every day,

To hale a debtor from his hiding-place
In church protected by the Sacrament?

To this conclusion have I brought my Fisc?

Foxes have holes, and fowls o' the air their nests;

Praise you the impiety that follows, Fisc?
Shall false wife yet have where to lay her
head?

"Contra Fiscum definitum est!" He's done!

"Surge et scribe." make a note of it!
— If I may dally with Aquinas' word.

Or in the death-throe does he mutter still,
Fourth aggravation, that we changed our garb,

And rusticised ourselves with uncouth hat,

Rough vest and goatskin wrappage; murdered thus

Mutatione vestium, in disguise, Whereby mere murder got complexed with o Turned homicidium ex insidiis? Fisc, How often must I round thee in the ears —

All means are lawful to a lawful end?
Concede he had the right to kill his wife:
The Count indulged in a travesty; why?
De illa ut vindictam sumeret, That on her he might lawful vengeance

take,
Commodius, with more ease, et tutius, And safer: wants he warrant for the o Read to thy profit how the Apostle once For ease and safety, when Damascus raged,

Was let down in a basket by the wall
To 'scape the malice of the governor (Another sort of Governor boasts Rome!)
— Many are of opinion, — covered close, Concealed with — what except that very cloak

He left behind at Troas afterward?
I shall not add a syllable: Molinists may!
Well, have we more to manage? Ay,
indeed!

o Fifth aggravation, that our wife reposed Sub potestate iudicis, beneath Protection of the judge, — her house was styled

A prison, and his power became its guard
In lieu of wall and gate and bolt and bar.
This is a tough point, shrewd, redoubt-

able:
Because we have to supplicate that judge Shall overlook wrong done the judgment-

seat.
Now, I might suffer my own nose be pulled,

As man: but then as father . . . if the

Fisc
Touched one hair of my boy who held my

o In confidence he could not come to harm Crossing the Corso, at my own desire, Going to see those bodies in the church —
What would you say to that, Don Hyacinth?

This is the sole and single knotty point:
For, bid Tommati blink his interest, You laud his magnanimity the while

But baulk Tommati's office, — he talks big!

"My predecessors in the place, — those sons

"O' the prophets that may hope succeed me here, —

"Shall I diminish their prerogative? 5a

"Count Guido Franceschini's honour! — well,

"Has the Governor of Rome none?"

You perceive,
The cards are all against us. Make a push,
Kick over table, as shrewd gamesters do!
We, do you say, encroach upon the rights, Deny the omnipotence o' the Judge for-

sooth?
We, who have only been from first to last Intending that his purpose should prevail, Nay more, at times, anticipating it At risk of his rebuke? 6a

But wait awhile!
Cannot we lump this with the sixth and last

Of the aggravations — that the Majesty O' the Sovereign here received a wound?
to-wit,

Læsa Majestas, since our violence
Was out of envy to the course of law, In odium litis? We cut short thereby Three pending suits, promoted by our-

selves
I' the main, — which worsens crime, accedit ad

Exasperationem criminis!

Yes, here the eruptive wrath with full 7a
effect!

How, did not indignation chain my tongue,
Could I repel this last, worst charge of all!
(There is a porcupine to barbecue;
Gigia can jug a rabbit well enough, With sour-sweet sauce and pine-pips; but,
good Lord,

Suppose the devil instigate the wench To stew, not roast him? Stew my porcupine?

If she does, I know where his quills shall stick!

Come, I must go myself and see to things:
I cannot stay much longer stewing here.) 8a Our stomach . . . I mean, our soul is stirred within,

And we want words. We wounded Majesty?

Fall under such a censure, we? — who yearned

So much that Majesty dispel the cloud
And shine on us with healing on her wings,
That we prayed Pope Majestas' very self
To anticipate a little the tardy pack, Bell us forth deep the authoritative bay Should start the beagles into sudden yelp

- Unisonous, — and, Gospel leading Law, Grant there assemble in our own behoof
A Congregation, a particular Court,
A few picked friends of quality and place,
To hear the several matters in dispute, — Causes big, little and indifferent, Bred of our marriage like a mushroom-
growth, —
All at once (can one brush off such too soon?)
And so with laudable dispatch decide 10 Whether we, in the main (to sink detail) Were one the Pope should hold fast or let go.
“What, take the credit from the Law?”
you ask?
Indeed, we did! Law ducks to Gospel
here:
Why should Law gain the glory and pronounce
A judgment shall immortalise the Pope?
Yes: our self-abnegating policy Was Joab’s — we would rouse our David’s sloth,
Bid him encamp against a city, sack
A place whereto ourselves had long laid siege, 35 Lest, taking it at last, it take our name Nor be styled Innocentinopolis.
But no! The modesty was in alarm,
The temperance refused to interfere, Returned us our petition with the word “Ad iudices suos,” “Leave him to his Judge!” As who should say “Why trouble my repose?
“Why consult Peter in a simple case, “Peter’s wife’s sister in her fever-fit “Might solve as readily as the Apostle’s
self?
30 “Are my Tribunals posed by aught so
plain?
“Hath not my Court a conscience? It is of age, “Ask it!”
We do ask, — but, inspire reply To the Court thou bidst me ask, as I have asked —
Oh thou, who vigilantly dost attend
To even the few, the ineffectual words Which rise from this our low and mundane sphere
Up to thy region out of smoke and noise, Seeking corroboration from thy nod Who art all justice — which means mercy
too,
40 In a low noisy smoky world like ours
Where Adam’s sin made peccable his seed!
We venerate the father of the flock, Whose last faint sands of life, the frittered
gold,
Fall noiselessly, yet all too fast, o’ the cone
And tapering heap of those collected years: Never have these been hurried in their
flow,
Though justice fain would jog reluctant
arm,
In eagerness to take the forfeiture
Of guilty life: much less shall mercy sue In vain that thou let innocence survive, 50 Precipitate no minim of the mass
O’ the all-so precious moments of thy life,
By pushing Guido into death and doom!
(Our Cardinal engages to go read The Pope my speech, and point its beauties
out.
They say, the Pope has one half-hour, in twelve,
Of something like a moderate return Of the intellectuals, — never much to lose!
If I adroitly plant this passage there,
The Fisc will find himself forestalled, I 60
think,
Though he stand, beat till the old eardrum break!
— Ah, boy of my own bowels, Hyacinth, Wilt ever catch the knack, requite the
pains
Of poor papa, become proficient too I’ the how and why and when, the time to
laugh,
The time to weep, the time, again, to pray,
And all the times prescribed by Holy Writ?
Well, well, we fathers can but care, but cast
Our bread upon the waters!)
- In a word,
These secondary charges go to ground, 70
Since secondary, and superfluous, — notes Quite from the main point: we did all and some,
Little and much, adjunct and principal, Causa honoris. Is there such a cause As the sake of honour? By that sole test try
Our action, nor demand if more or less, Because of the action’s mode, we merit
blame
Or may-be deserve praise! The Court decides.
Is the end lawful? It allows the means:
What we may do, we may with safety do, 80
And what means “safety” we ourselves must judge.
Put case a person wrongs me past dispute:
If my legitimate vengeance be a blow, Mistrusting my bare arm can deal that
blow,
I claim co-operation of a stick; Doubtful if stick be tough, I crave a
sword;
Diffident of ability in fence,
I fee a friend, a swordsman to assist:
Take one — he may be coward, fool or
knave:
Why not take fifty? — and if these exceed 90

I' the due degree of drubbing, whom accuse
 But the first author of the aforesaid wrong
 Who put poor me to such a world of pains?
 Surgery would have just excised a wart;
 The patient made such pother, struggled so That the sharp instrument sliced nose and
 all.
 Taunt us not that our friends performed for pay!
 Ourselves had toiled for simple honour's
 sake:
 But country clowns want dirt they comprehend,
 The piece of gold! Our reasons, which
 suffice
 Ourselves, be ours alone; our piece of gold
 Be, to the rustic, reason he approves!
 We must translate our motives like our
 speech,
 into the lower phrase that suits the sense O' the limitedly apprehensive. Let Each level have its language! Heaven speaks first
 To the angel, then the angel tames the
 word
 Down to the ear of Tobit: he, in turn, Diminishes the message to his dog,
 And finally that dog finds how the flea (Which else, importunate, might check his speed)
 Shall learn its hunger must have holiday.
 By application of his tongue or paw:
 So many varied sorts of language here, Each following each with pace to match the step,
Haud passibus æquis!
 Talking of which flea,
 Reminds me I must put in special word For the poor humble following, — the four
 friends,
Sicarii, our assassins caught and caged.
 Ourselves are safe in your approval now:
 Yet must we care for our companions,
 plead
 The cause o' the poor, the friends (of old-world faith)
 Who lie in tribulation for our sake.
Pauperum Procurator is my style:
 I stand forth as the poor man's advocate:
 And when we treat of what concerns the
 poor,
Et cum agatur de pauperibus,
 In bondage, carceratis, for their sake,
In eorum causis, natural piety, 40 Pietas, ever ought to win the day, Triumphare debet, quia ipsi sunt, Because those very paupers constitute,
Thesaurus Christi, all the wealth of Christ.
 Nevertheless I shall not hold you long With multiplicity of proofs, nor burn Candle at noon-tide, clarify the clear.

There beams a case refulgent from our books —
Castrensis, Butringarius,¹ everywhere
 I find it burn to dissipate the dark.
 'Tis this: a husband had a friend, which 54
 friend
 Seemed to him over-friendly with his wife In thought and purpose, — I pretend no
 more.
 To justify suspicion or dispel,
 He bids his wife make show of giving heed, Semblance of sympathy — propose, in
 fine,
 A secret meeting in a private place.
 The friend, enticed thus, finds an ambuscade,
 To-wit, the husband posted with a pack
 Of other friends, who fall upon the first And beat his love and life out both at 60
 once.
 These friends were brought to question for their help; Law ruled "The husband being in the
 right,
 "Who helped him in the right can scarce be wrong" —
Opinio, an opinion every way, Mulum tenenda cordi, heart should hold!
 When the inferiors follow as behis
 The lead o' the principal, they change their name,
 And, non dicuntur, are no longer called His mandatories, mandatorii,
 But helpmates, sed auxiliatores; since 70
 To that degree does honour's sake lend aid, Ad eo honoris causa est efficax,
 That not alone, non solum, does it pour Itself out, se diffundit, on mere friends
 We bring to do our bidding of this sort,
In mandatorios simplices, but sucks Along with it in wide and generous whirl, Sed etiam assassinii qualitate Qualificatos, people qualified
 By the quality of assassination's self, 80 Dare I make use of such neologism, Ut ular verbo.

Haste we to conclude.
 Of the other points that favour, leave some few
 For Spreti; such as the delinquents' youth.
 One of them falls short, by some months,
 of age
 Fit to be managed by the gallows; two May plead exemption from our law's award, Being foreigners, subjects of the Granduke —
 I spare that bone to Spreti, and reserve Myself the juicier breast of argument — 90 Flinging the breast-blade i' the face o' the Fise,

¹ Castrensis, Butringarius: Paulus de Castro and Jacobus Butringarius (as the name should be spelt), jurists of the sixteenth century.

Who furnished me the tid-bit: he must needs

Play off his privilege and rack the clowns, —
And they, at instance of the rack, confess All four unanimously made resolve, — The night o' the murder, in brief minute snatched

Behind the back of Guido as he fled, — That, since he had not kept his promise,
paid

The money for the murder on the spot,
So, reaching home again, might please ignore

10 The pact or pay them in improper coin, — They one and all resolved, these hopeful
friends,

'Twere best inaugurate the morrow's light, Nature recruited with her due repose,
By killing Guido as he lay asleep Pillowed on wallet which contained their fee.

I thank the Fisc for knowledge of this fact:
What fact could hope to make more manifest

Their rectitude, Guido's integrity?

For who fails recognise the touching truth

30 That these poor rustics bore no envy, hate, Malice nor yet uncharitableness

Against the people they had put to death?

In them, did such an act reward itself?

All done was to deserve the simple pay,

Obtain the bread clowns earn by sweat of
brow,

And missing which, they missed of everything —

Hence claimed pay, even at expense of life To their own lord, so little warped (admire!)

By prepossession, such the absolute

30 Instinct of equity in rustic souls!

Whereas our Count, the cultivated mind,

He, wholly rapt in his serene regard

Of honour, he contemplating the sun

Who hardly marks if taper blink below, —

He, dreaming of no argument for death

Except a vengeance worthy noble hearts, —

Dared not so desecrate the deed, for sooth,

Vulgarise vengeance, as defray its cost

By money dug from out the dirty earth,

40 Irritant mere, in Ovid's phrase, to ill.

What though he lured base hinds by lucre's

hope, —

The only motive they could masticate,

Milk for babes, not strong meat which men require?

The deed done, those coarse hands were soiled enough,

He spared them the pollution of the pay.

So much for the allegement, thine, my Fisc,

Quo nil absurdius, 'han which nought more

mad,

Excogitari potest, may be squeezed

From out the cogitative brain of thee!

And now, thou excellent the Governor! 54

(Push to the peroration) catcrum

Enixe supplico, I strive in prayer, Ut dominis meis, that unto the Court, Benigna fronte, with a gracious brow,
Et oculis serenis, and mild eyes, Perpendere placcat, it may please them weigh,

Quod dominus Guido, that our noble Count

Occidit, did the killing in dispute,

Ut ejus honor tumulatus, that

The honour of him buried fathom-deep 64

In infamy, in infamia, might arise,

Resurgeret, as ghost breaks sepulchre!

Occidit, for he killed, uxorem, wife,

Quia illi fuit, since she was to him,

Obprobrio, a disgrace and nothing more!

Et genitores, killed her parents too,

Qui, who, postposita verecundia,

Having thrown off all sort of decency,

Filiam repudiarunt, had renounced

Their daughter, atque declarare non 70

Erubuerunt, nor felt blush tinge cheek,

Declaring, meretricis genitam

Esse, she was the offspring of a drab,

Ut ipse dehonestaretur, just

That so himself might lose his social rank!

Cujus mentem, and which daughter's heart and soul,

They, perverterunt, turned from the right

course,

Et ad illicitos amores non

Dumtaxat pellexerunt, and to love

Not simply did alluringly incite, 80

Sed vi obedientiae, but by force

O' the duty, filialis, daughters owe,

Coegerunt, forced and drove her to the

deed:

Occidit, I repeat he killed the clan,

Ne scilicet amplius in dedecore,

Lest peradventure longer life might trail,

Viveret, link by link his turpitude,

Invisus consanguineis, hateful so

To kith and kindred, a nobilibus

Notatus, shunned by men of quality, 90

Relictus ab amicis, left i' the lurch

By friends, ab omnibus derisus, turned

A common hack-block to try edge of jokes.

Occidit, and he killed them here in Rome,

In Urbe, the Eternal City, Sirs,

Nempe quæ alias spectata est,

The appropriate theatre which witnessed

once,

Matronam nobilem, Lucretia's self,

Abluere pudicitiae maculas,

Wash off the spots of her pudicity, 100

Sanguine proprio, with her own pure blood;

Quæ vidit and which city also saw,

Patrem, Virginus, undequaque, quite,

Impunem, with no sort of punishment,

Nor, et non illaudatum, lacking praise,

Sed pollutentem patricidio,

Imbrue his hands with butchery, filiae,

Of chaste Virginia, to avoid a rape,
Ne raperetur ad supra; so to heart, Tanti illi cordi fuit, did he take, Suspicio, the mere fancy men might have,
Honoris amittendi, of fame's loss, Ut potius voluerit filia Orbari, he preferred to lose his child, Quam illa incederet, rather than she walk
The ways an, inhonesta, child disgraced, Licet non sponte, though against her will.
Occidit — killed them, I reiterate — In propria domo, in their own abode, Ut adultera et parentes, that each wretch, Conscii agnoscerent, might both see and say, Nullum locum, there's no place, nullumque esse

Asylum, nor yet refuge of escape, Impenetrabilem, shall serve as bar, Honori laeso, to the wounded one In honour; neve ibi opprobria Continuarentur, killed them on the spot, Moreover, dreading lest within those walls
The opprobrium peradventure be prolonged.

Et domus quæ testis fuit turpium,
And that the domicile which witnessed
crime,
Esset et pænæ, might watch punishment:
Occidit, killed, I round you in the ears, Quia alio modo, since by other mode,
Non poterat ejus existimatio,
There was no possibility his fame,
Laesa, gashed grossly, iam enormiter, Ducere cicatrices, might be healed:
Occidit ut exemplum præberet Uxoribus, killed her, so to lesson wives Jura conjugii, that the marriage-oath, Esse servanda, must be kept henceforth:
Occidit denique, killed her, in a word,
Ut pro posse honestus viveret,
That he, please God, might creditably live, Sin minus, but if fate willed otherwise, Proprii honoris, of his outraged fame, Offensi, by Mannaia, if you please, Commiscranda victima caderet,
The pitiable victim he should fall!

Done! I' the rough, i' the rough! But done! And, lo,
Landed and stranded lies my very speech,
My miracle, my monster of defence — Leviathan into the nose whereof I have put fish-hook, pierced his jaw with thorn,
And given him to my maidens for a play!
I' the rough: to-morrow I review my piece, Tame here and there undue floridity.
It's hard: you have to plead before these priests
And poke at them with Scripture, or you
pass
For heathen and, what's worse, for ignorant O' the quality o' the Court and what it likes By way of illustration of the law.

To-morrow stick in this, and throw out
that,
And, having first ecclesiasticised, Regularise the whole, next emphasise,
Then latinise, and lastly Cicero-ise, 60 Giving my Fisc his finish. There's my
speech!

And where's my fry, and family and friends?
Where's that huge Hyacinth I mean to hug Till he cries out "Jam satis! Lct me
breathe!"

Now, what an evening have I earned to-
day!

Hail, ye true pleasures, all the rest are false!
Oh the old mother, oh the fattish wife!
Rogue Hyacinth shall put on paper toque, And wrap himself around with mamma's veil

Done up to imitate papa's black robe, 70 (I'm in the secret of the comedy, —

Part of the program leaked out long ago!)
And call himself the Advocate o' the Poor, Mimic Don father that defends the Count:
And for reward shall have a snail full glass Of manly red resolio to himself,

— Always provided that he conjugate Bibo, I drink, correctly — nor be found Make the perfectum, bipsi, as last year!
How the ambitious to do so harden heart 80

As lightly hold by these home-sanctitudes,
To me is matter of bewilderment — Bewilderment! Because ambition's range Is nowise tethered by domestic tie.

Am I refused an outlet from my home To the world's stage? — whereon a man should play

The man in public, vigilant for law, Zealous for truth, a credit to his kind,
Nay, — since, employing talent so, I yield
The Lord His own again with usury, — 90
A satisfaction, yea, to God Himself!
Well, I have modelled me by Agur's wish,
"Remove far from me vanity and lies,
"Feed me with food convenient for me!"

What

I' the world should a wise man require
beyond?

Can I but coax the good fat little wife
To tell her fool of a father the mad prank His scapegrace nephew played this time last year

At Carnival! He could not choose, I
think,

But modify that inconsiderate gift 100 O' the cup and cover (somewhere in the
will

Under the pillow, someone seems to guess)
— Correct that clause in favour of a boy

The trifle ought to grace, with name engraved,

Would look so well, produced in future
years

To pledge a memory, when poor papa Latin and law are long since laid at rest —

Hyacintho dono dedit avus! Why,
The wife should get a necklace for her
pains,
The very pearls that made Violante proud,
And Pietro pawned for half their value
once, —

Redeemable by somebody, ne sit Marita quæ rotundioribus Onusta mammis . . . baccis ambulet:
Her bosom shall display the big round balls,
No braver proudly borne by wedded wife!
10 With which Horatian promise¹ I conclude.

Into the pigeon-hole with thee, my speech!
Off and away, first work then play, play,
play!
Botfini, burn thy books, thou blazing ass!
Sing "Tra-la-la, for, lambkins, we must live!"

IX. — JURIS DOCTOR JOHANNES- BAPTISTA BOTTINIUS,

FISCI ET REV. CAM. APOSTOL. ADVOCATUS.

HAD I God's leave, how I would alter
things!
If I might read instead of print my
speech, —
Ay, and enliven speech with many a flower Refuses obstinate to blow in print,
As wildings planted in a prim parterre, — 20 This scurvy room were turned an immense hall;
Opposite, fifty judges in a row;
This side and that of me, for audience —
Rome:
And, where yon window is, the Pope should
hide —
Watch, curtained, but peep visibly enough.
A buzz of expectation! Through the crowd, Jingling his chain and stumping with his staff,
Up comes an usher, louts him low, "The
Court
"Requires the allocution of the Fisc!"
I rise, I bend, I look about me, pause 30 O'er the hushed multitude: I count — One, two —

Have ye seen, Judges, have ye, lights of
law, —
When it may hap some painter, much in vogue
Throughout our city nutritive of arts, Ye summon to a task shall test his worth,
To manufacture, as he knows and can,
A work may decorate a palace-wall, Afford my lords their Holy Family, — Hath it escaped the acumen of the Court 40 How such a painter sets himself to paint?

¹ Horatian promise: Horace, Epodes, 8, 13.

Suppose that Joseph, Mary and her Babe
A-journeying to Egypt, prove the piece:
Why, first he sedulously practiseth, This painter, — girding loin and lighting
lamp, —

On what may nourish eye, make facile
hand;

Getteth him studies (styled by draughtsmen so)

From some assistant corpse of Jew or Turk Or, haply, Molinist, he cuts and carves, — This Luca or this Carlo or the like.

To him the bones their inmost secret yield,
Each notch and nodule signify their use: 54
On him the muscles turn, in triple tier,
And pleasantly entreat the entrusted man
"Familiarise thee with our play that lifts
"Thus, and thus lowers again, leg, arm and foot!"

— Ensuring due correctness in the nude.
Which done, is all done? Not a whit, ye
know!

He, — to art's surface rising from her depth, —

If some flax-poll'd soft-bearded sire be
found,

May simulate a Joseph, (happy chance!) — Linneth exact each wrinkle of the brow, 60

Loseth no involution, check or chap,
Till lo, in black and white, the senior lives!

Is it a young and comely peasant-nurse
That poseth? (be the phrase accorded me!)

Each feminine delight of florid lip, Eyes brimming o'er and brow bowed down with love,

Marmoreal neck and bosom uberous, — Glad on the paper in a trice they go

To help his notion of the Mother-maid:
Methinks I see it, chalk a little stumped! 70

Yea and her babe — that flexure of soft
limbs,

That budding face imbued with dewy sleep, Contribute each an excellence to Christ.

Nay, since he humbly lent companionship,
Even the poor ass, unpanniered and elate

Stands, perks an ear up, he a model too;
While clouded shoon, staff, scrip and watergourd, —

Aught may betoken travel, heat and haste, —
No jot nor tittle of these but in its turn

Ministers to perfection of the piece: 80 Till now, such piece before him, part by
part, —

Such prelude ended, — pause our painter
may,

Submit his fifty studies one by one,
And in some sort boast "I have served my

lords."

But what? And hath he painted once this
while?

Or when ye cry "Produce the thing required,

"Show us our picture shall rejoice its niche,

"Thy Journey through the Desert done in oils!" —
What, doth he fall to shuffling 'mid his sheets, Fumbling for first this, then the other fact Consigned to paper, — "studies," bear the term! —
And stretch a canvas, mix a pot of paste,
And fasten here a head and there a tail, (The ass hath one, my Judges!) so dove-tail
Or, rather, ass-tail in, piece sorrily out — By bits of reproduction of the life —
The picture, the expected Family?
I trow not! do I miss with my conceit
The mark, my lords? — not so my lords were served!
Rather your artist turns abrupt from these,
And preferably buries him and broods (Quite away from aught vulgar and extern) On the inner spectrum, filtered through the
eye,
His brain-deposit, bred of many a drop,
E pluribus unum:¹ and the wiser he!
For in that brain, — their fancy sees at
work,
Could my lords peep indulged, — results
alone,
Not processes which nourish such results,
Would they discover and appreciate, — life Fed by digestion, not raw food itself, No gobbets but smooth comfortable chyme²
Secreted from each snapped-up crudity, — Less distinct, part by part, but in the whole Truer to the subject, — the main central
truth
And soul o' the picture, would my Judges spy, —
Not those mere fragmentary studied facts Which answer to the outward frame and
flesh —
Not this nose, not that eyebrow, the other fact Of man's staff, woman's stole or infant's clout,
But lo, a spirit-birth conceived of flesh, Truth rare and real, not transcripts, fact and false.
The studies — for his pupils and himself!
The picture be for our eximious Rome And — who knows? — satisfy its Governor,
Whose new wing to the villa he hath bought (God give him joy of it) by Capena, soon ('Tis bruited) shall be glowing with the brush
Of who hath long surpassed the Florentine,³

The Urbinate⁴ and . . . what if I dared add,

Even his master, yea the Cortonense,⁵ —
I mean the accomplished Ciro Ferri,⁶ Sirs!
(— Did not he die? I'll see before I print.)

End we exordium, Phœbus plucks my ear!
Thus then, just so and no whit otherwise, Have I, — engaged as I were Ciro's self,
To paint a parallel, a Family,
The patriarch Pietro with his wise old wife 50 To boot (as if one introduced Saint Anne By bold conjecture to complete the group)
And juvenile Pompilia with her babe,
Who, seeking safety in the wilderness, Were all surprised by Herod, while outstretched

In sleep beneath a palm-tree by a spring,
And killed — the very circumstance I paint, Moving the pity and terror of my lords — Exactly so have I, a month at least,
Your Fiscal, made me cognisant of facts, 60 Searched out, pried into, pressed the meaning forth

Of every piece of evidence in point, How bloody Herod slew these innocents, — Until the glad result is gained, the group Demonstrably presented in detail, Their slumber and his onslaught, — like as life.

Yea and, availing me of help allowed By law, discreet provision lest my lords Be too much troubled by effrontery, — Therack, law plics suspected crime withal — 70 (Law that hath listened while the lyrist sang

"Lene tormentum ingenio admoveo," Gently thou joggest by a twinge the wit,
"Plerumque duro," else were slow to blab!) Through this concession my full cup runs o'er:

The guilty owns his guilt without reserve.
Therefore by part and part I clutch my
case

Which, in entirety now, — momentous task, —

My lords demand, so render them I must, Since, one poor pleading more and I have 80
done.

But shall I ply my papers, play my proofs, Parade my studies, fifty in a row,
As though the Court were yet in pupilage, Claimed not the artist's ultimate appeal?
Much rather let me soar the height prescribed

And, bowing low, proffer my picture's self!
No more of proof, disproof, — such virtue
was,

¹ E pluribus unum: "one made out of many" (Virgil, Mœneum, 103).

² Chyme: the matter into which food is reduced by the juices of the stomach.

³ The Florentine: Michel Angelo.

⁴ The Urbinate: Rafael.

⁵ The Cortonense: Pietro da Cortona.

⁶ Ciro Ferri: a painter, who lived 1634-1689, a pupil of Pietro da Cortona. He had now been dead some nine years.

Such vice was never in Pompilia, now!
Far better say "Behold Pompilia!" — (for I leave the family as unmanageable,
And stick to just one portrait, but life-size.) Hath calumny imputed to the fair
A blemish, mole on cheek or wart on chin, Much more, blind hidden horrors best unnamed?

Shall I descend to prove you, point by
point,

Never was knock-knee known nor splayfoot found

- 10 In Phryne? (I must let the portrait go, Content me with the model, I believe) — — I prove this? An indignant sweep of
hand,

Dash at and doing away with drapery,
And, — use your eyes, Athenians, smooth she smiles!¹

Or, — since my client can no longer smile,
And more appropriate instances abound, —
What is this Tale of Tarquin, how the slave Was caught by him, preferred to Collatine?
Thou, even from thy corpse-clothes vir-ginal,

- 20 Look'st the lie dead, Lucretia!

Thus at least

I, by the guidance of antiquity, (Our one infallible guide) now operate, Sure that the innocence thus shown is safe; Sure, too, that, while I plead, the echoes
cry

(Lend my weak voice thy trump, sonorous Fame!)

"Monstrosity the Phrynean shape shall
mar,

"Lucretia's soul comport with Tarquin's
lie,

"When thistles grow on vines or thorns yield figs,

"Or oblique sentence leave this judgment-
seat!"

- 30 A great theme: may my strength be adequate!

For — paint Pompilia, dares my feeble-
ness?

How did I unaware engage so much — Find myself undertaking to produce A faultless nature in a flawless form?

What's here? Oh, turn aside nor dare the blaze

Of such a crown, such constellation, say,
As jewels here thy front, Humanity!

First, infancy, pellucid as a pearl;
Then childhood — stone which, dew-drop at the first,

- 40 (An old conjecture) sucks, by dint of gaze, Blue from the sky and turns to sapphire so: Yet both these gems eclipsed by, last and
best,

¹ Alluding to the defence of the courtesan Phryné by Hyperides, who secured a verdict by displaying her unveiled beauty to the court.

Womanliness and wifehood opaline, Its milk-white pallor, — chastity, — suffused

With here and there a tint and hint of
flame, —

Desire, — the lapidary loves to find.
Such jewels bind conspicuously thy brow,

Pompilia, infant, child, maid, woman, wife — Crown the ideal in our earth at last!

What should a faculty like mine do here? 50
Close eyes, or else, the rashlier hurry hand!

Which is to say, — lose no time but begin!
Sermocinando ne declinem, Sirs,

Ultra clepsydram, as our preachers smile, Lest I exceed my hour-glass. Whereupon,

As Flaccus prompts, I dare the epic plunge —

Begin at once with marriage, up till when Little or nothing would arrest your love,

In the easeful life o' the lady; lamb and
lamb,

How do they differ? Know one, you know 60
all

Manners of maidenhood: mere maiden
she.

And since all lambs are like in more than fleece,

Prepare to find that, lamb-like, she too frisks —

O' the weaker sex, my lords, the weaker sex!

To whom, the Teian² teaches us, for gift, Not strength, — man's dower, — but beauty, nature gave,

"Beauty in lieu of spears, in lieu of shields!"

And what is beauty's sure concomitant, Nay, intimate essential character,

But melting wiles, deliciouslest deceits, 70
The whole redoubted armoury of love?

Therefore of vernal pranks, dishevellings O' the hair of youth that dances April in,

And easily-imagined Hebe-slips O'er sward which May makes over-smooth for foot —

These shall we pry into? — or wiselier

wink, Though numerous and dear they may have
been?

For lo, advancing Hymen and his pomp!
Discedunt nunc amores, loves, farewell!

Maneat amor, let love, the sole, remain! 80
Farewell to dewiness and prime of life!

Remains the rough determined day: dance
done,

To work, with plough and harrow! What comes next?

'Tis Guido henceforth guides Pompilia's
step,

Cries "No more friskings o'er the foodful glebe,"

² The Teian: Anacreon.

"Else, 'ware the whip!" Accordingly, — first crack
O' the thong, — we hear that his young wife was barred,
Cohibita fuit, from the old free life,
Vitam liberioiorem ducere.
Demur we? Nowise: heifer brave the hind?

We seek not there should lapse the natural
law,

The proper piety to lord and king
And husband: let the heifer bear the yoke!
Only, I crave he cast not patience off, 10 This hind; for deem you she endures the whip,

Nor winces at the goad, nay, restive, kicks?
What if the adversary's charge be just,
And all untowardly she pursue her way With groan and grunt, though hind strike ne'er so hard?

If petulant remonstrance made appeal, Unseasonable, o'erprotracted, — if Importunate challenge taxed the public
ear

When silence more decorously had served For protestation, — if Pompilian plaint 20 Wrought but to aggravate Guidonian ire, — Why, such mishaps, ungainly though they
be,

Ever companion change, are incident
To altered modes and novelty of life:
The philosophic mind expects no less,
Smilingly knows and names the crisis, sits Waiting till old things go and new arrive.
Therefore, I hold a husband but inept
Who turns impatient at such transit-time,
As if this running from the rod would last!

30 Since, even while I speak, the end is reached:

Success awaits the soon-disheartened man.
The parents turn their backs and leave the
house,

The wife may wail but none shall intervene:
He hath attained his object, groom and bride

Partake the nuptial bower no soul can see, Old things are passed and all again is new,
Over and gone the obstacles to peace, Novorum — tenderly the Mantuan¹ turns The expression, some such purpose in his
eye

10 Nascitur ordo! Every storm is laid,
And forth from plain each pleasant herb may peep,
Each bloom of wifehood in abeyance late:
(Confer a passage in the Canticles.)

But what if, as 'tis wont with plant and
wife,
Flowers, — after a suppression to good end,

¹ The Mantuan: Virgil, Ecl. 4, 5 — Magnus ex integro saculorum nascitur ordo.

Still, when they do spring forth, — sprout here, spread there,

Anywhere likelier than beneath the foot O' the lawful good-man gardener of the
ground?

He dug and dibbled, sowed and watered, —
still

'Tis a chance wayfarer shall pluck the 50
increase.

Just so, respecting persons not too much,
The lady, foes allege, put forth each charm
And proper floweret of femininity
To whosoever had a nose to smell Or breast to deck: what if the charge be
true?

The fault were graver had she looked with
choice,

Fastidiously appointed who should grasp,
Who, in the whole town, go without the prize!

To nobody she destined donative, But, first come was first served, the accuser 60 saith.

Put case her sort of . . . in this kind . . .
escapes

Were many and oft and indiscriminate — Impute ye as the action were prepenae,
The gift particular, arguing malice so?
Which butterfly of the wide air shall brag
"I was preferred to Guido" — when 'tis
clear

The cup, he quaffs at, lay with olent²
breast

Open to gnat, midge, bee and moth as
well?

One chalice entertained the company;
And if its peevish lord object the more, 70 Mistake, misname such bounty in a wife, Haste we to advertise him — charm of
cheek,

Lustre of eye, allowance of the lip,
All womanly components in a spouse,
These are no household-bread each stranger's bite

Leaves by so much diminished for the
mouth

O' the master of the house at supper-time:
But rather like a lump of spice they lie, Morsel of myrrh, which scents the neighbourhood

Yet greets its lord no lighter by a grain. 80

Nay, even so, he shall be satisfied!
Concede we there was reason in his wrong, Grant we his grievance and content the
man!

For lo, Pompilia, she submits herself; Ere three revolving years have crowned their course,

Off and away she puts this same reproach
Of lavish bounty, inconsiderate gift O' the sweets of wifehood stored to other
ends:

² Olent: odorous.

No longer shall he blame "She none excludes," But substitute "She laudably sees all,
"Searches the best out and selects the
same."
For who is here, long sought and latest
found,
Waiting his turn unmoved amid the whirl,
"Constans in levitate," — Ha, my lords?
Calm in his levity, — indulge the quip! — Since 'tis a levite bears the bell away, Parades him henceforth as Pompilia's
choice.

10 'Tis no ignoble object, husband!
Doubt'st?
When here comes tripping Flaccus¹ with his phrase
"Trust me, no miscreant singled from the mob,
"Crede non illum tibi de scelestis
"Plebe delectum," but a man of mark, A priest, dost hear? Why then, submit thyself!
Priest, ay and very phoenix of such fowl,
Well-born, of culture, young and vigorous, Comely too, since precise the precept points —
On the selected levite be there found 20 Nor mole nor scar nor blemish, lest the

mind
Come all uncandid through the thwarting
flesh!
Was not the son of Jesse ruddy, sleek, Pleasant to look on, pleasant every way?
Since well he smote the harp and sweetly
sang,
And danced till Abigail came out to see,
And sewing smiled and smiling ministered
The raisin-cluster and the cake of figs,
With ready meal refreshed the gifted youth,
Till Nabal, who was absent shearing sheep,

30 Felt heart sink, took to bed (discreetly
done —
They might have been beforehand with him else)
And died — would Guido have behaved
as well!
But ah, the faith of early days is gone, Heu prisca fides! Nothing died in him Save courtesy, good sense and proper trust, Which, when they ebb from souls they should o'erflow,
Discover stub, mced, sludge and ugliness.
(The Pope, we know, is Neapolitan And relishes a sea-side simile.)

40 Deserted by each charitable way, Guido, left high and dry, shows jealous
now!
Jealous avouched, paraded: tax the fool
With any peccadillo, he responds
"Truly I beat my wife through jealousy,
"Imprisoned her and punished otherwise,

"Being jealous: now would threaten,
sword in hand,
"Now manage to mix poison in her sight,
"And so forth: jealously I dealt, in fine." Concede thus much, and what remains to
prove?
Have I to teach my masters what effect 50 Hath jealousy, and how, befooling men,
It makes false true, abuses eye and ear, Turns mere mist adamant, loads with
sound
Silence, and into void and vacancy Crowds a whole phalanx of conspiring foes?
Therefore who owns "I watched with jealousy
"My wife," adds "for no reason in the
world!"
What need that, thus proved madman, he remark
"The thing I thought a serpent proved an eel"? — Perchance the right Comacchian, six foot 60
length,
And not an inch too long for that rare pie (Master Arcangeli has heard of such) Whose succulence makes fasting bearable;
Meant to regale some moody splenetic Who, pleasing to mistake the donor's gift, Spying I know not what Lernaean snake*
I' the luscious Lenten creature, stamps
forsooth
The dainty in the dust.

Enough! Prepare,
Such luns announced, for downright lunacy!
Insaniti homo, threat succeeds to threat, 70
And blow redoubles blow, — his wife, the block.
But, if a block, shall not she jar the hand That buffets her? The injurious idle
stone Rebounds and hits the head of him who flung.
Causeless rage breeds, i' the wife now, rageful cause,
Tyranny wakes rebellion from its sleep.
Rebellion, say I? — rather, self-defence, Laudable wish to live and see good days, Pricks our Pompilia now to fly the fool
By any means, at any price, — nay, more, 80 Nay, most of all, i' the very interest
O' the fool that, baffled of his blind desire
At any price, were truest victor so.
Shall he effect his crime and lose his
soul?
No, dictates duty to a loving wife!
Far better that the unconsummated blow, Adroitly baulked by her, should back again,
Correctively admonish his own pate!

* Lernaean snake: a reference to the hydra of Lerna, killed by Hercules.

¹ Flaccus: Horace, Odes, II. 4, 17.

Crime then, — the Court is with me? —
 she must crush:
 How crush it? By all efficacious means;
 And these, — why, what in woman should they be?
 "With horns the bull, with teeth the lion fights;
 "To woman," quoth the lyrist¹ quoted
 late,
 "Nor teeth, nor horns, but beauty, Nature gave."
 Pretty i' the Pagan! Who dares blame the use Of armoury thus allowed for natural,
 Exclaim against a seeming-dubious play O' the sole permitted weapon, spear and shield
 Alike, resorted to i' the circumstance By poor Pompilia? Grant she somewhat
 plied
 Arts that allure, the magic nod and wink,
 The witchery of gesture, spell of word,
 Whereby the likelier to enlist this friend,
 Yea stranger, as a champion on her side?
 Such man, being but mere man, ('twas all she knew),
 Must be made sure by beauty's silken bond, The weakness that subdues the strong, and bows
 Wisdom alike and folly. Grant the tale O' the husband, which is false, were proved and true
 To the letter — or the letters, I should say, Abominations he professed to find And fix upon Pompilia and the priest, — Allow them hers — for though she could not write,
 In early days of Eve-like innocence That pluck no apple from the knowledge-
 tree, Yet, at the Serpent's word, Eve plucks and eats
 And knows — especially how to read and
 write:
 And so Pompilia, — as the move o' the
 maw, Quoth Persius,² makes a parrot bid "Good
 day!"
 A crow salute the concave, and a pie Endeavour at proficiency in speech, —
 So she, through hunger after fellowship, May well have learned, though late, to play the scribe:
 As indeed, there's one letter on the list Explicitly declares did happen here.
 "You thought my letters could be none of mine,"
 She tells her parents — "mine, who wanted
 skill;
 40 "But now I have the skill, and write, you
 see!"

She needed write love-letters, so she learned,
 "Negatus artifex sequi voces" — though
 'This letter nowise 'scapes the common lot,
 But lies i' the condemnation of the rest, Found by the husband's self who forged them all.
 Yet, for the sacredness of argument,
 For this once an exemption shall it plead — Anything, anything to let the wheels Of argument run glibly to their goal!
 Concede she wrote (which were prepos- 50 terous)
 This and the other epistle, — what of it?
 Where does the figment touch her candid fame?
 Being in peril of her life — "my life,
 "Nct an hour's purchase," as the letter
 runs, —
 And having but one stay in this extreme,
 Out of the wide world but a single friend —
 What could she other than resort to him,
 And how with any hope resort but thus?
 Shall modesty dare bid a stranger brave Danger, disgrace, any death in her behalf — 60 Think to entice the sternness of the steel Yet spare love's loadstone moving manly
 mind?
 — Most of all, when such mind is hampered so
 By growth of circumstance athwart the
 life
 O' the natural man, that decency forbids
 He stoop and take the common privilege, Say frank "I love," as all the vulgar do.
 A man is wedded to philosophy,
 Married to statesmanship; a man is old;
 A man is fettered by the foolishness 70
 He took for wisdom and talked ten years
 since;
 A man is, like our friend the Canon here,
 A priest, and wicked if he break his vow:
 Shall he dare love, who may be Pope one
 day?
 Despite the coil of such encumbrance here,
 Suppose this man could love, unhappily, And would love, dared he only let love
 show!
 In case the woman of his love speaks first,
 From what embarrassment she sets him
 free!
 "Tis I who break reserve, begin appeal, 80
 "Confess that, whether you love me or no,
 "I love you!" What an ease to dignity, What help of pride from the hard high-backed chair
 Down to the carpet where the kittens bask,
 All under the pretence of gratitude!
 From all which, I deduce — the lady here
 Was bound to proffer nothing short of love
 To the priest whose service was to save her.
 What?
 Shall she propose him lucre, dust o' the
 mine,

¹ The lyrist: Anacreon. See p. 824, l. 65.

² Persius: Prologue to Satires, 6-13.

Rubbish o' the rock, some diamond, muck-worms prize,
Some pearl secreted by a sickly fish?
Scarcely! She caters for a generous taste.
'Tis love shall beckon, beauty bid to breast, Till all the Samson sink into the snare!
Because, permit the end — permit there-
with Means to the end!

How say you, good my lords?
I hope you heard my adversary ring
The changes on this precept: now, let me 10 Reverse the peal! Quia dato licito fine, Ad illum assequendum ordinata Non sunt damnanda media, — licit end Enough was found in mere escape from

death,
To legalise our means illicit else Of feigned love, false allurements, fancied
fact.

Thus Venus losing Cupid on a day, (See that *Idyllium Moschi*¹) seeking help,
In the anxiety of motherhood, Allowably promised "Who shall bring report

20 "Where he is wandered to, my winged
babe,

"I give him for reward a nectared kiss;
"But who brings safely back the truant's
self,

"His be a super-sweet makes kiss seem cold!"

Are not these things writ for example-
sake?

To such permitted motive, then, refer All those professions, else were hard explain,
Of hope, fear, jealousy, and the rest of
love!

He is Myrtilus, Amaryllis² she,
She burns, he freezes, — all a mere device

30 To catch and keep the man, may save her
life,

Whom otherwise nor catches she nor keeps!

Worst, once, turns best now: in all faith,
she feigns:

Feigning, — the liker innocence to guilt,
The truer to the life in what she feigns!

How if Ulysses, — when, for public good He sunk particular qualms and played the spy,

Entered Troy's hostile gate in beggar's garb —

How if he first had boggled at this clout, Grown dainty o'er that clack-dish?
Grime is grace

40 To whoso gropes amid the dung for gold.

Hence, beyond promises, we praise each
proof

¹ Idyllium Moschi: Moschus, Idyll, I. 4. 5.

² Myrtilus, Amaryllis: typical pastoral lovers.

That promise was not simply made to break,

Mere moonshine-structure meant to fade
at dawn:

We praise, as consequent and requisite, What, enemies allege, were more than
words,

Deeds — meetings at the window, twilight-trysts,

Nocturnal entertainments in the dim Old labyrinthine palace; lies, we know — Inventions we, long since, turned inside
out.

Must such external semblance of intrigue 54 Demonstrate that intrigue there lurks perdue?

Does every hazel-sheath disclose a nut?
He were a Molinist who dared maintain That midnight meetings in a screened alcove

Must argue folly in a matron — since
So would he bring a slur on Judith's self, Commended beyond women, that she lured

The lustful to destruction through his lust.
Pompilia took not Judith's liberty,
No faulchion find you in her hand to smite, 60
No damsel to convey in dish the head Of Holophernes, — style the Canon so — Or is it the Count? If I entangle me With my similitudes, — if wax wings melt, And earthward down I drop, not mine the
fault:

Blame your beneficence, O Court, O sun, Whereof the beamy smile affects my
flight!

What matter, so Pompilia's fame revive I' the warmth that proves the bane of Icarus?

Yea, we have shown it lawful, necessary 70 Pompilia leave her husband, seek the
house

O' the parents: and because 'twixt home and home

Lies a long road with many a danger rife, Lions by the way and serpents in the path, To rob and ravish, — much behoves she keep

Each shadow of suspicion from fair fame
For her own sake much, but for his sake
more,

The ingrate husband's. Evidence shall
be,

Plain witness to the world how white she walks

I' the mire she wanders through ere Rome 80 she reach.

And who so proper witness as a priest?
Gainsay ye? Let me hear who dares gainsay!

I hope we still can punish heretics!
"Give me the man" I say with him of Gath,

"That we may fight together!" None, I think:
The priest is granted me.

Then, if a priest,
One juvenile and potent: else, mayhap,
That dragon, our Saint George would slay, slays him.
And should fair face accompany strong
hand,
The more complete equipment: nothing
mars
Work, else praiseworthy, like a bodily flaw I' the worker: as 'tis said Saint Paul himself Deplored the check o' the puny presence,
still

Cheating his fulmination of its flash, Albeit the bolt therein went true to oak.
Therefore the agent, as prescribed, she takes, —
Both juvenile and potent, handsome
too, —
In all obedience: "good," you grant again.
Do you? I would you were the husband,
lords!

How prompt and facile might departure
be!

How boldly would Pompilia and the priest March out of door, spread flag at beat of drum,

But that inapprehensive Guido grants Neither premiss nor yet conclusion here, And, purblind, dreads a bear in every bush!

For his own quietude and comfort, then, Means must be found for flight in masquerade

At hour when all things sleep. — "Save jealousy!"

Right, Judges! Therefore shall the lady's wit

Supply the boon thwart nature baulks him of,

And do him service with the potent drug (Helen's nepenthe,¹ as my lords opine) Which respites blessedly each fretted nerve

O' the much-enduring man: accordingly, There lies he, duly dosed and sound
asleep,

Relieved of woes or real or raved about.
While soft she leaves his side, he shall not wake;

Nor stop who steals away to join her
friend,

Nor do him mischief should he catch that
friend

Intent on more than friendly office, —
nay,

¹ Nepenthe: a drug given to Helen by the Egyptian Polydamna, producing forgetfulness of pain (Homer, Od. IV. 220-230).

Nor get himself raw head and bones laid
bare
In payment of his apparition!

Thus
Would I defend the step, — were the thing
true
Which is a fable, — see my former ¹¹
speech, —
That Guido slept (who never slept a wink) Through treachery, an opiate from his
wife,
Who not so much as knew what opiates
mean.

Now she may start: or hist, — a stoppage
still!

A journey is an enterprise of cost!
As in campaigns, we fight but others pay,
*Suis expensis, nemo militat.*²
'Tis Guido's self we guard from accident, Ensuring safety to Pompilia, versed Nowise in misadventures by the way, ⁵⁰ Hard riding and rough quarters, the rude fare,

The unready host. What magic mitigates Each plague of travel to the unpractised
wife?

Money, sweet Sirs! And were the fiction
fact

She helped herself thereto with liberal hand From out her husband's store, — what fitter use

Was ever husband's money destined to?
With bag and baggage thus did Dido once Decamp, — for more authority, a queen!

So is she fairly on her route at last, ⁶⁰ Prepared for either fortune: nay and if The priest, now all a-glow with enterprise, Cool somewhat presently when fades the flush

O' the first adventure, clouded o'er belike By doubts, misgivings how the day may
die,

Though born with such auroral brilliance,
— if

The brow seem over-pensive and the lip
'Gin lag and lose the prattle lightsome
late, —

Vanquished by tedium of a prolonged jaunt

In a close carriage o'er a jolting road, ⁷⁰
With only one young female substitute For seventeen other Canons of ripe age Were wont to keep him company in
church, —

Shall not Pompilia haste to dissipate
The silent cloud that, gathering, bodes her bale? —

Prop the irresoluteness may portend

² Suis expensis, nemo militat: "no one goeth a warfare at his own cost."

- Suspension of the project, check the flight, Bring ruin on them both? Use every
means, Since means to the end are lawful! What i' the way Of wile should have allowance like a kiss
Sagely and sisterly administered, Sororia saltem oscula? We find Such was the remedy her wit applied To each incipient scruple of the priest,
If we believe, — as, while my wit is mine 10 I cannot, — what the driver testifies, Borsi, called Venerino, the mere tool Of Guido and his friend the Governor, — Avowal I proved wrung from out the wretch,
After long rotting in imprisonment,
As price of liberty and favour: long They tempted, he at last succumbed, and lo Counted them out full tale each kiss and
more,
"The journey being one long embrace," quothe he.
Still, though we should believe the driver's
lie, 20 Nor even admit as probable excuse, Right reading of the riddle, — as I urged In my first argument, with fruit perhaps — That what the owl-like eyes (at back of
head!)
O' the driver, drowsed by driving night and day, Supposed a vulgar interchange of lips,
This was but innocent jog of head 'gainst
head, Cheek meeting jowl as apple may touch pear
From branch and branch contiguous in the wind,
When Autumn blusters and the orchard rocks: — 30 That rapid run and the rough road were
cause
O' the casual ambiguity, no harm
I' the world to eyes awake and penetrative.
Say, — not to grasp a truth I can release And safely fight without, yet conquer
still, —
Say, she kissed him, say, he kissed her
again!
Such osculation was a potent means,
A very efficacious help, no doubt:
Such with a third part of her nectar did Venus imbue: why should Pompilia fling 40 The poet's declaration in his teeth? — Pause to employ what — since it had success,
And kept the priest her servant to the
end —
We must presume of energy enough,
No whit superfluous, so permissible?
- The goal is gained: day, night and yet a
day
Have run their round: a long and devious
road
Istraversed, — many manners, various men Passed in review, what cities did they see,
What hamlets mark, what profitable food
For after-meditation cull and store! 50 Till Rome, that Rome whereof — this
voice
Would it might make our Molinists observe,
That she is built upon a rock nor shall Their powers prevail against her! — Rome, I say, Is all but reached; one stage more and they stop Saved: pluck up heart, ye pair, and forward, then!
- Ah, Nature — baffled she recurs, alas!
Nature imperiously exacts her due,
Spirit is willing but the flesh is weak:
Pompilia needs must acquiesce and swoon, 60 Give hopes alike and fears a breathing-
while.
The innocent sleep soundly: sound she sleeps,
So let her slumber, then, unguarded save
By her own chastity, a triple mail,
And his good hand whose stalwart arms have borne The sweet and senseless burthen like a babe
From coach to couch, — the serviceable
strength!
Nay, what and if he gazed rewardedly
On the pale beauty prisoned in embrace, Stooped over, stole a balmy breath per- 70
haps
For more assurance sleep was not decease —
"Ut vidi," "how I saw!" succeeded by "Ut perii," "how I sudden lost my brains!"
— What harm ensued to her unconscious
quite?
For, curiosity — how natural!
Importunateness — what a privilege In the ardent sex! And why curb ardour
here?
How can the priest but pity whom he saved?
And pity is so near to love, and love
So neighbourly to all unreasonableness! 80
As to love's object, whether love were sage Or foolish, could Pompilia know or care, Being still sound asleep, as I premised?
Thus the philosopher absorbed by thought,
Even Archimedes, busy o'er a book
The while besiegers sacked his Syracuse, Was ignorant of the imminence o' the
point

O' the sword till it surprised him: let it stab,
And never knew himself was dead at all.
So sleep thou on, secure whate'er betide!
For thou, too, hast thy problem hard to solve — How so much beauty is compatible With so much innocence!

Fit place, methinks,
While in this task she rosily is lost,
To treat of and repel objection here Which, — frivolous, I grant, — my mind misgives,
May somehow still have flitted, gadfly-
like,
And teased the Court at times — as if, all
said
And done, there seemed, the Court might nearly say,
In a certain acceptance, somewhat more
Of what may pass for insincerity, Falsehood, throughout the course Pom-pilia took,
Than befits Christian. Pagans held, we
know,
Man always ought to aim at good and
truth,
Not always put one thing in the same
words:

Non idem semper dicere sed spectare Debemus. But the Pagan yoke was light; “Lie not at all,” the exacter precept bids: Each least lie breaks the law, — is sin, we hold.

I humble me, but venture to submit —
What prevents sin, itself is sinless, sure:
And sin, which hinders sin of deeper dye, Softens itself away by contrast so.
Conceive me! Little sin, by none at all,
Were properly condemned for great: but great,

By greater, dwindles into small again.
Now, what is greatest sin of womanhood?
That which unwomans it, abolishes
The nature of the woman, — impudence.
Who contradicts me here? Concede me,
then,

Whatever friendly fault may interpose
To save the sex from self-abolishment Is three-parts on the way to virtue's rank!
And, what is taxed here as duplicity, Feint, wile and trick, — admitted for the nonce, —

What worse do one and all than interpose, Hold, as it were, a deprecating hand, Statuesquely, in the Mediccan mode,¹ Before shame which modesty would veil?
Who blames the gesture prettily perverse?
Thus, — lest ye miss a point illustrative, —

Admit the husband's calumny — allow That the wife, having penned the epistle fraught With horrors, charge on charge of crime she heaped
O' the head of Pietro and Violante — (still Presumed her parents) — having dispatched the same To their arch-enemy Paolo, through free
choice
And no sort of compulsion in the world —
Put case she next discards simplicity For craft, denies the voluntary act, Declares herself a passive instrument I' the husband's hands; that, duped by knavery,
She traced the characters she could not
write,
And took on trust the unread sense which,
read,
And recognised were to be spurned at once:
Allow this calumny, I reiterate!
Who is so dull as wonder at the pose 60
Of our Pompilia in the circumstance?
Who sees not that the too-ingenuous soul, Repugnant even at a duty done Which brought beneath too scrutinising glare

The misdemeanours, — buried in the
dark, —
Of the authors of her being, as believed, — Stung to the quick at her impulsive deed,
And willing to repair what harm it worked,
She — wise in this beyond what Nero
proved,
Who when folk urged the candid juvenile 70
To sign the warrant, doom the guilty dead, “Would I had never learned to write,”
quoth he!
—Pompilia rose above the Roman, cried “To read or write I never learned at all!”
O splendidly mendacious!

But time fleets:
Let us not linger: hurry to the end,
Since flight does end, and that disastrously.
Beware ye blame desert for unsuccess, Disparage each expedient else to praise,
Call failure folly! Man's best effort fails. 80 After ten years' resistance Troy succumbed:
Could valour save a town, Troy still had
stood.
Pompilia came off halting in no point Of courage, conduct, her long journey
through:
But nature sank exhausted at the close,
And as I said, she swooned and slept all
night.
Morn breaks and brings the husband: we assist
At the spectacle. Discovery succeeds.

Ha, how is this? What moonstruck rage is here?

Though we confess to partial frailty now,
To error in a woman and a wife, Is't by the rough way she shall be reclaimed?

Who bursts upon her chambered privacy?
What crowd profanes the chaste cubi-culum?

What outcries and lewd laughter, scurril gibe

And ribald jest to scare the ministrant Good angels that commerce with souls in
sleep?

10 Why, had the worst crowned Guido to his wish,

Confirmed his most irrational surmise, Yet there be bounds to man's emotion, checks

To an immoderate astonishment.
'Tis decent horror, regulated wrath, Befit our dispensation: have we back The old Pagan licence? Shall a Vulcan
clap

His net o' the sudden and expose the pair

To the unquenchable universal mirth?
A feat, antiquity saw scandal in 20 So clearly, that the nauseous tale thereof — Demodocus his nugatory song¹ —

Hath ever been concluded modern stuff Impossible to the mouth of the grave Muse, So, foisted into that Eighth Odyssey By some impertinent pickthank. O thou
fool,

Count Guido Franceschini, what didst
gain

By publishing thy secret to the world?
Were all the precepts of the wise a waste — Bred in thee not one touch of reverence?

10 Admit thy wife — admonish we the fool, — Were falseness' self, why chronicle thy
shame?

Much rather should thy teeth bite out thy
tongue,

Dumb lip consort with desecrated brow, Silence become historiographer,
And thou — thine own Cornelius Tacitus!
But virtue, barred, still leaps the barrier,
lords!

— Still, moon-like, penetrates the encroaching mist

And bursts, all broad and bare, on night, ye know!

Surprised, then, in the garb of truth, perhaps,

10 Pompilia, thus opposed, breaks obstacle, Springs to her feet, and stands Thalassianpure,²

Confronts the foe, — nay, catches at his
sword

And tries to kill the intruder, he complains.
Why, so she gave her lord his lesson back, Crowned him, this time, the virtuous woman's way,

With an exact obedience; he brought
sword,

She drew the same, since swords are meant to draw.

Tell not me 'tis sharp play with tools on edge!

It was the husband chose the weapon here.
Why did not he inaugurate the game 50

With some gentility of apophthegm Still pregnant on the philosophic page,

Some captivating cadence still a-lisp O' the poet's lyre? Such spells subdue the surge,

Make tame the tempest, much more mitigate

The passions of the mind, and probably Had moved Pompilia to a smiling blush.

No, he must needs prefer the argument O' the blow: and she obeyed, in duty
bound,

Returned him buffet ratiocinative — 60
Ay, in the reasoner's own interest,

For wife must follow whither husband leads,

Vindicate honour as himself prescribes, Save him the very way himself bids save!

No question but who jumps into a quag Should stretch forth hand and pray us
"Pull me out

"By the hand!" such were the customary
cry:

But Guido pleased to bid "Leave hand
alone!

"Join both feet, rather, jump upon my
head:

"I extricate myself by the rebound!" 70
And dutifully as enjoined she jumped —

Drew his own sword and menaced his own
life,

Anything to content a wilful spouse.

And so he was contented — one must do justice to the expedient which succeeds, Strange as it seem: at flourish of the blade,

The crowd drew back, stood breathless and abashed,

Then murmured "This should be no wanton wife,

"No conscience-stricken sinner, caught i'
the act,

"And patiently awaiting our first stone: 80
"But a poor hard-pressed all-bewildered
thing,

"Has rushed so far, misguidedly perhaps,

"Meaning no more harm than a fright ened sheep.

Od. VIII. 266-366.

² Thalassian-pure: pure as the sea; from thalassa, the Greek word for sea.

'She sought for aid; and if she made mistake
'T' the man could aid most, why — so mortals do:
"Even the blessed Magdalen mistook
"Far less forgiveably: consult the place —
"Supposing him to be the gardener,
"Sir," said she, and so following." Why more words?
Forthwith the wife is pronounced innocent:
What would the husband more than gain his cause,
And find that honour flash in the world's eye,
His apprehension was lest soil had smirched?

So, happily the adventure comes to close Whereon my fat opponent grounds his charge Preposterous: at mid-day he groans "How dark!"
Listen to me, thou Archangelic swine!
Where is the ambiguity to blame,
The flaw to find in our Pompilia? Safe She stands, see! Does thy comment follow quick "Safe, inasmuch as at the end proposed;
"But thither she picked way by devious path —
"Stands dirtied, no dubiety at all!
"I recognise success, yet, all the same,
"Importunately will suggestion prompt —
"Better Pompilia gained the right to boast
"No devious path, no doubtful patch was mine,
"I saved my head nor sacrificed my foot!"
"Why, being in a peril, show mistrust
"Of the angels set to guard the innocent?
"Why rather hold by obvious vulgar help
"Of stratagem and subterfuge, excused "Somewhat, but still no less a foil, a fault,
"Since low with high, and good with bad is linked?
"Methinks I view some ancient bas-relief.
"There stands Hesione¹ thrust out by Troy,
"Her father's hand has chained her to a crag,
"Her mother's from the virgin plucked the vest,
"At a safe distance both distressful watch,
"While near and nearer comes the snorting orc.
"I lock that, white and perfect to the end,

¹ Hesione: daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, exposed on a rock to avert a plague caused by her father's breach of faith, and saved by Hercules, son of Alcmena.

"She wait till Jove dispatch some demi-god;
"Not that, — impatient of celestial club 44
"Alcmena's son should brandish at the beast, —
"She daub, disguise her dainty limbs with pitch,
"And so elude the purblind monster! Ay,
"The trick succeeds, but 'tis an ugly trick,
"Where needs have been no trick!"

My answer? Faugh; Nimis incongrue! Too absurdly put!
Scientiam ego teneo contrariam, Trick, I maintain, had no alternative.
The heavens were bound with brass, — Jove far at feast (No feast like that thou didst not ask me 50 to, Arcangeli, — I heard of thy regale!)
With the unblamed Æthiop,² — Hercules spun wool
I' the lap of Omphale, while Virtue shrieked —
The brute came paddling all the faster.
You
O! Troy, who stood at distance, where's the aid You offered in the extremity? Most and least, Gentle and simple, here the Governor,
There the Archbishop, everywhere the friends, Shook heads and waited for a miracle,
Or went their way, left Virtue to her 60 fate.
Just this one rough and ready man leapt forth!
— Was found, sole anti-Fabius³ (dare I say) Who restored things, with no delay at all, Qui haud cunctando rem restituit! He,
He only, Caponsacchi 'mid a crowd, Caught Virtue up, carried Pompilia off Through gaping impotence of sympathy In ranged Arezzo: what you take for pitch, Is nothing worse, belike, than black and blue, Mere evanescent proof that hardy hands 70
Did yeomen's service, cared not where the gripe Was more than duly energetic; bruised,
She smarts a little, but her bones are saved
A fracture, and her skin will soon show sleek.
How it disgusts when weakness, false-refined,

² With the unblamed Æthiop: as described by Homer, Il. i. 423.

³ Anti-Fabius: the antithesis of Q. Fabius Maximus, qui cunctando restituit rem, who, in the second Punic war, restored the fortunes of Rome by delay, i.e., by avoiding pitched battles

Censures the honest rude effective strength, —

When sickly dreamers of the impossible Decry plain sturdiness which does the feat With eyes wide open!

Did occasion serve,
I could illustrate, if my lords allow;
Quid vetat, what forbids I aptly ask With Horace, that I give my anger vent, While I let breathe, no less, and recreate,
The gravity of my Judges, by a tale?

10 A case in point — what though an apologue

Graced by tradition? — possibly a fact:
Tradition must precede all scripture,
words

Serve as our warrant ere our books can be:
So, to tradition back we needs must go For any fact's authority: and this Hath lived so far (like jewel hid in muck)
On page of that old lying vanity Called "Sepher Toldoth Yeschu:" God be
praised,

I read no Hebrew, — take the thing on
trust:

20 But I believe the writer meant no good (Blind as he was to truth in some respects) To our pestiferous and schismatic . . .
well,

My lords' conjecture be the touchstone,
show

The thing for what it is! The author lacks

Discretion, and his zeal exceeds: but zeal, —

How rare in our degenerate day! Enough!
Here is the story: fear not, I shall chop And change a little, else my Jew would press

All too unmannerly before the Court.

30 It happened once, — begins this foolish
Jew,

Pretending to write Christian history, — That three, held greatest, best and worst of men,

Peter and John and Judas, spent a day In toil and travel through the country-side
On some sufficient business — I suspect, Suppression of some Molinism i' the bud.
Foot-sore and hungry, dropping with fatigue,

They reached by nightfall a poor lonely grange,

Hostel or inn: so, knocked and entered
there.

40 "Your pleasure, great ones?" — "Shelter, rest and food!"

For shelter, there was one bare room
above;

For rest therein, three beds of bundled
straw:

For food, one wretched starveling fowl, no
more —

Meat for one mouth, but mockery for three.

"You have my utmost." How should supper serve?

Peter broke silence: "To the spit with fowl!

"And while 'tis cooking, sleep! — since beds there be,

"And, so far, satisfaction of a want.

"Sleep we an hour, awake at supper-time,

"Then each of us narrate the dream he had,

"And he whose dream shall prove the happiest, point

"The clearliest out the dreamer as ordained

"Beyond his fellows to receive the fowl,

"Him let our shares be cheerful tribute to,

"His the entire meal, may it do him good!"

Who could dispute so plain a consequence?

So said, so done: each hurried to his straw,

Slept his hour's-sleep and dreamed his dream, and woke.

"I," commenced John, "dreamed that I gained the prize

"We all aspire to: the proud place was
mine,

"Throughout the earth and to the end of
time

"I was the Loved Disciple: mine the meal!"

"But I," proceeded Peter, "dreamed, a
word

"Gave me the headship of our company,
"Made me the Vicar and Vice-gerent,

gave
"The keys of heaven and hell into my
hand,

"And o'er the earth, dominion: mine the meal!"

"While I," submitted in soft under-tone
The Iscariot — sense of his unworthiness

Turning each eye up to the inmost white — With long-drawn sigh, yet letting both lips smack,

"I have had just the pitifullest dream

"That ever proved man meanest of his mates,

"And born foot-washer and foot-wiper,
nay

"Foot-kisser to each comrade of you all!

"I dreamed I dreamed; and in that mimic
dream

"(Impalpable to dream as dream to fact)
"Methought I meanly chose to sleep no
wink

"But wait until I heard my brethren snore;
"Then stole from couch, slipped noiseless o'er the planks,

"Slid downstairs, furtively approached the hearth,

"Found the fowl duly brown, both back and breast,

"Hissing in harmony with the cricket's chirp,
 "Grilled to a point; said no grace but fell
 to,
 "Nor finished till the skeleton lay bare.
 "In penitence for which ignoble dream,
 "Lo, I renounce my portion cheerfully!
 "Fie on the flesh — be mine the ethereal gust,
 "And yours the sublunary sustenance!
 "See that whate'er be left ye give the poor!"
 Down the two scuttled, one on other's heel,
 Stung by a fell surmise; and found, alack,
 A goodly savour, both the drumstick bones,
 And that which henceforth took the appropriate name O' the Merry-thought, in memory of the
 fact
 That to keep wide awake is man's best
 dream.
 So, — as was said once of Thucydides And his sole joke, "The lion, lo, hath laughed!" —
 Just so, the Governor and all that's great l' the city, never meant that Innocence Should quite starve while Authority sat at meat;
 They meant to fling a bone at banquet's
 end:
 Wished well to our Pompilia — in their dreams, Nor bore the secular sword in vain —
 asleep.
 Just so the Archbishop and all good like
 him
 Went to bed meaning to pour oil and wine l' the wounds of her, next day, — but long ere day, They had burned the one and drunk the other, while Just so, again, contrariwise, the priest Sustained poor Nature in extremity By stuffing barley-bread into her mouth, Saving Pompilia (grant the parallel)
 By the plain homely and straightforward
 way Taught him by common sense. Let others shriek
 "Oh what refined expedients did we dream
 "Proved us the only fit to help the fair!" He cried "A carriage waits, jump in with
 me!" And now, this application pardoned,
 lords, —
 This recreative pause and breathing-
 while, —
 Back to beseeingness and gravity!
 For Law steps in: Guido appeals to Law, Demands she arbitrate, — does well for
 once.

O Law, of thee how neatly was it said
 By that old Sophocles,¹ thou hast thy seat l' the very breast of Jove, no meanlier throned!
 Here is a piece of work now, hitherto Begun and carried on, concluded near, Without an eye-glance cast thy sceptre's
 way;
 And, lo the stumbling and discomfiture!
 Well may you call them "lawless" means, men take
 To extricate themselves through mother-wit
 When tangled haply in the toils of life! 50
 Guido would try conclusions with his foe, Whoe'er the foe was and whate'er the offence;
 He would recover certain dowry-dues:
 Instead of asking Law to lend a hand, What pothor of sword drawn and pistol cocked,
 What peddling with forged letters and paid spies,
 Politic circumvention! — all to end
 As it began — by loss of the fool's head,
 First in a figure, presently in a fact.
 It is a lesson to mankind at large. 65 How other were the end, would men be
 sage
 And bear confidingly each quarrel straight, O Law, to thy recipient mother-knees!
 How would the children light come and prompt go,
 This with a red-cheeked apple for reward,
 The other, peradventure red-cheeked too l' the rear, by taste of birch for punishment.
 No foolish brawling murder any more!
 Peace for the household, practice for the Fisc,
 And plenty for the exchequer of my lords! 70 Too much to hope, in this world: in the
 next,
 Who knows? Since, why should sit the Twelve enthroned
 To judge the tribes, unless the tribes be judged?
 And 'tis impossible but offences come:
 So, all's one lawsuit, all one long leet-day!²
 Forgive me this digression — that I stand Entranced awhile at Law's first beam, outbreak
 O' the business, when the Count's good angel bade
 "Put up thy sword, born enemy to the ear,
 "And let Law listen to thy difference!" 80 And Law does listen and compose the
 strife,
 Settle the suit, how wisely and how well!
 On our Pompilia, faultless to a fault,

 Ζητος ἀρχαίους νόμοις.

² Leet-day: day on which the court sits.

Law bends a brow maternally severe,
Implies the worth of perfect chastity,
By fancying the flaw she cannot find.
Superfluous sifting snow, nor helps nor harms:

'Tis safe to censure levity in youth,
Tax womanhood with indiscretion, sure!
Since toys, permissible to-day, become Follies to-morrow: prattle shocks in church:

And that curt skirt which lets a maiden skip,

10 The matron changes for a trailing robe.
Mothers may aim a blow with half-shut eyes

Nodding above their spindles by the fire,
And chance to hit some hidden fault, else safe.

Just so, Law hazarded a punishment —
If applicable to the circumstance, Why, well! if not so apposite, well too.

"Quit the gay range o' the world," I hear her cry,

"Enter, in lieu, the penitential pound:
"Exchange the gauds of pomp for ashes,
dust!

20 "Leave each mollitious haunt of luxury!
"The golden-garnished silken-couched alcove,

"The many-columned terrace that so tempts

"Feminine soul put foot forth, extend ear
"To fluttering joy of lover's serenade, —

"Leave these for cellular seclusion! mask
"And dance no more, but fast and pray!
avaunt —

"Be burned, thy wicked townsman's sonnet-book!

"Welcome, mild hymnal by . . . some better scribe!

"For the warm arms were wont enfold thy flesh,

30 "Let wire-shirt plough and whiplash discipline!"

If such an exhortation proved, perchance, Inapplicable, words bestowed in waste, What harm, since Law has store, can spend nor miss?

And so, our paragon submits herself,
Goes at command into the holy house,
And, also at command, comes out again:
For, could the effect of such obedience
prove

Too certain, too immediate? Being healed,

Go blaze abroad the matter, blessed one!

40 Art thou sound forthwith? Speedily vacate

The step by pool-side, leave Bethesda free To patients plentifully posted round, Since the whole need not the physician!

Brief,

She may betake her to her parents' place.

Welcome her, father, with wide arms once more,

Motion her, mother, to thy breast again!

For why? Since Law relinquishes the charge,

Grants to your dwelling-place a prison's style,

Rejoice you with Pompilia! golden days, Redeunt Saturnia regna. Six weeks slip, 5

And she is domiciled in house and home
As though she thence had never budged at all.

And thither let the husband, — joyous, ay,
But contrite also — quick betake himself, Proud that his dove which lay among the pots

Hath mued¹ those dingy feathers, — moulded now,

Shows silver bosom clothed with yellow gold!

So shall he tempt her to the perch she fled, Bid to domestic bliss the truant back.

But let him not delay! Time fleets how fast,

And opportunity, the irrevocable, Once flown will flout him! Is the furrow traced?

If field with corn ye fail preoccupy, Darnell for wheat and thistle-beards for grain,

Infelix lolium, carduus horridus,
Will grow apace in combination prompt,
Defraud the husbandman of his desire.

Already — hie! — what murmurs 'monish
now

The laggard? — doubtful, nay, fantastic bruit

Of such an apparition, such return Interdum, to anticipate the spouse,

Of Caponsacchi's very self! 'Tis said,
When nights are lone and company is rare,
His visitations brighten winter up.

If so they did — which nowise I believe — (How can I? — proof abounding that the
priest,

Once fairly at his relegation-place, Never once left it) still, admit he stole A midnight march, would fain see friend
again,

Find matter for instruction in the past,
Renew the old adventure in such chat
As cheers a fireside! He was lonely too,
He, too, must need his recreative hour.

Shall it amaze the philosophic mind If he, long wont the empurpled cup to quaff,

Have feminine society at will,
Being debarred abruptly from all drink Save at the spring which Adam used for
wine,

Dreads harm to just the health he hoped to guard,

And, trying abstinence, gains malady?
Ask Tozzi, now physician to the Pope!
"Little by little break" — (I hear he bids Master Arcangeli my antagonist, Who loves good cheer, and may indulge too
much:

So I explain the logic of the plea Wherewith he opened our proceedings
late) —

"Little by little break a habit, Don,
"Become necessity to feeble flesh!"
And thus, nocturnal taste of intercourse (Which never happened, — but, suppose it did)

May have been used to dishabituate
By sip and sip this drainer to the dregs O' the draught of conversation, — heady
stuff,

Brewage which, broached, it took two days and nights

To properly discuss i' the journey, Sirs!
Such power has second-nature, men call
use,

That un delightful objects get to charm
Instead of chafe: the daily colocynth Tickles the palate by repeated dose, Old sores scratch kindly, the ass makes a
push,

Although the mill-yoke-wound be smarting yet,

For mill-door bolted on a holiday:
Nor must we marvel here if impulse urge To talk the old story over now and then, The hopes and fears, the stoppage and the haste, —

Subjects of colloquy to surfeit once.
"Here did you bid me twine a rosy wreath!"

"And there you paid my lips a compliment!"

"Here you admired the tower could be so tall!"

"And there you likened that of Lebanon
"To the nose of the beloved!" Trifles!
still,

"Forsan et hæc olim,"¹ — such trifles
serve

To make the minutes pass in winter-time.

Husband, return then, I re-counsel thee!
For, finally, of all glad circumstance Should make a prompt return imperative, What in the world awaits thee, dost suppose?

O' the sudden, as good gifts are wont be-
fall,

What is the hap of our unconscious Count?
That which lights bonfire and sets cask a-tilt,

¹ Forsan et hæc olim meminisse iuvabit: Virgil, Æn. I. 203 — "Perchance one day we shall take pleasure in recalling even these experiences."

Dissolves the stubborn'st heart in jollity.
O admirable, there is born a babe,
A son, an heir, a Franceschini last And best o' the stock! Pompilia, thine the palm!

Repaying incredulity with faith, Ungenerous thrift of each marital debt
With bounty in profuse expenditure, Pompilia scorns to have the old year end Without a present shall ring in the new — 51 Bestows on her too-parsimonious lord
An infant for the apple of his eye, Core of his heart, and crown completing
life,

True summum bonum of the earthly lot!
"We," saith ingeniously the sage, "are born

"Solely that others may be born of us."

So, father, take thy child, for thine that
child,

Oh nothing doubt! In wedlock born, law holds

Baseness impossible: since "filius est
"Quem nuptiæ demonstrant," twits the text 60 Whoever dares to doubt.

Yet doubt he dares!

O faith, where art thou flown from out the
world?

Already on what an age of doubt we fall!
Instead of each disputing for the prize,

The babe is bandied here from that to this.
Whose the babe? "Cujum pecus?"²

Guido's lamb?

"An Melibæi?" Nay, but of the priest!

"Non sed Ægonis!" Someone must be
sire:

And who shall say, in such a puzzling strait,

If there were not vouchsafed some miracle 70
To the wife who had been harassed and abused

More than enough by Guido's family
For non-production of the promised fruit

Of marriage? What if Nature, I demand, Touched to the quick by taunts upon her
sloth,

Had roused herself, put forth recondite
power,

Bestowed this birth to vindicate her sway,
Like the strange favour, Maro memorised

As granted Aristæus when his hive Lay empty of the swarm? not one more 80
bee —

Not one more babe to Franceschini's
house!

And lo, a new birth filled the air with joy, Sprung from the bowels of the generous steer,

A novel son and heir rejoiced the Count!

² Cujum pecus, &c.: a quotation from Virgil, Ecl. 3, 1, except that sed should be verum;

"Whose is this flock, — Melibæus?" "Nay.
Ægon's."

Spontaneous generation, need I prove,
Were facile feat to Nature at a pinch?
Let whoso doubts, steep horsehair certain weeks

In water, there will be produced a snake; Spontaneous product of the horse, which horse

Happens to be the representative —
Now that I think on't — of Arezzo's self,
The very city our conception blessed:
Is not a prancing horse the City-arms?

• What sane eye fails to see coincidence?
Cur ego, boast thou, my Pompilia, then,
Desperem fieri sine conjuge Mater — how well the Ovidian distich suits! —

Et parere intacto dummodo Casta viro? Such miracle was wrought!
Note, further, as to mark the prodigy, The babe in question neither took the
name

Of Guido, from the sire presumptive, nor Giuseppe, from the sire potential, but 20 Gaetano — last saint of our hierarchy, And newest namer for a thing so new!
What other motive could have prompted
choice?

Therefore be peace again: exult, ye hills!
Ye vales rejoicingly break forth in song!
Incipe, parve puer, begin, small boy, Risu cognoscere patrem, with a laugh To recognise thy parent! Nor do thou Boggle, oh parent, to return the grace!
Nec anceps hære, pater, puero

30 Cognoscendo — one may well eke out the prayer!

In vain! The perverse Guido doubts his
eyes,

Distrusts assurance, lets the devil drive.
Because his house is swept and garnished
now,

He, having summoned seven like himself, Must hurry thither, knock and enter in,
And make the last worse than the first,
indeed!

Is he content? We are. No further
blame

O' the man and murder! They were stigmatised

Befittingly: the Court heard long ago

40 My mind o' the matter, which, outpouring
full,

Has long since swept like surge, i' the simile

Of Homer, overborne both dyke and dam,
And whelmed alike client and advocate:
His fate is sealed, his life as good as gone,
On him I am not tempted to waste word.
Yet though my purpose holds, — which was and is

And solely shall be to the very end,
To draw the true effigies of a saint,
Do justice to perfection in the sex, —

Yet let not some gross pamperer of the flesh

And niggard in the spirit's nourishment, Whose feeding hath offuscated his wit Rather than law, — he never had, to lose —

Let not such advocate object to me I leave my proper function of attack!

"What's this to Bacchus?" — (in the classic phrase,

Well used, for once) he hiccups probably.
O Advocate o' the Poor, thou born to
make

Their blessing void — beati pauperes!

By painting saintship I depicture sin: Beside my pearl, I prove how black thy jet,

And, through Pompilia's virtue, Guido's
crime.

Back to her, then, — with but one beauty
more,

End we our argument, — one crowning
grace

Pre-eminent 'mid agony and death.

For to the last Pompilia played her part, Used the right means to the permissible
end,

And, wily as an eel that stirs the mud Thick overhead, so baffling spearman's
thrust,

She, while he stabbed her, simulated
death,

Delayed, for his sake, the catastrophe, Obtained herself a respite, four days'
grace,

Whereby she told her story to the world,
Enabled me to make the present speech,
And, by a full confession, saved her soul.

Yet hold, even here would malice leer its
last,

Gurgle its choked remonstrance: snake, hiss free!

Oh, that's the objection? And to whom?
— not her

But me, forsooth — as, in the very act Of both confession and (what followed
close)

Subsequent talk, chatter and gossipry, Babble to sympathising he and she Whoever chose besiege her dying bed, — As this were found at variance with my
tale,

Falsified all I have adduced for truth,
Admitted not one peccadillo here, Pretended to perfection, first and last, O' the whole procedure — perfect in the
end,

Perfect i' the means, perfect in everything, Leaving a lawyer nothing to excuse, Reason away and show his skill about!
— A flight, impossible to Adamic flesh, Must to be fancied, scarcely to be wished

And, anyhow, unpleadable in court!
 "How reconcile," gasps Malice, "that with this?"

Your "this," friend, is extraneous to the
 law,

Comes of men's outside meddling, the unskilled

Interposition of such fools as press Out of their province. Must I speak my
 mind?

Far better had Pompilia died o' the spot Than found a tongue to wag and shame
 the law,

Shame most of all herself, — could friendship fail

And advocacy lie less on the alert:
 But no, they shall protect her to the end!
 Do I credit the alleged narration? No!
 Lied our Pompilia then, to laud herself?
 Still, no! Clear up what seems discrepancy?

The means abound: art's long, though time is short;

So, keeping me in compass, all I urge Is — since, confession at the point of
 death,

Nam in articulo mortis, with the Church Passes for statement honest and sincere, Nemo presumitur reus esse, — then,
 If sure that all affirmed would be believed,
 'Twas charity, in her so circumstanced, To spend the last breath in one effort more for universal good of friend and foe:
 And, — by pretending utter innocence, Nay, freedom from each foible we forgive, —

Re-integrate — not solely her own fame,
 But do the like kind office for the priest Whom telling the crude truth about might vex,

Haply expose to peril, abbreviate Indeed the long career of usefulness Presumably before him: while her lord, Whose fleeting life is forfeit to the law, — What mercy to the culprit if, by just The gift of such a full certificate Of his immitigable guiltiness,
 She stifled in him the absurd conceit Of murder as it were a mere revenge — Stopped confirmation of that jealousy Which, did she but acknowledge the first flaw,

The faintest foible, had emboldened him To battle with the charge, baulk penitence,

Bar preparation for impending fate!
 Whereas, persuade him that he slew a saint Who sinned not even where she may have sinned,

You urge him all the brisklier to repent Of most and least and aught and everything!

Still, if this view of mine content you not,

Lords, nor excuse the genial falsehood
 here,

We come to our Triarii,¹ last resource: 54
 We fall back on the inexpugnable, Submitting, — she confessed before she talked!

The sacrament obliterates the sin:
 What is not, — was not, therefore, in a
 sense.

Lt Molinists distinguish, "Souls washed
 white

"But red once, still show pinkish to the eye!"

We say, abolishment is nothingness,
 And nothingness has neither head nor tail, End nor beginning! Better estimate Exorbitantly, than disparage aught 60
 Of the efficacy of the act, I hope!

Solvuntur tabulae?² May we laugh and
 go?

Well, — not before (in filial gratitude To Law, who, mighty mother, waves adieu)
 We take on us to vindicate Law's self!
 For, — yea, Sirs, — curb the start, curtail the stare! —

Remains that we apologise for haste
 I' the Law, our lady who here bristles up "Blame my procedure? Could the Court mistake?

"(Which were indeed a misery to think) 76
 "Did not my sentence in the former stage
 "O' the business bear a title plain enough?
 "Decretum" — I translate it word for
 word —

"Decreed: the priest, for his complicity
 "'I' the flight and deviation of the dame,
 "'As well as for unlawful intercourse,
 "'Is banished three years:' crime and penalty,
 "Declared alike. If he be taxed with guilt,

"How can you call Pompilia innocent?
 "If both be innocent, have I been just?" 80

Gently, O mother, judge men — whose mistake

Is in the mere misapprehensiveness!
 The Titulus atop of your decree Was but to ticket there the kind of charge
 You in good time would arbitrate upon.
 Title is one thing, — arbitration's self, Probatio, quite another possibly.
Subsistit, there holds good the old response, Responsio tradita, we must not stick,
Quod non sit attendendus Titulus, 94
 To the Title, sed Probatio, but the Proof,

¹ Triarii: the third rank in the old formation of the Roman legion, containing the oldest soldiers, and only called upon at the crisis of a battle.

² Solvuntur tabulae: from Horace, Sat. II. i., 86 — solvuntur risu tabulae, "the court will break up in laughter."

Resultans ex processu, the result
O' the Trial, and the style of punishment, Et pœna per sententiam imposita.
All is tentative, till the sentence come:
An indication of what men expect,
But nowise an assurance they shall find.
Lords, what if we permissibly relax
The tense bow, as the law-god Phœbus
bids,

- Relieve our gravity at labour's close?
10 I traverse Rome, feel thirsty, need a draught,
Look for a wine-shop, find it by the bough
Projecting as to say "Here wine is sold!"
So much I know, — "sold:" but what sort of wine?
Strong, weak, sweet, sour, home-made or foreign drink?
That much must I discover by myself.
"Wine is sold," quoth the bough, "but good or bad,
"Find, and inform us when you smack your lips!"
Exactly so, Law hangs her title forth, To show she entertains you with such
case

- 20 About such crime. Come in! she pours, you quaff.
You find the Priest good liquor in the main,
But heady and provocative of brawls:
Remand the residue to flask once more,
Lay it low where it may deposit lees,
I' the cellar: thence produce it presently,
Three years the brighter and the better!

Thus,

- Law's son, have I bestowed my filial help,
And thus I end, tenax proposito;
Point to point as I purposed have I drawn 30 Pompilia, and implied as terribly Guido: so, gazing, let the world crown
Law —

Able once more, despite my impotence,
And helped by the acumen of the Court,
To eliminate, display, make triumph
truth!
What other prize than truth were worth the pains?

There's my oration — much exceeds in length
That famed panegyric of Isocrates, They say it took him fifteen years to pen.

- But all those ancients could say anything!
40 He put in just what rushed into his head: While I shall have to prune and pare and print.
This comes of being born in modern times
With priests for auditory. Still, it pays.

X. — THE POPE.

LIKE Ahasuerus, that shrewd prince,
I will begin, — as is, these seven years now,
My daily wont, — and read a History (Written by one whose deft right hand was dust

To the last digit, ages ere my birth)
Of all my predecessors, Popes of Rome:
For though mine ancient early dropped 50
the pen,

Yet others picked it up and wrote it dry,
Since of the making books there is no end.
And so I have the Papacy complete From Peter first to Alexander last;
Can question each and take instruction so.
Have I to dare? — I ask, how dared this
Pope?

To suffer? — Suchanone, how suffered he?
Being about to judge, as now, I seek How judged once, well or ill, some other
Pope;

Study some signal judgment that subsists 60 To blaze on, or else blot, the page which seals

The sum up of what gain or loss to God Came of His one more Vicar in the world.
So, do I find example, rule of life;
So, square and set in order the next page Shall be stretched smooth o'er my own funeral cyst.

Eight hundred years exact before the year
I was made Pope, men made Formosus
Pope,

Say Sigebert and other chroniclers.
Ere I confirm or quash the Trial here
Of Guido Franceschini and his friends, Read, — How there was a ghastly Trial
once

Of a dead man by a live man, and both,
Popes:

Thus — in the antique penman's very
phrase.

"Then Stephen, Pope and seventh of the
name,

"Cried out, in synod as he sat in state,
"While choler quivered on his brow and beard,

"Come into court, Formosus, thou lost
wretch,

"That claimedst to be late Pope as even
I!"

"And at the word the great door of the
church

"Flew wide, and in they brought Formosus' self,

"The body of him, dead, even as embalsmed

"And buried duly in the Vatican
"Eight months before, exhumed thus for the nonce.

- 'They set it, that dead body of a Pope,
 'Clothed in pontific vesture now again,
 'Upright on Peter's chair as if alive.
- 'And Stephen, springing up, cried furiously
 "'Bishop of Porto, wherefore didst presume
 "'To leave that see and take this Roman see,
 "'Exchange the lesser for the greater see,
 "'—A thing against the canons of the Church?'
- "Then one — (a Deacon who, observing forms,
 "Was placed by Stephen to repel the charge,
 "Be advocate and mouthpiece of the corpse) —
 "Spoke as he dared, set stammeringly forth
 "With white lips and dry tongue, — as but a youth,
 "For frightful was the corpse-face to behold, —
 "How nowise lacked there precedent for this.
- "But when, for his last precedent of all,
 "Emboldened by the Spirit, out he blurts
 "'And, Holy Father, didst not thou thyself
 "'Vacate the lesser for the greater see,
 "'Half a year since change Arago for Rome?'
 "'— Ye have the sin's defence now, Synod mine!
 "'Shrieks Stephen in a beastly froth of rage:
 "'Judge now betwixt him dead and me alive!
 "'Hath he intruded, or do I pretend?
 "'Judge, judge! — breaks wavelike one whole foam of wrath.
- "Whereupon they, being friends and followers,
 "Said 'Ay, thou art Christ's Vicar, and not he!
 "'Away with what is frightful to behold!
 "'This act was uncanonic and a fault.'
- "Then, swallowed up in rage, Stephen exclaimed
 "'So, guilty! So, remains I punish guilt!
 "'He is unpoped, and all he did I damn;
 "'The Bishop, that ordained him, I degrade:
 "'Depose to laics those he raised to priests:
 "'What they have wrought is mischief nor shall stand,
 "'It is confusion, let it vex no more!
 "'Since I revoke, annul and abrogate
 "'All his decrees in all kinds: they are void!
- "'In token whereof and warning to the world,
 "'Strip me yon miscreant of those robes 48
 "usurped,
 "'And clothe him with vile serge befitting such!
 "'Then hale the carrion to the marketplace:
 "'Let the town-hangman chop from his right hand
 "'Those same three fingers which he blessed withal;
 "'Next cut the head off once was crowned forsooth:
 "'And last go fling them, fingers, head and trunk,
 "'To Tiber that my Christian fish may sup!
 "'— Either because of ΙΧΘΥΣ which means Fish
 "'And very aptly symbolises Christ,
 "'Or else because the Pope is Fisherman, 50
 "'And seals with Fisher's-signet.
- "Anyway,
 "So said, so done: himself, to see it done,
 "Followed the corpse they trailed from street to street
 "Till into Tiber wave they threw the thing.
- "The people, crowded on the banks to see,
 "Were loud or mute, wept or laughed, cursed or jeered,
 "According as the deed addressed their sense;
 "A scandal verily: and out spake a Jew
 "'Wot ye your Christ had vexed our Herod thus?'
- "Now when, Formosus being dead a year, 60
 "His judge Pope Stephen tasted death in turn,
 "Made captive by the mob and strangled straight,
 "Romanus, his successor for a month,
 "Did make protest Formosus was with God,
 "Holy, just, true in thought and word and deed.
- "Next Theodore, who reigned but twenty days,
 "Therein convoked a synod, whose decree
 "Did reinstate, repope the late unpoped,
 "And do away with Stephen as accused. 73
 "So that when presently certain fisher-folk
 "(As if the queasy river could not hold "Its swallowed Jonas, but discharged the meal)
 "Produced the timely product of their nets,
 "The mutilated man, Formosus, — saved
 "From putrefaction by the embalmer's spice,
 "Or, as some said, by sanctity of flesh: —

- "Why, lay the body again," bade Theodore,
 "Among his predecessors, in the church
 "And burial-place of Peter!" which was done.
 "And," addeth Luitprand, "many of repute,
 "Pious and still alive, avouch to me
 "That, as they bore the body up the aisle,
 "The saints in imaged row bowed each his head
 "For welcome to a brother-saint come back."
 "As for Romanus and this Theodore, to "These two Popes, through the brief reign granted each,
 "Could but initiate what John came to close
 "And give the dual stamp to: he it was "Ninth of the name, (I follow the best guides)
 "Who, — in full synod at Ravenna held "With Bishops seventy-four, and present too
 "Eude King of France with his Archbishopry, —
 "Did condemn Stephen, anathematise
 "The disinterment, and make all blots blank,
 "For," argueth here Auxilius in a place to "De Ordinationibus," precedents
 "Had been, no lack, before Formosus long,
 "Of Bishops so transferred from see to see, —
 "Marinus, for example:" read the tract.
 "But, after John, came Sergius, reaffirmed
 "The right of Stephen, cursed Formosus, nay
 "Cast out, some say, his corpse a second time.
 "And here, — because the matter went to ground,
 "Fretted by new griefs, other cares of the age, —
 "Here is the last pronouncing of the Church, to "Her sentence that subsists unto this day.
 "Yet constantly opinion hath prevailed
 "I' the Church, Formosus was a holy man."
- Which of the judgments was infallible?
 Which of my predecessors spoke for God?
 And what availed Formosus that this cursed,
 That blessed, and then this other cursed again?
 "Fear ye not those whose power can kill the body "And not the soul," saith Christ, "but rather those
- "Can cast both soul and body into hell!"
 John judged thus in Eight Hundred Ninety 44
 Eight,
 Exact eight hundred years ago to-day
 When, sitting in his stead, Vice-gerent here,
 I must give judgment on my own behoof.
 So worked the predecessor: now, my turn!
 In God's name! Once more on this earth of God's,
 While twilight lasts and time wherein to work,
 I take His staff with my uncertain hand
 And stay my six and fourscore years, my due Labour and sorrow, on His judgment-seat,
 And forthwith think, speak, act, in place of 50
 Him —
 The Pope for Christ. Once more appeal is made From man's assize to mine: I sit and see Another poor weak trembling human wretch Pushed by his fellows, who pretend the right, Up to the gulf which, where I gaze, begins
 From this world to the next, — gives way and way, Just on the edge over the awful dark:
 With nothing to arrest him but my feet.
 He catches at me with convulsive face, Cries "Leave to live the natural minute 60
 more!"
 While hollowly the avengers echo "Leave?"
 "None! So has he exceeded man's due share
 "In man's fit licence, wrung by Adam's fall,
 "To sin and yet not surely die, — that we,
 "All of us sinful, all with need of grace,
 "All chary of our life, — the minute more "Or minute less of grace which saves a soul, —
 "Bound to make common cause with who craves time,
 " — We yet protest against the exorbitance
 "Of sin in this one sinner, and demand 7
 "That his poor sole remaining piece of time
 "Be plucked from out his clutch: put him to death!
 "Punish him now! As for the weal or woe "Hereafter, God grant mercy! Man be just,
 "Nor let the felon boast he went scot-free!
 And I am bound, the solitary judge,
 To weigh the worth, decide upon the plea,
 And either hold a hand out, or withdraw
 A foot and let the wretch drift to the fall.
 Ay, and while thus I dally, dare perchance Put fancies for a comfort 'twixt this calm And yonder passion that I have to bear, —

As if reprieve were possible for both Prisoner and Pope, — how easy were reprieve!
 A touch o' the hand-bell here, a hasty
 word
 To those who wait, and wonder they wait
 long,
 I' the passage there, and I should gain the
 life! —
 Yea, though I flatter me with fancy thus,
 I know it is but nature's craven-trick.
 The case is over, judgment at an end,
 And all things done now and irrevocable:
 A more dead man is Franceschini here,
 Even as Formosus centuries ago.
 I have won through this sombre wintry
 day,
 With winter in my soul beyond the world's,
 Over these dismalest of documents Which drew night down on me ere eve befell, —
 Pleadings and counter-pleadings, figure of
 fact Beside fact's self, these summaries to-wit, —
 How certain three were slain by certain five:
 I read here why it was, and how it went,
 And how the chief o' the five preferred excuse,
 And how law rather chose defence should
 lie, —
 What argument he urged by wary word
 When free to play off wile, start subterfuge, And what the unguarded groan told, tort-ure's feat
 When law grew brutal, outbroke, overbore
 And glutted hunger on the truth, at last, —
 No matter for the flesh and blood between.
 All's a clear rede and no more riddle
 now.
 Truth, nowhere, lies yet everywhere in
 these —
 Not absolutely in a portion, yet Evolvable from the whole: evolved at last Painfully, held tenaciously by me.
 Therefore there is not any doubt to clear When I shall write the brief word presently
 And chink the hand-bell, which I pause
 to do.
 Irresolute? Not I, more than the mound With the pine-trees on it yonder! Some surmise,
 Perchance, that since man's wit is fallible, Mine may fail here? Suppose it so, —
 what then?
 Say, — Guido, I count guilty, there's no
 babe
 So guiltless, for I misconceive the man!
 What's in the chance should move me from my mind?
 If, as I walk in a rough country-side,

Peasants of mine cry "Thou art he can
 help,
 "Lord of the land and counted wise to boot:
 "Look at our brother, strangling in his foam,
 "He fell so where we find him, — prove thy worth!"
 I may presume, pronounce, "A frenzy-fit,
 "A falling-sickness or a fever-stroke!
 "Breathe a vein, copiously let blood at 58
 once!"
 So perishes the patient, and anon
 I hear my peasants — "All was error,
 lord!
 "Our story, thy prescription: for there crawled
 "In due time from our hapless brother's
 breast
 "The serpent which had stung him: bleeding slew
 "Whom a prompt cordial had restored to health."
 What other should I say than "God so willed:
 "Mankind is ignorant, a man am I:
 "Call ignorance my sorrow, not my sin!"
 So and not otherwise, in after-time, 64
 If some acuter wit, fresh probing, sound This multifarious mass of words and deeds Deeper, and reach through guilt to innocence,
 I shall face Guido's ghost nor blench a jot.
 "God who set me to judge thee, meted
 out
 "So much of judging faculty, no more:
 "Ask Him if I was slack in use thereof!"
 I hold a heavier fault imputable Inasmuch as I changed a chaplain once, For no cause, — no, if I must bare my 70
 heart, —
 Save that he snuffled somewhat saying
 mass.
 For I am ware it is the seed of act,
 God holds appraising in His hollow palm, Not act grown great thence on the world
 below,
 Leafage and branchage, vulgar eyes admire.
 Therefore I stand on my integrity,
 Nor fear at all: and if I hesitate,
 It is because I need to breathe awhile, Rest, as the human right allows, review
 In tent the little seeds of act, my tree, — 8c The thought, which, clothed in deed, I give the world
 At chink of bell and push of arrased door.
 O pale departure, dim disgrace of day!
 Winter's in wane, his vengeful worst art
 thou,
 To dash the boldness of advancing March!

- Thy chill persistent rain has purged our streets Of gossipry; pert tongue and idle ear
 By this, consort 'neath archway, portico.
 But wheresoe'er Rome gathers in the grey,
 Two names now snap and flash from mouth to mouth — (Sparks, flint and steel strike) Guido and the Pope.
 By this same hour to-morrow eve — aha,
 How do they call him? — the sagacious Swede Who finds by figures how the chances prove, 10 Why one comes rather than another thing,
 As, say, such dots turn up by throw of dice,
 Or, if we dip in Virgil here and there
 And prick for such a verse, when such shall point.
 Take this Swede, tell him, hiding name and rank,
 Two men are in our city this dull eve;
 One doomed to death, — but hundreds in such plight Slip aside, clean escape by leave of law Which leans to mercy in this latter time;
 Moreover in the plenitude of life 20 Is he, with strength of limb and brain adroit, Presumably of service here: beside,
 The man is noble, backed by nobler friends:
 Nay, they so wish him well, the city's self Makes common cause with who — house-magistrate, Patron of hearth and home, domestic lord —
 But ruled his own, let aliens cavil. Die?
 He'll bribe a gaoler or break prison first!
 Nay, a sedition may be helpful, give Hint to the mob to batter wall, burn gate, 30 And bid the favourite malefactor march.
 Calculate now these chances of escape!
 "It is not probable, but well may be."
 Again, there is another man, weighed now
 By twice eight years beyond the seven-times-ten, Appointed overweight to break our branch.
 And this man's loaded branch lifts, more than snow,
 All the world's cark and care, though a bird's nest Were a superfluous burthen: notably Hath he been pressed, as if his age were youth, From to-day's dawn till now that day departs, Trying one question with true sweat of soul,
 "Shall the said doomed man fitlier die or live?"
 When a straw swallowed in his posset, stool
- Stumbled on where his path lies, any puff That's incident to such a smoking flax, Hurries the natural end and quenches him!
 Now calculate, thou sage, the chances here, Say, which shall die the sooner, this or that?
 "That, possibly, this in all likelihood."
 I thought so: yet thou tripp'st, my foreign friend!
 No, it will be quite otherwise, — to-day
 Is Guido's last: my term is yet to run.
 But say the Swede were right, and I forthwith Acknowledge a prompt summons and lie dead:
 Why, then I stand already in God's face And hear "Since by its fruit a tree is judged,
 "Show me thy fruit, the latest act of thine!
 "For in the last is summed the first and all, —
 "What thy life last put heart and soul into,
 "There shall I taste thy product." I 60 must plead
 This condemnation of a man to-day.
 Not so! Expect nor question nor reply
 At what we figure as God's judgment-bar!
 None of this vile way by the barren words Which, more than any deed, characterise Man as made subject to a curse: no speech —
 That still bursts o'er some lie which lurks inside,
 As the split skin across the coppery snake,
 And most denotes man! since, in all be-
 side,
 In hate or lust or guile or unbelief, 7
 Out of some core of truth the excrescence comes,
 And, in the last resort, the man may urge
 "So was I made, a weak thing that gave way
 "To truth, to impulse only strong since true,
 "And hated, lusted, used guile, forwent faith."
 But when man walks the garden of this world
 For his own solace, and, unchecked by law, Speaks or keeps silence as himself sees fit, Without the least incumbency to lie,
 — Why, can he tell you what a rose is like, 8
 Or how the birds fly, and not slip to false Though truth serve better? Man must tell his mate
 Of you, me and himself, knowing he lies, Knowing his fellow knows the same, — will think
 "He lies, it is the method of a man!"

And yet will speak for answer "It is truth"
 To him who shall rejoin "Again a lie!" Therefore these filthy rags of speech, this coil
 Of statement, comment, query and response,
 Tatters all too contaminate for use,
 Have no renewing: He the Truth, is, too,
 The Word. We men, in our degree, may
 know
 There, simply, instantaneously, as here After long time and amid many lies, Whatever we dare think we know indeed — That I am I, as He is He, — what
 else?
 — But be man's method for man's life at
 least!
 Wherefore, Antonio Pignatelli, thou
 My ancient self, who wast no Pope so long But studiedst God and man, the many
 years
 I' the school, i' the cloister, in the diocese Domestic, legate-rule in foreign lands, — Thou other force in those old busy days Than this grey ultimate decrepitude, — Yet sensible of fires that more and more Visit a soul, in passage to the sky, Left nakeder than when flesh-robe was
 new —
 Thou, not Pope but the mere old man o'
 the world,
 Supposed inquisitive and dispassionate, Wilt thou, the one whose speech I somewhat trust,
 Question the after-me, this self now Pope, Hear his procedure, criticise his work?
 Wise in its generation is the world.
 This is why Guido is found reprobate.
 I see him furnished forth for his career,
 On starting for the life-chance in our world,
 With nearly all we count sufficient help:
 Body and mind in balance, a sound frame,
 A solid intellect: the wit to seek, Wisdom to choose, and courage wherewithal
 To deal in whatsoever circumstance Should minister to man. make life succeed.
 Oh, and much drawback! what were earth without?
 Is this our ultimate stage, or starting-
 place
 To try man's foot, if it will creep or climb,
 'Mid obstacles in seeming, points that
 prove Advantage for who vaults from low to high
 And makes the stumbling-block a stepping-
 stone?
 So, Guido, born with appetite, lacks food:
 Is poor, who yet could deftly play-off
 wealth:
 Straitened, whose limbs are restless till at large.

He, as he eyes each outlet of the cirque
 And narrow penfold for probation, pines
 After the good things just outside its grate, With less monition, fainter consciencetwitch, Rarer instinctive qualm at the first feel Of greed unseemly, prompting grasp undue,
 Than nature furnishes her main man-
 kind, —
 Making it harder to do wrong than right
 The first time, careful lest the common ear Break measure, miss the outstep of life's march.
 Wherein I see a trial fair and fit For one else too unfairly fenced about,
 Set above sin, beyond his fellows here:
 Guarded from the arch-tempter all must 6:
 fight,
 By a great birth, traditionary name,
 Diligent culture, choice companionship, Above all, conversancy with the faith Which puts forth for its base of doctrine
 just
 "Man is born nowise to content himself, "But please God." He accepted such a rule, Recognised man's obedience; and the Church,
 Which simply is such rule's embodiment He clave to, he held on by, — nay, indeed, Near pushed inside of, deep as layman 7:
 durst,
 Professed so much of priesthood as might sue For priest's-exemption where the layman sinned, —
 Got his arm frocked which, bare, the law would bruise.
 Hence, at this moment, what's his last resource,
 His extreme stay and utmost stretch of
 hope
 But that, — convicted of such crime as
 law Wipes not away save with a worldling's
 blood, —
 Guido, the three-parts consecrate, may
 'scape?
 Nay, the portentous brothers of the man
 Are veritably priests, protected each 8:
 May do his murder in the Church's pale,
 Abate Paul, Canon Girolamo!
 This is the man proves irreligiousest
 Of all mankind, religion's parasite!
 This may forsooth plead dinned ear, jaded
 sense,
 The vice o' the watcher who bides near the bell,
 Sleeps sound because the clock is vigilant,
 And cares not whether it be shade or shine, Doling out day and night to all men else!
 Why was the choice o' the man to niche 9:
 himself

Perversely 'neath the tower where Time's own tongue

Thus undertakes to sermonise the world?

Why, but because the solemn is safe too,

The belfry proves a fortress of a sort,

Has other uses than to teach the hour:

Turns sunscreen, paravent and ombrifuge¹

To whoso seeks a shelter in its pale,

—Ay, and attractive to unwary folk

Who gaze at storied portal, statued spire

10 And go home with full head but empty

purse,

Nor dare suspect the sacristan the thief!

Shall Judas, — hard upon the donor's

heel,

To filch the fragments of the basket, —

plead

He was too near the preacher's mouth, nor sat

Attent with fifties in a company?

No, — closer to promulgated decree,

Clearer the censure of default. Proceed!

I find him bound, then, to begin life well;

Fortified by propitious circumstance,

20 Great birth, good breeding, with the Church for guide,

How lives he? Cased thus in a coat of

proof,

Mailed like a man-at-arms, though all the

while

A puny starveling, — does the breast pant

big,

The limb swell to the limit, emptiness

Strive to become solidity indeed?

Rather, he shrinks up like the ambiguous

fish,

Detaches flesh from shell and outside show,

And steals by moonlight (I have seen the

thing)

In and out, now to prey and now to skulk.

30 Armour he boasts when a wave breaks on beach,

Or bird stoops for the prize: with peril

nigh, —

The man of rank, the much-befriended-

man,

The man almost affiliate to the Church,

Such is to deal with, let the world beware!

Does the world recognise, pass prudently?

Do tides abate and sea-fowl hunt? the deep?

Already is the slug from out its mew,

Ignobly faring with all loose and free,

Sand-fly and slush-worm at their garbage-

feast,

40 A naked blotch no better than they all:

Guido has dropped nobility, slipped the

Church,

Plays trickster if not cut-purse, body and

soul

¹ Paravent and ombrifuge: protection against wind and rain,

Prostrate among the filthy feeders — laugh!
And when Law takes him by surprise at

last,

Catches the foul thing on its carrion-prey,

Behold, he points to shell left high and dry,

Pleads "But the case out yonder is myself!"

Nay, it is thou, Law prongs amid thy peers,

Congenial vermin; that was none of thee,

Thine outside, — give it to the soldier-⁵⁰

crab!

For I find this black mark impinge the

man,

That he believes in just the vile of life.

Low instinct, base pretension, are these

truth?

Then, that aforesaid armour, probity

He figures in, is falsehood scale on scale;

Honour and faith, — a lie and a disguise,

Probably for all livers in this world,

Certainly for himself! All say good words

To who will hear, all do thereby bad deeds

To who must undergo; so thrive man-⁶⁰

kind!

See this habitual creed exemplified

Most in the last deliberate act; as last,

So, very sum and substance of the soul

Of him that planned and leaves one perfect

piece,

The sin brought under jurisdiction now,

Even the marriage of the man: this act

I sever from his life as sample, show

For Guido's self, intend to test him by,

As, from a cup filled fairly at the fount,

By the components we decide enough

Or to let flow as late, or stanch the source.

He purposes this marriage, I remark,

On no one motive that should prompt

thereto —

Farthest, by consequence, from ends alleged

Appropriate to the action; so they were:

The best, he knew and feigned, the worst he took.

Not one permissible impulse moves the

man,

From the mere liking of the eye and ear,

To the true longing of the heart that

loves,

No trace of these: but all to instigate,

Is what sinks man past level of the brute

Whose appetite if brutish is a truth.

All is the lust for money: to get gold, —

Why, lie, rob, if it must be, murder!

Make

Body and soul wring gold out, lured within

The clutch of hate by love, the trap's pre-

tence!

What good else get from bodies and from souls?

This got, there were some life to lead there-

by,

— What, where or how, appreciate those who tell

How the toad lives: it lives, — enough for me!
 To get this good, — with but a groan or so,
 Then, silence of the victims, — were the feat.
 He foresaw, made a picture in his mind, —
 Of father and mother stunned and echoless
 To the blow, as they lie staring at fate's jaws
 Their folly danced into, till the woe fell; Edged in a month by strenuous cruelty
 From even the poor nook whence they watched the wolf Feast on their heart, the lamb-like child his prey;
 Plundered to the last remnant of their wealth, (What daily pittance pleased the plunderer dole) Hunted forth to go hide head, starve and die,
 And leave the pale awe-stricken wife, past hope Of help i' the world now, mute and motionless,
 His slave, his chattel, to first use, then destroy.
 All this, he bent mind how to bring about,
 Put plain in act and life, as painted plain,
 So have success, reach crown of earthly good,
 In this particular enterprise of man,
 By marriage — undertaken in God's face
 With all these lies so opposite God's truth, For end so other than man's end.

Thus schemes

Guido, and thus would carry out his scheme:
 But when an obstacle first blocks the path,
 When he finds none may boast monopoly
 Of lies and trick i' the tricking lying world, —
 That sorry timid natures, even this sort O' the Comparini, want nor trick nor lie Proper to the kind, — that as the gor-crow treats
 The bramble-finch so treats the finch the moth,
 And the great Guido is minutely matched By this same couple, — whether true or false
 The revelation of Pompilia's birth, Which in a moment brings his scheme to nought, —
 Then, he is piqued, advances yet a stage, Leaves the low region to the finch and fly, Soars to the zenith whence the fiercer fowl May dare the inimitable swoop. I see.
 He draws now on the curious crime, the fine Felicity and flower of wickedness; Determines, by the utmost exercise
 Of violence, made safe and sure by craft,

To satiate malice, pluck one last arch-pang
 From the parents, else would triumph out of reach,
 By punishing their child, within reach yet,
 Who, by thought, word or deed, could nowise wrong I' the matter that now moves him. So plans he, Always subordinating (note the point!)
 Revenge, the manlier sin, to interest 50
 The meaner, — would pluck pang forth, but unclench
 No gripe in the act, let fall no money-piece.
 Hence a plan for so plaguing, body and soul,
 His wife, so putting, day by day, hour by hour,
 The untried torture to the untouched place,
 As must precipitate an end foreseen, Goad her into some plain revolt, most like Plunge upon patent suicidal shame, Death to herself, damnation by rebound
 To those whose hearts he, holding hers, 60 holds still:
 Such plan as, in its bad completeness, shall Ruin the three together and alike, Yet leave himself in luck and liberty,
 No claim renounced, no right a forfeiture,
 His person unendangered, his good fame Without a flaw, his pristine worth intact, — While they, with all their claims and rights that cling, Shall forthwith crumble off him every side, Scorched into dust, a plaything for the winds.

As when, in our Campagna, there is fired 70
 The nest-like work that overruns a hut;
 And, as the thatch burns here, there, everywhere,
 Even to the ivy and wild vine, that bound
 And blessed the home where men were happy once,
 There rises gradual, black amid the blaze,
 Some grim and unscathed nucleus of the nest, —
 Some old malicious tower, some obscene tomb
 They thought a temple in their ignorance,
 And clung about and thought to lean upon—There laughs it o' their ravage, — where 80 are they?
 So did his cruelty burn life about,
 And lay the ruin bare in dreadfulfulness, Try the persistency of torment so Upon the wife, that, at extremity,
 Some crisis brought about by fire and flame,
 The patient frenzy-stung must needs break loose, Fly anyhow, find refuge anywhere,
 Even in the arms of who should front her first

No monster but a man — while nature shrieked

"Or thus escape, or die!" The spasm arrived,

Not the escape by way of sin, — O God, Who shall pluck sheep Thou holdest, from Thy hand?

Therefore she lay resigned to die, — so far The simple cruelty was foiled. Why then, Craft to the rescue, let craft supplement Cruelty and show hell a masterpiece! Hence this consummate lie, this love-intrigue,

10 Unmanly simulation of a sin, With place and time and circumstance to suit —

These letters false beyond all forgery — Not just handwriting and mere authorship, But false to body and soul they figure forth —

As though the man had cut out shape and shape

From fancies of that other Aretine,¹ To paste below — incorporate the filth With cherub faces on a missal-page! Whereby the man so far attains his end 20 That strange temptation is permitted, — see!

Pompilia wife, and Caponsacchi priest, Are brought together as nor priest nor wife Should stand, and there is passion in the place,

Power in the air for evil as for good, Promptings from heaven and hell, as if the stars

Fought in their courses for a fate to be. Thus stand the wife and priest, a spectacle, I doubt not, to unseen assemblage there. No lamp will mark that window for a shrine,

30 No tablet signalise the terrace, teach New generations which succeed the old The pavement of the street is holy ground; No bard describe in verse how Christ prevailed

And Satan fell like lightning! Why re-pine?

What does the world, told truth, but lie the more?

A second time the plot is foiled; nor, now, By corresponding sin for countercheck, No wile and trick that baffle trick and wile, —

The play o' the parents! Here the blot is blanch'd 40 By God's gift of a purity of soul That will not take pollution, ermine-like Armed from dishonour by its own soft snow.

Such was this gift of God who showed for once

¹ That other Aretine: Pietro-Aretino, author of various obscene writings.

How He would have the world go white: it seems

As a new attribute were born of each Champion of truth, the priest and wife I praise, —

As a new safeguard sprang up in defence Of their new noble nature: so a thorn Comes to the aid of and completes the rose —

Courage to-wit, no woman's gift nor priest's, I' the crisis; might leaps vindicating right. See how the strong aggressor, bad and bold,

With every vantage, preconcerts surprise, Leaps of a sudden at his victim's throat In a byeway, — how fares he when face to face

With Caponsacchi? Who fights, who fears now?

There quails Count Guido armed to the chattering teeth,

Cowers at the steadfast eye and quiet word O' the Canon of the Pieve! There skulks crime

Behind law called in to back cowardice: 6 While out of the poor trampled worm the wife, Springs up a serpent!

But anon of these.

Him I judge now, — of him proceed to note,

Failing the first, a second chance befriends Guido, gives pause ere punishment arrive. The law he called, comes, hears, adjudicates,

Nor does amiss i' the main, — secludes the wife

From the husband, respites the oppressed one, grants

Probation to the oppressor, could he know The mercy of a minute's fiery purge!

The furnace-coals alike of public scorn, Private remorse, heaped glowing on his head,

What if, — the force and guile, the ore's alloy,

Eliminate, his baser soul refined —

The lost be saved even yet, so as by fire?

Let him, rebuked, go softly all his days And, when no graver musings claim their due,

Meditate on a man's immense mistake Who, fashioned to use feet and walk deigns crawl —

Takes the unmanly means — ay, though to ends

Man scarce should make for, would but reach thro' wrong, —

May sin, but nowise needs shame manhood so:

Since fowlers hawk, shoot, nay and snare the game.

And yet eschew vile practice, nor find sport

In torch-light treachery or the luring owl.

But how hunts Guido? Why, the fraudulent trap —

Late spurned to ruin by the indignant feet Of fellows in the chase who loved fair play —

Here he picks up its fragments to the least,
Lades him and hies to the old lurking-place

Where haply he may patch again, refit
The mischief, file its blunted teeth anew, Make sure, next time, first snap shall break the bone.

Craft, greed and violence complot revenge:
Craft, for its quota, schemes to bring about
And seize occasion and be safe withal:
Greed craves its act may work both far and near,

Crush the tree, branch and trunk and root,
beside.

Whichever twig or leaf arrests a streak
Of possible sunshine else would coin itself,
And drop down one more gold piece in the path:

Violence stipulates "Advantage proved
"And safety sure, be pain the overplus!
"Murder with jagged knife! Cut but tear too!

"Foiled oft, starved long, glut malice for amends!"

And what, craft's scheme? scheme sorrowful and strange

As though the elements, whom mercy checked,

Had mustered hate for one eruption more,
One final deluge to surprise the Ark Cradled and sleeping on its mountain-top:
Their outbreak-signal — what but the dove's coo,

Back with the olive in her bill for news
Sorrow was over? 'Tis an infant's birth, Guido's first born, his son and heir, that gives

The occasion: other men cut free their souls

From care in such a case, fly up in thanks To God, reach, recognise His love for once:

Guido cries "Soul, at last the mire is thine!

"Lie there in likeness of a money-bag

"My babe's birth so pins down past moving now,

"That I dare cut adrift the lives I late

"Scrupled to touch lest thou escape with them!

"These parents and their child my wife, — touch one,

"Lose all! Their rights determined on a head

"I could but hate, not harm, since from each hair

"Dangled a hope for me: now — chance and change!

"No right was in their child but passes plain

"To that child's child and through such child to me.

"I am a father now, — come what, come will,

"I represent my child; he comes between —

"Cuts sudden off the sunshine of this life

"From those three: why, the gold is in his curls!

"Not with old Pietro's, Violante's head, 50

"Not his grey horror, her more hideous black —

"Go these, devoted to the knife!"

'Tis done:

Wherefore should mind misgive, heart hesitate?

He calls to counsel, fashions certain four Colourless natures counted clean till now, — Rustic simplicity, uncorrupted youth, Ignorant virtue! Here's the gold o' the prime

When Saturn ruled, shall shock our leaden day —

The clown abash the courtier! Mark it, bards!

The courtier tries his hand on clownship 60 here,

Speaks a word, names a crime, appoints a price, —

Just breathes on what, suffused with all himself,

Is red-hot henceforth past distinction now I' the common glow of hell. And thus they break

And blaze on us at Rome, Christ's birth-night-eve!

Oh angels that sang erst "On the earth, peace!

"To man, good will!" — such peace finds earth to-day!

After the seventeen hundred years, so man Wills good to man, so Guido makes complete

His murder! what is it I said? — cuts 70 loose

Three lives that hitherto he suffered cling,
Simply because each served to nail secure,

By a corner of the money-bag, his soul, — Therefore, lives sacred till the babe's first breath

O'erweights them in the balance, — off they fly!

So is the murder managed, sin conceived
To the full: and why not crowned with triumph too?

Why must the sin, conceived thus, bring forth death?

I note how, within hair's-breadth of escape,
Impunity and the thing supposed success, 80

Guido is found when the check comes, the change,

The monitory touch o' the tether — felt

By few, not marked by many, named by none

At the moment, only recognised aright
In the fulness of the days, for God's, lest sin Enured the service, leap the line: such check —

A secret which this life finds hard to keep,
And, often guessed, is never quite revealed — Needs must trip Guido on a stumbling-
block.

- 10 Too vulgar, too absurdly plain if the path!
Study this single oversight of care,
This hebetude that marred sagacity, Forgetfulness of all the man best knew, — How ah! stranger having need to fly, Needs but to ask and have the means of
flight.

Why, the first archia tells you, to leave
Rome,

Get horses, you must show the warrant,
just

The banal scrap, clerk's scribble, a fair word buys,

Or foul one, if a ducat sweeten word, —

- 20 And straight authority will back demand.
Give you the pick o' the post-house! — how should he,

Then, resident at Rome for thirty years, Guido, instruct a stranger! And himself Forgets just this poor paper scrap, where-
with

Armed, every door he knocks at opens wide To save him: horsed and manned, with such advance

O' the hunt behind, why, 'twere the easy task

Of hours told on the fingers of one hand, To reach the Tuscan frontier, laugh at
home.

- 30 Light-hearted with his fellows of the place, — Prepared by that strange shameful judgment, that

Satire upon a sentence just pronounced By the Rota and confirmed by the Gran-
duke, —

Ready in a circle to receive their peer, Appreciate his good story how, when
Rome,

The Pope-King and the populace of priests Made common cause with their confederate
The other priestling who secured his wife, He, all unaided, wiped out the affront With decent bloodshed and could face his
friends,

Frolic it in the world's eye. Ay, such tale Missed such applause, and by such oversight!

So, tired and footsore, those blood-flustered five

Went reeling on the road through dark and told,

The few permissible miles, to sink at length.

Wallow and sleep in the first wayside screw,

As the other herd quenched, if the wash of the wave.

— Each swine, the devil inside him: so slept they,

And ~~several~~ caught and caged — all through one trip,

One touch of fool in Guido the astute! 50

He curses the omission, I surmise,

More than the murder. Why, thou fool
and blind,

It is the mercy-stroke that stops thy fate, Hamstrings and holds thee to thy hurt, — but how?

On the edge o' the precipice! One minute
more.

Thou hadst gone farther and fared worse,
my son,

Fathoms down on the flint and fire beneath!

Thy comrades each and all were of one
mind,

Thy murder done, to straightway murder
thee

In turn, because of promised pay withheld. 60

So, to the last, greed found itself at odds

With craft in thee, and, proving conqueror.

Had sent thee, the same night that crowned thy hope,

Thither where, this same day, I see thee
not,

Nor, through God's mercy, need, to-morrow, see.

Such I find Guido, midstmost blotch of black Discord in this group of clustered crimes

Huddling together in the cave they call

Their pact outraged day thus penetrates.

Around him ranged, now close and now 70 remote,

Prominent or obscure to meet the needs

O' the magi and master, I detect each
shape:

Solitary if he were not leashed the less,

All alike couched, all despoiled arise

By one and the same pitchy furnace stirred

At the centre: see, they lick the master's
hand, —

This fox-faced horrible priest, this brother-brute

The Abate, why, mere wolfishness looks well.

Guido stands honest in the red o' the flame, Beside this yellow that would pass for
white.

Twice Guido, all craft but no violence,

This copier of the mien and gait and gait.

Of Peter and Paul, that he may go disguised,

- Rob halt and lame, sick folk i' the temple-porch!
- Armed with religion, fortified by law,
A man of peace, who trims the midnight lamp
And turns the classic page — and all for craft,
All to work harm with, yet incur no scratch!
While Guido brings the struggle to a close,
Paul steps back the due distance, clear o' the trap
He builds and baits. Guido I catch and judge; Paul is past reach in this world and my time:
- 10 That is a case reserved. Pass to the next,
The boy of the brood, the young Girolamo Priest, Canon, and what more? nor wolf nor fox,
But hybrid, neither craft nor violence Wholly, part violence part craft: such cross Tempt's speculation — will both blend one day,
And prove hell's better product? Or subside
And let the simple quality emerge, Go on with Satan's service the old way?
Meanwhile, what promise, — what performance too!
- 20 For there's a new distinctive touch, I see, Lust — lacking in the two — hell's own blue tint
That gives a character and marks the man
More than a match for yellow and red.
Once more,
A case reserved: why should I doubt?
Then comes
The gaunt grey nightmare in the furthest smoke,
The hag that gave these three abortions birth, Unmotherly mother and unwomanly Woman, that near turns motherhood to shame, Womanliness to loathing: no one word, 30 No gesture to curb cruelty a whit More than the she-pard thwarts her play-some whelps Trying their milk-teeth on the soft o' the throat
O' the first fawn, flung, with those beseeching eyes, Flat in the covert! How should she but couch, Lick the dry lips, unsheath the blunted claw, Catch 'twixt her placid eyewinks at what chance Old bloody half-forgotten dream may flit, Born when herself was novice to the taste,
The while she lets youth take its pleasure.
Last,
- These God-abandoned wretched lumps of 40
life,
These four companions, — country-folk this time,
Not tainted by the unwholesome civic breath, Much less the curse o' the Court! Mere striplings too, Fit to do human nature justice still!
Surely when impudence in Guido's shape Shall propose crime and proffer money's-worth To these stout tall rough bright-eyed black-haired boys,
The blood shall bound in answer to each check Before the indignant outcry break from lip!
Are these i' the mood to murder, hardly 50
loosed
From healthy autumn-finish of ploughed glebe, Grapes in the barrel, work at happy end,
And winter near with rest and Christmas play?
How greet they Guido with his final task — (As if he put proposed "One vineyard more "To dig, ere frost come, then relax indeed!")
"Anywhere, anyhow and anyway,
"Murder me some three people, old and young,
"Ye never heard the names of, — and be paid
"So much!" And the whole four accede 60
at once.
Demur? Do cattle bidden march or halt?
Is it some lingering habit, old fond faith I' the lord o' the land, instructs them, — birthright badge
Of feudal tenure claims its slaves again?
Not so at all, thou noble human heart!
All is done purely for the pay, — which, earned,
And not forthcoming at the instant, makes Religion heresy, and the lord o' the land Fit subject for a murder in his turn.
The patron with cut throat and rifled purse 70 Deposited i' the roadside-ditch, his due, Nought hinders each good fellow trudging home,
The heavier by a piece or two in poke,
And so with new zest to the common life,
Mattock and spade, plough-tail and waggon-shaft,
Till some such other piece of luck betide,
Who knows? Since this is a mere start in life,
And none of them exceeds the twentieth year.
Nay, more i' the background yet? Un-noticed forms Claim to be classed, subordinately vile? 80

- Complacent lookers-on that laugh, — per-
chance Shake head as their friend's horse-play grows too rough
With the mere child he manages amiss — But would not interfere and make bad
worse
For twice the fractious tears and prayers:
thou know'st
Civility better, Marzi-Medici, Governor for thy kinsman the Granduke!
Fit representative of law, man's lamp
I' the magistrate's grasp full-flare, no rush-light-end 10 Sputtering 'twixt thumb and finger of the
priest!
Whose answer to the couple's cry for help Is a threat, — whose remedy of Pompilia's
wrong,
A shrug o' the shoulder, and facetious
word
Or wink, traditional with Tuscan wits,
To Guido in the doorway. Laud to law!
The wife is pushed back to the husband, he Who knows how these home-squabbings persecute
People who have the public good to mind,
And work best with a silence in the court!
- 20 Ah, but I save my word at least for thee, Archbishop, who art under me i' the
Church,
As I am under God, — thou, chosen by
both
To do the shepherd's office, feed the sheep —
How of this lamb that panted at thy foot While the wolf pressed on her within crook's reach?
Wast thou the hireling that did turn and flee?
With thee at least anon the little word!
- Such denizens o' the cave now cluster
round
And heat the furnace sevenfold: time indeed 30 A bolt from heaven should cleave roof and clear place, Transfix and show the world, suspiring
flame,
The main offender, scar and brand the rest Hurrying, each miscreant to his hole:
then flood
And purify the scene with outside day — Which yet, in the absolutest drench of
dark,
Ne'er wants a witness, some stray beauty-beam
To the despair of hell.
- First of the first,
Such I pronounce Pompilia, then as now Perfect in whiteness: stoop thou down,
my child,
- Give one good moment to the poor old 41
Pope
Heart-sick at having all his world to
blame —
Let me look at thee in the flesh as erst, Let me enjoy the old clean linen garb, Not the new splendid vesture! Armed
and crowned,
Would Michael, yonder, be, nor crowned nor armed,
The less pre-eminent angel? Everywhere
I see in the world the intellect of man,
That sword, the energy his subtle spear, The knowledge which defends him like a shield —
Everywhere; but they make not up, I 54
think,
The marvel of a soul like thine, earth's flower
She holds up to the softened gaze of God!
It was not given Pompilia to know much, Speak much, to write a book, to move mankind,
Be memorised by who records my time.
Yet if in purity and patience, if
In faith held fast despite the plucking fiend, Safe like the signet stone with the new
name
That saints are known by, — if in right returned For wrong, most pardon for worst injury, 60
If there be any virtue, any praise, — Then will this woman-child have proved
— who knows? —
Just the one price vouchsafed unworthy
me,
Seven years a gardener of the untoward
ground,
I till, — this earth, my sweat and blood manure
All the long day that barrenly grows dusk:
At least one blossom makes me proud at
eve
Born 'mid the briers of my enclosure!
Still (Oh, here as elsewhere, nothingness of
man!)
- Those be the plants; imbedded yonder 70 South
To mellow in the morning, those made fat
By the master's eye, that yield such timid leaf,
Uncertain bud, as product of his pains!
While — see how this mere chance-sown cleft-nursed seed
That sprang up by the wayside 'neath the
foot
Of the enemy, this breaks all into blaze, Spreads itself, one wide glory of desire To incorporate the whole great sun it loves
From the inch-height whence it looks and longs! My flower,
My rose, I gather for the breast of God, 80

- This I praise most in thee, where all I
praise,
That having been obedient to the end
According to the light allotted, law Prescribed thy life, still tried, still standing test, — Dutiful to the foolish parents first, Submissive next to the bad husband, —
nay,
Tolerant of those meaner miserable That did his hests, eked out the dole of pain, —
Thou, patient thus, couldst rise from law to law, 10 The old to the new, promoted at one cry O' the trump of God to the new service, not To longer bear, but henceforth fight, be
found Sublime in new impatience with the foe!
Endure man and obey God: plant firm
foot
On neck of man, tread man into the hell
Meet for him, and obey God all the more!
Oh child that didst despise thy life so
much
When it seemed only thine to keep or lose,
How the fine ear felt fall the first low word 20 "Value life, and preserve life for My
sake!"
Thou didst . . . how shall I say? . . . receive so long
The standing ordinance of God on earth,
What wonder if the novel claim had clashed
With old requirement, seemed to supersede Too much the customary law? But,
brave,
Thou at first prompting of what I call God,
And fools call Nature, didst hear, comprehend,
Accept the obligation laid on thee,
Mother elect, to save the unborn child, 30 As brute and bird do, reptile and the fly, Ay and, I nothing doubt, even tree, shrub,
plant
And flower o' the field, all in a common pact
To worthily defend the trust of trusts, Life from the Ever Living: — didst resist —
Anticipate the office that is mine — And with his own sword stay the upraised
arm,
The endeavour of the wicked, and defend Him who, — again in my default, — was
there
For visible providence: one less true than thou 40 To touch, i' the past, less practised in the
right,
Approved less far in all docility To all instruction, — how had such an
one Made scruple "Is this motion a decree?"
It was authentic to the experienced ear
- O' the good and faithful servant. Go past me
And get thy praise, — and be not far to seek Presently when I follow if I may!
And surely not so very much apart Need I place thee, my warrior-priest, — in whom What if I gain the other rose, the gold, 50
We grave to imitate God's miracle, Greet monarchs with, good rose in its degree?
Irregular noble scapegrace — son the
same!
Faulty — and peradventure ours the fault Who still misteach, mislead, throw hook and line,
Thinking to land leviathan forsooth, Tame the scaled neck, play with him as a bird,
And bind him for our maidens! Better
bear
The King of Pride go wantoning awhile, Unplugged by cord in nose and thorn in 60
jaw,
Through deep to deep, followed by all that shine,
Churning the blackness hoary: He who
made The comely terror, He shall make the
sword
To match that piece of netherstone his
heart,
Ay, nor miss praise thereby; who else shut
fire
I' the stone, to leap from mouth at sword's first stroke,
In lamps of love and faith, the chivalry
That dares the right and disregards alike The yea and nay o' the world? Self-sacrifice, —
What if an idol took it? Ask the Church 70 Why she was wont to turn each Venus
here, —
Poor Rome perversely lingered round, despite
Instruction, for the sake of purblind love, — Into Madonna's shape, and waste no whit Of aught so rare on earth as gratitude!
All this sweet savour was not ours but thine, Nard of the rock, a natural wealth we
name
Incense, and treasure up as food for saints, When flung to us — whose function was to give
Not find the costly perfume. Do I smile? 80
Nay, Caponsacchi, much I find amiss, Blameworthy, punishable in this freak Of thine, this youth prolonged, though age was ripe,
This masquerade in sober day, with
change
Of motley too, — now hypocrite's disguise

- Now fool's-costume: which lie was least like truth,
Which the ungainlier, more discordant garb
With that symmetric soul inside my son, The churchman's or the worldling's, — let him judge,
Our adversary who enjoys the task!
I rather chronicle the healthy rage, — When the first moan broke from the martyr-maid
At that uncaging of the beasts, — made
bare
My athlete on the instant, gave such
good
- 10 Great undisguised leap over post and pale Right into the mid-cirque, free fighting-
place.
There may have been rash stripping — every rag
Went to the winds, — infringement manifold
Of laws prescribed pudicity, I fear,
In this impulsive and prompt self-display!
Ever such tax comes of the foolish youth;
Men mulct the wiser manhood, and suspect
No veritable star swims out of cloud.
Bear thou such imputation, undergo
- 20 The penalty I nowise dare relax, — Conventional chastisement and rebuke.
But for the outcome, the brave starry birth Conciliating earth with all that cloud, Thank heaven as I do! Ay, such championship
Of God at first blush, such prompt cheery thud
Of glove on ground that answers ringingly The challenge of the false knight, — watch we long
And wait we vainly for its gallant like From those appointed to the service, sworn
- 30 His body-guard with pay and privilege — White-cinct, because in white walks sanctity,
Red-socked, how else proclaim fine scorn of flesh, Unchariness of blood when blood faith begs!
Where are the men-at-arms with cross on coat?
Aloof, bewraying their attire: whilst thou In mask and motley, pledged to dance not fight, Sprang'st forth the hero! In thought,
word and deed,
How throughout all thy warfare thou wast
pure,
I find it easy to believe: and if
- 40 At any fateful moment of the strange Adventure, the strong passion of that strait,
Fear and surprise, may have revealed too
much, —
As when a thundrous midnight, with black
air
- That burns, rain-drops that blister, breaks
a spell, Draws out the excessive virtue of some sheathed Shut unsuspected flower that hoards and hides
Immensity of sweetness, — so, perchance, Might the surprise and fear release too
much
The perfect beauty of the body and soul
Thou savdest in thy passion for God's sake, 54
He who is Pity. Was the trial sore?
Temptation sharp? Thank God a second
time!
Why comes temptation but for man to meet
And master and make crouch beneath his
foot,
And so be pedestalled in triumph? Pray
"Lead us into no such temptations, Lord!" Yea, but, O Thou whose servants are the bold, Lead such temptations by the head and
hair,
Reluctant dragons, up to who dares fight,
That so he may do battle and have praise! 60 Do I not see the praise? — that while thy mates
Bound to deserve it the matter, prove at
need Unprofitable through the very pains
We gave to train them well and start them
fair, —
Are found too stiff, with standing ranked and ranged,
For onset in good earnest, too obtuse
Of ear, through iteration of command, For catching quick the sense of the real
cry, —
Thou, whose sword-hand was used to strike the lute, Whose sentry-station graced some wanton's 70
gate,
Thou didst push forward and show mettle,
shame
The laggards, and retrieve the day. Well
done!
Be glad thou hast let light into the world Through that irregular breach o' the boundary, — see
The same upon thy path and march assured,
Learning anew the use of soldiership,
Self-abnegation, freedom from all fear, Loyalty to the life's end! Ruminant, Deserve the initiatory spasm, — once
more Work, be unhappy but bear life, my son! 80
And troop you, somewhere 'twixt the best
and worst,
Where crowd the indifferent product, all too poor Makeshift, starved samples of humanity!

- Father and mother, huddle there and hide!
A gracious eye may find you! Foul and fair, Sadly mixed natures: self-indulgent, — yet Self-sacrificing too: how the love soars, How the craft, avarice, vanity and spite Sink again! So they keep the middle course, Slide into silly crime at unaware,
Slip back upon the stupid virtue, stay Nowhere enough for being classed, I hope o And fear. Accept the swift and rueful death, Taught, somewhat sternlier than is wont, what waits
The ambiguous creature, — how the one black tuft Steadies the aim of the arrow just as well As the wide faultless white on the bird's breast!
Nay, you were punished in the very part That looked most pure of speck, — 'twas honest love Betrayed you, — did love seem most worthy pains, Challenge such purging, since ordained survive
When all the rest of you was done with? Go!
13 Never again elude the choice of tints!
White shall not neutralise the black, nor good Compensate bad in man, absolve him so:
Life's business being just the terrible choice.
- So do I see, pronounce on all and some Grouped for my judgment now, — profess no doubt While I pronounce: dark, difficult enough
The human sphere, yet eyes grow sharp by use,
I find the truth, dispart the shine from shade,
As a mere man may, with no special touch 30 O' the lynx-gift in each ordinary orb: Nay, if the popular notion class me right,
One of well-nigh decayed intelligence, — What of that? Through hard labour and good will,
And habitude that gives a blind man sight
At the practised finger-ends of him, I do Discern, and dare decree in consequence, Whatever prove the peril of mistake.
Whence, then, this quite new quick cold thrill, — cloud-like,
This keen dread creeping from a quarter scarce 40 Suspected in the skies I nightly scan?
What slacks the tense nerve, saps the wound-up spring
Of the act that should and shall be, sends the mount
- And mass o' the whole man's-strength, — conglobed so late — Shudderingly into dust, a moment's work?
While I stand firm, go fearless, in this world,
For this life recognise and arbitrate,
Touch and let stay, or else remove a thing, Judge "This is right, this object out of place," Candle in hand that helps me and to spare, — What if a voice deride me, "Perk and pry!
"Brighten each nook with thine intelligence!
"Play the good householder, ply man and maid
"With tasks prolonged into the midnight, test
"Their work and nowise stint of the due wage
"Each worthy worker: but with gyves and whip
"Pay thou misprision of a single point.
"Plain to thy happy self who lift'st the light.
"Lament'st the darkling, — bold to all beneath!
"What if thyself adventure, now the place "Is purged so well? Leave pavement 60 and mount roof, "Look round thee for the light of the upper sky,
"The fire which lit thy fire which finds default
"In Guido Franceschini to his cost!
"What if, above in the domain of light,
"Thou miss the accustomed signs, remark eclipse?
"Shalt thou still gaze on ground nor lift a lid, —
"Steady in thy superb prerogative,
"Thy inch of inkling, — nor once face the doubt
"T' the sphere above thee, darkness to be felt?"
- Yet my poor spark had for its source, the 70 sun; Thither I sent the great looks which compel Light from its fount: all that I do and am Comes from the truth, or seen or else surmised, Remembered or divined, as mere man may:
I know just so, nor otherwise. As I know,
I speak, — what should I know, then, and how speak
Were there a wild mistake of eye or brain
As to recorded governance above?
If my own breath, only, blew coal alight
I styled celestial and the morning-star? 80

I, who in this world act resolutely, Dispose of men, their bodies and their
 souls,
 As they acknowledge or gainsay the light
 I show them, — shall I too lack courage?
 — leave
 I, too, the post of me, like those I blame?
 Refuse, with kindred inconsistency, To grapple danger whereby souls grow
 strong?
 I am near the end; but still not at the end;
 All to the very end is trial in life:
 At this stage is the trial of my soul Danger to face, or danger to refuse?
 Shall I dare try the doubt now, or not dare?
 O Thou, — as represented here to me
 In such conception as my soul allows, — Under Thy measureless, my atom width! — Man's mind, what is it but a convex glass Wherein are gathered all the scattered points
 Picked out of the immensity of sky,
 To re-unite there, be our heaven for earth, Our known unknown, our God revealed to
 man?
 Existent somewhere, somehow, as a
 whole;
 Here, as a whole proportioned to our
 sense, —
 There, (which is nowhere, speech must babble thus!)
 In the absolute immensity, the whole Appreciable solely by Thyself, —
 Here, by the little mind of man, reduced To littleness that suits his faculty,
 In the degree appreciable too; Between Thee and ourselves — nay even,
 again,
 Below us, to the extreme of the minute, Appreciable by how many and what diverse Modes of the life Thou madest be! (why
 live
 Except for love, — how love unless they
 know?)
 Each of them, only filling to the edge, Insect or angel, his just length and breadth, Due facet of reflection, — full, no less,
 Angel or insect, as Thou framedst things.
 I it is who have been appointed here
 To represent Thee, in my turn, on earth,
 Just as, if new philosophy know aught,
 This one earth, out of all the multitude Of peopled worlds, as stars are now supposed, —
 Was chosen, and no sun-star of the swarm,
 For stage and scene of Thy transcendent
 act
 Beside which even the creation fades
 Into a puny exercise of power.
 Choice of the world, choice of the thing I am,
 Both emanate alike from Thy dread play

Of operation outside this our sphere Where things are classed and counted 51 small or great, — Incomprehensibly the choice is Thine!
 I therefore bow my head and take Thy
 place
 There is, beside the works, a tale of Thee
 In the world's mouth, which I find credible:
 I love it with my heart: unsatisfied,
 I try it with my reason, nor discept From any point I probe and pronounce
 sound.
 Mind is not matter nor from matter, but Above, — leave matter then, proceed with
 mind!
 Man's be the mind recognised at the 64
 height, —
 Leave the inferior minds and look at man!
 Is he the strong, intelligent and good
 Up to his own conceivable height?
 Nowise.
 Enough o' the low, — soar the conceivable height,
 Find cause to match the effect in evidence,
 The work i' the world, not man's but God's; leave man!
 Conjecture of the worker by the work:
 Is there strength there? — enough: intelligence?
 Ample: but goodness in a like degree?
 Not to the human eye in the present state, 70
 An isoscele deficient in the base.¹
 What lacks, then, of perfection fit for God But just the instance which this tale supplies
 Of love without a limit? So is strength,
 So is intelligence; let love be so,
 Unlimited in its self-sacrifice, Then is the tale true and God shows complete.
 Beyond the tale, I reach into the dark, Feel what I cannot see, and still faith
 stands:
 I can believe this dread machinery 80
 Of sin and sorrow, would confound me
 else,
 Devised, — all pain, at most expenditure Of pain by Who devised pain, — to evolve,
 By new machinery in counterpart,
 The moral qualities of man — how else? —
 To make him love in turn and be beloved,
 Creative and self-sacrificing too,
 And thus eventually God-like, (ay,
 "I have said ye are Gods," — shall it be said for nought?)
 Enable man to wring, from out all pain, 90
 All pleasure for a common heritage
 To all eternity: this may be surmised,
 The other is revealed, — whether a fact,
¹ An isoscele deficient in the base: two sides of the triangle, strength and intelligence, are visible; the third, goodness, is not so in the present state of our knowledge.

- Absolute, abstract, independent truth, Historic, not reduced to suit man's
 mind, —
 Or only truth reverberate, changed, made
 pass
 A spectrum into mind, the narrow eye, —
 The same and not the same, else unconceived —
 Though quite conceivable to the next grade
 Above it in intelligence, — as truth
 Easy to man were blindness to the beast
 By parity of procedure, — the same truth
 In a new form, but changed in either case:
 What matter so intelligence be filled?
 To a child, the sea is angry, for it roars: Frost bites, else why the tooth-like fret on
 face?
 Man makes acoustics deal with the sea's
 wrath,
 Explains the choppy cheek by chymic
 law, —
 To man and child remains the same effect On drum of ear and root of nose, change
 cause Never so thoroughly: so my heart be
 struck,
 What care I, — by God's gloved hand or the bare?
 Nor do I much perplex me with aught
 hard,
 Dubious in the transmitting of the tale, —
 No, nor with certain riddles set to solve.
 This life is training and a passage; pass, — Still, we march over some flat obstacle
 We made give way before us; solid truth
 In front of it, what motion for the world?
 The moral sense grows but by exercise.
 'Tis even as man grew probatively Initiated in Godship, set to make A fairer moral world than this he finds,
 Guess now what shall be known hereafter.
 Deal
 Thus with the present problem: as we see,
 A faultless creature is destroyed, and sin Has had its way i' the world where God should rule.
 Ay, but for this irrelevant circumstance Of inquisition after blood, we see Pompilia lost and Guido saved: how long?
 For his whole life: how much is that whole life?
 We are not babes, but know the minute's
 worth,
 And feel that life is large and the world
 small,
 So, wait till life have passed from out the
 world.
 Neither does this astonish at the end,
 That whereas, I can so receive and trust, Other men, made with hearts and souls the
 same,
 Reject and disbelieve, — subordinate
 The future to the present, — sin, nor fear.
- This I refer still to the foremost fact, Life is probation and the earth no goal But starting-point of man: compel him
 strive,
 Which means, in man, as good as reach 50 the goal, —
 Why institute that race, his life, at all?
 But this does overwhelm me with surprise, Touch me to terror, — not that faith, the pearl,
 Should be let lie by fishers wanting food, — Nor, seen and handled by a certain few Critical and contemptuous, straight consigned
 To shore and shingle for the pebble it proves, —
 But that, when haply found and known and named
 By the residue made rich for evermore, These, — that these favoured ones, should 60 in a trice Turn, and with double zest go dredge for whelks,
 Mud-worms that make the savoury soup!
 Enough
 O' the disbelievers, see the faithful few!
 How do the Christians here deport them,
 keep Their robes of white unspotted by the
 world?
 What is this Aretine Archbishop, this Man under me as I am under God, This champion of the faith, I armed and decked,
 Pushed forward, put upon a pinnacle,
 To show the enemy his victor, — see! 70 What's the best fighting when the couple
 close?
 Pompilia cries, "Protect me from the wolf!"
 He — "No, thy Guido is rough, heady,
 strong,
 "Dangerous to disquiet: let him bide!
 "He needs some bone to mumble, help amuse
 "The darkness of his den with: so, the fawn
 "Which limps up bleeding to my foot and
 lies,
 "— Come to me, daughter! — thus I throw him back!"
 Have we misjudged here, over-armed our knight,
 Given gold and silk where plain hard steel 80 serves best,
 Enfeebled whom we sought to fortify,
 Made an archbishop and undone a saint?
 Well, then, descend these heights, this pride of life,
 Sit in the ashes with a barefoot monk Who long ago stamped out the worldly sparks,
 By fasting, watching, stone cell and wire
 scourge,

— No such indulgence as unknots the strength —

These breed the tight nerve and tough cuticle,

And the world's praise or blame runs rillet-wise

Off the broad back and brawny breast, we know!

He meets the first cold sprinkle of the world,

And shudders to the marrow. "Save this child?

"Oh, my superiors, oh, the Archbishop's self!

"Who was it dared lay hand upon the ark

"His betters saw fall nor put finger forth?

10 "Great ones could help yet help not: why should small?

"I break my promise: let her break her heart!"

These are the Christians not the worldlings, not

The sceptics, who thus battle for the faith!

If foolish virgins disobey and sleep,

What wonder? But, this time, the wise that watch,

Sell lamps and buy lutes, exchange oil for wine,

The mystic Spouse betrays the Bridegroom here.

To our last resource, then! Since all flesh is weak,

Bind weaknesses together, we get strength:

20 The individual weighed, found wanting, try

Some institution, honest artifice

Where by the units grow compact and firm!

Each props the other, and so stand is made

By our embodied cowards that grow brave.

The Monastery called of Convertites,

Meant to help women because these helped Christ, —

A thing existent only while it acts,

Does as designed, else a nonentity, —

For what is an idea unrealised? —

30 Pompilia is consigned to these for help.

They do help: they are prompt to testify

To her pure life and saintly dying days.

She dies, and lo, who seemed so poor, proves rich.

What does the body that lives through helpfulness

To women for Christ's sake? The kiss turns bite,

The dove's note changes to the crow's cry: judge!

"Seeing that this our Convent claims of right

"What goods belong to those we succour,

be

"The same proved women of dishonest life, —

40 "And seeing that this Trial made appear

"Pompilia was in such predicament, —

"The Convent hereupon pretends to said

"Succession of Pompilia, issues writ,
"And takes possession by the Fisc's advice."

Such is their attestation to the cause Of Christ, who had one saint at least, they hoped:

But, is a title-deed to filch, a corpse
To slander, and an infant-heir to cheat?

Christ must give up his gains then! They unsay

All the fine speeches, — who was saint is 59
whore.

Why, scripture yields no parallel for this!
The soldiers only threw dice for Christ's coat;

We want another legend of the Twelve Disputing if it was Christ's coat at all,

Claiming as prize the woof of price — for why?

The Master was a thief, purloined the same,
Or paid for it out of the common bag!

Can it be this is end and outcome, all
I take with me to show as stewardship's fruit,

The best yield of the latest time, this 60
year

The seventeen-hundredth since God died for man?

Is such effect proportionate to cause?
And still the terror keeps on the increase

When I perceive . . . how can I blink the fact?

That the fault, the obduracy to good,
Lies not with the impracticable stuff

Whence man is made, his very nature's fault,

As if it were of ice the moon may gild Not melt, or stone 'twas meant the sun should warm

Not make bear flowers, — nor ice nor 70 stone to blame:

But it can melt, that ice, can bloom, that stone,

Impossible to rule of day and night!
This terrifies me, thus compelled perceive,

Whatever love and faith we looked should spring

At advent of the authoritative star,
Which yet lie sluggish, curdled at the source, —

These have leapt forth profusely in old time,
These still respond with promptitude to-day,

At challenge of — what unacknowledged powers

O' the air, what uncommissioned meteors, 84
warmth

By law, and light by rule should supersede?

For see this priest, this Caponsacchi, stung

At the first summons, — "Help for hor-our's sake,

"Play the man, pity the oppressed!" — no
 pause,
 How does he lay about him in the midst,
 Strike any foe, right wrong at any risk, All blindness, bravery and obedience! —
 blind?

Ay, as a man would be inside the sun, Delirious with the plenitude of light Should refuse him to the finger-ends — Let him rush straight, and how shall he go
 wrong?

Where are the Christians in their panoply?
 10 The loins we girt about with truth, the breasts

Righteousness plated round, the shield of
 faith,

The helmet of salvation, and that sword O' the Spirit, even the word of God, — where these?

Slunk into corners! Oh, I hear at once Hubbub of protestation! "What, we monks,

"We friars, of such an order, such a rule,

"Have not we fought, bled, left our martyr-mark

"At every point along the boundary-line
 "'Twixt true and false, religion and the
 world,

20 "Where this or the other dogma of our Church

"Called for defence?" And I, despite
 myself,

How can I but speak loud what truth speaks low,

"Or better than the best, or nothing serves!

"What boots deed, I can cap and cover
 straight

"With such another doughtiness to match,
 "Done at an instinct of the natural man?"

Immolate body, sacrifice soul too, — Do not these publicans the same? Outstrip!

Or else stop race you boast runs neck and
 neck,

30 You with the wings, they with the feet, — for shame!

Oh, I remark your diligence and zeal!
 Five years long, now, rounds faith into my ears,

"Help thou, or Christendom is done to
 death!"

Five years since, in the Province of To-kien,

Which is in China as some people know, Maigrot, my Vicar Apostolic there,

Having a great qualm, issues a decree.
 Alack, the converts use as God's name, not Tien-chu but plain Tien or else mere Shang-ti,

40 As Jesuits please to fancy politic, While, say Dominicans, it calls down
 fire, —

For Tien means heaven, and Shang-ti, supreme prince,

While Tien-chu means the lord of heaven:
 all cry,

"There is no business urgent for dispatch
 "As that thou send a legate, specially

"Cardinal Tournon, straight to Peking,
 there

"To settle and compose the difference!"
 So have I seen a potentate all fume

For some infringement of his realm's just
 right,

Some menace to a mud-built straw- 50 thatched farm

O' the frontier; while inside the mainland
 lie,

Quite undisputed-for in solitude, Whole cities plague may waste or famine

sap:
 What if the sun crumble, the sands encroach,

While he looks on sublimely at his ease?
 How does their ruin touch the empire's

bound?

And in this little all that was to be?
 Where is the gloriously-decisive change,

Metamorphosis the immeasurable
 Of human clay to divine gold, we looked 60

Should, in some poor sort, justify its price?
 Had an adept of the mere Rosy Cross?

Spent his life to consummate the Great
 Work,

Would not we start to see the stuff it touched

Yield not a grain more than the vulgar got
 By the old smelting-process years ago?

If this were sad to see in just the sage Who should profess so much, perform no

more,
 What is it when suspected in that Power Who undertook to make and made the 70

world,
 Devised and did effect man, body and soul, Ordained salvation for them both, and

yet . . .

Well, is the thing we see, salvation?
 I

Put no such dreadful question to myself, Within whose circle of experience burns

The central truth, Power, Wisdom, Goodness, — God:

I must outlive a thing ere know it dead:
 When I outlive the faith there is a sun,

When I lie, ashes to the very soul, —
 Some one, not I, must wail above the 80

heap,
 "He died in dark whence never morn arose."

While I see day succeed the deepest
 night —

* An adept of the Rosy Cross a member of the society of Rosicrucians.

How can I speak but as I know? — my speech

Must be, throughout the darkness, "It will end:

"The light that did burn, will burn!" Clouds obscure —

But for which obscuration all were bright?
Too hastily concluded! Sun-suffused,
A cloud may soothe the eye made blind by blaze, —

Better the very clarity of heaven:
The soft streaks are the beautiful and dear.
What but the weakness in a faith supplies
The incentive to humanity, no strength Absolute, irresistible, comports?
How can man love but what he yearns to help?

And that which men think weakness within strength,
But angels know for strength and stronger yet —

What were it else but the first things made new,

But repetition of the miracle,
The divine instance of self-sacrifice
That never ends and aye begins for man?
So, never I miss footing in the maze,
No, — I have light nor fear the dark at all.

But are mankind not real, who pace outside

My petty circle, world that's measured me?
And when they stumble even as I stand,
Have I a right to stop ear when they cry,
As they were phantoms who took clouds for crags,

Tripped and fell, where man's march might safely move?

Beside, the cry is other than a ghost's,
When out of the old time there pleads some bard,

Philosopher, or both,¹ and — whispers not,
But words it boldly. "The inward work and worth

"Of any mind, what other mind may judge

"Save God who only knows the thing He made,

"The veritable service He exacts?
"It is the outward product men appraise.

"Behold, an engine hoists a tower aloft:
"I looked that it should move the mountain too!"

"Or else 'Had just a turret toppled down,
"Success enough!' — may say the Machinist

"Who knows what less or more result might be:

"But we, who see that done we cannot do,
"A feat beyond man's force," we men must say.

"But we, who see that done we cannot do,
"A feat beyond man's force," we men must say.

"Regard me and that shake I gave the world!

"I was born, not so long before Christ's birth

"As Christ's birth haply did precede thy day, —

"But many a watch before the star of dawn:

"Therefore I lived, — it is thy creed affirms,

"Pope Innocent, who art to answer me! —
"Under conditions, nowise to escape,

"Whereby salvation was impossible.
"Each impulse to achieve the good and fair,

"Each aspiration to the pure and true,
"Being without a warrant or an aim,

"Was just as sterile a felicity
"As if the insect, born to spend his life

"Soaring his circles, stopped them to describe

"(Painfully motionless in the mid-air)
"Some word of weighty counsel for man's sake,

"Some 'Know thyself' or 'Take the golden mean!' ²

"— Forwent his happy dance and the glad ray,

"Died half an hour the sooner and was dust.

"I, born to perish like the brutes, or worse,

"Why not live brutishly, obey brutes' law?

"But I, of body as of soul complete,
"A gymnast at the games, philosopher

"I' the schools, who painted, and made music, — all

"Glories that met upon the tragic stage

"When the Third Poet's ³ tread surprised the Two, —

"Whose lot fell in a land where life was great

"And sense went free and beauty lay profuse,

"I, untouched by one adverse circumstance,

"Adopted virtue as my rule of life,
"Waived all reward, loved but for loving's sake,

"And, what my heart taught me, I taught the world,

"And have been teaching now two thousand years.

"Witness my work, — plays that should please, forsooth!

"They might please, they may displease, they shall teach,

"They shall teach,

² Some "Know thyself" or "Take the golden mean": typical apophthegms of the ancient Greek sages.

³ The Third Poet: Euripides. The Two: Aeschylus and Sophocles.

¹ Some bard, philosopher, or both: the following speech is put into the mouth of Euripides.

- "For truth's sake," so I said, and did, and do.
 "Five hundred years ere Paul spoke, Felix heard, —
 "How much of temperance and righteousness,
 "Judgment to come, did I find reason for,
 "Corroborate with my strong style that spared
 "No sin, nor swerved the more from branding brow
 "Because the sinner was called Zeus and God?
 "How nearly did I guess at that Paul knew?
 "How closely come, in what I represent 10 "As duty, to his doctrine yet a blank?
 "And as that limner not untruly limns
 "Who draws an object round or square, which square
 "Or round seems to the unassisted eye,
 "Though Galileo's tube display the same
 "Oval or oblong, — so, who controverts
 "I rendered rightly what proves wrongly wrought
 "Beside Paul's picture? Mine was true for me.
 "I saw that there are, first and above all, 20 "The hidden forces, blind necessities,
 "Named Nature, but the thing's self unconceived:
 "Then follow, — how dependent upon these,
 "We know not, how imposed above ourselves,
 "We well know, — what I name the gods, a power
 "Various or one: for great and strong and good
 "Is there, and little, weak and bad there too,
 "Wisdom and folly: say, these make no God, —
 "What is it else that rules outside man's self?
 "A fact then, — always, to the naked eye, —
 "And so, the one revealment possible 30 "Of what were unimagined else by man.
 "Therefore, what gods do, man may criticise,
 "Applaud, condemn, — how should he fear the truth? —
 "But likewise have in awe because of power,
 "Venerate for the main munificence,
 "And give the doubtful deed its due excuse
 "From the acknowledged creature of a day
 "To the Eternal and Divine. Thus, bold
 "Yet self-mistrusting, should man bear himself,
- "Most assured on what now concerns him most —
 "The law of his own life, the path he prints, —
 "Which law is virtue and not vice, I say, —
 "And least inquisitive where search least skills,
 "I' the nature we best give the clouds to keep.
 "What could I paint beyond a scheme like this "Out of the fragmentary truths where light
 "Lay fitful in a tenebrific time?
 "You have the sunrise now, joins truth to truth,
 "Shoots life and substance into death and void;
 "Themselves compose the whole we made before:
 "The forces and necessity grow God, — 50
 "The beings so contrarious that seemed gods,
 "Prove just His operation manifold
 "And multiform, translated, as must be,
 "Into intelligible shape so far
 "As suits our sense and sets us free to feel.
 "What if I let a child think, childhood-long,
 "That lightning, I would have him spare his eye,
 "Is a real arrow shot at naked orb?
 "The man knows more, but shuts his lids the same:
 "Lightning's cause comprehends nor man 60 nor child.
 "Why then, my scheme, your better knowledge broke,
 "Presently re-adjusts itself, the small
 "Proportioned largelier, parts and whole named new:
 "So much, no more two thousand years have done!
 "Pope, dost thou dare pretend to punish me,
 "For not desecrating sunshine at midnight,
 "Me who crept all-fours, found my way so far —
 "While thou rewardest teachers of the truth,
 "Who miss the plain way in the blaze of noon, —
 "Though just a word from that strong 70 style of mine,
 "Grasped honestly in hand as guiding-staff,
 "Had pricked them a sure path across the bog,
 "That mire of cowardice and slush of lies
 "Wherein I find them wallow in wide day!"

How should I answer this Euripides?
Paul — 'tis a legend — answered Seneca,¹ But that was in the day-spring; noon is
now:

We have got too familiar with the light.
Shall I wish back once more that thrill of dawn?

When the whole truth-touched man burned up, one fire?

— Assured the trial, fiery, fierce, but fleet, Would, from his little heap of ashes, lend Wings to that conflagration of the world

10 Which Christ awaits ere He makes all things new:

So should the frail become the perfect, rapt From glory of pain to glory of joy; and

so Even in the end, — the act renouncing
earth,

Lands, houses, husbands, wives and children here, —

Begin that other act which finds all, lost, Regained, in this time even, a hundred-
fold,

And, in the next time, feels the finite love Blent and embalmed with the eternal life.

So does the sun ghastly seem to sink 20 In those north parts, lean all but out of

life,

Desist a dread mere breathing-stop, then
slow

Re-assert day, begin the endless rise.

Was this too easy for our after-stage?

Was such a lighting-up of faith, in life,

Only allowed initiate, set man's stop?

In the true way by help of the great glow?

A way wherein it is ordained he walk,

Bearing to see the light from heaven still
more

And more encroached on by the light of
earth,

30 Tentatives earth puts forth to rival heaven, Earthly incitements that mankind serve
God

For man's sole sake, not God's and therefore man's.

Till at last, who distinguishes the sun

From a mere Druid fire on a far mount?

More praise to him who with his subtle prism

Shall decompose both beams and name
the true.

In such sense, who is last proves first in-
deed;

For how could saints and martyrs fail see
truth

Streak the night's blackness? Who is faithful now?

40 Who untwists heaven's white from the yellow flare

O' the world's gross torch, without night's foil that helped

Produce the Christian act so possible When in the way stood Nero's cross and stake, —

So hard now when the world smiles "Right and wise!

"Faith points the politic, the thrifty way,

"Will make who plods it in the end returns

"Beyond mere fool's sport and improvi-
dence.

"We fools dance thro' the cornfield of this
life,

"Pluck ears to left and right and swallow raw,

" — Nay, tread, at pleasure, a sheaf under- 50
foot,

"To get the better at some poppy-
flower, —

"Well aware we shall have so much less wheat

"In the eventual harvest: you meantime

"Waste not a spike, — the richer will you reap!

"What then? There will be always garnered meal

"Sufficient for our comfortable loaf,

"While you enjoy the undiminished sack!"

Is it not this ignoble confidence, Cowardly hardihood, that dulls and damps,

Makes the old heroism impossible? 60

Unless . . . what whispers me of times to
come?

What if it be the mission of that age

My death will usher into life, to shake

This torpor of assurance from our creed,

Re-introduce the doubt discarded, bring

That formidable danger back, we drove

Long ago to the distance and the dark?

No wild beast now prowls round the infant camp:

We have built wall and sleep in city safe:

But if some earthquake try the towers that 70
laugh

To think they once saw lions rule outside,

And man stand out again, pale, resolute,

Prepared to die, — which means, alive at
last?

As we broke up that old faith of the world, Have we, next age, to break up this the

new — Faith, in the thing, grown faith in the report —

Whence need to bravely disbelieve report

Through increased faith i' the thing reports belie?

Must we deny, — do they, these Molinists,
At peril of their body and their soul, — 80

Recognised truths, obedient to some truth Unrecognised yet, but perceptible? —

Correct the portrait by the living face.

¹ Paul . . . answered Seneca: referring to the traditional (but legendary) intercourse between St. Paul and Seneca.

Man's God, by God's God in the mind of man?
 Then, for the few that rise to the new height,
 The many that must sink to the old depth,
 The multitude found fall away! A few,
 E'en ere new law speak clear, may keep the old,
 Preserve the Christian level, call good good And evil evil, (even though razed and blank
 The old titles,) helped by custom, habitude, And all else they mistake for finer sense
 O' the fact that reason warrants, — as before,
 They hope perhaps, fear not impossibly.
 At least some one Pompilia left the world Will say "I know the right place by foot's feel,
 "I took it and tread firm there; wherefore change?"
 But what a multitude will surely fall
 Quite through the crumbling truth, late subjacent, Sink to the next discoverable base, Rest upon human nature, settle there On what is firm, the lust and pride of life!
 A mass of men, whose very souls even now Seem to need re-creating, — so they slink Worm-like into the mud, light now lays bare, — Whose future we dispose of with shut eyes And whisper — "They are grafted, barren twigs,
 "Into the living stock of Christ: may bear
 "One day, till when they lie death-like, not dead," —
 Those who with all the aid of Christ succumb, How, without Christ, shall they, unaided, sink?
 Whither but to this gulf before my eyes?
 Do not we end, the century and I?
 The impatient antimasque treads close on kibe
 O' the very masque's self it will mock, — on me, Last lingering personage, the impatient mime Pushes already, — will I block the way?
 Will my slow trail of garments ne'er leave space
 For pantaloons, sock, plume, and castanet?
 Here comes the first experimentalist
 In the new order of things, — he plays a priest;
 Does he take inspiration from the Church, Directly make her rule his law of life?
 Not he: his own mere impulse guides the man — Happily sometimes, since ourselves allow

He has danced, in gaiety of heart, i' the main
 The right step through the maze we bade him foot.
 But if his heart had prompted him break loose
 And mar the measure? Why, we must submit,
 And thank the chance that brought him safe so far.
 Will he repeat the prodigy? Perhaps.
 Can he teach others how to quit themselves,
 Show why this step was right while that were wrong?
 How should he? "Ask your hearts as I asked mine,
 "And get discreetly through the morrice too;
 "If your hearts misdirect you, — quit the stage,
 "And make amends, — be there amends to make!"
 Such is, for the Augustin that was once,
 This Canon Caponsacchi we see now.
 "But my heart answers to another tune," Puts in the Abate, second in the suite,
 "I have my taste too, and tread no such step!
 "You choose the glorious life, and may, for me!
 "I like the lowest of life's appetites, —
 "So you judge, — but the very truth of joy
 "To my own apprehension which decides,
 "Call me knave and you get yourself called fool!
 "I live for greed, ambition, lust, revenge;
 "Attain these ends by force, guile: hypocrite,
 "To-day, perchance to-morrow recognised
 "The rational man, the type of common sense."
 There's Loyola¹ adapted to our time!
 Under such guidance Guido plays his part,
 He also influencing in the due turn These last clods where I track intelligence By any glimmer, these four at his beck Ready to murder any, and, at their own,
 As ready to murder him, — such make the world!
 And, first effect of the new cause of things,
 There they lie also duly, — the old pair
 Of the weak head and not so wicked heart,
 With the one Christian mother, wife and girl,
 — Which three gifts seem to make an angel up, —
 The world's first foot o' the dance is on their heads!

¹ Loyola: Ignatius Loyola (1491-1556), founder of the order of the Society of Jesus, or Jesuits.

Still, I stand here, not off the stage though
close

On the exit: and my last act, as my first,
I owe the scene, and Him who armed me
thus

With Paul's sword as with Peter's key. I smite

With my whole strength once more, ere end
my part,

Ending, so far as man may, this offence.
And when I raise my arm, who plucks my sleeve?

Who stops me in the righteous function, —
foe

Or friend? Oh, still as ever, friends are
they

Who, in the interest of outraged truth
Deprecate such rough handling of a lie!

The facts being proved and incontestable, What is the last word I must listen to?

Perchance — "Spare yet a term this barren
stock

"We pray thee dig about and dung and dress

"Till he repent and bring forth fruit even
yet!"

Perchance — "So poor and swift a punishment

"Shall throw him out of life with all that
sin:

"Let mercy rather pile up pain on pain
"Till the flesh expiate what the soul pays
else!"

Nowise! Remonstrants on each side commence

Instructing, there's a new tribunal now Higher than God's — the educated man's!

Nice sense of honour in the human breast Supersedes here the old coarse oracle —

Confirming none the less a point or so Wherein blind predecessors worked aright

By rule of thumb: as when Christ said, — when, where?

Enough, I find it pleaded in a place, —
"All other wrongs done, patiently I take:

"But touch my honour and the case is changed!

"I feel the due resentment, — nemini
"*Honorem trado*¹ is my quick retort."

Right of Him, just as if pronounced today!

Still, should the old authority be mute Or doubtful or in speaking clash with new,

The younger takes permission to decide.
At last we have the instinct of the world

Ruling its household without tutelage:
And while the two laws, human and divine,

Have busied finger with this tangled case,
In pushes the brisk junior, cuts the knot,

Pronounces for acquittal. How it trips Silverly o'er the tongue! "Remit the

death!

"Forgive, . . . well, in the old way, if thou please,

"Decency and the relics of routine "Respected, — let the Count go free as
air!

"Since he may plead a priest's immunity, —

"The minor orders help enough for that,
"With Farinacci's licence, — who decides 50

"That the mere implication of such man,
"So privileged, in any cause, before

"Whatever Court except the Spiritual,
"Straight quashes law-procedure, — quash it, then!

"Remains a pretty loophole of escape
"Moreover, that, beside the patent fact

"O' the law's allowance, there's involved the weal

"O' the Popedom: a son's privilege at stake,

"Thou wilt pretend the Church's interest,
"Ignore all finer reasons to forgive! 60

"But herein lies the crowning cogency —
"(Let thy friends teach thee while thou tellest beads)

"That in this case the spirit of culture speaks,

"Civilisation is imperative.
"To her shall we remand all delicate points

"Henceforth, nor take irregular advice
"O' the sly, as heretofore: she used to hint

"Remonstrances, when law was out of sorts

"Because a saucy tongue was put to rest,
"An eye that roved was cured of arrogance: 70

"But why be forced to mumble under
breath

"What soon shall be acknowledged as plain fact,

"Outspoken, say, in thy successor's time?
"Methinks we see the golden age return!

"Civilisation and the Emperor "Succeed to Christianity and Pope.

"One Emperor then, as one Pope now:
meanwhile,

"Anticipate a little! We tell thee 'Take
"Guido's life, sapped society shall crash,

"Whereof the main prop was, is, and shall 80
be

"— Supremacy of husband over wife!
"Does the man rule i' the house, and may his mate

"Because of any plea dispute the same?
"Oh, pleas of all sorts shall abound, be
sure,

"One but allowed validity, — for, harsh
"And savage, for, inept and silly-sooth,

"For, this and that, will the ingenious sex
"Demonstrate the best master e'er graced
slave:

'And there's but one short way to end the coil, —
 'Acknowledge right and reason steadily
 'I' the man and master: then the wife submits
 'To plain truth broadly stated. Does the time
 'Advise we shift — a pillar? nay, a stake
 'Out of its place i' the social tenement?
 'One touch may send a shudder through the heap
 'And bring it toppling on our children's heads!
 'Moreover, if ours breed a qualm in thee,
 'Give thine own better feeling play for
 once!
 'Thou, whose own life winks o'er the socket-edge,
 'Wouldst thou it went out in such ugly
 snuff
 'As dooming sons dead, e'en though justice prompt?
 'Why, on a certain feast, Barabbas' self
 'Was set free, not to cloud the general cheer:
 'Neither shalt thou pollute thy Sabbath
 close!
 'Mercy is safe and graceful. How one hears
 'The howl begin, scarce the three little taps!¹
 'O' the silver mallet silent on thy brow, —
 'His last act was to sacrifice a Count
 'And thereby screen a scandal of the Church!
 'Guido condemned, the Canon justified
 'Of course, — delinquents of his cloth go
 free!
 'And so the Luthers chuckle, Calvins
 scowl,
 'So thy hand helps Molinos to the chair
 'Whence he may hold forth till doom's day on just 'These petit-maitre priestlings, — in the choir
 'Sanctus et Benedictus, with a brush
 'Of soft guitar-strings that obey the thumb,
 'Touched by the bedside, for accompani-
 ment!
 'Does this give umbrage to a husband?
 Death
 'To the fool, and to the priest impunity!
 'But no impunity to any friend
 'So simply over loyal as these four 'Who made religion of their patron's
 cause,
 'Believed in him and did his bidding
 straight,

¹ The three little taps: when a pope dies, the Cardinal Camerlengo has to assure himself of his death by tapping thrice on his forehead with a silver mallet.

"Asked not one question but laid down the lives
 "This Pope took, — all four lives together
 make
 "Just his own length of days, — so, dead they lie,
 "As these were times when loyalty's a drug,
 "And zeal in a subordinate too cheap
 "And common to be saved when we spend
 life!
 "Come, 'tis too much good breath we waste in words:
 "The pardon, Holy Father! Spare
 grimace,
 "Shrugs and reluctance! Are not we the
 world,
 "Art not thou Priam? Let soft culture
 plead
 "Hecuba-like, 'non tali'² (Virgil serves)
 "'Auxilio' and the rest! Enough, it works!
 "The Pope relaxes, and the Prince is loth,
 "The father's bowels yearn, the man's will bends,
 "Reply is apt. Our tears on tremble,
 hearts
 "Big with a benediction, wait the word
 "Shall circulate thro' the city in a trice,
 "Set every window flaring, give each man
 "O' the mob his torch to wave for gratitude.
 "Pronounce then, for our breath and patience fail!"

I will, Sirs: but a voice other than yours quickens my spirit. "Quis pro Domino?
 "Who is upon the Lord's side?" asked the Count.

6c

I, who write —

"On receipt of this command,
 "Acquaint Count Guido and his fellows four
 "They die to-morrow: could it be tonight,
 "The better, but the work to do, takes
 time.
 "Set with all diligence a scaffold up,
 "Not in the customary place, by Bridge
 "Saint Angelo, where die the common
 sort;
 "But since the man is noble, and his peers
 "By predilection haunt the People's Square,
 "There let him be beheaded in the midst,
 "And his companions hanged on either
 side:
 "So shall the quality see, fear and learn.

² Non tali auxilio: Virgil, Æn. II. 521—"not with such aid" as thine is religion to be benefited, any more than Troy could be saved by Priam's arms.

"All which work takes time: till to-morrow, then,
 "Let there be prayer incessant for the five!"

For the main criminal I have no hope Except in such a suddenness of fate.
 I stood at Naples once, a night so dark
 I could have scarce conjectured there was earth

Anywhere, sky or sea or world at all:
 But the night's black was burst through by a blaze —

Thunder struck blow on blow, earth groaned and bore,

10 Through her whole length of mountain visible:

There lay the city thick and plain with spires,

And, like a ghost disshrouded, white the sea.

So may the truth be flashed out by one
 blow,

And Guido see, one instant, and be saved.
 Else I avert my face, nor follow him Into that sad obscure sequestered state Where God unmakes but to remake the soul

He else made first in vain; which must not be.

Enough, for I may die this very night:

20 And how should I dare die, this man let
 live?

Carry this forthwith to the Governor!

XI. — GUIDO.

You are the Cardinal Acciaiuoli, and you, Abate Panciatichi — two good Tuscan
 names:

Acciaiuoli — ah, your ancestor it was Built the huge battlemented convent-
 block

Over the little forky flashing Greve That takes the quick turn at the foot o' the hill

Just as one first sees Florence: oh those days!

'Tis Ema, though, the other rivulet,

30 The one-arched brown brick bridge yawns over, — yes,

Gallop and go five minutes, and you gain
 The Roman Gate from where the Ema's bridged:

Kingfishers fly there: how I see the bend O'erturreted by Certosa which he built, That Senescal (we styled him) of your House!

I do adjure you, help me, Sirs! My blood Comes from as far a source: ought it to
 end

This way, by leakage through their scaffold-planks

Into Rome's sink where her red refuse runs?

Sirs, I beseech you by blood-sympathy, 44
 If there be any vile experiment

In the air, — if this your visit simply prove, When all's done, just a well-intentioned
 trick

That tries for truth truer than truth itself,
 By startling up a man, ere break of day,

To tell him he must die at sunset, — pshaw!

That man's a Franceschini; feel his pulse, Laugh at your folly, and let's all go
 sleep!

You have my last word, — innocent am I As Innocent my Pope and murderer, 50

Innocent as a babe, as Mary's own, As Mary's self, — I said, say and repeat, —

And why, then, should I die twelve hours hence? I —

Whom, not twelve hours ago, the gaoler bade

Turn to my straw-truss, settle and sleep
 sound

That I might wake the sooner, promptlier
 pay

His due of meat-and-drink-indulgence, cross

His palm with fee of the good-hand, be-
 side,

As gallants use who go at large again!
 For why? All honest Rome approved my 60
 part;

Whoever owned wife, sister, daughter, —
 nay,

Mistress, — had any shadow of any right That looks like right, and, all the more resolved,

Held it with tooth and nail, — these manly
 men

Approved! I being for Rome, Rome was
 for me.

Then, there's the point reserved, the subterfuge

My lawyers held by, kept for last resource, Firm should all else, — the impossible fancy! — fail,

And sneaking burgess-spirit win the day.
 The knaves! One plea at least would 70 hold, — they laughed, —

One grappling-iron scratch the bottom-rock

Even should the middle mud let anchor
 go!

I hooked my cause on to the Clergy's, —
 plea

Which, even if law tipped off my hat and plume,

Revealed my priestly tonsure, saved me so.
 The Pope moreover, this old Innocent, Being so meek and mild and merciful,

So fond o' the poor and so fatigued of
 earth,

So . . . fifty thousand devils in deepest hell!
 Why must he cure us of our strange conceit
 Of the angel in man's likeness, that we loved And looked should help us at a pinch? He help?
 He pardon? Here's his mind and message — death!
 Thank the good Pope! Now, is he good in this,
 Never mind, Christian, — no such stuff's extant, —
 But will my death do credit to his reign, Show he both lived and let live, so was good?
 Cannot I live if he but like? "The law!"
 Why, just the law gives him the very chance,
 The precise measure to let my life alone,
 Which the archangelic soul of him (he says)
 Years after! Here they drop it in his palm, My lawyers, capital o' the cursed kind, — Drop life to take and hold and keep: but no!
 He sighs, shakes head, refuses to shut hand, Motions away the gift they bid him grasp,
 And of the coyness comes — that off I run
 And down I go, he best knows whither! mind,
 He knows, who sets me rolling all the same!
 Disinterested Vicar of our Lord,
 This way he abrogates and disallows, Nullifies and ignores, — reverts in fine
 To the good and right, in detriment of me!
 Talk away! Will you have the naked truth?
 He's sick of his life's supper, — swallowed lies:
 So, hobbling bedward, needs must ease his maw Just where I sit o' the door-sill. Sir Abate, Can you do nothing? Friends, we used to irk:
 What of this sudden slash in a friend's face,
 This cut across our good companionship That showed its front so gay when both were young?
 Were not we put into a beaten path,
 Bid pace the world, we nobles born and bred,
 We body of friends with each his scutcheon full Of old achievement and impunity, — Taking the laugh of morn and Sol's salute
 As forth we fared, pricked on to breathe our steeds
 And take equestrian sport over the green 45
 Under the blue, across the crop, — what care?
 If we went prancing up hill and down dale,
 In and out of the level and the straight,
 By the bit of pleasant byeway, where was harm?
 Still Sol salutes me and the morning laughs:
 I see my grandsire's hoof-prints, — point the spot Where he drew rein, slipped saddle, and stabbed knave
 For daring throw gibe — much less, stone — from pale:
 Then back, and on, and up with the cavalcade.
 Just so wend we, now canter, now converse, 50
 Till, 'mid the jauncing pride and jaunty port, Something of a sudden jerks at somebody —
 A dagger is out, a flashing cut and thrust, Because I play some prank my grandsire played,
 And here I sprawl: where is the company? Gone!
 A trot and a trample! only I lie trapped, Writhe in a certain novel springe just set By the good old Pope: I'm first prize. Warn me? Why?
 Apprise me that the law o' the game is changed?
 Enough that I'm a warning, as I writhe, 60
 To all and each my fellows of the file,
 And make law plain henceforward past mistake,
 "For such a prank, death is the penalty!"
 Pope the Five Hundredth (what do I know or care?)
 Deputes your Eminency and Abateship
 To announce that, twelve hours from this time, he needs
 I just essay upon my body and soul
 The virtue of his brand-new engine, prove Repressor of the pranksome! I'm the first!
 Thanks. Do you know what teeth you 70 mean to try
 The sharpness of, on this soft neck and throat?
 I know it, — I have seen and hate it, — ay,
 As you shall, while I tell you! Let me talk, Or leave me, at your pleasure! talk I must:
 What is your visit but my lure to talk?
 Nay, you have something to disclose? — a smile,
 At end of the forced sternness, means to mock

The heart-beats here? I call your two hearts stone!

Is your charge to stay with me till I die? Be tacit as your bench, then! Use your ears,

I use my tongue: how glibly yours will run

At pleasant supper-time . . . God's curse! . . . to-night

When all the guests jump up, begin so brisk

"Welcome, his Eminence who shrived the wretch!

"Now we shall have the Abate's story!"

Life!

How I could spill this overplus of mine to Among those hoar-haired, shrunk-shanked odds and ends

Of body and soul old age is chewing dry! Those windlestraws that stare while purblind death

Mows here, mows there, makes hay of juicy me,

And misses just the bunch of withered weed

Would brighten hell and streak its smoke with flame!

How the life I could shed yet never shrink,

Would drench their stalks with sap like grass in May!

Is it not terrible, I entreat you, Sirs? — With manifold and plenitudinous life,

to Prompt at death's menace to give blow for threat,

Answer his "Be thou not!" by "Thus I am!" —

Terrible so to be alive yet die?

How I live, how I see! so, — how I speak!

Lucidity of soul unlocks the lips:

I never had the words at will before.

How I see all my folly at a glance!

"A man requires a woman and a wife:"

There was my folly; I believed the saw.

I knew that just myself concerned myself, to Yet needs must look for what I seemed to lack,

In a woman, — why, the woman's in the man!

Fools we are, how we learn things when too late!

Overmuch life turns round my woman-side:

The male and female in me, mixed before, Settle of a sudden: I'm my wife outright

In this unmanly appetite for truth, This careless courage as to consequence,

This instantaneous sight through things and through,

This voluble rhetoric, if you please, — 'tis she!

Here you have that Pompilia whom I slew, Also the folly for which I slew her!

Fool!

And, fool-like, what is it I wander from? What did I say of your sharp iron tooth?

Ah, — that I know the hateful thing! this way.

I chanced to stroll forth, many a good year gone,

One warm Spring eve in Rome, and un- aware

Looking, mayhap, to count what stars were out,

Came on your fine axe in a frame, that falls

And so cuts off a man's head underneath, Mannaia, — thus we made acquaintance first:

Out of the way, in a by-part o' the town, At the Mouth-of-Truth o' the river-side, you know: One goes by the Capitol: and wherefore coy, Retiring out of crowded noisy Rome?

Because a very little time ago It had done service, chopped off head from trunk Belonging to a fellow whose poor house

The thing must make a point to stand before —

Felice Whatsoever-was-the-name Who stabled buffaloes and so gained bread, (Our clowns unyoke them in the ground hard by)

And, after use of much improper speech, Had struck at Duke Some-title-or-other's face, Because he kidnapped, carried away and kept Felice's sister who would sit and sing

I' the filthy doorway while she plaited fringe

To deck the brutes with, — on their gear it goes, —

The good girl with the velvet in her voice So did the Duke, so did Felice, so Did Justice, intervening with her axe. There the man-mutilating engine stood

At ease, both gay and grim, like a Swiss guard

Off duty, — purified itself as well, Getting dry, sweet and proper for next week, — And doing incidental good, 'twas hoped,

To the rough lesson-lacking populace Who now and then, forsooth, must right their wrongs! There stood the twelve-foot-square of scaffold, railed Considerately round to elbow-height, For fear an officer should tumble thence

And sprain his ankle and be lame a month Through starting when the axe fell and head too!

Railed likewise were the steps whereby
'twas reached.
All of it painted red: red, in the midst, Ran up two narrow tall beams barred
across,
Since from the summit, some twelve feet
to reach,
The iron plate with the sharp shearing
edge Had slammed, jerked, shot, slid, — I shall soon find which! —
And so lay quiet, fast in its fit place, The wooden half-moon collar, now eclipsed
By the blade which blocked its curvature:
apart,
The other half, — the under half-moon
board Which, helped by this, completes a neck's embrace, —
Joined to a sort of desk that wheels aside Out of the way when done with, — down you kneel,
In you're pushed, over you the other drops, Tight you're clipped, whiz, there's the blade cleaves its best, Out trundles body, down flops head on floor,
And where's your soul gone? That, too,
I shall find!
This kneeling-place was red, red, never
fear!
But only slimy-like with paint, not blood,
For why? a decent pitcher stood at hand,
A broad dish to hold sawdust, and a broom By some unnamed utensil, — scraperrake, —
Each with a conscious air of duty done.
Underneath, loungers, — boys and some few men, — Discours'd this platter, named the other
tool,
Just as, when grooms tie up and dress a steed,
Boys lounge and look on, and elucubrate What the round brush is used for, what the square, —
So was explained — to me the skill-less
then —
The manner of the grooming for next world Undergone by Felice What's-his-name.
There's no such lovely month in Rome as
May —
May's crescent is no half-moon of red plank,
And came now tilting o'er the wave i' the west,
One greenish-golden sea, right 'twixt those bars
Of the engine — I began acquaintance
with,
Understood, hated, hurried from before,
To have it out of sight and cleanse my
soul!

Here it is all again, conserved for use:
Twelve hours hence, I may know more, 43 not hate worse.

That young May-moon-month! Devils of the deep!

Was not a Pope then Pope as much as
now?

Used not he chirrup o'er the Merry Tales, Chuckle, — his nephew so exact the wag
To play a jealous cullion such a trick
As wins the wife i' the pleasant story!
Well?

Why do things change? Wherefore is Rome un-Romed?

I tell you, ere Felice's corpse was cold,
The Duke, that night, threw wide his palace-doors,

Received the compliments o' the quality 50

For justice done him, — bowed and smirked his best,

And in return passed round a pretty thing,
A portrait of Felice's sister's self,

Florid old rogue Albano's masterpiece,

As — better than virginity in rags —

Bouncing Europa on the back o' the bull:

They laughed and took their road the safelier home.

Ah, but times change, there's quite another
Pope,

I do the Duke's deed, take Felice's place,
And, being no Felice, lout and clout, 60

Stomach but ill the phrase "I lose my
head!"

How euphemistic! Lose what? Lose your ring,

Your snuff-box, tablets, kerchief! — but,
your head?

I learnt the process at an early age;

'Twas useful knowledge, in those same old
days,

To know the way a head is set on neck.

My fencing-master urged "Would you excel?

"Rest not content with mere bold give-and-guard,

"Nor pink the antagonist somehow-any-
how!

"See me dissect a little, and know your 74
game!

"Only anatomy makes a thrust the thing."

Oh Cardinal, those lithe live necks of ours!

Here go the vertebræ, here's Atlas, here

Axis, and here the symphyses stop short,

So wisely and well, — as, o'er a corpse, we cant, —

And here's the silver cord which . . .

what's our word?

Depends from the gold bowl, which loosed (not "lost")

Lets us from heaven to hell, — one chop, we're loose!

"And not much pain i' the process," quoth a sage:

Who told him? Not Felice's ghost, I think!
 Such "losing" is scarce Mother Nature's mode.
 She fain would have cord ease itself away, Worn to a thread by threescore years and ten,
 Snap while we slumber: that seems bearable.
 I'm told one clot of blood extravasate Ends one as certainly as Roland's sword, —
 One drop of lymph suffused proves Oliver's mace, — Intruding, either of the pleasant pair, 10 On the arachnoid tunic of my brain.
 'That's Nature's way of loosing cord! — but Art, How of Art's process with the engine here,
 When bow! and cord alike are crushed across,
 Bored between, bruised through? Why, if Fagon's self,
 The French Court's pride, that famed practitioner, Would pass his cold pale lightning of a knife, Pistoja-ware, adroit 'twixt joint and joint,
 With just a "See how facile, gentlefolk!" —
 The thing were not so bad to bear! Brute force 20 Cuts as he comes, breaks in, breaks on, breaks out O' the hard and soft of you: is that the same?
 A lithe snake thrids the hedge, makes throb no leaf:
 A heavy ox sets chest to brier and branch, Bursts somehow through, and leaves one hideous hole Behind him!

And why, why must this needs be?
 Oh, if men were but good! They are not good, Nowise like Peter: people called him rough,
 But if, as I left Rome, I spoke the Saint,
 — "Petrus, quo vadis?"¹ — doubtless, I should hear, 30 "To free the prisoner and forgive his fault!
 "I plucked the absolute dead from God's own bar,
 "And raised up Dorcas, — why not rescue thee?"

¹ Petrus, quo vadis: an allusion to the legend that St. Peter was leaving Rome on the outbreak of the Neronian persecution, when he met Christ coming towards the city, and addressed Him with the words, "Domine, quo vadis?" "Lord, whither goest Thou?" The answer was, "To Rome, to be crucified again"; whereupon Peter turned back and met his martyrdom.

What would cost one such nullifying word?
 If Innocent succeeds to Peter's place,
 Let him think Peter's thought, speak Peter's speech!
 I say, he is bound to it: friends, how say you?
 Concede I be all one bloodguiltiness And mystery of murder in the flesh,
 Why should that fact keep the Pope's mouth shut fast?
 He execrates my crime, — good! — sees hell yawn
 One inch from the red plank's end which I press, — Nothing is better! What's the consequence?
 How should a Pope proceed that knows his cue?
 Why, leave me linger out my minute here,
 Since close on death comes judgment and comes doom,
 Not crib at dawn its pittance from a sheep Destined ere dewfall to be butcher's-meat!
 Think, Sirs, if I have done you any harm,
 And you require the natural revenge, Suppose, and so intend to poison me,
 — Just as you take and slip into my draught
 The paperful of powder that clears scores,
 You notice on my brow a certain blue:
 How you both overset the wine at once!
 How you both smile! "Our enemy has the plague!
 "Twelve hours hence he'll be scraping his bones bare "Of that intolerable flesh, and die,
 "Frenzied with pain: no need for poison here!
 "Step aside and enjoy the spectacle!"
 Tender for souls are you, Pope Innocent!
 Christ's maxim is — one soul outweighs the world:
 Respite me, save a soul, then, curse the world!
 "No," venerable sire, I hear you smirk,
 "No: for Christ's gospel changes names, not things,
 "Renews the obsolete, does nothing more!
 "Our fire-new gospel is re-tinkered law,
 "Our mercy, justice, — Jove's rechristened God, —
 "Nay, whereas, in the popular conceit,
 "'Tis pity that old harsh Law somehow limps,
 "Lingers on earth, although Law's day be done,
 "Else would benignant Gospel interpose,
 "Not furtively as now, but bold and frank
 "O'erflutter us with healing in her wings,
 "Law being harshness, Gospel only love —
 "We tell the people, on the contrary,
 "Gospel takes up the rod which Law lets fall;

"Mercy is vigilant when justice sleeps!
 "Does Law permit a taste of Gospel-grace?
 "The secular arm allow the spiritual power
 "To act for once? — no compliment so fine
 "As that our Gospel handsomely turn harsh,
 "Thrust victim back on Law the nice and coy!" Yes, you do say so, else you would forgive Me whom Law does not touch but tosses you!
 Don't think to put on the professional face!
 You know what I know: casuists as you are,
 Each nerve must creep, each hair start, sting and stand,
 At such illogical inconsequence!
 Dear my friends, do but see! A murder's tried,
 There are two parties to the cause: I'm one,
 — Defend myself, as somebody must do:
 I have the best o' the battle: that's a fact,
 Simple fact, — fancies find no place just now.
 What though half Rome condemned me?
 Half approved:
 And, none disputes, the luck is mine at last,
 All Rome, i' the main, acquitting me: whereon, What has the Pope to ask but "How finds Law?"
 "I find," replies Law, "I have erred this while:
 "Guilty or guiltless, Guido proves a priest,
 "No layman: he is therefore yours, not mine:
 "I bound him: loose him, you whose will is Christ's!"
 And now what does this Vicar of our Lord, Shepherd o' the flock, — one of whose charge bleats sore
 For crook's help from the quag wherein it drowns?
 Law suffers him employ the crumpled end:
 His pleasure is to turn staff, use the point,
 And thrust the shuddering sheep, he calls a wolf, Back and back, down and down to where hell gapes!
 "Guiltless," cries Law — "Guilty" corrects the Pope!
 "Guilty," for the whim's sake! "Guilty," he somehow thinks,
 And anyhow says: 'tis truth; he dares not lie!
 Others should do the lying. That's the cause

Brings you both here: I ought in decency Confess to you that I deserve my fate, Am guilty, as the Pope thinks, — ay, to the end,
 Keep up the jest, lie on, lie ever, lie 44
 I' the latest gasp of me! What reason, Sirs?
 Because to-morrow will succeed to-day
 For you, though not for me: and if I stick Still to the truth, declare with my last breath, I die an innocent and murdered man, —
 Why, there's the tongue of Rome will wag apace
 This time to-morrow: don't I hear the talk!
 "So, to the last he proved impenitent?
 "Pagans have said as much of martyred saints!
 "Law demurred, washed her hands of the 50 whole case.
 "Prince Somebody said this, Duke Something, that.
 "Doubtless the man's dead, dead enough, don't fear!
 "But, hang it, what if there have been a spice,
 "A touch of . . . eh? You see, the Pope's so old,
 "Some of us add, obtuse: age never slips
 "The chance of shoving youth to face death first!"
 And so on. Therefore to suppress such talk You two come here, entreat I tell you lies,
 And end, the edifying way. I end, Telling the truth! Your self-styled shep- 60 herd thieves!
 A thief — and how thieves hate the wolves we know:
 Damage to theft, damage to thrift, all's one!
 The red hand is sworn foe of the black jaw.
 That's only natural, that's right enough:
 But why the wolf should compliment the thief
 With shepherd's title, bark out life in thanks,
 And, spiteless, lick the prong that spits him, — eh, Cardinal? My Abate, scarcely thus!
 There, let my sheepskin-garb, a curse on't, go — Leave my teeth free if I must show my 74 shag!
 Repent? What good shall follow? If I pass Twelve hours repenting, will that fact hold fast
 The thirteenth at the horrid dozen's end?
 If I fall forthwith at your feet, gnash, tear, Foam, rave, to give your story the due grace,
 Will that assist the engine half-way back

- Into its hiding-house? — boards, shaking
now,
Bone against bone, like some old skeleton bat
That wants, at winter's end, to wake and
prey!
Will howling put the spectre back to
sleep?
Ah, but I misconceive your object, Sirs!
Since I want new life like the creature, —
life,
Being done with here, begins i' the world
away:
I shall next have "Come, mortals, and be judged!"
There's but a minute betwixt this and
then:
■ So, quick, be sorry since it saves my soul!
Sirs, truth shall save it, since no lies assist!
Hear the truth, you, whatever you style
yourselves,
Civilisation and society!
Come, one good grapple, I with all the
world!
Dying in cold blood is the desperate thing;
The angry heart explodes, bears off in blaze
The indignant soul, and I'm combustion-ripe.
Why, you intend to do your worst with me!
That's in your eyes! You dare no more than death,
■ And mean no less. I must make up my
mind.
So Pietro, — when I chased him here and
there,
Morsel by morsel cut away the life
I loathed, — cried for just respite to confess And save his soul: much respite did I grant!
Why grant me respite who deserve my
doom?
Me — who engaged to play a prize, fight
you,
Knowing your arms, and foil you, trick for trick,
At rapier-fence, your match and, may be,
more.
I knew that if I chose sin certain sins, 30 Solace my lusts out of the regular way Prescribed me, I should find you in the path,
Have to try skill with a redoubted foe;
You would lunge, I would parry, and make
end.
At last, occasion of a murder comes:
We cross blades, I, for all my brag, break
guard,
And in goes the cold iron at my breast,
Out at my back, and end is made of me.
You stand confessed the adroit sword-man, — ay,
But on your triumph you increase, it seems,
- Want more of me than lying flat on face:
- I ought to raise my ruined head, allege Not simply I pushed worse blade o' the
pair,
But my antagonist dispensed with steel!
There was no passage of arms, you looked me low,
With brow and eye abolished cut and
thrust Nor used the vulgar weapon! This chance scratch,
This incidental hurt, this sort of hole
I' the heart of me? I stumbled, got it so!
Fell on my own sword as a bungler
may!
Yourself proscribe such heathen tools, and 5
trust
To the naked virtue: it was virtue stood Unarmed and awed me, — on my brow there burned
Crime out so plainly intolerably red, That I was fain to cry — "Down to the dust
"With me, and bury there brow, brand
and all!"
Law had essayed the adventure, — but what's Law?
Morality exposed the Gorgon shield!
Morality and Religion conquer me.
If Law sufficed would you come here, entreat
I supplement law, and confess forsooth? 6 Did not the Trial show things plain
enough?
"Ah, but a word of the man's very self "Would somehow put the keystone in its place
"And crown the arch!" Then take the word you want!
- I say that, long ago, when things began,
All the world made agreement, such and
such
Were pleasure-giving profit-bearing acts, But henceforth extra-legal, nor to be:
You must not kill the man whose death would please And profit you, unless his life stop yours 7 Plainly, and need so be put aside:
Get the thing by a public course, by law,
Only no private bloodshed as of old!
All of us, for the good of every one, Renounced such licence and conformed to
law:
Who breaks law, breaks pact therefore,
helps himself
To pleasure and profit over and above the
due,
And must pay forfeit, — pain beyond his share:
For, pleasure being the sole good in the
world,
Anyone's pleasure turns to someone's pain, 8
So, law must watch for everyone, — say
we,

Who call things wicked that give too much joy,
 And nickname mere reprisal, envy makes,
 Punishment: quite right! thus the world goes round.
 I, being well aware such pact there was,
 I, in my time who found advantage come
 Of law's observance and crime's penalty,— Who, but for wholesome fear law bred in friends, Had doubtless given example long ago,
 Furnished forth some friend's pleasure with my pain,
 And, by my death, pieced out his scanty life, —
 I could not, for that foolish life of me, Help risking law's infringement, — I broke bond,
 And needs must pay price, — wherefore, here's my head, Flung with a flourish! But, repentance too?
 But pure and simple sorrow for law's breach Rather than blunderer's ineptitude?
 Cardinal, no! Abate, scarcely thus!
 'Tis the fault, not that I dared try a fall
 With Law and straightway am found undermost,
 But that I failed to see, above man's law, God's precept you, the Christians, recognise?
 Colly my cow! Don't fidget, Cardinal!
 Abate, cross your breast and count your beads
 And exorcise the devil, for here he stands And stiffens in the bristly nape of neck, Daring you drive him hence! You, Christians both?
 I say, if ever was such faith at all Born in the world, by your community Suffered to live its little tick of time,
 'Tis dead of age, now, ludicrously dead;
 Honour its ashes, if you be discreet,
 In epitaph only! For, concede its death, Allow extinction, you may boast unchecked
 What feats the thing did in a crazy land
 At a fabulous epoch, — treat your faith, that way, Just as you treat your relics: "Here's a shred
 "Of saintly flesh, a scrap of blessed bone,
 "Raised King Cophetua, who was dead, to life
 "In Mesopotamy twelve centuries since,
 "Such was its virtue!" — twangs the Sacristan, Holding the shrine-box up, with hands like feet Because of gout in every finger joint:
 Does he bethink him to reduce one knob, Allay one twinge by touching what he vaunts?

I think he half uncrooks fist to catch fee,
 But, for the grace, the quality of cure, — Cophetua was the man put that to proof!
 Not otherwise, your faith is shrined and shown
 And shamed at once: you banter while you bow!
 Do you dispute this? Come, a monster-
 laugh,
 A madman's laugh, allowed his Carnival Later ten days than when all Rome, but he, Laughed at the candle-contest: mine's alight,
 'Tis just it sputter till the puff o' the Pope End it to-morrow and the world turn Ash.
 Come, thus I wave a wand and bring to pass
 In a moment, in the twinkle of an eye,
 What but that — feigning everywhere grows fact, Professors turn possessors, realise
 The faith they play with as a fancy now, 60
 And bid it operate, have full effect
 On every circumstance of life, to-day,
 In Rome, — faith's flow set free at fountain-head!
 Now, you'll own, at this present, when I speak, Before I work the wonder, there's no man, Woman or child in Rome, faith's fountain-head,
 But might, if each were minded, realise Conversely unbelief, faith's opposite — Set it to work on life unflinchingly, Yet give no symptom of an outward 70
 change:
 Why should things change because men disbelieve What's incompatible, in the whited tomb,
 With bones and rottenness one inch below?
 What saintly act is done in Rome to-day But might be prompted by the devil, —
 "is"
 I say not, — "has been, and again may be," —
 I do say, full i' the face o' the crucifix
 You try to stop my mouth with! Off with it!
 Look in your own heart, if your soul have eyes!
 You shall see reason why, though faith 80 were fled, Unbelief still might work the wires and move Man, the machine, to play a faithful part.
 Preside your college, Cardinal, in your cape, Or, — having got above his head, grown Pope, — Abate, gird your loins and wash my feet!
 Do you suppose I am at loss at all Why you crook, why you cringe, why fast or feast?

- Praise, blame, sit, stand, lie or go! — all of it,
In each of you, purest unbelief may prompt,
And wit explain to who has eyes to see.
But, lo, I wave wand, make the false the
true!
Here's Rome believes in Christianity!
What an explosion, how the fragments
fly
Of what was surface, mask and make-
believe!
Begin now, — look at this Pope's-halberdier
In wasp-like black and yellow foolery!
20 He, doing duty at the corridor, Wakes from a muse and stands convinced of sin!
Down he flings halbert, leaps the passage-
length,
Pushes into the presence, pantingly Submits the extreme peril of the case To the Pope's self, — whom in the world
beside? —
And the Pope breaks talk with ambassador, Bids aside bishop, wills the whole world
wait Till he secure that prize, outweighs the
world,
A soul, relieve the sentry of his qualm!
20 His Altitude the Referendary, — Robed right, and ready for the usher's
word
To pay devoir, — is, of all times, just then
'Ware of a master-stroke of argument Will cut the spinal cord . . . ugh, ugh!
. . . I mean,
Paralyse Molinism for evermore!
Straight he leaves lobby, trundles, two and
two,
Down steps to reach home, write, if but a
word Shall end the impudence: he leaves who likes Go pacify the Pope: there's Christ to serve!
30 How otherwise would men display their zeal?
If the same sentry had the least surmise
A powder-barrel 'neath the pavement lay In neighbourhood with what might prove a match,
Meant to bend sky-high Pope and presence both —
Would he not break through courtiers, rank and file,
Bundle up, bear off and save body so,
The Pope, no matter for his priceless soul?
There's no fool's-freak here, nought to soundly swinge,
Only a man in earnest, you'll so praise 40 And pay and prate about, that earth shall ring!
Had thought possessed the Referendary
- His jewel-case at home was left ajar, What would be wrong in running, robes awry,
To be beforehand with the pilferer?
What talk then of indecent haste? Which
means,
That both these, each in his degree, would
do Just that, — for a comparative nothing's
sake,
And thereby gain approval and reward, —
Which, done for what Christ says is worth
the world,
Procures the doer curses, cuffs and kicks. 5
I call such difference 'twixt act and act, Sheer lunacy unless your truth on lip
Be recognised a lie in heart of you!
How do you all act, promptly or in doubt,
When there's a guest poisoned at supper
time
And he sits chatting on with spot on cheek?
"Pluck him by the skirt, and round him in the ears,
"Have at him by the beard, warn any-
how!"
Good, and this other friend that's cheat and thief
And dissolute, — go stop the devil's feast, 6 Withdraw him from the imminent hell-
fire!
Why, for your life, you dare not tell your
friend
"You lie, and I admonish you for Christ!"
Who yet dare seek that same man at the Mass
To warn him — on his knees, and tinkle 1
near, —
He left a cask a-tilt, a tap unturned, The Trebbian running: what a grateful jump
Out of the Church rewards your vigilance!
Perform that self-same service just a
thought
More maladroitley, — since a bishop sits 7 At function! — and he budges not, bites
lip, —
"You see my case: how can I quit my
post?
"He has an eye to any such default.
"See to it, neighbour, I beseech your love!" He and you know the relative worth of
things,
What is permissible or inopportune.
Contort your brows! You know I speak
the truth:
Gold is called gold, and dross called dross,
i' the Book:
Gold you let lie and dross pick up and
prize!
- 1 Tinkle: the ringing of the bell which denotes the elevation of the Host.

— Despite your muster of some fifty monks And nuns a-maundering here and mump-ing there,
 Who could, and on occasion would, spurn
 dress, Clutch gold, and prove their faith a fact so
 far,
 I grant you! Fifty times the number squeak
 And gibber in the madhouse—firm of
 faith,
 This fellow, that his nose supports the moon;
 The other, that his straw hat crowns him
 Pope:
 Does that prove all the world outside insane?
 Do fifty miracle-mongers match the mob
 That acts on the frank faithless principle, Born-baptized-and-bred Christian-atheists, each With just as much a right to judge as
 you,—
 As many senses in his soul, and nerves I' neck of him as I,—whom, soul and
 sense,
 Neck and nerve, you abolish presently, —
 I being the unit in creation now Who pay the Maker, in this speech of mine, A creature's duty, spend my last of
 breath
 In bearing witness, even by my worst
 fault,
 To the creature's obligation, absolute, Perpetual: my worst fault protests, "The faith
 "Claims all of me: I would give all she claims,
 "But for a spice of doubt: the risk's too rash:
 "Double or quits, I play, but all or nought,
 "Exceeds my courage: therefore, I descend
 "To the next faith with no dubiety —
 "Faith in the present life, made last as
 long
 "And prove as full of pleasure as may hap,
 "Whatever pain it cause the world." I'm
 wrong?
 I've had my life, whate'er I lose: I'm
 right?
 I've got the single good there was to gain.
 Entire faith, or else complete unbelief!
 Aught between has my loathing and contempt,
 Mine and God's also, doubtless: ask
 yourself,
 Cardinal, where and how you like a man!
 Why, either with your feet upon his head, Confessed your caudatory,¹ or, at large,

The stranger in the crowd who caps to you But keeps his distance, — why should he 40 presume?
 You want no hanger-on and dropper-off, Now yours, and now not yours but quite his own,
 According as the sky looks black or bright.
 Just so I capped to and kept off from
 faith —
 You promised trudge behind through fair and foul,
 Yet leave i' the lurch at the first spit of rain.
 Who holds to faith whenever rain begins?
 What does the father when his son lies
 dead,
 The merchant when his money-bags take
 wing,
 The politician whom a rival ousts? 50
 No case but has its conduct, faith prescribes:
 Where's the obedience that shall edify?
 Why, they laugh frankly in the face of faith
 And take the natural course, — this rends his hair
 Because his child is taken to God's breast, That gnashes teeth and raves at loss of trash Which rust corrupts and thieves break through and steal,
 And this, enabled to inherit earth Through meekness, curses till your blood runs cold!
 Down they all drop to my low level, rest 60 Heart upon dungy earth that's warm and soft,
 And let who please attempt the altitudes.
 Each playing prodigal son of heavenly
 sire,
 Turning his nose up at the fatted calf, Fain to fill belly with the husks, we swine
 Did eat by born depravity of taste!
 Enough of the hypocrites. But you, Sirs,
 you —
 Who never budged from litter where I lay,
 And buried snout i' the draff-box while I fed,
 Cried amen to my creed's one article — 70
 "Get pleasure, 'scape pain, — give your preference
 "To the immediate good, for time is brief,
 "And death ends good and ill and everything!
 "What's got is gained, what's gained soon is gained twice,
 "And, — inasmuch as faith gains most, — feign faith!"
 So did we brother-like pass word about:
 — You, now, — like bloody drunkards but half-drunk,

- Who fool men yet perceive men find them
fools, —
Vexed that a titter gains the gravest
mouth, —
O' the sudden you must needs re-introduce Solemnity, straight sober undue mirth By a blow dealt me your boon companion
here Who, using the old licence, dreamed of
harm
No more than snow in harvest: yet it falls!
You check the merriment effectually By pushing your abrupt machine i' the midst,
o Making me Rome's example: blood for
wine!
The general good needs that you chop and
change!
I may dislike the hocus-pocus, — Rome, The laughter-loving people, won't they stare
Chap-fallen! — while serious natures ser-monise
"The magistrate, he beareth not the sword
"In vain; who sins may taste its edge, we
see!"
Why my sin, drunkards? Where have I abused
Liberty, scandalised you all so much?
Who called me, who crooked finger till I
came,
50 Fool that I was, to join companionship?
I knew my own mind, meant to live my life,
Elude your envy, or else make a stand, Take my own part and sell you my life
dear.
But it was "Fie! No prejudice in the
world
"To the proper manly instinct! Cast your lot
"Into our lap, one genius ruled our births,
"We'll compass joy by concert; take with
us
"The regular irregular way i' the wood;
"You'll miss no game through riding breast by breast, 30 "In this preserve, the Church's park and pale,
"Rather than outside where the world lies waste!"
Come, if you said not that, did you say
this?
Give plain and terrible warning, "Live, enjoy?
"Such life begins in death and ends in
hell!
"Dare you bid us assist your sins, us
priests
"Who hurry sin and sinners from the earth?
"No such delight for us, why then for
you?
- "Leave earth, seek heaven or find its opposite!"
Had you so warned me, not in lying words
But veritable deeds with tongues of flame.
That had been fair, that might have struck a man, Silenced the squabble between soul and
sense,
Compelled him to make mind up, take one
course
Or the other, peradventure! — wrong or
right, Foolish or wise, you would have been at
least Sincere, no question, — forced me choose, indulge Or else renounce my instincts, still play
wolf
Or find my way submissive to your fold, Be red-crossed on my fleece, one sheep the
more.
But you as good as bade me wear sheep's wool Over wolf's skin, suck blood and hide the noise
By mimicry of something like a bleat, — Whence it comes that because, despite my
care, Because I smack my tongue too loud for
once,
Drop baaing, here's the village up in arms!
Have at the wolf's throat, you who hate the breed!
Oh, were it only open yet to choose — One little time more — whether I'd be
free
Your foe, or subsidised your friend for-
sooth!
Should not you get a growl through the white fangs
In answer to your beckoning! Cardinal, Abate, managers o' the multitude, I'd turn your gloved hands to account, be
sure!
You should manipulate the coarse rough
mob:
'Tis you I'd deal directly with, not them, — Using your fears: why touch the thing
myself
When I could see you hunt, and then cry
"Shares!
"Quarter the carcase or we quarrel; come,
"Here's the world ready to see justice
done!"
Oh, it had been a desperate game, but 7
game
Wherein the winner's chance were worth
the pains!
We'd try conclusions! — at the worst, what worse Than this Mannaia-machine, each minute's talk Helps push an inch the nearer me? Fool,
fool!

You understand me and forgive, sweet Sirs?

I blame you, tear my hair and tell my woe —

All's but a flourish, figure of rhetoric!
One must try each expedient to save life.
One makes fools look foolisher fifty-fold By putting in their place men wise like
you,

To take the full force of an argument
Would buffet their stolidity in vain.
If you should feel aggrieved by the mere wind

O' the blow that means to miss you and maul them,

That's my success! Is it not folly, now,
To say with folk, "A plausible defence —
"We see through notwithstanding, and reject?"

Reject the plausible they do, these fools,
Who never even make pretence to show
One point beyond its plausibility In favour of the best belief they hold!

"Saint Somebody-or-other raised the
... dead:"

Did he? How do you come to know as
much?

"Know it, what need? The story's plausible,

"Avouched for by a martyrologist,
"And why should good men sup on cheese and leeks

"On such a saint's day, if there were no
saint?"

I praise the wisdom of these fools, and
straight

Tell them my story — "plausible, but false!"

False, to be sure! What else can story be That runs — a young wife tired of an old
spouse,

Found a priest whom she fled away with, —
both

Took their full pleasure in the two-days'
flight,

Which a grey-headed greyer-hearted pair, (Whose best boast was, their life had been a lie)

Helped for the love they bore all liars. Oh, Here incredulity begins! Indeed?

Allow then, were no one point strictly true, There's that if the tale might seem like truth at least

To the unlucky husband, — jaundiced
patch —

Jealousy maddens people, why not him?
Say, he was maddened, so forgivable!

Humanity pleads that though the wife were
true,

The priest true, and the pair of liars true, They might seem false to one man in the
world!

A thousand gnats make up a serpent's
sting,

And many sly soft stimulants to wrath Compose a formidable wrong at last That gets called easily by some one name
Not applicable to the single parts,
And so draws down a general revenge,
Excessive if you take crime, fault by fault.
Jealousy! I have known a score of plays, Were listened to and laughed at in my 54
time

As like the everyday-life on all sides, Wherein the husband, mad as a March hare,

Suspected all the world contrived his
shame.

What did the wife? The wife kissed both eyes blind,

Explained away ambiguous circumstance, And while she held him captive by the
hand,

Crowned his head, — you know what's the mockery, —

By half her body behind the curtain.
That's

Nature now! That's the subject of a piece
I saw in Vallombrosa Convent, made 64

Expressly to teach men what marriage
was!

But say "Just so did I misapprehend,
"Imagine she deceived me to my face,"

And that's pretence too easily seen
through!

All those eyes of all husbands in all plays,
At stare like one expanded peacock-tail,

Are laughed at for pretending to be keen

While horn-blind: but the moment I step
forth —

Oh, I must needs o' the sudden prove a lynx

And look the heart, that stone-wall, 74
through and through!

Such an eye, God's may be, — not yours nor mine.

Yes, presently . . . what hour is fleeting
now?

When you cut earth away from under me,
I shall be left alone with, pushed beneath

Some such an apparitional dread orb
As the eye of God, since such an eye there glares:

I fancy it go filling up the void Above my mote-self it devours, or what

Proves — wrath, immensity wreaks on nothingness.

Just how I felt once, couching through the 84
dark,

Hard by Vittiano; young I was, and gay, And wanting to trap fieldfares: first a

spark Tipped a bent, as a mere dew-globule
might

Any stiff grass-stalk on the meadow, —
this

Grew fiercer, flamed out full, and proved
the sun.
What do I want with proverbs, precepts
here?
Away with man! What shall I say to
God?
This, if I find the tongue and keep the
mind —
"Do Thou wipe out the being of me, and smear
'This soul from off Thy white of things, I blot!
"I am one huge and sheer mistake, —
whose fault?
"Not mine at least, who did not make myself!"
Someone declares my wife excused me so!
10 Perhaps she knew what argument to use.
Grind your teeth, Cardinal: Abate, writhe!
What else am I to cry out in my rage,
Unable to repent one particle O' the past? Oh, how I wish some cold wise man Would dig beneath the surface which you scrape,
Deal with the depths, pronounce on my desert Groundedly! I want simple sober sense,
That asks, before it finishes with a dog, Who taught the dog that trick you hang him for?
20 You both persist to call that act a crime, Which sense would call . . . yes, I maintain it, Sirs, . . .
A blunder! At the worst, I stood in
doubt
On cross-road, took one path of many paths:
It leads to the red thing, we all see now, But nobody saw at first: one primrose-
patch
In bank, one singing-bird in bush, the less, Had warned me from such wayfare: let me prove!
Put me back to the cross-road, start afresh!
Advise me when I take the first false step!
30 Give me my wife: how should I use my
wife, Love her or hate her? Prompt my action
now!
There she is, there she stands alive and
pale,
The thirteen-years'-old child, with milk for blood, Pompilia Comparini, as at first,
Which first is only four brief years ago!
I stand too in the little ground-floor room
O' the father's house at Via Vittoria: see!
Her so-called mother, — one arm round the waist
O' the child to keep her from the toys, let
fall
40 At wonder I can live yet look so grim, —

Ushers her in, with deprecating wave Of the other, — and she fronts me loose
at last,
Held only by the mother's finger-tip.
Struck dumb, — for she was white enough before! — She eyes me with those frightened balls o'
black,
As heifer — the old simile comes pat — Eyes tremblingly the altar and the priest
The amazed look, all one insuppressive
prayer, —
Might she but breathe, set free as heretofore,
Have this cup leave her lips unblistered,
bear
Any cross anywhither anyhow,
So but alone, so but apart from me!
You are touched? So am I, quite other-
wise,
If 'tis with pity. I resent my wrong,
Being a man: I only show man's soul Through man's flesh: she sees mine, it strikes her thus!
Is that attractive? To a youth perhaps —
Calf-creature, one-part boy to three-parts
girl,
To whom it is a flattering novelty That he, men use to motion from their
path,
Can thus impose, thus terrify in turn
A chit whose terror shall be changed apace
To bliss unbearable when grace and glow, Prowess and pride descend the throne and
touch
Esther in all that pretty tremble, cured By the dove o' the sceptre! But myself am old,
O' the wane at least, in all things: what do you say
To her who frankly thus confirms my
doubt?
I am past the prime, I scare the woman-
world,
Done-with that way: you like this piece of news?
A little saucy rose-bud minx can strike Death-damp into the breast of doughty
king Though 'twere French Louis, — soul I understand, — Saying, by gesture of repugnance, just
"Sire, you are regal, puissant and so forth,
"But — young you have been, are not, nor will be!"
In vain the mother nods, winks, bustles up,
"Count, girls incline to mature worth like
you!
"As for Pompilia, what's flesh, fish, or fowl
"To one who apprehends no difference,
"And would accept you even were you
old

"As you are . . . youngish by her father's side?

"Trim but your beard a little, thin your bush

"Of eyebrow; and for presence, portliness, "And decent gravity, you beat a boy!"

Deceive yourself one minute, if you may, In presence of the child that so loves age, Whose neck writhes, cords itself against your kiss,

Whose hand you wring stark, rigid with despair!

Well, I resent this; I am young in soul, Nor old in body, — thews and sinews here, —

Though the vile surface be not smooth as once, —

Far beyond that first wheelwork which went wrong

Through the untempered iron ere 'twas proof:

I am the wrought man worth ten times the crude,

Would woman see what this declines to see, Declines to say "I see," — the officious word

That makes the thing, pricks on the soul to shoot

New fire into the half-used cinder, flesh! Therefore 'tis she begins with wronging me,

Who cannot but begin with hating her. Our marriage follows: there she stands again!

Why do I laugh? Why, in the very gripe

O' the jaws of death's gigantic skull, do I Grin back his grin, make sport of my own pangs?

Why from each clashing of his molars, ground

To make the devil bread from out my grist,

Leaps out a spark of mirth, a hellish toy?

Take notice we are lovers in a church, Waiting the sacrament to make us one

And happy! Just as bid, she bears herself,

Comes and kneels, rises, speaks, is silent, goes:

So have I brought my horse, by word and blow,

To stand stock-still and front the fire he dreads.

How can I other than remember this, Resent the very obedience? Gain thereby?

Yes, I do gain my end and have my will, — Thanks to whom? When the mother speaks the word,

She obeys it — even to enduring me!

There had been compensation in revolt —

o Revolt's to quell: but martyrdom rehearsed.

But predetermined sainthood for the sake O' the mother! — "Go!" thought I, "we meet again!"

Pass the next weeks of dumb contented death,

She lives, — wakes up, installed in house and home,

Is mine, mine all day-long, all night long mine.

Good folk begin at me with open mouth, "Now, at least, reconcile the child to life!"

"Study and make her love . . . that is, endure

"The . . . hem! the . . . all of you though somewhat old,

"Till it amount to something, in her eye, 50

"As good as love, better a thousand times, —

"Since nature helps the woman in such strait,

"Makes passiveness her pleasure: failing which,

"What if you give up boy-and-girl-fools'-play

"And go on to wise friendship all at once?"

"Those boys and girls kiss themselves cold, you know,

"Till themselves tired and sink aside full soon

"To friendship, as they name satiety:

"Thither go you and wait their coming!" 60

Thanks, Considerate advisers, — but, fair play!

Had you and I, friends, started fair at first, We, keeping fair, might reach it, neck by neck,

This blessed goal, whenever fate so please: But why am I to miss the daisied mile?

The course begins with, why obtain the dust

Of the end precisely at the starting-point? Why quaff life's cup blown free of all the beads,

The bright red froth wherein our beard should steep

Before our mouth essay the black o' the wine?

Foolish, the love-fit? Let me prove it such 70

Like you, before like you I puff things clear!

"The best's to come, no rapture but content!

"Not love's first glory but a sober glow,

"Not a spontaneous outburst in pure boon,

"So much as, gained by patience, care and toil,

"Proper appreciation and esteem!"

Go preach that to your nephews, not to me

Who, tired i' the midway of my life, would stop

And take my first refreshment, pluck a rose:

What's this coarse woolly hip, worn smooth 80

of lef,

You counsel! I go plant in garden-plot

- Water with tears, manure with sweat and blood, In confidence the seed shall germinate
 And, for its very best, some far-off day, Grow big, and blow me out a dog-rose bell?
- Why must your nephews begin breathing spice
 O' the hundred-petalled Provence prodigy?
 Nay, more and worse, — would such my root bear rose — Prove really flower and favourite, not the
 kind
- That's queen, but those three leaves that make one cup
- 10 And hold the hedge-bird's breakfast, —
 then indeed
 The prize though poor would pay the care and toil!
 Respect we Nature that makes least as
 most,
 Marvellous in the minim! But this bud, Bit through and burned black by the tempter's tooth,
 This bloom whose best grace was the slug outside
 And the wasp inside its bosom, — call you
 "rose"?
- Claim no immunity from a weed's fate For the horrible present! What you call my wife
 I call a nullity in female shape,
- 20 Vapid disgust, soon to be pungent plague, When mixed with, made confusion and a curse
 By two abominable nondescripts, That father and that mother: think you
 see
 The dreadful bronze our boast, we Aretines,
 The Etruscan monster, the three-headed
 thing, Bellerophon's foe! How name you the whole beast?
 You choose to name the body from one
 head,
 That of the simple kid which droops the
 eye,
 Hangs the neck and dies tenderly enough:
- 30 I rather see the griesly lion belch Flame out i' the midst, the serpent writhe her rings,
 Grafted into the common stock for tail,
 And name the brute, Chimæra which I
 slew!
 How was there ever more to be — (concede My wife's insipid harmless nullity) — Dissociation from that pair of plagues — That mother with her cunning and her cant —
 The eyes with first their twinkle of conceit, Then, dropped to earth in mock-demureness, — now,
- 40 The smile self-satisfied from ear to ear,
- Now, the prim pursed-up mouth's protruded lips,
 With deferential duck, slow swing of head, Tempting the sudden fist of man too
 much, —
 That owl-like screw of lid and rock of ruff!
 As for the father, — Cardinal, you know,
 The kind of idiot! — such are rife in Rome,
 But they wear velvet commonly; good
 fools,
 At the end of life, to furnish forth young folk
 Who grin and bear with imbecility:
 Since the stalled ass, the joker, sheds from jaw
 Corn, in the joke, for those who laugh or starve.
 But what say we to the same solemn beast Wagging his ears and wishful of our pat, When turned, with holes in hide and bones
 laid bare,
 To forage for himself i' the waste o' the
 world,
 Sir Dignity i' the dumps? Pat him? We drub
 Self-knowledge, rather, into frowzy pate, Teach Pietro to get trappings or go hang!
 Fancy this quondam oracle in vogue
 At Via Vittoria, this personified Authority when time was, — Pantaloon Flaunting his tom-fool tawdry just the
 same
 As if Ash-Wednesday were mid-Carnival!
 That's the extreme and unforgivable Of sins, as I account such. Have you stooped
 For your own ends to bestialise yourself
 By flattery of a fellow of this stamp?
 The ends obtained or else shown out of reach,
 He goes on, takes the flattery for pure
 truth, —
 "You love, and honour me, of course:
 what next?"
 What, but the trifle of the stabbing,
 friend? —
 Which taught you how one worships when the shrine
 Has lost the relic that we bent before.
 Angry! And how could I be otherwise?
 'Tis plain: this pair of old pretentious
 fools
 Meant to fool me: it happens, I fooled
 them.
 Why could not these who sought to buy and sell Me, — when they found themselves were bought and sold, Make up their mind to the proved rule of
 right,
 Be chattel and not chapman any more?
 Miscalculation has its consequence;
 But when the shepherd crooks a sheep-like
 thing

And meaning to get wool, dislodges fleece
 And finds the veritable wolf beneath, (How that staunch image serves at every turn!)
 Does he, by way of being politic, Pluck the first whisker grimly visible?
 Or rather grow in a trice all gratitude, Protest this sort-of-what-one-might-name
 sheep
 Beats the old other curly-coated kind,
 And shall share board and bed, if so it deign, 10 With its discoverer, like a royal ram?
 Ay, thus, with chattering teeth and knocking knees,
 Would wisdom treat the adventure!
 these, forsooth, Tried whisker-plucking, and so found what trap
 The whisker kept perdue, two rows of teeth —
 Sharp, as too late the prying fingers felt.
 What would you have? The fools transgress, the fools
 Forthwith receive appropriate punishment:
 They first insult me, I return the blow, There follows noise enough: four hubbub
 months, 20 Now hue and cry, now whimpering and wail —
 A perfect goose-yard cackle of complaint
 Because I do not gild the geese their oats, —
 I have enough of noise, ope wicket wide, Sweep out the couple to go whine elsewhere,
 Frightened a little, hurt in no respect,
 And am just taking thought to breathe
 again,
 Taste the sweet sudden silence all about,
 When, there they raise it, the old noise I
 know,
 At Rome! the distance! "What, begun
 once more?
 30 "Whine on, wail ever, 'tis the loser's
 right!"
 But eh, what sort of voice grows on the wind?
 Triumph it sounds and no complaint at
 all!
 And triumph it is. My boast was premature:
 The creatures, I turned forth, clapped wing and crew Fighting-cock-fashion, — they had filched a pearl
 From dung-heap, and might boast with cause enough!
 I was defrauded of all bargained for:
 You know, the Pope knows, not a soul but knows
 My dowry was derision, my gain — muck, 40 My wife, (the Church declared my flesh-
 blood)
 The nameless bastard of a common whore:
 My old name turned henceforth to . . .
 shall I say
 "He that received the ordure in his face?"
 And they who planned this wrong, performed this wrong,
 And then revealed this wrong to the wide
 world,
 Rounded myself in the ears with my own
 wrong, —
 Why, these were (note hell's lucky malice,
 now!)
 These were just they who, they alone, could act
 And publish and proclaim their infamy, Secure that men would in a breath believe 50 Compassionate and pardon them, — for
 why?
 They plainly were too stupid to invent, Too simple to distinguish wrong from
 right, —
 Inconscious agents they, the silly-sooth,
 Of heaven's retributive justice on the strong Proud cunning violent oppressor — me!
 Follow them to their fate and help your
 best,
 You Rome, Arezzo, foes called friends of
 me,
 They gave the good long laugh to, at my
 cost!
 Defray your share o' the cost, since you 60 partook
 The entertainment! Do! — assured the
 while,
 That not one stab, I dealt to right and left,
 But went the deeper for a fancy — this —
 That each might do me two-fold service,
 find
 A friend's face at the bottom of each
 wound,
 And scratch its smirk a little!
 Panciatichi!
 There's a report at Florence, — is it true? —
 That when your relative the Cardinal Built, only the other day, that barrack-bulk,
 The palace in Via Larga, someone picked 70
 From out the street a saucy quip enough That fell there from its day's flight through the town,
 About the flat front and the windows wide And bulging heap of cornice, — hitched the joke
 Into a sonnet, signed his name thereto, And forthwith pinned on post the pleas-
 antry:
 For which he's at the galleys, rowing now Up to his waist in water, — just because Panciatichi and lymphatic rhymed so pat!
 I hope, Sir, those who passed this joke on 80
 me
 Were not unduly punished? What say
 you,
 Prince of the Church, my patron? Nay,
 indeed,

- I shall not dare insult your wits so much As think this problem difficult to solve.
 This Pietro and Violante then, I say, These two ambiguous insects, changing
 name
 And nature with the season's warmth or chill, —
 Now, grovelled, grubbing toiling moiling ants,
 A very synonym of thrift and peace, —
 Anon, with lusty June to prick their heart, Soared i' the air, winged flies for more
 offence, 10 Circed me, buzzed me deaf and stung me
 blind,
 And stunk me dead with fetor in the face Until I stopped the nuisance: there's my crime!
 Pity I did not suffer them subside Into some further shape and final form Of execrable life? My masters, no!
 I, by one blow, wisely cut short at once
 Them and their transformations of disgust,
 In the snug little Villa out of hand.
 "Grant me confession, give bare time for
 that!" — 20 Shouted the sinner till his mouth was stopped.
 His life confessed! — that was enough for
 me,
 Who came to see that he did penance.
 'S death!
 Here's a coil raised, a pother and for what?
 Because strength, being provoked by weakness, fought
 And conquered, — the world never heard
 the like!
 Pah, how I spend my breath on them, as if 'Twas their fate troubled me, too hard to range
 Among the right and fit and proper things!
- Ay, but Pompilia, — I await your word, — 30 She, unimpeached of crime, unimplicate In folly, one of alien blood to these I punish, why extend my claim, exact Her portion of the penalty? Yes, friends, I go too fast: the orator's at fault:
 Yes, ere I lay her, with your leave, by them
 As she was laid at San Lorenzo late,
 I ought to step back, lead you by degrees, Recounting at each step some fresh offence,
 Up to the red bed, — never fear, I will!
 40 Gaze at her, where I place her, to begin, Confound me with her gentleness and
 worth!
 The horrible pair have fled and left her
 now,
 She has her husband for her sole concern:
 His wife, the woman fashioned for his help, Flesh of his flesh, bone of his bone, the bride
 To groom as is the Church and Spouse to Christ:
- There she stands in his presence: "Thy desire
 "Shall be to the husband, o'er thee shall he rule!"
 — "Pompilia, who declare that you love
 God,
 "You know who said that: then, desire my 50
 love,
 "Yield me contentment and be ruled aright!"
 She sits up, she lies down, she comes and goes, Kneels at the couch-side, overleans the sill
 O' the window, cold and pale and mute as stone,
 Strong as stone also. "Well, are they not fled?
 "Am I not left, am I not one for all?
 "Speak a word, drop a tear, detach a glance,
 "Bless me or curse me of your own accord!
 "Is it the ceiling only wants your soul,
 "Is worth your eyes?" And then the 60
 eyes descend,
 And do look at me. Is it at the meal?
 "Speak!" she obeys, "Be silent!" she obeys,
 Counting the minutes till I cry "Depart," As brood-bird when you saunter past her eggs.
 Departs she? just the same through door and wall
 I see the same stone strength of white
 despair.
 And all this will be never otherwise!
 Before, the parents' presence lent her life:
 She could play off her sex's armoury, Entreat, reproach, be female to my male, 70
 Try all the shrieking doubles of the hare, Go clamour to the Commissary, bid
 The Archbishop hold my hands and stop my tongue,
 And yield fair sport so: but the tactics
 change,
 The hare stands stock-still to enrage the hound!
 Since that day when she learned she was no
 child
 Of those she thought her parents, — that their trick Had tricked me whom she thought sole trickster late, — Why, I suppose she said within herself
 "Then, no more struggle for my parents' 80
 sake!
 "And for my own sake, why needs struggle be?"
 But is there no third party to the pact?
 What of her husband's relish or dislike For this new game of giving up the game,
 This worst offence of not offending more?
 I'll not believe but instinct wrought in this Set her on to conceive and execute

The preferable plague: how sure they probe —

These jades, the sensitivest soft of man!
The long black hair was wound now in a wisp,

Crowned sorrow better than the wild web late:

No more soiled dress, 'tis trimness triumphs now,

For how should malice go with negligence?
The frayed silk looked the fresher for her spite!

There was an end to springing out of bed,
Praying me, with face buried on my feet, 10 Be hindered of my pastime, — so an end To my rejoinder, "What, on the ground at last?

"Vanquished in fight, a suppliant for life?
"What if I raise you? 'Ware the casting down

"When next you fight me!" Then, she lay there, mine:

Now, mine she is if I please wring her neck, —

A moment of disquiet, working eyes, Protruding tongue, a long sigh, then no more, —

As if one killed the horse one could not ride!

Had I enjoined "Cut off the hair!" — why, snap

20 The scissors, and at once a yard or so Had fluttered in black serpents to the floor:
But till I did enjoin it, how she combs, Uncurls and draws out to the complete length,

Plaits, places the insulting rope on head
To be an eyesore past dishevelment!
Is all done? Then sit still again and stare!

I advise — no one think to bear that look Of steady wrong, endured as steadily — Through what sustainment of deluding hope?

30 Who is the friend i' the background that notes all?

Who may come presently and close accounts?

This self-possession to the uttermost,
How does it differ in aught, save degree,
From the terrible patience of God?

"All which just means,
"She did not love you!" Again the word is launched

And the fact fronts me! What, you try the wards

With the true key and the dead lock flies open?

No, it sticks fast and leaves you fumbling still!

You have some fifty servants, Cardinal, —

40 Which of them loves you? Which subordinate

But makes parade of such officiousness

That, — if there's no love prompts it, — love, the sham,

Does twice the service done by love, the true?

God bless us liars, where's one touch of truth

In what we tell the world, or world tells us,
Of how we love each other? All the same,

We calculate on word and deed, nor err, —
Bid such a man do such a loving act,

Sure of effect and negligent of cause,
Just as we bid a horse, with cluck of tongue, 50

Stretch his legs arch-wise, crouch his saddled back

To foot-reach of the stirrup — all for love,
And some for memory of the smart of switch

On the inside of the foreleg — what care we?

Yet where's the bond obliges horse to man Like that which binds fast wife to husband?

God Laid down the law: gave man the brawny arm

And ball of fist — woman the beardless cheek

And proper place to suffer in the side:
Since it is he can strike, let her obey! 60

Can she feel no love? Let her show the more,

Sham the worse, damn herself praise-worthily!

Who's that soprano, Rome went mad about Last week while I lay rotting in my straw?

The very jailer gossiped in his praise — How, — dressed up like Armida, though

a man;
And painted to look pretty, though a fright, —

He still made love so that the ladies swooned,

Being an eunuch. "Ah, Rinaldo mine!"

"But to breathe by thee while Jove slays 70 us both!"

All the poor bloodless creature never felt,
Si, do, re, mi, fa, squeak and squall — for what?

Two gold zecchines¹ the evening. Here's my slave,

Whose body and soul depend upon my nod,
Can't falter out the first note in the scale

For her life! Why blame me if I take the life?

All women cannot give men love, forsooth!
No, nor all pullets lay the henwife eggs —

Whereat she bids them remedy the fault, Brood on a chalk-ball: soon the nest is 80 stocked —

Otherwise, to the plucking and the spit!
This wife of mine was of another mood —

¹ Zecchines: a gold coin worth about ten shillings.

- Would not begin the lie that ends with truth, Nor feign the love that brings real love about:
Wherefore I judged, sentenced and punished her.
But why particularise, defend the deed?
Say that I hated her for no one cause Beyond my pleasure so to do, — what then?
Just on as much incitement acts the world,
All of you! Look and like! You favour one, Browbeat another, leave alone a third, — 10 Why should you master natural caprice?
Pure nature! Try: plant elm by ash in file;
Both unexceptionable trees enough,
They ought to overlean each other, pair
At top, and arch across the avenue
The whole path to the pleasaunce: do they so — Or loathe, lie off abhorrent each from each?
Lay the fault elsewhere: since we must have faults, Mine shall have been, — seeing there's ill in the end Come of my course, — that I fare somehow worse 20 For the way I took: my fault . . . as God's my judge, I see not where my fault lies, that's the truth!
I ought . . . oh, ought in my own interest Have let the whole adventure go untried, This chance by marriage: or else, trying Ought to have turned it to account, some one O' the hundred otherwises? Ay, my friend, Easy to say, easy to do: step right Now you've stepped left and stumbled on the thing, — The red thing! Doubt I any more than you 30 That practice makes man perfect? Give again
The chance, — same marriage and no other wife, Be sure I'll edify you! That's because I'm practised, grown fit guide for Guido's self.
You proffered guidance, — I know, none so well, —
You laid down law and rolled decorum out,
From pulpit-corner on the gospel-side, —
Wanted to make your great experience mine, Save me the personal search and pains so: thanks!
Take your word on life's use? When I take his —
- The muzzled ox that treadeth out the corn, Gone blind in padding round and round one path, —
As to the taste of green grass in the field!
What do you know o' the world that's trodden flat
And salted sterile with your daily dung, Leavened into a lump of loathsomeness?
Take your opinion of the modes of life,
The aims of life, life's triumph or defeat, How to feel, how to scheme, and how to do Or else leave undone? You preached long and loud On high-days, "Take our doctrine upon 50 trust!
"Into the mill-house with you! Grind our corn,
"Relish our chaff, and let the green grass grow!"
I tried chaff, found I famished on such fare,
So made this mad rush at the mill-house door, Buried my head up to the ears in dew, Browsed on the best: for which you brain me, Sirs!
Be it so. I conceived of life that way,
And still declare — life, without absolute use Of the actual sweet therein, is death, not life.
Give me, — pay down, — not promise, 60 which is air, — Something that's out of life and better still,
Make sure reward, make certain punishment, Entice me, scare me, — I'll forgo this life;
Otherwise, no! — the less that words, mere wind,
Would cheat me of some minutes while they plague, Baulk fulness of revenge here, — blame yourselves
For this eruption of the pent-up soul
You prisoned first and played with afterward!
"Deny myself" meant simply pleasure you,
The sacred and superior, save the mark! 70 You, — whose stupidity and insolence
I must defer to, soothe at every turn, — Whose swine-like snuffling greed and grunt-ing lust
I had to wink at or help gratify, — While the same passions, — dared they perk in me, Me, the immeasurably marked, by God,
Master of the whole world of such as you, — I, boast such passions? 'Twas "Suppress them straight!
"Or stay, we'll pick and choose before destroy.
"Here's wrath in you, a serviceable 80 sword, —
"Beat it into a ploughshare! What's this long

- "Lance-like ambition? Forge a pruning-hook,
 "May be of service when our vines grow tall!
 "But—sword use swordwise, spear thrust out as spear?
 "Anathema! Suppression is the word!"
 My nature, when the outrage was too gross, Widened itself an outlet over-wide
 By way of answer, sought its own relief
 With more of fire and brimstone than you wished.
 All your own doing: preachers, blame yourselves!
- 0 'Tis I preach while the hour-glass runs and runs!
 God keep me patient! All I say just means—My wife proved, whether by her fault or mine,— That's immaterial,—a true stumbling-block
 I' the way of me her husband. I but plied
 The hatchet yourselves use to clear a path,
 Was politic, played the game you warrant wins, Plucked at law's robe a-rustle through the courts, Bowed down to kiss divinity's buckled shoe Cushioned i' the church: efforts all wide the aim!
- 20 Procedures to no purpose! Then flashed truth.
 The letter kills, the spirit keeps alive
 In law and gospel: there be nods and winks Instruct a wise man to assist himself In certain matters, nor seek aid at all.
 "Ask money of me,"—quoth the clownish saw,— "And take my purse! But,—speaking with respect,—
 "Need you a solace for the troubled nose?
 "Let everybody wipe his own himself!" Sirs, tell me free and fair! Had things gone well
- 30 At the wayside inn: had I surprised asleep
 The runaways, as was so probable,
 And pinned them each to other partridge-wise,
 Through back and breast to breast and back, then bade Bystanders witness if the spit, my sword, Were loaded with unlawful game for once—
 Would you have interposed to damp the glow Applauding me on every husband's cheek?
 Would you have checked the cry "A judgment, see!
 "A warning, note! Be henceforth chaste, ye wives,
 "Nor stray beyond your proper precinct, priests!"
 If you had, then your house against itself
- Divides, nor stands your kingdom any more.
 Oh why, why was it not ordained just so?
 Why fell not things out so nor otherwise?
 Ask that particular devil whose task it is To trip the all-but-at perfection,—slur
 The line of the painter just where paint leaves off
 And life begins,—put ice into the ode O' the poet while he cries "Next stanza—fire!"
- Inscribe all human effort with one word, 54 Artistry's haunting curse, the Incomplete!
 Being incomplete, my act escaped success.
 Easy to blame now! Every fool can swear
 To hole in net that held and slipped the fish.
 But, treat my act with fair unjaundiced eye,
 What was there wanting to a masterpiece Except the luck that lies beyond a man?
 My way with the woman, now proved grossly wrong,
 Just missed of being gravely grandly right And making mouths laugh on the other 60
 side.
 Do, for the poor obstructed artist's sake,
 Go with him over that spoiled work once more!
 Take only its first flower, the ended act Now in the dusty pod, dry and defunct!
 I march to the Villa, and my men with me,
 That evening, and we reach the door and stand.
 I say . . . no, it shoots through me lightning-like While I pause, breathe, my hand upon the latch,
 "Let me forebode! Thus far, too much success:
 "I want the natural failure—find it where? 70
 "Which thread will have to break and leave a loop
 "I' the meshy combination, my brain's loom
 "Wove this long while, and now next minute tests?
 "Of three that are to catch, two should go free,
 "One must: all three surprised,—impossible!
 "Beside, I seek three and may chance on six,—
 "This neighbour, t'other gossip,—the babe's birth
 "Brings such to fireside, and folks give them wine,—
 "'Tis late: but when I break in presently
 "One will be found outlingering the rest 80
 "For promise of a posset,—one whose shout
 "Would raise the dead down in the catacombs,
 "Much more the city-watch that goes its round.

"When did I ever turn adroitly up "To sun some brick embedded in the soil,
 "And with one blow crush all three scorpions there?
 "Or Pietro or Violante shambles off —
 "It cannot be but I surprise my wife —
 "If only she is stopped and stamped on,
 good!
 "That shall suffice: more is improbable.
 "Now I may knock!" And this once for my sake
 The impossible was effected: I called
 king,
 to Queen and knave in a sequence, and cards
 came,
 All three, three only! So, I had my way, Did my deed: so, unbrokenly lay bare Each tænia¹ that had sucked me dry of juice,
 At last outside me, not an inch of ring
 Left now to writhe about and root itself
 I' the heart all powerless for revenge!
 Henceforth
 I might thrive: these were drawn and dead and damned.
 Oh Cardinal, the deep long sigh you heave
 When the load's off you, ringing as it runs 20 All the way down the serpent-stair to hell!
 No doubt the fine delirium flustered me,
 Turned my brain with the influx of success
 As if the sole need now were to wave wand And find doors fly wide, — wish and have my will, —
 The rest o' the scheme would care for itself: escape
 Easy enough were that, and poor beside!
 It all but proved so, — ought to quite have proved,
 Since, half the chances had sufficed, set
 free
 Anyone, with his senses at command, 30 From thrice the danger of my flight.
 But, drunk,
 Redundantly triumphant, — some reverse Was sure to follow! There's no other way Accounts for such prompt perfect failure
 then
 And there on the instant. Any day o' the
 week,
 A ducat slid discreetly into palm O' the mute post-master, while you whisper
 him — How you the Count and certain four your
 knaves,
 Have just been mauling who was malapert, Suspect the kindred may prove troublesome,
 40 Therefore, want horses in a hurry, — that
 And nothing more secures you any day The pick o' the stable! Yet I try the
 trick,
 Double the bribe, call myself Duke for Count,

¹ Tænia: a tape-worm.

And say the dead man only was a Jew,
 And for my pains find I am dealing just With the one scrupulous fellow in all
 Rome —
 Just this immaculate official stares, Sees I want hat on head and sword in sheath, Am splashed with other sort of wet than
 wine, Shrugs shoulder, puts my hand by, gold 50
 and all,
 Stands on the strictness of the rule o' the
 road!
 "Where's the Permission?" Where's the wretched rag
 With the due seal and sign of Rome's Police,
 To be had for asking, half-an-hour ago?
 "Gone? Get another, or no horses
 hence!"
 He dares not stop me, we five glare too
 grim,
 But hinders, — hacks and hamstrings sure
 enough,
 Gives me some twenty miles of miry road
 More to march in the middle of that night Whereof the rough beginning taxed the 60
 strength
 O' the youngsters, much more mine, both soul and flesh,
 Who had to think as well as act: dead-
 beat,
 We gave in ere we reached the boundary
 And safe spot out of this irrational Rome, — Where, on dismounting from our steeds
 next day,
 We had snapped our fingers at you, safe and sound,
 Tuscans once more in blessed Tuscany, Where laws make wise allowance, understand
 Civilised life and do its champions right!
 Witness the sentence of the Rota there, 70 Arezzo uttered, the Granduke confirmed, One week before I acted on its hint, — Giving friend Guillichini, for his love,
 The galleys, and my wife your saint,
 Rome's saint, —
 Rome manufactures saints enough to know, Seclusion at the Stinche for her life.
 All this, that all but was, might all have
 been,
 Yet was not! balked by just a scrupulous
 knave
 Whose palm was horn through handling horses' hoofs
 And could not close upon my proffered 80
 gold!
 What say you to the spite of fortune?
 Well,
 The worst's in store: thus hindered, haled
 this way
 To Rome again by hangdogs, whom find I

- Here, still to fight with, but my pale frail wife?
 — Riddled with wounds by one not like to waste
 The blows he dealt, — knowing anatomy, — (I think I told you) bound to pick and choose The vital parts! 'Twas learning all in vain!
 She too must shimmer through the gloom o' the grave, Come and confront me — not at judgment-seat
 Where I could twist her soul, as erst her flesh,
 And turn her truth into a lie, — but there,
 O' the death-bed, with God's hand between us both,
 Striking me dumb, and helping her to speak,
 Tell her own story her own way, and turn My plausibility to nothingness!
 Four whole days did Pompilia keep alive,
 With the best surgery of Rome agape
 At the miracle, — this cut, the other slash,
 And yet the life refusing to dislodge,
 Four whole extravagant impossible days, Till she had time to finish and persuade Every man, every woman, every child In Rome, of what she would: the selfsame she Who, but a year ago, had wrung her hands, Reddened her eyes and beat her breasts, rehearsed,
 The whole game at Arezzo, nor availed Thereby to move one heart or raise one hand!
 When destiny intends you cards like these,
 What good of skill and preconcerted play?
 Had she been found dead, as I left her dead,
 I should have told a tale brooked no reply:
 You scarcely will suppose me found at fault With that advantage! "What brings me to Rome?"
 "Necessity to claim and take my wife:
 "Better, to claim and take my new-born babe, —
 "Strong in paternity a fortnight old,
 "When 'tis at strongest: warily I work,
 "Knowing the machinations of my foe;
 "I have companionship and use the night;
 "I seek my wife and child, — I find — no child
 "But wife in the embraces of that priest
 "Who caused her to elope from me.
 These two,
 "Backed by the pander-pair who watch the while,
 "Spring on me like so many tiger-cats,
 "Glad of the chance to end the intruder.
 I —
- "What should I do but stand on my defence,
 "Strike right, strike left, strike thick and threefold. slay,
 "Not all — because the coward priest escapes.
 "Last, I escape, in fear of evil tongues,
 "And having had my taste of Roman law."
 What's disputable, refutable here? —
 Save by just this one ghost-thing half on earth, Half out of it, — as if she held God's hand While she leant back and looked her last at me, Forgiving me (here monks begin to weep)
 Oh, from her very soul, commending mine To heavenly mercies which are infinite, — While fixing fast my head beneath your knife!
 'Tis fate not fortune. All is of a piece!
 When was it chance informed me of my youths?
 My rustic four o' the family, soft swains,
 What sweet surprise had they in store for me,
 Those of my very household, — what did Law Twist with her rack-and-cord-contrivance late From out their bones and marrow? What but this — Had no one of these several stumbling-blocks Stopped me, they yet were cherishing a scheme,
 All of their honest country homespun wit,
 To quietly next day at crow of cock Cut my own throat too, for their own behoof, Seeing I had forgot to clear accounts O' the instant, nowise slackened speed for that, —
 And somehow never might find memory, Once safe back in Arezzo, where things change,
 And a court-lord needs mind no country lout.
 Well, being the arch-offender, I die last, — May, ere my head falls, have my eyesight free, Nor miss them dangling high on either hand,
 Like scarecrows in a hemp-field, for their pains!
- And then my Trial, — 'tis my Trial that bites Like a corrosive, so the cards are packed, Dice loaded, and my life-stake tricked away!
 Look at my lawyers, lacked they grace of law,

- Latin or logic? Were not they fools to the height, Fools to the depth, fools to the level between,
 O' the foolishness set to decide the case?
 They feign, they flatter; nowise does it skill, Everything goes against me: deal each judgment
 His dole of flattery and feigning, — why,
 He turns and tries and snuts and savours it,
 As some old fly the sugar-grain, your gift;
 Then eyes your thumb and finger, brushes clean
- 10 The absurd old head of him, and whisks away, Leaving your thumb and finger dirty. Laugh!
 And finally, after this long-drawn range Of affront and failure, failure and affront; —
 This path, 'twixt crosses leading to a skull, Paced by me barefoot, bloodied by my palms
 From the entry to the end, — there's light at length, A cranny of escape: appeal may be To the old man, to the father, to the Pope, For a little life — from one whose life is spent,
- 20 A little pity — from pity's source and seat,
 A little indulgence to rank, privilege,
 From one who is the thing personified, Rank, privilege, indulgence, grown beyond Earth's bearing, even, ask Jansenius² else!
 Still the same answer, still no other tune
 From the cicala perched at the tree-top Than crickets noisy round the root: 'tis
 "Die!"
- Bids Law — "Be damned!" adds Gospel,
 — nay,
 No word so frank, — 'tis rather, "Save yourself!"
- 30 The Pope subjoins — "Confess and be absolved!
 "So shall my credit countervail your shame,
 "And the world see I have not lost the knack
 "Of trying all the spirits: yours, my son,
 "Wants but a fiery washing to emerge
 "In clarity! Come, cleanse you, ease the ache
 "Of these old bones, refresh our bowels, boy!"
- Do I mistake your mission from the Pope?
 Then, bear his Holiness the mind of me!
 I do get strength from being thrust to wall,
- Successfully wrenched from pillar and from post
 By this tenacious hate of fortune, hate
 Of all things in, under, and above earth Warfare; begun this mean unmanly mode, Does best to end so, — gives earth spectacle
 Of a brave fighter who succumbs to odds That turn defeat to victory. Stab, I fold My mantle round me! Rome approves my act:
 Applauds the blow which costs me life but keeps My honour spotless: Rome would praise no more Had I fallen, say, some fifteen years ago, 50 Helping Vienna² when our Aretines Flocked to Duke Charles and fought Turk Mustafa; Nor would you two be trembling o'er my corpse
 With all this exquisite solicitude.
 Why is it that I make such suit to live?
 The popular sympathy that's round me now Would break like bubble that o'er-domes a fly:
 Solid enough while he lies quiet there,
 But let him want the air and ply the wing, Why, it breaks and bespatters him, what 60
 else?
- Cardinal, if the Pope had pardoned me,
 And I walked out of prison through the crowd,
 It would not be your arm I should dare press!
 Then, if I got safe to my place again,
 How sad and sapless were the years to come!
 I go my old ways and find things grown grey;
 You priests leer at me, old friends look askance,
 The mob's in love, I'll wager, to a man,
 With my poor young good beauteous murdered wife:
 For hearts require instruction how to beat, 70
 And eyes, on warrant of the story, wax Wanton at portraiture in white and black Of dead Pompilia gracing ballad-sheet,
 Which eyes, lived she unmurdered and unsung,
 Would never turn though she paced street as bare
 As the mad penitent ladies do in France.
 My brothers quietly would edge me out Of use and management of things called mine;

² Helping Vienna: Vienna was besieged in 1683 by the Turks under Mahomet IV., and relieved by John Sobieski. Kara Mustafa was the Turkish grand-vizier and general. Duke Charles of Lorraine commanded part of the relieving forces.

² Jansenius: Cornelius Jansenius (1585-1638), from whom the Jansenists took their name; author of the work called Augustinus, condemned by several popes in succession.

- Do I command? "You stretched command before!"
- Show anger? "Anger little helped you once!"
- Advise? "How managed you affairs of old?"
- My very mother, all the while they gird, Turns eye up, gives confirmatory groan;
For unsuccess, explain it how you will,
Disqualifies you, makes you doubt yourself,
— Much more, is found decisive by your friends.
- Beside, am I not fifty years of age?
- What new leap would a life take, checked like mine
- I' the spring at outset? Where's my second chance?
- Ay, but the babe . . . I had forgot my son, My heir! Now for a burst of gratitude!
There's some appropriate service to intone,
Some gaudeamus and thanksgiving-psalm!
Old, I renew my youth in him, and poor Possess a treasure, — is not that the phrase?
- Only I must wait patient twenty years — Nourishing all the while, as father ought,
The excrescence with my daily blood of life.
Does it respond to hope, such sacrifice, — Grows the wen plump while I myself grow lean?
- Why, here's my son and heir in evidence,
Who stronger, wiser, handsomer than I
By fifty years, relieves me of each load, — Tames my hot horse, carries my heavy gun, Courts my coy mistress, — has his apt advice On house-economy, expenditure, And what not. All which good gifts and great growth
- Because of my decline, he brings to bear On Guido, but half apprehensive how He cumbers earth, crosses the brisk young Count, Who civilly would thrust him from the scene.
Contrariwise, does the blood-offering fail?
There's an ineptitude, one blank the more Added to earth in semblance of my child?
Then, this has been a costly piece of work,
My life exchanged for his! — why he, not I,
- Enjoy the world, if no more grace accrue?
- Dwarf me, what giant have you made of him?
- I do not dread the disobedient son:
I know how to suppress rebellion there, Being not quite the fool my father was.
But grant the medium measure of a man,
The usual compromise 'twixt fool and sage,
— You know — the tolerably-obstinate,
- The not-so-much-perverse but you may train,
The true son-servant that, when parent bids
"Go work, son, in my vineyard!" makes reply
"I go, Sir!" — Why, what profit in your son Beyond the drudges you might subsidise, Have the same work from, at a paul the head?
- Look at those four young precious olive-plants Reared at Vittiano, — not on flesh and blood,
'These twenty years, but black bread and sour wine!
I bade them put forth tender branch, hook, hold,
And hurt three enemies I had in Rome:
They did my hest as unreluctantly,
At promise of a dollar, as a son Adjured by mumping memories of the 60 past.
- No, nothing repays youth expended so — Youth, I say, who am young still: grant but leave To live my life out, to the last I'd live And die conceding age no right of youth!
- It is the will runs the renewing nerve Through flaccid flesh that faints before the time.
- Therefore no sort of use for son have I — Sick, not of life's feast but of steps to climb To the house where life prepares her feast, — of means
- To the end: for make the end attainable Without the means, — my relish were like yours.
- A man may have an appetite enough For a whole dish of robins ready cooked,
And yet lack courage to face sleet, pad snow,
And snare sufficiently for supper.
- Thus
- The time's arrived when, ancient Roman-like,
I am bound to fall on my own sword: why not Say — Tuscan-like, more ancient, better still?
Will you hear truth can do no harm nor good?
- I think I never was at any time
A Christian, as you nickname all the world, Me among others: truce to nonsense now!
Name me, a primitive religionist — As should the aboriginary be I boast myself, Etruscan, Aretine

One sprung, — your frigid Virgil's fieriest word,¹ —

From fauns and nymphs, trunks and the heart of oak,

With, — for a visible divinity, —

The portent of a Jove Ægiochus

Descried 'mid clouds, lightning and thunder, couched

On topmost crag of your Capitoline:

'Tis in the Seventh Æneid, — what, the Eighth?

Right, — thanks, Abate, — though the Christian's dumb,

The Latinist's vivacious in you yet!

10 I know my grandsire had our tapestry Marked with the motto, 'neath a certain shield,

Where to his grandson presently will give gules

To vary azure. First we fight for faiths, But get to shake hands at the last of all:

Mine's your faith too, — in Jove Ægiochus!

Nor do Greek gods, that serve as supplement,

Jar with the simpler scheme, if understood.

We want such intermediary race

To make communication possible;

20 The real thing were too lofty, we too low, Midway hang these: we feel their use so plain

In linking height to depth, that we doff hat
And put no question nor pry narrowly

Into the nature hid behind the names.

We grudge no rite the fancy may demand;
But never, more than needs, invent, refine,

Improve upon requirement, idly wise

Beyond the letter, teaching gods their trade,

Which is to teach us: we'll obey when taught.

30 Why should we do our duty past the need?
When the sky darkens, Jove is wroth, — say prayer!

When the sun shines and Jove is glad, — sing psalm!

But wherefore pass prescription and devise Blood-offering for sweat-service, lend the rod

A pungency through pickle of our own?

Learned Abate, — no one teaches you

What Venus means and who's Apollo here!

I spare you, Cardinal — but, though you wince,

"Haec nemora indigenæ Fauni Nymphæque tenebant, Gensque virum truncis et duro robore nata."

The reference which follows is to ll. 351-353 of the same book.

You know me, I know you, and both know that!

So, if Apollo bids us fast, we fast,

40 But where does Venus order we stop sense When Master Pietro² rhymes a pleasantry?

Give alms prescribed on Friday: but, hold hand

Because your foe lies prostrate, — where's the word

Explicit in the book debars revenge?

The rationale of your scheme is just

"Pay toll here, there pursue your pleasure free!"

So do you turn to use the medium-powers, Mars and Minerva, Bacchus and the rest,

And so are saved propitiating — whom? 50
What all-good, all-wise and all-potent Jove

Vexed by the very sins in man, himself
Made life's necessity when man he made?

Irrational bunglers! So, the living truth Revealed to strike Pan dead,³ ducks low at last,

Prays leave to hold its own and live good days

Provided it go masque grotesquely, called Christian not Pagan. Oh, you purged the sky

Of all gods save the One, the great and good,

Clapped hands and triumphed! But the 60 change came fast:

The inexorable need in man for life — (Life, you may mulct and minish to a grain

Out of the lump, so that the grain but live) Laughed at your substituting death for life,

And bade you do your worst: which worst was done

In just that age styled primitive and pure When Saint this, Saint that, dutifully starved,

Froze, fought with beasts, was beaten and abused

And finally ridded of his flesh by fire, He kept life-long unspotted from the 70
world!

Next age, how goes the game, what mortal gives

His life and emulates Saint that, Saint this?

Men mutter, make excuse or mutiny,
In fine are minded all to leave the new,

Stick to the old, — enjoy old liberty,
No prejudice in enjoyment, if you please,

To the new profession: sin o' the sly, henceforth!

² Master Pietro: Pietro Aretino. See note on p. 843, l. 16.

³ Revealed to strike Pan dead: an allusion to the legend that, at the hour of the Crucifixion, certain Greek sailors heard a voice proclaiming "Pan is dead."

The law stands though the letter kills:
what then?

The spirit saves as unmistakeably.

Omniscience sees, Omnipotence could stop,

Omnibenevolence pardons: it must be, Frown law its fiercest, there's a wink somewhere!

Such was the logic in this head of mine:

I, like the rest, wrote "poison" on my bread,

But broke and ate: — said "Those that use the sword

"Shall perish by the same;" then stabbed my foe.

ro I stand on solid earth, not empty air:

Dislodge me, let your Pope's crook hale me hence!

Not he, nor you! And I so pity both, I'll make the true charge you want wit to
make:

"Count Guido, who reveal our mystery,

"And trace all issues to the love of life:

"We having life to love and guard, like you,

"Why did you put us upon self-defence?

"You well knew what prompt pass-word would appease

"The sentry's ire when folk infringed his
bounds,

20 "And yet kept mouth shut: do you wonder
then

"If, in mere decency, he shot you dead?

"He can't have people play such pranks as yours

"Beneath his nose at noonday: you disdained

"To give him an excuse before the world

"By crying 'I break rule to save our camp!'

"Under the old rule, such offence were
death;

"And you had heard the Pontifex pronounce

"Since you slay foe and violate the form,

"Slaying turns murder, which were sacrifice

30 "Had you, while, say, law-suiting foe to
death,

"But raised an altar to the Unknown God

"Or else the Genius of the Vatican.'

"Why then this pother? — all because the Pope,

"Doing his duty, cried 'A foreigner,

"You scandalise the natives: here at
Rome

"Romano vivitur more:¹ wise men, here,

"Put the Church forward and efface
themselves.

"The fit defence had been, — you stamped on wheat,

"Intending all the time to trample tares, —

"Were fain extirpate, then, the heretic, 4c

"You now find, in your haste was slain a
fool:

"Nor Pietro, nor Violante, nor your wife

"Meant to breed up your babe a Molinist!

"Whence you are duly contrite. Not one
word

"Of all this wisdom did you urge: which slip

"Death must atone for."

So, let death atone!

So ends mistake, so end mistakers! — end Perhaps to recommence, — how should I
know?

Only, be sure, no punishment, no pain

Childish, preposterous, impossible, 5a

But some such fate as Ovid could fore-
see, —

Byblis in fluvium,² let the weak soul end

In water, sed Lycaon in lupum, but

The strong become a wolf for evermore!

Change that Pomrilia to a puny stream

Fit to reflect the daisies on its bank!

Let me turn wolf, be whole, and sate, for
once, —

Wallow in what is now a wolfishness

Coerced too much by the humanity

That's half of me as well! Grow out of 6c
man,

Glut the wolf-nature, — what remains but
grow

Into the man again, be man indeed

And all man? Do I ring the changes
right?

Deformed, transformed, reformed, informed, conformed!

The honest instinct, pent and crossed through life,

Let surge by death into a visible flow

Of rapture: as the strangled thread of
flame

Painfully winds, annoying and annoyed,

Malignant and maligned, thro' stone and ore,

Till earth exclude the stranger: vented 7a
once,

It finds full play, is recognised atop

Some mountain as no such abnormal birth,

Fire for the mount, not streamlet for the vale!

Ay, of the water was that wife of mine —

Be it for good, be it for ill, no run

O' the red thread through that insignificance!

Again, how she is at me with those eyes!

Away with the empty stare! Be holy still,

And stupid ever! Occupy your patch

Of private snow that's somewhere in what 8a
world

¹ Romano vivitur more: "one does as Rome does."

² Byblis in fluvium . . . Lycaon in lupum: titles of transformations recorded in Ovid's Metamorphoses.

- May now be growing icy round your head, And aguish at your foot-print, — freeze not
me,
Dare follow not another step I take,
Not with so much as those detested eyes, No, though they follow but to pray me
pause
On the incline, earth's edge that's next to hell!
None of your abnegation of revenge!
Fly at me frank, tug while I tear again!
There's God, go tell Him, testify your worst!
- Not she! There was no touch in her of
hate:
And it would prove her hell, if I reached
mine!
To know I suffered, would still sadden her Do what the angels might to make amends!
Therefore there's either no such place as
hell,
Or thence shall I be thrust forth, for her
sake,
And thereby undergo three hells, not one —
I who, with outlet for escape to heaven,
Would tarry if such flight allowed my foe
To raise his head, relieved of that firm
foot
- 20 Had pinned him to the fiery pavement
else!
So am I made, "who did not make
myself." (How dared she rob my own lip of the word?)
Beware me in what other world may be! — Pompilia, who have brought me to this pass!
All I know here, will I say there, and go Beyond the saying with the deed. Some
use
There cannot but be for a mood like mine, Implacable, persistent in revenge.
She maundered "All is over and at end:
- 30 "I go my own road, go you where God
will!
"Forgive you? I forget you!" There's the saint
That takes your taste, you other kind of
men!
How you had loved her! Guido wanted
skill
To value such a woman at her worth!
Properly the instructed criticise
"What's here, you simpleton have tossed
to take
"Its chance i' the gutter? This a daub,
indeed?
"Why, 'tis a Rafael that you kicked to rags!"
Perhaps so: some prefer the pure design:
- 40 Give me my gorge of colour, glut of gold
In a glory round the Virgin made for me!
Titian's the man, not Monk Angelico Who traces you some timid chalky ghce
- That turns the church into a chancel: ay, Just such a pencil might depict my wife!
She, — since she, also, would not change herself, —
Why could not she come in some heart-shaped cloud, Rainbowed about with riches, royalty Rimming her round, as round the tintless lawn Guardingly runs the selvage cloth of gold? 5
I would have left the faint fine gauze un-
touched,
Needle-worked over with its lily and rose,
Let her bleach unmolested in the midst, Chill that selected solitary spot
Of quietude she pleased to think was life.
Purity, pallor grace the lawn no doubt When there's the costly bordure to un-thread
And make again an ingot: but what's
grace
When you want meat and drink and clothes and fire?
A tale comes to my mind that's apposite — 6 Possibly true, probably false, a truth Such as all truths we live by, Cardinal!
'Tis said, a certain ancestor of mine Followed — whoever was the potentate, To Paynimrie, and in some battle, broke Through more than due allowance of the
foe,
And, risking much his own life, saved the lord's.
Battered and bruised, the Emperor scrambles up,
Rubs his eyes and looks round and sees my
sire,
Picks a furze-sprig from out his hauberk- 7 joint, (Token how near the ground went majesty)
And says "Take this, and if thou get safe
home,
"Plant the same in thy garden-ground to
grow:
"Run thence an hour in a straight line,
and stop:
"Describe a circle round (for central point)
"The furze aforesaid, reaching every way
"The length of that hour's run: I give it
thee, —
"The central point, to build a castle
there,
"The space circumjacent, for fit demesne,
"The whole to be thy children's heritage, — 8
"Whom, for thy sake, bid thou wear furze on cap!"
Those are my arms: we turned the furze
a tree
To show more, and the greyhound tied
thereto,
Straining to start, means swift and greedy both;
He stands upon a triple mount of gold —

By Jove, then, he's escaping from true gold And trying to arrive at empty air!
 Aha! the fancy never crossed my mind!
 My father used to tell me, and subjoin
 "As for the castle, that took wings and flew,
 "The broad lands, — why, to traverse them to-day
 "Scarce tasks my gouty feet, and in my prime
 "I doubt not I could stand and spit so far:
 "But for the furze, boy, fear no lack of that,
 "So long as fortune leaves one field to grub!
 "Wherefore, hurra for furze and loyalty!"
 What may I mean, where may the lesson lurk?
 "Do not bestow on man, by way of gift,
 "Furze without land for framework, — vaunt no grace
 "Of purity, no furze-sprig of a wife,
 "To me, i' the thick of battle for my bread,
 "Without some better dowry, — gold will do!"
 No better gift than sordid muck? Yes, Sirs!
 Many more gifts much better. Give them me!
 O those Olimpias bold, those Biancas brave,
 That brought a husband power worth Ormuz' wealth!
 Cried "Thou being mine, why, what but thine am I?
 "Be thou to me law, right, wrong, heaven and hell!
 "Let us blend souls, blent, thou in me, to bid
 "Two bodies work one pleasure! What are these "Called king, priest, father, mother, stranger, friend?
 "They fret thee or they frustrate? Give the word —
 "Be certain they shall frustrate nothing more!
 "And who is this young florid foolishness
 "That holds thy fortune in his pigmy clutch,
 "— Being a prince and potency, forsooth! —
 "He hesitates to let the trifle go?
 "Let me but seal up eye, sing ear to sleep
 "Sounder than Samson, — pounce thou on the prize
 "Shall slip from off my breast, and down couch-side,
 "And on to floor, and far as my lord's feet —
 "Where he stands in the shadow with the knife,
 "Waiting to see what Delilah dares do!

"Is the youth fair? What is a man to me "Who am thy call-bird? Twist his neck 40
 — my dupe's, —
 "Then take the breast shall turn a breast indeed!" Such women are there; and they marry whom?
 Why, when a man has gone and hanged himself Because of what he calls a wicked wife, — See, if the very turpitude bemoaned Prove not mere excellence the fool ignores!
 His monster is perfection, — Circe, sent Straight from the sun, with wand the idiot blames As not an honest distaff to spin wool!
 O thou Lucrezia,¹ is it long to wait 50 Yonder where all the gloom is in a glow
 With thy suspected presence? — virgin yet, Virtuous again, in face of what's to teach — Sin unimagined, unimaginable, — I come to claim my bride, — thy Borgia's self Not half the burning bridegroom I shall be!
 Cardinal, take away your crucifix!
 Abate, leave my lips alone, — they bite!
 Vainly you try to change what should not change,
 And shall not. I have bared, you bathe 60 my heart —
 It grows the stonier for your saving dew!
 You steep the substance, you would lubricate,
 In waters that but touch to petrify!
 You too are petrifications of a kind:
 Move not a muscle that shows mercy.
 Rave
 Another twelve hours, every word were waste!
 I thought you would not slay impenitence,
 But teased, from men you slew, contrition first, —
 I thought you had a conscience. Cardinal, You know I am wronged! — wronged, say, 70 and wronged, maintain.
 Was this strict inquisition made for blood
 When first you showed us scarlet on your back, Called to the College? Your straightforward way To your legitimate end, — I think it passed Over a scantling of heads brained, hearts broke, Lives trodden into dust! How otherwise?
 Such was the way o' the world, and so you walked.

Does memory haunt your pillow? Not a whit.
 God wills you never pace your garden-path,
 One appetising hour ere dinner-time,
 But your intrusion there treads out of life
 A universe of happy innocent things:
 Feel you remorse about that damsel-fly Which buzzed so near your mouth and Flapped your face?
 You blotted it from being at a blow:
 It was a fly, you were a man, and more, 10 Lord of created things, so took your
 course.
 Manliness, mind, — these are things fit to save,
 Fit to brush fly from: why, because I take My course, must needs the Pope kill me?
 — kill you!
 You! for this instrument, he throws away,
 Is strong to serve a master, and were yours To have and hold and get much good from out!
 The Pope who dooms me needs must die
 next year;
 I'll tell you how the chances are supposed
 For his successor: first the Chamberlain, 20 Old San Cesario, — Colloredo, next, — Then, one, two, three, four, I refuse to
 name;
 After these, comes Altieri; then come
 you —
 Seventh on the list you come, unless . . .
 ha, ha,
 How can a dead hand give a friend a lift?
 Are you the person to despise the help
 O' the head shall drop in pannier presently?
 So a child seesaws on or kicks away
 The fulcrum-stone that's all the sage requires
 To fit his lever to and move the world.
 30 Cardinal, I adjure you in God's name, Save my life, fall at the Pope's feet, set
 forth Things your own fashion, not in words like
 these
 Made for a sense like yours who apprehend!
 Translate into the Court-conventional "Count Guido must not die, is innocent!
 "Fair, be assured! But what an he were foul,
 "Blood-drenched and murder-crust head
 to foot?
 "Spare one whose death insults the Emperor,
 "Nay, outrages the Louis you so love!
 40 "He has friends who will avenge him;
 enemies
 "Who will hate God now with impunity, "Missing the old coercive: would you send
 "A soul straight to perdition, dying frank

"An atheist?" Go and say this, for God's sake!
 — Why, you don't think I hope you'll say one word?
 Neither shall I persuade you from your
 stand Nor you persuade me from my station:
 take
 Your crucifix away, I tell you twice!
 Come, I am tired of silence! Pause
 enough!
 You have prayed: I have gone inside my 50
 soul
 And shut its door behind me: 'tis your torch Makes the place dark: the darkness let
 alone
 Grows tolerable twilight: one may grope And get to guess at length and breadth and depth.
 What is this fact I feel persuaded of —
 This something like a foothold in the sea, Although Saint Peter's bark scuds, billow-borne,
 Leaves me to founder where it flung me
 first?
 Spite of your splashing, I am high and dry!
 God takes his own part in each thing He 60
 made;
 Made for a reason, He conserves his work,
 Gives each its proper instinct of defence.
 My lamblike wife could neither bark nor
 bite,
 She bleated, bleated, till for pity pure The village roused up, ran with pole and prong
 To the rescue, and behold the wolf's at bay!
 Shall he try bleating? — or take turn or
 two,
 Since the wolf owns some kinship with the fox,
 And, failing to escape the foe by craft,
 Give up attempt, die fighting quietly? 70
 The last bad blow that strikes fire in at eye
 And on to brain, and so out, life and all,
 How can it but be cheated of a pang
 If, fighting quietly, the jaws enjoy One re-embrace in mid back-bone they
 break,
 After their weary work thro' the foe's
 flesh?
 That's the wolf-nature. Don't mistake my trope!
 A Cardinal so qualmish? Eminence,
 My fight is figurative, blows i' the air, Brain-war with powers and principalities, 80 Spirit-bravado, no real fisticuffs!
 I shall not presently, when the knock
 comes,
 Cling to this bench nor claw the hang man's face,

No, trust me! I conceive worse lots than mine.
 Whether it be, the old contagious fit
 And plague o' the prison have surprised me too,
 The appropriate drunkenness of the death-hour Crept on my sense, kind work o' the wine and myrrh, —
 I know not, — I begin to taste my strength, Careless, gay even. What's the worth of life?
 The Pope's dead now, my murderous old man,
 For Tozzi told me so: and you, forsooth — Why, you don't think, Abate, do your best, You'll live a year more with that hacking cough
 And blotch of crimson where the cheek's a pit?
 Tozzi has got you also down in book!
 Cardinal, only seventh of seventy near,
 Is not one called Albano¹ in the lot?
 Go eat your heart, you'll never be a Pope!
 Inform me, is it true you left your love,
 A Pucci, for promotion in the church?
 She's more than in the church, — in the churchyard!
 20 Plautilla Pucci, your affianced bride, Has dust now in the eyes that held the love, —
 And Martinez, suppose they make you Pope, Stops that with veto, — so, enjoy yourself!
 I see you all reel to the rock, you waves —
 Some forthright, some describe a sinuous, track,
 Some, crested brilliantly, with heads above,
 Some in a strangled swirl sunk who knows how,
 But all bound whither the main-current sets, Rockward, an end in foam for all of you!
 30 What if I be o'ertaken, pushed to the front
 By all you crowding smoother souls behind,
 And reach, a minute sooner than was meant,
 The boundary whereon I break to mist?
 Go to! the smoothest safest of you all,
 Most perfect and compact wave in my train, Spite of the blue tranquillity above,
 Spite of the breadth before of lapsing peace,
 Where broods the halcyon and the fish leaps free,
 Will presently begin to feel the prick 40 At lazy heart, the push at torpid brain, Will rock vertiginously in turn, and reel,
 And, emulative, rush to death like me.

Later or sooner by a minute then,
 So much for the untimeliness of death!
 And, as regards the manner that offends,
 The rude and rough, I count the same for gain.
 Be the act harsh and quick! Undoubtedly The soul's condensed and, twice itself, expands
 To burst thro' life, by alternation due,
 Into the other state whate'er it prove. 50
 You never know what life means till you die:
 Even throughout life, 'tis death that makes life live, Gives it whatever the significance.
 For see, on your own ground and argument, Suppose life had no death to fear, how find A possibility of nobleness In man, prevented daring any more?
 What's love, what's faith without a worst to dread?
 Lack-lustre jewelry! but faith and love With death behind them bidding do or 60
 die —
 Put such a foil at back, the sparkle's born!
 From out myself how the strange colours come!
 Is there a new rule in another world?
 Be sure I shall resign myself: as here
 I recognised no law I could not see,
 There, what I see, I shall acknowledge too:
 On earth I never took the Pope for God,
 In heaven I shall scarce take God for the Pope.
 Unmanned, remanned: I hold it probable — With something changeless at the heart of 70
 me
 To know me by, some nucleus that's myself: Accretions did it wrong? Away with them —
 You soon shall see the use of fire!

Till when,

All that was, is; and must for ever be.
 Nor is it in me to unhate my hates, —
 I use up my last strength to strike once more Old Pietro in the wine-house-gossip-face,
 To trample underfoot the whine and wile
 Of beast Violante, — and I grow one gorge To loathingly reject Pompilia's pate 80 Poison my hasty hunger took for food.
 A strong tree wants no wreaths about its trunk,
 No cloying cups, no sickly sweet of scent,
 But sustenance at root, a bucketful.

¹ One called Albano: the next pope was Giovanni Francisco Albani.

How else lived that Athenian¹ who died so Drinking hot bull's blood, fit for men like
me?
I lived and died a man, and take man's
chance,
Honest and bold: right will be done to
such.

Who are these you have let descend my stair?

Ha, their accursed psalm! Lights at the sill!

Is it "Open" they dare bid you? Treach-ery!

Sirs, have I spoken one word all this while Out of the world of words I had to say?

10 Not one word! All was folly — I laughed and mocked!

Sirs, my first true word, all truth and no
lie,

Is — save me notwithstanding! Life is
all!

I was just stark mad, — let the madman
live

Pressed by as many chains as you please
pile!

Don't open! Hold me from them! I am
yours,

I am the Granduke's — no, I am the Pope's!

Abate, — Cardinal, — Christ, — Maria,
— God, . . .

Pompilia, will you let them murder me?

XII.—THE BOOK AND THE RING.

HERE were the end, had anything an end: 20 Thus, lit and launched, up and up roared and soared

A rocket, till the key o' the vault was reached,

And wide heaven held, a breathless minute-
space,

In brilliant usurpature: thus caught
spark,

Rushed to the height, and hung at full of fame

Over men's upturned faces, ghastly thence,
Our glaring Guido: now decline must be.

In its explosion, you have seen his act, By my power — may-be, judged it by your own, —

Or composite as good orbs prove, or crammed

30 With worse ingredients than the Wormwood Star.²

The act, over and ended, falls and fades:

¹ That Athenian: Themistocles, who was said to have killed himself by drinking bull's blood, which the ancients believed to be a poison.

² The Wormwood Star: Rev. viii. 11.

What was once seen, grows what is: now described,

Then talked of, told about, a tinge the less
In every fresh transmission; till it melts, Trickles in silent orange or wan grey Across our memory, dies and leaves all
dark,

And presently we find the stars again.

Follow the main streaks, meditate the mode

Of brightness, how it hastes to blend with black!

After that February Twenty Two, 40
Since our salvation, Sixteen Ninety Eight,
Of all reports that were, or may have been, Concerning those the day killed or let
live,

Four I count only. Take the first that comes.

A letter from a stranger, man of rank, Venetian visitor at Rome, — who knows,
On what pretence of busy idleness?

Thus he begins on evening of that day.

"Here are we at our end of Carnival;

"Prodigious gaiety and monstrous mirth, 50

"And constant shift of entertaining show:

"With influx, from each quarter of the globe,

"Of strangers nowise wishful to be last

"I' the struggle for a good place presently

"When that befalls fate cannot long defer.

"The old Pope totters on the verge o' the grave:

"You see, Malpichi understood far more "Than Tozzi how to treat the ailments:

age,

"No question, renders these inveterate.

"Cardinal Spada, actual Minister, 60

"Is possible Pope; I wager on his head,

"Since those four entertainments of his niece

"Which set all Rome a-stare: Pope probably —

"Though Colloredo has his backers too,
"And San Cesario makes one doubt at
times:

"Altieri will be Chamberlain at most.

"A week ago the sun was warm like May,

"And the old man took daily exercise

"Along the river-side; he loves to see "That Custom-house he built upon the 70 bank,

"For, Naples born, his tastes are maritime:

"But yesterday he had to keep in-doors

"Because of the outrageous rain that fell.

"On such days the good soul has faintingfits,

"Or lies in stupor, scarcely makes believe
"Of minding business, fumbles at his beads.

- "They say, the trust that keeps his heart alive
 "Is that, by lasting till December next,
 "He may hold Jubilee a second time,
 "And, twice in one reign, ope the Holy Doors.
 "By the way, somebody responsible "Assures me that the King of France has writ
 "Fresh orders: Fénelon will be condemned:¹
 "The Cardinal makes a wry face enough,
 "Having a love for the delinquent: still,
 "He's the ambassador, must press the point.
 "Have you a wager too, dependent here?
 "Now, from such matters to divert awhile,
 "Hear of to-day's event which crowns the week,
 "Casts all the other wagers into shade.
 "Tell Dandolo I owe him fifty drops
 "Of heart's blood in the shape of gold zechines!
 "The Pope has done his worst: I have to pay "For the execution of the Count, by Jove!
 "Two days since, I reported him as safe,
 "Re-echoing the conviction of all Rome:
 "Who could suspect its one deaf ear — the Pope's?
 "But prejudices grow insuperable,
 "And that old enmity to Austria, that "Passion for France and France's pageant-king "(Of which, why pause to multiply the proofs
 "Now scandalously rife in Europe's mouth?)
 "These fairly got the better in our man
 "Of justice, prudence, and esprit de corps,
 "And he persisted in the butchery.
 "Also, 'tis said that in his latest walk
 "To that Dogana-by-the-Bank he built,
 "The crowd, — he suffers question, unrebuked,
 "Asked, 'Whether murder was a privilege
 "Only reserved for nobles like the Count?'
 "And he was ever mindful of the mob.
 "Martinez, the Cæsarian Minister,
 "— Who used his best endeavours to spare blood,
 "And strongly pleaded for the life 'of one,'
 "Urged he, 'I may have dined at table with!' —
 "He will not soon forget the Pope's rebuff,
 "— Feels the slight sensibly, I promise you!
- ¹ Fénelon will be condemned: Fénelon's Explication des Maximes des Saints was condemned by Pope Innocent in 1699 for its advocacy of Quietism.
- "And but for the dissuasion of two eyes
 "That make with him foul weather or fine day,
 "He had abstained, nor graced the spectacle:
 "As it was, barely would he condescend
 "Look forth from the *palchetto*² where he sat
 "Under the Pincian: we shall hear of this.
 "The substituting, too, the People's Square
 "For the out-o'-the-way old quarter by the Bridge,
 "Was meant as a conciliatory sop
 "To the mob; it gave one holiday the more.
 "But the French Embassy might unfurl flag, —
 "Still the good luck of France to fling a foe!
 "Cardinal Bouillon triumphs properly.
 "Palchetti were erected in the Place,
 "And houses, at the edge of the Three Streets,
 "Let their front windows at six dollars each:
 "Anguisciola, that patron of the arts,
 "Hired one; our Envoy Contarini too.
 "Now for the thing; no sooner the decree
 "Gone forth, — 'tis four-and-twenty hours ago, —
 "Than Acciaiuoli and Panciatichi,
 "Old friends, indeed compatriots of the man,
 "Being pitched on as the couple properest
 "To intimate the sentence yesternight,
 "Were closeted ere cock-crow with the Count.
 "They both report their efforts to dispose
 "The unhappy nobleman for ending well,
 "Despite the natural sense of injury,
 "Were crowned at last with a complete
 "And when the Company of Death arrived
 "At twenty-hours, — the way they reckon here, —
 "We say, at sunset, after dinner-time, —
 "The Count was led down, hoisted up on car,
 "Last of the five, as heinous, you know:
 "Yet they allowed one whole car to each man.
 "His intrepidity, nay, nonchalance,
 "As up he stood and down he sat himself,
 "Struck admiration into those who saw.
 "Then the procession started, took the way
 "From the New Prisons by the Pilgrim's Street,

² Palchetto: stage or scaffold.

- "The street of the Governo, Pasquin's Street, "(Where was stuck up, 'mid other epi-grams,
 "A quatrain . . . but of all that, presently!)
 "The Place Navona, the Pantheon's Place,
 "Place of the Column, last the Corso's length,
 "And so debouched thence at Mannaia's foot
 "I the Place o' the People. As is evident,
 "(Despite the malice, — plainly meant, I fear,
 "By this abrupt change of locality, — 10 "The Square's no such bad place to head and hang)
 "We had the titillation as we sat
 "Assembled, (quality in conclave, ha?)
 "Of, minute after minute, some report
 "How the slow show was winding on its way.
 "Now did a car run over, kill a man,
 "Just opposite a pork-shop numbered Twelve:
 "And bitter were the outcries of the mob
 "Against the Pope: for, but that he forbids
 "The Lottery, why, Twelve were Tern Quatern!
 20 "Now did a beggar by Saint Agnes, lame
 "From his youth up, recover use of leg.
 "Through prayer of Guido as he glanced that way:
 "So that the crowd near crammed his hat with coin.
 "Thus was kept up excitement to the last,
 "— Not an abrupt out-bolting, as of yore,
 "From Castle, over Bridge and on to block,
 "And so all ended ere you well could wink!
 "To mount the scaffold-steps, Guido was last
 "Here also, as atrociouslest in crime.
 30 "We hardly noticed how the peasants died.
 "They dangled somehow soon to right and left,
 "And we remained all ears and eyes, could give "Ourselves to Guido undividedly,
 "As he harangued the multitude beneath.
 "He begged forgiveness on the part of God,
 "And fair construction of his act from men,
 "Whose suffrage he entreated for his soul,
 "Suggesting that we should forthwith repeat
- "A Pater and an Ave, with the hymn
 "Salve Regina Celi, for his sake.
 "Which said, he turned to the confessor, crossed "And reconciled himself, with decency, "Oft glancing at St. Mary's opposite,
 "Where they possess, and showed in shrine to-day,
 "The blessed Umbilicus of our Lord,
 "(A relic 'tis believed no other church
 "In Rome can boast of) — then rose up, as brisk
 "Knelt down again, bent head, adapted neck,
 "And, with the name of Jesus on his lips,
 "Received the fatal blow.
 "The headsman showed "The head to the populace. Must I avouch
 "We strangers own to disappointment here?
 "Report pronounced him fully six feet high,
 "Youngish, considering his fifty years.
 "And, if not handsome, dignified at least.
 "Indeed, it was no face to please a wife!
 "His friends say, this was caused by the costume:
 "He wore the dress he did the murder in.
 "That is, a just-a-corps of russet serge.
 "Black camisole, coarse cloak of baracan 6
 "(So they style here the garb of goat's-hair cloth)
 "White hat and cotton cap beneath, poor Count,
 "Preservative against the evening dews
 "During the journey from Arezzo. Well,
 "So died the man, and so his end was peace:
 "Whence many a moral were to meditate.
 "Spada, — you may bet Dandolo, — is Pope!
 "Now for the quatrain!"
-
- No, friend, this will do!
 You've sputtered into sparks. What streak comes next?
 A letter — Don Giacinto Arcangeli, Doctor and Doctor, him I made you mark Buckle to business in his study late,
 The virtuous sire, the valiant for the truth, Acquaints his correspondent, — Florentine,
 By name Cencini, advocate as well, Socius and brother-in-the-devil-to-match, —
 A friend of Franceschini, anyhow,
 And knit up with the bowels of the case, — Acquaints him, (in this paper that I touch)
 How their joint effort to obtain reprieve &
 For Guido had so nearly nicked the nine

And ninety and one over, — folk would At Tarocs, — or succeeded, — in our
 phrase.
 To this Cencini's care I owe the Book,
 The yellow thing I take and toss once
 more, —
 How will it be, my four-years'-intimate,
 When thou and I part company anon? —
 'Twas he, the "whole position of the case," Pleading and summary, were put before;
 Discreetly in my Book he bound them all,
 Adding some three epistles to the point.
 Here is the first of these, part fresh as penned,
 The sand, that dried the ink, not rubbed
 away, Though penned the day whereof it tells the
 deed:
 Part — extant just as plainly, you know
 where,
 Whence came the other stuff, went, you know how,
 To make the Ring that's all but round and
 done.

"Late they arrived, too late, egregious Sir,
 "Those same justificative points you urge "Might benefit His Blessed Memory
 "Count Guido Franceschini now, with God:
 "Since the Court, — to state things succinctly, — styled
 "The Congregation of the Governor, "Having resolved on Tuesday last our
 cause
 "I' the guilty sense, with death for punishment,
 "Spite of all pleas by me deducible
 "In favour of said Blessed Memory, —
 "I, with expenditure of pains enough,
 "Obtained a respite, leave to claim and
 prove
 "Exemption from the law's award, — alleged
 "The power and privilege o' the Clericate:
 "To which effect a courier was dispatched.
 "But ere an answer from Arezzo came,
 "The Holiness of our Lord the Pope (prepare!)
 "Judging it inexpedient to postpone
 "The execution of such sentence passed,
 "Saw fit, by his particular cheirograph,
 "To derogate, dispense with privilege,
 "And wink at any hurt accruing thence "To Mother Church through damage of her son:
 "Also, to overpass and set aside
 "That other plea on score of tender age,
 "Put forth by me to do Pasquini good,
 "One of the four in trouble with our
 friend.

"So that all five, to-day, have suffered
 death
 "With no distinction save in dying, — he,
 "Decollate by mere due of privilege,
 "The rest hanged decently and in order.
 Thus
 "Came the Count to his end of gallant
 man,
 "Defunct in faith and exemplarity:
 "Nor shall the shield of his great House 56 lose shine
 "Thereby, nor its blue banner blush to
 red.
 "This, too, should yield sustainment to our hearts —
 "He had commiseration and respect
 "In his decease from universal Rome,
 "Quantum est hominum venustiorum,
 "The nice and cultivated everywhere:
 "Though, in respect of me his advocate,
 "Needs must I groan o'er my debility, "Attribute the untoward event o' the strife
 "To nothing but my own crass ignorance 60
 "Which failed to set the valid reasons
 forth,
 "Find fit excuse: such is the fate of war!
 "May God compensate us the direful blow
 "By future blessings on his family,
 "Whereof I lowly beg the next commands;
 " — Whereto, as humbly, I confirm myself . . ."

And so forth, — follow name and place and date.

On next leaf —

"Hadenus senioribus!

"There, old fox, show the clients t'other
 side
 "And keep this corner sacred, I beseech! 70
 "You and your pleas and proofs were what folk call
 "Pisan assistance, aid that comes too late,
 "Saves a man dead as nail in post of door.
 "Had I but time and space for narrative!
 "What was the good of twenty Clericates
 "When Somebody's thick headpiece once was bent
 "On seeing Guido's drop into the bag?
 "How these old men like giving youth a
 push!
 "So much the better: next push goes to
 him,
 "And a new Pope begins the century. 80
 "Much good I get by my superb defence!
 "But argument is solid and subsists,
 "While obstinacy and ineptitude
 "Accompany the owner to his tomb —
 "What do I care how soon? Beside, folk
 see!
 "Rome will have relished heartily the
 show,

"Quantum est, &c.: "all the world of cultivated men," — from Catullus, 3, 2.

- "Yet understood the motives, never fear,
 "Which caused the indecent change o' the People's Place
 "To the People's Playground, — stigmatise the spite
 "Which in a trice precipitated things!
 "As oft the moribund will give a kick
 "To show they are not absolutely dead,
 "So feebleness i' the socket shoots its last,
 "A spirt of violence for energy!
- ro "But thou, Cencini, brother of my breast,
 "O fox whose home is 'mid the tender grape,
 "Whose couch in Tuscany by Themis'
 throne,
 "Subject to no such . . . best I shut my
 mouth
 "Or only open it again to say,
 "This pother and confusion fairly laid,
 "My hands are empty and my satchel

 "Now then for both the Matrimonial
 Cause
 "And the Case of Gomez! Serve them hot and hot!
- "*Reliqua differamus in crastinum!*¹

 here.
 "I promised him, the rogue, a month ago,
 "The day his birthday was, of all the days,
 "That if I failed to save Count Guido's
 head,
 "Cinuccio should at least go see it chopped
 "From trunk — 'So, latinise your thanks!'
 quoth I.
 "That I prefer, hoc malim,' raps me out mowed lay man,

- "And folk could fall to the suspended chat,
 "This time, you see, Bottini rules the roast,
 "Nor can Papa with all his eloquence
 "Be reckoned on to help as heretofore!"
 "Whereat Cinone pouts; then, sparkishly —
 "Papa knew better than aggrieve his Pope,
 "And baulk him of his grudge against our Count,
 "Else he'd have argued-off Bottini's' . . .

 old)
 "And as for tripping in Eutropius . .
 well,
 "Reason the more that we strain every nerve
 "To do him justice, mould a model-
 mouth,
 "A Bartolus-cum-Baldo for next age:
 "For that I purse the pieces, work the
 brain,
 "And want both Gomez and the marriage-
 case,
 "Success with which shall plaster aught of pate
 "That's broken in me by Bottini's flail,
 "And bruise his own, belike, that wags and brags.

 pace,
 "Hobblingly play the roadster: who but
 he
 "Had his opinion, was not led by the nose
 "In leash of quibbles strung to look like 70

 "And compliment him on confuting me, —
 "If, by a back-swing of the pendulum, "Grace be not, thick and threefold, consequent.
 "I must decide as I see proper, Don!

 "Could eloquence avail to gainsay fact,
 "Yours were the victory, be comforted!
 "Cinuzzo will be gainer by it all.
 "Quick then with Gomez, hot and hot next case!"

Follows, a letter, takes the other side.
 Tall blue-eyed Fisc whose head is capped with cloud, Doctor Bottini, — to no matter who,
 Writes on the Monday two days afterward.
 Now shall the honest championship of right, Crowned with success, enjoy at last, unblamed, Moderate triumph! Now shall eloquence Poured forth in fancied floods for virtue's sake, (The print is sorrowfully dyked and dammed,
 But shows where fain the unbridled force would flow, Finding a channel) — now shall this refresh
 The thirsty donor with a drop or two!
 Here has been truth at issue with a lie:
 Let who gained truth the day have handsome pride In his own prowess! Eh! What ails the man?

"Well, it is over, ends as I foresaw:
 "Easily proved, Pompilia's innocence!
 "Catch them entrusting Guido's guilt to me
 "Who had, as usual, the plain truth to plead.
 "I always knew the clearness of the stream
 "Would show the fish so thoroughly, child might prong
 "The clumsy monster: with no mud to splash,
 "Small credit to lynx-eye and lightning-spear!
 "This Guido, — (much sport he contrived to make,
 "Who at first twist, preamble of the cord,
 "Turned white, told all, like the poltroon he was!) —
 "Finished, as you expect, a penitent,
 "Fully confessed his crime, and made amends,
 "And, edifying Rome last Saturday,
 "Died like a saint, poor devil! That's the man
 "The gods still give to my antagonist:
 "Imagine how Arcangeli claps wing

"And crows! 'Such formidable facts to face,
 "So naked to attack, my client here, 4c
 "And yet I kept a month the Fisc at bay,
 "And in the end had foiled him of the prize
 "By this arch-stroke, this plea of privilege,
 "But that the Pope must gratify his whim,
 "Put in his word, poor old man, — let it pass!
 " — Such is the cue to which all Rome responds.
 "What with the plain truth gives me to uphold,
 "And, should I let truth slip, the Pope at hand
 "To pick up, steady her on legs again,
 "My office turns a pleasantry indeed! 5c
 "Not that the burly boaster did one jot
 "O' the little was to do — young Spreti's work!
 "But for him, — mannikin and dandiprat
 "Mere candle-end and inch of cleverness
 "Stuck on Arcangeli's save-all, — but for him
 "The spruce young Spreti, what is bad were worse!
 "I looked that Rome should have the natural gird
 "At advocate with case that proves itself;
 "I knew Arcangeli would grin and brag:
 "But what say you to one impertinence 6c
 "Might move a stone? That monk, you are to know,
 "That barefoot Augustinian whose report
 "O' the dying woman's words did detriment
 "To my best points it took the freshness from,
 " — That meddler preached to purpose yesterday
 "At San Lorenzo as a winding-up
 "O' the show which proved a treasure to the church.
 "Out comes his sermon smoking from the press:
 "Its text — 'Let God be true, and every man
 "A liar' — and its application, this 7c
 "The longest-winded of the paragraphs,
 "I straight unstitch, tear out and treat you with:
 "Tis piping hot and posts through Rome to-day.
 "Remember it, as I engage to do!

"But if you rather be disposed to see "In the result of the long trial here, —

- "This dealing doom to guilt and doling
 praise
 "To innocency, — any proof that truth
 "May look for vindication from the world, "Much will you have misread the signs, I
 say.
 "God, who seems acquiescent in the main
 "With those who add 'So will he ever
 sleep'
 "Flutters their foolishness from time to
 time,
 "Puts forth His right-hand recognisably;
 "Even as, to fools who deem He needs must right 10 "Wrong on the instant, as if earth were
 heaven,
 "He wakes remonstrance — 'Passive, Lord, how long?'
 "Because Pompilia's purity prevails, "Conclude you, all truth triumphs in the
 end?
 "So might those old inhabitants of the ark,
 "Witnessing haply their dove's safe return,
 "Pronounce there was no danger, all the while
 "O' the deluge, to the creature's counterparts,
 "Aught that beat wing i' the world, was white or soft, —
 "And that the lark, the thrush, the culver¹
 too, 20 "Might equally have traversed air, found
 earth,
 "And brought back olive-branch in unharmed bill.
 "Methinks I hear the Patriarch's warning
 voice —
 "'Though this one breast, by miracle,
 return,
 "'No wave rolls by, in all the waste, but bears
 "'Within it some dead dove-like thing as
 dear,
 "'Beauty made blank and harmlessness destroyed!
 "How many chaste and noble sister-fames
 "Wanted the extricating hand, so lie
 "Strangled, for one Pompilia proud above 30 "The welter, plucked from the world's calumny,
 "Stupidity, simplicity, — who cares?
 "Romans! An elder race possessed your land
 "Long ago, and a false faith lingered still,
 'As shades do, though the morning-star be out.
 "Doubtless some pagan of the twilight-day
 "Has often pointed to a cavern-mouth
 "Obnoxious to beholders, hard by Rome,
 "And said, — nor he a bad man, no, nor
 fool,
 "Only a man born blind like all his mates, —
 "Here skulk in safety, lurk, defying law.
 "The devotees to execrable creed,
 "Adoring — with what culture . . . Jove, avert
 "Thy vengeance from us worshippers of
 thee! . . .
 "What rites obscene — their idol-god, an Ass!
 "So went the word forth, so acceptance
 found,
 "So century re-echoed century,
 "Cursed the accursed, — and so, from sire to son,
 "You Romans cried 'The offscourings of our race
 "Corrupt within the depths there: fitly fiends
 "Perform a temple-service o'er the dead:
 "Child, gather garment round thee, pass nor pry!
 "Thus groaned your generations: till the
 time
 "Grew ripe, and lightning had revealed,
 belike, —
 "Thro' crevice peeped into by curious
 fear, —
 "Some object even fear could recognise
 "I' the place of spectres; on the illumined
 wall,
 "To-wit, some nook, tradition talks about,
 "Narrow and short, a corpse's length, no
 more:
 "And by it, in the due receptacle,
 "The little rude brown lamp of earthen-
 ware,
 "The cruse, was meant for flowers but now held blood,
 "The rough-scratched palm-branch, and the legend left
 "Pro Christo. Then the mystery lay
 clear:
 "The abhorred one was a martyr all the
 time,
 "Heaven's saint whereof earth was not worthy. What?
 "Do you continue in the old belief?
 "Where blackness bides unbroke, must devils brood?
 "Is it so certain not another cell
 "O' the myriad that make up the cata-comb
 "Contains some saint a second flash would
 show?
 "Will you ascend into the light of day
 "And, having recognised a martyr's
 shrine,
 "Go join the votaries that gape around
 "Each vulgar god that awes the marketplace?
 "Are these the objects of your praising?
 See!

¹ Culver: wood-pigeon.

- "In the outstretched right hand of Apollo,
 there,
 "Lies screened a scorpion: housed amid the folds
 "Of Juno's mantle lurks a centipede!
 "Each statue of a god were fittier styled "Demon and devil. Glorify no brass "That shines like burnished gold in noonday glare,
 "For fools! Be otherwise instructed,
 you!
 "And preferably ponder, ere ye judge,
 "Each incident of this strange human play
 "Privily acted on a theatre
 "That seemed secure from every gaze but God's, —
 "Till, of a sudden, earthquake laid wall
 low
 "And let the world perceive wild work
 inside
 "And how, in petrification of surprise,
 "The actors stood, — raised arm and planted foot, —
 "Mouth as it made, eye as it evidenced, "Despairing shriek, triumphant hate, —
 transfixed,
 "Both he who takes and she who yields the
 life.
 "As ye become spectators of this scene,
 "Watch obscuration of a pearl-pure fame
 "By vapoury films, enwoven circumstance,
 "— A soul made weak by its pathetic want
 "Of just the first apprenticeship to sin
 "Which thenceforth makes the sinning soul secure
 "From all foes save itself, souls' truest
 foe, —
 "Since egg turned snake needs fear no serpentry, —
 "As ye behold this web of circumstance "Deepen the more for every thrill and throe,
 "Convulsive effort to disperse the films
 "And disenmesh the fame o' the martyr, —
 mark
 "How all those means, the unfriended one pursues,
 "To keep the treasure trusted to her
 breast,
 "Each struggle in 'the flight from death to
 life,
 "How all, by procurement of the powers
 "Of darkness, are transformed, — no single ray,
 "Shot forth to show and save the inmost
 star,
 "But, passed as through hell's prism, proceeding black
 "To the world that hates white: as ye watch, I say,
 "Till dusk and such defacement grow eclipse
- "By, — marvellous perversity of man! — 40
 "The inadequacy and inaptitude
 "Of that self-same machine, that very law
 "Man vaunts, devised to dissipate the gloom,
 "Rescue the drowning orb from calumny,
 "— Hear law, appointed to defend the
 just,
 "Submit, for best defence, that wickedness "Was bred of flesh and innate with the bone
 "Borne by Pompilia's spirit for a space,
 "And no mere chance fault, passionate and
 brief:
 "Finally, when ye find, — after this touch 50
 "Of man's protection which intends to mar
 "The last pin-point of light and damn the disc, —
 "One wave of the hand of God amid the worlds
 "Bid vapour vanish, darkness flee away,
 "And let the vexed star culminate in peace
 "Approachable no more by earthly mist —
 "What I call God's hand, — you, perhaps, — mere chance
 "Of the true instinct of an old good man "Who happens to hate darkness and love
 light, —
 "In whom too was the eye that saw, not 60
 dim,
 "The natural force to do the thing he saw,
 "Nowise abated, — both by miracle, —
 "All this well pondered, — I demand assent
 "To the enunciation of my text
 "In face of one proof more that 'God is
 true
 "And every man a liar' — that who trusts
 "To human testimony for a fact "Gets this sole fact — himself is proved a
 fool;
 "Man's speech being false, if but by consequence
 "That only strength is true: while man is 70
 weak,
 "And, since truth seems reserved for heaven not earth,
 "Plagued here by earth's prerogative of
 lies,
 "Should learn to love and long for what,
 one day,
 "Approved by life's probation, he may
 speak.
 "For me, the weary and worn, who haply
 prompt
 "To mirth or pity, as I move the mood, —
 "A friar who glides unnoticed to the grave,
 "With these bare feet, coarse robe and ropegirt waist, —
 "I have long since renounced your world,
 ye know:

"Yet what forbids I weigh the prize for-
 gone,
 "The worldly worth? I dare, as I were
 dead,
 "Disinterestedly judge this and that "Good ye account good: but God tries the heart.
 "Still, if you question me of my content
 "At having put each human pleasure by,
 "I answer, but the urgency of truth:
 "As this world seems, I dare not say I
 know
 "— Apart from Christ's assurance which decides — 10 "Whether I have not failed to taste much
 joy.
 "For many a doubt will fain perturb my choice —
 "Many a dream of life spent otherwise —
 "How human love, in varied shapes, might
 work
 "As glory, or as rapture, or as grace:
 "How consanquancy with the books that teach,
 "The arts that help, — how, to grow good and great,
 "Rather than simply good, and bring
 thereby
 "Goodness to breathe and live, nor, born i' the brain,
 "Die there, — how these and many another gift 20 "Of life are precious though abjured by me.
 "But, for one prize, best meed of mightiest
 man,
 "Arch-object of ambition, — earthly praise,
 "Repute o' the world, the flourish of loud trump,
 "The softer social fluting, — Oh, for these,
 "— No, my friends! Fame, — that bubble which, world-wide
 "Each blows and bids his neighbour lend a breath,
 "That so he haply may behold thereon
 "One more enlarged distorted false fool's-
 face,
 "Until some glassy nothing grown as big 30 "Send by a touch the imperishable to suds, —
 "No, in renouncing fame, my loss was
 light,
 "Choosing obscurity, my chance was
 well!"

Didst ever touch such ampollosity As the monk's own bubble, let alone its spite?
 What's his speech for, but just the fame
 he flouts?
 How he dares reprehend both high and low, Nor stoops to turn the sentence "God is
 true
 "And every man a liar — save the Pope

"Happily reigning — my respects to him!"
 And so round off the period. Molinism Simple and pure! To what pitch get we
 next?

I find that, for first pleasant consequence, Gomez, who had intended to appeal
 From the absurd decision of the Court, Declines, though plain enough his privilege,

To call on help from lawyers any more — Resolves earth's liars may possess the
 world

Till God have had sufficiency of both:
 So may I whistle for my job and fee!

But, for this virulent and rabid monk, — 5
 If law be an inadequate machine,
 And advocacy, froth and impotence,
 We shall soon see, my blatant brother!
 That's

Exactly what I hope to show your sort!
 For, by a veritable piece of luck,
 The providence, you monks round period
 with,

All may be gloriously retrieved. Perpend!
 That Monastery of the Convertites Whereto the Court consigned Pompilia
 first,

— Observe, if convertite, why, sinner then, 6
 Or what's the pertinency of award? —
 And whither she was late returned to die, — Still in their jurisdiction, mark again! —
 That thrifty Sisterhood, for perquisite, Claims every piece whereof may die possessed

Each sinner in the circuit of its walls.
 Now, this Pompilia seeing that, by death O' the couple, all their wealth devolved on
 her,

Straight utilised the respite ere decease,
 By regular conveyance of the goods 7
 She thought her own, to will and to devise, —

Gave all to friends, Tighetti and the like,
 In trust for him she held her son and heir, Gaetano, — trust which ends with infancy:

So willing and devising, since assured
 The justice of the Court would presently Confirm her in her rights and exculpate, Re-integrate and rehabilitate — Place her as, through my pleading, now she stands.

But here's the capital mistake: the Court 8 Found Guido guilty, — but pronounced
 no word

About the innocence of his wife:
 I grounded charge on broader base, I
 hope!

No matter whether wife be true or false,
 The husband must not push aside the law,
 And punish of a sudden: that's the point:
 Gather from out my speech the contrary!
 It follows that Pompilia, unrelieved

By formal sentence from imputed fault, Remains unfit to have and to dispose Of property which law provides shall lapse.
Wherefore the Monastery claims its due:
And whose, pray, whose the office, but the Fisc's?

Who but I institute procedure next Against the person of dishonest life, Pompilia whom last week I sainted so?
I it is teach the monk what scripture
means,

o And that the tongue should prove a two-edged sword,
No axe sharp one side, blunt the other
way,
Like what amused the town at Guido's
cost!

Astræa redux! I've a second chance Before the self-same Court o' the Governor Who soon shall see volte-face and chop, change sides.

Accordingly, I charge you on your life, Send me with all dispatch the judgment
late

O' the Florence Rota Court, confirmative O' the prior judgment at Arezzo, clenched o Again by the Granducal signature, Wherein Pompilia is convicted, doomed,
And only destined to escape through flight The proper punishment. Send me the
piece, —

I'll work it! And this foul-mouthed friar shall find

His Noah's-dove that brought the olive back Turn into quite the other sooty scout,
The raven, Noah first put forth the ark,
Which never came back but ate carcasses!

30 No power of life and death i' the learned
tongue?

Methinks I am already at my speech, Startle the world with "Thou, Pompilia,
thus?

"How is the fine gold of the Temple dim!" And so forth. But the courier bids me
close,

And clip away one joke that runs through
Rome,

Side by side with the sermon which I send.
How like the heartlessness of the old hunks Arcangeli! His Count is hardly cold,

40 The client whom his blunders sacrificed, When somebody must needs describe the scene —

How the procession ended at the church That boasts the famous relic:¹ quoth our brute,

"Why, that's just Martial's phrase for
'make an end' —

"Ad umbilicum sic perventum est!"

The callous dog, — let who will cut off head,
He cuts a joke and cares no more than so!
I think my speech shall modify his mirth.
"How is the fine gold dim!" — but send the piece!

Alack, Bottini, what is my next word But death to all that hope? The Instru- 50
ment

Is plain before me, print that ends my Book

With the definitive verdict of the Court, Dated September, six months afterward, (Such trouble and so long the old Pope gave!)

"In restitution of the perfect fame
"Of dead Pompilia, quondam Guido's
wife,

"And warrant to her representative
"Domenico Tighetti, barred hereby,
"While doing duty in his guardianship,
"From all molesting, all disquietude. 60

"Each perturbation and vexation brought "Or threatened to be brought against the heir

"By the Most Venerable Convent called "Saint Mary Magdalen o' the Convertites
"I' the Corso."

Justice done a second time!
Well judged, Marc Antony, Locum-tenens
O' the Governor, a Venturini too!
For which I save thy name, — last of the list!

Next year but one, completing his nine
years

Of rule in Rome, died Innocent my Pope 70
— By some account, on his accession-day.
If he thought doubt would do the next age
good,

'Tis pity he died unapprised what birth His reign may boast of, be remembered
by —

Terrible Pope, too, of a kind, — Voltaire.

And so an end of all i' the story. Strain Never so much my eyes, I miss the mark
If lived or died that Gaetano, child Of Guido and Pompilia: only find, Immediately upon his father's death, 80
A record, in the annals of the town — That Porzia, sister of our Guido, moved The Priors of Arezzo and their head Its Gonfalonier to give loyally
A public attestation of the right O' the Franceschini to all reverence — Apparently because of the incident O' the murder, — there's no mention made o' the crime,

¹ The famous relic: see p. 808, l. 45. Umbilicus also means an ornamental knob at the end of the stick round which books, in Greek and Roman times, used to be rolled; hence the phrase ad umbilicum pervenire (Martial, iv. 89) meant "to reach the end" of a book.

- But what else could have caused such urgency To cure the mob, just then, of greediness For scandal, love of lying vanity,
And appetite to swallow crude reports That bring annoyance to their betters? — bane
Which, here, was promptly met by antidote.
I like and shall translate the eloquence Of nearly the worst Latin ever writ:
"Since antique time whereof the memory 10 "Holds the beginning, to this present hour,
"The Franceschini ever shone, and shine
"Still I' the primary rank, supreme amid "The lustrous of Arezzo, proud to own
"In this great family, the flag-bearer, "Guide of her steps and guardian against
foe, —
"As in the first beginning, so to-day!"
There, would you disbelieve the annalist, Go rather by the babble of a bard?
I thought, Arezzo, thou hadst fitter souls, 20 Petrarch,¹ — nay, Buonarroti at a pinch,
To do thee credit as vexillifer!²
Was it mere mirth the Patavinian³ meant, Making thee out, in his veracious page, Founded by Janus of the Double Face?
Well, proving of such perfect parentage,
Our Gaetano, born of love and hate, Did the babe live or die? I fain would
find!
What were his fancies if he grew a man?
Was he proud, — a true scion of the stock 30 Which bore the blazon, shall make bright my page —
Shield, Azure, on a Triple Mountain, Or,
A Palm-tree, Proper, whereunto is tied A Greyhound, Rampant, striving in the slips?
Or did he love his mother, the base-born,
And fight i' the ranks, unnoticed by the
world?
Such, then, the final state o' the story. So Did the Star Wormwood in a blazing fall Frighten awhile the waters and lie lost.
So did this old woe fade from memory:
40 Till after, in the fulness of the days, I needs must find an ember yet unquenched,
And, breathing, blow the spark to flame.
It lives,
If precious be the soul of man to man.
So, British Public, who may like me yet, (Marry and amen!) learn one lesson hence Of many which whatever lives should teach:
- This lesson, that our human speech is naught,
Our human testimony false, our fame
And human estimation words and wind.
Why take the artistic way to prove so
much?
Because, it is the glory and good of Art,
That Art remains the one way possible Of speaking truth, to mouths like mine at
least.
How look a brother in the face and say
"Thy right is wrong, eyes hast thou yet art blind,
"Thine ears are stuffed and stopped, despite their length:
"And, oh, the foolishness thou countest
faith!"
Say this as silverly as tongue can troll —
The anger of the man may be endured,
The shrug, the disappointed eyes of him 60 Are not so bad to bear — but here's the plague
That all this trouble comes of telling truth, Which truth, by when it reaches him, looks
false,
Seems to be just the thing it would sup-
plant,
Nor recognisable by whom it left:
While falsehood would have done the work of truth.
But Art, — wherein man nowise speaks to
men,
Only to mankind, — Art may tell a truth Obliquely, do the thing shall breed the
thought,
Nor wrong the thought, missing the 70 mediate word.
So may you paint your picture, twice show
truth,
Beyond mere imagery on the wall, — So, note by note, bring music from your
mind,
Deeper than ever e'en Beethoven dived, — So write a book shall mean beyond the facts,
Suffice the eye and save the soul beside.
And save the soul! If this intent save
mine, —
If the rough ore be rounded to a ring, Render all duty which good ring should do,
And, failing grace, succeed in guardian- 80
ship, —
Might mine but lie outside thine, Lyric
Love, Thy rare gold ring of verse (the poet⁴ praised)
Linking our England to his Italy!

¹ Petrarch was born in the town of Arezzo, and Buonarroti (Michel Angelo) in the territory, though not in the town itself.

² Vexillifer: standard-bearer.

³ The Patavinian: Livy.

⁴ The poet: Tommaseo, who wrote the inscription on the tablet placed on the walls of Casa Guidi by the municipality of Florence to the memory of Mrs. Browning: "Qui scrisse e morì E. B. Browning, che . . . fece del suo verso aureo anello fra Italia e Inghilterra."

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU,

SAVIOUR OF SOCIETY.

1871.

[The Prince stands for the Third Napoleon, the author — it may be the unwilling author — of the coup d'état of December 1851. For eighteen years he was Emperor of the French, the ally of Great Britain, and to some extent the Liberator of Italy. He and his came to an end at Sedan in 1870.]

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL- SCHWANGAU,

SAVIOUR OF SOCIETY

Υδραν φονεύσας, μυρίων τ' ἄλλων πόνων διήλθον ἀγέλας . . .
τὸ λοῖσθιον δὲ τόνδ' ἔτλην τάλας πόνον,
. . . δῶμα θριγκῶσαι κακοῖς.

I slew the Hydra, and from labour pass'd To labour — tribes of labours! Till, at
last,

Attempting one more labour, in a trice, Alack, with ills I crowned the edifice.

You have seen better days, dear? So have
I —

And worse too, for they brought no such bud-mouth

As yours to lip "You wish you knew me!"
Well,

Wise men, 'tis said, have sometimes wished
the same,

And wished and had their trouble for their
pains.

Suppose my Œdipus should lurk at last Under a pork-pie hat and crinoline,

And, lateish, pounce on Sphinx in Leicester Square?

Or likelier, what if Sphinx in wise old age, Grown sick of snapping foolish people's
heads,

And jealous for her riddle's proper rede, — Jealous that the good trick which served the turn

Have justice rendered it, nor class one day With friend' Home's ' stilts and tongs and medium-ware, —

What if the once redoubted Sphinx, I say, (Because night draws on, and the sands
increase,

And desert-whispers grow a prophecy)
Tell all to Corinth of her own accord, Bright Corinth, not dull Thebes, for Laïs'
sake,

Who finds me hardly grey, and likes my
nose,

The notorious spiritualist and impostor.

And thinks a man of sixty at the prime?
Good! It shall be! Revealment of myself!

But listen, for we must co-operate;
I don't drink tea: permit me the cigar!

First, how to make the matter plain, of
course —

What was the law by which I lived. Let's
see:

Ay, we must take one instant of my life
Spent sitting by your side in this neat room: Watch well the way I use it, and don't
laugh!

Here's paper on the table, pen and ink: 30 Give me the soiled bit — not the pretty rose!

See! having sat an hour, I'm rested now, Therefore want work: and spy no better
work

For eye and hand and mind that guides them both,

During this instant, than to draw my pen
From blot One — thus — up, up to blot

Two — thus —

Which I at last reach, thus, and here's my line

Five inches long and tolerably straight:
Better to draw than leave undrawn, I think,

Fitter to do than let alone, I hold, 40
Though better, fitter, by but one degree.

Therefore it was that, rather than sit still Simply, my right-hand drew it while my left

Pulled smooth and pinched the moustache to a point.

Now I permit your plump lips to unpurse:
"So far, one possibly may understand

"Without recourse to witchcraft!" True, my dear.

Thus folks begin with Euclid, — finish,
how?

Trying to square the circle! — at any rate, Solving abstruser problems than this first 50

"How find the nearest way 'twixt point and
point."

Deal but with moral mathematics so — Master one merest moment's work of mine, Even this practising with pen and ink, — Demonstrate why I rather plied the quill Than left the space a blank, — you gain a
 fact,
 And God knows what a fact's worth! So proceed
 By inference from just this moral fact
 — I don't say, to that plaguy quadrature
 "What the whole man meant, whom you wish you knew," 10 But, what meant certain things he did of
 old,
 Which puzzled Europe, — why, you'll find them plain,
 This way, not otherwise: I guarantee, Understand one, you comprehend the rest.
 Rays from all round converge to any point:
 Study the point then ere you track the rays!
 The size o' the circle's nothing; subdivide Earth, and earth's smallest grain of mustard-seed,
 You count as many parts, small matching
 large,
 If you can use the mind's eye: otherwise, 20 Material optics, being gross at best, Prefer the large and leave our mind the
 small —
 And pray how many folk have minds can
 see?
 Certainly you — and somebody in Thrace Whose name escapes me at the moment.
 You — Lend me your mind then! Analyse with
 me
 This instance of the line 'twixt blot and blot
 I rather chose to draw than leave a blank, Things else being equal. You are taught
 thereby
 That 'tis my nature, when I am at ease, 30 Rather than idle out my life too long,
 To want to do a thing — to put a thought,
 Whether a great thought or a little one,
 Into an act, as nearly as may be.
 Make what is absolutely new — I can't,
 Mar what is made already well enough —
 I won't: but turn to best account the thing That's half-made — that I can. Two blots, you saw
 I knew how to extend into a line Symmetric on the sheet they blurred
 before — 40 Such little act sufficed, this time, such
 thought.

Now, we'll extend rays, widen out the verge,
 Describe a larger circle: leave this first Clod of an instance we began with, rise To the complete world many clods effect.
 Only continue patient while I throw,
 Delver-like, spadeful after spadeful up,

Just as truths, come the subsoil of me,
 mould
 Whence spring my moods: your object, — just to find,
 Alike from handlift and from barrow-load, What salts and silts may constitute the
 earth —
 If it be proper stuff to blow man glass, Or bake him pottery, bear him oaks or wheat —
 What's the born of me, in brief; which found, all's known.
 If it were genius did the digging-job, Logic would speedily sift its product
 smooth
 And leave the crude truths bare for poetry;
 But I'm no poet, and am stiff i' the back.
 What one spread fails to bring, another
 may.
 In goes the shovel and out comes scoop —
 as here!

I live to please myself. I recognise 6
 Power passing mine, immeasurable, God — Above me, whom He made, as heaven
 beyond Earth — to use figures which assist our
 sense.
 I know that He is there as I am here, By the same proof, which seems no proof
 at all,
 It so exceeds familiar forms of proof.
 Why "there," not "here"? Because, when I say "there,"
 I treat the feeling with distincter shape That space exists between us: I, — not
 He, —
 Live, think, do human work here — no 7 machine,
 His will moves, but a being by myself
 His, and not He who made me for a work, Watches my working, judges its effect
 But does not interpose. He did so once,
 And probably will again some time — not
 now,
 Life being the minute of mankind, not God's,
 In a certain sense, like time before and time After man's earthly life, so far as man Needs apprehend the matter. Am I clear?
 Suppose I bid a courier take to-night 8 (. . . Once for all, let me talk as if I smoked
 Yet in the Residenz, a personage:
 I must still represent the thing I was,
 Galvanically make dead muscle play,
 Or how shall I illustrate muscle's use?) I could then, last July, bid courier take Message for me, post-haste, a thousand miles.
 I bid him, since I have the right to bid,
 And, my part done so far, his part begins;
 He starts with due equipment, will and 9
 power,

Means he may use, misuse, not use at all,
 At his discretion, at his peril too.
 I leave him to himself: but, journey done,
 I count the minutes, call for the result In quickness and the courier quality, Weigh its worth, and then punish or reward
 According to proved service; not before.
 Meantime, he sleeps through noontide, rides till dawn,
 Sticks to the straight road, tries the crooked
 path,
 Measures and manages resource, trusts,
 doubts
 Advisers by the wayside, does his best
 At his discretion, lags or launches forth, (He knows and I know) at his peril too.
 You see? Exactly thus men stand to God:
 I with my courier, God with me. Just so I have His bidding to perform; but mind And body, all of me, though made and
 meant
 For that sole service, must consult, concert With my own self and nobody beside, How to effect the same: God helps not
 else.
 'Tis I who, with my stock of craft and
 strength,
 Choose the directer cut across the hedge,
 Or keep the foot-track that respects a crop.
 Lie down and rest, rise up and run, — live spare, Feed free, — all that's my business: but,
 arrive,
 Deliver message, bring the answer back,
 And make my bow, I must: then God will
 speak,
 Praise me or haply blame as service proves.
 To other men, to each and everyone, Another law! what likelier? God, per-
 chance,
 Grants each new man, by some as new a
 mode, Intercommunication with Himself,
 Wreaking on finiteness infinitude;
 By such a series of effects, gives each Last His own imprint: old yet ever new
 The process: 'tis the way of Deity.
 How it succeeds He knows: I only know That varied modes of creatureship abound, Implying just as varied intercourse
 For each with the creator of them all.
 Each has his own mind and no other's mode.
 What mode may yours be? I shall sympathise!
 No doubt, you, good young lady that you
 are,
 Despite a natural naughtiness or two,
 Turn eyes up like a Pradier Magdalen¹
 And see an outspread providential hand

¹ In the Louvre. Pradier was a famous scul-tor. His statue of Rousseau is at Geneva.

Above the owl's-wing aigrette — guard and guide — Visibly o'er your path, about your bed, Through all your practisings with London-
 town.
 It points, you go; it stays fixed, and you 50
 stop;
 You quicken its procedure by a word Spoken, a thought in silence, prayer and
 praise.
 Well, I believe that such a hand may stoop,
 And such appeals to it may stave off harm, Pacify the grim guardian of this Square,
 And stand you in good stead on quarter-
 day:
 Quite possible in your case; not in mine.
 "Ah, but I choose to make the difference, Find the emancipation?" No, I hope!
 If I deceive myself, take noon for night, 60
 Please to become determinedly blind
 To the true ordinance of human life, Through mere presumption — that is my affair,
 And truly a grave one; but as grave I
 think
 Your affair, yours, the specially observed — Each favoured person that perceives his path
 Pointed him, inch by inch, and looks above For guidance, through the mazes of this
 world,
 In what we call its meanest life-career
 — Not how to manage Europe properly, 70
 But how keep open shop, and yet pay rent, Rear household, and make both ends meet,
 the same.
 I say, such man is no less tasked than I To duly take the path appointed him
 By whatsoever sign he recognise.
 Our insincerity on both our heads!
 No matter what the object of a life, Small work or large, — the making thrive
 a shop,
 Or seeing that an empire take no harm, —
 There are known fruits to judge obedience 80
 by.
 You've read a ton's weight, now, of newspaper —
 Lives of me, gabble about the kind of prince —
 You know my work i' the rough; I ask you, then,
 Do I appear subordinated less
 To hand-impulsion, one prime push for all,
 Than little lives of men, the multitude That cried out, every quarter of an hour,
 For fresh instructions, did or did not work,
 And praised in the odd minutes?

Eh, my dear?
 Such is the reason why I acquiesced 90
 In doing what seemed best for me to do, So as to please myself on the great scale.

- Having regard to immortality No less than life — did that which head and heart Prescribed my hand, in measure with its
 means Of doing — used my special stock of
 power —
 Not from the aforesaid head and heart
 alone,
 But every sort of helpful circumstance,
 Some problematic and some nondescript:
 All regulated by the single care
 I' the last resort — that I made thoroughly serve
- 10 The when and how, toiled where was need, reposed
 As resolutely at the proper point, Braved sorrow, courted joy, to just one
 end:
 Namely, that just the creature I was bound To be, I should become, nor thwart at all God's purpose in creation. I conceive No other duty possible to man, — Highest mind, lowest mind, no other law
 By which to judge life failure or success:
 What folk call being saved or cast away.
- 20 Such was my rule of life: I worked my
 best
 Subject to ultimate judgment, God's not man's.
 Well then, this settled, — take your tea, I beg,
 And meditate the fact, 'twixt sip and sip, —
 This settled — why I pleased myself, you
 saw,
 By turning blot and blot into a line, O' the little scale, — we'll try now (as your
 tongue Tries the concluding sugar-drop) what's meant
 To please me most o' the great scale. Why,
 just now,
 With nothing else to do within my reach,
- 30 Did I prefer making two blots one line To making yet another separate Third blot, and leaving those I found un-linked?
 It meant, I like to use the thing I find,
 Rather than strive at unfound novelty:
 I make the best of the old, nor try for new.
 Such will to act, such choice of action's
 way, Constitute — when at work on the great scale,
 Driven to their farthest natural consequence
 By all the help from all the means — my
 own
- 40 Particular faculty of serving God, Instinct for putting power to exercise Upon some wish and want o' the time, I
 prove
 Possible to mankind as best I may.
- This constitutes my mission, — grant the
 phrase, —
 Namely, to rule men — men within my reach,
 To order, influence and dispose them so As render solid and stabilize Mankind in particles, the light and loose, For their good and my pleasure in the
 act.
 Such good accomplished proves twice good
 to me —
 Good for its own sake, as the just and
 right,
 And, in the effecting also, good again
 To me its agent, tasked as suits my taste.
- Is this much easier to be understood At first glance? Now begin the steady gaze!
- My rank — (if I must tell you simple
 truth —
 Telling were else not worth the whiff o' the weed
 I lose for the tale's sake) — dear, my rank i' the world
 Is hard to know and name precisely: err
 I may, but scarcely over-estimate My style and title. Do I class with men Most useful to their fellows? Possibly, — Therefore, in some sort, best; but, greatest
 mind
 And rarest nature? Evidently no.
 A conservator, call me, if you please,
 Not a creator nor destroyer: one Who keeps the world safe. I profess to trace
 The broken circle of society, Dim actual order, I can redescribe
 Not only where some segment silver-true Stays clear, but where the breaks of black commence Baffling you all who want the eye to probe —
 As I make out yon problematic thin White paring of your thumb-nail outside
 there,
 Above the plaster-monarch on his steed —
 See an inch, name an ell, and prophesy O' the rest that ought to follow, the round
 moon
 Now hiding in the night of things: that
 round,
 I labour to demonstrate moon enough For the month's purpose, — that society, Render efficient for the age's need:
 Preserving you in either case the old,
 Nor aiming at a new and greater thing,
 A sun for moon, a future to be made By first abolishing the present law:
 No such proud task for me by any means!
 History shows you men whose master-
 touch
 Not so much modifies as makes anew:

Minds that transmute nor need restore at all.

A breath of God made manifest in flesh Subjects the world to change, from time to time,

Alters the whole conditions of our race Abruptly, not by unperceived degrees Nor play of elements already there,
But quite new leaven, leavening the lump,
And liker, so, the natural process. See!
Where winter reigned for ages — by a turn
I' the time, some star change, (ask geologists)

The ice-tracts split, clash, splinter and disperse,

And there's an end of immobility, Silence, and all that tinted pageant, base To pinnacle, one flush from fairyland Dead-asleep and deserted somewhere, — see! —

As a fresh sun, wave, spring and joy outburst.

Or else the earth it is, time starts from trance,

Her mountains tremble into fire, her plains
Heave blinded by confusion: what result?
New teeming growth, surprises of strange life

Impossible before, a world broke up And re-made, order gained by law destroyed.

Not otherwise, in our society Follow like portents, all as absolute Regenerations: they have birth at rare Uncertain unexpected intervals

O' the world, by ministry impossible Before and after fulness of the days:
Some dervish desert-spectre, swordsman, saint,

Lawgiver, lyrist,—oh, we know the names!
Quite other these than I. Our time requires

No such strange potentate, — who else would dawn, —

No fresh force till the old have spent itself.
Such seems the natural economy.

To shoot a beam into the dark, assists:
To make that beam do fuller service, spread

And utilise such bounty to the height,
That assists also, — and that work is mine.
I recognise, contemplate, and approve The general compact of society,
Not simply as I see effected good,
But good i' the germ, each chance that's possible

I' the plan traced so far: all results, in short,

For better or worse of the operation due
To those exceptional natures, unlike mine,
Who, helping, thwarting, conscious, unaware,

Did somehow manage to so far describe

This diagram left ready to my hand, Waiting my turn of trial. I see success, See failure, see what makes or mars so throughout.

How shall I else but help complete this plan
Of which I know the purpose and approve,
By letting stay therein what seems to stand,
And adding good thereto of easier reach
To-day than yesterday?

So much, no more!
Whereon, "No more than that?" — inquire aggrieved

Half of my critics: "nothing new at all?
The old plan saved, instead of a sponged slate

And fresh-drawn figure?" — while, "So much as that?"

Object their fellows of the other faith: "O

"Leave unscathed the crazy labyrinth Of alteration and amendment, lines Which every dabster felt in duty bound To signalise his power of pen and ink
By adding to a plan once plain enough?
Why keep each fool's bequeathment, scratch and blur

Which overscrawl and underscore the piece —

Nay, strengthen them by touches of your own?"

Well, that's my mission, so I serve the world,

Figure as man o' the moment, — in default

Of somebody inspired to strike such change Into society — from round to square,
The ellipsis to the rhomboid, how you please,

As suits the size and shape o' the world he finds.

But this I can, — and nobody my peer, — Do the best with the least change possible:
Carry the incompleteness on, a stage,
Make what was crooked straight, and roughness smooth,

And weakness strong: wherein if I succeed,
It will not prove the worst achievement, secure,

In the eyes at least of one man, one I look Nowise to catch in critic company:

To-wit, the man inspired, the genius' self Destined to come and change things thoroughly.

He, at least, finds his business simplified, Distinguishes the done from undone, reads Plainly what meant and did not mean this time

We live in, and I work on, and transmit To such successor: he will operate

On good hard substance, not mere shade and shine.

Let all my critics, born to idleness

And impotency, get their good, and have Their hooting at the giver: I am deaf — Who find great good in this society, Great gain, the purchase of great labour.

Touch

The work I may and must, but — reverent
 In every fall o' the finger-tip, no doubt.
 Perhaps I find all good there's warrant for I' the world as yet: nay, to the end of
 time, —

Since evil never means part company 10 With mankind, only shift side and change
 shape.

I find advance i' the main, and notably
 The Present an improvement on the Past, And promise for the Future — which shall
 prove

Only the Present with its rough made
 smooth,

Its indistinctness emphasised; I hope
 No better, nothing newer for mankind, But something equably smoothed every-
 where,

Good, reconciled with hardly-quite-as-good Instead of good and bad each jostling each.

30 "And that's all?" Ay, and quite enough
 for me!

We have toiled so long to gain what gain
 I find

I' the Present, — let us keep it! We shall toil

So long before we gain — if gain God
 grant —

A Future with one touch of difference
 I' the heart of things, and not their outside
 face, —

Let us not risk the whiff of my cigar For Fourier, Comte, and all that ends in smoke!

This I see clearest probably of men
 With power to act and influence, now alive:

30 Juster than they to the true state of things;
 In consequence, more tolerant that, side By side, shall co-exist and thrive alike
 In the age, the various sorts of happiness Moral, mark! — not material — moods o'
 the mind

Suited to man and man his opposite: Say, minor modes of movement — hence to there,

Or thence to here, or simply round about — So long as each toe spares its neighbour's kibe,

Nor spurs the major march and main advance.

40 The love of peace, care for the family, Contentment with what's bad but might be
 worse —

Good movements these! and good, too, discontent,

So long as that spurs good, which might be
 best,

Into becoming better, anyhow:

Good — pride of country, putting hearth
 and home

I' the back-ground, out of undue prominence:

Good — yearning after change, strife, victory,

And triumph. Each shall have its orbit marked,

But no more, — none impede the other's path

In this wide world, — though each and all alike,

Save for me, fain would spread itself through space

And leave its fellow not an inch of way.

I rule and regulate the course, excite, Restrain: because the whole machine should march

Impelled by those diversely-moving parts,
 Each blind to aught beside its little bent.

Out of the turnings round and round
 inside,

Comes that straightforward world-advance,
 I want,

And none of them supposes God wants
 too

And gets through just their hindrance and my help.

I think that to have held the balance straight For twenty years, say, weighing claim and

claim,

And giving each its due, no less no more,
 This was good service to humanity,

Right usage of my power in head and heart,
 And reasonable piety beside.

Keep those three points in mind while judging me!

You stand, perhaps, for some one man, not
 men, —

Represent this or the other interest, Nor mind the general welfare, — so, im-pugn

My practice and dispute my value: why?
 You man of faith, I did not tread the world

Into a paste, and thereof make a smooth Uniform mound whereon to plant your flag,

The lily-white, above the blood and brains!

Nor yet did I, you man of faithlessness,
 So roll things to the level which you love,

That you could stand at ease there and survey

The universal Nothing undisgraced
 By pert obtrusion of some old church-spire

I' the distance! Neither friend would I
 content,

Nor, as the world were simply meant for
 him,

Thrust out his fellow and mend God's mistake.

Why, you two fools, — my dear friends all
 the same, —

Is it some change o' the world and nothing
 else Contents you? Should whatever was, not
 be?
 How thanklessly you view things! There's the root
 Of the evil, source of the entire mistake:
 You see no worth i' the world, nature and
 life,
 Unless we change what is to what may be,
 Which means, — may be, i' the brain of one of you!
 "Reject what is?" — all capabilities — Nay, you may style them chances if you choose —
 All chances, then, of happiness that lie
 Open to anybody that is born, Tumbles into this life and out again, —
 All that may happen, good and evil too,
 I' the space between, to each adventurer Upon this 'sixty, Anno Domini:
 A life to live — and such a life! a world To learn, one's lifetime in, — and such a world!
 How did the foolish ever pass for wise
 By calling life a burden, man a fly Or worm or what's most insignificant?
 "O littleness of man!" deplores the bard;
 And then, for fear the Powers should punish him,
 "O grandeur of the visible universe
 Our human littleness contrasts withal!
 O sun, O moon, ye mountains and thou
 sea,
 Thou emblem of immensity, thou this,
 That, and the other, — what impertinence In man to eat and drink and walk about
 And have his little notions of his own, The while some wave sheds foam upon the shore!"
 First of all, 'tis a lie some three-times thick:
 The bard, — this sort of speech being poetry, —
 The bard puts mankind well outside himself
 And then begins instructing them: "This
 way
 I and my friend the sea conceive of you!
 What would you give to think such thoughts as ours
 Of you and the sea together?" Down they go On the humbled knees of them: at once they draw Distinction, recognise no mate of theirs
 In one, despite his mock humility, So plain a match for what he plays with.
 ... Next,
 The turn of the great ocean-playfellow, When the bard, leaving Bond Street very
 far
 From ear-shot, cares not to ventriloquise, But tells the sea its home-truths: "You, my match?

You, all this terror and immensity And what not? Shall I tell you what you are?
 Just fit to hitch into a stanza, so Wake up and set in motion who's asleep O' the other side of you in England, else 50 Unaware, as folk pace their Bond Street
 now,
 Somebody here despises them so much!
 Between us, — they are the ultimate! to
 them
 And their perception go these lordly
 thoughts:
 Since what were ocean — mane and tail, to boot —
 Mused I not here, how make thoughts thinkable?
 Start forth my stanza and astound the
 world!
 Back, billows, to your insignificance!
 Deep, you are done with!"

Learn, my gifted friend,
 There are two things i' the world, still 60 wiser folk Accept — intelligence and sympathy.
 You pant about unutterable power
 I' the ocean, all you feel but cannot speak?
 Why, that's the plainest speech about it all.
 You did not feel what was not to be felt.
 Well, then, all else but what man feels is
 nought —
 The wash o' the liquor that o'erbrims the
 cup
 Called man, and runs to waste adown his
 side,
 Perhaps to feed a cataract, — who cares?
 I'll tell you: all the more I know mankind, 70
 The more I thank God, like my grandmother,
 For making me a little lower than The angels, honour-clothed and glory-
 crowned:
 This is the honour, — that no thing I know, Feel or conceive, but I can make my own Somehow, by use of hand or head or heart:
 This is the glory, — that in all conceived,
 Or felt or known, I recognise a mind Not mine but like mine, — for the double
 joy, —
 Making all things for me and me for Him. 80
 There's folly for you at this time of day!
 So think it! and enjoy your ignorance Of what — no matter for the worthy's
 name —
 Wisdom set working in a noble heart,
 When he, who was earth's best geometer
 Up to that time of day, consigned his life
 With its results into one matchless book,
 The triumph of the human mind so far,
 All in geometry man yet could do:
 And then wrote on the dedication-page 90
 In place of name the universe applauds,
 "But, God, what a geometer art Thou!"

I suppose Heaven is, through Eternity,
The equalising, ever and anon,
In momentary rapture, great with small,
Omniscience with intelligency, God With man, — the thunder-glow from pole to pole

Abolishing, a blissful moment-space, Great cloud alike and small cloud, in one
fire —

As sure to ebb as sure again to flow

When the new receptivity deserves

10 The new completion. There's the Heaven
for me.

And I say, therefore, to live out one's life I' the world here, with the chance, — whether by pain

Or pleasure be the process, long or short
The time, august or mean the circumstance To human eye, — of learning how set foot Decidedly on some one path to Heaven, Touch segment in the circle whence all lines

Lead to the centre equally, red lines

Or black lines, so they but produce themselves —

20 This, I do say, — and here my sermon
ends, —

This makes it worth our while to tenderly Handle a state of things which mend we might,

Mar we may, but which meanwhile helps so far.

Therefore my end is — save society!

"And that's all?" twangs the never-failing taunt

O' the foe — "No novelty, creativeness, Mark of the master that renews the age?"

"Nay, all that?" rather will demur my
judge

I look to hear some day, nor friend nor
foe —

30 "Did you attain, then, to perceive that God Knew what He undertook when He made
things?"

Ay: that my task was to co-operate Rather than play the rival, chop and
change

The order whence comes all the good we
know,

With this, — good's last expression to our
sense, —

That there's a further good conceivable
Beyond the utmost earth can realise:

And, therefore, that to change the agency,
The evil whereby good is brought about —

40 Try to make good do good as evil does — Were just as if a chemist, wanting white, And knowing black ingredients bred the dye,

Insisted these too should be white forsooth!

Correct the evil, mitigate your best, Blend mild with harsh, and soften black to grey

If grey may follow with no detriment
To the eventful perfect purity!
But as for hazarding the main result By hoping to anticipate one half In the intermediate process, — no, my
friends!

This bad world, I experience and approve;
Your good world, — with no pity, courage,
hope,

Fear, sorrow, joy, — devotedness, in short
Which I account the ultimate of man, Of which there's not one day nor hour but brings,

In flower or fruit, some sample of success,
Out of this same society I save —

None of it for me! That I might have none,

I trapped your tampering knuckles twenty
years.

Such was the task imposed me, such my
end.

Now for the means thereto. Ah, confidence —

Keep we together or part company?
This is the critical minute! "Such my
end?"

Certainly; how could it be otherwise?
Can there be question which was the right
task —

To save or to destroy society?
Why, even prove that, by some miracle, Destruction were the proper work to choose,
And that a torch best remedies what's

wrong

I' the temple, whence the long procession
wound

Of powers and beauties, earth's achievements all,

The human strength that strove and overthrew, —

The human love that, weak itself, crowned
strength, —

The instinct crying "God is whence I
came!" —

The reason laying down the law "And
such

His will i' the world must be!" — the leap and shout

Of genius "For I hold His very thoughts, The meaning of the mind of Him!" — nay,

more,

The ingenuities, each active force
That turning in a circle on itself

Looks neither up nor down but keeps the spot,

Mere creature-like, and, for religion, works, Works only and works ever, makes and shapes

And changes, still wrings more of good from less,

Still stamps some bad out, where was worst
before,

So leaves the handiwork, the act and deed,

Were it but house and land and wealth, to show
Here was a creature perfect in the kind — Whether as bee, beaver, or behemoth, What's the importance? he has done his
work
For work's sake, worked well, earned a creature's praise; —
I say, concede that same fame, whence deploys
Age after age, all this humanity, Diverse but ever dear, out of the dark Behind the altar into the broad day By the portal — enter, and, concede there mocks
Each lover of free motion and much space A perplexed length of apse and aisle and nave, — Pillared roof and carved screen, and what care I? — Which irk the movement and impede the march, —
Nay, possibly, bring flat upon his nose At some odd break-neck angle, by some freak
Of old-world artistry, that personage Who, could he but have kept his skirts from grief
And catching at the hooks and crooks
about,
Had stepped out on the daylight of our time Plainly the man of the age, — still, still,
I bar
Excessive conflagration in the case.
"Shake the flame freely!" shout the multitude:
The architect approves I stuck my torch Inside a good stout lantern, hung its light Above the hooks and crooks, and ended so.
To save society was well: the means Whereby to save it, — there begins the
doubt Permitted you, imperative on me; Were mine the best means? Did I work
aright
With powers appointed me? — since powers denied Concern me nothing.

Well, my work reviewed Fairly, leaves more hope than discouragement, First, there's the deed done: what I found,
I leave, —
What tottered, I kept stable: if it stand One month, without sustinment, still thank me
The twenty years' sustainer! Now, observe,
Sustaining is no brilliant self-display
Like knocking down or even setting up:
Much bustle these necessitate; and still To vulgar eye, the mightier of the myth

Is Hercules, who substitutes his own For Atlas' shoulder and supports the globe A whole day, — not the passive and obscure
Atlas who bore, ere Hercules was born,
And is to go on bearing that same load
When Hercules turns ash on Ceta's top.
'Tis the transition-stage, the tug and strain,
That strike men: standing still is stupid-
like.
My pressure was too constant on the whole 50
For any part's eruption into space Mid sparkles, crackling, and much praise
of me.
I saw that, in the ordinary life,
Many of the little make a mass of men Important beyond greatness here and
there;
As certainly as, in life exceptional, When old things terminate and new commence,
A solitary great man's worth the world.
God takes the business into His own hands
At such time: who creates the novel flower 60 Contrives to guard and give it breathing-
room:
I merely tend the corn-field, care for crop,
And weed no acre thin to let emerge
What prodigy may stifle there perchance, — No, though my eye have noted where he lurks.
Oh those mute myriads that spoke loud
to me —
The eyes that craved to see the light, the mouths
That sought the daily bread and nothing
more,
The hands that supplicated exercise, Men that had wives, and women that had 70
babes,
And all these making suit to only live!
Was I to turn aside from husbandry, Leave hope of harvest for the corn my care,
To play at horticulture, rear some rose Or poppy into perfect leaf and bloom When, 'mid the furrows, up was pleased to sprout
Some man, cause, system, special interest
I ought to study, stop the world meanwhile?
"But I am Liberty, Philanthropy, Enlightenment, or Patriotism, the power 80 Whereby you are to stand or fall!" cries
each:
"Mine and mine only be the flag you flaunt!"
And, when I venture to object "Meantime, What of yon myriads with no flag at all — My crop which, who flaunts flag must tread across?"
"Now, this it is to have a puny mind!" Admire my mental prodigies: "down —
down —
Ever at home o' the level and the low,

- There bides he brooding! Could he look
above,
With less of the owl and more of the eagle
eye,
He'd see there's no way helps the little
cause
Like the attainment of the great. Dare first The chief emprise; dispel yon cloud between
The sun and us; nor fear that, though our heads Find earlier warmth and comfort from his ray,
What lies about our feet, the multitude,
Will fail of beneficence presently.
- 10 Come now, let each of us awhile cry truce
To special interests, make common cause Against the adversary — or perchance Merè dullard to his own plain interest!
Which of us will you choose? — since needs must be Some one o' the warring causes you incline To hold, i' the main, has right and should prevail:
Why not adopt and give it prevalence?
Choose strict Faith or lax Incredulity, — King, Caste and Cultus — or the Rights of Man,
- 20 Sovereignty of each Proudhon¹ o'er himself,
And all that follows in just consequence!
Go free the stranger from a foreign yoke;
Or stay, concentrate energy at home;
Succeed! — when he deserves, the stranger
will.
Comply with the Great Nation's impulse,
print
By force of arms, — since reason pleads in
vain,
And, mid the sweet compulsion, pity weeps, — Hohenstiel-Schwangau on the universe!
Snub the Great Nation, cure the impulsive itch
- 30 With smartest fillip on a restless nose
Was ever launched by thumb and finger!
Bid
Hohenstiel-Schwangau first repeal the tax On pig-tails and pomatum, and then mind Abstruser matters for next century!
Is your choice made? Why then, act up to choice!
Leave the illogical touch now here now there I' the way of work, the tantalising help
First to this, then the other opposite:
The blowing hot and cold, sham policy,
- 40 Sure ague of the mind and nothing more, Disease of the perception or the will,
That fain would hide in a fine name!
Your choice,
Speak it out and condemn yourself there-
by!"

Well, Leicester-square is not the Residenz: Instead of shrugging shoulder, turning
friend
The deaf ear, with a wink to the police — I'll answer — by a question, wisdom's
mode.
How many years, o' the average, do men Live in this world? Some score, say computists.
Quintuple me that term and give mankind
The likely hundred, and with all my heart
I'll take your task upon me, work your way, Concentrate energy on some one cause:
Since, counsellor, I also have my cause,
My flag, my faith in its effect, my hope
In its eventual triumph for the good O' the world. And once upon a time, when I Was like all you, mere voice and nothing
more,
Myself took wings, soared sunward, and thence sang
"Look where I live i' the loft, come up to
me, Groundlings, nor grovel longer! gain this
height,
And prove you breathe here better than
below!
Why, what emancipation far and wide Will follow in a trice! They too can soar, Each tenant of the earth's circumference Claiming to elevate humanity,
They also must attain such altitude,
Live in the luminous circle that surrounds
The planet, not the leaden orb itself.
Press out, each point, from surface to yon verge Which one has gained and guaranteed your realm!"
Ay, still my fragments wander, music-
fraught,
Sighs of the soul, mine once, mine now, and
mine
For ever! Crumbled arch, crushed aqueduct,
Alive with tremors in the shaggy growth Of wild-wood, crevice-sown, that triumphs
there Imparting exultation to the hills!
Sweep of the swathe when only the winds
walk
And waft my words above the grassy sea
Under the blinding blue that basks o'er
Rome, —
Hear ye not still — "Be Italy again"?
And ye, what strikes the panic to your
heart?
Decrepit council-chambers, — where some lamp
Drives the unbroken black three paces off From where the greybeards huddle in debate,
Dim crows and capes, and midmost glimmers one

Like tarnished gold, and what they say is
doubt,
And what they think is fear, and what suspends
The breath in them is not the plaster-patch Time disengages from the painted wall Where Rafael moulderingly bids adieu, Nor tick of the insect turning tapestry Which a queen's finger traced of old, to
dust;
But some word, resonant, redoubtable,
Of who once felt upon his head a hand Whereof the head now apprehends his foot.
"Light in Rome, Law in Rome, and Liberty
O' the soul in Rome — the free Church, the free State!
Stamp out the nature that's best typified
By its embodiment in Peter's Dome,
The scorpion-body with the greedy pair
Of outstretched nippers, either colonnade Agape for the advance of heads and hearts!"
There's one cause for you! one and only
one,
For I am vocal through the universe,
I' the workshop, manufactory, exchange And market-place, sea-port and custom-
house
O' the frontier: listen if the echoes die —
"Unfettered commerce! Power to speak and hear,
And print and read! The universal vote!
Its rights for labour!" This, with much
beside,
I spoke when I was voice and nothing
more,
But altogether such an one as you My censors. "Voice, and nothing more,
indeed!" Re-echoes round me: "that's the censure, there's Involved the ruin of you soon or late!
Voice, — when its promise beat the empty
air:
And nothing more, — when solid earth's your stage,
And we desiderate performance, deed
For word, the realising all you dreamed In the old days: now, for deed, we find at door
O' the council-chamber posted, mute as mouse, Hohenstiel-Schwangau, sentry and safeguard
O' the greybeards all a-chuckle, cowl to cape,
Who challenge Judas, — that's endearment's style, —
To stop their mouths or let escape grimace, While they keep cursing Italy and him.
The power to speak, hear, print and read is ours?

Ay, we learn where and how, when clapped
inside
A convict-transport bound for cool Cayenne!
The universal vote we have: its urn,
We also have where votes drop, fingeredo'er
By the universal Prefect. Say, Trade's
free
And Toil turned master out o' the slave it
was:
What then? These feed man's stomach, but his soul
Craves finer fare, nor lives by bread alone, 50 As somebody says somewhere. Hence you stand Proved and recorded either false or weak, Faulty in promise or performance: which?" Neither, I hope. Once pedestalled on
earth,
To act not speak, I found earth was not
air.
I saw that multitude of mine, and not The nakedness and nullity of air Fit only for a voice to float in free.
Such eyes I saw that craved the light alone, Such mouths that wanted bread and noth- 60
ing else,
Such hands that supplicated handiwork, Men with the wives, and women with the
babes,
Yet all these pleading just to live, not die!
Did I believe one whit less in belief, Take truth for falsehood, wish the voice revoked
That told the truth to heaven for earth to hear?
No, this should be, and shall; but when and how?
At what expense to these who average Your twenty years of life, my computists?
"Not bread alone" but bread before all 70
else
For these: the bodily want serve first, said
I;
If earth-space and the life-time help not
here,
Where is the good of body having been?
But, helping body, if we somewhat baulk
The soul of finer fare, such food's to find Elsewhere and afterward — all indicates Even this self-same fact that soul can starve
Yet body still exist its twenty years: While, stint the body, there's an end at
once
O' the revel in the fancy that Rome's free, 80
And superstition's fettered, and one prints Whate'er one pleases and who pleases reads
The same, and speaks out and is spoken
to,

- And divers hundred thousand fools may vote
A vote untampered with by one wise man,
And so elect Barabbas deputy In lieu of his concurrent. I who trace The purpose written on the face of
things,
For my behoof and guidance — (whoso
needs
No such sustainment, sees beneath my signs, Proves, what I take for writing, penman-
ship,
Scribble and flourish with no sense for me
O' the sort I solemnly go spelling out, — Let him! there's certain work of mine to
show
Alongside his work: which gives warranty Of shrewder vision in the workman —
judge!)
- I who trace Providence without a break I' the plan of things, drop plumb on this plain print
Of an intention with a view to good,
That man is made in sympathy with man
At outset of existence, so to speak;
But in dissociation, more and more,
Man from his fellow, as their lives advance
In culture; still humanity, that's born
A mass, keeps flying off, fining away Ever into a multitude of points,
And ends in isolation, each from each:
Peerless above i' the sky, the pinnacle, — Absolute contact, fusion, all below At the base of being. How comes this
about?
- This stamp of God characterising man And nothing else but man in the universe — That, while he feels with man (to use man's speech)
I' the little things of life, its fleshly wants Of food and rest and health and happiness,
Its simplest spirit-motions, loves and hates, Hopes, fears, soul-cravings on the ig-noblest scale,
O' the fellow-creature, — owns the bond at base, —
He tends to freedom and divergency In the upward progress, plays the pinnacle When life's at greatest (grant again the
phrase!
Because there's neither great nor small in
life).
- "Consult thou for thy kind that have the
eyes
To see, the mouths to eat, the hands to
work,
Men with the wives, and women with the
babes!"
Prompts Nature. "Care thou for thyself
alone
- I' the conduct of the mind God made thee
with!
Think, as if man had never thought before!
Act, as if all creation hung attent
On the acting of such faculty as thine,
To take prime pattern from thy master-
piece!"
Nature prompts also: neither law obeyed
To the uttermost by any heart and soul
We know or have in record: both of them Acknowledged blindly by whatever man
We ever knew or heard of in this world.
"Will you have why and wherefore, and the fact Made plain as pikestaff?" modern Science asks.
"That mass man sprung from was a jelly lump
Once on a time; he kept an after course Through fish and insect, reptile, bird and
beast,
Till he attained to be an ape at last Or last but one. And if this doctrine shock In aught the natural pride" . . . Friend, banish fear,
The natural humility replies!
Do you suppose, even I, poor potentate, Hohenstiel-Schwangau, who once ruled the roast, —
I was born able at all points to ply
My tools? or did I have to learn my trade, Practise as exile ere perform as prince?
The world knows something of my ups and downs:
But grant me time, give me the management
And manufacture of a model me, Me fifty-fold, a prince without a flaw, —
Why, there's no social grade, the sordidest, My embryo potentate should blink and
'scape.
King, all the better he was cobbler once, He should know, sitting on the throne, how tastes Life to who sweeps the doorway. But life's hard,
Occasion rare; you cut probation short,
And, being half-instructed, on the stage
You shuffle through your part as best you
can,
And bless your stars, as I do. God takes 8
time.
I like the thought He should have lodged me once I' the hole, the cave, the hut, the tene-
ment,
The mansion and the palace; made me
learn
The feel o' the first, before I found myself Loftier i' the last, not more emancipate;
From first to last of lodging, I was I,

And not at all the place that harboured me.
 Do I refuse to follow farther yet I' the backwardness, repine if tree and
 flower,
 Mountain or streamlet were my dwelling-
 place Before I gained enlargement, grew mollusc?
 As well account that way for many a thrill Of kinship, I confess to, with the powers Called Nature: animate, inanimate, In parts or in the whole, there's something there Man-like that somehow meets the man in
 me.
 My pulse seeks altogether with the heart O' the Persian, that old Xerxes, when he stayed
 His march to conquest of the world, a day I' the desert, for the sake of one superb Plane-tree which queened it there in solitude:
 Giving her neck its necklace, and each
 arm
 Its armlet, suiting soft waist, snowy side, With cincture and apparel. Yes, I lodged In those successive tenements; perchance Taste yet the straitness of them while I stretch
 Limb and enjoy new liberty the more.
 And some abodes are lost or ruinous;
 Some, patched-up and pieced-out, and so transformed
 They still accommodate the traveller His day of lifetime. O you count the links,
 Descry no bar of the unbroken man?
 Yes, — and who welds a lump of ore, suppose
 He likes to make a chain and not a bar,
 And reach by link on link, link small, link
 large,
 Out to the due length — why, there's forethought still Outside o' the series, forging at one end, While at the other there's — no matter
 what
 The kind of critical intelligence Believing that last link had last but one For parent, and no link was, first of all,
 Fitted to anvil, hammered into shape.
 Else, I accept the doctrine, and deduce
 This duty, that I recognise mankind, In all its height and depth and length and breadth.
 Mankind i' the main have little wants, not
 large:
 I, being of will and power to help, i' the
 main,
 Mankind, must help the least wants first.
 My friend,
 That is, my foe, without such power and
 will,
 May plausibly concentrate all he wields,

And do his best at helping some large want, Exceptionally noble cause, that's seen Subordinate enough from where I stand.
 As he helps, I' helped once, when like himself,
 Unable to help better, work more wide;
 And so would work with heart and hand 50
 to-day,
 Did only computists confess a fault,
 And multiply the single score by five,
 Five only, give man's life its hundred years.
 Change life, in me shall follow change to
 match!
 Time were then, to work here, there, every-
 where,
 By turns and try experiment at ease!
 Full time to mend as well as mar: why
 wait
 The slow and sober uprising all around O' the building? Let us run up, right to
 roof,
 Some sudden marvel, piece of perfectness, 60
 And testify what we intend the whole!
 Is the world losing patience? "Wait!"
 say we:
 "There's time: no generation needs to die Unsolaced; you've a century in store!"
 But, no: I sadly let the voices wing Their way i' the upper vacancy, nor test Truth on this solid as I promised once.
 Well, and what is there to be sad about?
 The world's the world, life's life, and nothing else.
 'Tis part of life, a property to prize, 70
 That those o' the higher sort engaged i' the
 world,
 Should fancy they can change its ill to
 good,
 Wrong to right, ugliness to beauty: find Enough success in fancy turning fact,
 To keep the sanguine kind in countenance
 And justify the hope that busies them:
 Failure enough, — to who can follow
 change
 Beyond their vision, see new good prove ill
 I' the consequence, see blacks and whites of life
 Shift square indeed, but leave the chequered 80
 face Unchanged i' the main, — failure enough for such,
 To bid ambition keep the whole from
 change,
 As their best service. I hope nought be-
 side.
 No, my brave thinkers, whom I recognise,
 Gladly, myself the first, as, in a sense, All that our world's worth, flower and fruit of man!
 Such minds myself award supremacy
 Over the common insignificance, When only Mind's in question, — Body
 bows

- To quite another government, you know.
Be Kant crowned king o' the castle in the air!
- Hans Slouch, — his own, and children's mouths to feed
I' the hovel on the ground, — wants meat, nor chews
- "The Critique of Pure Reason" in exchange.
- But, now, — suppose I could allow your claims
- And quite change life to please you, — would it please?
- Would life comport with change and still be life?
- Ask, now, a doctor for a remedy:
- 10 There's his prescription. Bid him point you out Which of the five or six ingredients saves
The sick man. "Such the efficacy?
Then why not dare and do things in one dose Simple and pure, all virtue, no alloy Of the idle drop and powder?" What's his word?
- The efficacy, neat, were neutralised:
It wants dispersing and retarding, — nay Is put upon its mettle, plays its part Precisely through such hindrance everywhere,
- 20 Finds some mysterious give and take i' the case,
Some gain by opposition, he foregoes Should he unfetter the medicament.
So with this thought of yours that fain would work Free in the world: it wants just what it finds —
The ignorance, stupidity, the hate, Envy and malice and uncharitableness
That bar your passage, break the flow of you Down from those happy heights where many a cloud Combined to give you birth and bid you be
- 30 The royalist of rivers: on you glide Silverly till you reach the summit-edge, Then over, on to all that ignorance, Stupidity, hate, envy, bluffs and blocks, Posted to fret you into foam and noise.
What of it? Up you mount in minute mist,
And bridge the chasm that crushed your quietude,
A spirit-rainbow, earthborn jewelry Outsparkling the insipid firmament Blue above Terni and its orange-trees.
- 40 Do not mistake me! You, too, have your rights!
Hans must not burn Kant's house above his head Because he cannot understand Kant's book:
- And still less must Hans' pastor burn Kant's self Because Kant understands some books too well.
- But, justice seen to on this little point, Answer me, is it manly, is it sage
To stop and struggle with arrangements here
It took so many lives, so much of toil,
To tinker up into efficiency?
Can't you contrive to operate at once, — Since time is short and art is long, — to show Your quality i' the world, whate'er you boast, Without this fractious call on folks to crush
The world together just to set you free, Admire the capers you will cut perchance, Nor mind the mischief to your neighbours?
- "Age!
Age and experience bring discouragement," You taunt me: I maintain the opposite.
Am I discouraged who, — perceiving health, Strength, beauty, as they tempt the eye of 6
soul,
Are uncombinable with flesh and blood, — Resolve to let my body live its best,
And leave my soul what better yet may be Or not be, in this life or afterward?
— In either fortune, wiser than who waits Till magic art procure a miracle.
In virtue of my very confidence Mankind ought to outgrow its babyhood,
I prescribe rocking, deprecate rough hands, While thus the cradle holds it past mis- 7
take.
- Indeed, my task's the harder — equable Sustainment everywhere, all strain, no push — Whereby friends credit me with indolence, Apathy, hesitation. "Stand stock-still If able to move briskly? 'All a-strain' —
So must we compliment your passiveness?
Sound asleep, rather!"
- Just the judgment passed Upon a statue, luckless like myself, I saw at Rome once! 'Twas some artist's whim
To cover all the accessories close 8
I' the group, and leave you only Laocoön With neither sons nor serpents to denote
The purpose of his gesture. Then a crowd Was called to try the question, criticise Wherefore such energy of legs and arms, Nay, eyeballs, starting from the socket.
One —
I give him leave to write my history —
Only one said "I think the gesture strives Against some obstacle we cannot see." All the rest made their minds up. "'Tis a yawn

 Of sheer fatigue subsiding to repose:
 The statue's 'Somnolency' clear enough!"

There, my arch stranger-friend, my audience both
 And arbitress, you have one half your wish,
 At least: you know the thing I tried to do!
 All, so far, to my praise and glory — all Told as befits the self-apologist, — Who ever promises a candid sweep And clearance of those errors miscalled crimes
 None knows more, none laments so much as he,
 And ever rises from confession, proved A god whose fault was — trying to be man.
 Just so, fair judge, — if I read smile
 aright —
 I condescend to figure in your eyes As biggest heart and best of Europe's
 friends,
 And hence my failure. God will estimate Success one day; and, in the mean time —
 you!

I dare say there's some fancy of the sort Frolicking round this final puff I send To die up yonder in the ceiling-rose, — Some consolation-stakes, we losers win!
 A plague of the return to "I — I — I Did this, meant that, hoped, feared the other thing!"

Autobiography, adieu! The rest Shall make amends, be pure blame, history And falsehood: not the ineffective truth, But Thiers-and-Victor-Hugo exercise.
 Hear what I never was, but might have
 been
 I' the better world where goes tobacco-
 smoke!

Here lie the dozen volumes of my life: (Did I say "lie"? the pregnant word will serve).

Cut on to the concluding chapter, though!
 Because the little hours begin to strike.
 Hurry Thiers-Hugo to the labour's end!

Something like this the unwritten chapter reads.

Exemplify the situation thus!
 Hohenstiel-Schwangau, being, no dispute, Absolute mistress, chose the Assembly first,
 To serve her: chose this man, its President Afterward, to serve also, — specially To see that folk did service one and all.
 And now the proper term of years was out When the Head-servant must vacate his
 place,

And nothing lay so patent to the world
 As that his fellow-servants one and all

Were — mildly to make mention — knaves or fools,
 Each of them with his promise flourished
 full

I' the face of you by word and impudence, 5c
 Or filtered slyly out by nod and wink
 And nudge upon your sympathetic rib — That not one minute more did knave or
 fool

Mean to keep faith and serve as he had sworn

Hohenstiel-Schwangau, once her Head
 away.

Why should such swear except to get the
 chance,

When time should ripen and confusion
 bloom,

Of putting Hohenstielers-Schwangauese
 To the true use of human property —

Restoring souls and bodies, this to Pope, 6c
 And that to King, that other to his planned

Perfection of a Share-and-share-alike,
 That other still, to Empire absolute

In shape of the Head-servant's very self Transformed to Master whole and sole?
 each scheme

Discussible, concede one circumstance — That each scheme's parent were, beside
 himself,

Hohenstiel-Schwangau, not her serving-
 man

Sworn to do service in the way she chose Rather than his way: way superlative, 7c

Only, — by some infatuation, — his
 And his and his and everyone's but hers Who stuck to just the Assembly and the Head.

I make no doubt the Head, too, had his
 dream

Of doing sudden duty swift and sure
 On all that heap of untrustworthiness — Catching each vaunter of the villany He meant to perpetrate when time was ripe,

Once the Head-servant fairly out of doors, —

And, caging here a knave and there a fool, 8c Cry "Mistress of your servants, these and
 me,

Hohenstiel-Schwangau! I, their trusty
 Head,

Pounce on a pretty scheme concocting here That's stopped, extinguished by my vigilance.

Your property is safe again: but mark!
 Safe in these hands, not yours, who lavish
 trust

Too lightly. Leave my hands their charge
 awhile!

I know your business better than yourself:
 Let me alone about it! Some fine day,

Once we are rid of the embarrassment, 9c
 You shall look up and see your longing
 crowned!"

Such fancy might have tempted him be
false,
But this man chose truth and was wiser so.
He recognised that for great minds i' the
world
There is no trial like the appropriate one Of leaving little minds their liberty Of littleness to blunder on through life, Now, aiming at right ends by foolish
means,
Now, at absurd achievement through the aid
Of good and wise endeavour — to acquiesce
10 In folly's life-long privilege, though with
power
To do the little minds the good they need, Despite themselves, by just abolishing Their right to play the part and fill the
place I' the scheme of things He schemed who made alike Great minds and little minds, saw use for
each.
Could the orb sweep those puny particles
I just half lights at distance, hardly leads I' the leash — sweep out each speck of them from space They anticise in with their days and nights
20 And whirlings round and dancings off, forsooth,
And all that fruitless individual life One cannot lend a beam to but they spoil —
Sweep them into itself and so, one star, Preponderate henceforth i' the heritage Of heaven! No! in less senatorial phrase, The man endured to help, not save out-
right
The multitude by substituting him For them, his knowledge, will and way, for God's:
Nor change the world, such as it is, and
was 30 And will be, for some other, suiting all Except the purpose of the maker. No!
He saw that weakness, wickedness will be,
And therefore should be: that the perfect
man
As we account perfection — at most pure O' the special gold, whate'er the form it
take,
Head-work or heart-work, fined and thrice-refined
I' the crucible of life, whereto the powers Of the refiner, one and all, are flung To feed the flame, he saw that e'en the block 40 Such perfect man holds out triumphant, breaks
Into some poisonous ore, gold's opposite,
At the very purest, so compensating Man's Adversary — what if we believe? —

For earlier stern exclusion of his stuff.
See the sage, with the hunger for the
truth,
And see his system that's all true, except The one weak place that's stanchioned by a lie!
The moralist who walks with head erect
I' the crystal clarity of air so long,
Until a stumble, and the man's one mire!
Philanthropy undoes the social knot With axe-edge, makes love room 'twixt head and trunk:
Religion — but, enough, the thing's too
clear!
Well, if these sparks break out i' the greenest tree,
Our topmost of performance, yours and
mine,
What will be done i' the dry ineptitude
Of ordinary mankind, bark and bole, All seems ashamed of but their mother-
earth?
Therefore throughout Head's term of servitude
He did the appointed service, and forbore Extraneous action that were duty else, Done by some other servant, idle now Or mischievous: no matter, each his own — Own task, and, in the end, own praise or
blame!
He suffered them strut, prate and brag
their best,
Squabble at odds on every point save one,
And there shake hands, — agree to trifle
time,
Obstruct advance with, each, his cricket-
cry
"Wait till the Head be off the shoulders
here!
Then comes my King, my Pope, my Auto-crat,
My Socialist Republic to her own —
To-wit, that property of only me, Hohenstiel-Schwangau who conceits her-
self Free, forsooth, and expects I keep her
so!"
— Nay, suffered when, perceiving with dismay Head's silence paid no tribute to their noise,
They turned on him. "Dumb menace in that mouth,
Malice in that unstridulosity!
He cannot but intend some stroke of state Shall signalise his passage into peace
Out of the creaking, — hinder transference O' the Hohenstiellers-Schwangauese to king, Pope, autocrat, or socialist republic!
That's Exact the cause his lips unlocked would
cry!
Therefore be stirring: brave, beard, bully
him!

Dock, by the million, of its friendly joints, The electoral body short at once! who
 did,
 May do again, and undo us beside.
 Wrest from his hands the sword for self-
 defence,
 The right to parry any thrust in play
 We peradventure please to meditate!"
 And so forth; creak, creak, creak: and ne'er a line
 His locked mouth oped the wider, till at
 last
 O' the long degraded and insulting day, Sudden, the clock told it was judgment-
 time
 Then he addressed himself to speak indeed
 To the fools, not knaves: they saw him walk straight down Each step of the eminence, as he first engaged,
 And stand at last o' the level, — all he swore.
 "People, and not the people's varletry,
 This is the task you set myself and these!
 Thus I performed my part of it, and thus They thwarted me throughout, here, here, and here:
 Study each instance! yours the loss, not
 mine.
 What they intend now is demonstrable As plainly: here's such man, and here's such mode
 Of making you some other than the thing You, wisely or unwisely, choose to be,
 And only set him up to keep you so.
 Do you approve this? Yours the loss, not
 mine.
 Do you condemn it? There's a remedy.
 Take me — who know your mind, and mean your good,
 With clearer brain and stouter arm than
 they,
 Or you, or haply anybody else —
 And make me master for the moment!
 Choose
 What time, what power you trust me with:
 I too
 Will choose as frankly ere I trust myself With time and power: they must be adequate
 To the end and aim, since mine the loss,
 with yours,
 If means be wanting; once their worth approved,
 Grant them, and I shall forthwith operate — Ponder it well! — to the extremest stretch O' the power you trust me: if with unsuc-
 cess,
 God wills it, and there's nobody to blame."
 Whereon the people answered with a shout

"The trusty one! no tricksters any more!" How could they other? He was in his place.

What followed? Just what he foresaw, what proved
 The soundness of both judgments, — his,
 o' the knaves
 And fools, each trickster with his dupe, — and theirs,
 The people's, in what head and arm could help.
 There was uprising, masks dropped, flags unfurled, Weapons outflourished in the wind, my
 faith!
 Heavily did he let his fist fall plumb
 On each perturber of the public peace, 50 No matter whose the wagging head it
 broke —
 From bald-pate craft and greed and impu-
 dence
 Of night-hawk at first chance to prowl and
 prey
 For glory and a little gain beside, Passing for eagle in the dusk of the
 age, —
 To florid head-top, foamy patriotism
 And tribunitary daring, breast laid bare Thro' confidence in rectitude, with hand On private pistol in the pocket: these And all the dupes of these, who lent them- 60
 selves
 As dust and feather do, to help offence O' the wind that whirls them at you, then subsides
 In safety somewhere, leaving filth afloat, Annoyance you may brush from eyes and beard, —
 These he stopped: bade the wind's spite howl or whine
 Its worst outside the building, wind conceives
 Meant to be pulled together and become Its natural playground so. What foolish-
 ness
 Of dust or feather proved importunate And fell 'twixt thumb and finger, found 70 them gripe
 To detriment of bulk and buoyancy.
 Then followed silence and submission.
 Next,
 The inevitable comment came on work And work's cost: he was censured as profuse
 Of human life and liberty: too swift And thorough his procedure, who had lagged
 At the outset, lost the opportunity Through timid scruples as to right and
 wrong.
 "There's no such certain mark of a small
 mind"
 (So did Sagacity explain the fault)

"As when it needs must square away and sink

To its own small dimensions, private scale Of right and wrong, — humanity i' the
large,

The right and wrong of the universe, for-
sooth!

This man addressed himself to guard and guide

Hohenstiel-Schwangau. When the case demands

He frustrate villany in the egg, unhatched, With easy stamp and minimum of pang E'en to the punished reptile, 'There's my oath

10 Restrains my foot,' objects our guide and
guard,

'I must leave guardianship and guidance
now:

Rather than stretch one handbreadth of the
law,

I am bound to see it break from end to end.
First show me death i' the body politic:

Then prescribe pill and potion, what may please

Hohenstiel-Schwangau! all is for her sake:
'Twas she ordained my service should be
so.

What if the event demonstrate her unwise,
If she unwill the thing she willed before?

20 I hold to the letter and obey the bond
And leave her to perdition loyally.'

Whence followed thrice the expenditure we
blame

Of human life and liberty: for want O' the by-blow, came deliberate butcher's-

work!"

"Elsewhere go carry your complaint!"
bade he.

"Least, largest, there's one law for all the minds,

Here or above: be true at any price!
'Tis just o' the great scale, that such happy

stroke
Of falsehood would be found a failure.

Truth

10 Still stands unshaken at her base by me, Reigns paramount i' the world, for the large

good
O' the long late generations, — I and you Forgotten like this buried foolishness!

Not so the good I rooted in its grave."

This is why he refused to break his oath, Rather appealed to the people, gained the

power
To act as he thought best, then used it,
once

For all, no matter what the consequence To knaves and fools. As thus began his sway,

15 So, through its twenty years, one rule of
right

afflicted him: govern for the many first,

The poor mean multitude, all mouths and
eyes:

Bid the few, better favoured in the brain,
Be patient nor presume on privilege, Help him or else be quiet, — never crave

That he help them, — increase, forsooth, the gulf

Yawning so terribly 'twixt mind and mind I' the world here, which his purpose was to

block
At bottom, were it by an inch, and bridge,
If by a filament, no more, at top.

Equalise things a little! And the way He took to work that purpose out, was

plain Enough to intellect and honesty
And — superstition, style it if you please,

So long as you allow there was no lack O' the quality imperative in man —

Reverence. You see deeper? thus saw
he,

And by the light he saw, must walk: how
else

Was he to do his part? a man's, with might

And main, and not a faintest touch of fear, Sure he was in the hand of God who comes Before and after, with a work to do

Which no man helps nor hinders. Thus the man, —

So timid when the business was to touch
The uncertain order of humanity,

Imperil, for a problematic cure
Of grievance on the surface, any good

I' the deep of things, dim yet discernible —
This same man, so irresolute before,

Show him a true excrescence to cut sheer,
A devil's-graft on God's foundation-stock,

Then — no complaint of indecision more!
He wrenched out the whole canker, root and branch,

Deaf to who cried that earth would tumble

in
At its four corners if he touched a twig.

Witness that lie of lies, arch-infamy, When the Republic, with her life in-olved

In just this law — "Each people rules it-

self
Its own way, not as any stranger please" —

Turned, and for first proof she was living,
bade

Hohenstiel-Schwangau fasten on the throat
Of the first neighbour that claimed benefit

O' the law herself established: "Hohenstiel

For Hohenstiellers! Rome, by parity Of reasoning, for Romans? That's a

jest
Wants proper treatment, — lancet-puncture suits

The proud flesh: Rome ape Hohenstiel

forsooth!"

And so the siege and slaughter and success

Whereof we nothing doubt that Hohenstiel Will have to pay the price, in God's good
 time
 Which does not always fall on Saturday When the world looks for wages. Any-
 how,
 He found this infamy triumphant. Well:
 Sagacity suggested, make this speech!
 "The work was none of mine: suppose wrong wait,
 Stand over for redressing? Mine for me,
 My predecessors' work on their own head!
 Meantime there's plain advantage, should we leave Things as we find them. Keep Rome manacled
 Hand and foot: no fear of unruliness!
 Her foes consent to even seem our friends So long, no longer. Then, there's glory got
 By boldness and bravado to the world:
 The disconcerted world must grin and
 bear
 The old saucy writing, 'Grunt thereat who
 may,
 So shall things be, for such my pleasure
 is — Hohenstiel-Schwangau's.' How that reads
 in Rome
 O' the Capitol where Brennus broke his
 pate,
 And lends a flourish to our journalists!" Only, it was nor read nor flourished of,
 Since, not a moment did such glory stay Excision of the canker! Out it came, Root and branch, with much roaring, and some blood,
 And plentiful abuse of him from friend And foe. Who cared? Not Nature who assuaged
 The pain and set the patient on his legs Promptly: the better! had it been the
 worse,
 'Tis Nature you must try conclusions with,
 Not he, since nursing canker kills the sick For certain, while to cut may cure, at
 least.
 "Ah," groaned a second time Sagacity,
 "Again the little mind, precipitate, Rash, rude, when even in the right, as here!
 The great mind knows the power of gentle-
 ness,
 Only tries force because persuasion fails.
 Had this man, by prelusive trumpet-blast, Signified 'Truth and Justice mean to
 come,
 Nay, fast approach your threshold! Ere they knock,
 See that the house be set in order, swept And garnished, windows shut, and doors thrown wide!
 The free State comes to visit the free
 Church:

Receive her! or . . . or . . . never mind what else!"
 Thus moral suasion heralding brute force,
 How had he seen the old abuses die,
 And new life kindle here, there, every-
 where,
 Roused simply by that mild yet potent
 spell —
 Beyond or beat of drum or stroke of
 sword — Public opinion!"

50

"How, indeed?" he asked,
 "When all to see, after some twenty years, Were your own fool-face waiting for the
 sight,
 Faced by as wide a grin from ear to ear O' the knaves who, while the fools were waiting, worked — Broke yet another generation's heart — Twenty years' respite helping! Teach your nurse
 'Compliance with, before you suck, the teat!'
 Find what that means, and meanwhile hold your tongue!"
 Whereof the war came which he knew
 must be.
 Now, this had proved the dry-rot of the 60
 race
 He ruled o'er, that, i' the old day, when
 was need
 They fought for their own liberty and life, Well did they fight, none better: whence, such love
 Of fighting somehow still for fighting's sake Against no matter whose the liberty And life, so long as self-conceit should crow And clap the wing, while justice sheathed her claw, —
 That what had been the glory of the world When thereby came the world's good, grew its plague
 Now that the champion-armour, donned to 70
 dare
 The dragon once, was clattered up and
 down
 Highway and by-path of the world at peace, Merely to mask marauding, or for sake O' the shine and rattle that apprised the fields
 Hohenstiel-Schwangau was a fighter yet,
 And would be, till the weary world suppressed
 Her peccant humours out of fashion now.
 Accordingly the world spoke plain at last,
 Promised to punish who next played with fire.
 So, at his advent, such discomfiture Taking its true shape of beneficence, Hohenstiel-Schwangau, half-sad and part-
 wise,

80

Sat: if with wistful eye reverting oft
 To each pet weapon, rusty on its peg, Yet, with a sigh of satisfaction too That, peacefulness become the law, her-
 self
 Got the due share of godsend in its train, Cried shame and took advantage quietly.
 Still, so the dry-rot had been nursed into Blood, bones and marrow, that, from worst to best,
 All, — clearest brains and soundest hearts save here, 10 All had this lie acceptable for law Plain as the sun at noonday — "War is
 best,
 Peace is worst; peace we only tolerate As needful preparation for new war:
 War may be for whatever end we will — Peace only as the proper help thereto.
 Such is the law of right and wrong for us Hohenstiel-Schwangau: for the other
 world,
 As naturally, quite another law.
 Are we content? The world is satisfied.
 20 Discontent? Then the world must give us leave
 To strike right, left, and exercise our arm Torpid of late through overmuch repose,
 And show its strength is still superlative At somebody's expense in life or limb:
 Which done, — let peace succeed and last a year!"
 Such devil's-doctrine so was judged God's
 law,
 We say, when this man stepped upon the
 stage,
 That it had seemed a venial fault at most Had he once more obeyed Sagacity.
 30 "You come i' the happy interval of peace,
 The favourable weariness from war:
 Prolong it! artfully, as if intent On ending peace as soon as possible.
 Quietly so increase the sweets of ease
 And safety, so employ the multitude, Put hod and trowel so in idle hands, So stuff and stop up wagging jaws with
 bread,
 That selfishness shall surreptitiously
 Do wisdom's office, whisper in the ear 40 Of Hohenstiel-Schwangau, there's a pleasant feel
 In being gently forced down, pinioned fast
 To the easy arm-chair by the pleading arms
 O' the world beseeching her to there abide Content with all the harm done hitherto,
 And let herself be petted in return, Free to re-wage, in speech and prose and
 verse,
 The old unjust wars, nay — in verse and prose
 And speech, — to vaunt new victories shall
 prove

A plague o' the future, — so that words
 suffice
 For present comfort, and no deeds denote That — tired of illimitable line on line Of boulevard-building, tired o' the theatre With the tuneless thousand in their thrones
 above,
 For glory of the male intelligence,
 And Nakedness in her due niche below,
 For illustration of the female use — That she, 'twixt yawn and sigh, prepares to slip Out of the arm-chair, wants fresh blood
 again
 From over the boundary, to colour-up The sheeny sameness, keep the world aware Hohenstiel-Schwangau's arm needs exercise
 Despite the petting of the universe!
 Come, you're a city-builder: what's the
 way Wisdom takes when time needs that she entice
 Some fierce tribe, castled on the mountain-peak,
 Into the quiet and amenity
 O' the meadow-land below? By crying
 'Done
 With fight now, down with fortress?'
 Rather — 'Dare
 On, dare ever, not a stone displace!'
 Cries Wisdom: 'Cradle of our ancestors, Be bulwark, give our children safety still!
 Who of our children please may stoop and taste
 O' the valley-fatness, unafraid, — for why?
 At first alarm they have thy mother-ribs
 To run upon for refuge: foes forget Scarcely that Terror on her vantage-coign, Couchant supreme among the powers of
 air, Watches — prepared to pounce — the country wide!
 Meanwhile the encouraged valley holds its
 own,
 From the first hut's adventure in descent, 8 Half home, half hiding place, — to dome and spire
 Befitting the assured metropolis:
 Nor means offence to the fort which caps
 the crag,
 All undismantled of a turret-stone,
 And bears the banner-pole that creaks at times
 Embarrassed by the old emblazonment,
 When festal days are to commemorate:
 Otherwise left untenanted, no doubt,
 Since, never fear, our myriads from below Would rush, if needs were, man the walls 94
 again,
 Renew the exploits of the earlier time
 At moment's notice! But till notice sound, Inhabit we in ease and opulence!'

And so, till one day thus a notice sounds,
Not trumpeted, but in a whisper-gust Fitfully playing through mute city streets At midnight weary of day's feast and
game —

'Friends, your famed fort's a ruin past repair!

Its use is — to proclaim it had a use Obsolete long since. Climb and study
there

How to paint barbican and battlement
I' the scenes of our new theatre! We fight Now — by forbidding neighbours to sell
steel

Or buy wine, not by blowing out their brains!

Moreover, while we let time sap the strength
O' the walls omnipotent in menace once, Neighbours would seem to have prepared surprise —

Run up defences in a mushroom-growth,
For all the world like what we boasted:
brief —

Hohenstiel-Schwangau's policy is peace!"

Ay, so Sagacity advised him filch Folly from fools: handsomely substitute o The dagger o' lath, while gay they sang and danced,

For that long dangerous sword they liked to feel,

Even at feast-time, clink and make friends start.

No! he said "Hear the truth, and bear the
truth,

And bring the truth to bear on all you are And do, assured that only good comes
thence

Whate'er the shape good take! While I have rule,

Understand! — war for war's sake, war for sake

O' the good war gets you as war's soul
excuse,

Is damnable and damned shall be. You want

30 Glory? Why so do I, and so does God.
Where is it found, — in this paraded
shame, —

One particle of glory? Once you warred
For liberty against the world, and won:
There was the glory. Now, you fain would war

Because the neighbour prospers over-
much, —

Because there has been silence half-an-
hour,

Like Heaven on earth, without a cannon-shot

Announcing Hohenstiellers-Schwangaese
Are minded to disturb the jubilee, —

40 Because the loud tradition echoes faint,
And who knows but posterity may doubt

If the great deeds were ever done at all,
Much less believe, were such to do again,
So the event would follow: therefore, prove The old power, at the expense of somebody!

Oh Glory, — gilded bubble, bard and sage So nickname rightly, — would thy dance endure

One moment, would thy vaunting make believe

Only one eye thy ball was solid gold, Hadst thou less breath to buoy thy vacancy 50
Than a whole multitude expends in praise, Less range for roaming than from head to head

Of a whole people? Flit, fall, fly again, Only, fix never where the resolute hand May prick thee, prove the glassy lie thou art!

Give me real intellect to reason with,
No multitude, no entity that apes
One wise man, being but a million fools!
How and whence wishest glory, thou wise
one?

Wouldst get it, — didst thyself guide 60 Providence, —

By stinting of his due each neighbour round
In strength and knowledge and dexterity
So as to have thy littleness grow large By all those somethings once, turned nothings now,

As children make a molehill mountainous
By scooping out a trench around their pile,
And saving so the mudwork from approach?
Quite otherwise the cheery game of life,
True yet mimetic warfare, whereby man Does his best with his utmost, and so ends 70
A victor most of all in fair defeat.

Who thinks, — would he have no one think
beside?

Who knows, who does, — save his must learning die

And action cease? Why, so our giant proves

No better than a dwarf, once rivalry Prostrate around him. Let the whole race
stand

For him to try conclusions fairly with!
Show me the great man would engage his peer

Rather by grinning 'Cheat, thy gold is brass!'

Than granting 'Perfect piece of purest ore! 80 Still, is it less good mintage, this of mine?' Well, and these right and sound results of
soul

I' the strong and healthy one wise man, — shall such

Be vainly sought for, scornfully renounced
I' the multitude that make the entity —

The people? — to what purpose, if no less,
In power and purity of soul, below

The reach of the unit than, by multiplied

Might of the body, vulgarised the more,
Above, in thick and threefold brutishness?
See! you accept such one wise man, my-
self:

Wiser or less wise, still I operate From my own stock of wisdom, nor exact
Of other sort of natures you admire,
That whoso rhymes a sonnet pays a tax, Who paints a landscape dips brush at his
cost,

Who scores a septett true for strings and
wind

10 Multcted must be — else how should I impose

Properly, attitudinise aright, Did such conflicting claims as these divert Hohenstiel Schwangau from observing me?
Therefore, what I find facile, you be sure,
With effort or without it, you shall dare — You, I aspire to make my better self And truly the Great Nation. No more war

For war's sake, then! and, — seeing, wickedness

Springs out of folly, — no more foolish
dread

20 O' the neighbour waxing too inordinate
A rival, through his gain of wealth and ease!
What? — keep me patient, Powers! — the people here,

Earth presses to her heart, nor owns a pride Above her pride i' the race all flame and
air

And aspiration to the boundless Great,
The incommensurably Beautiful — Whose very falterings groundward come of flight

Urged by a pinion all too passionate For heaven and what it holds of gloom and glow:

30 Bravest of thinkers, bravest of the brave Doers, exalt in Science, rapturous In Art, the — more than all — magnetic race

To fascinate their fellows, mould mankind Hohenstiel - Schwangau - fashion, — these, what? — these

Will have to abdicate their primacy Should such a nation sell them steel untaxed,

And such another take itself, on hire For the natural se'nnight, somebody for
lord

Unpatronised by me whose back was turned?

40 Or such another yet would fain build bridge,

Lay rail, drive tunnel, busy its poor self With its appropriate fancy: so there's — flash —

Hohenstiel-Schwangau up in arms at once!
Genius has somewhat of the infantine:
But of the childish, not a touch nor taint

Except through self-will, which, being foolishness,

Is certain, soon or late, of punishment Which Providence avert! — and that it
may

Avert what both of us would so deserve
No foolish dread o' the neighbour, I enjoin!
By consequence, no wicked war with him, While I rule!

“Does that mean — no war at all When just the wickedness I here proscribe Comes, haply, from the neighbour? Does my speech

Precede the praying that you beat the
sword

To ploughshare, and the spear to pruninghook,

And sit down henceforth under your own vine

And fig-tree through the sleepy summer
month,

Letting what hurly-burly please explode On the other side the mountain-frontier? (

No,
Beloved! I foresee and I announce Necessity of warfare in one case, For one cause: one way, I bid broach the
blood

O' the world. For truth and right, and only right

And truth, — right, truth, on the absolute scale of God,

No pettiness of man's admeasurement, —
In such case only, and for such one cause, Fight your hearts out, whatever fate betide Hands energetic to the uttermost!

Lie not! Endure no lie which needs your ?
heart

And hand to push it out of mankind's
path —

No lie that lets the natural forces work Too long ere lay it plain and pulverised — Seeing man's life lasts only twenty years!

And such a lie, before both man and God, Proving, at this time, present, Austria's rule O'er Italy, — for Austria's sake the first Italy's next, and our sake last of all, Come with me and deliver Italy!

Smite hip and thigh until the oppressor ?
leave

Free from the Adriatic to the Alps The oppressed one! We were they who laid her low

In the old bad day when Villany braved
Truth

And Right and laughed 'Henceforward, God deposed,

Satan we set to rule for evermore
I' the world!' — whereof to stop the consequence,

And for atonement of false glory there Gaped at and gabbled over by the world

I purpose to get God enthroned again For what the world will gird at as sheer
shame
I' the cost of blood and treasure. 'All for nought —

Not even, say, some patch of province, splice

O' the frontier? — some snug honcrariumfee

Shut into glove and pocketed apace?"

(Questions Sagacity) 'in deference

To the natural susceptibility

Of folks at home, unwitting of that pitch

o You soar to, and misdoubting if Truth,
Right

And the other such augustnesses repay

Expenditure in coin o' the realm, — but prompt

To recognise the cession of Savoy

And Nice as marketable value! No,

Sagacity, go preach to Metternich,

And, sermon ended, stay where he resides!

Hohenstiel-Schwangau, you and I must
march

The other road! war for the hate of war,
Not love, this once!" So Italy was free.

20 What else noteworthy and commendable
I' the man's career? — that he was resolute

No trepidation, much less treachery

On his part, should imperil from its poise

The ball o' the world, heaved up at such expense

Of pains so far, and ready to rebound,

Let but a finger maladroitly fall,

Under pretence of making fast and sure

The inch gained by late volubility,

And run itself back to the ancient rest

30 At foot o' the mountain. Thus he ruled, gave proof

The world had gained a point, progressive
so,

By choice, this time, as will and power concurred,

O' the fittest man to rule; not chance of
birth,

Or such-like dice-throw. Oft Sagacity

Was at his ear: "Confirm this clear advance,

Support this wise procedure! You, elect

O' the people, mean to justify their choice

And out-king all the kingly imbeciles;

But that's just half the enterprise: remains

40 You find them a successor like yourself, In head and heart and eye and hand and
aim,

Or all done's undone; and whom hope to

mould

So like you as the pupil Nature sends,

The son and heir's completeness which you lack?

Lack it no longer! Wed the pick o' the world.

30

Where'er you think you find it. Should she be

A queen, — tell Hohenstielers-Schwangauese

'So do the old enthroned decrepitudes

Acknowledge, in the rotten hearts of them, Their knell is knolled, they hasten to make 54

peace

With the new order, recognise in me

Your right to constitute what king you will,

Cringe therefore crown in hand and bride on arm,

To both of us: we triumph, I suppose!"

Is it the other sort of rank? — bright eye,

Soft smile, and so forth, all her queenly

boast?

Undaunted the exordium — "I, the man

O' the people, with the people mate myself:

So stand, so fall. Kings, keep your crowns and brides!

Our progeny (if Providence agree) 60

Shall live to tread the baubles underfoot

And bid the scarecrows consort with their kin.

For son, as for his sire, be the free wife

In the free state!"

That is, Sagacity

Would prop up one more lie, the most of all

Pernicious fancy that the son and heir

Receives the genius from the sire, himself

Transmits as surely, — ask experience else!

Which answers, — never was so plain a

truth

As that God drops his seed of heavenly 70

flame

Just where He wills on earth: sometimes where man

Seems to tempt — such the accumulated

store

Of faculties — one spark to fire the heap;

Sometimes where, fire ball like, it falls

upon

The naked unpreparedness of rock,

Burns, beaconing the nations through their

night.

Faculties, fuel for the flame? All helps

Come, ought to come, or come not, crossed by chance,

From culture and transmission. What's your want

I' the son and heir? Sympathy, aptitude, 80

Teachableness, the fuel for the flame?

You'll have them for your pains: but the flame's self,

The novel thought of God shall light the

world?

No, poet, though your offspring rhyme and

chime

I' the cradle, — painter, no, for all your pet

Draws his first eye, beats Salvatore's boy, —

And thrice no, statesman, should your progeny

- Tie bib and tucker with no tape but red,
And made a foolscap kite of protocols!
Critic and copyist and bureaucrat To heart's content! The seed o' the apple
tree Brings forth another tree which bears a
crab:
'Tis the great gardener grafts the excellence On wildings when he will.
- "How plain I view, Across those misty years 'twixt me and
Rome" —
(Such the man's answer to Sagacity) 10 "The little wayside temple, half-way down To a mild river that makes oxen white Miraculously, un-mouse-colours skin,
Or so the Roman country people dream!
I view that sweet small shrub-embedded
shrine
On the declivity, was sacred once To a transmuting Genius of the land, Could touch and turn its dunnest natures
bright,
— Since Italy means the Land of the Ox,
we know.
Well, how was it the due succession fell 20 From priest to priest who ministered i' the cool Calm fane o' the Clitumnian god? The
sire
Brought forth a son and sacerdotal sprout, Endowed instinctively with good and grace To suit the gliding gentleness below — Did he? Tradition tells another tale.
Each priest obtained his predecessor's staff,
Robe, fillet and insignia, blamelessly,
By springing out of ambush, soon or late,
And slaying him: the initiative rite 30 Simply was murder, save that murder took,
I' the case, another and religious name.
So it was once, is now, shall ever be With genius and its priesthood in this
world;
The new power slays the old — but handsomely.
There he lies, not diminished by an inch Of stature that he graced the altar with, Though somebody of other bulk and build Cries 'What a goodly personage lies here Reddening the water where the bulrush roots!
40 May I conduct the service in his place, Decently and in order, as did he,
And, as he did not, keep a wary watch
When meditating 'neath yon willow shade!
Find out your best man, sure the son of him Will prove best man again, and better still Somehow than best, the grandson-prodigy!
You think the world would last another
day
Did we so make us masters of the trick Whereby the works go, we could pre-arrange
- Their play and reach perfection when we 50
please?
Depend on it, the change and the surprise
Are part o' the plan: 'tis we wish steadiness; Nature prefers a motion by unrest, Advancement through this force which jostles that.
And so, since much remains i' the world
to see,
Here's the world still, affording God the sight."
Thus did the man refute Sagacity Ever at this old whisper in his ear:
"Here are you picked out, by a miracle,
And placed conspicuously enough, folks say 60
And you believe, by Providence outright Taking a new way — nor without success —
To put the world upon its mettle: good!
But Fortune alternates with Providence; Resource is soon exhausted. Never count On such a happy hit occurring twice!
Try the old method next time!"
- "Old enough,"
(At whisper in his ear, the laugh outbroke)
"And mode the most discredited of all,
By just the men and women who make 70
boast
They are kings and queens thereby! Mere self-defence
Should teach them, on one chapter of the
law
Must be no sort of trifling — chastity:
They stand or fall, as their progenitors Were chaste or unchaste. Now, run eye
around My crowned acquaintance, give each life its look And no more, — why, you'd think each life was led Purposely for example of what pains
Who leads it took to cure the prejudice,
And prove there's nothing so unproveable 80
As who is who, what son of what a sire, And, — inferentially, — how faint the
chance
That the next generation needs to fear Another fool o' the selfsame type as he Happily regnant now by right divine And luck o' the pillow! No: select your
lord
By the direct employment of your brains
As best you may, — bad as the blunder
prove,
A far worse evil stank beneath the sun When some legitimate blockhead managed 90
so
Matters that high time was to interfere, Though interference came from hell itself
And not the blind mad miserable mob Happily ruled so long by pillow-luck And divine right, — by lies in short, not
truth.
And meanwhile use the allotted minute . . ."

One, —
 Two, three, four, five — yes, five the pendule warns!
 Eh? Why, this wild work wanders past all bound And bearing! Exile, Leicester-square, the life
 I' the old gay miserable time, rehearsed, Tried on again like cast clothes, still to serve
 At a pinch, perhaps? "Who's who?"
 was aptly asked,
 Since certainly I am not I! since when?
 Where is the bud-mouthed arbitress? A nod Out-Homering Homer! Stay — there flits the clue
 I fain would find the end of! Yes, —
 "Meanwhile,
 Use the allotted minute!" Well, you see, (Veracious and imaginary Thiers, Who map out thus the life I might have led,
 But did not, — all the worse for earth and
 me —
 Doff spectacles, wipe pen, shut book, de-camp!)
 You see 'tis easy in heroics! Plain Pedestrian speech shall help me perorate.
 Ah, if one had no need to use the tongue!
 How obvious and how easy 'tis to talk Inside the soul, a ghostly dialogue — Instincts with guesses, — instinct, guess,
 again
 With dubious knowledge, half-experience:
 each
 And all the interlocutors alike Subordinating, — as decorum bids, Oh, never fear! but still decisively, — Claims from without that take too high a tone,
 — ("God wills this, man wants that, the dignity Prescribed a prince would wish the other
 thing") —
 Putting them back to insignificance Beside one intimatest fact — myself Am first to be considered, since I live Twenty years longer and then end, perhaps!
 But, where one ceases to soliloquise, Somehow the motives, that did well enough I' the darkness, when you bring them into
 light
 Are found, like those famed cave-fish, to lack eye
 And organ for the upper magnitudes.
 The other common creatures, of less fine Existence, that acknowledge earth and
 heaven,
 Have it their own way in the argument.
 Yes, forced to speak, one stoops to say — one's aim Was — what it peradventure should have
 been:

To renovate a people, mend or end That bane come of a blessing meant the
 world —
 Inordinate culture of the sense made quick By soul, — the lust o' the flesh, lust of the
 eye,
 And pride of life, — and, consequent on
 these,
 The worship of that prince o' the power
 o' the air
 Who paints the cloud and fills the emptiness 50
 And bids his votaries, famishing for truth, Feed on a lie.

Alack, one lies oneself
 Even in the stating that one's end was truth, Truth only, if one states as much in words!
 Give me the inner chamber of the soul
 For obvious easy argument! 'tis there One pits the silent truth against a lie — Truth which breaks shell a careless simple
 bird,
 Nor wants a gorget nor a beak filed fine, Steel spurs, and the whole armoury o' the 60
 tongue,
 To equalise the odds. But, do your best, Words have to come: and somehow words deflect
 As the best cannon ever rifled will.
 "Deflect" indeed! nor merely words from
 thoughts
 But names from facts: "Clitumnus" 1 did I say?
 As if it had been his ox-whitening wave Whereby folk practised that grim cult of
 old —
 The murder of their temple's priest by who Would qualify for his succession. Sure — Nemi was the true lake's style. Dream 70 had need Of the ox-whitening piece of prettiness
 And so confused names, well known once awake.

So, i' the Residenz yet, not Leicester-square, Alone, — no such congenial intercourse! — My reverie concludes, as dreaming should,
 With daybreak: nothing done and over
 yet, Except cigars! The adventure thus may be,
 Or never needs to be at all: who knows?
 My Cousin-Duke, perhaps, at whose hard
 head
 — Is it, now — is this letter to be launched, 24
 The sight of whose grey oblong, whose grim seal,
 Set all these fancies floating for an hour?
 Twenty years are good gain, come what come will!
 Double or quits! The letter goes! Or stays?

FIFINE AT THE FAIR.

1872.

[For an analysis of this remarkable poem, see Dr. Berdœ's "Browning Cyclopædia" (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) and Mr. Nettleship's "Essays on Browning's Poetry."]

DONE ELVIRE.

Vous plaît-il, don Juan, nous éclaircir ces beaux mystères?

DON JUAN.

Madame, á vous dire la vérité . . .

DONE ELVIRE.

Ah! que vous savez mal vous défendre pour un homme de cour, et qui doit être accoutumé à ces sortes de choses! J'ai pitié de vous voir la confusion que vous avez. Que ne vous armez-vous le front d'une noble effronterie? Que ne me jurez-vous que vous êtes toujours dans les mêmes sentimens pour moi, que vous m'aimez toujours avec une ardeur sans égale, et que rien n'est capable de vous détacher de moi que la mort? — MOLIÈRE, Don Juan, acte i. sc. 3.

DONNA ELVIRA.

Don Juan, might you please to help one give a guess,
Hold up a candle, clear this fine mysterious-
ness?

DON JUAN.

Madam, if needs I must declare the truth,
— in short . . .

DONNA ELVIRA.

Fie, for a man of mode, accustomed at the
court
To such a style of thing, how awkwardly my lord Attempts defence! You move compassion, that's the word — Dumb-founded and chap-fallen! Why don't you arm your brow With noble impudence? Why don't you swear and vow
No sort of change is come to any sentiment You ever had for me? Affection holds the bent,
You love me now as erst, with passion that makes pale

All ardour else: nor aught in nature can avail
To separate us two, save what, in stopping
breath,
May peradventure stop devotion likewise
— death!

PROLOGUE.

AMPHIBIAN.

I.

THE fancy I had to-day,
Fancy which turned a fear!
I swam far out in the bay,
Since waves laughed warm and clear.

II.

I lay and looked at the sun,
The noon-sun looked at me:
Between us two, no one Live creature, that I could see.

III.

Yes! There came floating by Me, who lay floating too,
Such a strange butterfly!
Creature as dear as new:

IV.

Because the membraned wings
So wonderful, so wide,
So sun-suffused, were things Like soul and nought beside.

V.

A handbreadth over head!
All of the sea my own,
It owned the sky instead;
Both of us were alone.

VI.

I never shall join its flight,
For, nought buoys flesh in air.
If it touch the sea — good night!
Death sure and swift waits there.

VII.

Can the insect feel the better For watching the uncouth play Of limbs that slip the fetter, Pretend as they were not clay?

VIII.

Undoubtedly I rejoice
That the air comports so well
With a creature which had the choice Of the land once. Who can tell?

IX.

What if a certain soul
Which early slipped its sheath,
And has for its home the whole Of heaven, thus look beneath,

X.

Thus watch one who, in the world,
Both lives and likes life's way;
Nor wishes the wings unfurled
That sleep in the worm, they say?

XI.

But sometimes when the weather Is blue, and warm waves tempt
To free oneself of tether,
And try a life exempt

XII.

From worldly noise and dust,
In the sphere which overbrims With passion and thought, — why, just Unable to fly, one swims!

XIII.

By passion and thought upborne,
One smiles to oneself — "They fare Scarce better, they need not scorn Our sea, who live in the air!"

XIV.

Emanipate through passion
And thought, with sea for sky,
We substitute, in a fashion,
For heaven — poetry:

XV.

Which sea, to all intent,
Gives flesh such noon-disport
As a finer element Affords the spirit-sort.

XVI.

Whatever they are, we seem:
Imagine the thing they know;
All deeds they do, we dream;
Can heaven be else but so?

XVII.

And meantime, yonder streak Meets the horizon's verge;
That is the land, to seek
If we tire or dread the surge:

XVIII.

Land the solid and safe —
To welcome again (confess!)
When, high and dry, we chafe
The body, and don the dress.

XIX.

Does she look, pity, wonder
At one who mimics flight, Swims — heaven above, sea under,
Yet always earth in sight?

FIFINE AT THE FAIR.

I.

O TRIP and skip, Elvire! Link arm in arm with me!
Like husband and like wife, together let us
see
The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers
on their stage,
Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage.

II.

Now, who supposed the night would play us such a prank?
— That what was raw and brown, rough pole and shaven plank?
Mere bit of hoarding, half by trestle propped, half tuo, Would flaunt it forth as brisk as butterfly 64 from grub?
This comes of sun and air, of Autumn afternoon,
And Pornic and Saint Gille, whose feast affords the boon —
This scaffold turned parterre, this flower-bed in full blow, Bateleurs, baladines! We shall not miss
the show!
They pace and promenade; they presently will dance:
What good were else i' the drum and fife?
O pleasant land of France!

III.

Who saw them make their entry? At wink of eve, be sure!
They love to steal a march, nor lightly risk the lure.
They keep their treasure hid, nor stale (improvident) Before the time is ripe, each wonder of 70 their tent —

* Conjurers and dancers.

Yon six-legged sheep, to wit, and he who beats a gong, Lifts cap and waves salute, exhilarates the throng —
 Their ape of many years and much adventure, grim
 And grey with pitying fools who find a joke in him.
 Or, best, the human beauty, Mimi, Toinette, Fifine, Tricot fines down if fat, padding plumps up if lean,
 Ere, shedding petticoat, modesty, and such toys,
 They bounce forth, squalid girls transformed to gamesome boys.

IV.

No! no, thrice, Pornic, no! Perpend the authentic tale!
 10 'Twas not for every Gawain to gaze upon the Grail!
 But whoso went his rounds, when flew bat,
 flitted midge, Might hear across the dusk, — where both roads join the bridge, Hard by the little port, — creak a slow caravan,
 A chimneyed house on wheels; so shylysheathed, began To broaden out the bud which, bursting unaware,
 Now takes away our breath, queen-tulip of the Fair!

V.

Yet morning promised much: for, pitched and slung and reared On terrace 'neath the tower, 'twixt tree and tree appeared An airy structure; how the pennon from its dome, 20 Frenetic¹ to be free, makes one red stretch
 for home!
 The home far and away, the distance where lives joy,
 The cure, at once and ever, of world and world's annoy;
 Since, what lolls full in front, a furlong from the booth, But ocean-idleness, sky-blue and millpond-smooth?

VI.

Frenetic to be free! And, do you know, there beats Something within my breast, as sensitive? — repeats
 The fever of the flag? My heart makes just the same Passionate stretch, fires up for lawlessness, lays claim
 To share the life they lead: losels, who have and use

¹ Frenzied.

The hour what way they will, — applaud 36 them or abuse
 Society, whereof myself am at the beck, Whose call obey, and stoop to burden stiffest neck!

VII.

Why is it that whene'er a faithful few combine
 To cast allegiance off, play truant, nor repine,
 Agree to bear the worst, forego the best in store
 For us who, left behind, do duty as of yore, —
 Why is it that, disgraced, they seem to relish life the more?
 — Seem as they said "We know a secret passing praise Or blame of such as you! Remain! we go our ways
 With something you o'erlooked, forgot or 40 chose to sweep Clean out of door: our pearl picked from your rut-ish-heap.
 You care not for your loss, we calculate our gain.
 All's right. Are you content? Why, so let things remain!
 To the wood then, to the wild: free life, full liberty!"
 And when they rendezvous beneath the inclement sky,
 House by the hedge, reduced to brute-companionship,
 — Misguided ones who gave society the
 slip,
 And find too late how boon a parent they despised,
 What ministration spurned, how sweet and civilised — Then, left alone at last with self-sought 50 wretchedness,
 No interloper else! — why is it, can we guess? —
 At somebody's expense, goes up so frank a laugh?
 As though they held the corn, and left us only chaff From garners crammed and closed. And we indeed are clever If we get grain as good, by thrashing straw for ever!

VIII.

Still, truants as they are and purpose yet
 to be,
 That nowise needs forbid they venture — as you see —
 To cross confine, approach the once familiar roof
 O' the kindly race their flight estranged:
 stand half aloof,

Sidle half up, press near, and proffer wares for sale

— In their phrase — make, in ours, white levy of black mail.

They, of the wild, require some touch of us the tame,

Since clothing, meat and drink, mean money all the same.

IX.

If hunger, proverbs say, allures the wolf from wood,

Much more the bird must dare a dash at something good:

Must snatch up, bear away in beak, the trifle-treasure

To wood and wild, and then — O how enjoy at leisure!

Was never tree-built nest, you climbed and took, of bird

10 (Rare city-visitant, talked of, scarce seen or heard),

But, when you would dissect the structure, piece by piece,

You found, enwreathed amid the country-product — fleece

And feather, thistle-fluffs and bearded windle-straws¹ —

Some shred of foreign silk, unravelling of gauze,

Bit, may be, of brocade, mid fur and blow-bell-down:

Filched plainly from mankind, dear tribute paid by town,

Which proved how oft the bird had plucked up heart of grace,

Swooped down at waif and stray, made furtively our place

Pay tax and toll, then borne the booty to enrich

20 Her paradise i' the waste; the how and why of which,

That is the secret, there the mystery that stings!

X.

For, what they traffic in, consists of just the things

We, — proud ones who so scorn dwellers without the pale,

Bateleurs, baladines, white leviers of black mail, —

I say, they sell what we most pique us that we keep!

How comes it, all we hold so dear they count so cheap?

XI.

What price should you impose, for instance, on repute,

Good fame, your own good fame and family's to boot?

Stay start of quick moustache, arrest the angry rise

Of eyebrow! All I asked is answered by 30 surprise.

Now tell me: are you worth the cost of a cigar?

Go boldly, enter booth, disburse the coin at bar

Of doorway where presides the master of the troop,

And forthwith you survey his Graces in a group,

Live Picture, picturesque no doubt and close to life:

His sisters, right and left; the Grace in front, his wife.

Next, who is this performs the feat of the Trapeze?

Lo, she is launched, look — fie, the fairy!
— how she flees

O'er all those heads thrust back, — mouths, eyes, one gape and stare, —

No scrap of skirt impedes free passage 40 through the air,

Till, plumb on the other side, she lights and laughs again,

That fairy-form, whereof each muscle, nay, each vein

The curious may inspect, — his daughter that he sells

Each rustic for five sous. Desiderate ought else

O' the vendor? As you leave his show, why, joke the man!

"You cheat: your six-legged sheep, I recollect, began

Both life and trade, last year, trimmed properly and clipt,

As the Twin-headed Babe, and Human Nondescript!"

What does he care? You paid his price, may pass your jest.

So values he repute, good fame, and all the 50
rest!

XII.

But try another tack; say: "I indulge
caprice,

Who am Don and Duke, and Knight, beside, o' the Golden Fleece,

And, never mind how rich. Abandon this career!

Have hearth and home, nor let your womankind appear

Without as multiplied a coating as protects

An onion from the eye! Become, in all respects,

God-fearing householder, subsistent by brain-skill,

Hand-labour; win your bread whatever way you will,

So it be honestly, — and, while I have a purse.

Means shall not lack !” — His thanks will be the roundest curse
That ever rolled from lip.

XIII.

Now, what is it? — returns
The question — heartens so this losel that he spurious
All we so prize? I want, put down in black and white, What compensating joy, unknown and infinite,
Turns lawlessness to law, makes destitution — wealth, Vice — virtue, and disease of soul and body — health?

XIV.

Ah, the slow shake of head, the melancholy smile,
The sigh almost a sob! What’s wrong, was right erewhile?
10 Why are we two at once such ocean-width
apart?
Pale fingers press my arm, and sad eyes probe my heart.
Why is the wife in trouble?

XV.

This way, this way, Fifine!
Here’s she, shall make my thoughts be surer what they mean!
First let me read the signs, pourtray you past mistake
The gipsy’s foreign self, no swarth our sun could bake.
Yet where’s a woolly trace degrades the wiry hair?
And note the Greek-nymph nose, and — oh, my Hebrew pair Of eye and eye — o’erarched by velvet of the mole —
That swim as in a sea, that dip and rise and roll, 20 Spilling the light around! While either ear is cut Thin as a dusk-leaved rose carved from a cocoa-nut.
And then, her neck! now, grant you had the power to deck,
Just as your fancy pleased, the bistre-length of neck, Could lay, to shine against its shade, a moonlike row
Of pearls, each round and white as bubble Cupids blow Big out of mother’s milk, — what pearl-moon would surpass That string of mock-turquoise, those almandines¹ of glass, Where girlhood terminates? for with breasts’-birth commence

¹ Garnets.

The boy, and page-costume, till pink and impudence
End admirably all: complete the creature 3 trips
Our way now, brings sunshine upon her spangled hips,
As here she fronts us full, with pose half-frank, half-fierce!

XVI.

Words urged in vain, Elvire! You waste your quarte and tierce, Lunge at a phantom here, try fence in fairylane.
For me, I own defeat, ask but to understand
The acknowledged victory of whom I call my queen, Sexless and bloodless sprite: though mischievous and mean, Yet free and flower-like too, with loveliness for law,
And self-sustainment made morality.

XVII.

A flaw
Do you account i’ the lily, of lands which 40 travellers know,
That, just as golden gloom supersedes Northern snow
I’ the chalice, so, about each pistil, spice is packed, — Deliriously-drugged scent, in lieu of odour lacked,
With us, by bee and moth, their banquet to enhance
At morn and eve, when dew, the chilly sustenance, Needs mixture of some chaste and temperate perfume?
I ask, is she in fault who guards such golden gloom,
Such dear and damning scent, by who cares what devices,
And takes the idle life of insects she entices
When, drowned to heart’s desire, they 50 sate the inside
O’ the lily, mark her wealth and manifest her pride?

XVIII.

But, wiser, we keep off, nor tempt the acid juice;
Discreet we peer and praise, put rich things to right use.
No flavoured venom’d bell, — the rose it is, I wot, Only the rose, we pluck and place, un-wronged a jot, No worse for homage done by every devotee,
I’ the proper loyal throne, on breast where rose should be.

Or if the simpler sweets we have to choose among,
Would taste between our teeth, and give its toy the tongue, — O gorgeous poison-plague, on thee no hearts are set!
We gather daisy meek, or maiden violet:
I think it is Elvire we love, and not Fifine.

XIX.

“How does she make my thoughts be sure of what they mean?” Judge and be just! Suppose, an age and time long past Renew for our behoof one pageant more, the last
O’ the kind, sick Louis liked to see defile
between Him and the yawning grave, its passage served to screen.
With eye as grey as lead, with cheek as brown as bronze,
Here where we stand, shall sit and suffer
Louis Onze:
The while from yonder tent parade forth, not — oh, no — Bateleurs, baladines! but range themselves a-row
Those well-sung women-worthies’ whereof loud fame still finds Some echo linger faint, less in our hearts than minds.

XX.

See, Helen! pushed in front o’ the world’s worst night and storm, By Lady Venus’ hand on shoulder: the sweet form Shrinkingly prominent, though mighty, like a moon Outbreaking from a cloud, to put harsh things in tune,
And magically bring mankind to acquiesce
In its own ravage, — call no curse upon, but bless (Beldame, a moment since) the outbreak-ing beauty, now,
That casts o’er all the blood a candour from her brow.
See, Cleopatra! bared, the entire and sinuous wealth
O’ the shining shape; each orb of indolent ripe health,
Captured, just where it finds a fellow-orb as fine
If the body: traced about by jewels which outline, Fire-frame, and keep distinct, perfections — lest they melt

To soft smooth unity ere half their held be felt:

Yet, o’er that white and wonder, a soul’s predominance
I’ the head so high and haught — except one thievish glance,
From back of oblong eye, intent to count the slain.

Hush, — O I know, Elvire! Be patient, more remain!

What say you to Saint . . . Pish! Whatever Saint you please,

Cold-pinnaced aloft o’ the spire, prays calm the seas

From Pornic Church, and oft at midnight (peasants say)

Goes walking out to save from shipwreck:
well she may!

For think how many a year has she been conversant

With nought but winds and rains, sharp 40 courtesy and scant

O’ the wintry snow that coats the penthouse of her shrine,

Covers each knee, climbs near, but spares the smile benign

Which seems to say “I looked for scarce so much from earth!”

She follows, one long thin pure finger in the girth

O’ the girdle — whence the folds of garment, eye and eye,

Besprent with fleurs-de-lys, flow down and multiply

Around her feet, — and one, pressed hushingly to lip:

As if, while thus we made her march, some foundering ship

Might miss her from her post, nearer to God half-way

In heaven, and she inquired “Who that 50 treads earth can pray?

I doubt if even she, the unashamed!
though, sure,

She must have stripped herself only to clothe the poor.”

XXI.

This time, enough’s a feast, not one more form, Elvire!

Provided you allow that, bringing up the rear

O’ the bevy I am loth to — by one bird — curtail,

First note may lead to last, an octave crown the scale,

And this femininity be followed — do not flout! —

By — who concludes the masque with curtsey, smile and pout,

Submissive-mutinous? No other than Fifine

Points toe, imposes haunch. and pleads 60 with tambourine!

XXII.

"Well, what's the meaning here, what does the masque intend,
Which, unabridged, we saw file past us, with no end Of fair ones, till Fifine came, closed the catalogue?"

XXIII.

"Task fancy yet again! Suppose you cast this clog Of flesh away (that weeps, upbraids, withstands my arm)
And pass to join your peers, paragon charm with charm,
As I shall show you may, — prove best of beauty there!
Yourself confront yourself! This, help me to declare That yonder-you, who stand beside these, braving each
And blinking none, beat her who lured to Troy-town beach
The purple prows of Greece, — nay, beat Fifine; whose face, Mark how I will inflame, when seigneurlike I place
I' the tambourine, to spot the strained and piteous blank
Of pleading parchment, see, no less than a whole franc!

XXIV.

Ah, do you mark the brown o' the cloud, made bright with fire Through and through? as, old wiles succeeding to desire,
Quality (you and I) once more compassionate A hapless infant, doomed (fie on such partial fate!) To sink the inborn shame, waive privilege of sex,
And posture as you see, support the nods and becks Of clowns that have their stare, nor always pay its price; An infant born perchance as sensitive and nice
As any soul of you, proud dames, whom destiny Keeps uncontaminate from stigma of the stye
She wallows in! You draw back skirts from filth like her Who, possibly, braves scorn, if, scorned, she minister
To age, want, and disease of parents one or
both;
Nay, peradventure, stoops to degradation,
loth

That some just-budding sister, the dew yet on the rose,
Should have to share in turn the ignoble trade, — who knows?

XXV.

Ay, who indeed! Myself know nothing, but dare guess That off she trips in haste to hand the booty . . . yes,
'Twixt fold and fold of tent, there looms
he, dim-discerned,
The ogre, lord of all those lavish limbs have earned!
— Brute-beast-face, — ravage, scar, scowl and malignancy, — O' the Strong Man, whom (no doubt, her husband) by-and-by You shall behold do feats: lift up nor quail beneath
A quintal¹ in each hand, a cart-wheel
'twixt his teeth.
Oh she prefers sheer strength to ineffective
grace,
Breeding and culture! seeks the essential in the case!
To him has flown my franc; and welcome, if that squint
O' the diabolic eye so soften through absinthe,
That, for once tambourine, tunic and tricot² 'scape
Their customary curse "Not half the gain o' the ape!"
Ay, they go in together!

XXVI.

Yet still her phantom stays Opposite, where you stand: as steady
'neath our gaze —
The live Elvire's and mine — though fancy-stuff and mere Illusion; to be judged, — dream-figures, — without fear Or favour, those the false, by you and me
the true.

XXVII.

"What puts it in my head to make yourself judge you?"
Well, it may be, the name of Helen brought to mind
A certain myth I mused in years long left behind:
How she that fled from Greece with Paris whom she loved,
And came to Troy, and there found shelter and so proved Such cause of the world's woe, — how she, old stories call This creature, Helen's self, never saw Troy at all.

Jove had his fancy-fit, must needs take empty air, Fashion her likeness forth, and set the phantom there I' the midst for sport, to try conclusions with the blind
And blundering race, the game create for Gods, mankind: Experiment on these, — establish who would yearn
To give up life for her, who, other-minded, spurn
The best her eyes could smile, — make half the world sublime, And half absurd, for just a phantom all the
time!
Meanwhile true Helen's self sat, safe and far away,
By a great river-side, beneath a purer day,
With solitude around, tranquillity within;
Was able to lean forth, look, listen, through the din
And stir; could estimate the worthlessness or worth Of Helen who inspired such passion to the earth,
A phantom all the time! That put it in my head,
To make yourself judge you — the phantom-wife instead O' the tearful true Elvire!

XXVIII.

I thank the smile at last

Which thins away the tear! Our sky was overcast,
And something fell; but day clears up: if there chanced rain, The landscape glistens more. I have not vexed in vain Elvire: because she knows, now she has stood the test, How, this and this being good, herself may still be best O' the beauty in review; because the flesh that claimed Unduly my regard, she thought, the taste, she blamed
In me, for things extern, was all mistake, she finds, —
Or will find, when I prove that bodies show me minds, That, through the outward sign, the inward grace allures, And sparks from heaven transpierce earth's coarsest covertures, — All by demonstrating the value of Fifine!

XXIX.

Partake my confidence! No creature's made so mean But that, some way, it boasts, could we investigate,

Its supreme worth: fulfils, by ordinance of fate,
Its momentary task, gets glory all its
own,
Tastes triumph in the world, pre-eminent,
alone.
Where is the single grain of sand, mid millions heaped Confusedly on the beach, but, did we know, has leaped Or will leap, would we wait, i' the century, some once,
To the very throne of things? — earth's brightest for the nonce, When sunshine shall impinge on just that grain's facette Which fronts him fullest, first, returns 40 his ray with jet Of promptest praise, thanks God best in creation's name!
As firm is my belief, quick sense perceives
the same
Self-vindicating flash illustrate every man And woman of our mass, and prove, throughout the plan,
No detail but, in place allotted it, was prime And perfect.

xxx.

Witness her, kept waiting all this time!
What happy angle makes Fifine reverberate Sunshine, least sand-grain, she, of shadiest social state?
No adamantine shield, polished like Helen
there,
Fit to absorb the sun, regorge him till the 50
glare,
Dazing the universe, draw Troy-ward those blind beaks
Of equal-sided ships rowed by the well-greaved Greeks!
No Asian mirror, like yon Ptolemaic witch Able to fix sun fast and tame sun down, enrich,
Not burn the world with beams thus flatteringly rolled
About her, head to foot, turned slavish snakes of gold!
And oh, no tinted pane of oriel sanctity, Does our Fifine afford, such as permits supply
Of lustrous heaven, revealed, far more than mundane sight Could master, to thy cell, pure Saint! 60 where, else too bright, So suits thy sense the orb, that, what outside was noon, Pales, through thy lozenged blue, to meek benefic moon!
What then? does that prevent each dung-hill, we may pass Daily, from boasting too its bit of lookingglass,

Its sherd which, sun-smit, shines, shoots arrowy fire beyond That satin-muffled mope, your sulky diamond?

XXXI.

And now, the mingled ray she shoots, I decompose.
 Her antecedents, take for execrable!
 Gloze
 No whit on your premiss: let be, there was no worst Of degradation spared Fifine: ordained from first To last, in body and soul, for one life-long debauch,
 The Pariah of the North, the European Nautch!
 This, far from seek to hide, she puts in evidence 10 Calmly, displays the brand, bids pry without offence Your finger on the place. You comment
 "Fancy us
 So operated on, maltreated, mangled thus!
 Such torture in our case, had we survived an hour?
 Some other sort of flesh and blood must be, with power Appropriate to the vile, unsensitive, toughthonged,
 In lieu of our fine nerve! Be sure, she was not wronged Too much: you must not think she winced at prick as we!"
 Come, come, that's what you say, or would, were thoughts but free.

XXXII.

Well then, thus much confessed, what wonder if there steal 20 Unchallenged to my heart the force of one appeal
 She makes, and justice stamp the sole claim she asserts?
 So absolutely good is truth, truth never hurts
 The teller, whose worst crime gets somehow grace, avowed.
 To me, that silent pose and prayer proclaimed aloud
 "Know all of me outside, the rest be emptiness For such as you! I call attention to my dress, Coiffure, outlandish features, lithe memorable limbs, Piquant entreaty, all that eye-glance overskims.
 Does this give pleasure? Then, repay the pleasure, put 30 Its price i' the tambourine! Do you seek further? Tut!

I'm just my instrument, — sound hollow:
 mere smooth skin Stretched o'er gilt framework, I: rub-dub, nought else within — Always, for such as you! — if I have use elsewhere, —
 If certain bells, now mute, can jingle, need you care?
 Be it enough, there's truth i' the pleading, which comports
 With no word spoken out in cottages or courts,
 Since all I plead is 'Pay for just the sight
 you see,
 'And give no credit to another charm in
 me!'
 Do I say, like your Love? 'To praise my face is well,
 'But, who would know my worth, must search my heart to tell!'
 Do I say, like your Wife? 'Had I passed in review
 'The produce of the globe, my man of men were — you!'
 Do I say, like your Helen? 'Yield yourself up, obey
 'Implicitly, nor pause to question, to survey
 'Even the worshipful! prostrate you at my shrine!
 'Shall you dare controvert what the world counts divine?
 'Array your private taste, own liking of the
 sense,
 'Own longing of the soul, against the impudence
 'Of history, the blare and bullying of verse?
 'As if man ever yet saw reason to disburse 50 'The amount of what sense liked, soul longed for, — given, devised
 'As love, forsooth, — until the price was recognised
 'As moderate enough by divers fellow-men!
 'Then, with his warrant safe that these would love too, then,
 'Sure that particular gain implies a public
 loss,
 'And that no smile he buys but proves a slash across
 'The face, a stab into the side of somebody —
 'Sure that, along with love's main purchase, he will buy
 'Up the whole stock of earth's uncharit-ableness,
 'Envy and hatred, — then, decides he to profess
 'His estimate of one, by love discerned, though dim
 'To all the world beside: since what's the world to him?'
 Do I say, like your Queen of Egypt?
 'Who foregoes

'My cup of witchcraft — fault be on the fool! He knows
 'Nothing of how I pack my wine-press, turn its winch
 'Three-times-three, all the time to song and dance, nor flinch
 'From charming on and on, till at the last I squeeze
 'Out the exhaustive drop that leaves behind mere lees
 'And dregs, vapidity, thought essence heretofore!
 'Sup of my sorcery, old pleasures please no more!
 'Be great, be good, love, learn, have potency of hand 'Or heart or head, — what boots? You die, nor understand 'What bliss might be in life: you ate the grapes, but knew 'Never the taste of wine, such vintage as I brew!
 Do I say, like your Saint? 'An exquisitest touch
 'Bides in the birth of things: no after-time can much
 'Enhance that fine, that faint, fugitive first of all!
 'What colour paints the cup o' the May-rose, like the small 'Suspicion of a blush which doubtfully begins?
 'What sound outwarbles brook, while, at the source, it wins
 'That moss and stone dispart, allow its bubblings breathe?
 'What taste excels the fruit, just where sharp flavours sheathe
 'Their sting, and let encroach the honey that allays?
 'And so with soul and sense; when sanctity betrays
 'First fear lest earth below seem real as heaven above,
 'And holy worship, late, change soon to sinful love —
 'Where is the plenitude of passion which endures
 'Comparison with that, I ask of amateurs?' Do I say, like Elvire" . . .

XXXIII.

(Your husband holds you fast, Will have you listen, learn your character at last!)
 "Do I say? — like her mixed unrest and discontent, Reproachfulness and scorn, with that submission blent
 So strangely, in the face, by sad smiles and gay tears, —

Quiescence which attacks, rebellion which endears, — Say? 'As you loved me once, could you but love me now!
 'Years probably have graved their passage on my brow,
 'Lips turn more rarely red, eyes sparkle less than erst;
 'Such tribute body pays to time; but, un-amerced,
 'The soul retains, nay, boasts old treasure multiplied.
 'Though — dew-prime flee, — mature at noonday, love defied
 'Chance, the wind, change, the rain: love, strenuous all the more
 'For storm, struck deeper root and choicer fruitage bore,
 'Despite the rocking world; yet truth struck root in vain:
 'While tenderness bears fruit, you praise, not taste again.
 'Why? They are yours, which once were hardly yours, might go 'To grace another's ground: and then — the hopes we know,
 'The fears we keep in mind! — when, ours to arbitrate,
 'Your part was to bow neck, bid fall decree of fate.
 'Then, O the knotty point — white-night's work to revolve —
 'What meant that smile, that sigh? Not Solon's self could solve!
 'Then, O the deep surmise what one word might express,
 'And if what seemed her "No" may not have meant her "Yes!"
 'Then, such annoy, for cause calm welcome, such acquit
 'Of rapture if, refused her arm, hand touched her wrist!
 'Now, what's a smile to you? Poor candle that lights up 'The decent household gloom which sends you out to sup.
 'A tear? worse! warns that health requires you keep aloof
 'From nuptial chamber, since rain penetrates the roof!
 'Soul, body got and gained, inalienably safe
 'Your own, become despised; more worth has any waif
 'Or stray from neighbour's pale: pouch that, — 'tis pleasure, pride,
 'Novelty, property, and larceny beside!
 'Preposterous thought! to find no value fixed in things,
 'To covet all you see, hear, dream of, till fate brings
 'About that, what you want, you gain; then follows change.

'Give you the sun to keep, forthwith must fancy range:
'A goodly lamp, no doubt, — yet might you catch her hair
'And capture, as she frisks, the fen-fire dancing there!
'What do I say? at least a meteor's half in
heaven;
'Provided filth but shine, my husband hankers even
'After putridity that's phosphorescent, cribs
'The rustic's tallow-rush, makes 'spoil of urchins' squibs,
'In short prefers to me — chaste, temperate, serene —
'What sputters green and blue, this fizgig (called Fifine!)''

XXXIV.

10 So all your sex mistake! Strange that so plain a fact Should raise such dire debate! Few families were racked By torture self-supplied, did Nature grant but this —
That women comprehend mental analysis!

XXXV.

Elvire, do you recall when, years ago,
our home
The intimation reached, a certain pride of Rome, Authenticated piece, in the third, last and
best Manner, — whatever fools and connoisseurs contest, —
No particle disturbed by rude restorer's
touch,
The palaced picture-pearl, so long eluding clutch 20 Of creditor, at last, the Rafael might — could we But come to terms — change lord, pass from the Prince to me?
I think you recollect my fever of a year:
How the Prince would, and how he would not; now, — too dear That promise was, he made his grandsire so long since,
Rather to boast "I own a Rafael" than "am Prince!"
And now, the fancy soothed — if really sell he must His birthright for a mess of pottage — such a thrust
I' the vitals of the Prince were mollified by balm,
Could he prevail upon his stomach to bear quail, 30 And bequeath Liberty (because a purchaser

Was ready with the sum — a trifle!) yes, transfer
His heart at all events to that land where,
at least,
Free institutions reign! And so, its price increased Five-fold (Americans are such impor-tunates!), Soon must his Rafael start for the United States.
O alternating bursts of hope now, then
despair!
At last, the bargain's struck, I'm all but beggared, there
The Rafael faces me, in fine, no dream at
all,
My housemate, evermore to glorify my
wall.
A week must pass, before heart-palpitations sink,
In gloating o'er my gain, so late I edged the brink
Of doom; a fortnight more, I spent in Paradise:
"Was outline e'er so true, could colouring entice
So calm, did harmony and quiet so avail?
How right, how resolute, the action tells the tale!"
A month, I bid my friends congratulate their best:
"You happy Don!" (to me): "The block-head!" (to the rest):
"No doubt he thinks his daub original, poor dupe!"
Then I resume my life: one chamber must not coop Man's life in, though it boast a marvel like my prize.
Next year, I saunter past with unaverted
eyes, Nay, loll and turn my back: perchance to overlook
With relish, leaf by leaf, Doré's last picture-book.

XXXVI.

Imagine that a voice reproached me from its frame:
"Here do I hang, and may! Your Rafael,
just the same,
'Tis only you that change: no ecstasies of
yore!
No purposed suicide distracts you any
more!"
Prompt would my answer meet such frivolous attack:
"You misappropriate sensations. What men lack,
And labour to obtain, is hoped and feared 6
about
After a fashion; what they once obtain, makes doubt,

Expectancy's old fret and fume, henceforward void.
But do they think to hold such havings unalloyed
By novel hopes and fears, of fashion just as new,
To correspond i' the scale? Nowise, I promise you!
Mine you are, therefore mine will be, as fit to cheer
My soul and glad my sense to-day as this-day-year.
So, any sketch or scrap, pochade,¹ carica-
ture, Made in a moment, meant a moment to endure,
I snap at, seize, enjoy, then tire of, throw
aside, to Find you in your old place. But if a servant cried
'Fire in the gallery!' — methinks, were I engaged In Doré, elbow-deep, picture-books million-paged
To the four winds would pack, sped by the heartiest curse
Was ever launched from lip, to strew the universe.
Would not I brave the best o' the burning, bear away Either my perfect piece in safety, or else
stay
And share its fate, be made its martyr nor repine?
Inextricably wed, such ashes mixed with mine!"

XXXVII

For which I get the eye, the hand, the heart, the whole so O' the wondrous wife again!

XXXVIII.

But no, play out your rôle
I' the pageant! 'Tis not fit your phantom leave the stage:
I want you, there, to make you, here, confess you wage Successful warfare, pique those proud ones, and advance Claim to . . . equality? nay, but predominance.
In physique, o'er them all, where Helen heads the scene
Closed by its tiniest of tail-tips, pert Fifine.
How ravishingly pure you stand in pale constraint!
My new-created shape, without or touch or taint,
Inviolate of life and worldliness and sin — so Vettered, I hold my flower, her own cup's weight would win

From off the tall slight stalk atop of which she turns And trembles, makes appeal to one who roughly earns Her thanks instead of blame, (did lily only
know,)
By thus constraining length of lily, letting snow
Of cup-crown, that's her face, look from its guardian stake, Superb on all that crawls beneath, and mutely make Defiance, with the mouth's white movement of disdain,
To all that stoops, retires and hovers round
again!
How windingly the limbs delay to lead up,
reach
Where, crowned, the head waits calm: as 49
if reluctant, each,
That eye should traverse quick such lengths of loveliness, From feet, which just are found embedded in the dress Deep swathed about with folds and flowings virginal,
Up to the pleated breasts, rebellious 'neath their pall,
As if the vesture's snow were moulding sleep not death, Must melt and so release; whereat, from the fine sheath,
The flower-cup-crown starts free, the face is unconcealed,
And what shall now divert me, once the sweet face revealed,
From all I loved so long, so lingeringly left?

XXXIX.

Because indeed your face fits into just 50 the left O' the heart of me, Elvire, makes right and whole once more All that was half itself without you! As
before,
My truant finds its place! Doubtlessly sea-shells yearn, If plundered by sad chance: would pray their pearls return, Let negligently slip away into the wave!
Never may eyes desist, those eyes so grey and grave,
From their slow sure supply of the effluent soul within!
And, would you humour me? I dare to ask, unpin
The web of that brown hair! O'erwash o' the sudden, but As promptly, too, disclose, on either side. 51
the jut
Of alabaster brow! So part rich rillet dyed

Deep by the woodland leaf, when down they pour, each side O' the rock-top, pushed by Spring!

XI.

"And where i' the world is all This wonder, you detail so trippingly, espied?
My mirror would reflect a tall, thin, pale, deep-eyed Personage, pretty once, it may be, doubtless still Löving, — a certain grace yet lingers, if you will, —
But all this wonder, where?"

XII.

Why, where but in the sense And soul of me, Art's judge? Art is my evidence
That something was, is, might be; but no more thing itself, 10 Than flame is fuel. Once the verse-book laid on shelf,
The picture turned to wall, the music fled from ear, —
Each beauty, born of each, grows clearer and more clear,
Mine henceforth, ever mine!

XIII.

But if I would retrace Effect, in Art, to cause, — corroborate, erase What's right or wrong i' the lines, test fancy in my brain
By fact which gave it birth? I re-pruse
in vain
The verse, I fail to find that vision of de-
light
I' the Bazzi's¹ lost-profile, eye-edge so exquisite.
And, music: what? that burst of pillared cloud by day 20 And pillared fire by night, was product, must we say,
Of modulating just, by enharmonic
change, —
The augmented sixth resolved, — from out the straighter range Of D sharp minor, — leap of disimprisoned thrall, —
Into thy light and life, D major natural?

XIII.

Elvire, will you partake in what I shall impart?
I seem to understand the way heart chooses
heart
By help of the outside form, — a reason for our wild

Diversity in choice, — why each grows reconciled
To what is absent, what superfluous in the mask
Of flesh that's meant to yield, — did na- 34 ture ply her task As artist should, — precise the features of the soul,
Which, if in any case they found expression, whole
I' the traits, would give a type, undoubtedly display
A novel, true, distinct perfection in its way.
Never shall I believe any two souls were
made Similar; granting, then, each soul of every grade
Was meant to be itself, prove in itself complete
And, in completion, good, — nay, best o' the kind, — as meet Needs must it be that show on the outside correspond With inward substance, — flesh, the dress 40 which soul has donned, Exactly reproduce, — were only justice
done
Inside and outside too, — types perfect every one.
How happens it that here we meet a mystery
Insoluble to man, a plaguy puzzle? Why Each soul is either made imperfect, and deserves
As rude a face to match; or else a bungler swerves,
And nature, on a soul worth rendering
aright,
Works ill, or proves perverse, or, in her own despite,
— Here too much, there too little, — bids each face, more or less, Retire from beauty, make approach to 50 ugliness?
And yet succeeds the same: since, what is wanting to success, If somehow every face, no matter how deform,
Evidence, to some one of hearts on earth, that, warm Beneath the veriest ash, there hides a spark of soul Which, quickened by love's breath, may yet pervade the whole O' the grey, and, free again, be fire? — of worth the same, How'er produced, for, great or little,
flame is flame.
A mystery, whereof solution is to seek.

XIV.

I find it in the fact that each soul, just as weak

Its own way as its fellow, — departure from design
As flagrant in the flesh, — goes striving to combine
With what shall right the wrong, the under or above
The standard: supplement unloveliness by
love.
— Ask Plato else! And this corroborates the sage,
That Art, — which I may style the love of loving, rage
Of knowing, seeing, feeling the absolute truth of things
For truth's sake, whole and sole, not any good, truth brings The knower, seer, feeler, beside, — instinctive Art Must fumble for the whole, once fixing on
a part However poor, surpass the fragment, and aspire
To reconstruct thereby the ultimate entire.
Art, working with a will, discards the superflux,
Contributes to defect, toils on till, — fiat lux, —
There's the restored, the prime, the individual type!

XLV.

Look, for example now! This piece of broken pipe (Some shipman's solace erst) shall act as crayon; and What tablet better serves my purpose than the sand?
— Smooth slab whereon I draw, no matter with what skill,
A face, and yet another, and yet another
still.
There lie my three prime types of beauty!

XLVI.

Laugh your best!
"Exaggeration and absurdity?" Confessed!
Yet, what may that face mean, no matter for its nose,
A yard long, or its chin, a foot short?

XLVII.

"You suppose, Horror?" Exactly! What's the odds if, more or less
By yard or foot, the features do manage to express Such meaning in the main? Were I of Gérôme's force, Nor feeble as you see, quick should my crayon course O'er outline, curb, excite, till, — so completion speeds

With Gérôme¹ well at work, — observe 30
how brow recedes, Head shudders back on spine, as if one hailed the hair, Would have the full-face front what pinpoint eye's sharp stare Announces; mouth agape to drink the flowing fate, While chin protrudes to meet the burst o'
the wave: elate Almost, spurred on to brave necessity, expend
All life left, in one flash, as fire does at its
end.
Retrenchment and addition effect a master-
piece,
Not change i' the motive: here diminish, there increase —
And who wants Horror, has it.

XLVIII.

Who wants some other show Of soul, may seek elsewhere — this second 40 of the row?
What does it give for germ, monadic mere intent
Of mind in face, faint first of meanings ever meant?
Why, possibly, a grin, that, strengthened, grows a laugh;
That, softened, leaves a smile; that,
tempered, bids you quaff At such a magic cup as English Reynolds
once Compounded: for the witch pulls out of you response Like Garrick's to Thalia, however due
may be
Your homage claimed by that stiff-stoled Melpomene!

XLIX.

And just this one face more! Pardon the bold pretence!
May there not lurk some hint, struggle 50 toward evidence In that compressed mouth, those strained nostrils, steadfast eyes
Of utter passion, absolute self-sacrifice, Which, — could I but subdue the wild grotesque, refine That bulge of brow, make blunt that nose's aquiline,
And let, although compressed, a point of pulp appear I' the mouth, — would give at last the portrait of Elvire?

L.

Well, and if so succeed hand-practice on awry Preposterous art-mistake, shall soul-proficiency

* Modern French painter.

Despair, — when exercised on nature, which at worst Always implies success, however crossed and curst
 By failure, — such as art would emulate
 in vain?
 Shall any soul despair of setting free
 again
 Trait after trait, until the type as wholly start Forth, visible to sense, as that minutest
 part,
 (Whatever the chance) which first arresting eye, warned soul That, under wrong enough and ravage, lay the whole
 O' the loveliness it "loved" — I take the accepted phrase?

LI.

So I account for tastes: each chooses, none gainsays
 The fancy of his fellow, a paradise for
 him,
 A hell for all beside. You can but crown the brim
 O' the cup; if it be full, what matters less or more?
 Let each, i' the world, amend his love, as I, o' the shore
 My sketch, and the result as undisputed
 be!
 Their handiwork to them, and my Elvire
 to me:
 — Result more beautiful than beauty's self, when lo,
 What was my Rafael turns my Michel-agnolo!

LII.

For, we two boast, beside our pearl, a diamond.
 I' the palace-gallery, the corridor beyond, Upheaves itself a marble, a magnitude man-shaped As snow might be. One hand, — the Master's, — smoothed and scraped That mass, he hammered on and hewed at, till he hurled Life out of death, and left a challenge: for
 the world,
 Death still, — since who shall dare, close to the image, say If this be purposed Art, or mere mimetic
 play
 Of Nature? — wont to deal with crag or cloud, as stuff
 To fashion novel forms, like forms we know, enough For recognition, but enough unlike the
 same,
 To leave no hope ourselves may profit by her game;

Death therefore to the world. Step back a pace or two!
 And then, who dares dispute the gradual birth its due
 Of breathing life, or breathless immortality,
 Where out she stands, and yet stops short,
 half bold, half shy, Hesitates on the threshold of things, since partly blent
 With stuff she needs must quit, her native element
 I' the mind o' the Master, — what's the creature, dear-divine Yet earthly-awful too, so manly-feminine, Pretends this white advance? What startling brain-escape
 Of Michelagnolo takes elemental shape?
 I think he meant the daughter of the old man o' the sea, Emerging from her wave, goddess
 Eidotheé —
 She who, in elvish sport, spite with benevolence Mixed Mab-wise up, must needs instruct the Hero whence Salvation dawns o'er that mad misery of his isle.
 Yes, she imparts to him, by what a pranksome wile
 He may surprise her sire, asleep beneath a rock,
 When he has told their tale, amid his webfoot flock Of sea-beasts, "fine fat seals with bitter breath!" laughs she
 At whom she likes to save, no less:
 Eidotheé,
 Whom you shall never face evolved, in earth, in air,
 In wave; but, manifest i' the soul's domain, why, there She ravishingly moves to meet you, all through aid
 O' the soul! Bid shine what should, dismiss into the shade What should not be, — and there triumphs the paramount Emprise o' the Master! But, attempt to make account
 Of what the sense, without soul's help, perceives? I bought That work — (despite plain proof, whose hand it was had wrought I' the rough: I think we trace the tool of triple tooth, Here, there and everywhere) — bought dearly that uncouth Unwieldy bulk, for just ten dollars —
 "Bulk, would fetch — Converted into lime — some five pauls!" grinned a wretch.

Who, bound on business, paused to hear the bargaining,
And would have pitied me "but for the fun o' the thing!"

LIII.

Shall such a wretch be — you? Must — while I show Elvire Shaming all other forms, seen as I see her
here
I' the soul, — this other-you perversely look outside,
And ask me, "Where i' the world is charm to be described
I' the tall thin personage, with paled eye, pensive face,
Any amount of love, and some remains of
grace?"
See yourself in my soul!

LIV.

And what a world for each Must somehow be i' the soul, — accept that mode of speech, — Whether an aura gird the soul, wherein it seems
To float and move, a belt of all the glints and gleams
It struck from out that world, its weaklier fellows found So dead and cold; or whether these not so much surround, As pass into the soul itself, add worth to
worth,
As wine enriches blood, and straightway send it forth, Conquering and to conquer, through all eternity,
That's battle without end.

LV.

I search but cannot see What purpose serves the soul that strives, or world it tries Conclusions with, unless the fruit of victories Stay, one and all, stored up and guaranteed its own
For ever, by some mode whereby shall be made known The gain of every life. Death reads the title clear — What each soul for itself conquered from out things here: Since, in the seeing soul, all worth lies, I assert, —
And nought i' the world, which, save for soul that sees, inert Was, is, and would be ever, — stuff for transmuting, — null And void until man's breath evoke the beautiful —

But, touched aright, prompt yields each particle its tongue Of elemental flame, — no matter whence flame sprung
From gums and spice, or else from straw and rottenness,
So long as soul has power to make them burn, express What lights and warms henceforth, leaves only ash behind, Howe'er the chance: if soul be privileged to find Food so soon that, by first snatch of eye, suck of breath,
It can absorb pure life: or, rather, meeting
death
I' the shape of ugliness, by fortunate recoil
So put on its resource, it find therein a foil For a new birth of life, the challenged soul's response To ugliness and death, — creation for the 44
nonce.

LVI.

I gather heart through just such conquests of the soul, Through evocation out of that which, on
the whole,
Was rough, ungainly, partial accomplishment, at best,
And — what, at worst, save failure to spit at and detest? — — Through transference of all, achieved in visible things,
To where, secured from wrong, rest soul's imaginings — Through ardour to bring help just where completion halts, Do justice to the purpose, ignore the slips and faults —
And, last, through waging with deformity a fight Which wrings thence, at the end, precise its 50
opposite.
I praise the loyalty o' the scholar, — stung by taunt
Of fools "Does this evince thy Master men so vaunt?
Did he then perpetrate the plain abortion
here?"
Who cries "His work am I! full fraught by him, I clear His fame from each result of accident and
time,
Myself restore his work to its fresh morning-prime,
Not daring touch the mass of marble,
fools deride,
But putting my idea in plaster by its
side,
His, since mine; I, he made, vindicate who made me!"

LVIII.

For, you must know, I too achieved
Eidotheé,
In silence and by night — dared justify the lines
Plain to my soul, although, to sense, that triple-time's Achievement halt half-way, break down, or leave a blank.
If she stood forth at last, the Master was to thank!
Yet may there not have smiled approval in his eyes —
That one at least was left who, born to recognise Perfection in the piece imperfect, worked,
that night,
In silence, such his faith, until the apposite 10 Design was out of him, truth palpable
once more?
And then, — for at one blow, its fragments strewed the floor, — Recalled the same to live within his soul as heretofore.

LVIII.

And, even as I hold and have Eidotheé, I say, I cannot think that gain, — which would not be Except a special soul had gained it, — that such gain
Can ever be estranged, do aught but ap-pertain Immortally, by right firm, indefeasible, To who performed the feat, through God's grace and man's will!
Gain, never shared by those who practised with earth's stuff, 20 And spoiled whate'er they touched, leaving its roughness rough,
Its blankness bare, and, when the ugliness opposed, Either struck work or laughed "He doted or he dozed"

LIX.

While, oh, how all the more will love become intense Hereafter, when "to love" means yearning to dispense,
Each soul, its own amount of gain through its own mode Of practising with life, upon some soul which owed
Its treasure, all diverse and yet in worth
the same,
To new work and changed way! Things furnish you rose-flame, Which burn up red, green, blue, nay, yellow more than needs.
30 For me, I nowise doubt: why doubt a time succeeds

When each one may impart, and each receive, both share
The chemic secret, learn, — where I lit force, why there.
You drew forth lambent pity, — where I found only food For self-indulgence, you still blew a spark it brood
I the greyest ember, stopped not till self-sacrifice imbued Heaven's face with flame? What joy, when each may supplement
The other, changing each as changed, till, wholly blent,
Our old things shall be new, and, what we both ignite,
Fuse, lose the varicolour in achromatic
white!
Exemplifying law, apparent even now In the eternal progress, — love's law, 40 which I avow
And thus would formulate: each soul lives, longs and works For itself, by itself, — because a lodestar
lurks,
An other than itself, — in whatsoe'er the niche
Of mistiest heaven it hide, whoe'er the Glimdaldich
May grasp the Gulliver: or it, or he, or she —
*Theosutos e broteios eper kekramene,*¹ — (For fun's sake, where the phrase has fastened, leave it fixed!
So soft it says, — "God, man, or both together mixed"!)
This, guessed at through the flesh, by 50 parts which prove the whole, This constitutes the soul discernible by
soul
— Elvire, by me!

LX.

"And then" — (pray you, permit remain
This hand upon my arm! — your cheek dried, if you deign, Choosing my shoulder) — "then" — (Stand up for, boldly state The objection in its length and breadth!)
"you abdicate,
With least yet on your lip, soul's empire, and accept
The rule of sense: the Man, from mon-arch's throne has stepped — Leapt, rather, at one bound, to base, and there lies, Brute.
You talk of soul, — how soul, in search 60
of soul to suit, Must needs review the sex, the army, rank and file
Of womankind, report no face nor form so vile

But that a certain worth, by certain signs, may thence Evolve itself and stand confessed — to soul — by sense.
 Sense? Oh, the loyal bee endeavours for the hive!
 Disinterested hunts the flower-field through, alive
 Not one mean moment, no, — suppose on flower he light, —
 To his peculiar drop, petal-dew per-quisite,
 Matter-of-course snatched snack: unless he taste, how try?
 This, light on tongue-tip laid, allows him pack his thigh, Transport all he counts prize, provision for the comb,
 Food for the future day, — a banquet, but
 at home!
 Soul? Ere you reach Fifine's, some flesh may be to pass!
 That bombed brow, that eye, a kindling chrysopras, Beneath its stiff black lash, inquisitive how speeds
 Each functionary limb, how play of foot
 succeeds,
 And how you let escape or duly sympathise With gastroknemian¹ grace, — true, your soul tastes and tries,
 And trifles time with these, but, fear not,
 will arrive
 At essence in the core, bring honey home to hive, Brain-stock and heart-stuff both — to strike objectors dumb — Since only soul affords the soul fit pabulum!
 Be frank for charity! Who is it you deceive —
 Yourself or me or God, with all this make-believe?"

LXI.

And frank I will respond as you interrogate.
 Ah, Music, wouldst thou help! Words struggle with the weight So feebly of the False, thick element between
 Our soul, the True, and Truth! which,
 but that intervene False shows of things, were reached as easily by thought Reducible to word, as now by yearnings
 wrought
 Up with thy fine free force, oh Music, that canst thrid,
 Electrically win a passage through the lid Of earthly sepulchre, our words may push against,

¹ Pertaining to the calf of the leg.

Hardly transpierce as thou! Not dissipate, thou deign'st, So much as tricksily elude what words attempt
 To heave away, i' the mass, and let the soul, exempt
 From all that vapoury obstruction, view, instead
 Of glimmer underneath, a glory overhead.
 Not feebly, like our phrase, against the barrier go In suspirative swell the authentic notes I
 know,
 By help whereof, I would our souls were found without The pale, above the dense and dim which breeds the doubt!
 But Music, dumb for you, withdraws her help from me;
 And, since to weary words recourse again
 must be,
 At least permit they rest their burthen here
 and there, Music-like: cover space! My answer, — need you care
 If it exceed the bounds, reply to questioning
 You never meant should plague? Once fairly on the wing, Let me flap far and wide!

LXII.

For this is just the time,
 The place, the mood in you and me, when all things chime.
 Clash forth life's common chord, whence, list how there ascend Harmonics far and faint, till our perception end, — Reverberated notes whence we construct the scale
 Embracing what we know and feel and are! How fail To find or, better, lose your question, in this quick Reply which nature yields, ample and catholic?
 For, arm in arm, we two have reached,
 nay, passed, you see,
 The village-precinct; sun sets mild on Sainte Marie —
 We only catch the spire, and yet I seem to
 know What's hid i' the turn o' the hill: how all the graves must glow Soberly, as each warms its little iron cross,
 Flourished about with gold, and graced (if private loss Be fresh) with stiff rope-wreath of yellow crisp bead-blooms
 Which tempt down birds to pay their supper, mid the tombs,

With prattle good as song, amuse the dead
awhile,
If couched they hear beneath the matted camomile!

LXIII.

Bid them good-bye before last friend has sung and supped!
Because we pick our path and need our eyes, — abrupt Descent enough, — but here's the beach, and there's the bay,
And, opposite, the streak of Île Noirmoutier.
Thither the waters tend; they freshen as they haste,
At feel o' the night-wind, though, by cliff and cliff embraced,
This breadth of blue retains its self-possession still;
10 As you and I intend to do, who take our fill Of sights and sounds — soft sound, the countless hum and skip Of insects we disturb, and that good fellowship
Of rabbits our foot-fall sends huddling, each to hide
He best knows how and where; and what whirred past, wings wide?
That was an owl, their young may justlier apprehend!
Though you refuse to speak, your beating heart, my friend, I feel against my arm, — though your bent head forbids
A look into your eyes, yet, on my cheek, their lids
That ope and shut, soft send a silken thrill
the same.
20 Well, out of all and each these nothings, comes — what came Often enough before, the something that would aim Once more at the old mark: the impulse to at last Succeed where hitherto was failure in the
past,
And yet again essay the adventure.
Clearlier sings
No bird to its couched corpse "Into the truth of things —
Out of their falseness rise, and reach thou, and remain!"

LXIV.

"That rise into the true out of the false — explain?"
May an example serve? In yonder bay I bathed,
This sunny morning: swam my best, then hung, half swathed 30 With chill, and half with warmth, i' the channel's midmost deep:

You know how one — not treads, but stands in water? Keep Body and limbs below, hold head back, uplift chin,
And, for the rest, leave care! If brow, eyes, mouth, should win Their freedom, — excellent! If they must brook the surge,
No matter though they sink, let but the nose emerge.
So, all of me in brine lay soaking: did I
care
One jot? I kept alive by man's due breath of air
I' the nostrils, high and dry. At times, o'er these would run The ripple, even wash the wavelet, — morning's sun Tempted advance, no doubt: and always 40 flash of froth, Fish-outbreak, bubbling by, would find me nothing loth
To rise and look around; then all was overswept With dark and death at once. But trust the old adept!
Back went again the head, a merest motion
made,
Fin-fashion, either hand, and nostril soon conveyed Assurance light and life were still in reach as erst:
Always the last and, — wait and watch, — sometimes the first.
Try to ascend breast-high? wave arms wide free of tether?
Be in the air and leave the water altogether?
Under went all again, till I resigned myself 50 To only breathe the air, that's footed by an elf,
And only swim the water, that's native to a fish.
But there is no denying that, ere I curbed my wish,
And schooled my restive arms, salt entered mouth and eyes Often enough — sun, sky, and air so tantalise!
Still, the adept swims, this accorded, that denied;
Can always breathe, sometimes see and be satisfied!

LXV.

I liken to this play o' the body, — fruitless strife
To slip the sea and hold the heaven, — my spirit's life
'Twixt false, whence it would break, and 60 true, where it would bide.
I move in, yet resist, am upborne every
side
By what I beat against, an element too gross

To live in, did not soul duly obtain her dose
Of life-breath, and inhale from truth's pure plenitude Above her, snatch and gain enough to just illude
With hope that some brave bound may baffle evermore
The obstructing medium, make who swam henceforward soar:
— Gain scarcely snatched when, foiled by the very effort, sowse, Underneath ducks the soul, her truthward yearnings dowse Deeper in falsehood I ay, but fitted less and
less
To bear in nose and mouth old briny bitterness Proved alien more and more: since each experience proves Air — the essential good, not sea, wherein who moves Must thence, in the act, escape, apart from will or wish.
Move a mere hand to take waterweed, jelly-fish, Upward you tend! And yet our business with the sea
Is not with air, but just o' the water, watery:
We must endure the false, no particle of
which Do we acquaint us with, but up we mount a pitch Above it, find our head reach truth, while hands explore The false below: so much while here we bathe, — no more!

LXVI.

Now, there is one prime point (hear and be edified!)
One truth more true for me than any truth
beside —
To-wit, that I am I, who have the power to swim,
The skill to understand the law whereby each limb May bear to keep immersed, since, in return, made sure That its mere movement lifts head clean through coverture.
By practice with the false, I reach the true?
Why, thence It follows, that the more I gain self-confidence,
Get proof I know the trick, can float, sink, rise, at will,
The better I submit to what I have the skill To conquer in my turn, even now, and by and by Leave wholly for the land, and there laugh, shake me dry

To last drop, saturate with noonday — no need more Of wet and fret, plagued once: on Pornic's placid shore, Abundant air to breathe, sufficient sun
to feel!
Meantime I buoy myself: no whit my senses reel
When over me there breaks a billow; nor, elate
Too much by some brief taste, I quaff intemperate
The air, o'ertop breast-high the wave-environment.
Full well I know the thing I grasp, as if intent
To hold, — my wandering wave, will not be grasped at all:
The solid-seeming grasped, the handful great or small Must go to nothing, glide through fingers fast enough;
But none the less, to treat liquidity as
stuff —
Though failure — certainly succeeds beyond its aim,
Sends head above, past thing that hands miss, all the same.

LXVII.

So with this wash o' the world, wherein life-long we drift; We push and paddle through the foam by making shift
To breathe above at whiles when, after deepest duck Down underneath the show, we put forth hand and pluck
At what seems somehow like reality — 50 a soul.
I catch at this and that, to capture and control, Presume I hold a prize, discover that my pains
Are run to nought: my hands are baulked, my head regains
The surface where I breathe and look about, a space.
The soul that helped me mount? Swallowed up in the race O' the tide, come who knows whence, gone gaily who knows where!
I thought the prize was mine; I flattered myself there.
It did its duty, though: I felt it, it felt me, Or, where I look about and breathe, I should not be.
The main point is — the false fluidity was 60
bound Acknowledge that it frothed o'er substance, nowise found Fluid, but firm and true. Man, outcast, "howls," — at rods? —

If "sent in playful spray a-shivering to his gods!"

Childishest childe, man makes thereby no bad exchange.

Stay with the flat-fish, thou! We like the upper range

Where the "gods" live, perchance the dæmons also dwell:

Where operates a Power, which every throb and swell

Of human heart invites that human soul approach,

"Sent" near and nearer still, however "spray" encroach

On "shivering" flesh below, to altitudes, which gained,

Evil proves good, wrong right, obscurity explained,

10 And "howling" childishness. Whose howl have we to thank,

If all the dogs'gan bark and puppies whine, till sank

Each yelpers' tail 'twixt legs? for Huntsman Common-sense

Came to the rescue, bade prompt thwack of thong dispense

Quiet i' the kennel; taught that ocean might be blue,

And rolling and much more, and yet the soul have, too,

Its touch of God's own flame, which He may so expand

"Who measured the waters i' the hollow of His hand"

That ocean's self shall dry, turn dew-drop in respect

20 Of all-triumphant fire, matter with intellect Once fairly matched; bade him who egged on hounds to bay,

Go curse, i' the poultry yard, his kind: "there let him lay"¹

The swan's one addled egg: which yet shall put to use,

Rub breast-bone warm against, so many a sterile goose!

LXVIII.

No, I want sky not sea, prefer the larks to shrimps,

And never dive so deep but that I get a glimpse

O' the blue above, a breath of the air around. Elvire,

I seize — by catching at the melted beryl here,

The tawny hair that just has trickled off, — Fifiue!

Did not we two trip forth to just enjoy the scene,

30 The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers on their stage,

Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage —

Dabble, and there an end, with foam and froth o'er face,

Till suddenly Fifiue suggested change of place?

Now we taste æther, scorn the wave, and interchange apace

No ordinary thoughts, but such as evidence

The cultivated mind in both. On what pretence

Are you and I to sneer at who lent help to hand,

And gave the lucky lift?

LXIX.

Still sour? I understand!

One ugly circumstance discredits my fair plan —

That Woman does the work: I waive the help of Man.

"Why should experiment be tried with only waves,

When solid spars float round? Still some Thalassia saves

Too pertinaciously, as though no Triton, bluff

As e'er blew brine from conch, were free to help enough!

Surely, to recognise a man, his mates serve best!

Why is there not the same or greater interest

In the strong spouse as in the pretty partner, pray,

Were recognition just your object, as you say,

Amid this element o' the false?"

LXX.

We come to terms.

I need to be proved true; and nothing so confirms

One's faith in the prime point that one's alive, not dead,

In all Descents to Hell whereof I ever read, As when a phantom there, male enemy or friend,

Or merely stranger-shade, is struck, is forced suspend

His passage: "You that breathe, along with us the ghosts?"

Here, why must it be still a woman that accosts?

LXXI.

Because, one woman's worth, in that respect, such hairy hosts

Of the other sex and sort! Men? Say you have the power

To make them yours, rule men, throughout life's little hour.

According to the phrase; what follows?

Men, you make,

By ruling them, your own: each man for his own sake

Accepts you as his guide, avails him of what worth

He apprehends in you to sublimate his earth

With fire: content, if so you convoy him through night,

That you shall play the sun, and he, the satellite,

Pilfer your light and heat and virtue, starry pelf,

While, caught up by your course, he turns upon himself.

Women rush into you, and there remain absorbed.

10 Beside, 'tis only men completely formed, full-orbed,

Are fit to follow track, keep pace, illustrate so

The leader: any sort of woman may bestow Her atom on the star, or clod she counts for such, —

Each little making less bigger by just that much.

Women grow you, while men depend on you at best.

And what dependence! Bring and put him to the test,

Your specimen disciple, a handbreadth separate

From you, he almost seemed to touch before! Abate

Complacency you will, I judge, at what's divulged!

20 Some flabbiness you fixed, some vacancy outbulged,

Some — much — nay, all, perhaps, the outward man's your work:

But, inside man? — find him wherever he may lurk,

And where's a touch of you in his true self?

LXXII.

I wish

Some wind would waft this way a glassy bubble-fish

O' the kind the sea inflates, and show you, once detached

From wave . . . or no, the event is better told than watched:

Still may the thing float free, globose and opaline

All over, save where just the amethysts combine

To blue their best, rim-round the sea-flower with a tinge

30 Earth's violet never knew! Well, 'neath that gem-tipped fringe,

A head lurks — of a kind — that acts as stomach too;

Then comes the emptiness which out the water blew

So big and belly-like, but, dry of water drained,

Withers away nine-tenths. Ah, but a tenth remained!

That was the creature's self: no more akin to sea,

Poor rudimental head and stomach, you agree,

Than sea's akin to sun who yonder dips his edge.

LXXIII.

But take the rill which ends a race o'er yonder ledge

O' the fissured cliff, to find its fate in smoke below!

Disengage that, and ask — what news of 40 life, you know

It led, that long lone way, through pasture, plain and waste?

All's gone to give the seal no touch of earth, no taste

Of air, reserved to tell how rushes used to bring

The butterfly and bee, and fisher-bird that's king

O' the purple kind, about the snow-soft silver-sweet

Infant of mist and dew; only these atoms fleet,

Embittered evermore, to make the sea one drop

More big thereby — if thought keep count where sense must stop.

LXXIV.

The full-blown ingrate, mere recipient of the brine,

That takes all and gives nought, is Man; 50 the feminine

Rillet that, taking all and giving nought in turn,

Goes headlong to her death i' the sea, without concern

For the old inland life, snow-soft and silver-clear,

That's woman — typified from Fifine to Elvire.

LXXV.

Then, how diverse the modes prescribed to who would deal

With either kind of creature! 'Tis Man, you seek to seal

Your very own? Resolve, for first step, to discard

Nine-tenths of what you are! To make, you must be marred, —

To raise your race, must stoop, — to teach them aught, must learn

Ignorance, meet half-way what most you 60 hope to spurn

I' the sequel. Change yourself, dissimulate the thought And vulgarise the word, and see the deed be brought To look like nothing done with any such intent
 As teach men — though perchance it teach, by accident!
 So may you master men: assured that if you show
 One point of mastery, departure from the low And level, — head or heart-revolt at long disguise, Immurement, stifling soul in mediocrities, —
 If inadvertently a gesture, much more, word 10 Reveal the hunter no companion for the herd, His chance of capture's gone. Success means, they may snuff, Examine, and report, — a brother, sure enough, Disports him in brute-guise; for skin is truly skin, Horns, hoofs are hoofs and horns, and all, outside and in,
 Is veritable beast, whom fellow-beasts resigned
 May follow, made a prize in honest pride, behind
 One of themselves and not creation's upstart lord!
 Well, there's your prize i' the pound — much joy may it afford My Indian! Make survey and tell me, — was it worth 20 You acted part so well, went all-fours upon earth
 The live-long day, brayed, belled, and all to bring to pass That stags should deign eat hay when winter stints them grass?

LXXVI.

So much for men, and how disguise may make them mind
 Their master. But you have to deal with womankind?
 Abandon stratagem for strategy! Cast quite The vile disguise away, try truth clean-opposite Such creep-and-crawl, stand forth all man and, might it chance, Somewhat of angel too! — whate'er inheritance, Actual on earth, in heaven prospective, be your boast, 1 Lay claim to! Your best self revealed at uttermost, — That's the wise way o' the strong! And e'en should falsehood tempt

The weaker sort to swerve, — at least the lie's exempt From slur, that's loathlier still, of aiming to debase Rather than elevate its object. Mimic grace, Not make deformity your mask! Be sick by stealth, Nor traffic with disease — malingering in health!
 No more of: "Countrymen, I boast me one like you — My lot, the common strength, the common weakness too!
 I think the thoughts you think; and if I have the knack Of fitting thoughts to words, you peradventure lack, Envy me not the chance, yourselves more fortunate!
 Many the loaded ship self-sunk through treasure-freight, Many the pregnant brain brought never child to birth,
 Many the great heart broke beneath its girdle-girth!
 Be mine the privilege to supplement defect, Give dumbness voice, and let the labouring intellect Find utterance in word, or possibly in deed!
 What though I seem to go before? 'tis you that lead!
 I follow what I see so plain — the general mind Projected pillar-wise, flame kindled by the 50 kind,
 Which dwarfs the unit — me — to insignificance!
 Halt you, I stop forthwith, — proceed, I too advance!"

LXXVII.

Ay, that's the way to take with men you wish to lead, Instruct and benefit. Small prospect you succeed With women so! Be all that's great and good and wise, August, sublime — swell out your frog the right ox-size — He's buoyed like a balloon, to soar, not burst, you'll see!
 The more you prove yourself, less fear the prize will flee
 The captor. Here you start after no pompous stag Who condescends be snared, with toss of 60 horn, and brag Of bray, and ramp of hoof; you have not to subdue
 The foe through letting him imagine he snares you!
 'Tis rather with . . .

LXXVIII.

Ah, thanks! quick!—

where the dipping disk

Shows red against the rise and fall o' the fin! there frisk

In shoal the — porpoises? Dolphins, they shall and must

Cut through the freshening clear — dolphins, my instance just!

'Tis fable, therefore truth: who has to do with these,

Needs never practise trick of going hands and knees

As beasts require. Art fain the fish to captivate?

Gather thy greatness round, Arion! Stand in state,

As when the banqueting thrilled conscious — like a rose

10 Throughout its hundred leaves at that approach it knows

Of music in the bird — while Corinth grew one breast

A-throb for song and thee; nay, Periander¹ pressed

The Methymnæan² hand, and felt a king indeed, and guessed

How Phœbus' self might give that great mouth of the gods

Such a magnificence of song! The pillar nods,

Rocks roof, and trembles door, gigantic,
post and jamb,

As harp and voice rend air — the shattering dithyramb!³

So stand thou, and assume the robe that tingles yet

With triumph; strike the harp, whose every golden fret

20 Still smoulders with the flame, was late at fingers' end —

So, standing on the bench o' the ship, let voice expend

Thy soul, sing, unalloyed by meaner mode, thine own,

The Orthian lay; then leap from music's lofty throne,

Into the lowest surge, make fearlessly thy launch!

Whatever storm may threat, some dolphin will be staunch!

Whatever roughness rage, some exquisite sea-thing

Will surely rise to save, will bear — pal-pitating —

One proud humility of love beneath its load —

Stem tide, part wave, till both roll on, thy jewell'd road

² Arion was born at Methymna, in Lesbos.
Lyrical chorus.

Of triumph, and the grim o' the gulph 30 grow wonder-white

I' the phosphorescent wake; and still the exquisite

Sea-thing stems on, saves still, palpitatingly
thus,

Lands safe at length its load of love at Tænarus,⁴

True woman-creature!

LXXIX.

Man? Ah, would you prove what power

Marks man, — what fruit his tree may yield, beyond the sour

And stunted crab, he calls love-apple, which remains

After you toil and moil your utmost, — all, love gains

By lavishing manure? — try quite the other plan!

And, to obtain the strong true product of a man,

Set him to hate a little! Leave cherishing his root,

And rather prune his branch, nip off the pettiest shoot

Superfluous on his bough! I promise, you shall learn

By what grace came the goat, of all beasts else, to earn

Such favour with the god o' the grape:
'twas only he

Who, browsing on its tops, first stung fertility

Into the stock's heart, stayed much growth of tendril-twine,

Some faintish flower, perhaps, but gained the indignant wine,

Wrath of the red press! Catch the puniest of the kind —

Man-animalcule, starved body, stunted
mind,

And, as you nip the blotch 'twixt thumb 50
and finger-nail,

Admire how heaven above and earth below
avail

No jot to soothe the mite, sore at God's prime offence

In making mites at all, — coax from its impotence

One virile drop of thought, of word, or deed, by strain

To propagate for once — which nature rendered vain,

Who lets first failure stay, yet cares not to record

Mistake that seems to cast opprobrium on the Lord!

Such were the gain from love's best pains!
But let the elf

⁴ The spot whither the dolphin carried Arion on his way to Corinth,

Be touched with hate, because some real man bears himself Manlike in body and soul, and, since he lives, must thwart
And furify and set a-fizz this counterpart O' the pismire that's surprised to effevescence, if,
By chance, black bottle come in contact with chalk cliff, Acid with alkali! Then thrice the bulk, out blows
Our insect, does its kind, and cuckoo-spits some rose!

LXXX.

No — 'tis ungainly work, the ruling men,
at best!
The graceful instinct's right: 'tis women stand confessed
Auxiliary, the gain that never goes away, Takes nothing and gives all: Elvire, Fifine,
'tis they Convince, — if little, much, no matter! — one degree
The more, at least, convince unreasonable
me
That I am, anyhow, a truth, though all else
seem
And be not: if I dream, at least I know I
dream.
The falsity, beside, is fleeting: I can
stand Still, and let truth come back, — your steading touch of hand Assists me to remain self-centred, fixed amid All on the move. Believe in me, at once you bid Myself believe that, since one soul has disengaged Mine from the shows of things, so much is fact: I waged
No foolish warfare, then, with shades, myself a shade,
Here in the world — may hope my pains will be repaid!
How false things are, I judge: how changeable, I learn When, where and how it is I shall see truth
return,
That I expect to know, because Fifine knows me! —
How much more, if Elvire!

LXXXI.

"And why not, only she?
Since there can be for each, one Best, no more, such Best,
For body and mind of him, abolishes the
rest
O' the simply Good and Better. You please select Elvire To give you this belief in truth, dispel the
fear

Yourself are, after all, as false as what surrounds;
And why not be content? When we two watched the rounds
The boatman made, 'twixt shoal and sandbank, yesterday,
As, at dead slack of tide, he chose to push his way,
With oar and pole, across the creek, and reach the isle
After a world of pains — my word provoked your smile, Yet none the less deserved reply: "Twere wiser wait
'The turn o' the tide, and find conveyance for his freight —
'How easily — within the ship to purpose 44 moored,
'Managed by sails, not oars! But no, —
the man's allured
'By liking for the new and hard in his exploit!
'First come shall serve! He makes, — courageous and adroit, —
'The merest willow-leaf of boat do duty,
bear
'His merchandise across: once over, needs he care
'If folk arrive by ship, six hours hence, fresh and gay?"
No: he scorns commonplace, affects the unusual way;
And good Elvire is moored, with not a breath to flap
The yards of her, no lift of ripple to o'erlap Keel, much less, prow. What care? since 50 here's a cockle-shell, Fifine, that's taut and crank, and carries just as well Such seamanship as yours!"

LXXXII.

Alack, our life is lent,
From first to last, the whole, for this experiment
Of proving what I say — that we ourselves are true!
I would there were one voyage, and then no more to do But tread the firmland, tempt the uncertain sea no more.
I would we might dispense with change of shore for shore
To evidence our skill, demonstrate — in no dream
It was, we tidied o'er the trouble of the stream.
I would the steady voyage, and not the 60 fitful trip, — Elvire, and not Fifine, — might test our seamanship.
But why expend one's breath to tell you, change of boat

Mean change of tactics took. Come on the same affair!
To-morrow, all the change, new stowage fore and aft
O' the cargo; then, to cross requires new sailor-craft!
To-day, one step from stern to bow keeps boat in trim:
To-morrow, some big stone, — or woe to that and him! — Must ballast both. That man stands for Mind, paramount
The vessel is adventure ay, however you make account,
'Tis mind that navigates, — skips over, twists between The vessel is the rest, — now gives importance to the mean.
And now, in the pursuit of life, acceptance,
fact,
Discards all fiction, — steers Fifine, and cries, i' the act,
"Thou art so bad, and yet so delicate a brown!
Wouldst tell no end of lies: I talk to smile or frown!
Wouldst rob me: do men blame a squirrel,
lithe and sly,
For pilfering the nut she adds to board?
Nay!
Fifine is true, as truth, honesty — self, black The worse! too safe the ship, the transport there and back Too certain, — may bill and lounge and leave the helm, Let wind and tide do work: no fear that waves o'erwhelm
The steady-going bark, as sure to feel her bill Bound to cross, reach land, next year as yesterday!
How can I but suspect, the true feat were to sail Down, — transfer myself to cockle-shell from ship,
And try of trusting to sea tracklessness, I dare
With me — and whose breast grew oak and triple brass.
Was it need no degree of death, but, with my eyes,
Surveyed the turgid main and its monstrous things
And muttered futile so, the prudent Power's decrees
Of separate earth and disassociating sea: Since, now is it observed, if impious vessels sail Across, and tempt a thing they should not touch — the deep?
(See Homer to the boat, wherein, for Athens bound,
When I sail must embark — Jove keep him safe and sound! —

The great battle — fought, but not the victory won.

Mean, surrounded by this so comfortable ode.)

1833-III

Then, never grudge my poor Fifine her compliment!
The rakish craft could slip her moorings in the tent,
And, being a every sort of stranded can-ny, steer Through dunes, rocks and reefs, — so fine, deposit here Your Virgil of a spouse, in Attica: yea, 40 thrid
The mob of men, select the special virtue hid In him, however, and say, — whatever, — Of all the multitude, you — I prefer to choose!
Are you for Athens bound? I can perform the trip, Shove little pinnacle off, while yon superior
ship,
The Elvire, refits in port!" So, off we push from beach
Of Pornic town, and lo, ere eye can wink, we reach
The Long Walls, and I prove that Athens is no dream,
For there the temples stand, they are, they nowise seem.
Nay, not all one lie, the truth attracts me so
true!
Thanks therefore to Fifine! Elvire, I'm back with you!
Share in the memories! Embark I trust we shall Together some fine day, and so, for good
and all,
Bid Pornic Town adieu, — then, just the strait to cross,
And we reach harkness, safe, in Iustephanos!
LXXXIV.
How quickly night comes! Lo, already 'tis the land
Turns sea-like; overcrept by grey, the plains expand.
Assume significance; where ocean dwindles,
shrinks
Into a pettier bound: its splash and plaint,
methinks,
Six steps away, how both retire, as if their 60
part Were played, another force were free to prove her art, Protagonist in turn! Are you unterrified?
All false, all fleeting too! And nowhere things above.
And everywhere we strain that things should say, — the one Truth, that ourselves are true!

LXXXV.

- A word, and I have done.
Is it not just our hate of falsehood, fleet-ingness,
And the mere part, things play, that constitutes express
The inmost charm of this Fifine and all her tribe?
Actors! We also act, but only they inscribe
Their style and title so, and preface, only
they,
Performance with "A lie is all we do or
say."
Wherein but there can be the attraction, Falsehood's bribe,
That wins so surely o'er to Fifine and her tribe
- 10 The liking, nay the love of who hate Falsehood most,
Except that these alone of mankind make their boast
"Frankly, we simulate!" To feign, means — to have grace
And so get gratitude! This ruler of the race, Crowned, sceptred, stoled to suit, — 'tis not that you detect The cobbler in the king, but that he makes effect
By seeming the reverse of what you know
to be
The man, the mind, whole form, fashion and quality.
Mistake his false for true, one minute, — there's an end Of the admiration! Truth, we grieve at or rejoice:
- 20 'Tis only falsehood, plain in gesture, look and voice,
That brings the praise desired, since profit comes thereby.
The histrionic truth is in the natural lie.
Because the man who wept the tears was,
all the time,
Happy enough; because the other man, a-grime
With guilt, was, at the least, as white as I
and you;
Because the timid type of bashful maid-hood, who Starts at her own pure shade, already numbers seven Born babes and, in a month, will turn their odd to even;
Because the saucy prince would prove,
could you unfurl
- 30 Some yards of wrap, a meek and meritorious girl — Precisely as you see success attained by
each
O' the mimes, do you approve, not foolishly impeach
The falsehood!

LXXXVI.

That's the first o' the truths found: all things, slow Or quick i' the passage, come at last to that, you know!
Each has a false outside, whereby a truth is forced To issue from within: truth, falsehood, are divorced
By the excepted eye, at the rare season, for The happy moment. Life means — learning to abhor
The false, and love the true, truth treasured snatch by snatch, Waifs counted at their worth. And when 40 with strays they match I' the parti-coloured world, — when, under foul, shines fair,
And truth, displayed i' the point, flashes forth everywhere
I' the circle, manifest to soul, though hid from sense,
And no obstruction more affects this confidence, —
When faith is ripe for sight, — why, reasonably, then Comes the great clearing-up. Wait three-score years and ten!

LXXXVII.

Therefore I prize stage-play, the honest cheating; thence
The impulse pricked, when life and drum bade Fair commence, To bid you trip and skip, link arm in arm
with me,
Like husband and like wife, and so together 50
see
The tumbling-troop arrayed, the strollers
on their stage
Drawn up and under arms, and ready to engage.
And if I started thence upon abstruser themes . . .
Well, 'twas a dream, pricked too!

LXXXVIII.

A poet never dreams:
We prose-folk always do: we miss the proper duct For thoughts on things unseen, which stagnate and obstruct The system, therefore; mind, sound in a body sane, Keeps thoughts apart from facts, and to one flowing vein Confines its sense of that which is not, but might be,
And leaves the rest alone. What ghosts 60 do poets see?
What demons fear? what man or thing misapprehend?

Unchoked, the channel's flush, the fancy's free to spend
 Its special self aright in manner, time and
 place.
 Never believe that who create the busy race O' the brain, bring poetry to birth, such act performed, Feel trouble them, the same, such residue as warmed
 My prosy blood, this morn, — intrusive fancies, meant For outbreak and escape by quite another vent!
 Whence follows that, asleep, my dreamings oft exceed
 The bound. But you shall hear.

LXXXIX.

I smoked. The webs o' the weed, 10 With many a break i' the mesh, were floating to re-form Cupola-wise above: chased thither by soft warm
 Inflow of air without; since I — of mind to muse, to clench
 The gain of soul and body, got by their noon-day drench
 In sun and sea, — had flung both frames
 o' the window wide,
 To soak my body still and let soul soar
 beside.
 In came the country sounds and sights and smells — that fine Sharp needle in the nose from our fermenting wine!
 In came a dragon-fly with whirl and stir,
 then out,
 Off and away: in came, — kept coming, rather, — pout 20 Succeeding smile, and take-away still close on give, —
 One loose long creeper-branch, tremblingly sensitive To risks which blooms and leaves, — each leaf tongue-broad, each bloom Mid target deep, — must run by prying in the room
 Of one who loves and grasps and spoils and speculates.
 All so far plain enough to sight and sense:
 but, weights,
 Measures and numbers, — ah, could one apply such test
 To other visitants that came at no request Of who kept open house, — to fancies manifold
 From this four-cornered world, the memories new and old, 30 The antenatal prime experience — what know I? —
 The initiatory love preparing us to die — Such were a crowd to count, a sight to see, a prize

To turn to profit, were but fleshly ears and
 eyes
 Able to cope with those o' the spirit!

XC.

Therefore, — since Thought hankers after speech, while no speech may evince Feeling like music, — mine, o'erburthened with each gift From every visitant, at last resolved to shift
 Its burthen to the back of some musician
 dead
 And gone, who feeling once what I feel now, instead Of words, sought sounds, and saved for 40 ever, in the same, Truth that escapes prose, — nay, puts poetry to shame.
 I read the note, I strike the key, I bid record
 The instrument — thanks greet the veritable word!
 And not in vain I urge: "O dead and gone
 away,
 Assist who struggles yet, thy strength become my stay, Thy record serve as well to register — I felt
 And knew thus much of truth! With me, must knowledge melt Into surmise and doubt and disbelief, unless Thy music reassure — I gave no idle guess, But gained a certitude I yet may hardly 50
 keep!
 What care? since round is piled a monumental heap
 Of music that conserves the assurance, thou
 as well
 Wast certain of the same! thou, master of the spell, Mad'st moonbeams marble, didst record what other men Feel only to forget!" Who was it helped me, then?
 What master's work first came responsive to my call,
 Found my eye, fixed my choice?

XCI.

Why, Schumann's "Carnival!" My choice chimed in, you see, exactly with the sounds
 And sights of yestereve when, going on my rounds,
 Where both roads join the bridge, I heard 60 across the dusk Creak a slow caravan, and saw arrive the husk
 O' the spice nut, which peeled off this morning, and displayed,

'Twixt tree and trée, a tent whence the red pennon made Its vivid reach for home and ocean-idle-
ness —
And where, my heart surmised, at that same moment, — yes, — Tugging her tricot on, — yet tenderly, lest stitch
Announce the crack of doom, reveal disaster which Our Pornic's modest stock of merceries in vain
Were ransacked to retrieve, — there, cautiously a-strain, (My heart surmised) must crouch in that tent's corner, curved Like Spring-month's russet moon, some girl by fate reserved 10 To give me once again the electric snap and spark Which prove, when finger finds out finger in the dark O' the world, there's fire and life and truth there, link but hands And pass the secret on. Lo, link by link, expands
The circle, lengthens out the chain, till one embrace
Of high with low is found uniting the whole
race,
Not simply you and me and our Fifine, but
all
The world: the Fair expands into the Carnival,
And Carnival again to . . . ah, but that's my dream!

XCII.

I somehow played the piece: remarked on each old theme 20 I' the new dress; saw how food o' the soul, the stuff that's made To furnish man with thought and feeling, is purveyed Substantially the same from age to age, with change
Of the outside only for successive feasters.
Range
The banquet room o' the world, from the dim farthest head
O' the table, to its foot, for you and me bespread,
This merry morn, we find sufficient fare, I trow.
But, novel? Scrape away the sauce; and taste, below,
The verity o' the viand, — you shall perceive there went To board-head just the dish which other condiment 30 Makes palatable now: guests came, sat down, fell-to,
Rose up, wiped mouth, went way, — lived, died, — and never knew

That generations yet should, seeking sustenance,
Still find the selfsame fare, with somewhat
to enhance Its flavour, in the kind of cooking. As with hates
And loves and fears and hopes, so with what emulates
The same, expresses hates, loves, fears and hopes in Art:
The forms, the themes — no one without its counterpart Ages ago; no one but, mumbled the due
time
I' the mouth of the eater, needs be cooked again in rhyme, Dished up anew in paint, sauce-smothered fresh in sound, To suit the wisdom-tooth, just cut, of the age, that's found With gums obtuse to gust and smack which relished so
The meat o' the meal folk made some fifty years ago.
But don't suppose the new was able to efface
The old without a struggle, a pang! The commonplace Still clung about his heart, long after all the
rest
O' the natural man, at eye and ear, was caught, confessed
The charm of change, although wry lip and wrinkled nose Owned ancient virtue more conducive to repose
Than modern nothings roused to somethings by some shred Of pungency, perchance garlic in amber's
stead.
And so on, till one day, another age, by
due Rotation, pries, sniffs, smacks, discovers old is new,
And sauce, our sires pronounced insipid, proves again
Sole piquant, may resume its titillating
reign —
With music, most of all the arts, since change is there
The law, and not the lapse: the precious means the rare,
And not the absolute in all good save
surprise.
So I remarked upon our Schumann's victories
Over the commonplace, how faded phrase grew fine,
And palled perfection — piqued, upstartled by that brine,
His pickle — bit the mouth and burnt the tongue aright, Beyond the merely good no longer exquisite:

Then took things as I found, and thanked without demur
The pretty piece — played through that movement, you prefer,
Where dance and shuffle past, — he scolding while she pouts, She canting while he calms, — in those eternal bouts
Of age, the dog — with youth, the cat — by rose-festoon Tied teasingly enough — Columbine, Pantalon:
She, toe-tips and staccato, — legato shakes his poll
And shambles in pursuit, the senior. Fi la jolle!
Lie to him! get his gold and pay its price!
begin Your trade betimes, nor wait till you've wed Harlequin
And need, at the week's end, to play the duteous wife,
And swear you still love slaps and leapings more than life!
Pretty! I say.

XCIII.

And so, I somehow-nohow played
The whole o' the pretty piece; and then
... whatever weighed My eyes down, furred the films about my wits? suppose,
The morning-bath, — the sweet monotony of those Three keys, flat, flat and flat, never a sharp
at all, —
Or else the brain's fatigue, forced even here to fall Into the same old track, and recognise the shift
From old to new, and back to old again, and, — swift Or slow, no matter, — still the certainty of
change,
Conviction we shall find the false, where'er
we range,
In art no less than nature: or what if wrist were numb,
And over-tense the muscle, abductor of the thumb,
Taxed by those tenths' and twelfths' unconscionable stretch?
Howe'er it came to pass, I soon was far to fetch — Gone off in company with Music!

XCIV.

Whither bound Except for Venice? She it was, by instinct found Carnival-country proper, who far below the perch
Where I was pinnaced, showed, opposite, Mark's Church,

And, underneath, Mark's Square, with those two lines of street, Procuratiè-sides, each leading to my feet — Since from above I gazed, however I got there.

XCV.

And what I gazed upon was a prodigious
Fair,
Concourse immense of men and women,
crowned or casqued, Turbaned or tiar'd, wreathed, plumed, hatted or wigged, but masked — Always masked, — only, how? No face-shape, beast or bird, Nay, fish and reptile even, but some one had preferred,
From out its frontispiece, feathered or scaled or curled,
To make the vizard whence himself should 40
view the world,
And where the world believed himself was manifest.
Yet when you came to look, mixed up among the rest
More funnily by far, were masks to imitate Humanity's mishap: the wrinkled brow, bald pate
And rheumy eyes of Age, peak'd chin and parchment chap,
Were signs of day-work done, and wage-time near, — mishap Merely; but, Age reduced to simple greed and guile,
Worn apathetic else as some smooth slab, erewhile
A clear-cut man-at-arms 't the pavement, till foot's tread Effaced the sculpture, left the stone you 50 saw instead, — Was not that terrible beyond the mere uncouth?
Well, and perhaps the next revolting you was Youth, Stark ignorance and crude conceit, half smirk, half stare
On that frank fool-face, gay beneath its head of hair
Which covers nothing.

XCVI.

These, you are to understand,
Were the mere hard and sharp distinctions.
On each hand,
I soon became aware, flocked the infini-
tude
Of passions, loves and hates, man pampers till his mood Becomes himself, the whole sole face we name him by,
Nor want denotement else, if age or youth 60
supply

The rest of him: old, young, — classed creature: in the main A love, a hate, a hope, a fear, each soul a-strain
 Some one way through the flesh — the face, an evidence O' the soul at work inside; and, all the more intense,
 So much the more grotesque.

XCVII.

"Why should each soul be tasked Some one way, by one love or else one hate?" I asked.
 When it occurred to me, from all these sights beneath
 There rose not any sound: a crowd, yet dumb as death!

XCVIII.

Soon I knew why. (Propose a riddle, and 'tis solved 10 Forthwith — in dream!) They spoke; but, — since on me devolved To see, and understand by sight, — the vulgar speech Might be dispensed with. "He who cannot see, must reach As best he may the truth of men by help of
 words
 They please to speak, must fare at will of who affords
 The banquet," — so I thought. "Who sees not, hears and so Gets to believe; myself it is that, seeing,
 know,
 And, knowing, can dispense with voice and vanity
 Of speech. What hinders then, that, drawing closer, I Put privilege to use, see and know better
 still 20 These simulacra, taste the profit of my skill,
 Down in the midst?"

XCIX.

And plumb I pitched into the square—A groundling like the rest. What think you happened there?
 Precise the contrary of what one would expect!
 For, — whereas so much more monstrosities deflect
 From nature and the type, as you the more approach
 Their precinct, — here, I found brutality encroach Less on the human, lie the lightlier as I looked
 The nearer on these faces that seemed but now so crook'd

And clawed away from God's prime purpose. They diverged
 A little from the type, but somehow rather urged To pity than disgust: the prominent,
 before,
 Now dwindled into mere distinctness,
 nothing more.
 Still, at first sight, stood forth undoubtedly
 the fact
 Some deviation was: in no one case there lacked
 The certain sign and mark, — say hint, say, trick of lip Or twist of nose, — that proved a fault in workmanship,
 Change in the prime design, some hesitancy here
 And there, which checked the man and let the beast appear;
 But that was all.

C.

All: yet enough to bid each tongue Lie in abeyance still. They talked, themselves among,
 Of themselves, to themselves; I saw the mouths at play,
 The gesture that enforced, the eye that strove to say
 The same thing as the voice, and seldom gained its point — That this was so, I saw; but all seemed out of joint I' the vocal medium 'twixt the world and me. I gained Knowledge by notice, not by giving ear, — attained
 To truth by what men seemed, not said:
 to me one glance
 Was worth whole histories of noisy utterance,
 — At least, to me in dream.

CI.

And presently I found That, just as ugliness had withered, so un-
 wound Itself, and perished off, repugnance to what wrong Might linger yet i' the make of man. My will was strong
 I' the matter; I could pick and choose, project my weight: (Remember how we saw the boatman trim his freight!) Determine to observe, or manage to escape,
 Or make divergency assume another
 shape
 By shift of point of sight in me the observer: thus Corrected, added to, subtracted from, — discuss

Each variant quality, and brute-beast touch was turned into mankind's safeguard! Force, guile, were arms which earned My praise, not blame at all: for we must learn to live, Case-hardened at all points, not bare and
 sensitive,
 But plated for defence, nay, furnished for attack,
 With spikes at the due place, that neither front nor back May suffer in that squeeze with nature, we find — life.
 Are we not here to learn the good of peace through strife,
 Of love through hate, and reach knowledge by ignorance?
 Why, those are helps thereto, which late we eyed askance, And nicknamed unaware! Just so, a sword we call Superfluous, and cry out against, at festival:
 Wear it in time of war, its clink and clatter grate
 O' the ear to purpose then!

CII.

I found, one must abate One's scorn of the soul's casing, distinct from the soul's self — Which is the centre-drop: whereas the pride in pelf,
 The lust to seem the thing it cannot be, the greed
 For praise, and all the rest seen outside, — these indeed
 Are the hard polished cold crystal environment
 Of those strange orbs unearthed i' the Druid temple, meant For divination (so the learned please to
 think)
 Wherein you may admire one dew-drop roll and wink, All unaffected by — quite alien to — what sealed
 And saved it long ago: though how it got congealed
 I shall not give a guess, nor how, by power occult,
 The solid surface-shield was outcome and result
 Of simple dew at work to save itself amid The unwatery force around; protected thus, dew slid Safe through all opposites, impatient to absorb
 Its spot of life, and last for ever in the
 orb
 We, now, from hand to hand pass with impunity.

CIII.

And the delight wherewith I watch this crowd must be Akin to that which crowns the chemist when he winds Thread up and up, till clue be fairly clutched, — unbinds
 The composite, ties fast the simple to its mate,
 And, tracing each effect back to its cause,
 elate,
 Constructs in fancy, from the fewest primitives,
 The complex and complete, all diverse life, that lives
 Not only in beast, bird, fish, reptile, insect,
 but
 The very plants and earths and ores. Just 40 so I glut
 My hunger both to be and know the thing I am,
 By contrast with the thing I am not; so,
 through sham
 And outside, I arrive at inmost real, probe And prove how the nude form obtained the chequered robe.

CIV.

— Experience, I am glad to master soon or late,
 Here, there and everywhere i' the world, without debate!
 Only, in Venice why? What reason for Mark's Square
 Rather than Timbuctoo?

CV.

And I became aware, Scarcely the word escaped my lips, that swift ensued
 In silence and by stealth, and yet with 50
 certitude,
 A formidable change of the amphitheatre Which held the Carnival; although the human stir Continued just the same amid that shift of scene.

CVI.

For as on edifice of cloud i' the grey and green
 Of evening, — built about some glory of the west,
 To barricade the sun's departure, — manifest,
 He plays, pre-eminently gold, gilds vapour, crag and crest Which bend in rapt suspense above the act and deed
 They cluster round and keep their very own, nor heed
 The world at watch; while we, breathlessly 60 at the base

O' the castellated bulk, note momentarily the mace
Of night fall here, fall there, bring change with every blow, Alike to sharpened shaft and broadened portico
I' the structure: heights and depths, beneath the leaden stress, Crumble and melt and mix together, coalesce,
Re-form, but sadder still, subdued yet more and more By every fresh defeat, till wearied eyes need pore
No longer on the dull impoverished deca-
dence
Of all that pomp of pile in towering evidence
10 So lately: —

CVII.

Even thus nor otherwise, meseemed That if I fixed my gaze awhile on what I dreamed Was Venice' Square, Mark's Church, the scheme was straight unschemed, A subtle something had its way within the
heart
Of each and every house I watched, with counterpart Of tremor through the front and outward face, until Mutation was at end; impassive and stock-still Stood now the ancient house, grown — new, is scarce the phrase, Since older, in a sense, — altered to . . .
what i' the ways,
Ourselves are wont to see, coerced by city,
town 20 Or village, anywhere i' the world, pace up or down Europe! In all the maze, no single tenement
I saw, but I could claim acquaintance
with.

CVIII.

There went Conviction to my soul, that what I took of late For Venice was the world; its Carnival — the state Of mankind, masquerade in life-long permanence
For all time, and no one particular feast-day. Whence
'Twas easy to infer what meant my late disgust
At the brute-pageant, each grotesque of greed and lust
And idle hate, and love as impotent for
good — 30 When from my pride of place I passed the interlude

In critical review; and what, the wonder that ensued
When, from such pinnaced pre-eminence,
I found Somehow the proper goal for wisdom was
the ground
And not the sky, — so, slid sagaciously be-
times Down heaven's baluster-rope, to reach the mob of mimes
And mummers; whereby came discovery there was just Enough and not too much of hate, love,
greed and lust,
Could one discerningly but hold the balance, shift
The weight from scale to scale, do justice to the drift
Of nature, and explain the glories by the 40 shames
Mixed up in man, one stuff miscalled by different names
According to what stage i' the process turned his rough,
Even as I gazed, to smooth — only get close
enough!
— What was all this except the lesson of a
life?

CIX.

And — consequent upon the learning how from strife Grew peace — from evil, good — came knowledge that, to get Acquaintance with the way o' the world, we must nor fret Nor fume, on altitudes of self-sufficiency,
But bid a frank farewell to what — we think — should be,
And, with as good a grace, welcome 50 what is — we find.

CX.

Is — for the hour, observe! Since something to my mind Suggested soon the fancy, nay, certitude that change,
Never suspending touch, continued to derange
What architecture, we, walled up within the cirque
O' the world, consider fixed as fate, not fairy work.
For those were temples, sure, which tremblingly grew blank From bright, then broke afresh in triumph, — ah, but sank As soon, for liquid change through artery and vein O' the very marble wound its way! And first a stain
Would startle and offend amid the glory; 60
next,

Spot swift succeeded spot, but found me less perplexed
 By portents; then as 'twere a sleepiness soft stole Over the stately fane, and shadow sucked
 the whole
Façade into itself, made uniformly earth What was a piece of heaven; till, lo, a second birth,
 And the veil broke away because of something new Inside, that pushed to gain an outlet, paused in view
 At last, and proved a growth of stone or brick or wood Which, alien to the aim o' the Builder, somehow stood
 The test, could satisfy, if not the early
 race
 For whom he built, at least our present populace,
 Who must not bear the blame for what, blamed, proves mishap
 Of the Artist: his work gone, another fills the gap, Serves the prime purpose so. Undoubtedly there spreads Building around, above, which makes men lift their heads
 To look at, or look through, or look — for aught I care —
 Over: if only up, it is, not down, they stare, "Commercing with the skies," and not the pavement in the 'Square.

CXI.

But are they only temples that subdivide, collapse,
 And tower again, transformed? Academies, perhaps!
 Domes where dwells Learning, seats of Science, bower and hall Which house Philosophy — do these, too, rise and fall,
 Based though foundations be on steadfast mother-earth,
 With no chimeric claim to supermundane
 birth,
 No boast that, dropped from cloud, they did not grow from ground?
 Why, these fare worst of all! these vanish and are found Nowhere, by who tasks eye some twice within his term
 Of threescore years and ten, for tidings what each germ Has burgeoned out into, whereof the promise stunned
 His ear with such acclaim, — praise-payment to refund
 The praisers, never doubt, some twice before they die
 Whose days are long i' the land.

CXII.

Alack, Philosophy!
 Despite the chop and change, diminished or increased, Patched up, and plastered o'er, religion stands at least I' the temple-type. But thou? Here gape I, all agog These thirty years, to learn how tadpole turns to frog;
 And thrice at least have gazed with mild astonishment, As, skyward up and up, some fire-new fabric sent Its challenge to mankind that, clustered underneath
 To hear the word, they straight believe, 44 ay, in the teeth O' the Past, clap hands and hail triumphant Truth's outbreak — Tadpole-frog-theory propounded past mistake!
 In vain! A something ails the edifice, it bends, It bows, it buries . . . Hastel cry "Heads below" to friends — But have no fear they find, when smother shall subside,
 Some substitution perk with unabated
 pride
 I' the predecessor's place!

CXIII.

No, — the one voice which failed Never, the preachment's coign of vantage nothing ailed, —
 That had the luck to lodge i' the house not made with hands!
 And all it preached was this: "Truth 56 builds upon the sands, Though stationed on a rock: and so her work decays,
 And so she builds afresh, with like result.
 Nought stays
 But just the fact that Truth not only is, but fain
 Would have men know she needs must be,
 by each so plain Attempt to visibly inhabit where they dwell."
 Her works are work, while she is she;
 that work does well Which lasts mankind their life-time through, and lets believe One generation more, that, though sand run through sieve, Yet earth now reached is rock, and what we moderns find Erected here is Truth, who, 'stablished to 64 her mind

I' the fulness of the days, will never change in show More than in substance erst: men thought they knew; we know!

CXIV.

Do you, my generation? Well, let the blocks prove mist
I' the main enclosure, — church and college, if they list,
Be something for a time, and everything
anon,
And anything awhile, as fit is off or on,
Till they grow nothing, soon to re-appear no less
As something, — shape re-shaped, till out of shapelessness Come shape again as sure! no doubt, or round or square 10 Or polygon its front, some building will be there,
Do duty in that nook o' the wall o' the world where once
The Architect saw fit precisely to ensconce College or church, and bid such bulwark guard the line O' the barrier round about, humanity's confine.

CXV.

Leave watching change at work i' the greater scale, on these The main supports, and turn to their interstices Filled up by fabrics too, less costly and less
rare,
Yet of importance, yet essential to the Fair
They help to circumscribe, instruct and regulate!
20 See, where each booth-front boasts, in letters small or great,
Its specialty, proclaims its privilege to stop
A breach, beside the best!

CXVI.

Here History keeps shop, Tells how past deeds were done, so and not otherwise:
"Man! hold truth evermore! forget the early lies!"
There sits Morality, demure behind her stall, Dealing out life and death: "This is the thing to call Right, and this other, wrong; thus think, thus do, thus say, Thus joy, thus suffer! — not to-day as yesterday —
Yesterday's doctrine dead, this only shall endure!
30 Obey its voice and live!" — enjoins the dame demure.

While Art gives flag to breeze, bids drum beat, trumpet blow, Inviting eye and ear to yonder raree-show.
Up goes the canvas, hauled to height of pole. I think,
We know the way — long lost, late learned — to paint! A wink Of eye, and lo, the pose! the statue on its plinth!
How could we moderns miss the heart o' the labyrinth Perversely all these years, permit the Greek seclude
His secret till to-day? And here's another feud
Now happily composed: inspect this quartett-score!
Got long past melody, no word has Music 44 To say to mortal man! But is the bard to be more Behindhand? Here's his book, and now perhaps you see
At length what poetry can do!

CXVII.

Why, that's stability Itself, that change on change we sorrow-fully saw Creep o'er the prouder piles! We acquiesced in law
When the fine gold grew dim i' the temple, when the brass Which pillared that so brave abode where Knowledge was,
Bowed and resigned the trust; but, bear all this caprice, Harlequinade where swift to birth succeeds decease
Of hue at every turn o' the tinsel-flag 50 which flames While Art holds booth in Fair? Such glories chased by shames Like these, distract beyond the solemn and august Procedure to decay, evanishment in dust,
Of those marmoreal domes, — above vicissitude,
We used to hope!

CXVIII.

"So, all is change, in fine," pursued The preacher to a pause. When — "All is permanence!"
Returned a voice. Within? without?
No matter whence
The explanation came: for, understand, I ought To simply say — "I saw," each thing I say "I thought."
Since ever as, unrolled, the strange scene- 60 picture grew

• Marble-like.

Before me, sight flashed first, though mental comment too Would follow in a trice, come hobblingly to halt.

CXIX.

So, what did I see next but, — much as when the vault
 I' the west, — wherein we watch the vapoury manifold Transfiguration, — tired turns blaze to black, — behold, Peak reconciled to base, dark ending feud with bright,
 The multiform subsides, becomes the definite.
 Contrasting life and strife, where battle they i' the blank Severity of peace in death, for which we thank 10 One wind that comes to quell the concourse, drive at last Things to a shape which suits the close of things, and cast Palpably o'er vexed earth heaven's mantle of repose?

CXX.

Just so, in Venice' Square, that things were at the close Was signalled to my sense; for I perceived arrest
 O' the change all round about, As if some impulse pressed Each gently into each, what was distinct-ness, late,
 Grew vague, and, line from line no longer separate,
 No matter what its style, edifice . . . shall
 I say,
 Died into edifice? I find no simpler
 way 20 Of saying how, without or dash or shock or trace
 Of violence, I found unity in the place Of temple, tower, — nay, hall and house and hut, — one blank Severity of peace in death; to which they sank
 Resigned enough, till . . . ah, conjecture,
 I beseech,
 What special blank did they agree to, all
 and each?
 What common shape was that wherein they mutely merged Likes and dislikes of form, so plain before?

CXXI.

I urged Your step this way, prolonged our path of enterprise
 To where we stand at last, in order that your eyes 30 Might see the very thing, and save my tongue describe

The Druid monument which fronts you.
 Could I bribe Nature to come in aid, illustrate what I
 mean, What wants there she should lend to solemnize the scene?

CXXII.

How does it strike you, this construction gaunt and grey Sole object, these piled stones, that gleam unground-away
 By twilight's hungry jaw, which champs fine all beside
 I' the solitary waste we grope through?
 Oh, no guide Need we to grope our way and reach the monstrous door Of granite! Take my word, the deeper you explore That caverned passage, filled with fancies 40 to the brim,
 The less will you approve the adventure!
 such a grim Bar-sinister soon blocks abrupt your path, and ends
 All with a cold dread shape, — shape whereon Learning spends Labour, and leaves the text obscurer for the gloss, While Ignorance reads right — recoiling from that Cross!
 Whence came the mass and mass, strange quality of stone
 Unquarried anywhere i' the region round?
 Unknown!
 Just as unknown, how such enormity could be Conveyed by land, or else transported over sea,
 And laid in order, so, precisely each on 50
 each,
 As you and I would build a grotto where the beach
 Sheds shell — to last an hour: this building lasts from age
 To age the same. But why?

CXXIII.

Ask Learning! I engage You get a prosy wherefore, shall help you to advance
 In knowledge just as much as helps you Ignorance
 Surmising, in the mouth of peasant-lad or lass,
 "I heard my father say he understood it was A building, people built as soon as earth
 was made Almost, because they might forget (they were afraid) Earth did not make itself, but came of 60 Somebody.

They laboured that their work might last,
 and show thereby He stays, while we and earth, and all things come and go.
 Come whence? Go whither? That, when come and gone, we know Perhaps, but not while earth and all things need our best Attention: we must wait and die to know
 the rest.
 Ask, if that's true, what use in setting up the pile?
 'To make one fear and hope: remind us, all the while We come and go, outside there's Somebody that stays;
 A circumstance which ought to make us mind our ways, 10 Because, — whatever end we answer by this life, —
 Next time, best chance must be for who,
 with toil and strife, Manages now to live most like what he was meant Become: since who succeeds so far, 'tis evident, Stands foremost on the file; who fails, has less to hope From new promotion. That's the rule — with even a rope
 Of mushrooms, like this rope I dangle!
 those that grew Greatest and roundest, all in life they had
 to do,
 Gain a reward, a grace they never dreamed,
 I think;
 Since, outside white as milk and inside black as ink, 20 They go to the Great House to make a dainty dish
 For Don and Donna; while this basket-load, I wish Well off my arm, it breaks, — no starveling of the heap
 But had his share of dew, his proper length of sleep
 I' the sunshine: yet, of all, the outcome is — this queer Cribbed quantity of dwarfs which burthen basket here Till I reach home; 'tis there that, having run their rigs,
 They end their earthly race, are flung as food for pigs.
 Any more use I see? Well, you must know, there lies Something, the Curé says, that points to mysteries 30 Above our grasp: a huge stone pillar, once upright,
 Now laid at length, half-lost — discreetly shunning sight
 I' the bush and briar, because of stories in the air —

Hints what it signified, and why was stationed there, Once on a time. In vain the Curé tasked his lungs — Showed, in a preachment, how, at bottom of the rungs
 O' the ladder, Jacob saw, where heavenly angels slept
 Up and down, lay a stone which served him, while he slept, For pillow; when he woke, he set the same upright
 As pillar, and atop poured oil: things requisite
 To instruct posterity, there mounts from floor to roof,
 A staircase, earth to heaven; and also put in proof,
 When we have scaled the sky, we well may let alone
 What raised us from the ground, and, — paying to the stone Proper respect, of course, — take staff and go our way, Leaving the Pagan night for Christian break of day.
 'For,' preached he, 'what they dreamed, these Pagans wide-awake
 'We Christians may behold. How strange, then, were mistake
 'Did anybody style the stone, — because of drop 'Remaining there from oil which Jacob poured a-top, —
 'Itself the Gate of Heaven, itself the end, 50 and not 'The means thereto!' Thus preached the Curé, and no jot
 The more persuaded people but that, what once a thing Meant and had right to mean, it still must mean. So cling Folk somehow to the prime authoritative
 speech,
 And so distrust report, it seems as they could reach Far better the arch-word, whereon their fate depends,
 Through rude charactery, than all the grace it lends
 That lettering of your scribes! who flourish pen apace
 And ornament the text, they say — we say efface.
 Hence, when the earth began its life afresh 60 in May,
 And fruit-trees bloomed, and waves would wanton, and the bay Ruffle its wealth of weed, and stranger-birds arrive,
 And beasts take each a mate, — folk, too, found sensitive,
 Surmised the old grey stone upright there, through such tracts

Of solitariness and silence, kept the facts Entrusted it, could deal out doctrine, did it please:

No fresh and frothy draught, but liquor on the lees,

Strong, savage and sincere: first bleedings from a vine

Whereof the product now do Curés so refine

To insipidity, that, when heart sinks, we strive

And strike from the old stone the old restorative.

‘Which is?’ — why, go and ask our grandames how they used

To dance around it, till the Curé disa-bused

10 Their ignorance, and bade the parish in a band

Lay flat the obtrusive thing that cumbered so the land!

And there, accordingly, in bush and briar it — ‘bides

‘Its time to rise again!’ (so somebody derides,

That’s pert from Paris) ‘since, yon spire, you keep erect

‘Yonder, and pray beneath, is nothing, I suspect,

‘But just the symbol’s self, expressed in slate for rock,

‘Art’s smooth for Nature’s rough, new chip from the old block!’

There, sir, my say is said! Thanks, and Saint Gille increase

The wealth bestowed so well!” — wherewith he pockets piece,

20 Doffs cap, and takes the road. I leave in Learning’s clutch

More money for his book, but scarcely gain as much.

CCXIV.

To this it was, this same primæval monument,

That, in my dream, I saw building with building blent

Fall: each on each they fast and founde-ringly went

Confusion-ward; but thence again subsided fast,

Became the mound you see. Magnificently massed

Indeed, those mammoth-stones, piled by the Protoplast

Temple-wise in my dream! beyond compare with fanes

Which, solid-looking late, had left no least remains

30 I’ the bald and blank, now sole usurper of the plains

Of heaven, diversified and beautiful before.
And yet simplicity appeared to speak no
more

Nor less to me than spoke the compound.

At the core,

One and no other word, as in the crust of
late,

Whispered, which, audible through the transition-state,

Was no loud utterance in even the ultimate Disposure. For as some imperial chord

subsists,

Steadily underlies the accidental mists Of music springing thence, that run their mazy race Around, and sink, absorbed, back to the 40 triad base, —

So, out of that one word, each variant rose and fell

And left the same “All’s change, but permanence as well.”

— Grave note whence — list aloft! — harmonics sound, that mean:

“Truth inside, and outside, truth also;
and between

Each, falsehood that is change, as truth is permanence.

The individual soul works through the shows of sense,

(Which, ever proving false, still promise to be true)

Up to an outer soul as individual too;
And, through the fleeting, lives to die into the fixed,

And reach at length ‘God, man, or both 50 together mixed,’

Transparent through the flesh, by parts which prove a whole,

By hints which make the soul discernible by soul —

Let only soul look up, not down, not hate but love,

As truth successively takes shape, one grade above

Its last presentment, tempts as it were truth
indeed

Revealed this time; so tempts, till we attain to read

The signs aright, and learn, by failure, truth is forced

To manifest itself through falsehood; whence divorced

By the excepted eye, at the rare season,
for

The happy moment, truth instructs us to 60
abhor

The false, and prize the true, obtainable
thereby.

Then do we understand the value of a lie;
Its purpose served, its truth once safe deposited,

Each lie, superfluous now, leaves, in the singer’s stead,

The indubitable song; the historic personage

Put by, leaves prominent the impulse of his age;

Truth sets aside speech, act, time, place, indeed, but brings Nakedly forward now the principle of
things Highest and least."

CCXV.

Wherewith change ends. What change to dread
When, disengaged at last from every veil, instead
Of type remains the truth? once — falsehood: but anon Theosuton e broteion eper kekramenon, Something as true as soul is true, though veils between Prove false and fleet away. As I mean, did he mean,
The poet whose bird-phrase sits, singing in my ear 10 A mystery not unlike? What through the dark and drear Brought comfort to the Titan? Emerging from the lymph,
"God, man, or mixture" proved only to be a nymph:
"From whom the clink on clink of metal" (money, judged Abundant in my purse) "struck" (bumped at, till it budged)
"The modesty, her soul's habitual resident" (Where late the sisterhood were lively in their tent)
"As out of wingèd car" (that caravan on wheels)
"Impulsively she rushed, no slippers to her heels,"
And "Fear not, friends we flock!" soft smiled the sea-Fifine — 20 Primitive of the veils (if he meant what I mean)
The poet's Titan learned to lift, ere
"Three-formed Fate, Moirai Trimorphoi" stood unmasked the Ultimate.

CCXVI.

Enough o' the dream! You see how poetry turns prose.
Announcing wonder-work, I dwindle at the close Down to mere commonplace old facts which everybody knows.
So dreaming disappoints! The fresh and strange at first,
Soon wears to trite and tame, nor warrants the outburst
Of heart with which we hail those heights at very brink
Of heaven, whereto one least of lifts would lead, we think, 30 But wherefrom quick decline conducts our step, we find,
To homely earth, old facts familiar left behind.

Did not this monument, for instance, long ago
Say all it had to say, show all it had to
show,
Nor promise to do duty more in dream?

CCXVII.

Awaking so,
What if we, homeward-bound, all peace and some fatigue, Trudge, soberly complete our tramp of near a league, Last little mile which makes the circuit just, Elvire?
We end where we began: that consequence
is clear.
All peace and some fatigue, wherever we were nursed
To life, we bosom us on death, find last is 40
first
And thenceforth final too.

CCXVIII.

"Why final? Why the more Worth credence now than when such truth proved false before?"
Because a novel point impresses now:
each lie Redounded to the praise of man, was victory
Man's nature had both right to get, and might to gain,
And by no means implied submission to the reign
Of other quite as real a nature, that saw fit To have its way with man, not man his way with it.
This time, acknowledgment and acquiescence quell
Their contrary in man; promotion proves 50
as well
Defeat: and Truth, unlike the False with Truth's outside,
Neither plumes up his will nor puffs him out with pride.
I fancy, there must lurk some cogency i'
the claim,
Man, such abatement made, submits to,
all the same.
Soul finds no triumph, here, to register like Sense
With whom 'tis ask and have, — the want, the evidence That the thing wanted, soon or late, will be supplied.
This indeed plumes up will; this, sure,
puffs out with pride, When, reading records right, man's instincts still attest Promotion comes to Sense because Sense 60 likes it best;
For bodies sprouted legs, through a desire to run:

While hands, when fain to filch, got fingers one by one,
 And nature that's ourself, accommoda-tive brings
 To bear that, tired of legs which walk, we now bud wings Since of a mind to fly. Such savour in the nose
 Of Sense, would stimulate Soul sweetly, I suppose,
 Souls with its proper itch of instinct, prompting clear To recognise soul's self Soul's only master
 here
 Alike from first to last. But, if time's pressure, light's Or rather, dark's approach, wrest thoroughly the rights 10 Of rule away, and bid the soul submissive
 bear Another soul than it play master everywhere
 In great and small, — this time, I fancy, none disputes There's something in the fact that such conclusion suits Nowise the pride of man, nor yet chimes in with attributes Conspicuous in the lord of nature. He receives
 And not demands — not first likes faith and then believes.

CXXIX.

And as with the last essence so with its first faint type.
 In constancy means raw, 'tis faith alone means ripe
 I' the soul which runs its round: no matter how it range 20 From Helen to Ffine, Elvire bids back the
 change
 To permanence. Here, too, love ends where love began.
 Such ending looks like law, because the natural man Inclines the other way, feels lordlier free than bound.
 Poor pabulum for pride when the first love is found
 Last also! and, so far from realising gain, Each step aside just proves divergency in vain.
 The wanderer brings home no profit from his quest
 Beyond the sad surmise that keeping house were best Could life begin anew. His problem posed aright 30 Was — "From the given point evolve the infinite!"
 Not — "Spend thyself in space, endeavouring to joint

Together, and so make infinite, point and
 point:
 Fix into one Elvire a Fair-ful of Ffines!" Ffine, the foam-flake, she: Elvire, the sea's self, means Capacity at need to shower how many
 such!
 And yet we left her calm profundity, to clutch
 Foam-flutter, bell on bell, that, bursting at a touch, Blistered us for our pains. But wise, we want no more O' the fickle element. Enough of foam and roar!
 Land-locked, we live and die henceforth: 4 for here's the villa-door.

CXXX.

How pallidly you pause o' the threshold!
 Hardly night,
 Which drapes you, ought to make real flesh and blood so white!
 Touch me, and so appear alive to all intents!
 Will the saint vanish from the sinner that repents?
 Suppose you are a ghost! A memory, a
 hope,
 A fear, a conscience! Quick! Give back the hand I grope I' the dusk for!

CXXXI.

That is well. Our double horoscope I cast, while you concur. Discard that simile
 O' the fickle element! Elvire is land not
 sea —
 The solid land, the safe. All these word- 50 bubbles came O' the sea, and bite like salt. The unlucky bath's to blame.
 This hand of yours on heart of mine, no more the bay
 I beat, nor bask beneath the blue! In Pornic, say,
 The Mayor shall catalogue me duly domiciled, Contributable, good-companion of the guild And mystery of marriage. I stickle for
 the town,
 And not this tower apart; because,
 though, half-way down, Its mullions wink o'erwebbed with bloomy greenness, yet Who mounts to staircase top may tempt the parapet,
 And sudden there's the sea! No mem- 64 ories to arouse,
 No fancies to delude! Our honest civic
 house
 Of the earth be earthy too! — or graced perchance with shell

Made prize of long ago, picked haply where the swell Menaced a little once — or seaweed-branch that yet Dampens and softens, notes a freak of wind, a fret
 Of wave: though, why on earth should sea-change mend or mar
 The calm contemplative householders that we are?
 So shall the seasons fleet, while our two selves abide:
 E'en past astonishment how sunrise and springtide Could tempt one forth to swim; the more if time appoints That swimming grow a task for one's rheumatic joints.
 10 Such honest civic house, behold, I constitute
 Our villa! Be but flesh and blood, and smile to boot!
 Enter for good and all! then fate bolt fast
 the door,
 Shut you and me inside, never to wander
 more!

CXXXII.

Only, — you do not use to apprehend attack!
 No doubt, the way I march, one idle arm, thrown slack Behind me, leaves the open hand defenceless at the back, Should an impertinent on tiptoe steal, and
 stuff
 — Whatever can it be? A letter sure
 enough, Pushed betwixt palm and glove! That largess of a franc?
 20 Perhaps unconsciously, — to better help the blank
 O' the nest, her tambourine, and, laying egg, persuade
 A family to follow, the nest-egg that I laid May have contained, — but just to foil suspicious folk, — Between two silver whites a yellow double yolk!
 Oh, threaten no farewell! five minutes shall suffice
 To clear the matter up. I go, and in a trice Return; five minutes past, expect me!
 If in vain —
 Why, slip from flesh and blood, and play the ghost again!

EPILOGUE.

THE HOUSEHOLDER.

I.

Savage I was sitting in my house, late,
 lone:

Dreary, weary with the long day's work: 3 Head of me, heart of me, stupid as a
 stone: Tongue-tied now, now blaspheming like a Turk;
 When, in a moment, just a knock, call,
 cry,
 Half a pang and all a rapture, there again were we! —
 "What, and is it really you again?" quoth
 I:
 "I again, what else did you expect?"
 quoth She.

II.

"Never mind, hie away from this old
 house —
 Every crumbling brick embrowned with sin and shame!
 Quick, in its corners ere certain shapes arcuse!
 Let them — every devil of the night —
 lay claim,
 Make and mend, or rap and rend, for me!
 Good-bye!
 God be their guard from disturbance at their glee, Till, crash, comes down the carcass in a heap!" quoth I:
 "Nay, but there's a decency required!"
 quoth She.

III.

"Ah, but if you knew how time has dragged, days, nights!
 All the neighbour-talk with man and maid — such men!
 All the fuss and trouble of street-sounds, window-sights:
 All the worry of flapping door and echoing roof; and then,
 All the fancies . . . Who were they had leave, dared try Darker arts that almost struck despair in me?
 If you knew but how I dwelt down here!"
 quoth I:
 "And was I so better off up there?"
 quoth She.

IV.

"Help and get it over! *Re-united to his
 wife* (How draw up the paper lets the parish-people know?)
Lies M., or N., departed from this life, Day the this or that, month and year the so and so.
 What i' the way of final flourish? Prose, verse? Try!
Affliction sore long time he bore, or, what is it to be?
Till God did please to grant him ease. Do end!" quoth I:
 "I end with — Love is all and Death is nought!" quoth She.

RED COTTON NIGHT-CAP COUNTRY,

OR

1873.

[This poem is founded on a somewhat disagreeable story told at great length in the French newspapers at the time (1871). In the early proofs the real names of the young goldsmith and his leman appeared, but before publication imaginary names were substituted. "Turf" stands for the self-indulgent life, and "Towers" typify the life of struggle and self-mastery.]

TO

MISS THACKERAY.

RED COTTON NIGHT-CAP, COUNTRY, OR TURF AND TOWERS.

I.

AND so, here happily we meet, fair friend!
Again once more, as if the years rolled
back
And this our meeting-place were just that
Rome
Out in the champaign, say, o'er-rioted By verdure, ravage, and gay winds that war Against strong sunshine settled to his sleep;
Or on the Paris Boulevard, might it prove,
You and I came together saunteringly, Bound for some shop-front in the Place
Vendôme —
Gold-smithy and Golconda mine, that makes
"The Firm-Miranda" blazed about the
world —
Or, what if it were London, where my toe Trespassed upon your flounce? "Small blame," you smile,
Seeing the Staircase Party in the Square Was Small and Early, and you broke no rib.

Even as we met where we have met so oft,
Now meet we on this unpretending beach
Below the little village: little, ay!
But pleasant, may my gratitude subjoin?
Meek, hitherto un-Murrayed bathing-
place,
Best loved of sea-coast-nook-ful Normandy!
That, just behind you, is mine own hired
house:
With right of pathway through the field in
front,

No prejudice to all its growth unsheaved
Of emerald luzern bursting into blue.
Be sure I keep the path that hugs the wall,
Of mornings, as I pad from door to gate!
Yon yellow — what if not wild-mustard
flower? —

Of that, my naked sole makes lawful prize, Bruising the acrid aromatics out, 30 Till, what they preface, good salt savours sting

From, first, the sifted sands, then sands in slab, Smooth save for pipy wreath-work of the worm:

(Granite and mussel-shell are ground
alike

To glittering paste, — the live worm troubles yet.)

Then, dry and moist, the varech¹ limit-
line,

Burnt cinder-black, with brown un-crumpled swathe

Of berried softness, sea-swoln thrice its size;

And, lo, the wave protrudes a lip at last,
And flecks my foot with froth, nor tempts 40
in vain.

Such is Saint-Rambert, wilder very much Than Joyeux, that famed Joyous-Gard of
yours,

Some five miles farther down; much homelier too —

Right for me, — right for you the fine
and fair!

Only, I could endure a transfer —
wrought

By angels famed still, through our country-
side,

For weights they fetched and craved in old time

When nothing like the need was — transfer, just
 Of Joyeux church, exchanged for yonder prig,
 Our brand-new stone cream-coloured master-piecc.

Well — and you know, and not since this one year,

The quiet seaside country? So do I:
 Who like it, in a manner, just because Nothing is prominently likeable
 To vulgar eye without a soul behind,
 Which, breaking surface, brings before the ball

10 Of sight, a beauty buried everywhere.
 If we have souls, know how to see and use,
 One place performs, like any other place,
 The proper service every place on earth
 Was framed to furnish man with: serves alike

To give him note that, through the place he sees,

A place is signified he never saw,
 But, if he lack not soul, may learn to know.
 Earth's ugliest walled and ceiled imprisonment

May suffer, through its single rent in roof, 20 Admittance of a cataract of light Beyond attainment through earth's palace-panes

Pinholed athwart their windowed flagree
 By twinklings sobered from the sun outside.

Doubtless the High Street of our village here

Imposes hardly as Rome's Corso could:
 And our projected race for sailing-boats Next Sunday, when we celebrate our Saint, Falls very short of that attractiveness,
 That artistry in festive spectacle,

30 Paris ensures you when she welcomes back

(When shall it be?) the Assembly from Versailles;

While the best fashion and intelligence Collected at the counter of our Mayor (Dry goods he deals in, grocery beside) What time the post-bag brings the news from Vire, —

I fear me much, it scarce would hold its own,

That circle, that assorted sense and wit,
 With Five o'clock Tea in a house we know.

Still, 'tis the check that gives the leap its lift.

40 The nullity of cultivated souls, Even advantaged by their news from Vire,
 Only conduces to enforce the truth That, thirty paces off, this natural blue Broods o'er a bag of secrets, all unbroaded, Beneath the bosom of the placid deep,

Since first the Post Director sealed them safe;

And formidable I perceive this fact — Little Saint-Rambert touches the great sea.
 From London, Paris, Rome, where men are men,

Not mice, and mice not Mayors presumably,

Thought scarce may leap so fast, alight so far.

But this is a pretence, you understand, Disparagement in play to parry thrust Of possible objector: nullity
 And ugliness, the taunt be his, not mine
 Nor yours, — I think we know the world too well!

Did you walk hither, jog it by the plain,
 Or jaunt it by the highway, braving bruise

From springless and uncushioned vehicle?

Much, was there not, in place and people both,

To lend an eye to? and what eye like yours —

The learned eye is still the loving one!
 Our land: its quietude, productiveness,
 Its length and breadth of grain-crop, meadow-ground,

Its orchards in the pasture, farms a-field
 And hamlets on the road-edge, nought you missed

Of one and all the sweet rusticities!
 From stalwart strider by the waggon-side, Brightening the acre with his purple blouse,

To those dark-featured comely women-folk,

Healthy and tall, at work, and work indeed,

On every cottage door-step, plying brisk Bobbins that bob you ladies one such lace!
 Oh, you observed! and how that nimble play

Of finger formed the sole exception, bobbed

The one disturbance to the peace of things, Where nobody esteems it worth his while,
 If time upon the clock-face goes asleep,
 To give the rusted hands a helpful push.

Nobody lifts an energetic thumb
 And index to remove some dead and gone Notice which, posted on the barn, repeats For truth what two years' passage made a lie.

Still is for sale, next June, that same château

With all its immobilities, — were sold Duly next June behind the last but last;
 And, woe's me, still placards the Emperor His confidence in war he means to wage, God aiding and the rural populace.
 No: rain and wind must rub the rags away
 And let the lazy land untroubled snore.

Ah, in good truth? and did the drowshead
So suit, so soothe the learned loving eye,
That you were minded to confer a crown, (Does not the poppy boast such?) — call the land

By one slow hither-thither stretching, fast Subsiding-into-slumber sort of name, Symbolic of the place and people too, “White Cotton Night-cap Country?” Excellent!

For they do, all, dear women young and
old,

10 Upon the heads of them bear notably This badge of soul and body in repose;
Nor its fine thimble fits the acorn-top,
Keeps woolly ward above that oval brown, Its placid feature, more than muffler makes A safeguard, circumvents, intelligence In — what shall evermore be named and famed,

If happy nomenclature aught avail, “White Cotton Night-cap Country.”

Do I hear —

Oh, better, very best of all the news —

20 You mean to catch and cage the winged
word,

And make it breed and multiply at home Till Norman idlesse stock our England
too?

Normandy shown mini²e yet magnified
In one of those small books, the truly great,
We never know enough, yet know so well?
How I foresee, the cursive diamond-dints, — Composite pen that plays the pencil too, — As, touch the page and up the glamour
goes,

And filmily o'er grain-crop, meadow-
ground,

30 O'er orchard in the pasture, farm a-field And hamlet on the road-edge, floats and forms

And falls, at lazy last of all, the Cap That crowns the country! we, awake out-
side,

Farther than ever from the imminence
Of what cool comfort, what close coverture Your magic, deftly weaving, shall surround The unconscious captives with. Be theirs to drowse

Trammeled and ours to watch the tram-mel-trick!

40 Ours be it, as we can the book of books,
To wonder how is winking possible!

All hail, “White Cotton Night-cap Country,” then!

And yet, as on the beach you promise
book, —

On beach, mere razor-edge 'twixt earth and sea,

I stand at such a distance from the world That 'tis the whole world which obtains regard.

Rather than any part, though part presumed

A perfect little province in itself, When wayfare made acquaintance first therewith.

So standing, therefore, on this edge of
things,

What if the backward glance I gave, return 50 Loaded with other spoils of vagrancy

Than I dispatched it for, till I propose The question — puzzled by the sudden
store

Official fancy plumps beneath my nose — “Which sort of Night-cap have you glorified?”

You would be gracious to my ignorance: “What other Night-cap than the normal
one? —

Old honest guardian of man's head and
hair

In its elastic yet continuous, soft,
No less persisting, circumambient gripe, — 60 Night's notice, life is respited from day!

Its form and fashion vary, suiting so Each seasonable want of youth and age.

In infancy, the rosy naked ball Of brain, and that faint golden fluff it
bears,

Are smothered from disaster, — nurses
know

By what foam-fabric; but when youth succeeds,

The sterling value of the article Discards adornment, cap is cap henceforth

Unfeathered by the futile row on row. 70 Manhood strains hard a sturdy stocking-
stuff

O'er well-deserving head and ears: the cone

Is tassel-tipt, commendably takes pride, Announcing workday done and wages pouched,

And liberty obtained to sleep, nay, snore
Unwise, he peradventure shall essay

The sweets of independency for once — Waive its advantage on his wedding-night:

Fool, only to resume it, night the next,
And never part companionship again. 8c

Since, with advancing years, night's solace
soon

Intrudes upon the daybreak dubious life Persuades it to appear the thing it is,

Half-sleep; and so, encroaching more and
more,

It lingers long past the abstemious meal
Of morning, and, as prompt to serve, precedes

The supper-summons, gruel grown a feast.
Finally, when the last sleep finds the eye

So tired it cannot even shut itself, Does not a kind domestic hand unite 90 Friend to friend, lid from lid to part no
more,

Consigned alike to that receptacle
So bleak without, so warm and white within?

"Night-caps, night's comfort of the human race:

Their usage may be growing obsolete,
Still, in the main, the institution stays.
And though yourself may possibly have lived,

And probably will die, undignified — The Never-night-capped — more experienced folk

Laugh you back answer — What should Night-cap be

Save Night-cap pure and simple? Sorts of such?

Take cotton for the medium, cast an eye
This side to comfort, lambswool or the like,
That side to frilly cambric costliness,
And all between proves Night-cap proper."

Add
"Fiddle!" and I confess the argument.

Only, your ignoramus here again Proceeds as tardily to recognize Distinctions: ask him what a fiddle means,
And "Just a fiddle" seems the apt reply.

Yet, is not there, while we two pace the beach,

This blessed moment, at your Kensington,
A special Fiddle-Show and rare array Of all the sorts were ever set to cheek, 'Stablished on clavicle, sawn bow-hand-
wise,

Or touched lute-fashion and forefinger-plucked?

I doubt not there be duly catalogued Achievements all and some of Italy, Guarnerius, Straduarious,¹ — old and new,
Augustly rude, refined to finicking,
This mammoth with his belly full of blare, That mouse of music — inch-long silvery wheeze.

And here a specimen has effloresced Into a scroll-head, there subsides supreme,
And with the tail-piece satisfies mankind.
Why should I speak of woods, grains, stains and streaks,

The topaz varnish or the ruby gum?
We preferably pause where tickets teach "Over this sample would Corelli² croon, Grieving, by minors, like the cushat-dove, Most dulcet Giga,³ dreamiest Saraband."⁴

"From this did Paganini comb the fierce Electric sparks, or to tenuity Pull forth the inmost wailing of the wire — No cat-gut could swoon out so much of
soul!"

Three hundred violin-varieties

² A famous fiddler and composer (1653-1713).

³ Jig.

⁴ A Spanish dance.

Exposed to public view! And dare I
doubt

Some future enterprise shall give the world Quite as remarkable a Night-cap-show?

Methinks, we, arm-in-arm, that festal day, Pace the long range of relics shined aright, so Framed, glazed, each cushioned curiosity, And so begin to smile and to inspect:

"Pope's sickly head-sustainment, damped with dew

Wrung from the all-unfair fight: such a frame —

Though doctor and the devil helped their
best —

Fought such a world that, waiving doctor's
help,

Had the mean devil at its service too!

Voltaire's imperial velvet! Hogarth eyed
The thumb-nail record of some alley-phys, Then chucklingly clapped yonder cosiness (oc On pate, and painted with true flesh and blood!

Poor hectic Cowper's soothing sarsnetstripe!"

And so we profit by the catalogue, Somehow our smile subsiding more and
more,

Till we decline into . . . but no! shut
eyes

And hurry past the shame uncoffined here, The hangman's toilet! If we needs must trench,

For science' sake which craves completeness still,

On the sad confine, not the district's self,
The object that shall close review may be . . .

Well, it is French, and here are we in France:

It is historic, and we live to learn,
And try to learn by reading story-books.

It is an incident of 'Ninety-two,
And, twelve months since, the Commune had the sway.

Therefore resolve that, after all the Whites Presented you, a solitary Red Shall pain us both, a minute and no more!
Do not you see poor Louis pushed to front Of palace-window, in persuasion's name, so

A spectacle above the howling mob
Who tasted, as it were, with tiger-smack, The outstart, the first spirt of blood on
brow,

The Phrygian symbol, the new crown of thorns,

The Cap of Freedom? See the feeble mirth

At odds with that half-purpose to be strong
And merely patient under misery!

And note the ejaculation, ground so hard Between his teeth, that only God could hear,

As the lean pale proud insignificance

With the sharp-featured liver-worried stare Out of the two grey points that did him
stead

And passed their eagle-owner to the front Better than his mob-elbowed undersize, —
The Corsican lieutenant commented

"Had I but one good regiment of my own, How soon should volleys to the due amount Lay stiff upon the street-flags this canaille!
As for the droll there, he that plays the
king

to And screws out smile with a Red night-cap
on,

He's done for! Somebody must take his
place."

White Cotton Night-cap Country: excellent!

Why not Red Cotton Night-cap Country
too?

"Why not say swans are black and blackbirds white,

Because the instances exist?" you ask.

"Enough, that white, not red, predominates,

Is normal, in cleric phrase

Quod semel, semper, et ubique." Here,

Applying such a name to such a land,

to Especially you find inopportune,

Impertinent, my scruple whether white

Or red describes the local colour best.

"Let be" (you say), "the universe at large

Supplied us with exceptions to the rule,

So manifold, they bore no passing-by, — Little Saint-Rambert has conserved at
least

The pure tradition: white from head to heel,

Where is a hint of the ungracious hue?

See, we have traversed with hop, step and
jump,

to From heel to head, the main-street in a trice,

Measured the garment (help my metaphor!)

Not merely criticised the cap, forsooth;

And were you pricked by that collecting-
itch,

That prurience for writing o'er your reds

'Rare, rarer, rarest, not rare but unique,'—

The shelf, Saint-Rambert, of your cabinet

Unlabelled, — virginal, no Rahab-thread!

For blushing token of the spy's success, —

Would taunt with vacancy, I undertake!

to What, yonder is your best apology,

Pretext at most approach to naughtiness,

Impingement of the ruddy on the blank?

This is the criminal Saint-Rambertese

Who smuggled in tobacco, half-a-pound!

The Octroi² found it out and fined the wretch,

² Taxes levied at the gates of cities.

This other is the culprit who despatched A hare, he thought a hedgehog (clods obstruct),

Unfurnished with Permission for the Chase!

As to the womankind — renounce from those

The hope of getting a companion-tinge, 50

First faint touch promising romantic
fault!"

Enough: there stands Red Cotton Nightcap shelf

A cavern's ostentatious vacancy —

My contribution to the show; while
yours —

Whites heap your row of pegs from every hedge

Outside, and house inside Saint-Rambert
here —

We soon have come to end of. See, the
church

With its white steeple gives your challenge
point,

Perks as it were the night-cap of the town,

Starchedly warrants all beneath is matched 60
By all above, one snowy innocence!

You put me on my mettle. British maid

And British man, suppose we have it out

Here in the fields, decide the question so?

Then, British fashion, shake hands hard
again,

Go home together, friends the more confirmed

That one of us — assuredly myself —

Looks puffy about eye, and pink at nose?

Which "pink" reminds me that the arduousness

We both acknowledge in the enterprise, 70

Claims, counts upon a large and liberal

Acceptance of as good as victory

In whatsoever just escapes defeat.

You must be generous, strain point, and
call

Victory, any the least flush of pink Made prize of, labelled scarlet for the nonce —

Faintest pretension to be wrong and red

And picturesque, that varies by a splotch

The righteous flat of insipidity.

Quick to the quest, then, — forward, the 80 firm foot!

Onward, the quarry-overtaking eye!

For, what is this, by way of march-tune,
makes

The musicaliest buzzing at my ear

By reassurance of that promise old

Though sins are scarlet they shall be as wool?

Whence — what fantastic hope do I deduce?

I am no Liebig: when the dyer dyes

A texture, can the red dye prime the white?
 And if we washed well, wrung the texture
 hard,
 Would we arrive, here, there and everywhere,
 At a fierce ground beneath the surface
 meek?

I take the first chance, rub to threads what rag Shall flutter snowily in sight. For see!
 Already these few yards upon the rise, Our back to brave Saint-Rambert, how
 we reach

The open, at a dozen steps or strides!
 10 Turn round and look about, a breathing-
 while!

There lie, outspread at equidistance, thorpes

And villages and towns along the coast, Distinguishable, each and all alike, By white persistent Night-cap, spire on spire.

Take the left: yonder town is — what say you

If I say "Londres"? Ay, the mother-mouse

(Reversing fable, as truth can and will) Which gave our mountain of a London
 birth!

This is the Conqueror's country, bear in
 mind,

20 And Londres-district blooms with London-
 pride.

Turn round: La Roche, to right, where oysters thrive:

Monlieu — the lighthouse is a telegraph;
 This, full in front, Saint-Rambert; then
 succeeds

Villeneuve, and Pons the Young with Pons
 the Old,

And — ere faith points to Joyeux, out of sight,

A little nearer — oh, La Ravissante!

There now is something like a Night-cap
 spire,

Donned by no ordinary Notre-Dame!
 For, one of the three safety-guards of France,

30 You front now, lady! Nothing intercepts
 The privilege, by crow-flight, two miles far.
 She and her sisters Lourdes and La Salette Are at this moment hailed the cynosure Of poor dear France, such waves have buffeted

Since she eschewed infallibility And chose to steer by the vague compassbox.

This same midsummer month, a week ago,
 Was not the memorable day observed For reinstatement of the misused Three 40 In old supremacy for evermore?

 Did not the faithful flock in pilgrimage

By railway, diligence and steamer — nay On foot with staff and scrip, to see the sights

Assured them? And I say best sight was
 here:

And nothing justified the rival Two
 In their pretension to equality;
 Our folk laid out their ticket-money best,
 And wiseliest, if they walked, wore shoe
 away;

Not who went farther only to fare worse.
 For, what was seen at Lourdes and La Salette

Except a couple of the common cures
 Such as all three can boast of, any day?

While here it was, here and by no means
 there,

That the Pope's self sent two great real gold crowns

As thick with jewelry as thick could stick,
 His present to the Virgin and her Babe — Provided for — who knows not? — by that fund,

Count Alessandro Sforza's legacy, Which goes to crown some Virgin every year.

But this year, poor Pope was in prison-
 house,

And money had to go for something else;
 And therefore, though their present seemed the Pope's,

The faithful of our province raised the sum Preached and prayed out of — nowise purse alone.

Gentle and simple paid in kind, not cash,
 The most part: the great lady gave her brooch,

The peasant-girl her hair-pin; 'twas the rough

Bluff farmer mainly who, — admonished
 well

By wife to care lest his new colewort-crop Stray sorrowfully sparse like last year's seed, —

Lugged from reluctant pouch the fifty-franc,

And had the Curé's hope that rain would cease.

And so the sum in evidence at length,
 Next step was to obtain the donative

By the spontaneous bounty of the Pope —
 No easy matter, since his Holiness

Had turned a deaf ear, long and long ago,
 To much entreaty on our Bishop's part,

Commendably we boast. "But no,"
 quoth he,

"Image and image needs must take their
 turn:

Here stand a dozen as importunate."
 Well, we were patient; but the cup ran o'er

When — who was it pressed in and took the prize

But our own offset, set far off indeed
 To grow by help of our especial name,

She of the Ravissante — in Martinique!
 "What?" cried our patience at the boiling-
 point,

"The daughter crowned, the mother's head goes bare?

Bishop of Raimbaux!" — that's our diocese —

"Thou hast a summons to repair to Rome,
 Be efficacious at the Council there: Now is the time or never! Right our wrang!

Hie thee away, thou valued Morillon, And have the promise, thou who hast the vote!"

So said, so done, so followed in due course (To cut the story short) this festival, This famous Twenty-second, seven days
 since.

Oh, but you heard at Joyeux! Pilgrim-
 age,

Concourse, procession with, to head the host,

Cardinal Mirecourt, quenching lesser
 lights:

The leafy street-length through, decked end to end

With August-stripping, and adorned with flags

That would have waved right well but that it rained

Just this picked day, by some perversity.
 And so were placed, on Mother and on

Babe,
 The pair of crowns: the Mother's, you must see!

Miranda, the great Paris goldsmith, made The marvel, — he's a neighbour: that's his park

Before you, tree-topped wall we walk toward

His shop it was turned out the masterpiece, Probably at his own expenditure;

Anyhow, his was the munificence Contributed the central and supreme

Splendour that crowns the crown itself,
 The Stone.

Not even Paris, ransacked, could supply
 That gem: he had to forage in New-York,
 This jeweller, and country-gentleman,
 And most undoubted devotee beside!

Worthily wived, too: since his wife it was Bestowed "with friendly hand" — befitting phrase!

The lace which trims the coronation-robe —

Stiff wear — a mint of wealth on the brocade.

Do go and see what I saw yesterday!
 And, for that matter, see in fancy still,

Since . . .

There now! Even for unthankful me,
 Who stuck to my devotions at high-tide

That festal morning, never had a mind To trudge the little league and join the crowd —

Even for me is miracle vouchsafed!
 How pointless proves the sneer at miracles!

As if, contrariwise to all we want And reasonably look to find, they graced

Merely those graced-before, grace helps no whit,

Unless, made whole, they need physician
 still.

I — sceptical in every inch of me, — 59

Did I deserve that, from the liquid name
 "Miranda," — faceted as lovelily

As his own gift, the gem, — a shaft should shine,

Bear me along, another Abaris,¹ Nor let me light till, lo, the Red is reached,
 And yonder lies in luminosity!

Look, lady! where I bade you glance but
 now!

Next habitation, though two miles away, —
 No tenement for man or beast between, — 60

That, park and domicile, is country-seat
 Of this same good Miranda! I accept

The augury. Or there, or nowhere else, Will I establish that a Night-cap gleams

Of visionary Red, not White for once!
 "Heaven" saith the sage "is with us, here

inside
 Each man:" "Hell also," simpleness sub-joins,

By White and Red describing human flesh.

And yet as we continue, quicken pace,
 Approach the object which determines me

Victorious or defeated, more forlorn 70 My chance seems, — that is certainty at
 least.

Halt midway, reconnoitre! Either side
 The path we traverse (turn and see) stretch fields

Without a hedge: one level, scallop-striped²
 With bands of beet and turnip and luzern,

Limited only by each colour's end, Shelves down, — we stand upon an eminence, —

To where the earth-shell scallops out the
 sea,

A sweep of semicircle; and at edge —

Just as the milk-white incrustations stud 80
 At intervals some shell-extremity,

So do the little growths attract us here, Towns with each name I told you: say,

they touch

The sea, and the sea them, and all is said, So sleeps and sets to slumber that broad
 blue!

The people are as peaceful as the place.
 This, that I call "the path" is road, high-
 way;

² Striped like a scallop-shell.

But has there passed us by a market-cart,
Man, woman, child, or dog to wag a tail?
True, I saw weeders stooping in a field;
But — formidably white the Cap's extent!

Round again! Come, appearance promises!

The boundary, the park-wall, ancient brick,

Upholds a second wall of tree-heads high Which overlean its top, a solid green.

That surely ought to shut in mysteries!

10 A jeweller — no unsuggestive craft!

Trade that admits of much romance, indeed.

For, whom but goldsmiths used old monarchs pledge

Regalia to, or seek a ransom from,

Or pray to furnish dowry, at a pinch,

According to authentic story-books?

Why, such have revolutionised this land
With diamond-necklace-dealing! not to speak

Of families turned upside-down, because The gay wives went and pawned clandestinely

20 Jewels, and figured, till found out, with paste,

Or else redeemed them — how, is horrible!
Then there are those enormous criminals

That love their ware and cannot lose their love,

And murder you to get your purchase back.
Others go courting after such a stone,

Make it their mistress, marry for their wife,
And find out, some day, it was false the while,

As ever wife or mistress, man too fond Has named his Pilgrim, Hermit, Ace of Hearts.

30 Beside — what style of edifice begins
To grow in sight at last and top the scene?
That grey roof, with the range of lucarnes,¹ four

I count, and that erection in the midst — Clock-house, or chapel-spire, or what,
above?

Conventual, that, beyond manorial, sure!
And reason good; for Clairvaux, such its name,

Was built of old to be a Priory, Dependence on that Abbey-for-the-Males
Our Conqueror founded in world-famous Caen,

40 And where his body sought the sepulture
It was not to retain: you know the tale.
Such Priory was Clairvaux, prosperous Hundreds of years; but nothing lasts
below,

And when the Red Cap pushed the Crown
aside,

The Priory became, like all its peers,

¹ Roof windows.

A National Domain: which, bought and sold

And resold, needs must change, with ownership,

Both outside show and inside use; at length
The messuage, three-and-twenty years ago, Became the purchase of rewarded worth 5 Impersonate in Father — I must stoop To French phrase for precision's sake, I fear —

Father Miranda, goldsmith of renown:

By birth a Madrilene,² by domicile

And sojourning accepted French at last.

His energy it was which, trade transferred To Paris, throve as with a golden thumb,

Established in the Place Vendôme. He bought

Not building only, but belongings far

And wide, at Gonther there, Monlieu, 5 Villeneuve,

A plentiful estate: which, twelve years since,

Passed, at the good man's natural demise,
To Son and Heir Miranda — Clairvaux

here,

The Paris shop, the mansion — not to say Palatial residence on Quai Rousseau,

With money, moveables, a mine of wealth —
And young Léonce Miranda got it all.

Ah, but — whose might the transformation be?

Were you prepared for this, now? As we talked,

We walked, we entered the half-privacy, 7
The partly guarded precinct: passed be-

side

The little paled-off islet, trees and turf, Then found us in the main ash-avenue

Under the blessing of its branchage-roof Till, on emergence, what affronts our gaze?

Priory — Conqueror — Abbey-for-the-Males —

Hey, presto, pass, who conjured all away?
Look through the railwork of the gate:

a park

—Yes, but à l'Anglaise, as they compliment!

Grass like green velvet, gravel-walks like gold,

Bosses of shrubs, embosomings of flowers, Lead you — through sprinkled trees of tiny breed

Disporting, within reach of coverture
By some habitual acquiescent oak

Or elm, that thinks, and lets the youngsters laugh —

Lead, lift at last your soul that walks the air,

Up to the house-front, or its back perhaps — Whether façade or no, one coquetry

Of coloured brick and carved stone!
Stucco? Well,

The daintiness is cheery, that I know,

² Of Madrid.

And all the sportive floral framework fits
The lightsome purpose of the architect.
Those lucarnes which I called conventual,
late,

Those are the outlets in the mansarde- roof;¹

And, underneath, what long light elegance
Of windows here suggests how brave inside Lurk eyeballed gems they play the eyelids
to!

Festive arrangements look through such,
be sure!

And now the tower atop, I took for clock's
Or bell's abode, turns out a quaint device, Pillared and temple-treated Belvedere — Pavilion safe within its railed-about Sublimity of area — whence what stretch Of sea and land, throughout the seasons'
change,

Must greet the solitary! Or suppose — If what the husband likes, the wife likes
too —

The happy pair of students cloistered high, Alone in April kiss when Spring arrives!
Or no, he mounts there by himself to meet 20 Winds, welcome wafts of sea-smell, first white bird

That flaps thus far to taste the land again,
And all the promise of the youthful year; Then he descends, unbosoms straight his store

Of blessings in the bud, and both embrace, Husband and wife, since earth is Paradise, And man at peace with God. You see it
all?

Let us complete our survey, go right round
The place: for here, it may be, we surprise
The Priory, — these solid walls, big barns, 30 Grey orchard-grounds, huge four-square stores for stock,

Betoken where the Church was busy once.
Soon must we come upon the Chapel's self.
No doubt next turn will treat us to . . .

Aha,
Again our expectation proves at fault!
Still the bright graceful modern — not to
say

Modish adornment, meets us: Parc Ang- lais,

Tree-sprinkle, shrub-embossment as before.
See, the sun splits on yonder bauble world
Of silvered glass concentrating, every side,

40 All the adjacent wonder, made minute
And touched grotesque by ball-convexity!

Just so, a sense that something is amiss,
Something is out of sorts in the display, Affects us, past denial, everywhere.

The right erection for the Fields, the Wood (Fields — but Elysées, wood — but de Boulogne)

¹ High French roof with rooms in it, first used in the Louvre. Mansard was an architect, died 1666.

Is peradventure wrong for wood and fields
When Vire, not Paris, plays the Capital.

So may a good man have deficient taste;
Since Son and Heir Miranda, he it was 50 Who, six years now elapsed, achieved the
work

And truly made a wilderness to smile.

Here did their domesticity reside,

A happy husband and as happy wife,

Till . . . how can I in conscience longer keep

My little secret that the man is dead

I, for artistic purpose, talk about

As if he lived still? No, these two years
now,

Has he been dead. You ought to sympathise,

Not mock the sturdy effort to redeem 60

My pledge, and wring you out some tragedy

From even such a perfect commonplace!

Suppose I boast the death of such desert

My tragic bit of Red? Who contravenes

Assertion that a tragedy exists

In any stoppage of benevolence,

Utility, devotion above all?

Benevolent? There never was his like:

For poverty, he had an open hand

. . . Or stop — I use the wrong expression 70
here —

An open purse, then, ever at appeal;

So that the unreflecting rather taxed

Profusion than penuriousness in alms.

One, in his day and generation, deemed

Of use to the community? I trust

Clairvaux thus renovated, regalsed,

Paris expounded thus to Normandy,

Answers that question. Was the man devout?

After a life — one mere munificence

To Church and all things churchly, men or 80 mice, —

Dying, his last bequeathment gave land, goods,

Cash, every stick and stiver, to the Church,

And notably to that church yonder, that

Beloved of his soul La Ravissante —

Wherefrom, the latest of his gifts, the Stone

Gratefully bore me as on arrow-flash

To Clairvaux, as I told you.

“Ay, to find

Your Red desiderated article,

Where every scratch and scrape provokes my White

To all the more superb a prominence! 90

Why, 'tis the story served up fresh again —

How it befell the restive prophet old

Who came and tried to curse, but blessed
the land

Come, your last chance! he disinherited

Children: he made his widow mourn too
much

By this endowment of the other Bride —

Nor understood that gold and jewelry Adorn her in a figure, not a fact.
You make that White, I want, so very
white,
'Tis I say now — some trace of Red should
be Somewhere in this Miranda-sanctitude!"

Not here, at all events, sweet mocking
friend!

For he was childless; and what heirs he had

Were an uncertain sort of Cousinry Scarce claiming kindred so as to withhold 10 The donor's purpose though fantastical:
Heirs, for that matter, wanting no increase Of wealth, since rich already as himself;
Heirs that had taken trouble off his hands, Bought that productive goldsmith-business
he,

With abnegation wise as rare, renounced Precisely at a time of life when youth, Nigh on departure, bids mid-age discard Life's other loves and likings in a pack,
To keep, in lucre, comfort worth them all.
20 This Cousinry are they who boast the shop Of "Firm-Miranda, London and New-York."

Cousins are an unconscionable kind;
But these — pretension surely on their part
To share inheritance were too absurd!

"Remains then, he dealt wrongly by his
wife,
Despoiled her somehow by such testament?
Farther than ever from the mark, fair
friend!

The man's love for his wife exceeded
bounds

Rather than failed the limit. 'Twas to
live

30 Hers and hers only, to abolish earth Outside — since Paris holds the pick of
earth —

He turned his back, shut eyes, stopped ears to all

Delicious Paris tempts her children with,
And fled away to this far solitude —
She peopling solitude sufficiently!

She, partner in each heavenward flight sublime,

Was, with each condescension to the
ground,

Duly associate also: hand in hand,
. . . Or side by side, I say by preference —

On every good work sidelingly they went.
40 Hers was the instigation — none but she Willed that, if death should summon first her lord,

Though she, sad relict, must drag residue Of days encumbered by this load of wealth —

(Submitted to with something of a grace
So long as her surviving vigilance

Might worthily administer, convert Wealth to God's glory and the good of
man,

Give, as in life, so now in death, effect (To cherished purpose) — yet she begged and prayed

That, when no longer she could supervise
The House, it should become a Hospital:
For the support whereof, lands, goods and cash

Alike will go, in happy guardianship To yonder church, la Ravissante: who debt

To God and man undoubtedly will pay.

"Not of the world, your heroine!"

Do you know

I saw her yesterday — set eyes upon The veritable personage, no dream?
I in the morning strolled this way, as oft,
And stood at entry of the avenue.

When, out from that first garden-gate, we gazed

Upon and through, a small procession swept —

Madame Miranda with attendants five.
First, of herself: she wore a soft and white Engaging dress, with velvet stripes and squares

Severely black, yet scarce discouraging: Fresh Paris-manufacture! (Vire's would
do?)

I doubt it, but confess my ignorance.) Her figure? somewhat small and darling-
like.

Her face? well, singularly colourless, 7
For first thing: which scarce suits a blonde,
you know.

Pretty you would not call her: though
perhaps

Attaining to the ends of prettiness
And somewhat more, suppose enough of
soul.

Then she is forty full: you cannot judge
What beauty was her portion at eighteen,
The age she married at. So, colourless
I stick to, and if featureless I add, Your notion grows completer: for, although I noticed that her nose was aquiline, 8
The whole effect amounts with me to — blank!

I never saw what I could less describe.
The eyes, for instance, unforgettable Which ought to be, are out of mind as sight.

Yet is there not conceivably a face,
A set of wax-like features, blank at first,
Which, as you bendingly grow warm above, Begins to take impressment from your breath?

Which, as your will itself were plastic here Nor needed exercise of handicraft,

From formless moulds itself to correspond With all you think and feel and are — in fine
 Grows a new revelation of yourself, Who know now for the first time what you want?
 Here has been something that could wait
 awhile,
 Learn your requirement, nor take shape
 before,
 But, by adopting it, make palpable
 Your right to an importance of your own, Companions somehow were so slow to
 see!
 10 — Far delicater solace to conceit Than should some absolute and final face, Fit representative of soul inside, Summon you to surrender — in no way Your breath's impressment, nor, in stranger's guise,
 Yourself — or why of force to challenge
 you?
 Why should your soul's reflection rule your
 soul?
 ("You" means not you, nor me, nor any-
 one Framed, for a reason I shall keep suppressed,
 To rather want a master than a slave: 20 The slavish still aspires to dominate!) So, all I say is, that the face, to me One blur of blank, might flash significance To who had seen his soul reflected there By that symmetric silvery phantom-like Figure, with other five processional.
 The first, a black-dressed matron — maybe,
 maid —
 Mature, and dragonish of aspect, — marched;
 Then four came tripping in a joyous flock,
 Two giant goats and two prodigious sheep 30 Pure as the arctic fox that suits the snow Tripped, trotted, turned the march to merriment,
 But ambled at their mistress' heel — for
 why?
 A rod of guidance marked the Châtelaine,
 And ever and anon would sceptre wave,
 And silky subject leave meandering.
 Nay, one great naked sheep-face stopped to ask
 Who was the stranger, snuffed inquisitive My hand that made acquaintance with its nose, Examined why the hand — of man at least — 40 Patted so lightly, warmly, so like life!
 Are they such silly natures after all?
 And thus accompanied, the paled-off space, Isleted shrubs and verdure, gained the
 group;
 Till, as I gave a furtive glance, and saw Her back-hair was a block of solid gold,
 The gate shut out my harmless question —
 Hair

So young and yellow, crowning sanctity, And claiming solitude . . . can hair be false?

"Shut in the hair and with it your last hope Yellow might on inspection pass for 50
 Red! —

Red, Red, where is the tinge of promised
 Red

In this old tale of town and country life,
 This rise and progress of a family?
 First comes the bustling man of enterprise,
 The fortune-founding father, rightly rough,
 As who must grub and grab, play pioneer.
 Then, with a light and airy step, succeeds
 The son, surveys the fabric of his sire And enters home, unsmirched from top to toe.

Polish and education qualify 60
 Their fortunate possessor to confine His occupancy to the first-floor suite Rather than keep exploring needlessly Where dwelt his sire content with cellarge:
 Industry bustles underneath, no doubt,
 And supervisors should not sit too close.
 Next, rooms built, there's the furniture to buy,

And what adornment like a worthy wife?
 In comes she like some foreign cabinet, Purchased indeed, but purifying quick 70 What space receives it from all traffictaint.

She tells of other habits, palace-life;
 Royalty may have pried into those depths Of sandal-wooded drawer, and set a-creak
 That pigmy portal pranked with lazuli.
 More fit by far the ignoble we replace By objects suited to such visitant Than that we desecrate her dignity
 By neighbourhood of vulgar table, chair, Which haply helped old age to smoke and 80 doze.

The end is, an exchange of city-stir
 And too intrusive burgess-fellowship,
 For rural isolated elegance, Careless simplicity, how preferable!
 There one may fairly throw behind one's
 back

The used-up worn-out Past, we want
 away,

And make a fresh beginning of stale life.
 'In just the place' — does anyone object? —
 'Where aboriginal gentility

Will scout the upstart, twit him with each 90
 trick

Of townish trade-mark that stamps word and deed,

And most of all resent that here town-dross
 He daubs with money-colour to deceive!
 Rashly objected! Is there not the Church To intercede and bring benefic truce At outset? She it is shall equalise
 The labourers i' the vineyard, last as first Pay court to her, she stops impertinence.

'Duke, once your sires crusaded it, we know:
 Our friend the newcomer observes, no less,
 Your chapel, rich with their emblazonry,
 Wants roofing — might he but supply the means!
 Marquise, you gave the honour of your name, Titular patronage, abundant will
 To what should be an Orphan Institute: Gave everything but funds, in brief; and these,
 Our friend, the lady newly resident, 10 Proposes to contribute, by your leave!
 Brothers and sisters lie they in thy lap, Thou none - excluding, all - collecting Church!
 Sure, one has half a foot i' the hierarchy Of birth, when 'Nay, my dear,' laughs out the Duke,
 'I'm the crown's cushion-carrier, but the crown —
 Who gave its central glory, I or you?'
 When Marquise jokes 'My quest, forsooth? Each doit
 I scrape together goes for Peter-pence
 To purvey bread and water in his bonds 20 For Peter's self imprisoned — Lord, how long?
 Yours, yours alone the bounty, dear my dame,
 You plumped the purse which, poured into the plate,
 Made the Archbishop open brows so broad!
 And if you really mean to give that length Of lovely lace to edge the robe!' . . . Ah, friends, Gem better serves so than by calling crowd Round shop-front to admire the million's-worth!
 Lace gets more homage than from lorgnette-stare,
 And comment coarse to match, (should one display 30 One's robe a trifle o'er the baignoire-edge,)¹
 'Well may she line her slippers with the like,
 If minded so! their shop it was produced
 That wonderful parure,² the other day, Whereof the Baron said it beggared him.'
 And so the paired Mirandas built their house, Enjoyed their fortune, sighed for family,
 Found friends would serve their purpose quite as well,
 And come, at need, from Paris — anyhow,
 With evident alacrity, from Vire — 40 Endeavour at the chase, at least succeed

In smoking, eating, drinking, laughing, and Preferring country, oh so much, to town!
 Thus lived the husband; though his wife would sigh
 In confidence, when Courtesses were kind,
 'Cut off from Paris and society!'
 White, White, I once more round you in the ears!
 Though you have marked it, in a corner, yours Henceforth, — Red-lettered 'Failure' very plain,
 I shall acknowledge, on the snowy hem Of ordinary Night-cap! Come, enough! 5
 We have gone round its cotton vastitude, Or half-round, for the end's consistent still,
 A cul-de-sac with stoppage at the sea.
 Here we return upon our steps. One look May bid good morning — properly good night —
 To civic bliss, Miranda and his mate!
 Are we to rise and go?"

No, sit and stay!
 Now comes my moment, with the thrilling throw
 Of curtain from each side a shrouded case.
 Don't the rings shriek an ominous "Ha! 6
 ha!
 So you take Human Nature upon trust?"
 List but with like trust to an incident Which speedily shall make quite Red enough Burn out of yonder spotless napery!
 Sit on the little mound here, whence you seize
 The whole of the gay front sun-satisfied,
 One laugh of colour and embellishment!
 Because it was there, — past those laurustines,³ On that smooth gravel-sweep 'twixt flowers and sward, —
 There tragic death befell; and not one grace Outspread before you but is registered In that sinister coil these last two years Were occupied in winding smooth again.

"True?" Well, at least it was concluded so, Sworn to be truth, allowed by Law as such (With my concurrence, if it matter here)
 A month ago: at Vire they tried the case.

II.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, then, . . .
 but stay!
 Permit me a preliminary word,
 And, after, all shall go so straight to end!
 Have you, the travelled lady, found yourself Inside a ruin, fane or bath or cirque,

Renowned in story, dear through youthful dream?
 If not, — imagination serves as well.
 Try fancy-land, go back a thousand years,
 Or forward, half the number, and confront
 Some work of art gnawn hollow by Time's tooth, Hellenic temple, Roman theatre, Gothic cathedral, Gallic Tuileries,
 But ruined, one and whichsoe'er you like.
 Obstructions choke what still remains intact,
 Yet proffer change that's picturesque in turn;
 Since little life begins where great life ends,
 And vegetation soon amalgamates, Smooth novel shape from out the shapeless old,
 Till broken column, battered cornice block
 The centre with a bulk half weeds and flowers, Half relics you devoutly recognise.
 Devoutly recognising, — hark, a voice
 Not to be disregarded! "Man worked here Once on a time; here needs again to work;
 Ruins obstruct, which man must remedy."
 Would you demur "Let Time fulfil his task,
 And, till the scythe-sweep find no obstacle, Let man be patient"?

The reply were prompt:
 "Glisteningly beneath the May-night moon, Herbage and floral coverture bedeck Yon splintered mass amidst the solitude:
 Wolves occupy the background, or some snake Glides by at distance; picturesque enough!
 Therefore, preserve it? Nay, pour daylight in, —
 The mound proves swarming with humanity.
 There never was a thorough solitude,
 Now you look nearer: mortal busy life
 First of all brought the crumbings down on pate, Which trip man's foot still, plague his passage much,
 And prove — what seems to you so picturesque
 To him is . . . but experiment yourself
 On how conducive to a happy home Will be the circumstance your bed for base Boasts tessellated pavement, — equally Affected by the scorpion for his nest, —
 While what o'erroofs bed is an architrave, Marble, and not unlikely to crush man
 To mummy, should its venerable prop,

Some fig-tree-stump, play traitor underneath.
 Be wise! Decide! For conservation's sake, Clear the arena forthwith! lest the tread
 Of too-much-ried impatience trample out Solid and unsubstantial to one blank Mud-mixture, picturesque to nobody,
 And, task done, quarrel with the parts intact Whence came the filtered fine dust, whence the crash Bides but its time to follow. Quick conclude Removal, time efforts so tardily,
 Of what is plain obstruction; rubbish cleared, Let partial-ruin stand while ruin may,
 And serve world's use, since use is manifold.
 Repair wreck, stanchion¹ wall to heart's content,
 But never think of renovation pure And simple, which involves creation too.
 Transform and welcome! Yon tall tower may help (Though built to be a belfry and nought else)
 Some Father Secchi² to tick Venus off
 In transit: never bring there bell again,
 To damage him aloft, brain us below,
 When new vibrations bury both in brick!" Monsieur Léonce Miranda, furnishing
 The application at his cost, poor soul!
 Was instanced how, — because the world lay strewn With ravage of opinions in his path,
 And neither he, nor any friendly wit, Knew and could teach him which was firm,
 which frail,
 In his adventure to walk straight through life
 The partial-ruin, — in such enterprise, He struggled into rubbish, struggled on,
 And stumbled out again observably.
 "Yon buttress still can back me up," he judged:
 And at a touch down came both he and it.
 "A certain statue, I was warned against,
 Now, by good fortune, lies well under foot,
 And cannot tempt to folly any more:"
 So, lifting eye, aloft since safety lay,
 What did he light on? the Idalian shape,
 The undeposed, erectly Victrix still!
 "These steps ascend the labyrinthine stair Whence, darkling and on all-fours, out I stand Exalt and safe, and bid low earth adieu —
 For so instructs 'Advice to who would climb:'" And all at once the climbing landed him — Where, is my story.

- Take its moral first.
 Do you advise a climber? Have respect To the poor head, with more or less of brains
 To spill, should breakage follow your advice!
 Head-break to him will be heart-break to
 you
 For having preached "Disturb no ruins
 here!"
 Are not they crumbling of their own accord?
 Meantime, let poets, painters keep a prize!
 Beside, a sage pedestrian picks his way."
 A sage pedestrian — such as you and I!
 10 What if there trip, in merry carelessness, And come to grief, a weak and foolish
 child?
 Be cautious how you counsel climbing,
 then!
- Are you adventurous and climb yourself?
 Plant the foot warily, accept a staff, Stamp only where you probe the standing-
 point,
 Move forward, well assured that move
 you may:
 Where you mistrust advance, stop short,
 there stick!
 This makes advancing slow and difficult?
 Hear what comes of the endeavour of brisk youth 20 To foot it fast and easy! Keep this same Notion of outside mound and inside mash, Towers yet intact round turfy rottenness, Symbolic partial-ravage, — keep in mind!
 Here fortune placed his feet who first of all Found no incumbrance, till head found
 . . . But hear!
- This son and heir then of the jeweller, Monsieur Léonce Miranda, at his birth, Mixed the Castilian passionate blind blood
 With answerable gush, his mother's gift, 30 Of spirit, French and critical and cold.
 Such mixture makes a battle in the brain, Ending as faith or doubt gets uppermost; Then will has way a moment, but no
 more:
 So nicely-balanced are the adverse strengths,
 That victory entails reverse next time.
 The tactics of the two are different And equalise the odds: for blood comes
 first,
 Surrounding life with undisputed faith.
 But presently, a new antagonist, 40 By scarce-suspected passage in the dark, Steals spirit, fingers at each crevice found Athwart faith's stronghold, fronts the astonished man:
 "Such pains to keep me far, yet here stand
 I,
 Your doubt inside the faith-defence of
 you!"
- With faith it was friends bulwarked him
 about
 From infancy to boyhood; so, by youth,
 He stood impenetrably circuited, Heaven-high and low as hell: what lacked he thus,
 Guarded against aggression, storm or sap?
 What foe would dare approach? Historic
 Doubt?
 Ay, were there some half-knowledge to attack!
 Batter doubt's best, sheer ignorance will beat.
 Acumen metaphysic? — drills its way Through what, I wonder! A thick feather-bed
 Of thoughtlessness, no operating tool — Framed to transpire the flint-stone — fumbles at,
 With chance of finding an impediment!
 This Ravissante, now: when he saw the
 church
 For the first time, and to his dying-day,
 His firm belief was that the name fell fit 6 From the Delivering Virgin, nighed and
 known;
 As if there wanted records to attest
 The appellation was a pleasantry, A pious rendering of Rare Vissante,
 The proper name which erst our province
 bore.
 He would have told you that Saint Aldabert Founded the church, (Heaven early favoured France,)
 About the second century from Christ; Though the true man was Bishop of Raimbaux,
 Eleventh in succession, Eldobert, 7 Who flourished after some six hundred
 years.
 He it was brought the image "from afar," (Made out of stone the place produces still) "Infantine Art divinely artless," (Art In the decrepitude of Decadence,) And set it up a-working miracles Until the Northmen's fury laid it low,
 Not long, however: an egregious sheep, Zealous with scratching hoof and routing horn, Unearthed the image in good Mailleville's
 time,
 Count of the country. "If the tale be false, Why stands it carved above the portal
 plain?"
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda used to ask.
 To Londres went the prize in solemn
 pomp,
 But, liking old abode and loathing new,
 Was borne — this time, by angels — back
 again.
 And, reinaugurated, miracle Succeeded miracle, a lengthy list,

Until indeed the culmination came — Archbishop Chaumont prayed a prayer and vowed A vow — gained prayer and paid vow properly —
 For the conversion of Prince Vertgalant.
 These facts, sucked in along with mother's-
 milk,
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda would dispute As soon as that his hands were flesh and bone
 Milk-nourished two-and-twenty years
 before
 So fortified by blind Castilian blood, o What say you to the chances of French cold
 Critical spirit, should Voltaire besiege
 "Alp, Apennine, and fortified redoubt"?
 Ay, would such spirit please to play faith's
 game Faith's way, attack where faith defends so
 well!
 But then it shifts, tries other strategy.
 Coldness grows warmth, the critical becomes Unquestioning acceptance. "Share and share
 Alike in facts, to truth add other truth!
 Why with old truth needs new truth disagree?"

20 Thus doubt was found invading faith, this
 time,
 By help of not the spirit but the flesh:
 Fat Rabelais chuckled, where faith lay in
 wait
 For lean Voltaire's grimace — French, either foe.
 Accordingly, while round about our friend Ran faith without a break which learned
 eye
 Could find at two-and-twenty years of age,
 The twenty-two-years-old frank footstep
 soon
 Assured itself there spread a standing-
 space
 Flowery and comfortable, nowise rock 30 Nor pebble-pavement roughed for champion's tread
 Who scorns discomfort, pacing at his post.
 Tall, long-limbed, shoulder right and shoulder left,
 And 'twixt acromia ¹ such a latitude, Black heaps of hair on head, and blacker
 bush O'er-rioting chin, cheek and throat and chest, —
 His brown meridional temperament Told him — or rather pricked into his
 sense Plainer than language — "Pleasant station
 here!

¹ Shoulder-blades.

Youth, strength, and lustihood can sleep on turf
 Yet pace the stony platform afterward: 40
 First signal of a foe and up they start!
 Saint Eldobert, at all such vanity, Nay — sinfulness, had shaken head austere.
 Had he? But did Prince Vertgalant?
 And yet,
 After how long a slumber, of what sort,
 Was it, he stretched octogenary joints And, nigh on Day-of-Judgment trumpet-
 blast,
 Jumped up and manned wall, brisk as any bee?"

Nor Rabelais nor Voltaire, but Sganarelle,² You comprehend, was pushing through the 50
 chink!
 That stager in the saint's correct costume,
 Who ever has his speech in readiness For thickhead juvenility at fault:
 "Go pace yon platform and play sentinel!
 You won't? The worse! but still a worse might hap.
 Stay then, provided that you keep in sight
 The battlement, one bold leap lands you
 by!
 Resolve not desperately 'Wall or turf, Choose this, choose that, but no alternative!'
 No! Earth left once were left for good 60
 and all:
 'With Heaven you may accommodate
 yourself.'

Saint Eldobert — I much approve his
 mode;
 With sinner Vertgalant I sympathise;
 But histrionic Sganarelle, who prompts While pulling back, refuses yet concedes, —
 Whether he preach in chair, or print in
 book,
 Or whisper due sustainment to weak
 flesh,
 Counting his sham beads threaded on a
 lie — Surely, one should bid pack that mountebank!
 Surely, he must have momentary fits 70
 Of self-sufficient stage-forgetfulness, Escapings of the actor-lassitude
 When he allows the grace to show the grin, Which ought to let even thickheads recognise (Through all the busy and benefic part, — Bridge-building, or rock-riving, or good clean Transport of church and congregation both From this to that place with no harm at
 all,)

² See Molière.

The Devil, that old stager, at his trick Of general utility, who leads Downward, perhaps, but fiddles all the
way!

Therefore, no sooner does our candidate For saintship spotlessly emerge soul-cleansed

From First Communion to mount guard at post,

Paris-proof, top to toe, than up there starts

The Spirit of the Boulevard — you know Who —

With jocund "So, a structure fixed as
fate,

10 Faith's tower joins on to tower, no ring more round,

Full fifty years at distance, too, from youth!
Once reach that precinct and there fight your best,

As looking back you wonder what has
come

Of daisy-dappled turf you danced across!
Few flowers that played with youth shall pester age,

However age esteem the courtesy;

And Eldobert was something past his prime,

Stocked Caen with churches ere he tried hand here.

Saint-Sauveur, Notre-Dame, Saint-Pierre, Saint-Jean

10 Attest his handiwork commenced betimes.
He probably would preach that turf is mud.

Suppose it mud, through mud one picks a
way,

And when, clay-clogged, the struggler steps to stone,

He uncakes shoe, arrives in manlier guise
Than carried pick-a-back by Eldobert

Big-baby-fashion, lest his leathers leak!
All that parade about Prince Vertgalant

Amounts to — your Castilian helps
enough —

Inveni ovem quæ perierat:

30 But ask the pretty votive statue-thing What the lost sheep's meantime amusements were

Till the Archbishop found him! That stays blank:

They washed the fleece well and forgot
the rest.

Make haste, since time flies, to determine,
though!"

Thus opportunely took up parable, — Admonishing Miranda just emerged

Pure from The Ravissante and Paris-
proof, —

Saint Sganarelle: then slipped aside, changed mask,

And made re-entry as a gentleman

Born of the Boulevard, with another 40
speech
I spare you.

So, the year or two revolved,
And ever the young man was dutiful To altar and to hearth: had confidence In the whole Ravissantish history.

Voltaire? Who ought to know so much of him, —

Old sciolist, whom only boys think sage, —
As one whose father's house upon the Quai

Neighbour'd the very house where that Voltaire

Died mad and raving, not without a burst
Of squibs and crackers too significant? 50

Father and mother hailed their best of
sons,

Type of obedience, domesticity,
Never such an example inside doors!

Outside, as well not keep too close a watch;
Youth must be left to some discretion there.

And what discretion proved, I find deposed At Vire, confirmed by his own words: to wit,

How, with the sprightliness of twenty-five, Five — and not twenty, for he gave their names

With laudable precision — were the few 60
Appointed by him unto mistress-ship;

While, meritoriously the whole long week
A votary of commerce only, week

Ended, "at shut of shop on Saturday, Do I, as is my wont, get drunk," he writes

In airy record to a confidant.
"Bragging and lies!" replied the apologist:

"And do I lose by that?" laughed Somebody

At the Court-edge a-tiptoe, mid the crowd, In his own clothes, a-listening to men's 70
Law.

Thus while, prospectively a combatant,
The volunteer bent brows, clenched jaws, and fierce

Whistled the march-tune "Warrior to the wall!"

Something like flowery laughter round his feet

Tangled him of a sudden with "Sleep
first!"

And fairly flat upon the turf sprawled he And let strange creatures make his mouth their home.

Anyhow, 'tis the nature of the soul
To seek a show of durability,

Nor, changing, plainly be the slave of 80
change.

Outside the turf, the towers: but, round
the turf,

A tent may rise, a temporary shroud,
Mock-faith to suit a mimic dwelling-place:

Tent which, while screening jollity inside
From the external circuit — evermore

A menace to who lags when he should march — Yet stands a-tremble, ready to collapse
 At touch of foot: turf is acknowledged grass,
 And grass, though pillowy, held contemptible Compared with solid rock, the rampired ridge.
 To truth a pretty homage thus we pay By testifying — what we dally with, Falsehood, (which, never fear we take for truth!)
 We may enjoy, but then — how we despise!

Accordingly, on weighty business bound,
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda stooped to play,
 But, with experience, soon reduced the game
 To principles, and thenceforth played by rule:
 Rule, dignifying sport as sport, proclaimed
 No less that sport was sport and nothing more.
 He understood the worth of womankind, —
 To furnish man — provisionally — sport:
 Sport transitive — such earth's amusements are:
 But, seeing that amusements pall by use,
 Variety therein is requisite.
 And since the serious work of life were wronged Should we bestow importance on our play,
 It follows, in such womankind-pursuit, Cheating is lawful chase. We have to spend An hour — they want a lifetime thrown away:
 We seek to tickle sense — they ask for soul,
 As if soul had no higher ends to serve!
 A stag-hunt gives the royal creature law:
 Bat-fowling is all fair with birds at roost,
 The lantern and the claret suit the hedge.
 Which must explain why, bent on Boulevard game, Monsieur Léonce Miranda decently Was prudent in his pleasure — passed himself Off on the fragile fair about his path
 As the gay devil rich in mere good looks, Youth, hope — what matter though the purse be void?
 "If I were only young Miranda, now, Instead of a poor clerkly drudge at desk
 All day, poor artist vainly bruising brush On palette, poor musician scraping gut
 With horseshair teased that no harmonics come!
 Then would I love with liberality,
 Then would I pay! — who now shall be repaid,

Repaid alike for present pain and past,
 If Mademoiselle permit the contre-danse, Sing 'Gay in garret youth at twenty lives,'
 And afterward accept a lemonade!"
 Such sweet facilities of intercourse Afford the Winter-Garden and Mabilie!
 "Oh, I unite" — runs on the confidence, 50 Poor fellow, that was read in open Court, — "Amusement with discretion: never fear My escapades cost more than market-price!
 No durably-attached Miranda-dupe, Sucked dry of substance by two clinging lips, Promising marriage, and performing it!
 Trust me, I know the world, and know myself,
 And know where duty takes me — in good time!"

Thus fortified and realistic, then,
 At all points thus against illusion armed, 60
 He wisely did New Year inaugurate By playing truant to the favoured five:
 And sat installed at "The Varieties," — Playhouse appropriately named, — to note (Prying amid the turf that's flowery there) What primrose, firstling of the year, might push The snows aside to deck his button-hole — Unnoticed by that outline sad, severe, (Though fifty good long years removed from youth)
 That tower and tower, — our image, bear 70 in mind!

No sooner was he seated than, behold,
 Out burst a polyanthus! He was 'ware
 Of a young woman niched in neighbourhood;
 And ere one moment flitted, fast was he Found captive to the beauty evermore,
 For life, for death, for heaven, for hell, her own.
 Philosophy, bewail thy fate! Adieu, Youth realistic and illusion-proof!
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda, — hero late Who "understood the worth of woman-kind," 80
 "Who found therein — provisionally — sport," — Felt, in the fitting of a moment, fool
 Was he, and folly all that seemed so wise,
 And the best proof of wisdom's birth would be That he made all endeavour, body, soul,
 By any means, at any sacrifice Of labour, wealth, repute, and (— well, the time For choosing between heaven on earth, and heaven In heaven, was not at hand immediately—)

Made all endeavour, without loss incurred
Of one least minute, to obtain her love.
"Sport transitive?" "Variety required?"
"In loving were a lifetime thrown away?"
How singularly may young men mistake!
The fault must be repaired with energy.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda ate her up With eye-devouring; when the unconscious fair Passed from the close-packed hall, he pressed behind; 10 She mounted vehicle, he did the same, Coach stopped, and cab fast followed, at one door —
Good house in unexceptionable street.
Out stepped the lady, — never think,
alone!
A mother was not wanting to the maid,
Or, may be, wife, or widow, might one
say?
Out stepped and properly down flung himself Monsieur Léonce Miranda at her feet —
And never left them after, so to speak,
For twenty years, till his last hour of life, 20 When he released them, as precipitate.
Love proffered and accepted then and
there!
Such potency in word and look has truth.

Truth I say, truth I mean: this love was
true,
And the rest happened by due consequence.
By which we are to learn that there exists
A falsish false, for truth's inside the same,
And truth that's only half true, falsish
truth.
The better for both parties! folk may taunt
That half your rock-built wall is rubble-
heap:
30 Answer them, half their flowery turf is stones!
Our friend had hitherto been decking coat If not with stones, with weeds that stones befit,
With dandelions — "primrose-buds," smirked he;
This proved a polyanthus on his breast, Prize-lawful or prize-lawless, flower the
same.
So with his other instance of mistake:
Was Christianity the Ravissante?
And what a flower of flowers he chanced on now!
To primrose, polyanthus I prefer 40 As illustration, from the fancy-fact That out of simple came the composite By culture: that the florist bedded thick His primrose-root in ruddle,¹ bullock's
blood,

¹ Red earth or chalk.

Ochre and devils'-dung, for aught I know,
Until the pale and pure grew fiery-fine,
Ruby and topaz, rightly named anew.
This lady was no product of the plain;
Social manure had raised a rarity.
Clara de Millefleurs (note the happy name Blazed in the full-blown glory of her
Spring.
Peerlessly perfect, form and face: for
both —
"Imagine what, at seventeen, may have proved Miss Pages, the actress: Pages herself, my
dear!"
Noble she was, the name denotes: and rich?
"The apartment in this Coliseum Street, Furnished, my dear, with such an elegance, Testifies wealth, my dear, sufficiently!
What quality, what style and title, eh?
Well now, waive nonsense, you and I are
boys
No longer: somewhere must a screw be 60
slack!
Don't fancy, Duchesses descend at door From carriage-step to stranger prostrate stretched,
And bid him take heart, and deliver mind, March in and make himself at ease forth-
with, —
However broad his chest and black his beard,
And comely his belongings, — all through
love
Protested in a world of ways save one Hinting at marriage!" — marriage which yet means
Only the obvious method, easiest help
To satisfaction of love's first demand, 70
That love endure eternally: "my dear, Somewhere or other must a screw be slack!"

Truth is the proper policy: from truth — Whate'er the force wherewith you fling your speech, —
Be sure that speech will lift you, by re-
bound,
Somewhere above the lowness of a lie!
Monsieur Léonce Miranda heard too true
A tale — perhaps I may subjoin, too trite!
As the meek martyr takes her statued stand Above our pity, claims our worship just 80
Because of what she puts in evidence, Signal of suffering, badge of torture borne In days gone by, shame then but glory
now, Barb, in the breast, turned aureole for the
front!
So, half timidity, composure half,
Clara de Millefleurs told her martyrdom.

Of poor though noble parentage, deprived Too early of a father's guardianship,

What wonder if the prodigality Of nature in the girl, whose mental gifts Matched her external dowry, form and
face —

If these suggested a too prompt resource To the resourceless mother? "Try the Stage

And so escape starvation! Prejudice Defames Mimetic Art: be yours to prove That gold and dross may meet and never mix,

Purity plunge in pitch yet soil no plume!"

10 All was prepared in London — (you conceive

The natural shrinking from publicity
In Paris, where the name excites remark) London was ready for the grand début;
When some perverse ill-fortune, incident
To art mimetic, some malicious thrust Of Jealousy who sidles 'twixt the scenes Or pops up sudden from the prompter's hole,

Somehow the brilliant bubble bursts in suds.

Want followed: in a foreign land, the pair!

20 O hurry over the catastrophe — Mother too sorely tempted, daughter tried Scarcely so much as circumvented, say!
Caged unsuspecting artless innocence!

Monsieur Léonce Miranda tell the rest! —
The rather that he told it in a style To puzzle Court Guide students, much more me.

"Brief, she became the favourite of Lord N.,

An aged but illustrious Duke, thereby Breaking the heart of his competitor

30 The Prince of O. Behold her palaced
straight

In splendour, clothed in diamonds" (phrase how fit!),

"Giving tone to the City by the Thames!
Lord N., the aged but illustrious Duke,
Was even on the point of wedding her,
Giving his name to her" (why not to us?)

"But that her better angel interposed.
She fled from such a fate to Paris back,
A fortnight since: conceive Lord N.'s despair!

40 Duke as he is, there's no invading France.
He must restrict pursuit to postal plague
Of writing letters daily, duly read

As daintily she hands them to myself,
The privileged supplanter, who therewith Light a cigar and see abundant blue" — (Either of heaven or else Havanna-smoke.)

"Think! she, who helped herself to diamonds late,

In passion of disinterestedness
Now — will accept no tribute of my love Beyond a paltry ring, three Louis'-worth!

50 Little she knows I have the rummaging

Of old Papa's shop in the Place. Vendôme!"

So wrote entrancedly to confident Monsieur Léonce Miranda. Surely now, If Heaven, that sees all, understands no
less,

It finds temptation pardonable here,
It mitigates the promised punishment, It recognises that to tarry just An April hour amid such dainty turf Means no rebellion against task imposed Of journey to the distant wall one day? 60

Monsieur Léonce Miranda puts the case!
Love, he is purposed to renounce, abjure;
But meanwhile, is the case a common one?
Is it the vulgar sin, none hates as he?

Which question, put directly to "his dear" (His brother — I will tell you in a trice)
Was doubtless meant, by due meandering, To reach, to fall not unobserved before The auditory cavern 'neath the cope

Of Her, the placable, the Ravissante. 70

But here's the drawback, that the image smiles,

Smiles on, smiles ever, says to suppliant
"Ay, ay, ay" — like some kindly weathercock

Which, stuck fast at Set Fair, Favonian Breeze,¹

Still warrants you from rain, though Auster's lead

Bring down the sky above your cloakless mirth.

Had he proposed this question to, nor
"dear"

Nor Ravissante, but prompt to the Police.
The Commissary of his Quarter, now —

There had been shaggy eyebrows elevate 80
With twinkling apprehension in each orb Beneath, and when the sudden shut of
mouth

Relaxed, — lip pressing lip, lest out should plump

The pride of knowledge in too frank a
flow, —

Then, fact on fact forthcoming, dose were dealt

Of truth remedial in sufficiency
To save a chicken threatened with the pip, Head-staggers and a tumble from its perch.

Alack, it was the lady's self that made The revelation, after certain days 90

— Nor so unwisely! As the haschisch-
man

Prepares a novice to receive his drug, Adroitly hides the soil with sudden spread

Of carpet ere he seats his customer:
Then shows him how to smoke himself
about

With Paradise; and only when, at puff Of pipe, the Houri dances round the brain

Of dreamer, does he judge no need is now
For circumspection and punctiliousness;
He may resume the serviceable scrap That made the votary unaware of muck.
Just thus the lady, when her brewage —
love —

Was well a-fume about the novice-brain, Saw she might boldly pluck from underneath
Her lover the preliminary lie.

10 Clara de Millefleurs, of the noble race,
Was Lucie Steiner, child to Dominique
And Magdalen Commercy; born at Sierck, About the bottom of the Social Couch.
The father having come and gone again,
The mother and the daughter found their
way

To Paris, and professed mode-merchandise
Were milliners, we English roughlier say;
And soon a fellow-lodger in the house, Monsieur Ulysse Muhlhausen, young and
smart,
Tailor by trade, perceived his housemate's
youth,

20 Smartness, and beauty over and above.
Courtship was brief, and marriage followed
quick,

And quicker — impecuniosity.
The young pair quitted Paris to reside At London: which repaid the compliment
But scurvily, since not a whit the more Trade prospered by the Thames than by the Seine.

Failing all other, as a last resource,
"He would have trafficked in his wife,"
— she said.

If for that cause they quarrelled, 'twas, I
fear,

30 Rather from reclamation of her rights
To wifely independence, than as wronged Otherwise by the course of life proposed:
Since, on escape to Paris back again From horror and the husband, — ill-exchanged

For safe maternal home recovered thus, —
I find her domiciled and dominant In that apartment, Coliseum Street, Where all the splendid magic met and mazed

40 Monsieur Léonce Miranda's venturous eye.
Only, the same was furnished at the cost Of someone notable in days long since, Carlino Centofanti: he it was Found entertaining unawares — if not An angel, yet a youth in search of one.
Why this revelation after reticence?
Wherefore, beginning "Millefleurs," end
at all

Steiner, Muhlhausen, and the ugly rest?
Because the unsocial purse-comptrolling wight,

Carlino Centofanti, — made aware

50 By misadventure that his bounty, crumbs

From table, comforted a visitant, — Took churlish leave, and left, too, debts to pay.

Loaded with debts, the lady needs must bring

Her soul to bear assistance from a friend Beside that paltry ring, three Louis'-worth;
And therefore might the little circumstance That Monsieur Léonce had the rummaging Of old Papa's shop in the Place Vendôme Pass, perhaps, not so unobservably.

Frail shadow of a woman in the flesh, 60

These very eyes of mine saw yesterday,
Would I re-tell this story of your woes,
Would I have heart to do you detriment By pinning all this shame and sorrow plain To that poor chignon, — staying with me
still,

Though form and face have well-nigh faded now, —

But that men read it, rough in brutal print, As two years since some functionary's
voice

Rattled all this — and more by very
much —

Into the ear of vulgar Court and crowd? 70

Whence, by reverberation, rumblings grew To what had proved a week-long roar in France,

Had not the dreadful cannonry drowned
all.

Was, now, the answer of your advocate More than just this? "The shame fell
long ago,

The sorrow keeps increasing: God forbid We judge man by the faults of youth in
age!"

Permit me the expression of a hope Your youth proceeded like your avenue, Stepping by bush, and tree, and taller tree, 80
Until, columnar, at the house they end.
So might your creeping youth columnar
rise

And reach, by year and year, symmetrical, To where all shade stops short, shade's service done.

Bushes on either side, and boughs above, Darken, deform the path else sun would streak;

And, cornered half-way somewhere, I suspect

Stagnation and a horse-pond: hurry past!
For here's the house, the happy half-and-half

Existence — such as stands for happiness 90 True and entire, howe'er the squeamish
talk!

Twenty years long, you may have loved this man;

He must have loved you; that's a pleasant
life,

Whatever was your right to lead the same.
The white domestic pigeon pairs secure,

Nay, does mere duty by bestowing egg In authorised compartment, warm and
safe,

Boarding about, and gilded spire above,
Hoisted on pole; to dogs' and cats' despair!
But I have spied a veriest trap of twigs On tree-top, every straw a thievery, Where the wild dove — despite the fowler's
snare,

The sportsman's shot, the urchin's stone,
— crooned gay,

And solely gave her heart to what she hatched,

o Nor minded a malignant world below.
I throw first stone forsooth? 'Tis mere assault

Of playful sugarplum against your cheek, Which, if it makes cheek tingle, wipes off rouge!

You, my worst woman? Ah, that touches
pride,

Puts on his mettle the exhibitor Of Night-caps, if you taunt him "This,
no doubt, —

Now we have got to Female-garniture, — Crowns your collection, Reddest of the row!"

O unimaginative ignorance

20 Of what dye's depth keeps best apart from worst

In womankind! — how heaven's own pure may seem

To blush aurorally beside such blanched Divineness as the women-wreaths named
White:

While hell, eruptive and fuliginous, Sickens to very pallor as I point

Her place to a Red clout called woman too!
Hail, heads that ever had such glory once Touch you a moment, like God's cloven tongues

Of fire! your lambent aureoles lost may leave

30 You marke' yet, dear beyond true diadems

And hold, each foot, nor spurn, to man's disgrace,

What other twist of fetid rag may fall!
Let sink into the sewer the cupping-cloth!

Lucie, much solaced, I re-finger you,
The medium article; if ruddy-marked With iron-mould, your cambric, — clean at
least

From poison-speck of rot and purulence.
Lucie Muhlhause said — "Such thing
am I:

Love me, or love me no'!" Miranda said

40 "I do love, more than ever, most for this."
The revelation of the very truth

Proved the concluding necessary shake Which bids the tardy mixture crystallise Or else stay ever liquid: shoot up shaft, Durably diamond, or evaporate —

Sluggish solution through a minute's slip.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda took his soul
In both his hands, as if it were a vase,
To see what came of the convulsion there,
And found, amid subsidence, love new-born 50
So sparkingly resplendent, old was new.

"Whatever be my lady's present, past, Or future, this is certain of my soul, I love her: in despite of all I know, Defiance of the much I have to fear,
I venture happiness on what I hope,
And love her from this day for evermore:
No prejudice to old profound respect For certain Powers! I trust they bear in mind

A most peculiar case, and straighten out 60 What's crooked there, before we close accounts.

Renounce the world for them — some day I will:

Meantime, to me let her become the
world!"

Thus mutely might our friend soliloquise Over the tradesmen's bills, his Clara's
gift —

In the apartment, Coliseum Street, Carlino Centofanti's legacy, Provided rent and taxes were discharged — In face of Steiner now, De Millefleurs once,
The tailor's wife and runaway confessed. 70

On such a lady if election light, (According to a social prejudice)
If henceforth "all the world" she constitute

For any lover, — needs must he renounce Our world in ordinary, walked about By couples loving as its laws prescribe, — Renunciation sometimes difficult.
But, in this instance, time and place and
thing

Combined to simplify experiment,
And make Miranda, in the current phrase, 80 Master the situation passably.

For first facility, his brother died —
Who was, I should have told you, confidant, Adviser, referee and substitute,
All from a distance: but I knew how soon
This younger brother, lost in Portugal, Had to depart and leave our friend at large.

Cut off abruptly from companionship With brother soul of bulk about as big, (Obvious recipient — by intelligence 90
And sympathy, poor little pair of souls — Of much affection and some foolishness) Monsieur Léonce Miranda, meant to lean By nature, needs must shift the leaning-
place

To his love's bosom from his brother's neck.

Or fall flat unrelieved of freight sublime.

Next died the lord of the Aladdin's cave, Master o' the mint and keeper of the keys

Of chests chokeful with gold and silver
changed

By Art to forms where wealth forgot itself,
And caskets where reposed each pullet-egg Of diamond, slipping flame from fifty slants.

In short, the father of the family Took his departure also from our scene, Leaving a fat succession to his heir Monsieur Léonce Miranda, — "fortunate If ever man was, in a father's death," 10 (So commented the world, — not he, too
kind,

Could that be, rather than scarce kind
enough)

Indisputably fortunate so far,
That little of incumbrance in his path,
Which money kicks aside, would lie there
long.

And finally, a rough but wholesome shock,
An accident which comes to kill or cure,
A jerk which mends a dislocated joint!
Such happy chance, at cost of twinge, no
doubt,

20 Into the socket back again put truth,
And stopped the limb from longer dragging
lie.

For love suggested "Better shamle on,
And bear your lameness with what grace
you may!"

And but for this rude wholesome accident, Continuance of disguise and subterfuge, Retention of first falsehood as to name
And nature in the lady, might have proved Too necessary for abandonment.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda probably Had else been loth to cast the mask aside,

30 So politic, so self-preservative, Therefore so pardonable — though so
wrong!

For see the bugbear in the background!
Breathe

But ugly name, and wind is sure to waft The husband news of the wife's where-
about:

From where he lies perdue in London
town,

Forth steps the needy tailor on the stage,
Deity-like from dusk machine of fog,
And claims his consort, or his consort's
worth

In rubies which her price is far above.

40 Hard to propitiate, harder to oppose, — Who but the man's self came to banish
fear,

A pleasant apparition, such as shocks
A moment, tells a tale, then goes for good!

Monsieur Ulysse Muhlhausen proved no
less

Nor more than "Gustave," lodging opposite

Monsieur Léonce Miranda's diamond-cave

And ruby-mine, and lacking little thence Save that its gnome would keep the captive
safe,

Never return his Clara to his arms.

For why? He was become the man in 50
vogue,

The indispensable to who went clothed Nor cared encounter Paris-fashion's
blame, —

Such miracle could London absence work.
Rolling in riches — so translate "the vogue" —

Rather his object was to keep off claw Should griffin scent the gold, should wife
lay claim

To lawful portion at a future day, Than tempt his partner from her private spoils.

Best forage each for each, nor coupled hunt!

Pursuantly, one morning, — knock at door 60
With knuckle, dry authoritative cough,
And easy stamp of foot, broke startlingly On household slumber, Coliseum Street:
"Admittance in the name of Law!" In marched

The Commissary and subordinate.

One glance sufficed them. "A marital
pair:

We certify, and bid good morning, sir!
Madame, a thousand pardons!" Whereupon

Monsieur Ulysse Muhlhausen, otherwise Called "Gustave" for convenience of trade, 70 Deposing in due form complaint of wrong, Made his demand of remedy — divorce From bed, board, share of name, and part in goods.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda owned his
fault,

Tested his pure ignorance, from first To last, of rights infringed in "Gustave's"
case:

Submitted him to judgment. Law decreed "Body and goods be henceforth separate!"

And thereupon each party took its way,
This right, this left, rejoicing, to abide 80

Estranged yet amicable, opposites
In life as in respective dwelling-place.

Still does one read on his establishment Huge-lettered "Gustave," — gold out-glittering

"Miranda, goldsmith," just across the street —

"A first-rate hand at riding-habits" — say The instructed — "special cut of chamber-robes."

Thus by a rude in seeming — rightlier
judged

Beneficent surprise, publicity Stopped further fear and trembling, and 90 what tale

Cowardice thinks a covert: one bold splash
Into the mid-shame, and the shiver ends, Though cramp and drowning may begin
perhaps.

To cite just one more point which crowned success:

Madame, Miranda's mother, most of all An obstacle to his projected life In licence, as a daughter of the Church, Duteous, exemplary, severe by right — Moreover one most thoroughly beloved Without a rival till the other sort Possessed her son, — first storm of anger spent,

She seemed, though grumblingly and grudgingly,
To let be what needs must be, acquiesce.
"With Heaven — accommodation possible!"

Saint Sganarelle had preached with such
effect,

She saw now mitigating circumstance.
"The erring one was most unfortunate,
No question: but worse Magdalens repent.
Were Clara free, did only Law allow,

What fitter choice in marriage could have
made

Léonce or anybody?" 'Tis alleged And evidenced, I find, by advocate
"Never did she consider such a tie As baleful, springe to snap whate'er the
cost."

And when the couple were in safety once
At Clairvaux, motherly, considerate, She shrank not from advice. "Since safe you be,

Safely abide! for winter, I know well,
Is troublesome in a cold country-house.
I recommend the south room, that we styled,

Your sire and I, the winter-chamber."

Chance

Or purpose, — who can read the mystery? —

Combined, I say, to bid "Entrench yourself,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, on this turf,
About this flower, so firmly that, as tent Rises on every side around you both,
The question shall become, — Which arrogates

Stability, this tent or those far towers?
May not the temporary structure suit
The stable circuit, co-exist in peace? — Always until the proper time, no fear!
'Lay flat your tent!' is easier said than
done."

So, with the best of auspices, betook Themselves Léonce Miranda and his bride —

Provisionary — to their Clairvaux house,

Never to leave it — till the proper time.

I told you what was Clairvaux-Priory Ere the improper time: an old demesne With memories, — relic half, and ruin
whole, —

The very place, then, to repair the wits 50
Worn out with Paris-traffic, when its lord, Miranda's father, took his month of ease Purchased by industry. What contrast
here!

Repose, and solitude, and healthy ways.
That ticking at the back of head, he took
For motion of an inmate, stopped at once, Proved nothing but the pavement's rattle
left

Behind at Paris: here was holiday.
Welcome the quaint succeeding to the spruce,

The large and lumbersome and — night 60
he breathe

In whisper to his own ear — dignified And gentry-fashioned old-style haunts of
sleep!

Palatial gloomy chambers for parade,
And passage-lengths of lost significance, Never constructed as receptacle,
At his odd hours, for him their actual lord
By dint of diamond-dealing, goldsmithry.
Therefore Miranda's father chopped and
changed

Nor roof-tile nor yet floor-brick, undis-maged

By rains atop or rats at bottom there. 70
Such contrast is so piquant for a month!
But now arrived quite other occupants Whose cry was "Permanency, — life and
death

Here, here, not elsewhere, change is all we dread!"

Their dwelling-place must be adapted,
then,

To inmates, no mere truants from the
town,

No temporary sojourners, forsooth,
At Clairvaux: change it into Paradise!

Fair friend, — who listen and let talk,
alas! —

You would, in even such a state of things, 80 Pronounce, — or am I wrong? — for bidding stay

The old-world inconvenience, fresh as
found.

All folk of individuality Prefer to be reminded now and then,
Though at the cost of vulgar cosiness,
That the shell-outside only harbours man
The vital and progressive, meant to build,
When build he may, with quite a difference,
Some time, in that far land we dream about,
Where every man is his own architect. 90

But then the couple here in question, each
At one in project for a happy life,

Were by no acceptation of the word
So individual that they must aspire To architecture all-appropriate And, therefore, in this world impossible:
They needed house to suit the circumstance,

Proprietors, not tenants for a term.
Despite a certain marking, here and there,
Of fleecy black or white distinguishment, These vulgar sheep wore the flock's uniform.

10 They love the country, they renounce the
town?

They gave a kick, as our Italians say,
To Paris ere it turned and kicked themselves!

Acquaintances might prove too hard to seek,

Or the reverse of hard to find, perchance, Since Monsieur Gustave's apparition there.
And let me call remark upon the list Of notabilities invoked, in Court

At Vire, to witness, by their phrases culled From correspondence, what was the esteem

20 Of those we pay respect to, for "the pair Whereof they knew the inner life," 'tis
said.

Three, and three only, answered the appeal.

First, Monsieur Vaillant, music-publisher,
"Begs Madame will accept civilities."

Next, Alexandre Dumas, — sire, not son, — "Sends compliments to Madame and to
you."

And last — but now prepare for England's
voice!

I will not mar nor make — here's word for
word —

30 "A rich proprietor of Paris, he To whom belonged that beauteous Bagatelle

Close to the wood of Boulogne, Hertford
height,

Assures of homages and compliments Affectionate — not now Miranda but "Madame Muhlhausen." (Was this friend, the Duke

Redoubtable in rivalry before?) Such was the evidence when evidence Was wanted, then if ever, to the worth Whereat acquaintances in Paris prized Monsieur Léonce Miranda's household charm.

40 No wonder, then, his impulse was to live,
In Norman solitude, the Paris life: Surround himself with Art transported
thence,

And nature like those famed Elysian
Fields:

Then, warm up the right colour out of both,
By Boulevard friendships tempted to come
taste

How Paris lived again in little there.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda practised Art.
Do let a man for once live as man likes!
Politics? Spend your life, to spare the world's:

Improve each unit by some particle Of joy the more, deteriorate the orb Entire, your own: poor profit, dismal loss!
Write books, paint pictures, or make music
— since

Your nature leans to such life-exercise!
Ay, but such exercise begins too soon, Concludes too late, demands life whole and sole

Artistry being battle with the age It lives in! Half life, — silence, while you learn

What has been done; the other half, — attempt At speech, amid world's wail of wonder-
ment —

"Here's something done was never done
before!"

To be the very breath that moves the age Means not to have breath drive you bubble-
like

Before it — but yourself to blow: that's strain;

Strain's worry through the life-time, till there's peace;

We know where peace expects the artist-
soul.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda knew as much.
Therefore in Art he nowise cared to be Creative; but creation, that had birth

In storminess long years before was born 70 Monsieur Léonce Miranda, — Art, enjoyed

Like fleshly objects of the chace that tempt In coquetry, not in capture — these might
feast

The dilettante, furnish tavern-fare Open to all with purses open too.

To sit free and take tribute seigneur-like — Now, not too lavish of acknowledgment, Now, self-indulgently profuse of pay, Always Art's seigneur, not Art's serving-
man

Whate'er the style and title and degree, — 80
That is the quiet life and easy death

Monsieur Léonce Miranda would approve Wholly — provided (back I go again To the first simile) that while glasses clink, And viands steam, and banqueting laughs
high,

All that's outside the temporary tent,
The dim grim outline of the circuit-wall, Forgets to menace "Soon or late will drop Pavilion, soon or late you needs must
march,

And laggards will be sorry they were slack! 90 Always — unless excuse sound plausible!"

Monsieur Léonce Miranda knew as much:
Whence his determination just to paint

So creditably as might help the eye
To comprehend how painter's eye grew dim

Ere it produced L'Ingegno's¹ piece of work —

So to become musician that his ear
Should judge, by its own tickling and turmoil,

Who made the Solemn Mass might well die deaf —

So cultivate a literary knack
That, by experience how it wiles the time,
He might imagine how a poet, rapt In rhyming wholly, grew so poor at last
By carelessness about his banker's-book
That the Sieur Boileau (to provoke our smile)

Began abruptly, — when he paid devoir
To Louis Quatorze as he dined in state,
"Sire, send a drop of broth to Pierre Corneille

Now dying and in want of sustenance!"
— I say, these half-hour playings at life's toil,

Diversified by billiards, riding, sport —
With now and then a visitor — Dumas, Hertford — to check no aspiration's
flight —

While Clara, like a diamond in the dark, Should extract shining from what else were shade,

And multiply chance rays a million-fold, — How could he doubt that all offence out-
side, —

Wrong to the towers, which, pillowed on
the turf,

He thus shut eyes to, — were as good as
gone?

So, down went Clairvaux-Priory to dust,
And up there rose, in lieu, yon structure
gay

Above the Norman ghosts: and where the stretch

Of barren country girdled house about,
Behold the Park, the English preference!
Thus made undoubtedly a desert smile Monsieur Léonce Miranda. —

Ay, but she?

One should not so merge soul in soul, you
think?

And I think: only, let us wait, nor want Two things at once — her turn will come in time.

A cork-float danced upon the tide, we saw,
This morning, blinding-bright with briny dews:

There was no disengaging soaked from
sound,

Earth-product from the sister-element.
But when we turn, the tide will turn, I think,

And bare on beach will lie exposed the buoy:

A very proper time to try, with foot
And even finger, which was buoying wave, Which merely buoyant substance, — power to lift,

And power to be sent skyward passively.
Meanwhile, no separation of the pair!

III.

And so slept pleasantly away five years
Of Paradisiac dream; till, as there flit Premonitory symptoms, pricks of pain, 5:
Because the dreamer has to start awake And find disease dwelt active all the while In head or stomach through his night-long
sleep, —

So happened here disturbance to content.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda's last of cares, Ere he composed himself, had been to make Provision that, while sleeping safe he lay, Somebody else should, dragon-like, let fall Never a lid, coiled round the apple-stem, But watch the précieux fruitage. Some- 60
body

Kept shop, in short, played Paris-substitute.
Himself, shrewd, well-trained, early-exercised,

Could take in, at an eye-glance, luck or loss —

Know commerce throve, though lazily uplift

On elbow merely: leave his bed, forsooth?
Such active service was the substitute's.

But one October morning, at first drop Of appled gold, first summons to be grave Because rough Autumn's play turns earnest now,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda was required 70
In Paris to take counsel, face to face,
With Madame-mother: and be rated, too, Roundly at certain items of expense Whereat the government provisional,
The Paris substitute and shopkeeper, Shook head, and talked of funds inadequate:

Oh, in the long run, — not if remedy Occurred betimes! Else, — tap the generous bole

Too near the quick, — it withers to the root —

Leafy, prolific, golden apple-tree, 80
"Miranda," sturdy in the Place Vendôme!

"What is this reckless life you lead?"
began

Her greeting she whom most he feared and
loved,

Madame Miranda. "Luxury, extravagance

Sardanapalus' self might emulate, — Did your good father's money go for this?

- Where are the fruits of education, where The morals which at first distinguished
you,
The faith which promised to adorn your
age?
And why such wastefulness outbreking
now,
When heretofore you loved economy?
Explain this pulling-down and building-up Poor Clairvaux, which your father bought because Clairvaux he found it, and so left to you,
Not a gilt-gingerbread big baby-house!
10 True, we could somehow shake head and shut eye
To what was past prevention on our part —
This reprehensible illicit bond:
We, in a manner, winking, watched con-
sort
Our modest well-conducted pious son With Dalilah: we thought the smoking
flax
Would smoulder soon away and end in snuff.
Is spark to strengthen, prove consuming
fire?
No lawful family calls Clairvaux 'home' — Why play that fool of Scripture whom the
voice 20 Admonished 'Whose to-night shall be those things Provided for thy morning jollity?'
To take one specimen of pure caprice
Out of the heap conspicuous in the plan, — Puzzle of change, I call it, — titled big 'Clairvaux Restored:' what means this Belvedere?
This Tower, stuck like a fool's-cap on the roof —
Do you intend to soar to heaven from
thence?
Tower, truly! Better had you planted
turf —
More fitly would you dig yourself a hole 30 Beneath it for the final journey's help!
O we poor parents — could we prophesy!"
Léonce was found affectionate enough To man, to woman, child, bird, beast, alike;
But all affection, all one fire of heart Flaming toward Madame-mother. Had she posed
The question plainly at the outset "Choose!
Cut clean in half your all-the-world of love,
The mother and the mistress: then resolve, Take me or take her, throw away the
one!" — 40 He might have made the choice and marred my tale.
But, much I apprehend, the problem put Was "Keep both halves, yet do no detriment
To either! Prize each opposite in turn!" Hence, while he prized at worth the Clair-vaux-life
- With all its tolerated naughtiness, He, visiting in fancy Quai Rousseau, Saw, cornered in the cosiest nook of all That range of rooms through number Thirty-three,
The lady-mother bent o'er her bézique;
While Monsieur Curé This, and Sister 54
That —
Superior of no matter what good House — Did duty for Duke Hertford and Dumas, Nay — at his mother's age — for Clara's
self.
At Quai Rousseau, things comfortable
thus,
Why should poor Clairvaux prove so troublesome?
She played at cards, he built a Belvedere.
But here's the difference: she had reached the Towers
And there took pastime: he was still on Turf —
Though fully minded that, when once he marched,
No sportive fancy should distract him more. 60
In brief, the man was angry with himself, With her, with all the world and much
beside:
And so the unseemly words were inter-
changed
Which crystallise what else evaporates,
And make mere misty petulance grow hard And sharp inside each softness, heart and
soul.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda flung at last Out of doors, fever-flushed: and there the Seine
Rolled at his feet, obsequious remedy For fever, in a cold Autumnal flow. 70
"Go and be rid of memory in a bath!"
Craftily whispered Who besets the ear On such occasions.
- Done as soon as dreamed.
Back shivers poor Léonce to bed — where
else?
And there he lies a month 'twixt life and
death,
Raving, "Remorse of conscience!" friends opine.
"Sirs, it may partly prove so," represents Beaumont — (the family physician, he Whom last year's Commune murdered, do you mind?) Beaumont reports "There is some active 80
cause,
More than mere pungency of quarrel
past, —
Cause that keeps adding other food to fire.
I hear the words and know the signs, I say!
Dear Madame, you have read the Book of Saints,
How Antony was tempted? As for me, Poor heathen, 'tis by pictures I am taught.

I say then, I see standing here, — between Me and my patient, and that crucifix
You very properly would interpose, —
A certain woman-shape, one white appeal 'Will you leave me, then, me, me, me for
her?'

Since cold Seine could not quench this flame, since flare

Of fever does not redden it away, — Be rational, indulgent, mute — should
chance

Come to the rescue — Providence, I
mean —

10 The while I blister and phlebotomise!"

Well, somehow rescued by whatever power, At month's end, back again conveyed himself

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, worn to rags,
Nay, tinder: stuff irreparably spoiled, Though kindly hand should stitch and patch its best.

Clairvaux in Autumn is restorative.

A friend stitched on, patched over. All
the same,

Clairvaux looked greyer than a month
ago.

Unglossed was shrubbery, unglorified

20 Each copse, so wealthy once; the garden-plots,

The orchard-walks showed dearth and dreariness.

The sea lay out at distance crammed by cloud

Into a leaden wedge; and sorrowful Sulked field and pasture with persistent rain.

Nobody came so far from Paris now:

Friends did their duty by an invalid Whose convalescence claimed entire repose.

Only a single ministrant was staunch

At quiet reparation of the stuff —

30 Monsieur Léonce Miranda, worn to rags,
But she was Clara and the world beside.

Another month, the year packed up his plagues

And sullenly departed, pedlar-like,

As apprehensive old-world ware might
show

To disadvantage when the new-comer, Merchant of novelties, young 'Sixty-eight, With brand-new bargains, whistled o'er the lea.

Things brightened somewhat o'er the Christmas hearth,

As Clara plied assiduously her task.

40 "Words are but words and wind. Why let the wind

Sing in your ear, bite, sounding, to your brain?

Old folk and young folk, still at odds, of
course!

Age quarrels because spring puts forth a leaf

While winter has a mind that boughs stay
bare;

Or rather — worse than quarrel — age describes

Propriety in preaching life to death.

'Enjoy nor youth, nor Clairvaux, nor poor
me?'

Dear Madame, you enjoy your age, 'tis
thought!

Your number Thirty-three on Quai Rousseau

Cost fifty times the price of Clairvaux, 50 tipped

Even with our prodigious Belvedere;

You entertain the Curé, — we, Dumas:

We play charades, while you prefer bézique:

Do lead your own life and let ours alone!

Cross Old Year shall have done his worst,
my friend!

Here comes gay New Year with a gift, no
doubt.

Look up and let in light that longs to shine — One flash of light, and where will darkness
hide?

Your cold makes me too cold, love! Keep me warm!"

Whereat Léonce Miranda raised his head 60

From his two white thin hands, and forced
a smile,

And spoke: "I do look up, and see your
light

Above me! Let New Year contribute warmth —

I shall refuse no fuel that may blaze."

Nor did he. Three days after, just a spark

From Paris, answered by a snap at Caen Or whither reached the telegraphic wire:

"Quickly to Paris! On arrival, learn Why you are wanted!" Curt and critical!

Off starts Léonce, one fear from head to 70
foot;

Caen, Rouen, Paris, as the railway helps;
Then come the Quai and Number Thirty

three.

"What is the matter, concierge?" — a grimace!

He mounts the staircase, makes for the main
seat

Of dreadful mystery which draws him
there —

Bursts in upon a bedroom known too
well —

There lies all left now of the mother once.
Tapers define the stretch of rigid white,

Nor want there ghastly velvets of the grave.
A blackness sits on either side at watch, 80

Sisters, good souls but frightful all the
same,

Silent: a priest is spokesman for his corpse—“Dead through Léonce Miranda! stricken
down

Without a minute’s warning, yesterday!
What did she say to you, and you to her,
Two months ago? This is the consequence!

The doctors have their name for the disease;

I, you, and God say — heart-break, nothing more!”

Monsieur Léonce Miranda, like a stone

Fell at the bedfoot and found respite so, 10 While the priest went to tell the company.
What follows you are free to disbelieve.
It may be true or false that this good priest Had taken his instructions, — who shall
blame? —

From quite another quarter than, perchance,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda might suppose Would offer solace in such pressing need.
All he remembered of his kith and kin Was they were worthily his substitutes In commerce, did their work and drew their pay.

20 But they remembered, in addition, this — They fairly might expect inheritance, As nearest kin, called Family by law And gospel both. Now, since Miranda’s
life

Showed nothing like abatement of distaste For conjugality, but preference Continued and confirmed of that smooth chain

Which slips and leaves no knot behind, no heir . .

Presumption was, the man, become mature,
Would at a calculable day discard

30 His old and outworn . . . what we blush to name,

And make society the just amends; Scarce by a new attachment — Heaven forbid!

Still less by lawful marriage: that’s reserved

For those who make a proper choice at
first —

Not try both courses and would grasp in
age

The very treasure youth preferred to spurn.
No! putting decently such thought aside,
The penitent must rather give his powers
To such a reparation of the past

40 As, edifying kindred, makes them rich.
Now, how would it enrich prospectively
The Cousins, if he lavished such expense On Clairvaux? — pretty as a toy, but then As toy, so much productive and no more!
If all the outcome of the goldsmith’s shop Went to gild Clairvaux, where remain the funds

For Cousinry to spread out lap and take?
This must be thought of and provided for.

I give it you as mere conjecture, mind!

To help explain the wholesome unannounced

Intelligence, the shock that startled guilt, The scenic show, much yellow, black and
white

By taper-shine, the nuns — portentous
pair,

And, more than all, the priest’s admonishment —

“No flattery of self! You murdered her!

The grey lips, silent now, reprove by mine.

You wasted all your living, rioted

In harlotry — she warned and I repeat!

No warning had she, for she needed none:

If this should be the last yourself receive?” 60

Done for the best, no doubt, though clumsily, —

Such, and so startling, the reception here,
You hardly wonder if down fell at once

The tawdry tent, pictorial, musical,

Poetical, besprent with hearts and darts;

Its cobweb-work, betinseled stitchery,

Lay dust about our sleeper on the turf,

And showed the outer towers distinct and dread.

Senseless he fell, and long he lay, and much Seemed salutary in his punishment 70

To planners and performers of the piece.
When pain ends, pardon prompt may operate.

There was a good attendance close at hand,

Waiting the issue in the great saloon,

Cousins with consolation and advice.

All things thus happily performed to point,
No wonder at success commensurate.

Once swooning stopped, once anguish subsequent

Raved out, — a sudden resolution chilled His blood and changed his swimming eyes 80 to stone,

As the poor fellow raised himself upright, Collected strength, looked, once for all, his
look,

Then, turning, put officious help aside And passed from out the chamber. “For affairs!”

So he announced himself to the saloon:

“We owe a duty to the living too!” —

Monsieur Léonce Miranda tried to smile.

How did the hearts of Cousinry rejoice

At their stray sheep returning thus to fold,

As, with a dignity, precision, sense, 90

All unsuspected in the man before,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda made minute

Detail of his intended scheme of life

Thenceforward and for ever. “Vanity

Was ended: its redemption must begin —

And, certain, would continue; but since
life

Was awfully uncertain — witness here! —

Behoved him lose no moment but discharge

Immediate burthen of the world's affairs On backs that kindly volunteered to crouch.

Cousins, with easier conscience, blamelessly

Might carry on the goldsmith's trade, in
brief,

Uninterfered with by its lord who late
Was used to supervise and take due tithe.
A stipend now sufficed his natural need: Themselves should fix what sum allows man live.

But half a dozen words concisely plain 10 Might, first of all, make sure that, on demise,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda's property Passed by bequeathment, every particle,
To the right heirs, the cousins of his heart.
As for that woman — they would understand!

This was a step must take her by surprise.
It were too cruel did he snatch away Decent subsistence. She was young, and
fair,

And . . . and attractive! Means must be supplied

To save her from herself, and from the
world,

20 And . . . from anxieties might haunt him
else

When he were fain have other thoughts in
mind."

It was a sight to melt a stone, that thaw
Of rigid disapproval into dew Of sympathy, as each extended palm Of cousin hasted to enclose those five Cold fingers, tendered so mistrustfully, Despairingly of condonation now!
You would have thought, — at every fervent shake,

In reassurance of those timid tips, — 30 The penitent had squeezed, considerate, By way of fee into physician's hand For physicking his soul, some diamond knob.

And now let pass a week. Once more behold

The same assemblage in the same saloon, Waiting the entry of protagonist Monsieur Léonce Miranda. "Just a week Since the death-day, was ever man transformed

Like this man?" questioned cousin of his mate.

Last seal to the repentance had been set 40 Three days before, at Sceaux in neighbourhood

Of Paris, where they laid with funeral pomp Mother by father. Let me spare the rest:
How the poor fellow, in his misery, Buried hot face and bosom, where heaped snow

Offered assistance, at the grave's black edge,

And there lay, till uprooted by main force From where he prayed to grow and ne'er
again

Walk earth unworthily as heretofore.

It is not with impunity priests teach

The doctrine he was dosed with from his 50
youth —

"Pain to the body — profit to the soul; Corporeal pleasure — so much woe to pay When disembodied spirit gives account."
However, woe had done its worst, this time.
Three days allow subsidence of much grief.
Already, regular and equable, Forward went purpose to effect. At once The testament was written, signed and sealed.

Disposure of the commerce — that took
time,

And would not suffer by a week's delay; 60
But the immediate, the imperious need,
The call demanding of the Cousinry Co-operation, what convened them thus,
Was — how and when should deputation
march

To Coliseum Street, the old abode Of wickedness, and there acquaint — oh,
shame!

Her, its old inmate, who had followed up And lay in wait in the old haunt for prey —
That they had rescued, they possessed Léonce,

Whose loathing at recapture equalled 70
theirs —

Upbraid that sinner with her sinfulness, Impart the fellow-sinner's firm resolve Never to set eyes on her face again:
Then, after stipulations strict but just,
Hand her the first instalment, — moderate Enough, no question, — of her salary:
Admonish for the future, and so end. — All which good purposes, decided on Sufficiently, were waiting full effect
When presently the culprit should appear. 80

Somehow appearance was delayed too long;
Chatting and chirping sunk inconspicuously To silence, nay, uneasiness, at length Alarm, till — anything for certitude! —
A peeper was commissioned to explore, At keyhole, what the laggard's task might
be —

What caused so palpable a disrespect!

Back came the tiptoe cousin from his quest.
"Monsieur Léonce was busy," he believed,
"Contemplating, — those love-letters, per- 90
haps,

He always carried, as if precious stones,
About with him." He read, one after one, Some sort of letters. But his back was turned.

The empty coffer open at his side,
He leant on elbow by the mantelpiece Before the hearth-fire; big and blazing too.

"Better he shovelled them all in at once, And burned the rubbish!" was a cousin's quip, Warming his own hands at the fire the
while.
I told you, snow had fallen outside, I think.

When suddenly a cry, a host of cries, Screams, hubbub and confusion thrilled
the room.
All by a common impulse rushed thence,
reached
The late death-chamber, tricked with trappings still,
Skulls, cross-bones, and such moral broid-
ery.
70 Madame Muhlhausen might have played the witch,
Dropped down the chimney and appalled
Léonce
Bysome proposal "Parting touch of hand!"
If she but touched his foolish hand, you
know!!

Something had happened quite contrari-
wise.
Monsieur Léonce Miranda, one by one,
Had read the letters and the love they held,
And, that task finished, had required his
soul
To answer frankly what the prospect seemed
Of his own love's departure — pledged to
part!
20 Then, answer being unmistakable,
He had replaced the letters quietly, Shut coffer, and so, grasping either side By its convenient handle, plunged the whole —
Letters and coffer and both hands to boot,
Into the burning grate and held them there.
"Burn, burn and purify my past!" said he,
Calmly, as if he felt no pain at all.

In vain they pulled him from the torture-
place:
The strong man, with the soul of tenfold
strength, 30 Broke from their clutch: and there again smiled he,
The miserable hands re-bathed in fire — Constant to that ejaculation "Burn, Burn, purify!" And when, combining
force,
They fairly dragged the victim out of reach Of further harm, he had no hands to hurt —
Two horrible remains of right and left,
"Whereof the bones, phalanges formerly, Carbonised, were still crackling with the
flame,"
Said Beaumont. And he fought them all the while:
40 "Why am I hindered when I would be pure?"

Why leave the sacrifice still incomplete?
She holds me, I must have more hands to burn!"
They were the stronger, though, and bound him fast.

Beaumont was in attendance presently.
"What did I tell you? Preachment to the deaf!
I wish he had been deafer when they preached,
Those priests! But wait till next Republic comes!"

As for Léonce, a single sentiment Possessed his soul and occupied his
tongue —
Absolute satisfaction at the deed. 54
Never he varied, 'tis observable, Nor in the stage of agonies (which proved Absent without leave, — science seemed to think)
Nor yet in those three months' febricity Which followed, — never did he vary
tale —
Remaining happy beyond utterance.
"Ineffable beatitude" — I quote
The words, I cannot give the smile —
"such bliss Abolished pain! Pain might or might not
be:
He felt in heaven, where flesh desists to fret. 60 Purified now and henceforth, all the past Reduced to ashes with the flesh defiled!
Why all those anxious faces round his bed?
What was to pity in their patient, pray, When doctor came and went, and Cousins watched?
— Kindness, but in pure waste!" he said and smiled.
And if a trouble would at times disturb The ambrosial mood, it came from other
source
Than the corporeal transitory pang.
"If sacrifice be incomplete!" cried he — 70
"If ashes have not sunk reduced to dust,
To nullity! If atoms coalesce Till something grow, grow, grow to be a
shape
I hate, I hoped to burn away from me!
She is my body, she and I are one, Yet, all the same, there, there at bed-foot
stands
The woman wound about my flesh and
blood,
There, the arms open, the more wonderful,
The whiter for the burning . . . Vanish
thou!
Avaunt, fiend's self found in the form I 80 wore!"

"Whereat," said Beaumont, "since his hands were gone,
The patient in a frenzy kicked and licked

To keep off some imagined visitant.
So will it prove as long as priests may preach

Spiritual terrors!" groaned the evidence Of Beaumont that his patient was stark
mad —

Produced in time and place: of which
anon.

"Mad, or why thus insensible to pain?
Body and soul are one thing, with two
names

For more or less elaborated stuff."

Such is the new Religio Medici.

10 Though antiquated faith held otherwise, Explained that body is not soul, but just Soul's servant: that, if soul be satisfied, Possess already joy or pain enough,
It uses to ignore, as master may,
What increase, joy or pain, its servant
brings —

Superfluous contribution: soul, once served,
Has nought to do with body's service more.
Each, speculated on exclusively,
As if its office were the only one,

20 Body or soul, either shows service paid In joy and pain, that's blind and object-
less —

A servant's toiling for no master's good — Or else shows good received and put to use,
As if within soul's self grew joy and pain,
Nor needed body for a ministrant.
I note these old unscientific ways:

Poor Beaumont cannot: for the Commune ruled

Next year, and ere they shot his priests, shot him.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda raved himself 30 To rest; lay three long months in bliss or bale,

Inactive, anyhow: more need that heirs, His natural protectors, should assume The management, bestir their cousinship, And carry out that purpose of reform
Such tragic work now made imperative.
A deputation, with austerity, Nay, sternness, bore her sentence to the fiend

Aforesaid, — she at watch for turn of wheel And fortune's favour, Street — you know
the name.

40 A certain roughness seemed appropriate:
"You —

Steiner, Muhlhausen, whatsoe'er your
name,
Cause whole and sole of this catastrophe!" —

And so forth, introduced the embassy.

"Monsieur Léonce Miranda was divorced
Once and for ever from his — ugly word.
Himself had gone for good to Portugal:
They came empowered to act and stipulate."

Hold! no discussion! Terms were settled
now:

So much of present and prospective pay,
But also — good engagement in plain terms 50
She never seek renewal of the past!"

This little harmless tale produced effect.
Madame Muhlhausen owned her sentence
just,

Its execution gentle. "Stern their phrase, These kinsfolk with a right she recognised —

But kind its import probably, which now Her agitation, her bewilderment Rendered too hard to understand, perhaps.
Let them accord the natural delay,
And she would ponder and decide. Mean- 60
time,

So far was she from wish to follow friend Who fled her, that she would not budge from place —

Now that her friend was fled to Portugal, — Never! She leave this Coliseum Street?
No, not a footstep!" she assured them.

So —
They saw they might have left that tale untold

When, after some weeks more were gone to waste,

Recovery seemed incontestable,
And the poor mutilated figure, once The gay and glancing fortunate young 70
spark,

Miranda, humbled and obedient took The doctor's counsel, issued sad and slow From precincts of the sick-room, tottered
down,

And out, and into carriage for fresh air,
And so drove straight to Coliseum Street, And tottered upstairs, knocked, and in a trice

Was clasped in the embrace of whom you
know —

With much asseveration, I omit, Of constancy henceforth till life should
end.

When all this happened, — "What re- 80 ward," cried she,

"For judging her Miranda by herself!
For never having entertained a thought Of breaking promise, leaving home for-
sooth,

To follow who was fled to Portugal!
As if she thought they spoke a word of
truth!

She knew what love was, knew that he loved her;

The Cousinry knew nothing of the kind."

I will not scandalise you and recount
How matters made the morning pass away.
Not one reproach, not one acknowledg- 90
ment,

One explanation: all was understood!
Matters at end, the home-uneasiness Cousins were feeling at this jaunt prolonged Was ended also by the entry of —
Not simply him whose exit had been made By mild command of doctor "Out with
you!

I warrant we receive another man!"
But — would that I could say, the married
pair!

And, quite another man assuredly, 10 Monsieur Léonce Miranda took on him Forthwith to bid the trio, priest' and nuns,

Constant in their attendance all this while,
Take his thanks and their own departure
too;

Politely but emphatically. Next,
The Cousins were dismissed: "No protest, pray!

Whatever I engaged to do is done,
Or shall be — I but follow your advice:
Love I abjure: the lady, you behold,
Is changed as I myself; her sex is changed:

20 This is my Brother — He will tend me
now,
Be all my world henceforth as brother should.

Gentlemen, of a kinship I revere,
Your interest in trade is laudable:
I purpose to indulge it: manage mine, My goldsmith-business in the Place Ven-
dôme,

Wholly — through purchase at the price adjudged

By experts I shall have assistance from.
If, in conformity with sage advice,
I leave a busy world of interests

30 I own myself unfit for — yours the care That any world of other aims, wherein I hope to dwell, be easy of access Through ministration of the moneys due,
As we determine, with all proper speed,
Since I leave Paris to repair my health.
Say farewell to our Cousins, Brother
mine!"

And, all submissiveness, as brother might,
The lady curtsied gracefully, and dropt More than mere curtesy, a concluding
phrase

40 So silver-soft, yet penetrative too,
That none of it escaped the favoured ears:
"Had I but credited one syllable, I should to-day be lying stretched on
straw,

The produce of your miserable rente!
Whereas, I hold him — do you comprehend?"

Cousin regarded cousin, turned up eye,
And took departure, as our Tuscans laugh, Each with his added palm-breadth of long
nose, —

Curtailed but imperceptibly, next week,

When transfer was accomplished, and the 59
trade

In Paris did indeed become their own, But bought by them and sold by him on terms

'Twixt man and man, — might serve
'twixt wolf and wolf, Substitute "bit and clawed" for "signed and sealed" —

Our ordinary business-terms, in short.
Another week, and Clairvaux broke in bloom

At end of April, to receive again
Monsieur Léonce Miranda, gentleman, Ex-jeweller and goldsmith: never more, — According to the purpose he professed, — 64
To quit this paradise, his property,
This Clara, his companion: so it proved.

The Cousins, each with elongated nose, Discussed their bargain, reconciled them
soon

To hard necessity, disbursed the cash,
And hastened to subjoin, wherever type Proclaimed "Miranda" to the public,
"Called

Now Firm-Miranda." There, a colony, They flourish underneath the name that
still

Maintains the old repute, I understand. 70 They built their Clairvaux, dream-Château in Spain,

Perhaps — but Place Vendôme is waking
worth:

Oh, they lost little! — only, man and man Hardly conclude transactions of the kind As cousin should with cousin, — cousins
think.

For the rest, all was honourably done, So, ere buds break to blossom, let us
breathe!

Never suppose there was one particle Of recrudescence — wound, half-healed
before,

Set freshly running — sin, repressed as such, 80
New loosened as necessity of life!
In all this revocation and resolve, Far be sin's self-indulgence from your
thought!

The man had simply made discovery,
By process I respect if not admire, That what was, was: — that turf, his feet had touched,

Felt solid just as much as yonder towers
He saw with eyes, but did not stand upon,
And could not, if he would, reach in a leap.
People had told him flowery turf was false 94
To footstep, tired the traveller soon, beside:
That was untrue. They told him "One fair stride

Plants on safe platform and secures man
rest."

That was untrue. Some varied the advice:

"Neither was solid, towers no more than turf."

Double assertion, therefore twice as false.

"I like these amateurs" — our friend had laughed,

Could he turn what he felt to what he thought,

And, that again, to what he put in words:

"I like their pretty trial, proof of paste

Or precious stone, by delicate approach

Of eye askance, fine feel of finger-tip,

Or touch of tongue inquisitive for cold.

10 I tried my jewels in a crucible:

Fierce fire has felt them, licked them, left them sound.

Don't tell me that my earthly love is sham,

My heavenly fear a clever counterfeit!

Each may oppose each, yet be true alike!"

To build up, independent of the towers,

A durable pavilion o'er the turf,

Had issued in disaster. "What remained

Except, by tunnel, or else gallery,

To keep communication 'twixt the two,

30 Unite the opposites, both near and far,

And never try complete abandonment

Of one or other?" so he thought, not said.

And to such engineering feat, I say,

Monsieur Léonce Miranda saw the means

Precisely in this revocation prompt

Of just those benefits of worldly wealth

Conferred upon his Cousinry — all but!

This Clairvaux — you would know, were you at top

Of yonder crowning grace, its Belvedere —

30 Is situate in one angle-niche of three

At equidistance from Saint-Rambert —

there

Behind you, and the Ravissante, beside

There: steeple, steeple, and this Clairvaux-

top,

(A sort of steeple) constitute a trine,

With not a tenement to break each side,

Two miles or so in length, if eye can judge.

Now, this is native land of miracle.

O why, why, why, from all recorded time,

Was miracle not wrought once, only once,

40 To help whoever wanted help indeed?

If on the day when Spring's green girlishness

Grew nubile and she trembled into May,

And our Miranda climbed to clasp the

Spring

A-tiptoe o'er the sea, those wafts of

warmth,

Those cloudlets scudding under the bare

blue,

And all that new sun, that fresh hope about

His airy place of observation, — friend,

Feel with me that if just then, just for once,

Some angel, — such as the authentic pen

50 Yonder records a daily visitant

Of ploughman Claude, rheumatic in the joints,

And spinster Jeanne, with megrim troubled sore,

If such an angel, with nought else to do,

Had taken station on the pinnacle

And simply said "Léonce, look straight before!

Neither to right hand nor to left: for why?

Being a stupid soul, you want a guide

To turn the goodness in you to account

And make stupidity submit itself.

Go to Saint-Rambert! Straightway get 64 such guide!

There stands a man of men. You, jeweller,

Must needs have heard how once the biggest block

Of diamond now in Europe lay exposed

Mid specimens of stone and earth and ore,

On huckster's stall, — Navona names the Square,

And Rome the city for the incident, —

Labelled 'quartz-crystal, price one half-penny.'

Haste and secure that ha'p'worth, on your life!

That man will read you rightly head to foot,

Mark the brown face of you, the bushy 70 beard,

The breadth 'twixt shoulder-blades, and through each black

Castilian orbit, see into your soul.

Talk to him for five minutes — nonsense, sense,

No matter what — describe your horse, your hound, —

Give your opinion of the policy

Of Monsieur Rouher, — will he succour Rome?

Your estimate of what may outcome be

From Ecumenical Assemblage there!

After which samples of intelligence,

Rapidly run through those events you call 80

Your past life, tell what once you tried to do,

What you intend on doing this next May!

There he stands, reads an English newspaper,

Stock-still, and now, again upon the move,

Paces the beach to taste the Spring, like you,

Since both are human beings in God's eye.

He will have understood you, I engage.

Endeavour, for your part, to understand

He knows more, and loves better, than the world

That never heard his name, and never may. 90

He will have recognised, ere breath be spent

And speech at end, how much that's good in man,

And generous, and self-devoting, makes Monsieur Léonce Miranda worth his help;

While sounding to the bottom ignorance

Historical and philosophical And moral and religious, all one couch
 Of crassitude, a portent of its kind.
 Then, just as he would pityingly teach Your body to repair maltreatment, give Advice that you should make those stumps to stir
 With artificial hands of caoutchouc,
 So would he soon supply your crippled soul
 With crutches, from his own intelligence, 10 Able to help you onward in the path Of rectitude whereto your face is set,
 And counsel justice — to yourself, the first,
 To your associate, very like a wife Or something better, — to the world at large,
 Friends, strangers, horses, hounds and Cousinry —
 All which amount of justice will include Justice to God. Go and consult his
 voice!"

Since angel would not say this simple truth,
 What hinders that my heart relieve itself, 20 Milsand, who makest warm my wintry
 world,
 And wise my heaven, if there we consort
 too?

Monsieur Léonce Miranda turned, alas,
 Or was turned, by no angel, t'other way,
 And got him guidance of The Ravissante.

Now, into the originals of faith,
 Yours, mine, Miranda's, no inquiry here!
 Of faith, as apprehended by mankind,
 The causes, were they caught and catalogued,
 Would too distract, too desperately foil 30 Inquirer. How may analyst reduce Quantities to exact their opposites, Value to zero, then bring zero back To value of supreme preponderance?
 How substitute thing meant for thing expressed?
 Detect the wire-thread through that fluffy silk
 Men call their rope, their real compulsive
 power?
 Suppose detected such anatomy,
 And demonstration made of what belief Has moved believer — were the consequence

40 Reward at all? would each man straight deduce,
 From proved reality of cause, effect Conformable — believe and unbelieve
 According to your True thus disengaged From all his heap of False called reason
 first?

No: hand once used to hold a soft thick
 twist,
 Cannot now grope its way by wire alone:
 Childhood may catch the knack, scarce Youth, not Age!

That's the reply rewards you. Just as
 well Remonstrate to yon peasant in the blouse
 That, had he justified the true intent 54 Of Nature who composed him thus and
 thus,
 Weakly or strongly, here he would not
 stand
 Struggling with uncongenial earth and sky, But elsewhere tread the surface of the globe,
 Since one meridian suits the faulty lungs, Another bids the sluggish liver work.
 "Here I was born, for better or for worse:
 I'd not choose a climate for myself;
 Admit, my life were healthy, led elsewhere,"
 (He answers) "how am I to migrate, 60
 pray?"

Therefore the course to take is — spare your pains,
 And trouble uselessly with discontent Nor soul nor body, by parading proof That neither haply had known ailment, placed
 Precisely where the circumstance forbade Their lot should fall to either of the pair.
 But try and, what you find wrong, remedy, Accepting the conditions: never ask "How came you to be born here with those lungs,
 That liver?" But bid asthma smoke a 70 pipe, Stramonium, just as if no Tropics were,
 And ply with calomel the sluggish duct, Nor taunt "The born Norwegian breeds no bile!"

And as with body, so proceed with soul:
 Nor less discerningly, where faith you
 found,
 However foolish and fantastic, grudge
 To play the doctor and amend mistake, Because a wisdom were conceivable Whence faith had sprung robust above disease.
 Far beyond human help, that source of 80
 things!

Since, in the first stage, so to speak, — first stare
 Of apprehension at the invisible, — Begins divergency of mind from mind, Superior from inferior: leave this first!
 Little you change there! What comes afterward —
 From apprehended thing, each inference With practicality concerning life, This you may test and try, confirm the
 right Or contravene the wrong which reasons
 there.

The offspring of the sickly faith must prove 90
 Sickly act also: stop a monster-birth!
 When water's in the cup and not the cloud,

Then is the proper time for chemic test:
Belief permits your skill to operate When, drop by drop condensed from misty
heaven,

'Tis wrung out, lies a bowlful in the fleece.
How dew by spoonfuls came, let Gideon
say:

What purpose water serves, your word or two

May teach him, should he fancy it lights
fire.

Concerning, then, our vaporous Ravis-sante —

How fable first precipitated faith —

10 Silence you get upon such point from me.
But when I see come posting to the pair
At Clairvaux, for the cure of soul-disease, This Father of the Mission, Parish-priest,
This Mother of the Convent, Nun I know — They practise in that second stage of
things;

They boast no fresh distillery of faith;
'Tis dogma in the bottle, bright and old,
They bring; and I pretend to pharmacy.
They undertake the cure with all my
heart!

20 He trusts them, and they surely trust themselves.

I ask no better. Never mind the cause, Fons et origo of the malady: Apply the drug with courage! Here's our
case.

Monsieur Léonce Miranda asks of God,
— May a man, living in illicit tie, Continue, by connivance of the Church,
No matter what amends he please to make Short of forthwith relinquishing the sin?
Physicians, what do you propose for cure?

30 Father and Mother of the Ravissante, Read your own records, and you find prescribed

As follows, when a couple out of sorts Rather than gravely suffering, sought your
skill

And thereby got their health again.
Perpend!

Two and a half good centuries ago,
Luc de la Maison Rouge, a nobleman Of Claise, (the river gives this country
name)

And, just as noblewoman, Maude his wife, Having been married many happy years

10 Spent in God's honour and man's service
too,

Conceived, while yet in flower of youth and
hope,

The project of departing each from each For ever, and dissolving marriage-bonds
That both might enter a religious life.

Needing, before they came to such resolve, Divine illumination, — course was clear, —
They visited your church in pilgrimage,

On Christmas morn: communicating
straight,

They heard three Masses proper for the
day,

"It is incredible with what effect" — 50

Quoth the Cistercian monk I copy from — And, next day, came, again communicants,

Again heard Masses manifold, but now With added thanks to Christ for special
grace

And consolation granted: in the night.
Had been divorce from marriage, manifest By signs and tokens. So, they made great gifts,

Left money for more Masses, and returned Homeward rejoicing — he, to take the rules,

As Brother Dionysius, Capucin; 60

She, to become first postulant, then nun
According to the rules of Benedict, Sister Scolastica: ¹ so ended they,

And so do I — not end nor yet commence One note or comment. What was done was done.

Now, Father of the Mission, here's your
case!

And, Mother of the Convent, here's its cure!

If separation was permissible,
And that decree of Christ "What God hath joined

Let no man put asunder" nullified 70

Because a couple, blameless in the world,
Had the conceit that, still more blame-
lessly,

Out of the world, by breach of marriage-
vow,

Their life was like to pass, — you oracles
Of God, — since holy Paul says such you
are, —

Hesitate, not one moment, to pronounce When questioned by the pair now needing
help

"Each from the other go, you guilty ones, Preliminary to your least approach

Nearer the Power that thus could strain a 80
point

In favour of a pair of innocents Who thought their wedded hands not clean
enough

To touch and leave unsullied their souls'
snow!

Are not your hands found filthy by the
world,

Mere human law and custom? Not a step

Nearer till hands be washed and purified!"

What they did say is immaterial, since Certainly it was nothing of the kind.

There was no washing hands of him (alack,

You take me? — in the figurative sense!), But, somehow, gloves were drawn o'er dirt and all,
 And practice with the Church procured
 thereby.
 Seeing that, — all remonstrance proved in
 vain,
 Persuasives tried and terrors put to use,
 I nowise question, — still the guilty pair Only embraced the closelier, obstinate, — Father and Mother went from Clairvaux
 back
 Their weary way, with heaviness of heart, I grant you, but each palm well crossed with coin,
 And nothing like a smutch perceptible.
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda might compound
 For sin? — no, surely! but by gifts — prepare
 His soul the better for contrition, say!
 Gift followed upon gift, at all events.
 Good counsel was rejected, on one part:
 Hard money, on the other — may we hope
 Was unreflectingly consigned to purse?

Two years did this experiment engage 20 Monsieur Léonce Miranda: how, by gifts To God and to God's poor, a man might stay
 In sin and yet stave off sin's punishment.
 No salve could be conceived more nicely
 mixed
 For this man's nature: generosity, — Susceptibility to human ills, Corporeal, mental, — self-devotedness Made up Miranda — whether strong or weak
 Elsewhere, may be inquired another time.
 In mercy he was strong, at all events.
 30 Enough! he could not see a beast in pain, Much less a man. without the will to aid;
 And where the will was, oft the means were
 too,
 Since that good bargain with the Cousinry.

The news flew fast about the countryside That, with the kind man, it was ask and have;
 And ask and have they did. To instance
 you: —
 A mob of beggars at The Ravissante Clung to his skirts one day, and cried
 "We thirst!"
 Forthwith he bade a cask of wine be broached
 40 To satisfy all comers, till, dead-drunk
 So satisfied, they strewed the holy place.
 For this was grown religious and a rite:
 Such slips of judgment, gifts irregular, Showed but as spillings of the golden grist On either side the hopper, through blind
 zeal;
 Steadily the main stream went pouring on

From mill to mouth of sack — held wide and close By Father of the Mission, Parish-priest,
 And Mother of the Convent, Nun I know,
 With such effect that, in the sequel, proof 50 Was tendered to the Court at Vire, last
 month,
 That in these same two years, expenditure At quiet Clairvaux rose to the amount Of Forty Thousand English Pounds:
 whereof
 A trifle went, no inappropriate close Of bounty, to supply the Virgin's crown With that stupendous jewel from New-York,
 Now blazing as befits the Star of Sea.

Such signs of grace, outward and visible, I rather give you, for your sake and 60
 mine,
 Than put in evidence the inward strife,
 Spiritual effort to compound for fault By payment of devotion — thank the
 phrase!
 That payment was as punctual, do not
 doubt,
 As its far easier fellow. Yesterday I trudged the distance from The Ravis-sante
 To Clairvaux, with my two feet: but our
 friend,
 The more to edify the country-folk,
 Was wont to make that journey on both knees.
 "Maliciously perverted incident!" 70 Snarled the retort, when this was told at Vire:
 "The man paid mere devotion as he passed,
 Knelt decently at just each wayside
 shrine!"
 Alas, my lawyer, I trudged yesterday —
 On my two feet, and with both eyes wide ope, —
 The distance, and could find no shrine at
 all!
 According to his lights, I praise the man.
 Enough! incessant was devotion, say —
 With her, you know of, praying at his side. 80
 Still, there be relaxations of the tense;
 Or life indemnifies itself for strain,
 Or finds its very strain grow feebleness.
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda's days were passed
 Much as of old, in simple work and play.
 His first endeavour, on recovery
 From that sad ineffectual sacrifice,
 Had been to set about repairing loss:
 Never admitting, loss was to repair.
 No word at any time escaped his lips — Betrayed a lurking presence, in his 90
 heart,
 Of sorrow; no regret for mischief done —
 Punishment suffered, he would rather say.

Good-tempered schoolboy-fashion, he preferred
To laugh away his flogging, fair price paid For pleasure out of bounds: if needs must Get pleasure and get flogged a second time!
A sullen subject would have nursed the scars
And made excuse, for throwing grammar by,
That bench was grown uneasy to the seat.
No: this poor fellow cheerfully got hands Fit for his stumps, and what hands failed
to do,
The other members did in their degree — Unwonted service. With his mouth alone He wrote, nay, painted pictures — think
of that!
He played on a piano pedal-keyed, Kicked out — if it was Bach's — good music thence.
He rode, that's readily conceivable,
But then he shot and never missed his bird,
With other feats as dexterous: I infer
He was not ignorant what hands are worth,
When he resolved on ruining his own.
So the two years passed somehow — who shall say Foolishly, — as one estimates mankind,
The work they do, the play they leave undone? —
Two whole years spent in that experiment
I told you of, at Clairvaux all the time,
From April on to April: why that month
More than another, notable in life?
Does the awakening of the year arouse Man to new projects, nerve him for fresh feats Of what proves, for the most part of mankind
Playing or working, novel folly too?
At any rate, I see no slightest sign Of folly (let me tell you in advance), Nothing but wisdom meets me manifest
In the procedure of the Twentieth Day Of April 'Seventy, — folly's year in France.
It was delightful Spring, and out of doors Temptation to adventure. Walk or ride?
There was a wild young horse to exercise,
And teach the way to go and pace to keep:
Monsieur Léonce Miranda chose to ride.
So, while they clapped soft saddle straight on back,
And bitted jaw to satisfaction, — since The partner of his days must stay at
home,
Teased by some trifling legacy of March To throat or shoulder, — visit duly paid And "farewell" given and received
again, —
As chamber-door considerably closed

Behind him, still five minutes were to spend.
How better, than by clearing, two and
two,
The staircase-steps and coming out aloft Upon the platform yonder (raise your eyes!)
And tasting, just as those two years before, Spring's bright advance upon the tower atop,
The feature of the front, the Belvedere?
Look at it for a moment while I breathe.

IV.

Ready to hear the rest? How good you
are!
Now for this Twentieth splendid day of Spring,
All in a tale, — sun, wind, sky, earth and
sea, —
To bid man "Up, be doing!" Mount the stair, Monsieur Léonce Miranda mounts so
brisk,
And look — ere his elastic foot arrive — Your longest, far and wide, o'er fronting
space.
Yon white streak — Havre lighthouse!
Name and name,
How the mind runs from each to each relay, Town after town, till Paris' self be
touched,
Superlatively big with life and death
To all the world, that very day perhaps!
He who stepped out upon the platform
here,
Pinnacled over the expanse, gave thought Neither to Rouher nor Ollivier, Roon Nor Bismarck, Emperor nor King, but just To steeple, church, and shrine, The Ravis-sante!
He saw Her, whom myself saw, but when
Spring
Was passing into Fall: not robed and
crowned
As, thanks to him, and her you know
about,
She stands at present; but She smiled the
same.
Thither he turned — to never turn away.
He thought . . .
(Suppose I should prefer "He said?" Along with every act — and speech is
act —
There go, a multitude impalpable
To ordinary human faculty, The thoughts which give the act significance.

Who is a poet needs must apprehend Alike both speech and thoughts which prompt to speak.
 Part these, and thought withdraws to poetry:
 Speech is reported in the newspaper.)

He said, then, probably no word at all, But thought as follows — in a minute's
 space —
 One particle of ore beats out such leaf!

"This Spring-morn I am forty-three years
 old:

In prime of life, perfection of estate 10 Bodily, mental, nay, material too, — My whole of worldly fortunes reach their height.

Body and soul alike on eminence:
 It is not probable I ever raise Soul above standard by increase of worth, Nor reasonably may expect to lift Body beyond the present altitude.

"Behold me, Lady called The Ravissante!
 Such as I am, I — gave myself to you So long since, that I cannot say 'I give.' 20 All my belongings, what is summed in
 life,

I have submitted wholly — as man might,
 At least, as I might, who am weak, not
 strong, —

Wholly, then, to your rule and governance, So far as I had strength. My weakness
 was —

I felt a fascination, at each point
 And pore of me, a Power as absolute Claiming that soul should recognise her sway.

O you were no whit clearer Queen, I see, Throughout the life that rolls out ribbon-
 like

30 Its shot-silk length behind me, than the strange

Mystery — how shall I denominate The unrobed One? Robed you go and crowned as well,

Named by the nations: she is hard to
 name,
 Though you have spelt out certain characters

Obscure upon what fillet binds her brow, Lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, life's pride.
 'So call her, and condemn the enchantress!' — 'Crush

The despot, and recover liberty!' —
 Cried despot and enchantress at each ear.
 40 You were conspicuous and pre-eminent, Authoritative and imperial, — you Spoke first, claimed homage: did I hesitate?

Born for no mastery, but servitude, Men cannot serve two masters, says the Book;

Master should measure strength with master, then,
 Before on servant is imposed a task.
 You spoke first, promised best, and threatened most;
 The other never threatened, promised,
 spoke

A single word, but, when your part was
 done,

Lifted a finger, and I, prostrate, knew 50 Films were about me, though you stood aloof

Smiling or frowning 'Where is power like
 mine

To punish or reward thee? Rise, thou
 fool!

Will to be free, and, lo, I lift thee loose!
 Did I not will, and could I rise a whit?
 Lay I, at any time, content to lie?

'To lie, at all events, brings pleasure:
 make

Amends by undemanded pain!' I said.
 Did not you prompt me? 'Purchase now by pain

Pleasure hereafter in the world to come!' 60
 I could not pluck my heart out, as you
 bade

Unbidden, I burned off my hands at least.
 My soul retained its treasure; but my
 purse

Lightened itself with much alacrity.
 Well, where is the reward? what promised
 fruit

Of sacrifice in peace, content? what sense Of added strength to bear or to forbear?

What influx of new light assists me now Even to guess you recognise a gain
 In what was loss enough to mortal me? 70

But she, the less authoritative voice, Oh, how distinct enunciating, how Plain dealing! Gain she gave was gain
 indeed!

That, you deny: that, you contemptuous
 call

Acorns, swine's food not man's meat!
 'Spurn the draft!'

Ay, but those life-tree apples I prefer,
 Am I to die of hunger till they drop?

Husks keep flesh from starvation, anyhow.
 Give those life-apples! — one, worth woods of oak,

Worth acorns by the waggon-load, — one 80 shoot

Through heart and brain, assurance bright and brief

That you, my Lady, my own Ravissante, Feel, through my famine, served and satisfied,

Own me, your starveling, soldier of a sort!

Your soldier! do I read my title clear Even to call myself your friend, not foe?
 What is the pact between us but a truce?
 At best I shall have staved off enmity,

- Obtained a respite, ransomed me from wrath.
 I pay, instalment by instalment, life,
 Earth's tribute-money, pleasures great and small,
 Whereof should at the last one penny piece Fall short, the whole heap becomes forfeiture.
 You find in me deficient soldiership:
 Want the whole life or none. I grudge that whole, Because I am not sure of recompense:
 Because I want faith. Whose the fault? I ask.
- 10 If insufficient faith have done thus much, Contributed thus much of sacrifice,
 More would move mountains, you are warrant. Well, Grant, you, the grace, I give the gratitude!
 And what were easier? 'Ask and have' folk call Miranda's method: 'Have, nor need to ask!'
 So do they formulate your quality Superlative beyond my human grace.
 The Ravissante, you ravish men away From puny aches and petty pains, assuaged
- 20 By man's own art with small expenditure Of pill or potion, unless, put to shame,
 Nature is roused and sets things right herself.
 Your miracles are grown our commonplace;
 No day but pilgrim hobbles his last mile, Kneels down and rises up, flings crutch away,
 Or else appends it to the reverend heap Beneath you, votive cripple-carpentry.
 Some few meet failure — oh, they wanted faith,
 And may betake themselves to La Salette,
- 30 Or seek Lourdes, so that hence the scandal limp!
 The many get their grace and go their way Rejoicing, with a tale to tell, — most like,
 A staff to borrow, since the crutch is gone,
 Should the first telling happen at my house,
 And teller wet his whistle with my wine.
 I tell this to a doctor and he laughs:
 'Give me permission to cry — Out of bed,
 You loth rheumatic sluggard! Cheat yon chair Of laziness, its gouty occupant! —
- 40 You should see miracles performed.
 But now,
 I give advice, and take as fee ten francs,
 And do as much as does your Ravissante.
 Send her that case of cancer to be cured
 I have refused to treat for any fee, Bring back my would-be patient sound and whole,
- And see me laugh on t'other side my mouth!'
 Can he be right, and are you hampered thus?
 Such pettiness restricts a miracle Wrought by the Great Physician, who hears prayer, Visibly seated in your mother-lap! 50
 He, out of nothing, made sky, earth, and sea,
 And all that in them is — man, beast, bird, fish,
 Down to this insect on my parapet.
 Look how the marvel of a minim crawls!
 Were I to kneel among the halt and maimed,
 And pray 'Who mad'st the insect with ten legs,
 Make me one finger grow where ten were once!'
 The very priests would thrust me out of church.
 'What folly does the madman dare expect?
 No faith obtains — in this late age, at 60
 least —
 Such cure as that! We ease rheumatics, though!'
- "Ay, bring the early ages back again,
 What prodigy were unattainable?
 I read your annals. Here came Louis Onze, Gave thrice the sum he ever gave before
 At one time, some three hundred crowns, to wit —
 On pilgrimage to pray for — health, he found?
 Did he? I do not read it in Commynes.¹ Here sent poor joyous Marie-Antoinette To thank you that a Dauphin dignified 70
 Her motherhood — called Duke of Normandy And Martyr of the Temple, much the same As if no robe of hers had dressed you rich;
 No silver lamps, she gave, illumine your shrine!
 Here, following example, fifty years Ago, in gratitude for birth again
 Of yet another destined King of France,
 Did not the Duchess fashion with her hands,
 And frame in gold and crystal, and present A bouquet made of artificial flowers? 80 And was he King of France, and is not he Still Count of Chambord?
- "Such the days of faith,
 And such their produce to encourage mine!
 What now, if I too count without my host?
 I too have given money, ornament,

And 'artificial flowers' — which, when I plucked,
Seemed rooting at my heart and real
enough:
What if I gain thereby nor health of mind, Nor youth renewed which perished in its prime,
Burnt to a cinder 'twixt the red-hot bars, Nor gain to see my second baby-hope Of managing to live on terms with both Opposing potentates, the Power and you, Crowned with success? I dawdle out my days
10 In exile here at Clairvaux, with mock love, That gives — while whispering 'Would I dared refuse!' — What the loud voice declares my heart's free gift:
Mock worship, mock superiority O'er those I style the world's benighted ones,
That irreligious sort I pity so,
Dumas and even Hertford who is Duke.

"Impiety? Not if I know myself!
Not if you know the heart and soul I bare,
I bid you cut, hack, slash, anatomise, 20 Till peccant part be found and flung away!
Demonstrate where I need more faith!
Describe
What act shall evidence sufficiency
Of faith, your warrant for such exercise Of power, in my behalf, as all the world Except poor praying me declares profuse?
Poor me? It is that world, not me alone, That world which prates of fixed laws and
the like,
I fain would save, poor world so ignorant!
And your part were — what easy miracle?
30 Oh, Lady, could I make your want like
mine!"

Then his face grew one luminescy.

"Simple, sufficient! Happiness at height!
I solve the riddle, I persuade mankind.
I have been just the simpleton who stands —
Summoned to claim his patrimonial
rights —
At shilly-shally, may he knock or no At his own door in his own house and
home
Whereof he holds the very title-deeds!
Here is my title to this property, 40 This power you hold for profit of myself And all the world at need — which need is
now!

"My title — let me hear who controverts!
Count Mailleville built yon church. Why did he so?
Because he found your image. How came that?

His shepherd told him that a certain sheep Was wont to scratch with hoof and scrape with horn
At ground where once the Danes had razed a church.
Thither he went, and there he dug, and
thence
He disinterred the image he conveyed In pomp to Londres yonder, his domain. 50 You liked the old place better than the
new.
The Count might surely have divined as
much:
He did not; someone might have spoke a
word:
No one did. A mere dream had warned
enough
That back again in pomp you best were borne:
No dream warned, and no need of convoy
was;
An angel caught you up and clapped you
down —
No mighty task, you stand one metre high,
And people carry you about at times.
Why, then, did you despise the simple 60
course?
Because you are the Queen of Angels:
when
You front us in a picture, there flock they,
Angels around you, here and everywhere.

"Therefore, to prove indubitable faith, Those angels that acknowledge you their queen,
I summon them to bear me to your feet From Clairvaux through the air, an easy trip!
Faith without flaw! I trust your potency,
Benevolence, your will to save the world —
By such a simplest of procedures, too! 70
Not even by affording angel-help, Unless it please you: there's a simpler
mode:
Only suspend the law of gravity,
And, while at back, permitted to propel,
The air helps onward, let the air in front Cease to oppose my passage through the midst!

"Thus I bestride the railing, leg o'er leg, Thus, lo, I stand, a single inch away, At dizzy edge of death's, — no touch of
fear,
As safe on tower above as turf below! 80
Your smile enswathes me in beatitude,
You lift along the votary — who vaults,
Who, in the twinkling of an eye, revives, Dropt safely in the space before the
church —
How crowded, since this morn is market-
day!
I shall not need to speak. The news will run

Like wild-fire. 'Thousands saw Miranda's flight!' 'Tis telegraphed to Paris in a trice. The Boulevard is one buzz 'Do you believe?' Well, this time, thousands saw Miranda's flight: You know him, goldsmith in the Place Vendôme.' In goes the Empress to the Emperor: 'Now — will you hesitate to make disgorge Your wicked King of Italy his gains, Give the Legations to the Pope, once more?' Which done, — why, grace goes back to operate, They themselves set a good example first, Resign the empire twenty years usurped, And Henry, the Desired One, reigns o'er France! Regenerated France makes all things new! My house no longer stands on Quai Rousseau But Quai rechristened Alacoque: ¹ a quai Where Renan burns his book, and Veuillot ² burns Renan beside, since Veuillot rules the roast, Re-edits now indeed 'The Universe.'³ O blessing, O superlatively big With blessedness beyond all blessing dreamed By man! for just that promise has effect, 'Old things shall pass away and all be new!' Then, for a culminating mercy-feat, Wherefore should I dare dream impossible That I too have my portion in the change? My past with all its sorrow, sin and shame, Becomes a blank, a nothing! There she stands, Clara de Millefleurs, all deodorised, Twenty years' stain wiped off her innocence! There never was Muhlhausen, nor at all Duke Hertford: nought that was, remains, except The beauty, — yes, the beauty is unchanged! Well, and the soul too, that must keep the same! And so the trembling little virgin hand Melts into mine, that's back again, of course! — Think not I care about my poor old self! I only want my hand for that one use,

³ M. Veuillot's paper.

To take her hand, and say 'I marry you — Men, women, angels, you behold my wife! ⁴ There is no secret, nothing wicked here, Nothing she does not wish the world to know!' None of your married women have the right To mutter 'Yes, indeed, she beats us all In beauty, — but our lives are pure at least!' Bear witness, for our marriage is no thing Done in a corner! 'Tis The Ravissante Repairs the wrong of Paris. See, She smiles, She beckons, She bids 'Hither, both of you!' And may we kneel? And will you bless ⁵ us both? And may I worship you, and yet love her? Then!' —

A sublime spring from the balustrade About the tower so often talked about, A flash in middle air, and stone-dead lay Monsieur Léonce Miranda on the turf.

A gardener who watched, at work the while Dribbling a flower-bed for geranium-shoots, Saw the catastrophe, and, straightening back, Stood up and shook his brows. "Poor soul, poor soul! Just what I prophesied the end would be! ⁶ Ugh — the Red Night-cap!" (as he raised the head) "This must be what he meant by those strange words While I was weeding larkspurs yesterday, 'Angels would take him!' Mad!"

No! sane, I say. Such being the conditions of his life, Such end of life was not irrational. Hold a belief, you only half-believe, With all-momentous issues either way, — And I advise you imitate this leap, Put faith to proof, be cured or killed at ⁷ once! Call you men, killed through cutting cancer out, The worse for such an act of bravery? That's more than I know. In my estimate, Better lie prostrate on his turf at peace, Than, wistful, I, from out the tent, the tower, Racked with a doubt "Will going on bare knees All the way to The Ravissante and back, Saying my Ave Mary all the time, Somewhat excuse if I postpone my march? — Make due amends for that one kiss I ⁸ gave In gratitude to her who held me out

Superior Fricquot's sermon, hot from
press,
A-spread with hands so sinful yet so
smooth?"

And now, sincerely do I pray she stand, Clara, with interposing sweep of robe, Between us and this horror! Any screen Turns white by contrast with the tragic pall;

And her dubiety distracts at least,
As well as snow, from such decided black.
With womanhood, at least, we have to do:
10 Ending with Clara — is the word too kind?

Let pass the shock! There's poignancy
enough

When what one parted with, a minute
since,

Alive and happy, is returned a wreck —
All that was, all that seemed about to be, Razed out and ruined now for evermore, Because a straw descended on this scale Rather than that, made death o'erbalance
life.

But think of cage-mates in captivity, Inured to day long, night-long vigilance 20 Each of the other's tread and angry turn If behind prison-bars the jailer knocked:
These whom society shut out, and thus Penned in, to settle down and regulate By the strange law, the solitary life —
When death divorces such a fellowship, Theirs may pair off with that prodigious
woe

Imagined of a ghastly brotherhood —
One watcher left in lighthouse out at sea With leagues of surf between the land and
him

30 Alive with his dead partner on the rock; One galley-slave, whom curse and blow compel

To labour on, ply oar — beside his chain, Encumbered with a corpse-companion
now.

Such these: although, no prisoners, self-entrenched

They kept the world off from their barricade.

Memory, gratitude was poignant, sure, Though pride brought consolation of a
kind.

Twenty years long had Clara been — of whom

The rival, nay, the victor, past dispute?

40 What if in turn The Ravissante at length Proved victor — which was doubtful —
anyhow,

Here lay the inconstant with, conspicuous
too,

The fruit of his good fortune!

"Has he gained
By leaving me?" she might soliloquize:

'All love could do, I did for him. I learned
By heart his nature, what he loved and loathed, Leaned to with liking, turned from with distaste.

No matter what his least velleity,
I was determined he should want no wish,
And in conformity administered
To his requirement; most of joy I mixed 5 With least of sorrow in life's daily draught, Twenty years long, life's proper average.
And when he got to quarrel with my cup, Would needs outsweeten honey, and discard

That gall-drop we require lest nectar cloy, —

I did not call him fool, and vex my friend,
But quietly allowed experiment, Encouraged him to spice his drink, and
now

Grate lignum vitæ,¹ now bruise so-called 60 grains

Of Paradise,² and pour now, for perfume, Distilment rare, the rose of Jericho, Holy-thorn, passion-flower, and what know I?

Till beverage obtained the fancied smack.
'Twas wild-flower-wine that neither helped nor harmed

Who sipped and held it for restorative — What harm? But here has he been through the hedge

Straying in search of simples, while my
back

Was turned a minute, and he finds a prize, Monkshood and belladonna! O my 70
child,

My truant little boy, despite the beard,
The body two feet broad and six feet long,
And what the calendar counts middle
age —

You wanted, did you, to enjoy a flight?

Why not have taken into confidence

Me, that was mother to you? — never
mind

What mock disguise of mistress held you
mine!

Had you come laughing, crying, with request,

'Make me fly, mother!' I had run upstairs

And held you tight the while I danced you 80
high

In air from tower-top, singing 'Off we go (On pilgrimage to Lourdes some day next month)

And swift we soar (to Rome with Peter-pence)

And low we light (at Paris where we pick Another jewel from our store of stones

* Guaiacum wood, good for rheumatism.

• Name for an aromatic drug.

And send it for a present to the Pope)!
 So, dropt indeed you were, but on my knees, Rolling and crowing, not a whit the worse For journey to your Ravissante and back.
 Now, no more Clairvaux — which I made you build,
 And think an inspiration of your own —
 No more fine house, trim garden, pretty park, Nothing I used to busy you about,
 And make believe you worked for my surprise!
 What weariness to me will work become Now that I need not seem surprised again!
 This boudoir, for example, with the doves (My stupid maid has damaged, dusting one) Embossed in stucco o'er the looking-glass Beside the toilet-table! dear — dear me!" Here she looked up from her absorbing grief,
 And round her, crow-like grouped, the Cousinry, (She grew aware) sat witnesses at watch.
 For, two days had elapsed since fate befell
 The courser in the meadow, stretched so stark.
 They did not cluster on the tree-tops, close Their sooty ranks, caw and confabulate
 For nothing: but, like calm determined crows,
 They came to take possession of their corpse.
 And who shall blame them? Had not they the right?
 One spoke. "They would be gentle, not austere.
 They understood and were compassionate.
 Madame Muhlhausen lay too abject now For aught but the sincerest pity; still,
 Since plain speech salves the wound it seems to make,
 They must speak plainly — circumstances spoke!
 Sin had conceived and brought forth death indeed.
 As the commencement so the close of things:
 Just what might be expected all along!
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda launched his youth Into a cesspool of debauchery,
 And if he thence emerged all dripping slime,
 Where was the change except from thin to thick,
 One warm rich mud-bath, Madame? — you, in place Of Paris-drainage and distilment, you
 He never needed budge from, boiled to rags!

True, some good instinct left the natural man,
 Some touch of that deep dye wherewith imbued
 By education, in his happier day,
 The hopeful offspring of high parentage Was fleece-marked moral and religious sheep, —
 Some ruddle, faint remainder, (we admit) Stuck to Miranda, rubbed he ne'er so rude Against the goatly coarseness: to the last, Moral he styled himself, religious too!
 Which means — what ineradicable good You found, you never left till good's self proved Perversion and distortion, nursed to growth
 So monstrous, that the tree-stock, dead and dry, Were seemlier far than such a heap grotesque Of fungous flourishing excrescence. Here Sap-like affection, meant for family, Stole off to feed one sucker fat — yourself;
 While branchage, trained religiously aloft
 To rear its head in reverence to the sun,
 Was pulled down earthward, pegged and picketed,
 By topiary contrivance, till the tree Became an arbour where, at vulgar ease, Sat superstition grinning through the loops.
 Still, nature is too strong or else too weak
 For cockney treatment: either, tree springs back To pristine shape, or else degraded droops, And turns to touchwood at the heart. So here —
 Body and mind, at last the man gave way.
 His body — there it lies, what part was left Unmutilated! for, the strife commenced
 Two years ago, when both hands burnt to ash,
 — A branch broke loose, by loss of what choice twigs!
 As for his mind — behold our register
 Of all its moods, from the incipient mad, Nay, mere erratic, to the stark insane,
 Absolute idiocy or what is worse!
 All have we catalogued — extravagance
 In worldly matters, luxury absurd,
 And zeal as crazed in its expenditure Of nonsense called devotion. Don't we know — We Cousins, bound in duty to our kin, — What mummeries were practised by you two At Clairvaux? Not a servant got discharge But came and told his grievance, testified

To acts which turn religion to a farce.
And as the private mock, so patent —
see —

The public scandal! Ask the neighbournood —

Or rather, since we asked them long ago,
Read what they answer, depositions down, Signed, sealed and sworn to! Brief, the man was mad.

We are his heirs and claim our heritage.
Madame Muhlhausen, — whom good taste forbids

We qualify as do these documents, — 10 Fear not lest justice stifle mercy's prayer!
True, had you lent a willing ear at first,
Had you obeyed our call two years ago,
Restrained a certain insolence of eye,
A volubility of tongue, that time,
Your prospects had been none the worse,
perhaps.

Still, fear not but a decent competence Shall smooth the way for your declining
age!

What we propose, then . . ."

Clara dried her eyes, Sat up, surveyed the consistory, spoke 20 After due pause, with something of a smile.

"Gentlemen, kinsfolk of my friend defunct,

In thus addressing me — of all the
world! —

You much misapprehend what part I play.
I claim no property you speak about.

You might as well address the park-keeper,

Harangue him on some plan advisable
For covering the park with cottage-plots.

He is the servant, no proprietor,
His business is to see the sward kept trim,

30 Untrespassed over by the indiscreet:
Beyond that, he refers you to myself —
Another servant of another kind —

Who again — quite as limited in act — Refer you, with your projects, — can I
else?

To who in mastery is ultimate,
The Church. The Church is sole ad-ministrant,

Since sole possessor of what worldly
wealth

Monsieur Léonce Miranda late possessed.
Often enough has he attempted, nay,

40 Forced me, well-nigh, to occupy the post You seemingly suppose I fill, — receive As gift the wealth entrusted me as grace.
This — for quite other reasons than appear

So cogent to your perspicacity — This I refused; and, firm as you could
wish,

Still was my answer 'We two understand

Each one the other. I am intimate — As how can be mere fools and knaves — or, say,

Even your Cousins? — with your love to
me,

Devotion to the Church. Would Provi-
dence

Appoint, and make me certain of the same,
That I survive you (which is little like,

Seeing you hardly overpass my age
And more than match me in abundant
health)

In such case, certainly I would accept Your bounty: better I than alien hearts Should execute your planned benevolence To man, your proposed largess to the Church.

But though I be survivor, — weakly
frame,

With only woman's wit to make amends, — 6a

When I shall die, or while I am alive, Cannot you figure me an easy mark

For hypocritical rapacity, Kith, kin and generation, couching low,

Ever on the alert to pounce on prey?
Far be it I should say they profited

By that first frenzy-fit themselves induced, —

Cold-blooded scenical buffoons at sport
With horror and damnation o'er a grave:

That were too shocking — I absolve them 7a
there!

Nor did they seize the moment of your swoon

To rifle pocket, wring a paper thence,
Their Cousinly dictation, and enrich Thereby each mother's son as heart could

wish,

Had nobody supplied a codicil.
But when the pain, poor friend! had prostrated

Your body, though your soul was right
once more,

I fear they turned your weakness to account!

Why else to me, who agonising watched, Sneak, cap in hand, now bribe me to for- 8a
sake

My maimed Léonce, now bully, cap on
head,

The impudent pretension to assuage Such sorrows as demanded Cousins'

care? —

For you rejected, hated, fled me, far In foreign lands you laughed at me! — they judged.

And, think you, will the unkind ones hesitate

To try conclusions with my helplessness, —
To pounce on and misuse your derelict,

Helped by advantage that bereavement lends

Folk, who, while yet you lived, played 9a tricks like these?

You only have to die, and they detect,
 In all you said and did, insanity!
 Your faith was fetish-worship, your regard
 For Christ's prime precept which endows the poor
 And strips the rich, a craze from first to
 last!
 They so would limn your likeness, paint your life,
 That if it ended by some accident, —
 For instance, if, attempting to arrange The plants below that dangerous Belvedère
 I cannot warn you from sufficiently,
 You last your balance and fell headlong —
 fine
 Occasion, such, for crying Suicide!
Non compos mentis, naturally next,
 Hands over Clairvaux to a Cousin-tribe Who nor like me nor love The Ravis-sante:
 Therefore be ruled by both! Life-interest
 In Clairvaux, — conservation, guardian-
 ship
 Of earthly good for heavenly purpose, —
 give Such and no other proof of confidence!
 Let Clara represent the Ravissante!
 — To whom accordingly, he then and
 there Bequeathed each stick and stone, by testament
 In holograph, mouth managing the quill:
 Go, see the same in Londres, if you
 doubt!"
 Then smile grew laugh, as sudden up she stood
 And out she spoke: intemperate the
 speech!
 "And now, sirs, for your special courtesy,
 Your candle held up to the character Of Lucie Steiner, whom you qualify
 As coming short of perfect womanhood.
 Yes, kindly critics, truth for once you
 tell!
 True is it that through childhood, poverty, Sloth, pressure of temptation, I succumbed,
 And, ere I found what honour meant, lost
 mine.
 So was the sheep lost, which the Shepherd
 found
 And never lost again. My friend found
 me;
 Or better say, the Shepherd found us
 both —
 Since he, my friend, was much in the same mire
 When first we made acquaintance. Each helped each, —
 A two-fold extrication from the slough;

And, saving me, he saved himself. Since
 then, Unsmirched we kept our cleanliness of
 coat.
 It is his perfect constancy, you call My friend's main fault — he never left his
 love!
 While as for me, I dare your worst, impute One breach of loving bond, these twenty
 years,
 To me whom only cobwebs bound, you
 count!
 'He was religiously disposed in youth!'
 That may be, though we did not meet at
 church.
 Under my teaching did he, like you 50
 scamps, Become Voltairian — fools who mock his faith?
 'Infirm of body!' I am silent there:
 Even yourselves acknowledge service done, Whatever motive your own souls supply As inspiration. Love made labour light." Then laugh grew frown, and frown grew terrible.
 Do recollect what sort of person shrieked —
 "Such was I, saint or sinner, what you
 please:
 And who is it casts stone at me but you?
 By your own showing, sirs, you bought and 60 sold,
 Took what advantage bargain promised
 bag, Abundantly did business, and with whom?
 The man whom you pronounce imbecile,
 push Indignantly aside if he presume
 To settle his affairs like other folk!
 How is it you have stepped into his shoes And stand there, bold as brass, 'Miranda,
 late,
 Now, Firm-Miranda'? Sane, he signed
 away That little birthright, did he? Hence to trade!
 I know and he knew who 'twas dipped and 70 ducked,
 Truckled and played the parasite in vain,
 As now one, now the other, here you cringed,
 Were feasted, took our presents, you — those drops
 Just for your wife's adornment! you — that spray Exactly suiting, as most diamonds would, Your daughter on her marriage! No word then
 Of somebody the wanton! Hence, I say, Subscribers to the Sicde, every snob —
 For here the post brings me the Univers!
 Home and make money in the Place 80
 Vendôme,

Sully yourselves no longer by my sight,
 And, when next Schneider wants a new parure,
 Be careful lest you stick there by mis-
 chance
 That stone beyond compare entrusted
 you
 To kindle faith with, when, Miranda's
 gift,
 Crowning the very crown, the Ravissante Shall claim it! As to Clairvaux — talk to Her!
 She answers by the Chapter of Raimbaux!"

Vituperative, truly! All this wrath Because the man's relations thought him
 mad!
 Whereat, I hope you see the Cousinry Turn each to other, blankly dolorous, Consult a moment, more by shrug and shrug
 Than mere man's language, — finally conclude
 To leave the reprobate untroubled now
 In her unholy triumph, till the Law Shall right the injured ones; for gentle-
 men
 Allow the female sex, this sort at least,
 Its privilege. So, simply "Cockatrice!" —
 "Jezebel!" — "Queen of the Camellias!" — cried Cousin to cousin, as yon hinge a-creak Shut out the party, and the gate returned To custody of Clairvaux. "Pretty place!
 What say you, when it proves our property,
 To trying a concurrence with La Roche,
 And laying down a rival oyster-bed?
 Where the park ends, the sea begins, you
 know."
 So took they comfort till they came to Vire.

But I would linger, fain to snatch a
 look
 At Clara as she stands in pride of place, Somewhat more satisfying than my glance
 So furtive, so near futile, yesterday, Because one must be courteous. Of the masks
 That figure in this little history,
 She only has a claim to my respect,
 And one-eyed, in her French phrase, rules the blind.

Miranda hardly did his best with life:
 He might have opened eye, exerted brain, Attained conception as to right and law
 In certain points respecting intercourse Of man with woman — love, one likes to
 say;
 Which knowledge had dealt rudely with the
 claim
 Of Clara to play representative And from perdition rescue soul, forsooth!
 Also, the sense of him should have sufficed

For building up some better theory Of how God operates in heaven and
 earth,
 Than would establish Him participant
 In doings yonder at the Ravissante.
 The heart was wise according to its 50
 lights
 And limits; but the head refused more
 sun,
 And shrank into its mew and craved less
 space.

Clara, I hold the happier specimen, —
 It may be, through that artist-preference For work complete, inferiorly proposed,
 To incompletion, though it aim aright.
 Morally, no! Aspire, break bounds! I
 say,
 Endeavour to be good, and better still,
 And best! Success is nought, endeavour's all.

But intellect adjusts the means to ends, 60 Tries the low thing, and leaves it done, at
 least;
 No prejudice to high thing, intellect Would do and will do, only give the
 means.

Miranda, in my picture-gallery,
 Presents a Blake; be Clara — Meissonier!
 Merely considered so by artist, mind!
 For, break through Art and rise to poetry,
 Being Art to tremble nearer, touch enough The verge of vastness to inform our
 soul
 What orb makes transit through the dark 70
 above,
 And there's the triumph! — there the incomplete,
 More than completion, matches the immense, —

Then, Michelagnolo against the world!
 With this proviso, let me study her Approvingly, the finished little piece!
 Born, bred, with just one instinct, — that of growth, —
 Her quality was, caterpillar-like,
 To all-unerringly select a leaf
 And without intermission feed her fill,
 Become the Painted-peacock, or belike 80
 The Brimstone-wing, when time of year should suit;
 And 'tis a sign (say entomologists) Of sickness, when the creature stops its meal
 One minute, either to look up at heaven,
 Or turn aside for change of aliment.
 No doubt there was a certain ugliness In the beginning, as the grub grew
 worm:
 She could not find the proper plant at
 once,
 But crawled and fumbled through a whole parterre.

Husband Muhlhhausen served for stuff not 90
 long:

Then came confusion of the slimy track From London, "where she gave the tone
 awhile,"
 To Paris: let the stalks start up again, Now she is off them, all the greener
 they!
 But, settled on Miranda, how she sucked, Assimilated juices, took the tint, Mimicked the form and texture of her food!
 Was he for pastime? Who so frolic-fond
 As Clara? Had he a devotion-fit?
 Clara grew serious with like qualm, be
 sure!
 In health and strength he, — healthy too and strong,
 She danced, rode, drove, took pistol-practice, fished, Nay, "managed sea-skiff with consum-mate skill."
 In pain and weakness, he, — she patient watched
 And wiled the slow drip-dropping hours
 away.
 She bound again the broken self-respect, She picked out the true meaning from mis-
 take,
 Praised effort in each stumble, laughed
 "Well-climbed!"
 When others groaned "None ever grovelled
 so!"
 "Rise, you have gained experience!" was her word:
 "Lie satisfied, the ground is just your
 place!"
 They thought appropriate counsel. "Live,
 not die,
 And take my full life to eke out your
 own:
 That shall repay me and with interest!
 Write! — is your mouth not clever as my
 hand?
 Paint! — the last Exposition warrants
 me,
 Plenty of people must ply brush with toes.
 And as for music — look, what folk nick-
 name
 A lyre, those ancients played to ravish-
 ment, —
 Over the pendule, see, Apollo grasps A three-stringed gimcrack which no Liszt could coax
 Such music from as jew's-harp makes to-
 day!
 Do your endeavour like a man, and leave
 The rest to 'fortune who assists the bold' — Learn, you, the Latin which you taught me first,
 You clever creature — clever, yes, I say!"
 If he smiled "Let us love, love's wrong comes right,

Shows reason last of all! Necessity Must meanwhile serve for plea — so, mind not much Old Fricquot's menace!" — back she 40 smiled "Who minds?"
 If he sighed "Ah, but She is strict, they
 say,
 For all Her mercy at the Ravissante, She scarce will be put off so!" — straight a sigh Returned "My lace must go to trim Her gown!"
 I nowise doubt she inwardly believed Smiling and sighing had the same effect Upon the venerated image. What She did believe in, I as little doubt, Was — Clara's self's own birthright to sustain Existence, grow from grub to butterfly, 50 Upon unlimited Miranda-leaf;
 In which prime article of faith confirmed,
 According to capacity, she fed On and on till the leaf was eaten up That April morning. Even then, I praise Her forethought which prevented leafless stalk
 Bestowing any hearted succulence
 On earwig and blackbeetle squat beneath Clairvaux, that stalk whereto her hermitage She tacked by golden throw of silk, so 60
 fine,
 So anything but feeble, that her sleep Inside it, through last winter, two years
 long,
 Recked little of the storm and strife without.
 "But — loved him?" Friend, I do not praise her love!
 True love works never for the loved one
 so,
 Nor spares skin-surface, smoothening truth
 away.
 Love bids touch truth, endure truth, and embrace Truth, though, embracing truth, love crush itself.
 "Worship not me but God!" the angels
 urge:
 That is love's grandeur: still, in pettier 70
 love
 The nice eye can distinguish grade and grade.
 Shall mine degrade the velvet green and puce
 Of caterpillar, palmer-worm — or what — Ball in and out of ball, each ball with brush
 Of Venus' eye-fringe round the turquoise egg
 That nestles soft, — compare such paragon
 With any scarabæus of the brood Which, born to fly, keeps wing in wing-case, walks
 Persistently a-trundling dung on earth?

Egypt may venerate such hierophants,
 Not I — the couple yonder, Father Priest And Mother Nun, who came and went and
 came,
 Beset this Clairvaux, trundled moneymuck
 To midden and the main heap oft enough, But never bade unshut from sheath the
 gauze, Nor showed that, who would fly, must let fall filth,
 And warn "Your jewel, brother, is a blotch : Sister, your lace trails ordure ! Leave your sins, 10 And so best gift with Crown and grace with Robe !"

The superstition is extinct, you hope ?
 It were, with my good will ! Suppose it so, Bethink you likewise of the latest use Whereto a Night-cap is convertible, And draw your very thickest, thread and thrum,
 O'er such a decomposing face of things,
 Once so alive, it seemed immortal too !

This happened two years since. The Cousinry
 Returned to Paris, called in help from
 Law,
 20 And in due form proceeded to dispute Monsieur Léonce Miranda's competence, Being insane, to make a valid Will.

Much testimony volunteered itself ;
 The issue hardly could be doubtful — but For that sad 'Seventy which must intervene,
 Provide poor France with other work to
 mind
 Than settling lawsuits, even for the sake
 Of such a party as the Ravissante.
 It only was this Summer that the case 30 Could come and be disposed of, two weeks
 since,
 At Vire — Tribunal Civil — Chamber
 First.

Here, issued with all regularity,
 I hold the judgment — just, inevitable, Nowise to be contested by what few Can judge the judges ; sum and substance,
 thus —

"Inasmuch as we find, the Cousinry, During that very period when they take Monsieur Léonce Miranda for stark
 mad,
 Considered him to be quite sane enough 40 For doing much important business with — Nor showed suspicion of his competence Until, by turning of the tables, loss Instead of gain accrued to them thereby, — Plea of incompetence we set aside.

— "The rather, that the dispositions,
 sought
 To be impugned, are natural and right, Nor jar with any reasonable claim Of kindred, friendship or acquaintance
 here.
 Nobody is despoiled, none overlooked ;
 Since the testator leaves his property 50 To just that person whom, of all the
 world,
 He counted he was most indebted to.
 In mere discharge, then, of conspicuous
 debt,
 Madame Muhlhausen has priority, Enjoys the usufruct of Clairvaux.

"Next,
 Such debt discharged, such life determin-
 ing,
 Such earthly interest provided for,
 Monsieur Léonce Miranda may bequeath,
 In absence of more fit recipient, fund
 And usufruct together to the Church 60 Whereof he was a special devotee.

"— Which disposition, being consonant With a long series of such acts and deeds Notorious in his life-time, needs must
 stand,
 Unprejudiced by eccentricity Nowise amounting to distemper: since,
 In every instance signalised as such,
 We recognise no overleaping bounds,
 No straying out of the permissible:
 Duty to the Religion of the Land, — 70
 Neither excessive nor inordinate.

"The minor accusations are dismissed ;
 They prove mere freak and fancy, boyish mood
 In age mature of simple kindly man.
 Exuberant in generousities To all the world: no fact confirms the
 fear
 He meditated mischief to himself
 That morning when he met the accident Which ended fatally. The case is closed."

How otherwise? So, when I grazed the 80 skirts,
 And had the glimpse of who made,
 yesterday, —
 Woman and retinue of goats and sheep, —
 The sombre path one whiteness, vision-like,
 As out of gate, and in at gate again, They wavered, — she was lady there for
 life:
 And, after life — I hope, a white success
 Of some sort, wheresoever life resume School interrupted by vacation — death; Seeing that home she goes with prize in
 hand,
 Confirmed the Châtelaine of Clairvaux. 90

True,
 Such prize fades soon to insignificance.
 Though she have eaten her Miranda up, And spun a cradle-cone through which she pricks
 Her passage, and proves Peacock-butterfly
 This Autumn — wait a little week of cold?
 Peacock and death's-head-moth end much
 the same,
 And could she still continue spinning, —
 sure,
 Cradle would soon crave shroud for substitute,
 And o'er this life of hers distaste would drop
 Red-cotton-Night-cap-wise.

 How say you, friend?
 Have I redeemed my promise? Smile assent Through the dark Winter-gloom between us both!

Already, months ago and miles away,
 I just as good as told you, in a flash,
 The while we paced the sands before my
 house,
 All this poor story — truth and nothing
 else.
 Accept that moment's flashing, amplified, Impalpability reduced to speech, Conception proved by birth, — no other so
 change!
 Can what Saint-Rambert flashed me in a
 thought,
 Good gloomy London make a poem of?
 Such ought to be whatever dares precede, Play ruddy herald-star to your white blaze About to bring us day. How fail imbibe Some fortaste of effulgence? Sun shall wax,
 And star shall wane: what matter, so star
 tell
 The drowsy world to start awake, rub
 eyes,
 And stand all ready for morn's joy a-blush?

THE INN ALBUM.

1875.

[For the alleged foundation of this story, see Notes and Queries, March 25, 1876.]

THE INN ALBUM.

I.

"THAT oblong book's the Album; hand it here!
Exactly! page on page of gratitude For breakfast, dinner, supper, and the view!
I praise these poets: they leave margin-space;
Each stanza seems to gather skirts around,
And primly, trimly, keep the foot's confine,
Modest and maidlike; lubber prose o'er-sprawls
And straddling stops the path from left to right.
Since I want space to do my cipher-work, o Which poem spares a corner? What comes first?
'Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot!'
(Open the window, we burn daylight, boy!)
Or see — succincter beauty, brief and bold —
'If a fellow can dine On rumpsteaks and port wine, He needs not despair Of dining well here —'
'Here!' I myself could find a better rhyme!
That bard's a Browning; he neglects the form:
But ah, the sense, ye gods, the weighty sense!
Still, I prefer this classic. Ay, throw wide!
20 I'll quench the bits of candle yet unburnt.
A minute's fresh air, then to cipher-work!
Three little columns hold the whole account:
Écarté, after which Blind Hookey, then Cutting-the-Pack, five hundred pounds the cut.
'Tis easy reckoning: I have lost, I think."

Two personages occupy this room Shabby-genteel, that's parlour to the inn Perched on a view-commanding eminence;
— Inn which may be a veritable house 30 Where somebody once lived and pleased good taste Till tourists found his coign of vantage out,
And fingered blunt the individual mark

And vulgarised things comfortably smooth.
On a sprig-pattern-papered wall there brays Complaint to sky Sir Edwin's dripping stag; His couchant coast-guard creature corresponds;
They face the Huguenot and Light'o' the World.
Grim o'er the mirror on the mantelpiece, Varnished and confined, Salmo jerox glares — Possibly at the List of Wines which, 40 framed
And glazed, hangs somewhat prominent on peg.

So much describes the stuffy little room — Vulgar flat smooth respectability:
Not so the burst of landscape surging in,
Sunrise and all, as he who of the pair
Is, plain enough, the younger personage Draws sharp the shrieking curtain, sends aloft
The sash, spreads wide and fastens back to wall Shutter and shutter, shows you England's best.
He leans into a living glory-bath 50
Of air and light where seems to float and move
The wooded watered country, hill and dale
And steel-bright thread of stream, a-smoke with mist, A-sparkle with May morning, diamond drift O' the sun-touched dew. Except the red-roofed patch Of half a dozen dwellings that, crept close For hill-side shelter, make the village-clump, This inn is perched above to dominate — Except such sign of human neighbourhood, (And this surmised rather than sensible) 60 There's nothing to disturb absolute peace,
The reign of English nature — which means art And civilised existence. Wildness' self Is just the cultured triumph. Presently Deep solitude, be sure, reveals a Place That knows the right way to defend itself:
Silence hems round a burning spot of life.

- Till death us twain do part? The bargain's struck!
 Old fellow, if you fancy — (to begin —)
 I failed to penetrate your scheme last week, You wrong your poor disciple. Oh, no airs!
- Because you happen to be twice my age And twenty times my master, must per-
 force
 No blink of daylight struggle through the web There's no unwinding? You entoil my legs,
 And welcome, for I like it: blind me, —
 no!
- 10 A very pretty piece of shuttle-work Was that — your mere chance question at the club —
*'Do you go anywhere this Whitsuntide?
 I'm off for Paris, there's the Opera —
 there's*
The Salon, there's a china-sale, — beside Chantilly; and, for good companionship, There's Such-and-such and So-and-so.
Suppose
We start together?' 'No such holiday!'
*I told you: 'Paris and the rest be hanged!
 Why plague me who am pledged to home-delights?'*
- I'm the engaged now; through whose fault but yours?
 On duty. As you well know. Don't I drowse
 The week away down with the Aunt and Niece?
 No help: it's leisure, loneliness and love.
 Wish I could take you; but fame travels
 fast,' —
*A man of much newspaper-paragraph,
 You scare domestic circles; and beside Would not you like your lot, that second taste
 Of nature and approval of the grounds!
 You might wail early or lie late, so shirk*
- 30 Week-day devotions: but stay Sunday o'er And morning church is obligatory:
 No mundane garb permissible, or dread
 The butler's privileged monition! No!
 Pack off to Paris, nor wipe tear away!
 Whoe'er how artlessly the happy flash Followed, by inspiration! *'Tell you
 what —*
*Let's turn their flank, try things on t'other
 side!*
*Inns for my money! Liberty's the life!
 We'll lie in hiding: there's the crow-nest nook,*
- The tourist's joy, the Inn they rave about, Inn that's out — out of sight and out of
 mind
 And out of mischief to all four of us — Aunt and niece, you and me. At night
 arrive;
 At morn, find time for just a Pisgah-view
- Of my friend's Land of Promise; then depart.*
*And while I'm whizzing onward by first train, Bound for our own place (since my Brother sulks
 And says I shun him like the plague) yourself —*
*Why, you have stepped thence, start from platform, gay
 Despite the sleepless journey, — love lends* 50
wings, —
*Hug aunt and niece who, none the wiser,
 wait
 The faithful advent! Eh?' 'With all my heart,'*
*Said I to you; said I to mine own self:
 'Does he believe I fail to comprehend He wants just one more final friendly snuck
 At friend's exchequer ere friend runs to
 earth,
 Marries, renounces yielding friends such
 sport?'*
*And did I spoil sport, pull face grim, — nay, grave?
 Your pupil does you better credit! No!
 I parleyed with my pass-book, — rubbed* 60 my pair
*At the big balance in my banker's hands, — Folded a cheque cigar-case-shape, — just wants Filling and signing, — and took train, resolved
 To execute myself with decency And let you win — if not Ten thousand
 quite,
 Something by way of wind-up-farewell
 burst
 Of firework-nosegay! Where's your fortune fled?
 Or is not fortune constant after all?
 You lose ten thousand pounds: had I lost
 half Or half that, I should bite my lips, I* 70
think.
*You man of marble! Strut and stretch my best
 On tiptoe, I shall never reach your height.
 How does the loss feel! Just one lesson
 more!"*
- The more refined man smiles a frown away.
 "The lesson shall be — only boys like you Put such a question at the present stage.
 I had a ball lodge in my shoulder once,
 And, full five minutes, never guessed the
 fact;
 Next day, I felt decidedly: and still,
 At twelve years' distance, when I lift my
- 80
- arm
-
- A twinge reminds me of the surgeon's
- probe.

Ask me, this day monthly, how I feel my luck!

And meantime please to stop impertinence.
For — what I know the subject? All too chaff.

Covers the town, this profane leads to
speech.

This day stands with a hero. 'There, my boy!

Our play has been played, but not earnest! I Empty, your game, inside out, while my
side.

Strip, it's for you! You can feel, more I say, more and more, more and more — I am I might down I in the day, change
drop

And show my father's warehouse-apron:
achance!

Stranger! I am here, my boy, my boy, over morning, — about, and about, my
friend!

My mother's name, would! I feel her man
my man.

There, say! He don't say it! Thanks,
my boy!

Here, say! He don't say it! Thanks, my boy!

Enough!
We've played, I've lost and owe ten thousand pounds.

Where's a woman, at the moment. — well, What's the best way, now, to the back of
town?

Silly! I've got to go, now, to the back of town. You may say it your money at woman's
end.

The young man at the window turns round
quick —

A young man, now, my boy, my boy, my boy, he has the best way, now, to the back of
town.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

Of the other, back, him in the sorrow face.

I've learned to know a little — all the day,
you!

It's nature I feel you. That's why
As I feel you, feeling the best way — For sure I am, the best way, feeling the best way, feeling the best way, feeling the best way.

My mother's name, would! I feel her man
my man.

There, say! He don't say it! Thanks,
my boy!

Here, say! He don't say it! Thanks,

*Commission-agent hight of Manchester — Partly, and partly through a baby case Of disappointment I've pumped out at
last —*

*And here you spend life's prime in gaining
flesh*

And giving science one more asteroid?

Brief, my dear fellow, you instructed me, At Alfred's and not Istria! proved a snob

May turn a million to account although His brother be no Duke, and see good days 10 Without the girl he lost and someone gained.

The end is, after one year's tutelage, Having, by your help, touched society, Polo, Tent-pegging, Hurlingham, the Rink —

I leave all these delights, by your advice,
And marry my young pretty cousin here Whose place, whose oaks ancestral you behold.

(Her father was in partnership with
mine —

Does not his purchase look a pedigree?)
My million will be tails and tassels smart

20 To this plump-bodied kite, this house and land

Which, set a-soaring, pulls me, soft as
sleep,

Along life's pleasant meadow, — arm left
free

To lock a friend's in, — whose but yours, old boy?

Arm in arm glide we over rough and
smooth,

While hand, to pocket held, saves cash from cards.

Now, if you don't esteem ten thousand pounds

(— Which I shall probably discover snug Hid somewhere in the column-corner capped

With 'Credit,' based on 'Balance,' — which, I swear,

30 By this time next month I shall quite forget Whether I lost or won — ten thousand pounds,

Which at this instant I would give . . .
let's see,

For Galopin¹ — nay, for that Gainsborough

Sir Richard won't sell, and, if bought by
me,

Would get my glance and praise some twice a year, —)

Well, if you don't esteem that price dirt-cheap

For teaching me Dalmatia was mistake —
Why then, my last illusion-bubble breaks,

40 My one discovered phoenix proves a goose,
My cleverest of all companions — oh,

Was worth nor ten pence nor ten thousand pounds!

Come! Be yourself again! So endeth
here

The morning's lesson! Never while life lasts

Do I touch card again. To breakfast now!
To bed — I can't say, since you needs must start

For station early — oh, the down-train still,
First plan and best plan — toward trip be hanged!

You're due at your big brother's — pay that debt,

Then owe me not a farthing! Order eggs —

And who knows but there's trout obtainable?"

The fine man looks well-nigh malignant:
then —

"Sir, please subdue your mannaer! Debts are debts:

I pay mine — debts of this sort — certainly.

What do I care how you regard your gains, Want them or want them not? The thing
I want

Is — not to have a story circulate From club to club — how, bent on clearing
out

Young So-and-so, young So-and-so cleaned
me,

Then set the empty kennel flush again,
Ignored advantage and forgave his friend — 60

For why? There was no wringing blood from stone!

Oh, don't be savage! You would hold your tongue,

Bite it in two, as man may; but those small

Hours in the smoking-room, when instance apt

Rises to tongue's root, tingles on to tip,
And the thinned company consists of six

Capital well-known fellows one may trust!
Next week, it's in the 'World.' No, thank you much.

I owe ten thousand pounds: I'll pay them!"

"Now, —
This becomes funny. You've made 70 friends with me:

I can't help knowing of the ways and
means!

Or stay! they say your brother closets up Correggio's long-lost Leda; if he means

To give you that, and if you give it me . . ."

"I polished snob off to aristocrat?

You compliment me! father's apron still Sticks out from son's court-vesture; still silk purse

Roughs finger with some bristle sow-ear-born!
 Well, neither I nor you mean harm at heart!
 I owe you and shall pay you: which premised,
 Why should what follows sound like flattery?
 The fact is — you do compliment too much Your humble master, as I own I am;
 You owe me no such thanks as you protest.
 The polisher needs precious stone no less Than precious stone needs polisher: 'believe I struck no tint from out you but I found Snug lying first 'neath surface hair-breadth-deep!
 Beside, I liked the exercise: with skill Goes love to show skill for skill's sake.
 You see,
 I'm old and understand things: too absurd
 It were you pitched and tossed away your life,
 As diamond were Scotch-pebble! all the more,
 That I myself misused a stone of price.
 Born and bred clever — people used to say Clever as most men, if not something more — Yet here I stand a failure, cut awry Or left opaque, — no brilliant named and known.
 Whate'er my inner stuff, my outside's blank;
 I'm nobody — or rather, look that same — I'm — who I am — and know it; but I hold What in my hand out for the world to see?
 What ministry, what mission, or what book
 — I'll say, book even? Not a sign of these!
 I began — laughing — 'All these when I like!'
 I end with — well, you've hit it! — 'This boy's cheque'
 For just as many thousands as he'll spare!
 The first — I could, and would not; your spare cash
 I would, and could not: have no scruple, pray, But, as I hoped to pocket yours, pouch mine — When you are able!"
 "Which is — when to be?
 I've heard, great characters require a fall
 Of fortune to show greatness by uprise:
They touch the ground to jollily rebound, Add to the Album! Let a fellow share Your secret of superiority!
 I know, my banker makes the money breed

Money; I eat and sleep, he simply takes The dividends and cuts the coupons off, Sells out, buys in, keeps doubling, tripling cash,
 While I do nothing but receive and spend.
 But you, spontaneous generator, hatch
 A wind-egg; cluck, and forth struts Capital
 As interest to me from egg of gold.
 I am grown curious: pay me by all means!
 How will you make the money?"
 "Mind your own —
 Not my affair. Enough: or money, or 50 Money's worth, as the case may be, expect Ere month's end, — keep but patient for a month!
 Who's for a stroll to station? Ten's the time;
 Your man, with my things, follow in the trap;
 At stoppage of the down-train, play the arrived On platform, and you'll show the due fatigue
 Of the night-journey, — not much sleep, — perhaps,
 Your thoughts were on before you — yes, indeed,
 You join them, being happily awake With thought's sole object as she smiling 60 sits At breakfast-table. I shall dodge meantime In and out station-precinct, wile away
 The hour till up my engine pants and smokes.
 No doubt, she goes to fetch you. Never fear!
 She gets no glance at me, who shame such saints!"

II.

So, they ring bell, give orders, pay, depart Amid profuse acknowledgment from host Who well knows what may bring the younger back.
 They light cigar, descend in twenty steps
 The "calm acclivity," inhale — beyond 70 Tobacco's balm — the better smoke of turf
 And wood fire, — cottages at cookery I' the morning, — reach the main road straitening on
 'Twixt wood and wood, two black walls full of night Slow to disperse, though mists thin fast
 before
 The advancing foot, and leave the flint-dust fine Each speck with its fire-sparkle. Presently The road's end with the sky's beginning mix

In one magnificence of glare, due East, So high the sun rides, — May's the merry
month.

They slacken pace: the younger stops
abrupt,
Discards cigar, looks his friend full in face.

"All right; the station comes in view at
end;

Five minutes from the beech-clump, there you are!

I say: let's halt, let's borrow yonder gate
Of its two magpies, sit and have a talk!

Do let a fellow speak a moment! More I think about and less I like the thing — No, you must let me! Now, be good for
once!

Ten thousand pounds be done for, dead
and damned!

We played for love, not hate: yes, hate!
I hate

Thinking you beg or borrow or reduce To strychnine some poor devil of a lord Licked at Unlimited Loo. I had the cash To lose — you knew that! — lose and none
the less

Whistle to-morrow: it's not every chap Affords to take his punishment so well!

Now, don't be angry with a friend whose
fault

Is that he thinks — upon my soul, I do — Your head the best head going. Oh, one sees

Names in the newspaper — great this, great
that,

Gladstone, Carlyle, the Laureate: — much
I care!

Others have their opinion, I keep mine: Which means — by right you ought to have the things

I want a head for. Here's a pretty place, My cousin's place, and presently my place, Not yours! I'll tell you how it strikes a
man.

My cousin's fond of music and of course Plays the piano (it won't be for long!) A brand-new bore she calls a 'semi-grand,'

Rosewood and pearl, that blocks the drawing-room,

And cost no end of money. Twice a week Down comes Herr Somebody and seats
himself,

Sets to work teaching — with his teeth on
edge —

I've watched the rascal. 'Does he play first-rate?'

I ask: 'I rather think so,' answers she — 'He's What's-his-Name!' — 'Why give you lessons then?' —

'I pay three guineas and the train beside.' — 'This instrument, has he one such at
home?' —

'He? Has to practise on a table-top, When he can't hire the proper thing.' —

'I see!
You've the piano, he the skill, and God
The distribution of such gifts.' So here:
After your teaching, I shall sit and strum Polkas on this piano of a Place You'd make resound with Rule Britannia!"

"Thanks!

I don't say but this pretty cousin's place, Appended with your million, tempts my 50
hand
As key-board I might touch with some effect."

"Then, why not have obtained the like?
House, land,
Money, are things obtainable, you see,
By clever head-work: ask my father else!
You, who teach me, why not have learned,
yourself?

Played like Herr Somebody with power to thump
And flourish and the rest, not bend demure

Pointing out blunders — 'Sharp, not natural!

Permit me — on the black key use the thumb!

There's some fatality, I'm sure! You say 60
'Marry the cousin, that's your proper move!'
And I do use the thumb and hit the sharp:
You should have listened to your own head's
hint,

As I to you! The puzzle's past my power, How you have managed — with such stuff, such means —

Not to be rich nor great nor happy man:
Of which three good things where's a sign
at all?

Just look at Dizzy!¹ Come, — what tripped your heels?

Instruct a goose that boasts wings and can't
fly!

I wager I have guessed it! — never found 70
The old solution of the riddle fail!

'Who was the woman?' I don't ask, but
— 'Where

I' the path of life stood she who tripped
you?'"

"Goose

You truly are! I own to fifty years.
Why don't I interpose and cut out — you?
Compete with five-and-twenty? Age, my
boy!"

"Old man, no nonsense! — even to a boy That's ripe at least for rationality Rapped into him, as may be mine was, once!
I've had my small adventure lesson me 80

Over the knuckles! — likely, I forget
The sort of figure youth cuts now and then, Competing with old shoulders but young
head
Despite the fifty grizzling years!"

"Aha?

Then that means — just the bullet in the blade

Which brought Dalmatia on the brain, — that, too,

Came of a fatal creature? Can't pretend Now for the first time to surmise as much!
Make a clean breast! Recount! a secret's safe

'Twixt you, me and the gate-post!"

"— Can't pretend,

Neither, to never have surmised your wish!
It's no use, — case of unextracted ball — Winces at finger-touching. Let things be!"

"Ah, if you love your love still! I hate
mine."

"I can't hate."

"I won't teach you; and won't tell You, therefore, what you please to ask of
me:

As if I, also, may not have my ache!"

"My sort of ache? No, no! and yet —
perhaps!

All comes of thinking you superior still.
But live and learn! I say! Time's up!
Good jump!

You old, indeed! I fancy there's a cut Across the wood, a grass path: shall we try?

It's venturesome, however!"

"Stop, my boy!

Don't think I'm stingy of experience!
Life

— It's like this wood we leave. Should you and I

Go wandering about there, though the gaps
We went in and came out by were opposed As the two poles, still, somehow, all the
same,

By nightfall we should probably have chanced

On much the same main points of interest—
Both of us measured girth of mossy trunk, Stript ivy from its strangle prey, clapped
hands

At squirrel, sent a fir-cone after crow, And so forth, — never mind what time betwixt.

So in our lives; allow I entered mine
Another way than you: 'tis possible I ended just by knocking head against

That plaguy low-hung branch yourself began

By getting bump from; as at last you too May stumble o'er that stump which first 40
of all

Bade me walk circumspectly. Head and feet

Are vulnerable both, and I, foot-sure, Forgot that ducking down saves brow from bruise.

I, early old, played young man four years
since

And failed confoundedly: so, hate alike Failure and who caused failure, — curse her cant!"

"Oh, I see! You, though somewhat past the prime,"

Were taken with a rosebud beauty! Ah — But how should chits distinguish? She admired

Your marvel of a mind, I'll undertake! 50
But as to body . . . nay, I mean . . .
that is,

When years have told on face and figure
. . ."

"Thanks

Mister Sufficiently-Instructed! Such
No doubt was bound to be the consequence To suit your self-complacency: she liked My head enough, but loved some heart
beneath

Some head with plenty of brown hair atop After my young friend's fashion! What becomes

Of that fine speech you made a minute
since

About the man of middle age you found 60
A formidable peer at twenty-one?

So much for your mock-moesty! and yet I back your first against this second sprout
Of observation, insight, what you please.

My middle age, Sir, had too much success!
It's odd: my case occurred four years
ago

I finished just while you commenced that
turn

I' the wood of life that takes us to the wealth

Of honeysuckle, heaped for who can reach.
Now, I don't boast: it's bad style, and be- 70
side,

The feat proves easier than it looks: I plucked

Full many a flower unnamed in that bouquet

(Mostly of peonies and poppies, though!) Good nature sticks into my button-hole.
Therefore it was with nose in want of snuff Rather than Ess or Psidium,¹ that I chanced On what — so far from 'rosebud beauty'

¹ Scents.

- She's dead: at least you never heard her name;
 She was no courtly creature, had nor birth Nor breeding — mere fine-lady-breeding;
 but Oh, such a wonder of a woman! Grand As a Greek statue! Stick fine clothes on
 that,
 Style that a Duchess or a Queen, — you
 know,
 Artists would make an outcry: all the more,
 That she had just a statue's sleepy grace Which broods o'er its own beauty. Nay, her fault 10 (Don't laugh!) was just perfection: for suppose
 Only the little flaw, and I had peeped Inside it, learned what soul inside was like.
 At Rome some tourist raised the grit be-
 neath
 A Venus' forehead with his whittlingknife —
 I wish, — now, — I had played that brute, brought blood
 To surface from the depths I fancied chalk!
 As it was, her mere face surprised so much That I stopped short there, struck on heap, as stares
 The cockney stranger at a certain bust 20 With drooped eyes, — she's the thing I have in mind, —
 Down at my Brother's. All sufficient
 prize —
 Such outside! Now, — confound me for a prig! —
 Who cares? I'll make a clean breast once for all!
 Beside, you've heard the gossip. My life
 long
 I've been a woman-liker, — liking means Loving and so on. There's a lengthy list By this time I shall have to answer for — So say the good folk: and they don't guess
 half —
 For the worst is, let once collecting-itch 30 Possess you, and, with perspicacity, Keeps growing such a greediness that theft Follows at no long distance, — there's the
 fact!
 I knew that on my Leporello¹-list Might figure this, that, and the other name Of feminine desirability,
 But if I happened to desire inscribe, Along with these, the only Beautiful — Here was the unique specimen to snatch Or now or never. 'Beautiful' I said — 40 'Beautiful' say in cold blood, — boiling
 then
 To tune of 'Haste, secure whatever the cost
*This rarity, die in the act, be damned,
 So you complete collection, crown your list!*
- It seemed as though the whole world, once aroused
 By the first notice of such wonder's birth, Would break bounds to contest my prize
 with me
 The first discoverer, should she but emerge From that safe den of darkness where she dozed
 Till I stole in, that country-parsonage Where, country-parson's daughter, mother-
 less,
 Brotherless, sisterless, for eighteen years
 She had been vegetating lily-like.
 Her father was my brother's tutor, got The living that way: him I chanced to see — Her I saw — her the world would grow one eye
 To see, I felt no sort of doubt at all!
 'Secure her!' cried the devil: 'afterward Arrange for the disposal of the prize!'
 The devil's doing! yet I seem to think — Now, when all's done, — think with 'a head reposed'
 In French phrase — hope I think I meant
 to do
 All requisite for such a rarity
 When I should be at leisure, have due time To learn requirement. But in evil day — Bless me, at week's end, long as any year,
 The father must begin 'Young Somebody, Much recommended — for I break a rule — Comes here to read, next Long Vacation.'
 'Young!'
 That did it. Had the epithet been 'rich,' 'Noble,' 'a genius,' even 'handsome,' — but
 — 'Young!' —
 "I say — just a word! I want to know — You are not married?"
 "I?"
 "Nor ever were?"
 "Never! Why?"
 "Oh, then — never mind! Go on!
 I had a reason for the question,"
 "Come, —
 You could not be the young man?"
 "No, indeed!
 Certainly — if you never married her!"
 "That I did not: and there's the curse, you'll see!
 Nay, all of it's one curse, my life's mistake Which, nourished with manure that's warranted
 To make the plant bear wisdom, blew out
 full
 In folly beyond field-flower-foolishness!

The lies I used to tell my womankind, Knowing they disbelieved me all the time Though they required my lies, their decent
 due,
 This woman — not so much believed, I'll
 say,
 As just anticipated from my mouth:
 Since being true, devoted, constant — she Found constancy, devotion, truth, the plain And easy commonplace of character.
 No mock-heroics but seemed natural To her who underneath the face, I knew Was fairness' self, possessed a heart, I judged
 Must correspond in folly just as far Beyond the common, — and a mind to
 match, —
 Not made to puzzle conjurers like me Who, therein, proved the fool who fronts you, Sir,
 And begs leave to cut short the ugly
 rest!
 'Trust me!' I said: she trusted. 'Marry
 me!'
 Or rather, 'We are married: when, the rite?'
 That brought on the collector's next-day qualm
 At counting acquisition's cost. There lay My marvel, there my purse more light by
 much
 Because of its late lie-expenditure:
 Ill-judged such moment to make fresh demand —
 To cage as well as catch my rarity!
 So, I began explaining. At first word Outbroke the horror. 'Then, my truths were lies!'
 I tell you, such an outbreak, such new strange
 All-unsuspected revelation — soul
 As supernaturally grand as face Was fair beyond example — that at once Either I lost — or, if it please you, found My senses, — stammered — somehow —
 'Jest! and now, Earnest! Forget all else but — heart has
 loved,
 Does love, shall love you ever! take the
 hand!'
 Not she! no marriage for superb disdain, Contempt incarnate!"

"Yes, it's different, —
 It's only like in being four years since.
 I see now!"

"Well, what did disdain do next, Think you?"

"That's past me: did not marry you! —
 That's the main thing I care for, I suppose.
 Turned nun, or what?"

"Why, married in a month
 Some parson, some smug crop-haired smooth-chinned sort Of curate-creature, I suspect, — dived
 down,
 Down, deeper still, and came up somewhere else —
 I don't know where — I've not tried much to know, —
 In short, she's happy: what the clodpoles
 call
 'Countrified' with a vengeance! leads the
 life
 Respectable and all that drives you mad: Still — where, I don't know, and that's best 50 for both."

"Well, that she did not like you, I conceive.
 But why should you hate her, I want to
 know?"

"My good young friend, — because or her or else
 Malicious Providence I have to hate.
 For, what I tell you proved the turning-
 point
 Of my whole life and fortune toward success
 Or failure. If I drown, I lay the fault Much on myself who caught at reed not rope,
 But more on reed which, with a packthread's pith,
 Had buoyed me till the minute's cramp 60 could thaw
 And I strike out afresh and so be saved.
 It's easy saying — I had sunk before, Disqualified myself by idle days And busy nights, long since, from holding
 hard
 On cable, even, had fate cast me such!
 You boys don't know how many times men fail
 Perforce o' the little to succeed i' the large, Husband their strength, let slip the petty
 prey, Collect the whole power for the final
 pounce.
 My fault was the mistaking man's main 70
 prize
 For intermediate boy's diversion; clap Of boyish hands here frightened game away Which, once gone, goes for ever. Oh, at first
 I took the anger easily, nor much Minded the anguish — having learned that storms
 Subside, and teapot-tempests are akin.
 Time would arrange things, mend what-e'er might be Somewhat amiss; precipitation, eh?
 Reason and rhyme prompt — reparation!
 Tiffs
 End properly in marriage and a dance! 80

I said 'We'll marry, make the past a blank' —

And never was such damnable mistake!

That interview, that laying bare my soul,
As it was first, so was it last chance — one And only. Did I write? Back letter came Unopened as it went. Inexorable
She fled, I don't know where, consoled herself

With the smug curate-creature: chop and change!

Sure am I, when she told her shaveling all 10 His Magdalen's adventure, tears were shed, Forgiveness evangelically shown,

'Loose hair and lifted eye,' — as someone says.

And now, he's worshipped for his pains, the sneak!"

"Well, but your turning-point of life, what's here

To hinder you contesting Finsbury

With Orton,¹ next election? I don't see . . ."

"Not you! But I see. Slowly, surely, creeps

Day by day o'er me the conviction — here Was life's prize grasped at, gained, and then let go!

20 — That with her — may be, for her — I had felt

Ice in me melt, grow steam, drive to effect
Any or all the fancies sluggish here I' the head that needs the hand she would not take

And I shall never lift now. Lo, your wood —

Its turnings which I likened life to!
Well, —

There she stands, ending every avenue,
Her visionary presence on each goal I might have gained had we kept side by side!

Still string nerve and strike foot? Her frown forbids:

30 The steam congeals once more: I'm old
again!

Therefore I hate myself — but how much
worse

Do not I hate who would not understand, Let me repair things — no, but sent a-slide My folly falteringly, stumblingly Down, down and deeper down until I
drop

Upon — the need of your ten thousand pounds

And consequently loss of mine! I lose Character, cash, nay, common-sense itself Recounting such a lengthy cock-and-bull

40 Adventure — lose my temper in the

"And lose beside, — if I may supplement
The list of losses, — train and ten-o'clock!
Hark, pant and puff, there travels the swart
sign!

So much the better! You're my captive
now!

I'm glad you trust a fellow: friends grow thick

This way — that's twice said; we were thickish, though,

Even last night, and, ere night comes again,
I prophesy good luck to both of us!

For see now! — back to 'balmy eminence'
Or 'calm acclivity,' or what's the word! 5a

Bestow you there an hour, concoct at ease A sonnet for the Album, while I put Bold face on, best foot forward, make for

house,

March in to aunt and niece, and tell the
truth —

(Even white-lying goes against my taste After your little story). Oh, the niece

Is rationality itself! The aunt — If she's amenable to reason too —

Why, you stopped short to pay her due respect,

And let the Duke wait (I'll work well the Duke).

If she grows gracious, I return for you;
If thunder's in the air, why — bear your
doom,

Dine on rump-steaks and port, and shake the dust

Of aunty from your shoes as off you go

By evening-train, nor give the thing a
thought

How you shall pay me — that's as sure as
fate,

Old fellow! Off with you, face left about!
Yonder's the path I have to pad. You see,

I'm in good spirits, God knows why! Perhaps

Because the woman did not marry you 7a — Who look so hard at me, — and have the right,

One must be fair and own."

The two stand still Under an oak.

"Look here!" resumes the youth.
"I never quite knew how I came to like

You — so much — whom I ought not court
at all:

Nor how you had a leaning just to me
Who am assuredly not worth your pains.

For there must needs be plenty such as
you

Somewhere about, — although I can't say
where, —

Able and willing to teach all you know; 8a
While — how can you have missed a score like me

With money and no wit, precisely each

A pupil for your purpose, were it — ease Fool's poke of tutor's honorarium-fee?
 And yet, howe'er it came about, I felt At once my master: you as prompt described
 Your man, I warrant, so was bargain struck.
 Now, these same lines of liking, loving, run Sometimes so close together they converge — Life's great ad-ventures — you know what I mean —
 In people. Do you know, as you advanced,
 It got to be uncommonly like fact We two had fallen in with — liked and
 loved
 Just the same woman in our different ways?
 I began life — poor groundling as I prove — Winged and ambitious to fly high: why
 not?
 There's something in 'Don Quixote' to the
 point,
 My shrewd old father used to quote and
 praise —
 'Am I born man?' asks Sancho: 'being
man,
By possibility I may be Pope!' So, Pope I meant to make myself, by
 step
 And step, whereof the first should be to
 find
 A perfect woman; and I tell you this — If what I fixed on, in the order due Of undertakings, as next step, had first Of all disposed itself to suit my tread,
 And I had been, the day I came of age, Returned at head of poll for Westminster — Nay, and moreover summoned by the Queen
 At week's end, when my maiden-speech bore fruit,
 To form and head a Tory ministry — It would not have seemed stranger, no, nor
 been
 More strange to me, as now I estimate, Than what did happen — sober truth, no
 dream.
 I saw my wonder of a woman, — laugh, I'm past that! — in Commemoration-
 week.
 A plenty have I seen since, fair and
 foul, —
 With eyes, too, helped by your sagacious
 wink;
 But one to match that marvel — no least
 trace,
 Least touch of kinship and community!
 The end was — I did somehow state the
 fact,
 Did, with no matter what imperfect words,
 One way or other give to understand That woman, soul and body were her slave Would she but take, but try them — any test
 Of wit, and some poor test of power beside:

So did the strings within my brain grow tense
 And capable of . . . hang similitudes!
 She answered kindly but beyond appeal.
 'No sort of habe for me, who came too late.
 She was another's. Love went — mine to
 her,
 Hers just as loyally to someone else.' 50
 Of course! I might expect it! Nature's
 law —
 Given the peerless woman, certainly Somewhere shall be the peerless man to
 match!
 I acquiesced at once, submitted me
 In something of a stupor, went my way.
 I fancy there had been some talk before Of somebody — her father or the like — To coach me in the holidays, — that's how I came to get the sight and speech of her, —
 But I had sense enough to break off sharp, 60 Save both of us the pain."

"Quite right there!"

"Eh?
 Quite wrong, it happens! Now comes worst of all!
 Yes, I did sulk aloof and let alone
 The lovers — I disturb the angel-mates?"

"Seraph paired off with cherub!"

"Thank you! While I never plucked up courage to inquire Who he was, even, — certain-sure of this,
 That nobody I knew of had blue wings And wore a star-crown as he needs must
 do, —
 Some little lady, — plainish, pock-marked 70
 girl,
 Finds out my secret in my woeful face, Comes up to me at the Apollo Ball,
 And pityingly pours her wine and oil
 This way into the wound: 'Dear f-f-friend, Why waste affection thus on — must I
say,
A somewhat worthless objec. Who's her choice —
Irrevocable as deliberate — Out of the wide world? I shall name no
names —
But there's a person in society, Who, blessed with rank and talent, has 80 grown grey
In idleness and sin of every sort Except hypocrisy: he's thrice her age,
A by-word for "successes with the sex"
As the French say — and, as we ought to say, Consummately a liar and a rogue, Since — show me where's the woman won without
The help of this one lie which she believes — That — never mind how things have come
to pass,

And let who loves have loved a thousand times —

All the same he now loves her only, loves Her ever! if by "won" you just mean "sold," That's quite another compact. Well, this scamp, Continuing descent from bad to worse, Must leave his fine and fashionable prey (Who — fathered, brothered, husbanded, — are hedged

About with thorny danger) and apply His arts to this poor country ignorance

10 Who sees forthwith in the first rag of man Her model hero! Why continue waste On such a woman treasures of a heart Would yet find solace, — yes, my f-f-friend In some congenial — fiddle-diddle-dee?"

"Pray, is the pleasant gentleman described Exact the portrait which my 'f-f-friends' Recognise as so like? 'Tis evident You half surmised the sweet original Could be no other than myself, just now! 20 Your stop and start were flattering!"

"Of course Caricature's allowed for in a sketch! The longish nose becomes a foot in length, The swarthy cheek gets copper-coloured, — still,

Prominent beak and dark-hued skin are facts:

And 'parson's daughter' — 'young man coachable' —

'Elderly party' — 'four years since' — were facts

To fasten on, a moment! Marriage, though —

That made the difference, I hope."

"All right!

I never married; wish I had — and then 30 Unwish it: people kill their wives, sometimes!

I hate my mistress, but I'm murder-free. In your case, where's the grievance? You came last,

The earlier bird picked up the worm. Suppose

You, in the glory of your twenty-one, Had happened to precede myself! 'tis odds But this gigantic juvenility,

This offering of a big arm's bony hand — I'd rather shake than feel shake me, I know —

Had moved my dainty mistress to admire

40 An altogether new Ideal — deem Idolatry less due to life's decline Productive of experience, powers mature By dint of usage, the made man — no boy That's all to make! I was the earlier bird —

And what I found, I let fall; what you missed

Who is the fool that blames you for?"

"Myself — For nothing, everything! For finding out She, whom I worshipped, was a worshipper In turn of . . . but why stir up settled mud?

She married him — the fifty-years-old 50 rake —

How you have teased the talk from me! At last

My secret's told you. I inquired no more, Nay, stopped ears when informants unshut mouth;

Enough that she and he live, deuce take where,

Married and happy, or else miserable — It's 'Cut-the-pack;' she turned up ace or knave,

And I left Oxford, England, dug my hole Out in Dalmatia, till you drew me thence Badger-like, — 'Back to London' was the word —

'Do things, a many, there, you fancy hard, 60 I'll undertake are easy!' — the advice.

I took it, had my twelvemonth's fling with you —

(Little hand holding large hand pretty tight

For all its delicacy — eh, my lord?), Until when, t'other day, I got a turn

Somehow and gave up tired: and 'Rest!' bade you,

'Marry your cousin, double your estate, And take your ease by all means!' So, I loll

On this the springy sofa, mine next month —

Or should loll, but that you must needs 70 beat rough

The very down you spread me out so smooth.

I wish this confidence were still to make! Ten thousand pounds? You owe me twice the sum

For stirring up the black depths! There's repose

Or, at least, silence when misfortune seems All that one has to bear; but folly — yes,

Folly, it all was! Fool to be so meek, So humble, — such a coward rather say!

Fool, to adore the adorer of a fool! Not to have faced him, tried (a useful 80 hint)

My big and bony, here, against the bunch Of lily-coloured five with signet-ring,

Most like, for little-finger's sole defence — Much as you flaunt the blazon there! I grind

My teeth, that bite my very heart, to think —

To know I might have made that woman mine

But for the folly of the coward — know — Or what's the good of my apprenticeship

This twelvemonth to a master in the art?

Mine — had she been mine — just one moment mine
For honour, for dishonour — anyhow,
So that my life, instead of stagnant . . .
Well,
You've poked and proved stagnation is not sleep —
Hang you!"

"Hang you for an ungrateful goose!
All this means — I who since I knew you
first
Have helped you to conceit yourself this cock
O' the dunghill with all hens to pick and choose — Ought to have helped you when shell first was chipped By chick that wanted prompting 'Use the spur!'
While I was elsewhere putting mine to use.
As well might I blame you who kept aloof, Seeing you could not guess I was alive, Never advised me '*Do as I have done — Reverence such a jewel as your luck
Has scratched up to enrich unworthiness!*' As your behaviour was should mine have
been,
— Faults which we both, too late, are sorry
for:
Opposite ages, each with its mistake!
'If youth but would — if age but could,
you know.
Don't let us quarrel. Come, we're — young and old — Neither so badly off. Go you your way, Cut to the Cousin! I'll to Inn, await The issue of diplomacy with Aunt,
And wait my hour on 'calm activity'
In rumination manifold — perhaps About ten thousand pounds I have to pay!"

III.

Now, as the elder lights the fresh cigar Conducive to resource, and saunteringly Betakes him to the left-hand backward
path, —
While, much sedate, the younger strides
away
To right and makes for — islanded in lawn And edged with shrubbery — the brilliant bit
Of Barry's building that's the Place, — a
pair
Of women, at this nick of time, one young,
One very young, are ushered with due pomp
Into the same Inn-parlour — "disengaged Entirely now!" the obsequious landlord
smiles,
"Since the late occupants — whereof but one Was quite a stranger" — (smile enforced by bow)

"*Left, a full two hours since, to catch the train,
Probably for the stranger's sake!*" (Bow,
smile,
And backing out from door soft-closed behind.)

Woman and girl, the two, alone inside, Begin their talk: the girl, with sparkling
eyes —

"Oh, I forewent him purposely! but you,
Who joined at — journeyed from the Junction here —

I wonder how he failed your notice. Few Stop at our station: fellow-passengers Assuredly you were — I saw indeed 50
His servant, therefore he arrived all right.
I wanted, you know why, to have you safe Inside here first of all, so dodged about The dark end of the platform; that's his
way —

To swing from station straight to avenue
And stride the half a mile for exercise.
I fancied you might notice the huge boy.
He soon gets o'er the distance; at the
house

He'll hear I went to meet him and have missed;

He'll wait. No minute of the hour's too 60
much

Meantime for our preliminary talk:

First word of which must be — O good beyond

Expression of all goodness — you to
come!"

The elder, the superb one, answers slow.

"There was no helping that. You called
for me,

Cried, rather: and my old heart answered
you.

Still, thank me! since the effort breaks a
vow —

At least, a promise to myself."

"I know!

How selfish get you happy folk to be!

If I should love my husband, must I needs 70

Sacrifice straightway all the world to him,

As you do? Must I never dare leave house

On this dread Arctic expedition, out

And in again, six mortal hours, though you,

You even, my own friend for evermore,

Adjure me — fast your friend till rude love

pushed Poor friendship from her vantage — just to grant

The quarter of a whole day's company And counsel? This makes counsel so much more

Need and necessity. For here's my block 80

Of stumbling: in the face of happiness

So absolute, fear chills me. If such change

In heart be but love's easy consequence, Do I love? If to marry mean—let go All I now live for, should my marriage
be?"

The other never once has ceased to gaze
On the great elm-tree in the open, posed Placidly full in front, smooth bole, broad
branch,
And leafage, one green plenitude of May.
The gathered thought runs into speech at
last.

"O you exceeding beauty, bosomful 10 Of lights and shades, murmurs and silences,
Sun-warmth, dew-coolness, — squirrel, bee and bird,
High, higher, highest, till the blue proclaims
'Leave earth, there's nothing better till next
step Heavenward!' — so, off flies what has wings to help!"

And henceforth they alternate. Says the girl —

"That's saved then: marriage spares the early taste."

"Four years now, since my eye took note of tree!"

"If I had seen no other tree but this My life long, while yourself came straight,
you said, 20 From tree which overstretched you and was just One fairy tent with pitcher-leaves that held Wine, and a flowery wealth of suns and moons,
And magic fruits whereon the angels feed —
I looking out of window on a tree Like yonder — otherwise well-known, much-liked,
Yet just an English ordinary elm —
What marvel if you cured me of conceit
My elm's bird-bee-and-squirrel tenantry Was quite the proud possession I supposed?"

30 And there is evidence you tell me true.
The fairy marriage-tree reports itself Good guardian of the perfect face and
form, Fruits of four years' protection! Married
friend,
You are more beautiful than ever!"

"Yes:

I think that likely. I could well dispense With all thought fair in feature, mine or no, Leave but enough of face to know me by — With all found fresh in youth except such
strength

As lets a life-long labour earn repose Death sells at just that price, they say; 45 and so,
Possibly, what I care not for, I keep."

"How you must know he loves you!
Chill, before,
Fear sinks to freezing. Could I sacrifice — Assured my lover simply loves my soul — One nose-breadth of fair feature? No,
indeed!
Your own love . . ."

"The preliminary hour — Don't waste it!"

"But I can't begin at once!
The angel's self that comes to hear me
speak
Drives away all the care about the speech.
What an angelic mystery you are — 50
Now — that is certain! when I knew you
first,
No break of halo and no bud of wing!
I thought I knew you, saw you, round and
through,
Like a glass ball; suddenly, four years
since,
You vanished, how and whither? Mystery!
Wherefore? No mystery at all: you loved, Were loved again, and left the world of
course:
Who would not? Lapped four years in fairyland,
Out comes, by no less wonderful a chance,
The changeling, touched athwart her 60 trellised bliss
Of blush-rose bower by just the old friend's
voice
That's now struck dumb at her own potency.
I talk of my small fortunes? Tell me yours Rather! The fool I ever was — I am, You see that: the true friend you ever had,
You have, you also recognise. Perhaps,
Giving you all the love of all my heart,
Nature, that's niggard in me, has denied The after-birth of love there's someone claims
— This huge boy, swinging up the avenue; 70
And I want counsel: is defect in me,
Or him who has no right to raise the love?
My cousin asks my hand: he's young
enough, Handsome, — my maid thinks, — manly's more the word:
He asked my leave to 'drop' the elm-tree
there,
Some morning before breakfast. Gentle-
ness Goes with the strength, of course. He's honest too, Limpidly truthful. For ability —

All's in the rough yet. His first taste of
 life Seems to have somehow gone against the
 tongue:
 He travelled, tried things — came back, tried still more —
 He says he's sick of all. He's fond of me
 After a certain careless-earnest way I like: the iron's crude, — no polished
 steel Somebody forged before me. I am rich —
 That's not the reason, he's far richer: no, Nor is it that he thinks me pretty, — frank Undoubtedly on that point! He saw once The pink of face-perfection — oh, not
 you — Content yourself, my beauty! — for she proved
 So thoroughly a cheat, his charmer . . .
 nay,
 He runs into extremes, I'll say at once, Lest you say! Well, I understand he wants Someone to serve, something to do: and
 both Requisites so abound in me and mine That here's the obstacle which stops consent:
 The smoothness is too smooth, and I mistrust
 The unseen cat beneath the counterpane.
 Therefore I thought *'Would she but judge
 for me,*
Who, judging for herself succeeded so!'
 Do I love him, does he love me, do both Mistake for knowledge — easy ignorance?
 Appeal to its proficient in each art!
 I got rough-smooth through a piano-piece, Rattled away last week till tutor came,
 Heard me to end, then grunted 'Ach, mein Gott!
Sagen Sie "easy"? Every note is wrong.
*All thumped mit wrist: we'll trouble fingers
 now.*
The Fräulein will please roll up Raff again
And exercise at Czerny for one month!'
 Am I to roll up cousin, exercise At Trollope's novels for one month? Pronounce!"

"Now, place each in the right position first, Adviser and advised one! I perhaps Am three — nay, four years older; am,
 beside,
 A wife: advantages — to balance which,
 You have a full fresh joyous sense of life That finds you out life's fit food every-
 where,
 Detects enjoyment where I, slow and dull, Fumble at fault. Already, these four years, Your merest glimpses at the world without Have shown you more than ever met my gaze;
 And now, by joyance you inspire joy, —
 learn

While you profess to teach, and teach although Avowedly a learner. I am dazed Like any owl by sunshine which just sets The sparrow preening plumage! Here's to spy — Your cousin! You have scanned him 50 all your life,
 Little or much; I never saw his face.
 You have determined on a marriage —
 used Deliberation therefore — I'll believe
 No otherwise, with opportunity For judgment so abounding! Here stand
 I —
 Summoned to give my sentence, for a whim, (Well, at first cloud-fleck thrown athwart your blue) Judge what is strangeness' self to me, — say 'Wed!'
 Or 'Wed not!' whom you promise I shall
 judge
 Presently, at propitious lunch-time, just 60 While he carves chicken! Sends he leg for wing?
 That revelation into character And conduct must suffice me! Quite as
 well
 Consult with yonder solitary crow
 That eyes us from your elm-top!"

"Still the same!
 Do you remember, at the library
 We saw together somewhere, those two books Somebody said were noteworthy? One Lay wide on table, sprawled its painted leaves
 For all the world's inspection; shut on 70 shelf Reclined the other volume, closed, clasped, locked — Clear to be let alone. Which page had we Preferred the turning over of? You were,
 Are, ever will be the locked lady, hold Inside you secrets written, — soul-absorbed,
 My ink upon your blotting-paper. I — What trace of you have I to show in turn?
 Delicate secrets! No one juvenile Ever essayed at croquet and performed Superiorly: but I confided you 80
 The sort of hat he wore and hair it held.
 While you? One day a calm note comes by post:
'I am just married, you may like to hear.'
 Most men would hate you, or they ought;
 we love
 What we fear, — I do! 'Cold' I shall expect
 My cousin calls you. I — dislike not him,
 But (if I comprehend what loving means) Love you immeasurably more — more —
 more

Than even he who, loving you his wife,
Would turn up nose at who impertinent, Frivolous, forward — loves that excellence Of all the earth he bows in worship to!
And who's this paragon of privilege?
Simply a country parson: his the charm That worked the miracle! Oh, too absurd
But that you stand before me as you stand!
Such beauty does prove something, everything!

10 Beauty's the prize-flower which dispenses
eye
From peering into what has nourished
root —
Dew or manure: the plant best knows its
place.
Enough, from teaching youth and tending
age
And hearing sermons, — haply writing tracts, —
From such strange love-besprinkled compost, lo,
Out blows this triumph! Therefore love's
the soil
Plants find or fail of. You, with wit to
find,
Exercise wit on the old friend's behalf, Keep me from failure! Scan and scrutinise 20 This cousin! Surely he's as worth your pains
To study as my elm-tree, crow and all, You still keep staring at. I read your thoughts."

"At last?"

"At first! '*Would, tree, atop of thee I winged were, like crow perched moveless
there,
And so could straightway soar, escape this
bore,
Back to my nest where broods whom I love
best —
The parson o'er his parish — garish — rarish —*'

Oh I could bring the rhyme in if I tried:
The Album here inspires me! Quite apart 30 From lyrical expression, have I read The stare aright, and sings not soul just
so?"

"Or rather so? '*Cool comfortable elm That men make coffins out of, — none for me At thy expense, so thou permit I glide Under thy ferny feet, and there sleep, sleep, Nor dread awaking though in heaven
itself!*'"

The younger looks with face struck sudden
white.

The elder answers its inquiry.

"Dear,

You are a guesser, not a 'clairvoyante.'

40 I'll so far open you the locked and shelved

Volume, my soul, that you desire to see,
As let you profit by the title-page —"

"Paradise Lost?"

"Inferno! — All which comes Of tempting me to break my vow. Stop
here!

Friend, whom I love the best in the whole
world,

Come at your call, be sure that I will do All your requirement — see and say my
mind.

It may be that by sad apprenticeship
I have a keener sense: I'll task the same.
Only indulge me — here let sight and
speech

Happen — this Inn is neutral ground, you
know!

I cannot visit the old house and home,
Encounter the old sociality Abjured for ever. Peril quite enough In even this first — last, I pray it prove — Renunciation of my solitude!

Back, you, to house and cousin! Leave me here,

Who want no entertainment, carry still My occupation with me. While I watch
The shadow inching round those ferny feet, 60 Tell him '*A school-friend wants a word
with me*'

Up at the inn: time, tide and train won't
wait:

I must go see her — on and off again — You'll keep me company?' Ten minutes'
talk,

With you in presence, ten more afterward.
With who, alone, convoys me station-
bound,

And I see clearly — and say honestly To-morrow: pen shall play tongue's part,
you know.

Go — quick! for I have made our hand-in-hand

Return impossible. So scared you look, — If cousin does not greet you with 'What ghost'

Has crossed your path?' I set him down obtuse."

And after one more look, with face still
white,

The younger does go, while the elder stands Occupied by the elm at window there.

IV.

Occupied by the elm; and, as its shade Has crept clock-hand-wise till it ticks at fern

Five inches further to the South, the door Opens abruptly, someone enters sharp.

The elder man returned to wait the youth:
Never observes the room's new occupant,

Throws hat on table, stoops quick, elbowpropped
Over the Album wide there, bends down
brow
A cogitative minute, whistles shrill, Then, — with a cheery-hopeless laugh-and-lose Air of defiance to fate visibly Casting the toils about him, — mouths
once more “Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot!”
Then clasps-to cover, sends book spinning
off
’T’other side table, looks up, starts erect 10 Full-face with her who, — roused from that abstruse Question, “*Will next tick tip the fern or
no?*”
Fronts him as fully.

All her languor breaks, Away withers at once the weariness From the black-blooded brow, anger and
hate Convulse. Speech follows slower, but at last —

“You here! I felt, I knew it would befall!
Knew, by some subtle undividable Trick of the trickster, I should, silly-sooth, Late or soon, somehow be allured to leave 20 Safe hiding and come take of him, arrears, My torment due on four years’ respite!
Time

To pluck the bird’s healed breast of down o’er wound!

Have your success! Be satisfied this sole Seeing you has undone all heaven could do These four years, puts me back to you and hell!

What will next trick be, next success? No
doubt

When I shall think to glide into the grave,
There will you wait disguised as beckoning
Death,

And catch and capture me for evermore!
30 But, God, though I am nothing, be thou all!
Contest him for me! Strive, for he is strong!”

Already his surprise dies palely out In laugh of acquiescing impotence.
He neither gasps nor hisses: calm and
plain —

“I also felt and knew — but otherwise!
You out of hand and sight and care of me These four years, whom I felt, knew, all the while . . .

Oh, it’s no superstition! It’s a gift O’ the gamester that he snuffs the unseen powers

40 Which help or harm him. Well I knew what lurked,

Lay perdue paralysing me, — drugged, drownd

And damnified my soul and body both!
Down and down, see where you have dragged me to,

You and your malice! I was, four years
since,

— Well, a poor creature! I became a
knave.

I squandered my own pence: I plump my
purse

With other people’s pounds. I practised
play

Because I liked it: play turns labour now Because there’s profit also in the sport.

I gamed with men of equal age and craft: 5
I steal here with a boy as green as grass

Whom I have tightened hold on slow and
sure

This long while, just to bring about to-day
When the boy beats me hollow, buries me

In ruin who was sure to beggar him.
O time indeed I should look up and laugh

“Surely she closes on me!” Here you
stand!”

And stand she does: while volubility, With him, keeps on the increase, for his
tongue

After long locking-up is loosed for once. 60

“Certain the taunt is happy!” he resumes:

“So, it was allured you — only I — I, and none other — to this spectacle —

Your triumph, my despair — you womanfiend

That front me! Well, I have my wish, then! See

The low wide brow oppressed by sweeps of hair

Darker and darker as they coil and swathe
The crowned corpse-wanness whence the eyes burn black Not asleep now! not pin-points dwarfed

beneath

Either great bridging eyebrow — poor 70 blank beads —

Babies, I’ve pleased to pity in my time:
How they protrude and glow immense with hate!

The long triumphant nose attains — retains

Just the perfection; and there’s scarletskein

My ancient enemy, her lip and lip, Sense-free, sense-frighting lips clenched cold and bold Because of chin, that based resolve beneath!

Then the columnar neck completes the
whole

Greek-sculpture-baffling body! Do I see?

Can I observe? You wait next word to 80
come?

- Well, wait and want! since no one blight I bid Consume one least perfection. Each and
all,
As they are rightly shocking now to me,
So may they still continue! Value them?
Ay, as the vendor knows the money-worth Of his Greek statue, fools aspire to buy,
And he to see the back of! Let us laugh!
You have absolved me from my sin at least!
You stand stout, strong, in the rude health of hate, 10 No touch of the tame timid nullity My cowardice, forsooth, has practised on!
Ay, while you seemed to hint some fine fifth act
Of tragedy should freeze blood, end the farce,
I never doubted all was joke. I kept,
May be, an eye alert on paragraphs,
Newspaper-notice, — let no inquest slip,
Accident, disappearance: sound and safe
Were you, my victim, not of mind to die!
So, my worst fancy that could spoil the
smooth
20 Of pillow, and arrest descent of sleep
Was *'Into what dim hole can she have dived, She and her wrongs, her woe that's wearing
flesh
And blood away?'* Whereas, see, sorrow swells!
Or, fattened, fulsome, have you fed on me, Sucked out my substance? How much gloss, I pray, O'erbloomed these hair-swathes when there crept from you To me that craze, else unaccountable, Which urged me to contest our county-seat With whom but my own brother's nominee?
30 Did that mouth's pulp glow ruby from carmine
While I misused my moment, pushed, —
one word, —
One hair's breadth more of gesture, — idiot-like Past passion, floundered on to the grotesque,
And lost the heiress in a grin? At least,
You made no such mistake! You tickled
fish,
Landed your prize the true artistic way!
How did the smug young curate rise to tune Of 'Friend, a fatal fact divides us. Love Suits me no longer. I have suffered shame, 40 *Betrayal: past is past; the future —
yours —
Shall never be contaminate by mine.
I might have spared me this confession, not — Oh, never by some hideousest of lies, Easy, impenetrable! No! but say,
By just the quiet answer — "I am cold."
Falsehood avunt, each shadow of thee,
hence!*
- Had happier fortune willed . . . but dreams are vain.
Now, leave me — yes, for pity's sake!*
Aha,
Who fails to see the curate as his face Reddened and whitened, wanted handker- 51 chief
At wrinkling brow and twinkling eye, until Out burst the proper *'Angel, whom the fiend
Has thought to smirch, — thy whiteness, at one wipe
Of holy cambric, shall disgrace the swan!
Mine be the task' . . . and so forth!*
Fool? not he!
Cunning in flavours, rather! What but sour Suspected makes the sweetness doubly
sweet,
And what stings love from faint to flamboyant
But the fear-sprinkle? Even horror helps —
'Love's flame in me by such recited wrong 60 Drenched, quenched, indeed? It burns the fiercelier thence!'
Why, I have known men never love their wives
Till somebody — myself, suppose — had
*'drenched
And quenched love,'* so the blockheads whined: as if The fluid fire that lifts the torpid limb Were a wrong done to palsy. But I thrilled
No palsied person: half my age, or less,
The curate was, I'll wager: o'er young
blood Your beauty triumphed! Eh, but — was it he?
Then, it was he, I heard of! None beside! 7 How frank you were about the audacious
boy
Who fell upon you like a thunderbolt — Passion and protestation! He it was Reserved in petto! Ay, and 'rich' beside —
'Rich' — how supremely did disdain curl
nose!
All that I heard was — 'wedded to a priest;'
Informants sunk youth, riches and the rest.
And so my lawless love parted loves, That loves might come together with a rush!
Surely this last achievement sucked me dry: 8 Indeed, that way my wits went. Mistressqueen,
Be merciful and let your subject slink Into dark safety! He's a beggar, see — Do not turn back his ship, Australia-
bound,
And bid her land him right amid some crowd
Of creditors, assembled by your curse!

Don't cause the very rope to crack (you can!) Whereon he spends his last (friend's) sixpence, just
The moment when he hoped to hang himself!
Be satisfied you beat him!"

She replies —

"Beat him! I do. To all that you confess
Of abject failure, I extend belief.
Your very face confirms it: God is just!
Let my face — fix your eyes! — in turn confirm What I shall say. All-abject's but half
truth;
Add to all-abject knave as perfect fool!
So is it you probed human nature, so Prognosticated of me? Lay these words To heart then, or where God meant heart should lurk!
That moment when you first revealed
yourself,
My simple impulse prompted — end forth-
with
The ruin of a life uprooted thus To surely perish! How should such spoiled tree Henceforward baulk the wind of its worst
sport,
Fail to go falling deeper, falling down From sin to sin until some depth were reached
Doomed to the weakest by the wickedest Of weak and wicked human kind? But when,
That self-display made absolute, — behold
A new revelation! — round you pleased to veer, Propose me what should prompt annul the
past,
Make me 'amends by marriage' — in your
phrase,
Incorporate me henceforth, body and soul,
With soul and body which mere brushing
past
Brought leprosy upon me — 'marry' these!
Why, then despair broke, re-assurance dawned,
Clear-sighted was I that who hurled contempt
As I — thank God! — at the contemptible, Was scarce an utter weakling. Rent
away
By treason from my rightful pride of place,
I was not destined to the shame below.
A cleft had caught me: I might perish
there,
But thence to be dislodged and whirled at
last Where the black torrent sweeps the sewage — no!

'Bare breast be on hard rock,' laughed out
my soul
In gratitude, 'howe'er rock's grip may 40
grind!
The plain rough wretched holdfast shall suffice
This wreck of me!' The wind, — I broke in bloom
At passage of, — which stripped me bole
and branch, Twisted me up and tossed me here, — turns back,
And, playful ever, would replant the spoil?
Be satisfied, not one least leaf that's mine Shall henceforth help wind's sport to exercise!
Rather I give such remnant to the rock Which never dreamed a straw would settle
there.
Rock may not thank me, may not feel my 50
breast,
Even: enough that I feel, hard and cold,
Its safety my salvation. Safe and saved, I lived, live. When the tempter shall persuade
His prey to slip down, slide off, trust the wind, —
Now that I know if God or Satan be Prince of the Power of the Air, — then,
then, indeed,
Let my life end and degradation too!"

"Good!" he smiles, "true Lord Byron!
'Tree and rock.'
'Rock' — there's advancement! He's at first a youth, Rich, worthless therefore; next he grows 60
a priest:
Youth, riches prove a notable resource,
When to leave me for their possessor gluts Malice abundantly; and now, last change,
The young rich parson represents a rock — Bloodstone, no doubt. He's Evangelical?
Your Ritualists prefer the Church for spouse!"

She speaks.

"I have a story to relate.
There was a parish-priest, my father knew, Elderly, poor: I used to pity him Before I learned what woes are pity- 70
worth.
Elderly was grown old now, scanty means Were straitening fast to poverty, beside The ailments which await in such a case.
Limited every way, a perfect man Within the bounds built up and up since
birth Breast-high about him till the outside
world
Was blank save o'erhead one blue bit of sky —

- Faith: he had faith in dogma, small or great,
 As in the fact that if he clave his skull He'd find a brain there: who proves such a fact No falsehood by experiment at price Of soul and body? The one rule of life Delivered him in childhood was 'Obeys Labour!' He had obeyed and laboured — tame,
 True to the mill-track blinked on from above.
 Some scholarship he may have gained in youth:
- 10 Gone — dropt or flung behind. Some blossom-flake, Spring's boon, descends on every vernal head,
 I used to think; but January joins December, as his year had known no May Trouble its snow-deposit, — cold and old!
 I heard it was his will to take a wife,
 A helpmate. Duty bade him tend and teach — How? with experience null, nor sympathy Abundant, — while himself worked dogma dead,
 Who would play ministrant to sickness, age,
- 20 Womankind, childhood? These demand a wife.
 Supply the want, then! theirs the wife; for him —
 No coarsest sample of the proper sex
 But would have served his purpose equally With God's own angel, — let but knowledge match Her coarseness: zeal does only half the work.
 I saw this — knew the purblind honest drudge
 Was wearing out his simple blameless life,
 And wanted help beneath a burthen — borne To treasure-house or dust-heap, what cared I?
- 30 Partner he needed: I proposed myself, Nor much surprised him — duty was so clear!
 Gratitude? What for? Gain of Paradise — Escape, perhaps, from the dire penalty Of who hides talent in a napkin? No:
 His scruple was — should I be strong enough — In body? since of weakness in the mind, Weariness in the heart — no fear of these!
 He took me as these Arctic voyagers Take an aspirant to their toil and pain:
- 40 Can he endure them? — that's the point, and not — Will he? Who would not, rather!
 Whereupon,
- I pleaded far more earnestly for leave To give myself away, than you to gain
 What you called priceless till you gained the heart And soul and body! which, as beggars serve Extorted alms, you straightway spat upon.
 Not so my husband, — for I gained my suit,
 And had my value put at once to proof.
 Ask him! These four years I have died away In village-life. The village? Ugliness 54
 At best and filthiness at worst, inside.
 Outside, sterility — earth sown with salt
 Or what keeps even grass from growing fresh.
 The life? I teach the poor and learn, myself,
 That commonplace to such stupidity Is all-recondite. Being brutalised Their true need is brute-language, cheery grunts
 And kindly cluckings, no articulate Nonsense that's elsewhere knowledge.
 Tend the sick,
 Sickened myself at pig-perversity, Cat-craft, dog-snarling, — may be, snapping . . ."
- "Brief:
 You eat that root of bitterness called Man
 — Raw: I prefer it cooked, with social sauce!
 So, he was not the rich youth after all!
 Well, I mistook. But somewhere needs must be The compensation. If not young nor rich . . ."
- "You interrupt."
- "Because you've daubed enough Bistre for background. Play the artist now, Produce your figure well-relieved in front!
 The contrast — do not I anticipate?
 Though neither rich nor young — what then? 'Tis all Forgotten, all this ignobility,
 In the dear home, the darling word, the smile,
 The something sweeter . . ."
- "Yes, you interrupt.
 I have my purpose and proceed. Who lives With beasts assumes beast-nature, look and voice,
 And, much more, thought, for beasts think. Selfishness In us met selfishness in them, deserved Such answer as it gained. My husband, bent

- On saving his own soul by saving theirs, —
 They, bent on being saved if saving soul Included body's getting bread and cheese Somehow in life and somehow after
 death, —
- Both parties were alike in the same boat,
 One danger, therefore one equality.
 Safety induces culture: culture seeks To institute, extend and multiply
 The difference between safe man and man, Able to live alone now; progress means What but abandonment of fellowship?
 We were in common danger, still stuck
 close.
- No new books, — were the old ones mastered yet?
- No pictures and no music: these divert — What from? the staving danger off!
 You paint
- The waterspout above, you set to words
 The roaring of the tempest round you?
 Thanks!
- Amusement? Talk at end of the tired
 day
- Of the more tiresome morrow! I transcribed
- 20 The page on page of sermon-scrawlings — stopped
- Intellect's eye and ear to sense and sound — Vainly: the sound and sense would penetrate
- To brain and plague there in despite of me Maddened to know more moral good were
 done
- Had we two simply sallied forth and preached
- I' the 'Green' they call their grimy, — I with twang
- Of long-disused guitar, — with cut and slash
- Of much-misvalued horsewhip he, — to bid
- The peaceable come dance, the peace-breaker
- 30 Pay in his person! Whereas — Heaven and Hell,
- Excite with that, restrain with this! So dealt
- His drugs my husband; as he dosed himself,
- He drenched his cattle: and, for all my
 part
- Was just to dub the mortar, never fear But drugs, hand pestled at, have poisoned
 nose!
- Heaven he let pass, left wisely undescribed:
 As applicable therefore to the sleep I want, that knows no waking — as to what's
- Conceived of as the proper prize to tempt 0 Souls less world-weary: there, no fault to
 find!
- But Hell he made explicit. After death, Life: man created new, ingeniously
- Perfect for a vindictive purpose now That man, first fashioned in beneficence, Was proved a failure; intellect at length Replacing old obtuseness, memory Made mindful of delinquent's bygone
 deeds
- Now that remorse was vain, which lifelong lay
- Dormant when lesson might be laid to
 heart;
- New gift of observation up and down 50
 And round man's self, new power to apprehend
- Each necessary consequence of act
 In man for well or ill — things obsolete — Just granted to supplant the idiocy Man's only guide while act was yet to choose,
- With ill or well momentarily its fruit;
 A faculty of immense suffering Conferred on mind and body, — mind,
 erewhile
- Unvisited by one compunctious dream
 During sin's drunken slumber, startled up, 60 Stung through and through by sin's significance
- Now that the holy was abolished — just As body which, alive, broke down beneath Knowledge, lay helpless in the path to good,
 Failed to accomplish aught legitimate, Achieve aught worthy, — which grew old in youth,
- And at its longest fell a cut-down flower, — Dying, this too revived by miracle To bear no end of burthen now that
 back
- Supported torture to no use at all, 70
 And live imperishably potent — since Life's potency was impotent to ward One plague off which made earth a hell
 before.
- This doctrine, which one healthy view of
 things,
- One sane sight of the general ordinance — Nature, — and its particular object, —
 man, —
- Which one mere eye-cast at the character Of Who made these and gave man sense to boot,
- Had dissipated once and evermore, —
 This doctrine I have dosed our flock withal. 80 Why? Because none believed it. They desire
- Such Heaven and dread such Hell, whom every day
- The alehouse tempts from one, a dog-fight
 bids
- Defy the other? All the harm is done Ourselves — done my poor husband who
 in youth
- Perhaps read Dickens, done myself who
 still
- Could play both Bach and Brahms. Such life I lead —

Thanks to you, knave! You learn its quality — Thanks to me, fool!"

He eyes her earnestly,
But she continues.

"— Life which, thanks once more To you, arch-knave as exquisitest fool, I acquiescingly — I gratefully Take back again to heart! and hence this
speech

Which yesterday had spared you. Four years long

Life — I began to find intolerable, Only this moment. Ere your entry just, 10 The leap of heart which answered, spite
of me,

A friend's first summons, first provocative, Authoritative, nay, compulsive call To quit, though for a single day, my house Of bondage — made return seem horrible.
I heard again a human lucid laugh
All trust, no fear; again saw earth pursue Its narrow busy way amid small cares, Smaller contentments, much weeds, some few flowers, —

Never suspicious of a thunderbolt 20 Avenging presently each daisy's death.
I recognised the beech-tree, knew the thrush Repeated his old music-phrase, all right, How wrong was I, then! But your entry
broke

Illusion, bade me back to bounds at
once.

I honestly submit my soul: which sprang At love, and losing love lies signed and sealed

'Failure.' No love more? then, no beauty
more

Which tends to breed love! Purify my powers,

Effortless till some other world procure

30 Some other chance of prize! or, if none
be, —

Nor second world nor chance, — unde-secrete

Die then this aftergrowth of heart, surmised Where May's precipitation left June blank?
Better have failed in the high aim, as I,
Than vulgarly in the low aim succeed As, God be thanked, I do not! Ugliness Had I called beauty, falsehood — truth,
and you

— My lover! No — this earth's unchanged
for me,

By his enchantment whom God made the Prince

40 O' the Power o' the Air, into a Heaven:
there is

Heaven, since there is Heaven's simulation
— earth.

I sit possessed in patience; prison-roof Shall break one day and Heaven beam overhead."

His smile is done with; he speaks bitterly.

"Take my congratulations, and permit I wish myself had proved as teachable!
— Or, no! until you taught me, could I
learn

A lesson from experience ne'er till now Conceded? Please you listen while I show How thoroughly you estimate my worth 50
And yours — the immeasurably superior!

I
Believed at least in one thing, first to last, —
Your love to me: I was the vile and you
The precious; I abused you, I betrayed, But doubted — never! Why else go my
way

Judas-like plodding to this Potter's Field Where fate now finds me? What has dinned my ear

And dogged my step? The spectre with the shriek

'Such she was, such were you, whose punishment

Is just!' And such she was not, all the 60
while!

She never owned a love to outrage, faith To pay with falsehood! For, my heart knows this —

Love once and you love always. Why, it's
down

Here in the Album: every lover knows Love may use hate but — turn to hate,
itself —

Turn even to indifference — no, indeed!
Well, I have been spell-bound, deluded
like

The witless negro by the Obeah-man Who bids him wither: so, his eye grows
dim,

His arm slack, arrow misses aim and spear 70 Goes wandering wide, — and all the woe because

He proved untrue to Fetish, who, he finds, Was just a feather-phantom! I wronged
love,

Am ruined, — and there was no love to
wrong!"

"No love? Ah, dead love! I involve thy ghost

To show the murderer where thy heart poured life

At summons of the stroke he doubts was dealt

On pasteboard and pretence! Not love, my love?

I changed for you the very laws of life:
Made you the standard of all right, all 100
fair.

No genius but you could have been, no
 sage,
 No sufferer — which is grandest — for the
 truth!
 My hero — where the heroic only hid To burst from hiding, brighten earth one
 day!
 Age and decline were man's maturity;
 Face, form were nature's type: more grace, more strength,
 What had they been but just superfluous gauds, Lawless divergence? I have danced through day
 On tiptoe at the music of a word, Have wondered where was darkness gone as night
 Burst out in stars at brilliance of a smile!
 Lonely, I placed the chair to help me
 seat
 Your fancied presence; in companion-
 ship,
 I kept my finger constant to your glove Glued to my breast; then — where was all the world?
 I schemed — not dreamed — how I might die some death Should save your finger aching! Who creates Destroys, he only: I had laughed to scorn Whatever angel tried to shake my faith And make you seem unworthy: you your-
 self
 Only could do that! With a touch 'twas
 done.
 'Give me all, trust me wholly!' At the
 word,
 I did give, I did trust — and thereupon
 The touch did follow. Ah, the quiet smile,
 The masterfully-folded arm in arm, As trick obtained its triumph one time
 more!
 In turn, my soul too triumphs in defeat:
 Treason like faith moves mountains: love is gone!"

He paces to and fro, stops, stands quite
 close
 And calls her by her name. Then —

"God forgives:

Forgive you, delegate of God, brought near
 As never priests could bring him to this
 soul
 That prays you both — forgive me! I abase —
 Know myself mad and monstrous utterly
 In all I did that moment; but as God Gives me this knowledge — heart to feel and tongue
 To testify — so be you gracious too!
 Judge no man by the solitary work Of — well, they do say and I can believe —

The devil in him: his, the moment, — 40
 mine
 The life — your life!"

He names her name again.

"You were just — merciful as just, you
 were
 In giving me no respite: punishment Followed offending. Sane and sound
 once more,
 The patient thanks decision, promptitude, Which flung him prone and fastened him from hurt,
 Haply to others, surely to himself.
 I wake and would not you had spared one pang.
 All's well that ends well!"

Yet again her name.

"Had you no fault? Why must you 50 change, forsooth,
 Parts, why reverse positions, spoil the play?
 Why did your nobleness look up to me,
 Not down on the ignoble thing confessed?
 Was it your part to stoop, or lift the low?
 Wherefore did God exalt you? Who would teach
 The brute man's tameness and intelligence Must never drop the dominating eye: Wink — and what wonder if the mad fit
 break,
 Followed by stripes and fasting? Sound and sane,
 My life, chastised now, couches at your 60
 foot.
 Accept, redeem me! Do your eyes ask
 'How?'
 I stand here penniless, a beggar; talk What idle trash I may, this final blow Of fortune fells me. I disburse, indeed, This boy his winnings? when each bubble-scheme
 That danced athwart my brain, a minute
 since,
 The worse the better, — of repairing
 straight
 My misadventure by fresh enterprise, Capture of other boys in foolishness His fellows, — when these fancies fade 70
 away
 At first sight of the lost so long, the found So late, the lady of my life, before Whose presence I, the lost, am also found Incapable of one least touch of mean Expedient, I who teemed with plot and wile —
 That family of snakes your eye bids flee!
 Listen! Our troublesomest dreams die
 off
 In daylight: I awake, and dream is —
 where?
 I rouse up from the past: one touch dispels

England and all here. I secured long
since
A certain refuge, solitary home To hide in, should the head strike work
one day,
The hand forget its cunning, or perhaps Society grow savage, — there to end My life's remainder, which, say what fools
will,
Is or should be the best of life, — its fruit, All tends to, root and stem and leaf and
flower.
Come with me, love, loved once, loved only, come, 10 Blend loves there! Let this parenthetic
doubt
Of love, in me, have been the trial-test Appointed to all flesh at some one stage Of soul's achievement, — when the strong man doubts
His strength. the good man whether goodness be,
The artist in the dark seeks, fails to find Vocation, and the saint forswears his shrine.
What if the lover may elude, no more Than these, probative dark, must search the sky Vainly for love, his soul's star? But the orb 20 Breaks from eclipse: I breathe again: I
love!
Tempted, I fell; but fallen — fallen lie Here at your feet, see! Leave this poor pretence
Of union with a nature and its needs Repugnant to your needs and nature!
Nay,
False, beyond falsity you reprehend In me, is such mock marriage with such mere Man-mask as — whom you witless wrong,
beside,
By that expenditure of heart and brain He recks no more of than would yonder
tree 30 If watered with your life-blood: rains and dews
Answer its ends sufficiently, while me One drop saves — sends to flower and fruit at last
The laggard virtue in the soul which else Cumbers the ground! Quickened me!
Call me yours — Yours and the world's — yours and the world's and God's!
Yes, for you can, you only! Think!
Confirm
Your instinct! Say, a minute since, I seemed
The castaway you count me, — all the
more Apparent shall the angelic potency 40 Lift me from out perdition's deep of deeps

To light and life and love! — that's love
for you — Love that already dares match might with yours.
You loved one worthy, — in your estimate, —
When time was; you described the unworthy taint,
And where was love then? No such test could e'er
Try my love: but you hate me and revile; Hatred, revilement — had you these to
bear
Would you, as I do, nor revile, nor hate, But simply love on, love the more, per-
chance?
Abide by your own proof! *'Your love
was love:
Its ghost knows no forgetting!'* Heart of
mine,
Would that I dared remember! Too un-
wise
Were he who lost a treasure, did himself Enlarge upon the sparkling catalogue Of gems to her his queen who trusted
late
The keeper of her caskets! Can it be That I, custodian of such relic still As your contempt permits me to retain,
All I dare hug to breast is — *'How your glove
Burst and displayed the long thin lily-streak!'*
What may have followed — that is forfeit
now!
I hope the proud man has grown humble.
True —
One grace of humbleness absents itself — Silence! yet love lies deeper than all
words,
And not the spoken but the speechless love Waits answer ere I rise and go my way."
Whereupon, yet one other time the name.
To end she looks the large deliberate look,
Even prolongs it somewhat; then the soul Bursts forth in a clear laugh that lengthens
on,
On, till — thinned, softened, silvered, one might say
The bitter runnel hides itself in sand, Moistens the hard grey grimly comic
speech.
"Ay — give the baffled angler even yet His supreme triumph as he hales to shore A second time the fish once 'scaped from hook:
So artfully has new bait hidden old Blood-imbrued iron! Ay, no barb's be-
neath
The gilded minnow here! You bid break
trust,

This time, with who trusts me, — not simply bid Me trust you, me who ruined but myself, In trusting but myself! Since, thanks to you,
 I know the feel of sin and shame, — be sure,
 I shall obey you and impose them both On one who happens to be ignorant Although my husband — for the lure is love, Your love! Try other tackle, fisher-friend!
 Repentance, expiation, hopes and fears, What you had been, may yet be, would I but Prove helpmate to my hero — one and all These silks and worsteds round the hook seduce Hardly the late torn throat and mangled tongue.
 Pack up, I pray, the whole assortment prompt!
 Who wonders at variety of wile
 In the Arch-cheat? You are the Adversary!
 Your fate is of your choosing: have your choice!
 Wander the world, — God has some end to serve Ere he suppress you! He waits: I endure, But interpose no finger-tip, forsooth,
 To stop your passage to the pit. Enough That I am stable, uninvolved by you In the rush downwards: free I gaze and fixed;
 Your smiles, your tears, prayers, curses move alike
 My crowned contempt. You kneel?
 Prostrate yourself!
 To earth, and would the whole world saw you there!"

Whereupon — "All right!" carelessly begins Somebody from outside, who mounts the stair,
 And sends his voice for herald of approach:
 Half in half out the doorway as the door Gives way to push..

"Old fellow, all's no good!

The train's your portion! Lay the blame on me!

I'm no diplomatist, and Bismarck's self Had hardly braved the awful Aunt at broach

Of proposition — so has world-repute Preceded the illustrious stranger! Ah! —"

Quick the voice changes to astonishment,
 Then horror, as the youth stops, sees, and knows.

The man who knelt starts up from kneeling, stands Moving no muscle, and confronts the stare. 40
 One great red outbreak buries — throat and brow —
 The lady's proud pale queenliness of scorn:
 Then her great eyes that turned so quick, become Intenser: quail at gaze, not they indeed!

V.

It is the young man shatters silence first.
 "Well, my lord — for indeed my lord you are,
 I little guessed how rightly — this last proof Of lordship-paramount confounds too much My simple head-piece! Let's see how we stand Each to the other! how we stood i' the 50
 game
 Of life an hour ago, — the magpies, stile And oak-tree witnessed. Truth exchanged for truth —
 My lord confessed his four-years-old affair —
 How he seduced and then forsook the girl Who married somebody and left him sad.
 My pitiful experience was — I loved A girl whose gown's hem had I dared to touch My finger would have failed me, palsy-fixed.
 She left me, sad enough, to marry — whom?
 A better man, — then possibly not you! 60 How does the game stand? Who is who and what Is what, o' the board now, since an hour went by?
 My lord's 'seduced, forsaken, sacrificed,' Starts up, my lord's familiar instrument, Associate and accomplice, mistress-slave — Shares his adventure, follows on the sly:
 — Ay, and since 'bag and baggage' is a phrase — Baggage lay hid in carpet-bag belike, Was but unpadlocked when occasion came For holding council, since my back was 70
 turned,
 On how invent ten thousand pounds which, paid,
 Would lure the winner to lose twenty more, Beside refunding these! Why else allow The fool to gain them? So displays herself
 The lady whom my heart believed — oh, laugh!
 Noble and pure: whom my heart loved at once,
 And who at once did speak truth when she said
 'I am not mine now but another's' — thus

- Being that other's! Devil's-marriage, eh?
'My lie weds thine till lucre us do part?'
 But pity me the snobbish simpleton,
 You two aristocratic tip-top swells At swindling! Quits, I cry! Decamp
 content
 With skin I'm peeled of: do not strip bones bare —
 As that you could, I have no doubt at all!
 O you two rare ones! Male and female,
 Sir!
 The male there smirked, this morning,
'Come, my boy — 10 Out with it! You've been crossed in love,
I think:
I recognise the lover's hangdog look;
Make a clean breast and match my confidence,
For, I'll be frank, I too have had my fling, Am punished for my fault, and smart
enough!
Where now the victim hides her head, God
knows!'
 Here loomed her head life-large, the devil
 knew!
 Look out, Salvini! Here's your man, your
 match!
 He and I sat applauding, stall by stall, Last Monday — 'Here's Othello' was our
 word, 20 'But where's Iago?' Where? Why, there! And now
 The fellow-artist, female specimen — Oh, lady, you must needs describe yourself!
 He's great in art, but you — how greater
 still
 — (If I can rightly, out of all I learned, Apply one bit of Latin that assures 'Art means just art's concealment') — tower
 yourself!
 For he stands plainly visible henceforth — Liar and scamp: while you, in artistry Prove so consummate — or I prove perhaps
 30 So absolute an ass — that — either way — You still do seem to me who worshipped
 you
 And see you take the homage of this man Your master, who played slave and knelt,
 no doubt,
 Before a mistress in his very craft . . .
 Well, take the fact, I nor believe my eyes, Nor trust my understanding! Still you
 seem Noble and pure as when we had the talk Under the tower, beneath the trees, that
 day.
 And there's the key explains the secret:
 down
 40 He knelt to ask your leave to rise a grade I' the mystery of humbug: well he may!
 For how you beat him! Half an hour ago,
 I held your master for my best of friends;
- And now I hate him! Four years since, you seemed My heart's one love: well, and you so remain!
 What's he to you in craft?"
- She looks him through.
- "My friend, 'tis just that friendship have its turn — Interrogate thus me whom one, of foes
 The worst, has questioned and is answered
 by.
 Take you as frank an answer! answers 50
 both
 Begin alike so far, divergent soon World-wide — I own superiority Over you, over him. As him I searched, So do you stand seen through and through by me
 Who, this time, proud, report your crystal shrines
 A dewdrop, plain as amber prisons round
 A spider in the hollow heart his house!
 Nowise are you that thing my fancy feared When out you stepped on me, a minute
 since,
 — This man's confederate! no, you step 60 not thus Obviously at beck and call to help At need some second scheme, and supplement
 Guile by force, use my shame to pinion me From struggle and escape! I fancied that!
 Forgive me! Only by strange chance, — most strange
 In even this strange world, — you enter
 now, Obtain your knowledge. Me you have not wronged
 Who never wronged you — least of all,
 my friend,
 That day beneath the College tower and trees,
 When I refused to say, — 'not friend but,
love!'
 Had I been found as free as air when first We met, I scarcely could have loved you.
 No —
 For where was that in you which claimed return
 Of love? My eyes were all too weak to probe
 This other's seeming, but that seeming
 loved
 The soul in me, and lied — I know too
 late!
 While your truth was truth: and I knew at
 once
 My power was just my beauty — bear the
 word —
 As I must bear, of all my qualities, To name the poorest one that serves my
 soul

And simulates myself! So much in me You loved, I know: the something that's beneath

Heard not your call, — uncalled, no answer
comes!

For, since in every love, or soon or late Soul must awake and seek out soul for soul, Yours, overlooking mine then, would,
some day,

Take flight to find some other; so it proved —

Missing me, you were ready for this man.
I apprehend the whole relation: his —

The soul wherein you saw your type of
worth

At once, true object of your tribute. Well Might I refuse such half-heart's homage!
Love

Divining, had assured you I no more Stand his participant in infamy Than you — I need no love to recognise As simply dupe and nowise fellow-cheat!
Therefore accept one last friend's-word, — your friend's,

All men's friend, save a felon's. Ravel out The bad embroilment, howsoever you
may,

Distribute as it please you praise or blame
To me — so you but fling this mockery
far —

Renounce this rag-and-feather hero-sham,
This poodle clipt to pattern, lion-like!
Throw him his thousands back, and lay to
heart

The lesson I was sent, — if man discerned Ever God's message, — just to teach. I
judge —

To far another issue than could dream
Your cousin, — younger, fairer, as befits — Who summoned me to judgment's exercise.

I find you, save in folly, innocent.
And in my verdict lies your fate; at choice
Of mine your cousin takes or leaves you.
'Take!'

I bid her — for you tremble back to truth.
She turns the scale, — one touch of the pure hand

Shall so press down, imprison past relapse Farther vibration 'twixt veracity — That's honest solid earth — and falsehood, theft

And air, that's one illusive emptiness!
That reptile capture you? I conquered
him:

You saw him cower before me. Have no
fear

He shall offend you farther! Spare to spurn

Safe let him slink hence till some subtler
Eye

Than I, anticipate the snake — bruise head Ere he bruise heel — or, wrier than the
first,

Some Adam purge earth's garden of its pest Before the slaver spoil the Tree of Life!

"You! Leave this youth, as he leaves you, as I

Leave each! There's caution surely extant yet

Though conscience in you were too vain a claim.

Hence quickly! Keep the cash but leave ⁵⁰ unsoiled

The heart I rescue and would lay to heal Beside another's! Never let her know How near came taint of your companion-

ship!"

"Ah!" — draws a long breath with a new strange look

The man she interpellates — soul a-stir Under its covert, as, beneath the dust,

A coppery sparkle all at once denotes
The hid snake has conceived a purpose.

"Ah —
Innocence should be crowned with ignorance?"

Desirable indeed, but difficult! ⁶⁰

As if yourself, now, had not glorified Your helpmate by imparting him a hint
Of how a monster made the victim bleed Ere crook and courage saved her — hint,

I say, —
Not the whole horror, — that were needless risk, —

But just such inkling, fancy of the fact,
As should suffice to qualify henceforth The shepherd, when another lamb would stray,

For warning 'Ware the wolf!' No doubt
at all,

Silence is generosity, — keeps wolf ⁷⁰

Unhunted by flock's warder! Excellent, Did — generous to me, mean — just to him!
But, screening the deceiver, lamb were
found

Outraging the deceitless! So, — he knows!
And yet, unharmed I breathe — perchance, repent —

Thanks to the mercifully-politic!"

"Ignorance is not innocence but sin — Witness yourself ignore what after-pangs

Pursue the plague-infected. Merciful Am I? Perhaps! The more contempt, ⁸⁰
the less

Hatred; and who so worthy of contempt
As you that rest assured I cooled the spot
I could not cure, by poisoning, forsooth, Whose hand I pressed there? Understand for once

That, sick, of all the pains corroding me This burnt the last and nowise least — the
need

Of simulating soundness. I resolved —

No matter how the struggle tasked weak
flesh —
To hide the truth away as in a grave From — most of all — my husband: he nor knows Nor ever shall be made to know your part, My part, the devil's part, — I trust, God's
part
In the foul matter. Saved, I yearn to save And not destroy: and what destruction
like
The abolishing of faith in him, that's faith In me as pure and true? Acquaint some
child 10 Who takes yon tree into his confidence, That, where he sleeps now, was a murder
done,
And that the grass which grows so thick,
he thinks,
Only to pillow him is product' just
Of what lies festering beneath! 'Tis God Must bear such secrets and disclose them.
Man?
The miserable thing I have become By dread acquaintance with my secret —
you —
That thing had he become by learning
me —
The miserable, whom his ignorance 10 Would wrongly call the wicked: ignorance Being, I hold, sin ever, small or great.
No, he knows nothing!"

"He and I alike
Are bound to you for such discreetness,
then.
What if our talk should terminate awhile?
Here is a gentleman to satisfy, Settle accounts with, pay ten thousand pounds
Before we part — as, by his face, I fear, Results from your appearance on the scene.
Grant me a minute's parley with my friend 30 Which scarce admits of a third personage!
The room from which you made your entry
first
So opportunely — still untenanted — What if you please return there? Just a
word
To my young friend first — then, a word
to you,
And you depart to fan away each fly From who, grass-pillowed, sleeps so sound
at home!"

"So the old truth comes back! A wholesome change, —
At last the altered eye, the rightful tone!
But even to the truth that drops disguise 40 And stands forth grinning malice which but now
Whined so contritely — I refuse assent Just as to malice. I, once gone, come
back?"

No, my lord! I enjoy the privilege Of being absolutely loosed from you Too much — the knowledge that your power is null Which was omnipotence. A word of
mouth,
A wink of eye would have detained me
once,
Body and soul your slave; and now,
thank God,
Your fawningest of prayers, your frightfulest
Of curses — neither would avail to turn My footstep for a moment!"

"Prayer, then, tries No such adventure. Let us cast about For something novel in expedient: take Command, — what say you? I profess
myself
One fertile in resource. Commanding,
then,
I bid — not only wait there, but return Here, where I want you! Disobey and —
good!
On your own head the peril!"

"Come!" breaks in The boy with his good glowing face.
"Shut up!
None of this sort of thing while I stand here!
— Not to stand that! No bullying, I beg!
I also am to leave you presently And never more set eyes upon your face — You won't mind that much; but — I tell you frank —
I do mind having to remember this For your last word and deed — my friend who were!
Bully a woman you have ruined, eh?
Do you know, — I give credit all at once To all those stories everybody told
And nobody but I would disbelieve:
They all seem likely now, — nay, certain,
sure!
I dare say you did cheat at cards that night
The row was at the Club: 'sauter la coupe' —
That was your 'cut' for which your friends
'cut' you;
While I, the booby, 'cut,' — acquaintance-
ship
With who so much as laughed when I said
'luck.'
I dare say you had bets against the horse
They doctored at the Derby; little doubt,
That fellow with the sister found you shirk
His challenge and did kick you like a ball;
Just as the story went about! Enough:
It only serves to show how well advised, Madam, you were in bidding such a fool As I, go hang. You see how the mere
sight
And sound of you suffice to tumble down

Conviction topsy-turvy: no, — that's false, — There's no unknowing what one knows;
 and yet
 Such is my folly that, in gratitude For . . . well, I'm stupid; but you seemed to wish I should know gently what I know, should slip Softly from old to new, not break my neck Between beliefs of what you were and are.
 Well then, for just the sake of such a wish To cut no worse a figure than needs must In even eyes like mine, I'd sacrifice Body and soul! But don't think danger
 -- pray! --
 Menaces either! He do harm to us?
 Let me say 'us' this one time! You'd allow
 I lent perhaps my hand to rid your ear Of some cur's yelping — hand that's fortified,
 Into the bargain, with a horsewhip? Oh, One crack and you shall see how curs decamp!
 My lord, you know your losses and my gains.
 Pay me my money at the proper time!
 If cash be not forthcoming, — well, your-
 self
 Have taught me, and tried often, I'll engage,
 The proper course: I post you at the Club, Pillory the defaulter. Crack, to-day, Shall, slash, to-morrow, slice through flesh and bone!
 There, Madam, you need mind no cur, I
 think!"

"Ah, what a gain to have an apt no less Than grateful scholar! Nay, he brings to mind
 My knowledge till he puts me to the blush,
 So long has it lain rusty! Post my name!
 That were indeed a wheal from whipcord! Whew!

I wonder now if I could rummage out — Just to match weapons — some old scorpion-scourge!

Madam, you hear my pupil, may applaud His triumph o'er the master. I — no
 more Bully, since I'm forbidden: but entreat — Wait and return — for my sake, no! but just
 To save your own defender, should he
 chance Get thracked thro' awkward flourish of his thong.
 And what if — since all waiting's weary
 work —
 I help the time pass 'twixt your exit now And entry then? for — pastime proper — here's

The very thing, the Album, verse and prose
 To make the laughing minutes launch
 away!

Each of us must contribute. I'll begin —
 'Hail, calm activity, salubrious spot!'

I'm confident I beat the bard, — for why?
 My young friend owns me an Iago — him Confessed, among the other qualities, A ready rhymers. Oh, he rhymed! Here goes!

— Something to end with 'horsewhip!' 50
 No, that rhyme

Beats me; there's 'cowslip,' 'boltsprit,' nothing else!

So, Tennyson take my benison, — verse for bard,

Prose suits the gambler's book best!
 Dared and done!"

Wherewith he dips pen, writes a line or
 two,

Closes and clasps the cover, gives the book, Bowing the while, to her who hesitates, Turns half away, turns round again, at last Takes it as you touch carrion, then retires.
 The door shuts fast the couple.

VI.

With a change
 Of his whole manner, opens out at once 60
 The Adversary.

"Now, my friend, for you!
 You who, protected late, aggressive grown, Brandish, it seems, a weapon I must 'ware!
 Plain speech in me becomes respectable Henceforth, because courageous; plainly,
 then —

(Have lash well loose, hold handle tight and light!)

Throughout my life's experience, you indulg'd

Yourself and friend by passing in review
 So courteously but now, I vainly search

To find one record of a specimen 70
 So perfect of the pure and simple fool

As this you furnish me. Ingratitude

I lump with folly, — all's one lot, — so —
 fool!

Did I seek you or you seek me? Seek?
 sneak

For service to, and service you would style —

And did style — godlike, scarce an hour
 ago!

Fool, there again, yet not precisely there First-rate in folly: since the hand you kissed

Did pick you from the kennel, did plant firm

Your footstep on the pathway, did per- 80
 suade

Your awkward shambling to true gait and pace,

- Fit for the world you walk in. Once astrut On that firm pavement which your cowardice Was for renouncing as a pitfall, next Came need to clear your brains of their conceit They cleverly could distinguish who was who,
Whatever folk might tramp the thoroughfare.
Men, now — familiarly you read them off,
Each phyz at first sight! O you had an eye!
Who couched it? made you disappoint each fox
- 10 Eager to strip my gosling of his fluff So 'golden as he cackled 'Goose trusts lamb?'
'Ay, but I saved you — wolf defeated fox — Wanting to pick your bones myself!' then, wolf Has got the worst of it with goose for once.
I, penniless, pay you ten thousand pounds (— No gesture, pray! I pay ere I depart.)
And how you turn advantage to account Here's the example. Have I proved so wrong In my peremptory 'debt must be discharged?'
- 20 O you laughed lovelily, were loth to leave The old friend out at elbows — pooh, a thing
Not to be thought of! I must keep my cash,
And you forget your generosity!
Ha ha, I took your measure when I laughed My laugh to that! First quarrel — nay, first faint Pretence at taking umbrage — 'Down with debt, Both interest and principal! — The Club, Exposure and expulsion! — stamp me out!' That's the magnanimous magnificent
- 30 Renunciation of advantage! Well, But whence and why did you take umbrage, Sir?
Because your master, having made you know Somewhat of men, was minded to advance, Expound you women, still a mystery!
My pupil potted with a cloud on brow,
A clod in breast: had loved, and vainly loved:
Whence blight and blackness, just for all the world As Byron used to teach us boys. Thought I — 'Quick rid him of that rubbish! Clear the cloud, 40 And set the heart a-pulsing!' — heart, this time:
- 'Twas nothing but the head I doctored late For ignorance of Man; now heart's to dose Palsied by over-palpitation due To Woman-worship — so, to work at once On first awol of the patient's ache!
This morning you described your malady, — How you dared love a piece of virtue — lost To reason, as the upshot showed: for scorn Fity repaid your stupid arrogance;
And, parting, you went two ways, she resumed
Her path — perfection, while forlorn you paced
The world that's made for beasts like you and me.
My remedy was — tell the fool the truth!
Your paragon of purity had plumped Into these arms at their first outspread — 'fallen
My victim,' she prefers to turn the phrase —
And, in exchange for that frank confidence, Asked for my whole life present and to come — Marriage: a thing uncovenanted for, Never so much as put in question. Life — 6 Implied by marriage — throw that trifle in And round the bargain off, no otherwise Than if, when we played cards, because you won My money you should also want my head!
That, I demurred to: we but played 'for love' —
She won my love; had she proposed for stakes
'Marriage,' — why, that's for whist, a wiser game.
Whereat she raved at me, as losers will,
And went her way. So far the story's known,
The remedy's applied, no farther: which 7 Here's the sick man's first honorarium for — Posting his medicine-monger at the Club!
That being, Sir, the whole you mean my fee —
In gratitude for such munificence I'm bound in common honesty to spare
No droplet of the draught: so, — pinch your nose, Pull no wry faces! — drain it to the dregs!
I say 'She went off' — 'went off,' you subjoin,
'*Since not to wedded bliss, as I supposed,
Sure to some convent: solitude and peace* 8
Help her to hide the shame from mortal view, With prayer and fasting.' No, my sapient Sir!
Far wieslier, straightway she betook herself To a prize-portent from the donkey-show

- Of leathern long-ears that compete for palm In clerical absurdity: since he,
Good ass, nor practises the shaving-trick,
The candle-crotchet, nonsense which repays When you've young ladies congregant, — but schools
The poor, — toils, moils and grinds the mill nor means To stop and munch one thistle in this
life
Till next life smother him with roses: just The parson for her purpose! Him she stroked
Over the muzzle; into mouth with bit, And on to back with saddle, — there he
stood,
The serviceable beast who heard, believed And meekly bowed him to the burden, —
borne Off in a canter to seclusion — ay, The lady's lost! But had a friend of mine — While friend he was — imparted his sad case To sympathising counsellor, full soon One cloud at least had vanished from his
brow.
'Don't fear!' had followed reassuringly —
'The lost will in due time turn up again, Probably just when, weary of the world,
You think of nothing less than settling-
down
To country life and golden days, beside A dearest best and brightest virtuousest Wife: who needs no more hope to hold her
own
Against the naughty-and-repentant — no,
Than water-gruel against Roman punch!' And as I prophesied, it proves! My
youth, —
Just at the happy moment when, subdued To spooniness, he finds that youth fleets
fast,
That town-life tires, that men should drop boys'-play,
That property, position have, no doubt,
Their exigency with their privilege, And if the wealthy wed with wealth, how dire
The double duty! — in, behold, there beams
Our long-lost lady, form and face complete!
And where's my moralising pupil now, Had not his master missed a train by
chance?
But, by your side instead of whirled away, How have I spoiled scene, stopped catastrophe, Struck flat the stage-effect I know by
heart!
Sudden and strange the meeting — improved?
- Bless you, the last event she hoped or dreamed!
But rude sharp stroke will crush out fire from flint — Assuredly from flesh. 'Tis you?' 'My- self,'
'Changed?' 'Changeless.' 'Then, what's earth to me?' 'To me What's heaven?' 'So, — thine!' 'And thine!' 'And likewise mine!' Had laughed 'Amen' the devil, but for me Whose intermeddling hinders this hot haste, And bids you, ere concluding contract, 54
pause —
Ponder one lesson more, then sign and seal
At leisure and at pleasure, — lesson's price Being, if you have skill to estimate, — How say you? — I'm discharged my debt in full!
Since paid you stand, to farthing utter-
most,
Unless I fare like that black majesty
A friend of mine had visit from last Spring.
Coasting along the Cape-side, he's becalmed
Off an uncharted bay, a novel town Untouched at by the trader: here's a 60
chance!
Out paddles straight the king in his canoe, Comes over bulwark, says he means to buy Ship's cargo — being rich and having brought
A treasure ample for the purpose. See!
Four dragons, stalwart blackies, guard the
same Wrapped round and round: its hulls, a multitude, — Palm-leaf and cocoa-mat and goat's-hair cloth
All duly braced about with bark and
board, —
Suggest how brave, 'neath coat, must kernel be!
At length the peeling is accomplished, 70
plain
The casket opens out its core, and lo — A brand-new British silver sixpence —
bid That's ample for the Bank, — thinks majesty!
You are the Captain; call my sixpence cracked
Or copper; 'what I've said is calumny;
The lady's spotless!' Then, I'll prove my
words,
Or make you prove them true as truth —
yourself,
Here, on the instant! I'll not mince my
speech,
Things at this issue. When she enters,
then,
Make love to her! No talk of marriage 80
now —

The point-blank bare proposal! Pick no phrase —

Prevent all misconception! Soon you'll see How different the tactics when she deals With an instructed man, no longer boy Who blushes like a booby. Woman's wit!
Man, since you have instruction, blush no more!

Such your five minutes' profit by my pains,
'Tis simply now — demand and be possessed!

Which means — you may possess — may strip the tree

10 Of fruit desirable to make one wise.

More I nor wish nor want: your act's your act,

My teaching is but — there's the fruit to pluck

Or let alone at pleasure. Next advance In knowledge were beyond you! Don't expect

I bid a novice — pluck, suck, send sky-high

Such fruit, once taught that neither crab nor sloe

Falls readier prey to who but robs a hedge,
Than this gold apple to my Hercules.

Were you no novice but proficient — then,

20 Then, truly, I might prompt you — Touch and taste,

Try flavour and be tired as soon as I!

Toss on the prize to greedy mouths agape, Betake yours, sobered as the satiate grow,

To wise man's solid meal of house and land, Consols and cousin! but my boy, my boy,
Such lore's above you!

Here's the lady back!

So, Madam, you have conned the Album-page

And come to thank its last contributor?

How kind and condescending! I retire

30 A moment, lest I spoil the interview,
And mar my own endeavour to make friends —

You with him, him with you, and both with me!

If I succeed — permit me to inquire

Five minutes hence! Friends bid good-bye, you know."

And out he goes.

VII.

She, face, form, bearing, one Superb composure —

"He has told you all?

Yes, he has told you all, your silence says —
What gives him, as he thinks, the mastery

Over my body and my soul! — has told

40 That instance, even, of their servitude

He now exacts of me? A silent blush!

That's well, though better would white ignorance

Beseem your brow, undesecrate before — Ay, when I left you! I too learn at last — Hideously learned as I seemed so late — What sin may swell to. Yes, — I needed learn

That, when my prophet's rod became the snake

I fled from, it would, one day, swallow up — Incorporate whatever serpentine

Falsehood and treason and unmanliness Beslime earth's pavement: such the power of Hell,

And so beginning, ends no otherwise

The Adversary! I was ignorant, Blameworthy — if you will; but blame I take Nowise upon me as I ask myself

— You — how can you, whose soul I seemed to read

The limpid eyes through, have declined so deep

Even with him for consort? I revolve Much memory, pry into the looks and words

Of that day's walk beneath the College wall,

And nowhere can distinguish, in what gleams

Only pure marble through my dusky past,
A dubious cranny where such poison-seed

Might harbour, nourish what should yield to-day

This dread ingredient for the cup I drink.
Do not I recognise and honour truth

In seeming? — take your truth and for return,

Give you my truth, a no less precious gift?
You loved me: I believed you. I replied

— How could I other? 'I was not my own.'

— No longer had the eyes to see, the ears
To hear, the mind to judge, since heart and soul

Now were another's. My own right in me,
For well or ill, consigned away — my face

Fronted the honest path, deflection whence Had shamed me in the furtive backward look

At the late bargain — fit such chapman's phrase! —

As though — less hasty and more provident —

Waiting had brought advantage. Not for me

The chapman's chance! Yet while thus 8.
much was true,

I spared you — as I knew you then — one more

Concluding word which, truth no less, seemed best

Buried away for ever. Take it now Its power to pain is past! Four years — that day —

Those limes that make the College avenue!

- I would that — friend and foe — by miracle,
I had, that moment, seen into the heart Of either, as I now am taught to see!
I do believe I should have straight assumed My proper function, and sustained a soul, Nor aimed at being just sustained myself
By some man's soul — the weaker woman's-want!
So had I missed the momentary thrill
Of finding me in presence of a god, But gained the god's own feeling when he gives Such thrill to what turns life from death
before.
'Gods many and Lords many,' says the Book:
You would have yielded up your soul to me — Not to the false god who has burned its clay
In his own image. I had shed my love Like Spring dew on the clod all flowery
thence,
Not sent up a wild vapour to the sun That drinks and then disperses. Both of us Blameworthy, — I first meet my punishment —
20 And not so hard to bear. I breathe again!
Forth from those arms' entwining leprosy
At last I struggle — uncontaminate:
Why must I leave you pressing to the breast That's all one plague-spot? Did you love me once?
Then take love's last and best return! I
think,
Womanliness means only motherhood;
All love begins and ends there, — roams
enough,
But, having run the circle, rests at home.
Why is your expiation yet to make?
30 Pull shame with your own hands from your own head
Now, — never wait the slow envelopment Submitted to by unelastic age!
One fierce throe frees the sapling: flake on flake
Lull till they leave the oak snow-stupefied.
Your heart retains its vital warmth — or
why
That blushing reassurance? Blush, young
blood!
Break from beneath this icy premature Captivity of wickedness — I warn Back, in God's name! No fresh encroachment here!
40 This May breaks all to bud — no Winter
now!
Friend, we are both forgiven! Sin no
more!
I am past sin now, so shall you become!
Meanwhile I testify that, lying once,
My foe lied ever, most lied last of all.
He, waking, whispered to your sense asleep
- The wicked counsel, — and assent might
seem;
But, roused, your healthy indignation
breaks
The idle dream-pact. You would die — not dare Confirm your dream-resolve, — nay, find
the word
That fits the deed to bear the light of day! 50 Say I have justly judged you! then farewell
To blushing — nay, it ends in smiles, not
tears!
Why tears now? I have justly judged,
thank God!"
- He does blush boy-like, but the man speaks
out,
— Makes the due effort to surmount himself.
- "I don't know what he wrote — how should I? Nor How he could read my purpose, which, it
seems,
He chose to somehow write — mistakenly Or else for mischief's sake. I scarce
believe
My purpose put before you fair and plain 60 Would need annoy so much; but there's my luck —
From first to last I blunder. Still, one
more Turn at the target, try to speak my
thought!
Since he could guess my purpose, won't you read Right what he set down wrong? He said — let's think!
Ay, so! — he did begin by telling heaps Of tales about you. Now, you see — suppose
Anyone told me — my own mother died Before I knew her — told me — to his
cost! —
Such tales about my own dead mother: 70
why,
You would not wonder surely if I knew,
By nothing but my own heart's help, he
lied, Would you? No reason's wanted in the
case.
So with you! In they burnt on me, his
tales,
Much as when madhouse-inmates crowd
around,
Make captive any visitor and scream All sorts of stories of their keeper — he's Both dwarf and giant, vulture, wolf, dog, cat,
Serpent and scorpion, yet man all the same;
Sane people soon see through the gibberish! 80 I just made out, you somehow lived some-
where

- A 'life of shame — I can't distinguish
more — Married or single — how, don't matter
much:
Shame which himself had caused — that point was clear,
That fact confessed — that thing to hold and keep.
Oh, and he added some absurdity — That you were here to make me — ha,
ha, ha! —
Still love you, still of mind to die for you, Ha, ha — as if that needed mighty pains!
Now, foolish as . . . but never mind
myself
- 10 — What I am, what I am not, in the eye Of the world, is what I never cared for
much.
Fool then or no fool, not one single word
In the whole string of lies did I believe, But this — this only — if I choke, who cares? —
I believe somehow in your purity Perfect as ever! Else what use is God?
He is God, and work miracles He can!
Then, what shall I do? Quite as clear, my course!
They've got a thing they call their Labyrinth
- 20 I' the garden yonder: and my cousin
played
A pretty trick once, led and lost me deep Inside the briery maze of hedge round
hedge;
And there might I be staying now, stock-
still,
But that I laughing bade eyes follow nose And so straight pushed my path through let and stop
And soon was out in the open, face all scratched,
But well behind my back the prison-bars
In sorry plight enough, I promise you!
So here: I won my way to truth through lies —
- 30 Said, as I saw light, — if her shame be
shame
I'll rescue and redeem her, — shame's no
shame?
Then, I'll avenge, protect — redeem myself
The stupidest of sinners! Here I stand!
Dear, — let me once dare call you so, —
you said
Thus ought you to have done, four years
ago,
Such things and such! Ay, dear, and what ought I?
You were revealed to me: where's gratitude,
Where's memory even, where the gain of you Discernible in my low after-life
- 40 Of fancied consolation? why, no horse Once fed on corn, will, missing corn, go munch
- Mere thistles like a donkey! I missed you, And in your place found — him, made him
my love,
Ay, did I, — by this token, that he taught
So much beast-nature that I meant . . .
God knows
Whether I bow me to the dust enough! . . .
To marry — yes, my cousin here! I hope That was a master-stroke! Take heart of hers,
And give her hand of mine with no more
heart
Than now you see upon this brow I strike! 50 What atom of a heart do I retain Not all yours? Dear, you know it!
Easily
May she accord me pardon when I place
My brow beneath her foot, if foot so deign, Since uttermost indignity is spared — Mere marriage and no love! And all this time
Not one word to the purpose! Are you
free?
Only wait! only let me serve — deserve Where you appoint and how you see the
good!
I have the will — perhaps the power — 60
at least
Means that have power against the world.
For time —
Take my whole life for your experiment!
If you are bound — in marriage, say — why, still,
Still, sure, there's something for a friend
to do, Outside? A mere well-wisher, under-
stand!
I'll sit, my life long, at your gate, you
know,
Swing it wide open to let you and him Pass freely, — and you need not look, much less Fling me a 'Thank you — are you there, old friend?'
Don't say that even: I should drop like 70
shot!
So I feel now at least: some day, who
knows?
After no end of weeks and months and
years
You might smile '*I believe you did your
best!*'
And that shall make my heart leap — leap such leap As lands the feet in Heaven to wait you
there!
Ah, there's just one thing more! How pale you look!
Why? Are you angry? If there's, after
all,
Worst come to worst — if still there somehow be The shame — I said was no shame, — none, I swear! —

In that case, if my hand and what it holds, —

My name, — might be your safeguard now — at once —

Why, here's the hand — you have the heart! Of course —

No cheat, no binding you, because I'm bound,

To let me off probation by one day,

Week, month, year, lifetime! Prove as you propose!

Here's the hand with the name to take or leave!

That's all — and no great piece of news, I hope!"

"Give me the hand, then!" she cries hastily.

10 "Quick, now! I hear his footstep!"

Hand in hand

The couple face him as he enters, stops Short, stands surprised a moment, laughs away

Surprise, resumes the much-experienced man.

"So, you accept him?"

"Till us death do part!"

"No longer? Come, that's right and rational!

I fancied there was power in common sense,

But did not know it worked thus promptly. Well —

At last each understands the other, then? Each drops disguise, then? So, at supper-time

20 These masquerading people doff their gear, Grand Turk his pompous turban, Quaker-ess

Her stiff-starched bib and tucker, — make-believe

That only bothers when, ball-business done,

Nature demands champagne and mayonnaise.

Just so has each of us sage three abjured His and her moral pet particular Pretension to superiority,

And, cheek by jowl, we henceforth munch and joke!

Go, happy pair, paternally dismissed

30 To live and die together — for a month, Discretion can award no more! Depart

From whatsoe'er the calm sweet solitude

Selected — Paris not improbably —

At month's end, when the honeycomb's left wax,

— You, daughter, with a pocketful of gold

Enough to find your village boys and girls

In duffel cloaks and hobnailed shoes from May

To — what's the phrase? — Christmas-come-never-mas!

You, son and heir of mine, shall re-appear Ere Spring-time, that's the ring-time, lose 40 one leaf,

And — not without regretful smack of lip

The while you wipe it free of honey-smear —

Marry the cousin, play the magistrate, Stand for the county, prove perfection's

pink —

Master of hounds, gay-coated dine — nor die

Sooner than needs of gout, obesity,

And sons at Christ Church! As for me, — ah me,

I abdicate — retire on my success,

Four years well occupied in teaching youth

My son and daughter the exemplary! 50

Time for me to retire now, having placed

Proud on their pedestal the pair: in turn, Let them do homage to their master!

You, —

Well, your flushed cheek and flashing eye proclaim Sufficiently your gratitude: you paid

The honorarium, the ten thousand pounds

To purpose, did you not? I told you so!

And you, but, bless me, why so pale — so faint

At influx of good fortune? Certainly,

No matter how or why or whose the fault, 60 I save your life — save it, nor less nor more!

You blindly were resolved to welcome death

In that black boor-and-bumpkin-haunted hole

Of his, the prig with all the preachments! You

Installed as nurse and matron to the crones

And wenches, while there lay a world outside

Like Paris (which again I recommend)

In company and guidance of — first, this, Then all in good time some new friend as fit —

What if I were to say, some fresh myself, 70

As I once figured? Each dog has his day, And mine's at sunset: what should old dog

do

But eye young litters' frisky puppyhood?

Oh I shall watch this beauty and this youth

Frisk it in brilliance! But don't fear! Discreet,

I shall pretend to no more recognise

My quondam pupils than the doctor nods

When certain old acquaintances may cross His path in Park, or sit down prim beside

His plate at dinner-table: tip nor wink 80

- Scares patients he has put, for reason
good,
Under restriction, — maybe, talked sometimes
Of douche or horsewhip to, — for why?
because
The gentleman would crazily declare His best friend was — Iago! Ay, and
worse —
The lady, all at once grown lunatic,
In suicidal monomania vowed,
To save her soul, she needs must starve
herself!
They're cured now, both, and I tell nobody.
- 10 Why don't you speak? Nay, speechless, each of you Can spare, — without unclasping plighted troth, —
At least one hand to shake! Left-hands will do — Yours first, my daughter! Ah, it guards — it gripes
The precious Album fast — and prudently!
As well obliterate the record there On page the last: allow me tear the leaf!
Pray, now! And afterward, to make amends,
What if all three of us contribute each A line to that prelusive fragment, — help
- 20 The embarrassed bard who broke out to break down Dumbfounded at such unforeseen success?
'Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot'
You begin — place aux dames! I'll prompt you then!
'Here do I take the good the gods allot!' Next you, Sir! What, still sulky? Sing, O Muse!
'Here does my lord in full discharge his shot!'
Now for the crowning flourish! mine shall
be . . .
- "Nothing to match your first effusion, mar What was, is, shall remain your masterpiece!
- 30 Authorship has the alteration-itch!
No, I protest against erasure. Read, My friend!" (she gasps out). "Read and quickly read
'Before us death do part,' what made you
mine
And made me yours — the marriage-licence here!
Decide if he is like to mend the same!"
- And so the lady, white to ghastliness, Manages somehow to display the page With left-hand only, while the right retains The other hand, the young man's, — dreaming-drunk
- 40 He, with this drench of stupefying stuff,
- Eyes wide, mouth open, — half the idiot's stare
And half the prophet's insight, — holding tight,
All the same, by his one fact in the world —
The lady's right-hand: he but seems to read —
Does not, for certain; yet, how understand Unless he reads?
- So, understand he does.
For certain. Slowly, word by word, she reads
Aloud that licence — or that warrant, say.
- "One against two — and two that urge their odds
To uttermost — I needs must try resource!" 50 Madam, I laid me prostrate, bade you spurn Body and soul: you spurned and safely spurned
So you had spared me the superfluous taunt
"Prostration means no power to stand erect, Stand, trampling on who trampled — prostrate now!"
- So, with my other fool-foe: I was fain
Let the boy touch me with the buttoned foil, And him the infection gains, he too must
needs
Catch up the butcher's cleaver. Be it so!
Since play turns earnest, here's my serious 60
fence.
He loves you; he demands your love: both
know What love means in my language. Love him then!
Pursuant to a pact, love pays my debt:
Therefore, deliver me from him, thereby Likewise delivering from me yourself!
For, hesitate — much more, refuse consent —
I tell the whole truth to your husband.
Flat
Cards lie on table, in our gamesier-phrase!
Consent — you stop my mouth, the only
way.
- "I did well, trusting instinct: knew your 70
hand
Had never joined with his in fellowship Over this pact of infamy. You known — As he was known through every nerve of
me.
Therefore I 'stopped his mouth the only
way'
But my way! none was left for you, my
friend —
The loyal — near, the loved one! No — no — no!
Threaten? Chastise? The coward would but quail.
Conquer who can, the cunning of the snake!
Stamp out his slimy strength from tail to
head,

And still you leave vibration of the tongue.
His malice had redoubled — not on me Who, myself, choose my own refining
fire —

But on poor unsuspicious innocence;
And, — victim, — to turn executioner
Also — that feat effected, fork tongue Had done indeed its office! Once snake's 'mouth' — how could mortal 'stop it'?"

"So!"

A tiger-flash — yell, spring, and scream:
halloo!

10 Death's out and on him, has and holds him
— ugh!

But ne trucidet coram populo

Juvenis senem! Right the Horatian rule!

There, see how soon a quiet comes to pass!

VIII.

The youth is somehow by the lady's side.
His right-hand grasps her right-hand once
again.

Both gaze on the dead body. Hers the
word.

"And that was good but useless. Had I lived

The danger was to dread: but, dying
now —

Himself would hardly become talkative, 20 Since talk no more means torture. Fools — what fools

These wicked men are! Had I borne four
years,

Four years of weeks and months and days and nights,

Inured me to the consciousness of life Coiled round by his life, with the tongue to ply, —

But that I bore about me, for prompt use At urgent need, the thing that 'stops the
mouth'

And stays the venom? Since such need was now

Or never, — how should use not follow
need?

Bear witness for me, I withdraw from
life

30 By virtue of the licence — warrant, say, That blackens yet this Album — white
again,

Thanks still to my one friend who tears the page!

Now, let me write the line of supplement,
As counselled by my foe there: 'each a
line!'"

And she does falteringly write to end.

"I die now through the villain who lies dead, Righteously slain. He would have outraged me,

So, my defender slew him. God protect The right! Where wrong lay, I bear witness now.

Let man believe me, whose last breath is 40 spent

In blessing my defender from my soul!"

And so ends the Inn Album.

As she dies,
Begins outside a voice that sounds like
song,

And is indeed half song though meant for
speech

Muttered in time to motion — stir of heart
That unsubduably must bubble forth

To match the fawn-step as it mounts the stair.

"All's ended and all's over! Verdict
found

'Not guilty' — prisoner forthwith set free, Mid cheers the Court pretends to discre- 50
gard!

Now Portia, now for Daniel, late severe,
At last appeased, benignant! 'This young man —

Hem — has the young man's foibles but no

fault.
He's virgin soil — a friend must cultivate.

I think no plant called "love" grows wild — a friend

May introduce, and name the bloom, the fruit!

Here somebody dares wave a handkerchief —

She'll want to hide her face with presently!
Good-bye then! 'Cigno fedel, cigno fedel, Addio!' Now, was ever such mistake — 60

Ever such foolish ugly omen? Pshaw!

Wagner, beside! 'Amo te solo, te Solo amai!' That's worth fifty such!

But, mum, the grave face at the opened
door!"

And so the good gay girl, with eyes and cheeks

Diamond and damask, — cheeks so white
erewhile

Because of a vague fancy, idle fear Chased on reflection! — pausing, taps discreet;

And then, to give herself a countenance,
Before she comes upon the pair inside, 70

Loud — the oft-quoted, long-laughed-over
line —

"Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot!" Open the door!"

No: let the curtain fall!

PACCHIAROTTO

AND

HOW HE WORKED IN DISTEMPER,

ET CETERA.

1876.

[Pacchiarotto, born Siena, 1474, was an insignificant painter, who once obtained a little credit for pictures really painted by Pacchia. He was a reformer and conspirator as well as an inferior artist.]

PROLOGUE.

I.

O the old wall here! How I could pass
Life in a long Midsummer day,
My feet confined to a plot of grass,
My eyes from a wall not once away!

II.

And lush and lithe do the creepers clothe Yon wall I watch, with a wealth of green:
Its bald red bricks draped, nothing loth, In lappets of tangle they laugh between.

III.

Now, what is it makes pulsate the robe?
10 Why tremble the sprays? What life o'erbrims
The body, — the house, no eye can probe, — Divined as, beneath a robe, the limbs?

IV.

And there again! But my heart may guess Who tripped behind; and she sang perhaps:
So, the old wall throbbed, and its life's excess
Died out and away in the leafy wraps.

V.

Wall upon wall are between us: life And song should away from heart to
heart.
I — prison-bird, with a ruddy strife 20 At breast, and a lip whence storm-notes start —

VI.

Hold on, hope hard in the subtle thing That's spirit: though cloistered fast, soar free;
Account as wood, brick, stone, this ring Of the rueful neighbours, and — forth to thee!

OF PACCHIAROTTO, AND HOW HE WORKED IN DISTEMPER.

I.

QUERY: was ever a quainter Crotchet than this of the painter Giacomo Pacchiarotto
Who took "Reform" for his motto?

II.

He, pupil of old Fungaio,
Is always confounded (heigho!)
With Pacchia, contemporaneous
No question, but how extraneous In the grace of soul, the power Of hand, — undoubted dower Of Pacchia who decked (as we know, My Kirkup! ¹) San Bernardino, Turning the small dark Oratory
To Siena's Art-laboratory,
As he made its straitness roomy
And glorified its gloomy, 4 With Bazzi ² and Beccafumi ³ (Another heigho for Bazzi: How people miscall him Razzi!)

III.

This Painter was of opinion
Our earth should be his dominion Whose Art could correct to pattern
What Nature had slurred — the slattern!
And since, beneath the heavens,
Things lay now at sixes and sevens,
Or, as he said, sopra-sotto ⁴ — 5 Thought the painter Pacchiarotto Things wanted reforming, therefore.
"Wanted it" — ay, but wherefore?
When earth held one so ready

² Italian painter of the fifteenth century.

³ Sienese painter of the sixteenth century.

⁴ Upside-down.

As he to step forth, stand steady
 In the middle of God's creation And prove to demonstration What the dark is, what the light is,
 What the wrong is, what the right is,
 What the ugly, what the beautiful,
 What the restive, what the dutiful,
 In Mankind profuse around him?
 Man, devil as now he found him,
 Would presently soar up angel
 At the summons of such evangel, And owe — what would Man not owe
 To the painter Pacchiarotto?
 Ay, look to thy laurels, Giotto!

IV.

But Man, he perceived, was stubborn, Grew regular brute, once cub born;
 And it stuck him as expedient — Ere he tried to make obedient The wolf, fox, bear and monkey, By piping advice in one key —
 That his pipe should play a prelude To something heaven-tinged not hell-hued, Something not harsh but docile, Man-liquid, not Man-fossil — Not fact, in short, but fancy.
 By a laudable necromancy
 He would conjure up ghosts — a circle Deprived of the means to work ill Should his music prove distasteful
 And pearls to the swine go wasteful.
 To be rent of swine — that was hard!
 With fancy he ran no hazard:
 Fact might knock him o'er the mazzard.¹

V.

So, the painter Pacchiarotto Constructed himself a grotto
 In the quarter of Stalloreggi —
 As authors of note allege ye.
 And on each of the whitewashed sides of it He painted — (none far and wide so fit As he to perform in fresco) —
 He painted nor cried quiesco Till he peopled its every square foot With Man — from the Beggar barefoot
 To the Noble in cap and feather:
 All sorts and conditions together.
 The Soldier in breastplate and helmet Stood frowningly — hail fellow well met — By the Priest armed with bell, book and candle
 Nor did he omit to handle
 The Fair Sex, our brave distemperer:
 Not merely King, Clown, Pope, Emperor — He diversified too his Hades
 Of all forms, pinched Labour and paid
 Ease,
 With as mixed an assemblage of Ladies.

VI.

Which work done, dry, — he rested him,
 Cleaned pallet, washed brush, divested him
 Of the apron that suits frescanti,²
 And, bonnet on ear stuck jaunty,
 This hand upon hip well planted,
 That, free to wave as it wanted,
 He addressed in a choice oration His folk of each name and nation, Taught its duty to every station.
 The Pope was declared an arrant Impostor at once, I warrant.
 The Emperor — truth might tax him With ignorance of the maxim
 "Shear sheep but nowise flay them!"
 And the Vulgar that obey them,
 The Ruled, well-matched with the Ruling,
 They failed not of wholesome schooling
 On their knavery and their fooling.
 As for Art — where's decorum? Pooh-poohed it is
 By Poets that plague us with lewd ditties,
 And Painters that pester with nudities!

VII.

Now, your rater and debater
 Is baulked by a mere spectator Who simply stares and listens Tongue tied, while eye nor glistens Nor brow grows hot and twitchy, Nor mouth, for a combat itchy, Quivers with some convincing Reply — that sets him wincing?
 Nay, rather — reply that furnishes Your debater with just what burnishes
 The crest of him, all one triumph,
 As you see him rise, hear him cry "Humph!
 Convinced am I? This confutes me?
 Receive the rejoinder that suits me!
 Confutation of vassal for prince meet — Wherein all the powers that convince meet,
 And mash my opponent to mincemeat!"

VIII.

So, off from his head flies the bonnet,
 His hip loses hand planted on it, While t'other hand, frequent in gesture, Slinks modestly back beneath vesture, As, — hop, skip and jump, — he's along
 with Those weak ones he late proved so strong
 with!
 Pope, Emperor, lo, he's beside them, Friendly now, who late could not abide
 them,
 King, Clown, Soldier, Priest, Noble, Burgess;
 And his voice, that out-roared Boanerges, How minikin-mildly it urges In accents how gentled and gingered Its word in defence of the injured!

² Painters in fresco.

"O call him not culprit, this Pontiff!
 Be hard on this Kaiser ye won't if Ye take into 'con-si-der-ation
 What dangers attend elevation!
 The Priest — who expects him to descant On duty with more zeal and less cant?
 He preaches but rubbish he's reared in.
 The Soldier, grown deaf (by the mere din Of battle) to mercy, learned tipling 10 And what not of vice while a stripling.
 The Lawyer — his lies are conventional.
 And as for the Poor Sort — why mention
 all Obstructions that leave barred and belted Access to the brains of each dolt-head?"

IX.

He ended, you wager? Not half! A bet?
 Precedence to males in the alphabet!
 Still, disposed of Man's A, B, C, there's X, Y, Z, want assistance, — the Fair Sex!
 How much may be said in excuse of — 20 Those vanities — males see no use of — From silk shoe on heel to laced poll's-
 hood!
 What's their frailty beside our own false-
 hood?
 The boldest, most brazen of . . . trumpets,
 How kind can they be to their dumb pets!
 Of their charms — how are most frank,
 how few venal!
 While as for these charges of Juvenal — Quæ nemo dixisset in toto Nisi (ædepol) ore illoto — He dismissed every charge with an
 "A page!"

X.

30 Then, cocking (in Scotch phrase) his cap a-gee,
 Right hand disengaged from the doublet — Like landlord, in house he had sub-let Resuming of guardianship gestion,
 To call tenants' conduct in question — Hop, skip, jump, to inside from outside Of chamber, he lords, ladies, louts eyed With such transformation of visage
 As fitted the censor of this age.
 No longer an advocate tepid 40 Of frailty, but champion intrepid Of strength, not of falsehood but verity,
 He, one after one, with asperity Stripped bare all the cant-clothed abuses.
 Disposed of sophistic excuses, Forced folly each shift to abandon,
 And left vice with no leg to stand on.
 So crushing the force he exerted,
 That Man at his foot lay converted!

XI.

True — Man bred of paint-pot and mortar!

But why suppose folks of this sort are More likely to hear and be tractable Than folks all alive and, in fact, able To testify promptly by action
 Their ardour, and make satisfaction For misdeeds non verbis sed factis?
 "With folk all alive be my practice Henceforward! O mortar, paint-pot O Farewell to ye!" cried Pacchiarotto, "Let only occasion interpose!"

XII.

It did so: for, pat to the purpose 60 Through causes I need not examine,
 There fell upon Siena a famine.
 In vain did the magistrates busily Seek succour, fetch grain out of Sicily, Nay, throw mill and bakehouse wide open — Such misery followed as no pen Of mine shall depict ye. Faint, fainter Waxed hope of relief: so, our painter, Emboldened by triumph of recency,
 How could he do other with decency 70 Than rush in this strait to the rescue, Play schoolmaster, point as with fescue!
 To each and all slips in Man's spelling
 The law of the land? — slips now telling With monstrous effect on the city, Whose magistrates moved him to pity
 As, bound to read law to the letter,
 They minded their hornbook no better.

XIII.

I ought to have told you, at starting, 80 How certain, who itched to be carting Abuses away clean and thorough From Siena, both province and borough, Had formed themselves into a company Whose swallow could bolt in a lump any Obstruction of scruple, provoking
 The nicer throat's coughing and choking:
 Fit Club, by as fit a name dignified Of "Freed Ones" — "Bardotti" — which signified
 "Spare-Horses" that walk by the waggon
 The team has to drudge for and drag on. 90
 This notable club Pacchiarotto Had joined long since, paid scot and lot to,
 As free and accepted "Bardotto."
 The Bailiwick watched with no quiet eye
 The outrage thus done to society, And noted the advent especially Of Pacchiarotto their fresh ally.

XIV.

These Spare-Horses forthwith assembled:
 Neighed words whereat citizens trembled
 As oft as the chiefs, in the Square by 104
 The Duomo, proposed a way whereby

¹ Straw or stick used as a pointer in teaching reading.

The city were cured of disaster.
 "Just substitute servant for master,
 Make Poverty Wealth and Wealth Poverty, Unloose Man from overt and covert tie,
 And straight out of social confusion True Order would spring!" Brave illusion —
 Aims heavenly attained by means earthy!

xv.

Off to these at full speed rushed our worthy, — Brain practised and tongue no less tutored, 10 In argument's armour accoutred, — Sprang forth, mounted rostrum and essayed
 Proposals like those to which "Yes" said
 So glibly each personage painted O' the wall-side wherewith you're acquainted.
 He harangued on the faults of the Baili-wick:
 "Red soon were our State-candle's paly
 wick,
 If wealth would become but interfluous,
 Fill voids up with just the superfluous;
 If ignorance gave way to knowledge 20 — Not pedantry picked up at college From Doctors, Professors et cetera — (They say: 'kai ta loipa' — like better a Long Greek string of kappas, taus, lambdas, Tacked on to the tail of each damned
 ass) —
 No knowledge we want of this quality,
 But knowledge indeed — practicality Through insight's fine universality!
 If you shout 'Bailiffs, out on ye all! Fie, Thou Chief of our forces, Amalfi, 30 Who shieldest the rogue and the clotpoll!' If you pounce on and poke out, with what pole
 I leave ye to fancy, our Siena's Beast-litter of sloths and hyenas —" (Whoever to scan this is ill able Forgets the town's name's a dissyllable)
 "If, this done, ye did — as ye might —
 place
 For once the right man in the right place, If you listened to me . . ."

xvi.

At which last "If"
 There flew at his throat like a mastiff 40 One Spare-Horse — another and another!
 Such outbreak of tumult and pother, Horse-faces a-laughing and fleering, Horse-voices a-mocking and jeering, Horse-hands raised to collar the caitiff Whose impudence ventured the late
 "If" —
 That, had not fear sent Pacchiarotto Off tramping, as fast as could trot toe, Away from the scene of discomfiture —

Had he stood there stock-still in a dumb fit — sure Am I he had paid in his person 50
 Till his mother might fail to know her son, Though she gazed on him never so wistful
 In the figure so tattered and triffling.
 Each mouth full of curses, each fist full Of cuffs — behold, Pacchiarotto, The pass which thy project has got to,
 Of trusting, nigh ashes still hot — tow!
 (The paraphrase — which I much need —
 is
 From Horace¹ "per ignes incedis.")

xvii.

Right and left did he dash helter-skelter 60
 In agonised search of a shelter.
 No purlieu so blocked and no alley
 So blind as allowed him to rally
 His spirits and see — nothing hampered His steps if he trudged and not scampered Up here and down there in a city
 That's all ups and downs, more the pity
 For folk who would outrun the constable.
 As last he stopped short at the one stable 70
 And sure place of refuge that's offered Humanity. Lately was coffered
 A corpse in its sepulchre, situate By St. John's Observance. "Habituate Thyself to the strangest of bedfellows, And, kicked by the live, kiss the dead fellows!"
 So Misery counselled the craven.
 At once he crept safely to haven Through a hole left unbricked in the structure.
 Ay, Misery, in have you tucked your Poor client and left him conterminous 80 With — pah — the thing fetid and ver-minous!
 (I gladly would spare you the detail, But History writes what I retail.)

xviii.

Two days did he groan in his domicile:
 "Good Saints, set me free and I promise
 I'll
 Abjure all ambition of preaching Change, whether to minds touched by teaching
 — The smooth folk of fancy, mere fig-
 ments
 Created by plaster and pigments, —
 Or to minds that receive with such rude- 90
 ness
 Dissuasion from pride, greed and lewdness, — The rough folk of fact, life's true specimens
 Of mind — 'haud in posse sed esse mens'
 As it was, is, and shall be for ever Despite of my utmost endeavour.
 O live foes I thought to illumine,

Henceforth lie untroubled your gloom in !
I need my own light, every spark, as I couch with this sole friend — a carcase !”

XIX.

Two days thus he maundered and rambled;
Then, starved back to sanity, scrambled From out his receptacle loathsome.
“A spectre !” — declared upon oath some Who saw him emerge and (appalling To mention) his garments a-crawling to With plagues far beyond the Egyptian.
He gained, in a state past description,
A convent of monks, the Observancy.

XX.

Thus far is a fact : I reserve fancy
For Fancy's more proper employment :
And now she waves wing with enjoyment,
To tell ye how preached the Superior When somewhat our painter's exterior Was sweetened. He needed (no mincing The matter) much soaking and rinsing, 20 Nay, rubbing with drugs odoriferous, Till, rid of his garments pestiferous
And robed by the help of the Brotherhood In odds and ends, — this gown and t'other hood, —
His empty inside first well-garnished, —
He delivered a tale round, unvarnished.

XXI.

“Ah, Youth !” ran the Abbot's admonishment, “Thine error scarce moves my astonishment.
For — why shall I shrink from asserting ? — Myself have had hopes of converting 30 The foolish to wisdom, till, sober, My life found its May grow October.
I talked and I wrote, but, one morning, Life's Autumn bore fruit in this warning : ‘Let tongue rest, and quiet thy quill be !
Earth is earth and not heaven, and ne'er
will be.’
Man's work is to labour and heaven —
As best he may — earth here with heaven ;
'Tis work for work's sake that he's need-
ing :
Let him work on and on as if speeding 40 Work's end, but not dream of succeeding !
Because if success were intended,
Why, heaven would begin ere earth ended.
A Spare-Horse ? Be rather a thill-horse,¹ Or — what's the plain truth — just a mill-horse !
Earth's a mill where we grind and wear mufflers :
A whip awaits shirkers and shufflers
Who slacken their pace, sick of lugging
At what don't advance for their tugging.
¹ Thill = shaft.

Though round goes the mill, we must still
post

On and on as if moving the mill-post. 9
So, grind away, mouth-wise and pen-wise,
Do all that we can to make men wise !
And if men prefer to be foolish, Ourselves have proved horse-like not mu-lish :

Sent grist, a good sackful, to hopper,
And worked as the Master thought proper.
Tongue I wag, pen I ply, who'am Abbot ; Stick thou, Son, to daub-brush and dab-pot !

But, soft ! I scratch hard on the scab hot ?
Though cured of thy plague, there may 50 linger

A pimple I fray with rough finger ?
So soon could my homily transmute Thy brass into gold ? Why, the man's mute !”

XXII.

“Ay, Father, I'm mute with admiring How Nature's indulgence untiring Still bids us turn deaf ear to Reason's Best rhetoric — clutch at all seasons And hold fast to what's proved untenable !
Thy maxim is — Man's not amenable To argument : whereof by consequence — 70 Thine arguments reach me : a non-sequence !

Yet blush not discouraged, O Father !
I stand unconverted, the rather That nowise I need a conversion.
No live man (I cap thy assertion) By argument ever could take hold Of me. 'Twas the dead thing, the clay-
cold,

Which grinned ‘Art thou so in a hurry
That out of warm light thou must scurry
And join me down here in the dungeon 80 Because, above, one's Jack and one — John, One's swift in the race, one — a hobbler, One's a crowned king, and one — a capped cobble,

Rich and poor, sage and fool, virtuous, vicious ?

Why complain ? Art thou so unsuspicious That all's for an hour of essaying Who's fit and who's unfit for playing His part in the after-construction — Heaven's Piece whereof Earth's the Induction ?

Things rarely go smooth at Rehearsal. 90 Wait patient the change universal,
And act, and let act, in existence !
For, as thou art clapped hence or hissed
hence,

Thou hast thy promotion or otherwise.
And why must wise thou have thy brother
wise

Because in rehearsal thy cue be To shine by the side of a booby ?
No polishing garnet to ruby !

All's well that ends well — through Art's magic

Some end, whether comic or tragic,
The Artist has purposed, be certain!
Explained at the fall of the curtain — In showing thy wisdom at odds with That folly: he tries men and gods with No problem for weak wits to solve meant,
But one worth such Author's evolvment.
So, back nor disturb play's production 10 By giving thy brother instruction To throw up his fool's-part allotted!
Lest haply thyself prove besotted
When stript, for thy pains, of that costume
Of sage, which has bred the imposhume
I prick to relieve thee of, — Vasily!

XXIII.

"So, Father, behold me in sanity!
I'm back to the palette and mahlstick:
And as for Man — let each and all stick To what was prescribed them at starting!
20 Once planted as fools — no departing From folly one inch, saeculorum
In saecula! Pass me the jorum, And push me the platter — my stomach Retains, through its fasting, still some ache —
And then, with your kind Benedicite, Good-bye!"

XXIV.

I have told with simplicity
My tale, dropped those harsh analytics,
And tried to content you, my critics,
Who greeted my early uprising!
30 I knew you through all the disguising, Droll dogs, as I jumped up, cried "Hey-
day!"
This Monday is — what else but May-day?
And these in the drabs, blues and yellows,
Are surely the privileged fellows.
So, saltbox and bones, tongs and bellows," (I threw up the window) "your pleasure?"

XXV.

Then he who directed the measure —
An old friend — put leg forward nimbly,
"We critics as sweeps out your chimney!" 40 Much soot to remove from your flue, sir!
Who spares coal in kitchen an't you, sir!
And neighbours complain it's no joke, sir,
— You ought to consume your own smoke,
sir!"

XXVI.

Ah, rogues, but my housemaid suspects
you —
Is confident oft she detects you In bringing more filth into my house Than ever you found there! I'm pious However: 'twas God made you dingy And me — with no need to be stingy 50 Of soap, when 'tis sixpence the packet.

So, dance away, boys, dust my jacket, Bang drum and blow life — ay, and rattle
Your brushes, for that's half the battle!
Don't trample the grass, — hocus-pocus With grime my Spring snowdrop and crocus, —

And, what with your rattling and tinkling,
Who knows but you give me an inkling How music sounds, thanks to the jangle
Of regular drum and triangle?
Whereby, tap-tap, chink-chink, 'tis proven 60
I break rule as bad as Beethoven.

"That chord now — a groan or a grunt
is't?"

Schumann's self was no worse contrapuntist.

No ear! or if ear, so tough-gristled —
He thought that he sung while he whistled!"

XXVII.

So, this time I whistle, not sing at all,
My story, the largess I fling at all
And every the rough there whose *aubade*¹ Did its best to amuse me, — nor so bad!
Take my thanks, pick up largess, and 7:
scamper

Off free, ere your mirth gets a damper!
You've Monday, your one day, your fun-
day,

While mine is a year that's all Sunday.
I've seen you, times — who knows how many? —

Dance in here, strike up, play the zany, Make mouths at the tenant, hoot warning You'll find him decamped next May-morning;

Then scuttle away, glad to 'scape hence With — kicks? no, but laughter and ha'- pence!

Mine's freehold, by grace of the grand 80
Lord

Who lets out the ground here, — my land-
lord:

To him I pay quit-rent — devotion;
Nor hence shall I budge, I've a notion,
Nay, here shall my whistling and singing Set all his street's echoes a-ringing Long after the last of your number Has ceased my front-court to encumber While, treading down rose and ranunculus, You Tommy-make-room-for-your-Uncle us!
Troop, all of you — man or homunculus, 90 Quick march! for Xanthippe, my house-
maid,

If once on your pates she a souse made With what, pan or pot, bowl or skoramis First comes to her hand — things were more amiss!

I would not for worlds be your place in — Recipient of slops from the basin!
You, Jack-in-the-Green, leaf-and-twig-gishness

¹ Serenade.

Won't save a dry thread on your priggish-
ness!

While as for Quilp-Hop-o'-my-thumb
there,

Banjo-Byron that twangs the strumstrum there —

He'll think, as the pickle he curses, I've discharged on his pate his own verses!

"Dwarfs are saucy," says Dickens: so, sauced in

Your own sauce, . . .¹

XXVIII.

But, back to my Knight of the Pencil, Dismissed to his fresco and stencil!²

10 Whose story — begun with a chuckle, And, throughout timed by raps of the knuckle, —

To small enough purpose were studied If it ends with crown cracked or nose bloodied.

Come, critics, — not shake hands, excuse
me!

But — say have you grudged to amuse me
This once in the forty-and-over

Long years since you trampled my clover And scared from my house-eaves each sparrow

I never once harmed by that arrow

20 Of song, karterotaton belos,³ (Which Pindar declares the true melos!)
I was forging and filing and finishing,
And no whit my labours diminishing Because, though high up in a chamber Where none of your kidney may clamber Your hullabaloo would approach me?
Was it "grammar" wherein you would "coach" me —

You, — pacing in even that paddock

Of language allotted you ad hoc,

30 With a clog at your fetlocks, — you — scorners

Of me free of all its four corners?

Was it "clearness of words which convey
thought?"

Ay, if words never needed enswathe aught
But ignorance, impudence, envy

And malice — what word-swathe would then vie

With yours for a clearness crystalline?

But had you to put in one small line

Some thought big and bouncing — as noddle

Of goose, born to cackle and waddle

40 And bite at man's heel as goose-wont is,

¹ No, please! For

"Who would be satirical

On a thing so very small?"

— Printer's Devil. [Note by R. B.]

² A thin plate with patterns cut out so as to be transferred to a substance placed underneath the plate.

³ The strongest dart.

⁴ Method.

Never felt plague its puny os frontis — You'd know, as you hissed, spat and sputtered,

Clear cackle is easily uttered!

XXIX.

Lo, I've laughed out my laugh on this mirth-day!

Beside, at week's end, dawns my birth-day,
That *hebdomo, hieron emar*⁵ —

(More things in a day than you deem are!)

— Tei gar Apollona chrusaora

Pgeinato Leto.⁶ So, gray or ray

Betide me, six days hence, I'm vexed here 50

By no swoop, that's certain, till next year!

"Vexed?" — roused from what else were insipid ease!

Leave snoring a-bed to Pheidippides!

We'll up and work! won't we, Euripides?

AT THE "MERMAID."

The figure that thou here seest . . . Tut!

Was it for gentle Shakespeare put?

B. JONSON. (Adapted.)

I.

I — "Next Poet?" No, my hearties,

I nor am nor fain would be!

Choose your chiefs and pick your parties,

Not one soul revolt to me!

I, forsooth, sow song-sedition?

I, a schism in verse provoke?

I, blown up by bard's ambition,

Burst — your bubble-king? You joke. 60

II.

Come, be grave! The sherris mantling

Still about each mouth, mayhap,

Breeds you insight — just a scantling —

Brings me truth out — just a scrap.

Look and tell me! Written, spoken,

Here's my life-long work: and where — Where's your warrant or my token

I'm the dead king's son and heir? 70

III.

Here's my work: does work discover —

What was rest from work — my life?

Did I live man's hater, lover?

Leave the world at peace, at strife?

Call earth ugliness or beauty?

See things there in large or small?

Use to pay its Lord my duty?

Use to own a lord at all?

⁵ The seventh, a holy day.

⁶ On which the golden-sworded Apollo was born of Latona.

IV.

Blank of such a record, truly Here's the work I hand, this scroll, Yours to take or leave; as duly,
 Mine remains the unproffered soul.
 So much, no whit more, my debtors —
 How should one like me lay claim To that largess elders, betters Sell you cheap their souls for — fame?

V.

Which of you did I enable Once to slip inside my breast,
 There to catalogue and label
 What I like least, what love best, Hope and fear, believe and doubt of,
 Seek and shun, respect — deride?
 Who has right to make a rout of Rarities he found inside?

VI.

Rarities or, as he'd rather,
 Rubbish such as stocks his own:
 Need and greed (O strange) the Father Fashioned not for him alone!
 Whence — the comfort set a-strutting, Whence — the outcry "Haste, behold!
 Bard's breast open wide, past shutting, Shows what brass we took for gold!"

VII.

Friends, I doubt not he'd display you Brass — myself call orichalc,¹ — Furnish much amusement; pray you Therefore, be content I baulk Him and you, and bar my portal!
 Here's my work outside: opine What's inside me mean and mortal!
 Take your pleasure, leave me mine!

VIII.

Which is — not to buy your laurel
 As last king did, nothing loth.
 Tale adorned and pointed moral Gained him praise and pity both.
 Out rushed sighs and groans by dozens,
 Forth by scores oaths, curses flew:
 Proving you were cater-cousins, Kith and kindred, king and you!

IX.

Whereas do I ne'er so little (Thanks to sherris) leave ajar Bosom's gate — no jot nor tittle Grow we nearer than we are.
 Sinning, sorrowing, despairing, Body-ruined, spirit-wrecked, — Should I give my woes an airing, — Where's one plague that claims respect?

X.

Have you found your life distasteful?
 My life did, and does, smack sweet. 50
 Was your youth of pleasure wasteful?
 Mine I saved and hold complete.
 Do your joys with age diminish?
 When mine fail me, I'll complain.
 Must in death your daylight finish?
 My sun sets to rise again.

XI.

What, like you, he proved — your Pilgrim —
 This our world a wilderness, Earth still grey and heaven still grim
 Not a hand there his might press, 60 Not a heart his own might throb to,
 Men all rogues and women — say, Dolls which boys' heads duck and bob to,
 Grown folk drop or throw away?

XII.

My experience being other,
 How should I contribute verse Worthy of your king and brother?
 Balaam-like I bless, not curse.
 I find earth not grey but rosy, Heaven not grim but fair of hue. 70
 Do I stoop? I pluck a posy.
 Do I stand and stare? All's blue.

XIII.

Doubtless I am pushed and shoved by Rogues and fools enough: the more Good luck mine, I love, am loved by Some few honest to the core.
 Scan the near high, scout the far low!
 "But the low come close:" what then?
 Simpletons? My match is Marlowe; Sciolists? My mate is Ben. 80

XIV.

Womankind — "the cat-like nature, False and fickle, vain and weak" —
 What of this sad nomenclature Suits my tongue, if I must speak?
 Does the sex invite, repulse so Tempt, betray, by fits and starts?
 So becalm but to convulse so,
 Decking heads and breaking hearts?

XV.

Well may you blaspheme at fortune!
 I "threw Venus"² (Ben, expound!) 90 Never did I need importune Her, of all the Olympian round.
 Blessings on my benefactress!
 Cursings suit — for aught I know —
 Those who twitched her by the back tress, Tugged and thought to turn her — so!

¹ Bronze.² The best cast in dice (three sixes) is called Venus.

XVI.

Therefore, since no leg to stand on Thus I'm left with, — joy or grief Be the issue, — I abandon Hope or care you name me Chief!
 Chief and king and Lord's anointed,
 I? — who never once have wished Death before the day appointed:
 Lived and liked, not poohed and pished!

XVII.

10 'Ah, but so I shall not enter, Scroll in hand, the common heart — Stopped at surface: since at centre Song should reach Welt-schmerz, world-smart!"
 "Enter in the heart?" Its shelly Cuirass guard mine, fore and aft!
 Such song "enters in the belly And is cast out in the draught."

XVIII.

Back then to our sherris-brewage!
 "Kingship" quotha? I shall wait — Waive the present time: some new age . . .
 20 But let fools anticipate!
 Meanwhile greet me — "friend, good fellow, Gentle Will," my merry men!
 As for making Envy yellow With "Next Poet" — (Manners, Ben!)

HOUSE.

I.

SHALL I sonnet-sing you about myself?
 Do I live in a house you would like to see?
 Is it scant of gear, has it store of pelf?
 "Unlock my heart with a sonnet-key?"

II.

Invite the world, as my betters have done?
 30 "Take notice: this building remains on view, Its suites of reception every one,
 Its private apartment and bedroom too;

III.

"For a ticket, apply to the Publisher."
 No: thanking the public, I must decline.
 A peep through my window, if folk prefer;
 But, please you, no foot over threshold of mine!

IV.

I have mixed with a crowd and heard free talk In a foreign land where an earthquake
 chanced:
 And a house stood gaping, nought to baulk 40 Man's eye wherever he gazed or glanced.

V.

The whole of the frontage shaven sheer,
 The inside gaped: exposed to day,
 Right and wrong and common and queer,
 Bare, as the palm of your hand, it lay.

VI.

The owner? Oh, he had been crushed,
 no doubt!
 "Odd tables and chairs for a man of
 wealth!
 What a parcel of musty old books about!
 He smoked, — no wonder he lost his health!

VII.

"I doubt if he bathed before he dressed.
 A brasier? — the pagan, he burned per- 51 fumes!
 You see it is proved, what the neighbours guessed:
 His wife and himself had separate rooms."

VIII.

Friends, the goodman of the house at
 least Kept house to himself till an earthquake
 came:
 'Tis the fall of its frontage permits you
 feast
 On the inside arrangement you praise or blame.

IX.

Outside should suffice for evidence:
 And whoso desires to penetrate Deeper, must dive by the spirit-sense — No optics like yours, at any rate! 60

X.

"Hoity toity! A street to explore, Your house the exception! 'With this same key Shakespeare unlocked his heart,' once
 more!"
 Did Shakespeare? If so, the less Shakespeare he!

SHOP.

So, friend, your shop was all your house!
 Its front, astonishing the street, Invited view from man and mouse
 To what diversity of treat Behind its glass — the single sheet!

II.

What gimcracks, genuine Japanese: 70
 Gape-jaw and goggle-eye, the frog; Dragons, owls, monkeys, beetles, geese;
 Some crush-nosed human-hearted dog:
 Queer names, too, such a catalogue!

III.

I thought "And he who owns the wealth Which blocks the window's vastitude,
— Ah, could I peep at him by stealth Behind his ware, pass shop, intrude On house itself, what scenes were viewed!

IV.

"If wide and showy thus the shop,
What must the habitation prove?
The true house with no name a-top —
The mansion, distant one remove,
Once get him off his traffic-groove!

V.

"Pictures he likes, or books perhaps;
And as for buying most and best,
Commend me to these City chaps!
Or else he's social, takes his rest
On Sundays, with a Lord for guest.

VI.

"Some suburb-palace, parked about And gated grandly, built last year:
The four-mile walk to keep off gout;
Or big seat sold by bankrupt peer:
But then he takes the rail, that's clear.

VII.

"Or, stop! I wager, taste selects Some out o' the way, some all-unknown Retreat: the neighbourhood suspects Little that he who rambles lone Makes Rothschild tremble on his throne!"

VIII.

Nowise! Nor Mayfair residence Fit to receive and entertain, — Nor Hampstead villa's kind defence From noise and crowd, from dust and drain, —
Nor country-box was soul's domain!

IX.

Nowise! At back of all that spread Of merchandize, woe's me, I find A hole i' the wall where, heels by head,
The owner couched, his ware behind,
— In cupboard suited to his mind.

For why? He saw no use of life
But, while he drove a roaring trade,
To chuckle "Customers are rife!"
To chafe "So much hard cash outlaid Yet zero in my profits made!

XI.

"This novelty costs pains, but — takes?
Cumbers my counter! Stock no more!

This article, no such great shakes, Fizzes like wildfire? Underscore The cheap thing — thousands to the fore!"

XII.

'Twas lodging best to live most nigh (Cramp, coffinlike as crib might be) Receipt of Custom; ear and eye Wanted no outworld: "Hear and see The bustle in the shop!" quoth he.

56

XIII.

My fancy of a merchant-prince Was different. Through his wares we groped
Our dorkling way to — not to mince The matter — no black den where moped
The master if we interloped!

XIV.

Shop was shop only: household-stuff?
What did he want with comforts there?
"Walls, ceiling, floor, stay blank and
rough,
So goods on sale show rich and rare!
'Sell and scud home' be shop's affair!"

60

XV.

What might he deal in? Gems, suppose!
Since somehow business must be done
At cost of trouble, — see, he throws
You choice of jewels, everyone, Good, better, best, star, moon and sun!

XVI.

Which lies within your power of purse?
This ruby that would tip aright Solomon's sceptre? Oh, your nurse Wants simply coral, the delight Of teething baby, — stuff to bite!

70

XVII.

Howe'er your choice fell straight you took Your purchase, prompt your money rang
On counter, — scarce the man forsook His study of the "Times," just swang Till-ward his hand that stopped the clang, —

XVIII.

Then off made buyer with a prize,
Then seller to his "Times" returned;
And so did day wear, wear, till eyes Brightened apace, for rest was earned:
He locked door long ere candle burned.

80

XIX.

And whither went he? Ask himself,
Not me! To change of scene, I think.

Once sold the ware and pursed the pelf, Chaffer was scarce his meat and drink,
Nor all his music — money-chink.

XX.

Because a man has shop to mind
In time and place, since flesh must live, Needs spirit lack all life behind,
All stray thoughts, fancies fugitive,
All loves except what trade can give?

XXI.

10 "I want to know a butcher paints,
A baker rhymes for his pursuit, Candlestick-maker much acquaints
His soul with song, or, haply mute, Blows out his brains upon the flute!

XXII.

But — shop each day and all day long!
Friend, your good angel slept, your star Suffered eclipse, fate did you wrong!
From where these sorts of treasures are,
There should our hearts be — Christ, how far!

PISGAH-SIGHTS. I.

I.

20 OVER the ball of it, Peering and prying,
How I see all of it,
Life there, outlying!
Roughness and smoothness, Shine and defilement,
Grace and uncouthness:
One reconcilment.

II.

30 Orbed as appointed, Sister with brother Joins, ne'er disjointed
One from the other.
All's lend-and-borrow;
Good, see, wants evil,
Joy demands sorrow,
Angel weds devil!

III.

40 "Which things must — why be?"
Vain our endeavour!
So shall things eye be
As they were seen.
"Such things should be!"
Sage our desistence!
Rough-smooth be made be,
Mixed — man's existence!

IV.

Man — wise and foolish, Lover and scorner,

Docile and mulish —
Keep each his corner!
Honey yet gall of it!
There's the life lying,
And I see all of it,
Only, I'm dying!

PISGAH-SIGHTS. II.

I.

COULD I but live again,
Twice my life over,
Would I once strive again?
Would not I cover Quietly all of it — Greed and ambition —
So, from the pall of it, Pass to fruition?

II.

"Soft!" I'd say, "Soul mine!
These years and ten years,
Let the bird move mine Digging out decease!
Let the clazed hawk soar,
Clean the sun's rays too!
Turf his hay stack so, FORAGE my finger's to."

III.

Only a harper,
Quilt one or blow one,
Just a chancer.
I won't touch no one.
I am earth's native:
No rearranging it!
I be creative,
Chopping and changing it?

IV.

March, men, my fellows!
Those who above me, (Distance so below)
Fancy you love me:
Those who, below me, (Distance makes great so) Free to hate me,
Fancy you hate so!

V.

Praising, reviling,
Worst men and best head, Put me among,
Never arrested,
Wasteful, unwasteful,
March, in my measure,
Men, my extraneous!
I am the future.

VI.

So shall I fear thee, Majesties yonder!

Mock-sun — more near thee,
 What is to wonder?
 So shall I love thee, Down in the dark, — lest Glowworm I prove thee,
 Star that now sparklest!

FEARS AND SCRUPLES.

I.

HERE'S my case. Of old I used to love him

This same unseen friend, before I knew:

Dream there was none like him, none above him, —

Wake to hope and trust my dream was true.

II.

Loved I not his letters full of beauty?

Not his actions famous far and wide?

Absent, he would know I vowed him duty;
 Present, he would find me at his side.

III.

Pleasant fancy! for I had but letters,

Only knew of actions by hearsay:

He himself was busied with my betters;

What of that? My turn must come some day.

IV.

"Some day" proving — no day! Here's the puzzle.

Passed and passed my turn is. Why complain?

He's so busied! If I could but muzzle People's foolish mouths that give me pain!

V.

"Letters?" (hear them!) "You a judge of writing?"

Ask the experts! — How they shake the head.

O'er these characters, your friend's inditing —

Call them forgery from A to Z!

VI.

"Actions? Where's your certain proof" (they bother)

"He, of all you find so great and good,

He, he only, claims this, that, the other

30 Action — claimed by men, a multitude?"

VII.

I can simply wish I might refute you,

Wish my friend would, — by a word, a wink, —

Bid me stop that foolish mouth, — you brute you!

He keeps absent, — why, I cannot think.

VIII.

Never mind! Though foolishness may flout me,

One thing's sure enough: 'tis neither frost,

No, nor fire, shall freeze or burn from out me

Thanks for truth — though falsehood, gained — though lost.

IX.

All my days, I'll go the softer, sadder, For that dream's sake! How forget 40

the thrill Through and through me as I thought

"The gladlier

Lives my friend because I love him still!"

X.

Ah, but there's a menace someone utters!
 "What and if your friend at home play

tricks?

Peep at hide-and-seek behind the shutters?
 Mean your eyes should pierce through solid bricks?

XI.

"What and if he, frowning, wake you, dreamy?

Lay on you the blame that bricks — conceal?

Say 'At least I saw who did not see me, Does see now, and presently shall feel'?" 50

XII.

"Why, that makes your friend a monster!"
 say you:

"Had his house no window? At first nod,

Would you not have hailed him?"

Hush, I pray you!

What if this friend happen to be —

God?

NATURAL MAGIC.

I.

ALL I can say is — I saw it!

The room was as bare as your hand.

I locked in the swarth little lady, — I swear,

From the head to the foot of her — well, quite as bare!

"No Nautch shall cheat me," said I, "taking my stand

At this bolt which I draw!" And this 60 bolt — I withdraw it,

And there laughs the lady, not bare, but embowered

With — who knows what verdure, o'er-fruited, o'erflowered?

Impossible! Only — I saw it!

II.

All I can sing is — I feel it!

This life was as blank as that room;

I let you pass in here. Precaution, indeed?

Walls, ceiling and floor, — not a chance for a weed!

Wide opens the entrance: where's cold now, where's gloom?

No May to sow seed here, no June to reveal it,

10 Behold you enshrined in these blooms of your bringing,

These fruits of your bearing — nay, birds of your winging!

A fairy-tale! Only — I feel it!

MAGICAL NATURE.

I.

FLOWER — I never fancied, jewel — I profess you!

Bright I see and soft I feel the outside of a flower.

Save but glow inside and — jewel, I should guess you,

Dim to sight and rough to touch: the glory is the dower.

II.

Tou, forsooth, a flower? Nay, my love, a jewel —

Jewel at no mercy of a moment in your prime!

Time may fray the flower-face: kind be time or cruel,

20 Jewel, from each facet, flash your laugh at time!

BIFURCATION.

WE were two lovers; let me lie by her,
My tomb beside her tomb. On hers inscribe —

"I loved him; but my reason bade prefer Duty to love, reject the tempter's bribe Of rose and lily when each path diverged,
And either I must pace to life's far end
As love should lead me, or, as duty urged, Plod the worn causeway arm-in-arm with
friend.

So, truth turned falsehood: 'How I loathe a flower,

30 How prize the pavement!' still caressed his ear —

The deafish friend's — through life's day, hour by hour.

As he laughed (coughing) 'Ay, it would appear!'

But deep within my heart of hearts there hid

Ever the confidence, amends for all,
That heaven repairs what wrong earth's journey did,

When love from life-long exile comes at
call.

Duty and love, one broad way, were the
best —

Who doubts? But one or other was to choose.

I chose the darkling half, and wait the
rest

In that new world where light and darkness fuse."

Inscribe on mine — "I loved her: love's track lay

O'er sand and pebble, as all travellers
know.

Duty led through a smiling country, gay With greensward where the rose and lily blow.

'Our roads are diverse: farewell, love!'
said she;

*"Tis duty I abide by: homely sward
And not the rock-rough picturesque for me!
Above, where both roads join, I wait reward.*

Be you as constant to the path whereon I leave you planted!' But man needs must move,

Keep moving — whither, when the star is gone

Whereby he steps secure nor strays from
love?

No stone but I was tripped by, stumbling-
block

But brought me to confusion. Where I
fell,

There I lay flat, if moss disguised the rock, Thence, if flint pierced, I rose and cried
'All's well!'

*Duty be mine to tread in that high sphere Where love from duty ne'er disparts, I
trust,*

And two halves make that whole, whereof — since here

One must suffice a man — why, this one must!'"

Inscribe each tomb thus: then, some sage acquaint

The simple — which holds sinner, & which holds saint!

NUMPHOLEPTOS.

[Caught by a Nymph.]

STILL you stand, still you listen, still you
smile!

Still melts your moonbeam through me,
 white awhile,
 Softening, sweetening till sweet and soft Increase so round this heart of mine, that oft
 I could believe your moonbeam-smile has
 past
 The pallid limit, lies, transformed at last To sunlight and salvation — warms the
 soul
 It sweetens, softens! Would you pass that goal,
 Gain love's birth at the limit's happier
 verge,
 And, where an iridescence lurks, but urge The hesitating pallor on to prime Of dawn! — true blood-streaked, sun-warmth, action-time,
 By heart-pulse ripened to a ruddy glow Of gold above my clay — I scarce should
 know From gold's self, thus suffused! For gold means love.
 What means the sad slow silver smile
 above
 My clay but pity, pardon? — at the best,
 But acquiescence that I take my rest, Contented to be clay, while in your heaven
 The sun reserves love for the Spirit-Seven Companioning God's throne they lamp
 before,
 — Leaves earth a mute waste only wandered o'er
 By that pale soft sweet discompassioned
 moon Which smiles me slow forgiveness! Such the boon
 I beg? Nay, dear, submit to this — just
 this Supreme endeavour! As my lips now
 kiss
 Your feet, my arms convulse your shrouding robe,
 My eyes, acquainted with the dust, dare probe
 Your eyes above for — what, if born, would blind
 Mine with redundant bliss, as flash may
 find
 The inert nerve, sting awake the palsied
 limb,
 Bid with life's ecstasy sense overbrim And suck back death in the resurging
 joy —
 Love, the love whole and sole without alloy!
 Vainly! The promise withers! I employ Lips, arms, eyes, pray the prayer which finds the word,
 Make the appeal which must be felt, not
 heard,
 And none the more is changed your calm
 regard:
 Rather, its sweet and soft grow harsh and
 hard — Forbearance, then repulsion, then disdain.
 Avert the rest! I rise, see! — make, 40
 again
 Once more, the old departure for some track Untried yet through a world which brings me back
 Ever thus fruitlessly to find your feet, To fix your eyes, to pray the soft and
 sweet
 Which smile there — take from his new pilgrimage
 Your outcast, once your inmate, and assuage
 With love — not placid pardon now — his thirst
 For a mere drop from out the ocean erst He drank at! Well, the quest shall be renewed.
 Fear nothing! Though I linger, un- 50 enbued
 With any drop, my lips thus close. I go!
 So did I leave you, I have found you so,
 And doubtlessly, if fated to return,
 So shall my pleading persevere and earn Pardon — not love — in that same smile,
 I learn,
 And lose the meaning of, to learn once
 more, Vainly!
 What fairy track do I explore?
 What magic hall return to, like the gem Centuply-angled o'er a diadem?
 You dwell there, hearted; from your mid- 60 most home
 Rays forth — through that fantastic world
 I roam
 Ever — from centre to circumference, Shaft upon coloured shaft: this crimsons
 thence,
 That purples out its precinct through the
 waste.
 Surely I had your sanction when I faced, Fared forth upon that untried yellow ray Whence I retrack my steps? They end
 to-day
 Where they began — before your feet,
 beneath
 Your eyes, your smile: the blade is shut in sheath,
 Fire quenched in flint; irradiation, late 70 Triumphant through the distance, finds its
 fate, Merged in your blank pure sea, alike the source
 And tomb of that prismatic glow: divorce Absolute, all-conclusive! Forth I fared, Treading the lambent flamelet: little cared
 If now its flickering took the topaz tint,

- If now my dull-caked path gave sulphury
hint
Of subterranean rage — no stay nor stint To yellow, since you sanctioned that I bathe, Burnish me, soul and body, swim and swathe
In yellow license. Here I reek suffused With crocus, saffron, orange, as I used With scarlet, purple, every dye o' the bow Born of the storm-cloud. As before, you
show Scarce recognition, no approval, some 30 Mistrust, more wonder at a man become Monstrous in garb, nay — flesh disguised
as well,
Through his adventure. Whatsoe'er be-
fell,
I followed, wheresoe'er it wound, that vein
You authorised should leave your whiteness, stain Earth's sombre stretch beyond your mid-most place
Of vantage, — trode that tinct whereof the trace On garb and flesh repel you! Yes, I plead
Your own permission — your command,
indeed,
That who would worthily retain the love
' Must share the knowledge shrined those eyes above,
Go boldly on adventure, break through
bounds
O' the quintessential whiteness that surrounds
Your feet, obtain experience of each tinge That bickers forth to broaden out, impinge Plainer his foot its pathway all distinct From every other. Ah, the wonder,
linked
With fear, as exploration manifests
What agency it was first tipped the crests Of unnamed wildflower, soon protruding
grew 30 Portentous mid the sands, as when his hue
Betrays him and the burrowing snake gleams through;
Till, last . . . but why parade more shame and pain?
Are not the proofs upon me? Here again
I pass into your presence, I receive Your smile of pity, pardon, and I leave . . .
No, not this last of times I leave you,
mute,
Submitted to my penance, so my foot May yet again adventure, tread, from
source
To issue, one more ray of rays which
course
40 Each other, at your bidding, from the sphere
- Silver and sweet, their birthplace, down that drear Dark of the world, — you promise shall return
Your pilgrim jewelled as with drops o' the urn
The rainbow paints from, and no smatch
at all
Of ghastliness at edge of some cloud-pall Heaven cowers before, as earth awaits the fall
O' the bolt and flash of doom. Who trusts your word Tries the adventure: and returns — absurd
As frightful — in that sulphur-steeped disguise Mocking the priestly cloth-of-gold, sole
prize
The arch-heretic was wont to bear away Until he reached the burning. No, I say: No fresh adventure! No more seeking
love
At end of toil, and finding, calm above
My passion, the old statuesque regard,
The sad petrific smile!
- O you — less hard
And hateful than mistaken and obtuse Unreason of a she-intelligence!
You very woman with the pert pretence To match the male achievement! Like
enough!
Ay, you were easy victors, did the rough Straightway efface itself to smooth, the gruff
Grind down and grow a whisper, — did man's truth Subdue, for sake of chivalry and ruth,
Its rapier-edge to suit the bulrush-spear Womanly falsehood fights with! O that ear
All fact pricks rudely, that thrice-super-
fine
Femininity of sense, with right divine To waive all process, take result stain-free From out the very muck wherein . . .
- Ah me!
The true slave's querculous outbreak! All the rest
Be resignation! Forth at your behest I fare. Who knows but this — the crimson-quest —
May deepen to a sunrise, not decay To that cold sad sweet smile? — which I obey.

APPEARANCES.

I.

AND so you found that poor room dull,
Dark, hardly to your taste, my dear?

Its features seemed unbeautiful:

But this I know — 'twas there, not here,
You plighted troth to me, the word Which — ask that poor room how it heard.

II.

And this rich room obtains your praise Unqualified, — so bright, so fair,
So all whereat perfection stays?

Ay, but remember — here, not there,
The other word was spoken! Ask o This rich room how you dropped the mask!

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER.

I.

No protesting, dearest!

Hardly kisses even!

Don't we both know how it ends?

How the greenest leaf turns serest,

Bluest outbreak — blankest heaven,

Lovers — friends?

II.

You would build a mansion,

I would weave a bower

— Want the heart for enterprise.

o Walls admit of no expansion:

Trellis-work may haply flower

Twice the size.

III.

What makes glad Life's Winter?

New buds, old blooms after.

Sad the sighing "How suspect

Beams would ere mid-Autumn splinter,

Roof-tree scarce support a rafter,

Walls lie wrecked?"

IV.

You are young, my princess!

I am hardly older:

Yet — I steal a glance behind.

Dare I tell you what convinces

Timid me that you, if bolder,

Bold — are blind?

V.

Where we plan our dwelling

Glooms a graveyard surely!

Headstone, footstone moss may drape, —

Name, date, violets hide from spelling, —

But, though corpses rot obscurely,

Ghosts escape.

VI.

Ghosts! O breathing Beauty,

Give my frank word pardon!

What if I — somehow, somewhere —

Pledged my soul to endless duty

Many a time and oft? Be hard on Love — laid there?

VII.

Nay, blame grief that's fickle,

Time that proves a traitor,

Chance, change, all that purpose warps, —

Death who spares to thrust the sickle 50

Laid Love low, through flowers which later

Shroud the corpse!

VIII.

And you, my winsome lady,

Whisper with like frankness!

Lies nothing buried long ago?

Are you — which shimmer mid the shady

Where moss and violet run to rankness —

Tombs or no?

IX.

Who taxes you with murder?

My hands are clean — or nearly! 60

Love being mortal needs must pass.

Repentance? Nothing were absurder.

Enough: we felt Love's loss severely;

Though now — alas!

X.

Love's corpse lies quiet therefore,

Only Love's ghost plays truant,

And warns us have in wholesome awe

Durable mansionry; that's wherefore

I weave but trellis-work, pursuant — Life, to law. 70

XI.

The solid, not the fragile,

Tempts rain and hail and thunder.

If bower stand firm at Autumn's
close,

Beyond my hope, — why, boughs were agile;

If bower fall flat, we scarce need wonder

Wreathing — rose!

XII.

So, truce to the protesting,

So, muffled be the kisses!

For, would we but avow the truth,

Sober is genuine joy. No jesting! 80

Ask else Penelope, Ulysses —

Old in youth!

XIII.

For why should ghosts feel angered?

Let all their interference

Be faint march-music in the air!

"Up! Join the rear of us the vanguard!
Up, lovers, dead to all appearance, Laggard pair!"

XIV.

The while you clasp me closer,
The while I press you deeper,
As safe we chuckle, — under breath, Yet all the slyer, the jocosier, —
"So, life can boast its day, like leap-
year,
Stolen from death!"

XV.

10 Ah me — the sudden terror!
Hence quick — avaunt, avoid me,
You cheat, the ghostly flesh-disguised!
Nay, all the ghosts in one! Strange error!
So, 'twas Death's self that clipped and coyed me,
Loved — and lied!

XVI.

Ay, dead loves are the potent!
Like any cloud they used you, Mere semblance you, but substance
they!
Build we no mansion, weave we no tent!
20 Mere flesh — their spirit interfused you!
Hence, I say!

XVII.

All theirs, none yours the glamour!
Theirs each low word that won me, Soft look that found me Love's, and
left What else but you — the tears and clamour
That's all your very own! Undone
me —
Ghost-bereft!

HERVÉ RIEL.¹

[Mr. Browning sent the hundred guineas he received for this poem to the relief of the starving French after the siege of Paris.
The story the poem records is true.]

I.

ON the sea and at the Hogue, sixteen hundred ninety-two,
Did the English fight the French, — woe to France!
30 And, the thirty-first of May, helter-skelter through the blue, Like a crowd of frightened porpoises a shoal of sharks pursue,

Came crowding ship on ship to Saint-Malo on the Rance,²
With the English fleet in view.

II.

'Twas the squadron that escaped, with the victor in full chase; First and foremost of the drove, in his great ship, Damfreville; Close on him fled, great and small,
Twenty-two good ships in all;
And they signalled to the place
"Help the winners of a race!
Get us guidance, give us harbour, take 4 us quick — or, quicker still, Here's the English can and will!"

III.

Then the pilots of the place put out brisk and leapt on board;
"Why, what hope or chance have ships like these to pass?" laughed they:
"Rocks to starboard, rocks to port, all the passage scarred and scored, — Shall the 'Formidable' here, with her twelve and eighty guns, Think to make the river-mouth by the single narrow way, Trust to enter — where 'tis ticklish for a craft of twenty tons,
And with flow at full beside?
Now, 'tis slackest ebb of tide.
Reach the mooring? Rather say, 5
While rock stands or water runs,
Not a ship will leave the bay!"

IV.

Then was called a council straight.
Brief and bitter the debate:
"Here's the English at our heels; would you have them take in tow All that's left us of the fleet, linked together stern and bow,
For a prize to Plymouth Sound?
Better run the ships aground!" (Ended Damfreville his speech).
"Not a minute more to wait!
Let the Captains all and each Shove ashore, then blow up, burn the vessels on the beach!
France must undergo her fate..

V.

Give the word!" But no such word
Was ever spoke or heard; For up stood, for out stepped, for in struck amid all these — A Captain? A Lieutenant? A Mate
— first, second, third?

² The river which runs into the English Channel at St. Malo.

No such man of mark, and meet
With his betters to compete!
But a simple Breton sailor pressed by Tourville for the fleet, A poor coasting-pilot he, Hervé Riel the Croisickese.¹

VI.

And "What mockery or malice have we here?" cries Hervé Riel: "Are you mad, you Malouins?"² Are you cowards, fools, or rogues?
Talk to me of rocks and shoals, me who took the soundings, tell On my fingers every bank, every shallow, every swell
'Twixt the offing here and Grève where the river disembogues?
Are you bought by English gold? Is it love the lying's for?
Morn and eve, night and day,
Have I piloted your bay, Entered free and anchored fast at the foot of Solidor.
Burn the fleet and ruin France? That were worse than fifty Hogues!
Sirs, they know I speak the truth!
Sirs, believe me there's a way!
Only let me lead the line,
Have the biggest ship to steer, Get this 'Formidable' clear,
Make the others follow mine,
And I lead them, most and least, by a passage I know well, Right to Solidor past Grève,
And there lay them safe and sound;
And if one ship misbehave, —
— Keel so much as grate the ground, Why, I've nothing but my life, — here's my head!" cries Hervé Riel.

VII.

Not a minute more to wait.
"Steer us in, then, small and great!
Take the helm, lead the line, save the squadron!" cried its chief.
Captains, give the sailor place!
He is Admiral, in brief.
Still the north-wind, by God's grace
See the noble fellow's face
As the big ship, with a bound, Clears the entry like a hound, Keeps the passage, as its inch of way were the wide sea's profound!
See, safe thro' shoal and rock,
How they follow in a flock, Not a ship that misbehaves, not a keel that grates the ground,
Not a spar that comes to grief!
The peril, see, is past.

of the Loire.

² Natives of St. Malo.

All are harboured to the last,
And just as Hervé Riel hollas "Anchor!" — sure as fate,
Up the English come, — too late!

VIII.

So, the storm subsides to calm:
They see the green trees wave
On the heights o'erlooking Grève.
Hearts that bled are stanch'd with balm.
"Just our rapture to enhance,
Let the English rake the bay, Gnash their teeth and glare askance
As they cannonade away!
'Neath rampired Solidor pleasant riding on the Rance!"
How hope succeeds despair on each Captain's countenance!
Out burst all with one accord,
"This is Paradise for Hell!
Let France, let France's King Thank the man that did the thing!"
What a shout, and all one word,
"Hervé Riel!"
As he stepped in front once more,
Not a symptom of surprise
In the frank blue Breton eyes, Just the same man as before.

IX.

Then said Damfreville, "My friend,
I must speak out at the end,
Though I find the speaking hard.
Praise is deeper than the lips:
You have saved the King his ships,
You must name your own reward.
'Faith, our sun was near eclipse!
Demand whate'er you will,
France remains your debtor still.
Ask to heart's content and have! or my name's not Damfreville."

X.

Then a beam of fun outbroke
On the bearded mouth that spoke,
As the honest heart laughed through Those frank eyes of Breton blue:
"Since I needs must say my say, Since on board the duty's done,
And from Malo Roads to Croisic Point, what is it but a run? — Since 'tis ask and have, I may — Since the others go ashore — Come! A good whole holiday!
Leave to go and see my wife, whom I call the Belle Aurore!" That he asked and that he got, — nothing more.

XI.

Name and deed alike are lost:
Not a pillar nor a post

In his Croisic keeps alive the feat as it befell;
Not a head in white and black
On a single fishing-smack, In memory of the man but for whom had gone to wrack

All that France saved from the fight whence England bore the bell.

Go to Paris: rank on rank

Search the heroes flung pell-mell

On the Louvre, face and flank!

"You shall look long enough ere you come to Hervé Riel.

10 So, for better and for worse,

Hervé Riel, accept my verse!

In my verse, Hervé Riel, do thou once
more

Save the squadron, honour France, love thy wife the Belle Aurore!

A FORGIVENESS.

I AM indeed the personage you know.

As for my wife, — what happened long
ago, —

You have a right to question me, as I Am bound to answer.

("Son, a fit reply!")

The monk half spoke, half ground through his clenched teeth,

At the confession-grate I knelt beneath.)

20 Thus then all happened, Father! Power and place

I had as still I have. I ran life's race, With the whole world to see, as only strains

His strength some athlete whose prodigious gains

Of good appal him: happy to excess, — Work freely done should balance happiness

Fully enjoyed; and, since beneath my roof Housed she who made home heaven, in heaven's behoof

I went forth every day, and all day long Worked for the world. Look, how the labourer's song

30 Cheers him! Thus sang my soul, at each sharp throe

Of labouring flesh and blood — "She loves me so!"

One day, perhaps such song so knit the nerve

That work grew play and vanished. "I deserve

Haply my heaven an hour before the
time!"

I laughed, as silverly the clockhouse-chime

Surprised me passing through the postern-
gate

— Not the main entry where the menials
wait

And wonder why the world's affairs allow The master sudden leisure. That was
how

I took the private garden-way for once. 44

Forth from the alcove, I saw start, ensconce

Himself behind the porphyry vase, a man.
My fancies in the natural order ran:

"A spy, — perhaps a foe in ambushade, — A thief, — more like, a sweetheart of some
maid

Who pitched on the alcove for tryst perhaps."

"Stand there!" I bid.

Whereat my man but wraps
His face the closelier with uplifted arm

Whereon the cloak lies, strikes in blind alarm

This and that pedestal as, — stretch and 54
stoop, —

Now in, now out of sight, he thrids the group

Of statues, marble god and goddess ranged Each side the pathway, till the gate's exchanged

For safety: one step thence, the street, you
know!

Thus far I followed with my gaze. Then,
slow,

Near on admiringly, I breathed again,
And — back to that last fancy of the train —

"A danger risked for hope of just a word With — which of all my nest may be the bird

This poacher covets for her plumage, pray? 64 Carmen? Juana? Carmen seems too

gay

For such adventure, while Juana's grave — Would scorn the folly. I applaud the

knave!

He had the eye, could single from my brood

His proper fledgeling!"

As I turned, there stood In face of me, my wife stone-still stone-
white.

Whether one bound had brought her, — at first sight

Of what she judged the encounter, sure to
be

Next moment, of the venturous man and
me, —

Brought her to clutch and keep me from my prey:

Whether impelled because her death no
day

Could come so absolutely opportune
As now at joy's height, like a year in June Stayed at the fall of its first ripened rose: Or whether hungry for my hate — who knows? —

Eager to end an irksome lie, and taste
Our tingling true relation, hate embraced By hate one naked moment: — anyhow There stone-still stone-white stood my wife, but now

The woman who made heaven within my
house.

Ay, she who faced me was my very spouse
As well as love — you are to recollect!

"Stay!" she said. "Keep at least one soul unspewed

With crime, that's spotless hitherto — your own!

Kill me who court the blessing, who alone
Was, am, and shall be guilty, first to last!
The man lay helpless in the toils I cast About him, helpless as the statue there Against that strangling bell-flower's bondage: tear

Away and tread to dust the parasite, But do the passive marble no despite!
I love him as I hate you. Kill me! Strike At one blow both infinitudes alike Out of existence — hate and love! Whence
love?

That's safe inside my heart, nor will remove

For any searching of your steel, I think.
Whence hate? The secret lay on lip, at brink

Of speech, in a fierce tremble to escape, At every form wherein your love took
shape,

At each new provocation of your kiss.
Kill me!"

We went in.

Next day after this,
I felt as if the speech might come. I spoke —
Easily, after all.

"The lifted cloak
Was screen sufficient: I concern myself Hardly with laying hands on who for pelf —

Whate'er the ignoble kind — may prowl and brave

Cuffing and kicking proper to a knave Detected by my household's vigilance.
Enough of such! As for my love-romance —

I, like our good Hidalgo, rub my eyes And wake and wonder how the film could rise

Which changed for me a barber's basin
straight

Into — Mambrino's helm? I hesitate Nowise to say — God's sacramental cup!
Why should I blame the brass which, burnished up,

Will blaze, to all but me, as good as gold?
To me — a warning I was overbold

In judging metals. The Hidalgo waked Only to die, if I remember, — staked

His life upon the basin's worth, and lost: While I confess torpidity at most

In here and there a limb; but, lame and halt,

Still should I work on, still repair my fault Ere I took rest in death, — no fear at all!
Now, work — no word before the curtain
fall!"

The "curtain"? That of death on life, I
meant:

My "word," permissible in death's event, Would be — truth, soul to soul; for,
otherwise,

Day by day, three years long, there had to rise

And, night by night, to fall upon our stage —

Ours, doomed to public play by heritage — 63
Another curtain, when the world, perforce

Our critical assembly, in due course Came and went, witnessing, gave praise or
blame

To art-mimetic. It had spoiled the game
If, suffered to set foot behind our scene,
The world had witnessed how stage-king and queen,

Gallant and lady, but a minute since Enarming each the other, would evince No sign of recognition as they took

His way and her way to whatever nook 70 Waited them in the darkness either side

Of that bright stage where lately groom and bride

Had fired the audience to a frenzy-fit
Of sympathetic rapture — every whit

Earned as the curtain fell on her and me, — Actors. Three whole years, nothing was to see

But calm and concord; where a speech was due

There came the speech: when smiles were wanted too

Smiles were as ready. In a place like
mine,

Where foreign and domestic cares com- 84
bine,

There's audience every day and all day
long;

But finally the last of the whole throng Who linger lets one see his back. For

her —
Why, liberty and liking: I aver,

Liking and liberty! For me — I breathed, Let my face rest from every wrinkle wreathed

- Smile-like about the mouth, unlearned my task
 Of personation till next day bade mask,
 And quietly betook me from that world
 To the real world, not pageant: there unfurled
 In 'work, its wings, my soul, the fretted power.
 Three years I worked, each minute of each hour
 Not claimed by acting: — work I may dispense With talk about, since work in evidence, Perhaps in history; who knows or cares?
- 10 After three years, this way, all unawares, Our acting ended. She and I, at close Of a loud night-feast, led, between two rows Of bending male and female loyalty,
 Our lord the king down staircase, while, held high At arm's length did the twisted tapers' flare Herald his passage from our palace, where Such visiting left glory evermore.
 Again the ascent in public, till at door
 As we two stood by the saloon — now blank
- 20 And disencumbered of its guests — there sank A whisper in my ear, so low and yet So unmistakable!
- "I half forget
 The chamber you repair to, and I want Occasion for one short word — if you grant That grace — within a certain room you called Our 'Study,' for you wrote there while I scrawled Some paper full of faces for my sport.
 That room I can remember. Just one short Word with you there, for the remembrance' sake!"
- 30 "Follow me thither!" I replied.
- We break
 The gloom a little, as with guiding lamp
 I lead the way, leave warmth and cheer, by damp
 Blind disused serpentining ways afar From where the habitable chambers are, — Ascend, descend stairs tunnelled through the stone, —
 Always in silence, — till I reach the lone Chamber sepulchred for my very own Out of the palace-quarry. When a boy, Here was my fortress, stronghold from annoy,
- 40 Proof-positive of ownership; in youth I garnered up my gleanings here — uncouth
- But precious relics of vain hopes, vain fears; Finally, this became in after years
 My closet of entrenchment to withstand Invasion of the foe on every hand —
 The multifarious herd in bower and hall, State-room, — rooms whatsoe'er the style, which call
 On masters to be mindful that, before Men, they must look like men and something more.
 Here, — when our lord the king's bestowment ceased To deck me on the day that, golden-fleeced, I touched ambition's height, — 'twas here, released From glory (always symbolled by a chain!)
 No sooner was I privileged to gain My secret domicile than glad I flung That last toy on the table — gazed where hung On hook my father's gift, the arquebuss — And asked myself "Shall I envisage thus
 The new prize and the old prize, when I reach Another year's experience? — own that each Equalled advantage — sportsman's — statesman's tool?
 That brought me down an eagle, this — a fool!"
- Into which room on entry, I set down
 The lamp, and turning saw whose rustled gown Had told me my wife followed, pace for pace.
 Each of us looked the other in the face.
 She spoke. "Since I could die now . . ."
- (To explain Why that first struck me, know — not once again
 Since the adventure at the porphyry's edge Three years before, which sundered like a wedge Her soul from mine, — though daily, smile to smile, We stood before the public, — all the while Not once had I distinguished, in that face
 I paid observance to, the faintest trace Of feature more than requisite for eyes
 To do their duty by and recognise:
 So did I force mine to obey my will And pry no further. There exists such skill, —
 Those know who need it. What physician
 shrinks
 From needful contact with a corpse? He drinks No plague so long as thirst for knowledge
 — not

- An idler impulse — prompts inquiry.
What,
And will you disbelieve in power to bid Our spirit back to bounds, as though we
child
A child from scrutiny that's just and right In manhood? Sense, not soul, accomplished sight, Reported daily she it was — not how Nor why a change had come to cheek and
brow.)
- “Since I could die now of the truth concealed, Yet dare not, must not die — so seems revealed
The Virgin's mind to me — for death means peace,
Wherein no lawful part have I, whose lease
Of life and punishment the truth avowed May haply lengthen, — let me push the shroud Away, that steals to muffle ere is just My penance-fire in snow! I dare — I must Live, by avowal of the truth — this
truth —
I loved you! Thanks for the fresh ser-pent's tooth
That, by a prompt new pang more exquisite
Than all preceding torture, proves me
right!
I loved you yet I lost you! May I go Burn to the ashes, now my shame you
know?”
- I think there never was such — how express? —
Horror coquetting with voluptuousness, As in those arms of Eastern workman-
ship —
Yataghan, kandjar, things that rend and rip, Gash rough, slash smooth, help hate so many ways, Yet ever keep a beauty that betrays Love still at work with the artificer Throughout his quaint devising. Why prefer,
Except for love's sake, that a blade should writhe
And bicker like a flame? — now play the scythe
As if some broad neck tempted, — now contract
And needle off into a fineness lacked For just that puncture which the heart demands?
Then, such adornment! Wherefore need our hands
Enclose not ivory alone, nor gold Roughened for use, but jewels? Nay, behold!
- Fancy my favourite — which I seem to grasp While I describe the luxury. No asp Is diapered more delicate round throat Than this below the handle! These denote
— These mazy lines meandering, to end Only in flesh they open — what intend They else but water-purlings — pale contrast
With the life-crimson where they blend at
last?
And mark the handle's dim pellucid green, Carved, the hard jadestone, as you pinch
a bean,
Into a sort of parrot-bird! He pecks A grape-bunch; his two eyes are rubyspecks Pure from the mine: seen this way, — glassy blank,
But turn them, — lo the inmost fire, that shrank
From sparkling, sends a red dart right to aim!
Why did I choose such toys? Perhaps the
game
Of peaceful men is warlike, just as men War-wearied get amusement from that pen And paper we grow sick of — statesfolk
tired Of merely (when such measures are required)
Dealing out doom to people by three words,
A signature and seal: we play with swords Suggestive of quick process. That is how I came to like the toys described you now, Store of which glittered on the walls and strewn
The table, even, while my wife pursued Her purpose to its ending. “Now you
know
This shame, my three years' torture, let me
go,
Burn to the very ashes! You — I lost, Yet you — I loved!”
- The thing I pity most In men is — action prompted by surprise Of anger: men? nay, bulls — whose onset
lies
At instance of the firework and the goad! 70
Once the foe prostrate, — trampling once bestowed, — Prompt follows placability, regret, Atonement. Trust me, blood-warmth never yet Betokened strong will! As no leap of pulse Pricked me, that first time, so did none convulse
My veins at this occasion for resolve.
Had that devolved which did not then devolve
Upon me, I had done — what now to do

Was quietly apparent.

"Tell me who
The man was, crouching by the porphyry vase!"

"No, never! All was folly in his case, All guilt in mine. I tempted, he complied."

"And yet you loved me?"

"Loved you. Double-dyed
In folly and in guilt, I thought you gave Your heart and soul away from me to slave At statecraft. Since my right in you seemed lost,
I stung myself to teach you, to your cost, 10 What you rejected could be prized beyond Life, heaven, by the first fool I threw a fond Look on, a fatal word to."

"And you still Love me? Do I conjecture well or ill?"

"Conjecture — well or ill! I had three
years
To spend in learning you."

"We both are peers
In knowledge, therefore: since three years are spent Ere thus much of yourself I learn — who went Back to the house, that day, and brought my mind
To bear upon your action, uncombined 20 Motive from motive, till the dross, deprived Of every purer particle, survived At last in native simple hideousness, Utter contemptibility, nor less Nor more. Contemptibility — exempt How could I, from its proper due — contempt?"

I have too much despised you to divert
My life from its set course by help or hurt
Of your all-despicable life — perturb
The calm, I work in, by — men's mouths to curb,

30 Which at such news were clamorous
enough —

Men's eyes to shut before my broidered
stuff

With the huge hole there, my emblazoned
wall

Blank where a scutcheon hung, — by,
worse than all,

Each day's procession, my paraded life Robbed and impoverished through the wanting wife

— Now that my life (which means — my work) was grown

Riches indeed! Once, just this worth
alone

Seemed work to have, that profit gained
thereby
Of good and praise would — how rewardingly! —

Fall at your feet, — a crown I hoped to cast Before your love, my love should crown
at last.

No love remaining to cast crown before,
My love stopped work now: but contempt
the more

Impelled me task as ever head and hand, Because the very fiends weave ropes of sand

Rather than taste pure hell in idleness.
Therefore I kept my memory down by stress

Of daily work I had no mind to stay For the world's wonder at the wife away.
Oh, it was easy all of it, believe,
For I despised you! But your words retrieve

Importantly the past. No hate assumed The mask of love at any time! There gloomed

A moment when love took hate's semblance, urged

By causes you declare; but love's self purged

Away a fancied wrong I did both loves — Yours and my own: by no hate's help, it proves,

Purgation was attempted. Then, you rise High by how many a grade! I did despise —

I do but hate you. Let hate's punishment 6 Replace contempt's! First step to which ascent —

Write down your own words I re-utter you!
'I loved my husband and I hated — who

He was, I took up as my first chance, mere Mud-ball to fling and make love foul with!

Here
Lies paper!"

"Would my blood for ink suffice!"

"It may: this minion from a land of spice, Silk, feather — every bird of jewelled
breast —

This poignard's beauty, ne'er so lightly prest

Above your heart there . . ." 7

"Thus?"

"It flows, I see.
Dip there the point and write!"

"Dictate to me!
Nay, I remember."

And she wrote the words.
I read them. Then — "Since love, in you, affords

License for hate, in me, to quench (I say) Contempt — why, hate itself has passed
 away
 In vengeance — foreign to contempt. De-
 part Peacefully to that death which Eastern art Imbued this weapon with, if tales be true!
 Love will succeed to hate. I pardon you — Dead in our chamber!"

True as truth the tale.

She died ere morning; then, I saw how pale
 Her cheek was ere it wore day's paint-
 disguise,
 10 And what a hollow darkened 'neath her
 eyes,
 Now that I used my own. She sleeps, as erst
 Beloved, in this your church: ay, yours!

Immersed

In thought so deeply, Father? Sad, perhaps?
 For whose sake, hers or mine or his who wraps — Still plain I seem to see! — about his
 head
 The idle cloak, — about his heart (instead Of cuirass) some fond hope he may elude
 My vengeance in the cloister's solitude?
 Hardly, I think! As little helped his brow 20 The cloak then, Father — as your grate helps now!

CENCIAJA.

[Cencigaga is a bundle of rags — a trifle.
 The Italian proverb may be translated thus: "Every poor creature will be pressing into the company of his betters." See the "Browning Cyclopædia," p. 97.]

Ogni cencio vuol entrare in bucato.

— Italian Proverb.

MAY I print, Shelley, how it came to pass That when your Beatrice seemed — by lapse
 Of many a long month since her sentence
 fell —

Assured of pardon for the parricide, —
 By intercession of staunch friends, or, say, By certain pricks of conscience in the Pope Conniver at Francesco Cenci's guilt, — Suddenly all things changed and Clement grew

"Stern," as you state, "nor to be moved nor bent,

But said these three words coldly 'She must die;'

Subjoining 'Pardon? Paolo Santa Croce Murdered his mother also yestereve, And he is fled: she shall not flee at least!'

— So, to the letter, sentence was fulfilled?
 Shelley, may I condense verbosity

That lies before me, into some few words Of English, and illustrate your superb Achievement by a rescued anecdote,

No great things, only new and true beside?
 As if some mere familiar of a house

Should venture to accost the group at gaze Before its Titian, famed the wide world

through,
 And supplement such pictured master-
 piece

By whisper "Searching in the archives
 here,

I found the reason of the Lady's fate,
 And how by accident it came to pass

She wears the halo and displays the palm:
 Who, haply, else had never suffered — no,

Nor graced our gallery, by consequence."
 Who loved the work would like the little

news:

Who lauds your poem lends an ear to me
 Relating how the penalty was paid

By one Marchese dell' Oriolo, called Onofrio Santa Croce otherwise,

For his complicity in matricide With Paolo his own brother, — he whose

crime
 And flight induced "those three words —
 She must die.

Thus I unroll you then the manuscript.

"God's justice" — (of the multiplicity Of such communications extant still,

Recording, each, injustice done by God
 In person of his Vicar-upon-earth,

Scarce one but leads off to the self-same
 tune)

"God's justice, tardy though it prove per-
 chance,

Rests never on the track until it reach Delinquency. In proof I cite the case

Of Paolo Santa Croce."

Many times

The youngster, — having been importu-nate

That Marchesine Costanza, who remained His widowed mother, should supplant the

her
 Her elder son, and substitute himself
 In sole possession of her faculty,

And meeting just as often with rebuff, — Blinded by so exorbitant a lust

Of gold, the youngster straightway tasked his wits,

Casting about to kill the lady — thus.

He first, to cover his iniquity, Writes to Onofrio Santa Croce, then

Authoritative lord, acquainting him Their mother was contamination —

wrought
 Like hell fire in the beauty of their House

By dissoluteness and abandonment Or soul and body to impure delight.
 Moreover, since she suffered from disease, Those symptoms which her death made manifest

Hydroptic, he affirmed were fruits of sin
 About to bring confusion and disgrace Upon the ancient lineage and high fame O' the family, when published. Duty
 bound,

He asked his brother — what a son should
 do?

10 Which when Marchese dell' Oriolo
 heard

By letter, being absent at his land Oriolo, he made answer, this, no more:
 "It must behove a son, — things haply
 so, —

To act as honour prompts a cavalier
 And son, perform his duty to all three, Mother and brothers" — here advice broke off.

By which advice informed and fortified,
 As he professed himself — since bound by
 birth

20 To hear God's voice in primogeniture — Paolo, who kept his mother company
 In her domain Subiaco, straightway dared His whole enormity of enterprise
 And, falling on her, stabbed the lady dead;
 Whose death demonstrated her innocence,
 And happened, — by the way, — since Jesus Christ
 Died to save man, just sixteen hundred
 years.

Costanza was of aspect beautiful Exceedingly, and seemed, although in age Sixty about, to far surpass her peers

30 The coëtaneous dames, in youth and
 grace.

Done the misdeed, its author takes to
 flight,

Foiling thereby the justice of the world:
 Not God's however, — God, be sure, knows well

The way to clutch a culprit. Witness here!
 The present sinner, when he least expects,
 Snug-cornered somewhere i' the Basilicate, Stumbles upon his death by violence.

A man of blood assaults a man of blood And slays him somehow. This was afterward:

40 Enough, he promptly met with his deserts, And, ending thus, permits we end with
 him,

And push forthwith to this important
 point —

His matricide fell out, of all the days, Precisely when the law-procedure closed Respecting Count Francesco Cenci's
 death

Chargeable on his daughter, sons and
 wife.

"Thus patricide was matched with matri-cide,"

A poet not inelegantly rhymed:

Nay, fratricide — those Princes Mas-simi! —

Which so disturbed the spirit of the Pope
 That all the likelihood Rome entertained Of Beatrice's pardon vanished straight,
 And she endured the piteous death.

Now see

The sequel — what effect commandment had

For strict inquiry into this last case, When Cardinal Aldobrandini (great His efficacy — nephew to the Pope) Was bidden crush — ay, though his very
 hand

Got soil i' the act — crime spawning everywhere!

Because, when all endeavour had been used

To catch the aforesaid Paolo, all in vain —
 "Make perquisition" quoth our Eminence,

"Throughout his now deserted domicile!
 Ransack the palace, roof and floor, to find If haply any scrap of writing, hid In nook or corner, may convict — who knows? —

Brother Onofrio of intelligence
 With brother Paolo, as in brotherhood Is but too likely: crime spawns everywhere."

And, every cranny searched accordingly, There comes to light — O lynx-eyed Cardinal! —

Onofrio's unconsidered writing-scrap,
 The letter in reply to Paolo's prayer,
 The word of counsel that — things proving
 so,

Paolo should act the proper knightly part,
 And do as was incumbent on a son,
 A brother — and a man of birth, be sure!

Whereat immediately the officers Proceeded to arrest Onofrio — found At foot-ball, child's play, unaware of harm, Safe with his friends, the Orsini, at their seat

Monte Giordano; as he left the house
 He came upon the watch in wait for him Set by the Barigel, — was caught and caged.

News of which capture being, that same
 hour,

Conveyed to Rome, forthwith our Eminence

Commands Taverna, Governor and Judge,
 To have the process in especial care,

Be, first to last, not only president In person, but inquisitor as well, Nor trust the by-work to a substitute:
Bids him not, squeamish, keep the bench, but scrub

The floor of Justice, so to speak, — go try His best in prison with the criminal:
Promising, as reward for by-work done Fairly on all-fours, that, success obtained And crime avowed, or such connivency

10 With crime as should procure a decent
death —

Himself will humbly beg — which means, procure —

The Hat and Purple from his relative
The Pope, and so repay a diligence Which, meritorious in the Cenci-case, Mounts plainly here to Purple and the Hat.

Whereupon did my lord the Governor
So masterfully exercise the task Enjoined him, that he, day by day, and
week

By week, and month by month, from first to last

20 Toiled for the prize: now, punctual at his
place,

Played Judge, and now, assiduous at his post,

Inquisitor — pressed cushion and scoured
plank,

Early and late. Noon's fervour and night's chill,

Nought moved whom morn would, purpling, make amends!

So that observers laughed as, many a day,
He left home, in July when day is flame,

Posted to Tordinona-prison, plunged Into a vault where daylong night is ice,

There passed his eight hours on a stretch,
content,

30 Examining Onofrio: all the stress Of all examination steadily

Converging into one pin-point, — he pushed

Tentative now of head and now of heart.
As when the nuthatch taps and tries the nut

This side and that side till the kernel
sound, —

So did he press the sole and single point — What was the very meaning of the
phrase

'Do as beseems an honoured cavalier'?

Which one persistent question-torture,
— plied

40 Day by day, week by week, and month by
month,

Morn, noon and night, — fatigued away a mind

Grown imbecile by darkness, solitude,

And one vivacious memory gnawing there As when a corpse is confined with a snake — Fatigued Onofrio into what might seem Admission that perchance his judgment
groped

So blindly, feeling for an issue — aught
With semblance of an issue from the toils Cast of a sudden round feet late so free,
He possibly might have envisaged, scarce 50 Recoiled from — even were the issue death — Even her death whose life was death and
worse!

Always provided that the charge of crime,
Each jot and tittle of the charge were true
In such a sense, belike, he might advise His brother to expurgate crime with . .
well,

With blood, if blood must follow on 'the
course
Taken as might beseem a cavalier.'

Whereupon process ended, and report
Was made without a minute of delay 60 To Clement who, because of those two crimes

O' the Massimi and Cenci flagrant late, Must needs impatiently desire result.

Result obtained, he bade the Governor Summon the Congregation and dispatch.
Summons made, sentence passed accordingly

— Death by beheading. When his death-decree

Was intimated to Onofrio, all Man could do — that did he to save himself.

'Twas much, the having gained for his 70
defence

The Advocate o' the Poor, with natural
help

Of many noble friendly persons fain
To disengage a man of family,

So young too, from his grim entanglement:
But Cardinal Aldobrandini ruled

There must be no diversion of the law.
Justice is justice, and the magistrate

Bears not the sword in vain. Who sins must die.

So, the Marchese had his head cut off,
With Rome to see, a concourse infinite, 80
In Place Saint Angelo beside the Bridge:
Where, demonstrating magnanimity Adequate to his birth and breed, — poor
boy! —

He made the people the accustomed speech, Exhorted them to true faith, honest works,
And special good behaviour as regards
A parent of no matter what the sex, Bidding each son take warning from himself.

Truly, it was considered in the boy

Stark staring lunacy, no less, to snap So plain a bait, be hooked and hauled ashore

By such an angler as the Cardinal!
Why make confession of his privity To 'Paolo's enterprise? Mere sealing lips —

Or, better, saying "When I counselled him
'To do as might besecm a cavalier,' What could I mean but 'Hide our parent's
shame

As Christian ought, by aid of Holy Church!
30 Bury it in a convent — ay, beneath Enough dotation to prevent its ghost From troubling earth!" Mere saying thus, — 'tis plain,

Not only were his life the recompense,
But he had manifestly proved himself True Christian, and in lieu of punishment

Got praise of all men. So the populace.

Anyhow, when the Pope made promise
good

(That of Aldobrandini, near and dear)
And gave Taverna, who had toiled so
much,

20 A Cardinal's equipment, some such word
As this 'from mouth to ear went saucily:
'Taverna's cap is dyed in what he drew From Santa Croce's veins!' So joked the world.

I add: Onofrio left one child behind, A daughter named Valeria, dowered with
grace

Abundantly of soul and body, doomed
To life the shorter for her father's fate.
By death of her, the Marquise returned To that Orsini House from whence it
came:

30 Oriolo having passed as donative
To Santa Croce from their ancestors.

And no word more? By all means!
Would you know

The authoritative answer, when folk urged 'What made Aldobrandini, hound-like staunch,

Hunt out of life a harmless simpleton?"
The answer was — "Hatred implacable, By reason they were rivals in their love."
The Cardinal's desire was to a dame Whose favour was Onofrio's. Pricked with pride,

40 The simpleton must ostentatiously Display a ring, the Cardinal's love-gift, Given to Onofrio as the lady's gage;
Which ring on finger, as he put forth hand
To draw a tapestry, the Cardinal Saw and knew, gift and owner, old and young;
Whereon a fury entered him — the fire

He quenched with what could quench fire only — blood.

Nay, more: "there want not who affirm
to boot,

The unwise boy, a certain festal eve, Feigned ignorance of who the wight might 5
be

That pressed too closely on him with a crowd.

He struck the Cardinal a blow: and then,
To put a face upon the incident,

Dared next day, smug as ever, go pay court I' the Cardinal's antechamber. Mark and mend,

Ye youth, by this example how may greed Vainglorious operate in worldly souls!"

So ends the chronicler, beginning with "God's justice, tardy though it prove per-
chance,

Rests never till it reach delinquency." 6
Ay, or how otherwise had come to pass That Victor rules, this present year, in Rome?

FILIPPO BALDINUCCI ON THE PRIVILEGE OF BURIAL.

A REMINISCENCE OF A.D. 1676.

[Baldinucci, who was born at Florence in 1624, is the author of a History of Italian Art, in the course of which, under the name of the painter Buti, he records the events which form the subject-matter of this poem.]

I.

"No, boy, we must not" — so began My Uncle (he's with God long since)
A-petting me, the good old man!
"We must not" — and he seemed to
wince,

And lost that laugh whereto had grown
His chuckle at my piece of news, How cleverly I aimed my stone —
"I fear we must not pelt the Jews!" 7

II.

"When I was young indeed, — ah, faith
Was young and strong in Florence too!
We Christians never dreamed of scathe Because we cursed or kicked the crew.
But now — well, well! The olive-crops Weighed double then, and Arno's pranks Would always spare religious shops Whenever he o'erflowed his banks!

III.

"I'll tell you" — and his eye regained Its twinkle — "tell you something 8
choice!

Something may help you keep unstained
Your honest zeal to stop the voice Of unbelief with stone-throw — spite Of laws, which modern fools enact,
That we must suffer Jews in sight Go wholly unmclestcd! Fact!

IV.

“There was, then, in my youth, and yet Is, by our San Frediano, just Below the Blessed Olivct,
A wayside ground wherein they thrust Their dead, — these Jews, — the more our shame!
Except that, so they will but die, Christians perchance incur no blame
In giving hogs a hoist to styce.

V.

“There, anyhow, Jews stow away Their dead; and, — such their insolence, — Slink at odd times to sing and pray
As Christians do — all make-pretence! — Which wickedness they perpetrate Because they think no Christians see.
They reckoned here, at any rate, Without their host: ha, ha, he, he!

VI.

“For, what should join their plot of
ground
But a good Farmer’s Christian field?
The Jews had hedged their corner round With bramble-bush to keep concealed Their doings: for the public road Ran betwixt this their ground and that The Farmer’s, where he ploughed and sowed,
Grew corn for barn and grapes for vat.

VII.

“So, properly to guard his store
And gall the unbelievers too,
He builds a shrine and, what is more,
Procures a painter whom I knew,
One Buti (he’s with God) to paint
A holy picture there — no less Than Virgin Mary free from taint Borne to the sky by angels: yes!

VIII.

“Which shrine he fixed, — who says him
nay? —
A-facing with its picture-side
Not, as you’d think, the public way, But just where sought these hounds to
hide
Their carrion from that very truth
Of Mary’s triumph: not a hound Could act his mummeries uncouth
But Mary shamed the pack all round!

IX.

“Now, if it was amusing, judge!
— To see the company arrive, Each Jew intent to end his trudge
And take his pleasure (though alive) 54
With all his Jewish kith and kin Below ground, have his venom out, Sharpen his wits for next day’s sin, Curse Christians, and so home, no
doubt!

X.

“Whereas, each phyzz upturned beholds Mary, I warrant, soaring brave!
And in a trice, beneath the folds Of filthy garb which gowns each knave, Down drops it — there to hide grimace, Contortion of the mouth and nose 60
At finding Mary in the place They’d keep for Pilate, I suppose!

XI.

“At last, they will not brook — not they! — Longer such outrage on their tribe:
So, in some hole and corner, lay Their heads together — how to bribe The meritorious Farmer’s self
To straight undo his work, restore Their chance to meet and muse on pelf — Pretending sorrow, as before! 70

XII.

“Forthwith, a posse, if you please,
Of Rabbi This and Rabbi That Almost go down upon their knees
To get him lay the picture flat,
The spokesman, eighty years of age, Grey as a badger, with a goat’s
Not only beard but bleat, ’gins wage War with our Mary. Thus he dotes: —

XIII.

“Friends, grant a grace! How Hebrews toil
Through life in Florence. — why relate 80
To those who lay the burden, spoil Our paths of peace? We bear our fate.
But when with life the long toil ends,
Why must you — the expression craves Pardon, but truth compels me, friends! — Why must you plague us in our graves?

XIV.

“Thoughtlessly plague, I would believe!
For how can you — the lords of ease
By nurture, birthright — e’en conceive Our luxury to lie with irees 94
And turf, — the cricket and the bird Left for our last companionship:
No harsh deed, no unkindly word,
No frowning brow nor scornful lip!

XV.

“‘Death’s luxury, we now rehearse While, living, through your streets we fare
And take your hatred: nothing worse
Have we, once dead and safe, to bear!
So we refresh our souls, fulfil Our works, our daily tasks; and thus Gather you grain — earth’s harvest — still The wheat for you, the straw for us.

XVI.

to “‘What flouting in a face, what harm,
In just a lady-borne from bier
By boys’ heads, wings for leg and arm?” You question. Friends, the harm is
here —
That just when our last sigh is heaved,
And we would fain thank God and you For labour done and peace achieved, Back comes the Past in full review!

XVII.

to “‘At sight of just that simple flag, Starts the foe-feeling serpent-like From slumber. Leave it lulled, nor drag — Though fangless — forth, what needs must strike
When stricken sore, though stroke be vain Against the mailed oppressor! Give Play to our fancy that we gain Life’s rights when once we cease to live!

XVIII.

to “‘Thus much to courtesy, to kind,
To conscience! Now to Florence folk!
There’s core beneath this apple-rind,
Beneath this white-of-egg there’s yolk!
Beneath this prayer to courtesy, Kind, conscience — there’s a sum to pouch!
How many ducats down will buy
Our shame’s removal, sirs? Avouch!

XIX.

to “‘Removal, not destruction, sirs!
Just turn your picture! Let it front
The public path! Or memory errs, Or that same public path is wont
To witness many a chance befall Of lust, theft, bloodshed — sins enough, Wherein our Hebrew part is small.
Convert yourselves!’ — he cut up rough.

XX.

“Look you, how soon a service paid Religion yields the servant fruit!
A prompt reply our Farmer made So following: ‘Sirs, to grant your suit Involves much danger! How? Trans-
pose
Our Lady? Stop the chastisement.

All for your good, herself bestows?
What wonder if I grudge consent?

XXI.

“‘— Yet grant it: since, what cash I take
Is so much saved from wicked use.
We know you! And, for Mary’s sake, A hundred ducats shall induce Concession to your prayer. One do Suffices: Master Buti’s brush Turns Mary round the other way,
And deluges your side with slush.

XXII.

“‘Down with the ducats therefore!’ Dump Dump, dump it falls, each counted piece, Hard gold. Then out of door they stump, These dogs, each brisk as with new lease
Of life, I warrant, — glad he’ll die Henceforward just as he may choose,
Be buried and in clover lie!
Well said Esaias — ‘stiff-necked Jews!’

XXIII.

“‘Off posts without a minute’s loss
Our Farmer, once the cash in poke
And summons Buti — ere its gloss Have time to fade from off the joke —
To chop and change his work, undo
The done side, make the side, now blank, Recipient of our Lady — who,
Displaced thus, had these dogs to thank!

XXIV.

“‘Now, boy, you’re hardly to instruct In technicalities of Art!
My nephew’s childhood sure has sucked Along with mother’s-milk some part Of painter’s-practice — learned, at least,
How expeditiously is plied
A work in fresco — never ceased When once begun — a day, each side.

XXV.

“‘So, Buti — (he’s with God) — begins:
First covers up the shrine all round With hoarding; then, as like as twins, Paints, t’other side the burial-ground,
New Mary, every point the same;
Next, sluices over, as agreed,
The old; and last — but, spoil the same By telling you? Not I, indeed!’

XXVI.

“‘Well, ere the week was half at end,
Out came the object of this zeal,
This fine alacrity to spend Hard money for mere dead men’s weal!
How think you? That old spokesman
Jew
Was High Priest, and he had a wife

As old, and she was dying too,
And wished to end in peace her life!

XXVII.

"And he must humour dying whims,
And soothe her with the idle hope They'd say their prayers and sing their hymns
As if her husband were the Pope!
And she did die — believing just This privilege was purchased! Dead In comfort through her foolish trust!
10 'Stiff-necked ones,' well Esaias said!

XXVIII.

"So, Sabbath morning, out of gate
And on to way, what sees our arch Good Farmer? Why, they hoist their freight —
The corpse — on shoulder, and so,
march!
'Now for it, Buti!' In the nick Of time 'tis pully-haully, hence With hoarding! O'er the wayside quick There's Mary, plain in evidence!

XXIX.

"And here's the convoy halting: right!
20 O they are bent on howling psalms
And growling prayers, when opposite!
And yet they glance, for all their qualms, Approve that promptitude of his,
The Farmer's — duly at his post
To take due thanks from every phyz, Sour smirk — nay, surly smile almost!

XXX.

"Then earthward drops each brow again;
The solemn task's resumed; they reach Their holy field — the unholy train: 30 Enter its precinct, all and each,
Wrapt somehow in their godless rites;
Till, rites at end, up-waking, lo
They lift their faces! What delights
The mourners as they turn to go?

XXXI.

"Ha, ha, he, he! On just the side They drew their purse-strings to make quit
Of Mary, — Christ the Crucified Fronted them now — these biters bit!
Never was such a hiss and snort, 40 Such screwing nose and shooting lip!
Their purchase — honey in report — Proved gall and verjuice at first sip!

XXXII.

"Out they break, on they bustle, where,
A-top of wall, the Farmer waits
With Buti: never fun so rare!

The Farmer has the best: he rates
The rascal, as the old High Priest Takes on himself to sermonise — Nay, sneer 'We Jews supposed, at least,
Theft was a crime in Christian eyes!' 50

XXXIII.

"'Theft?' cries the Farmer. 'Eat your words!
Show me what constitutes a breach Of faith in ought was said or heard!
I promised you in plainest speech I'd take the thing you count disgrace And put it here — and here 'tis put!
Did you suppose I'd leave the place Blank, therefore, just your rage to glut?

XXXIV.

"'I guess you dared not stipulate
For such a damned impertinence! 60
So, quick, my greybeard, out of gate
And in at Ghetto! Haste you hence!
As long as I have house and land,
To spite you irreligious chaps Here shall the Crucifixion stand — Unless you down with cash, perhaps!'

XXXV.

"So snickered he and Buti both.
The Jews said nothing, interchanged
A glance or two, renewed their oath To keep ears stopped and hearts es- 70
tranged
From grace, for all our Church can do;
Then off they scuttle: sullen jog Homewards, against our Church to brew Fresh mischief in their synagogue.

XXXVI.

"But next day — see what happened, boy!
See why I bid you have a care How you pelt Jews! The knaves employ Such methods of revenge, forbear
No outrage on our faith, when free To wreak their malice! Here they 80
took
So base a method — plague o' me
If I record it in my Book!

XXXVII.

"For, next day, while the Farmer sat Laughing with Buti, in his shop,
At their successful joke, — rat-tat, — Door opens, and they're like to drop Down to the floor as in their stalks
A six-feet-high herculean-built Young he-Jew with a beard that baulks Description. 'Help ere blood be spill!' 90

XXXVIII.

— "Screamed Buti: for he recognised Whom but the son, no less no more,

Of that High Priest his work surprised
 So pleasantly the day before!
 Son of the mother, then, whereof The bier he lent a shoulder to,
 And made the moans about, dared scoff At sober Christian grief — the Jew!

XXXIX.

“*Sirs, I salute you! Never rise!
 No apprehension!*” (Buti, white
 And trembling like a tub of size, 10 Had tried to smuggle out of sight
 The picture’s self — the thing in oils,
 You know, from which a fresco’s dashed Which courage speeds while caution spoils) ‘Stay and be praised, sir, unabashed!’

XL.

“*Praised, — ay, and paid too: for I come To buy that very work of yours.
 My poor abode, which boasts — well, some Few specimens of Art, secures Haply, a masterpiece indeed* 20 *If I should find my humble means Suffice the outlay. So, proceed!
 Propose — ere prudence intervenes!’*

XLI.

“On Buti, cowering like a child, These words descended from aloft,
 In tone so ominously mild,
 With smile terrifically soft
 To that degree — could Buti dare (Poor fellow) use his brains, think twice?
 He asked, thus taken unaware,
 30 No more than just the proper price!

XLII.

“Done!” cries the monster, “*I disburse Forthwith your moderate demand.
 Count on my custom — if no worse
 Your future work be, understand, Than this I carry off! No aid!
 My arm, sir, lacks nor bone nor thews:
 The burden’s easy, and we’re made,
 Easy or hard, to bear — we Jews!’*

XLIII.

“Crossing himself at such escape, 40 Buti by turns the money eyes
 And, timidly, the stalwart shape Now moving doorwards; but, more
 wise,
 The Farmer, — who, though dumb, this
 while
 Had watched advantage, — straight conceived
 A reason for that tone and smile So mild and soft! The Jew — believed!

XLIV.

“Mary in triumph borne to deck A Hebrew household! Pictured where No one was used to bend the neck
 In praise or bow the knee in prayer!
 Borne to that domicile by whom?
 The son of the High Priest! Through
 what?
 An insult done his mother’s tomb!
 Saul changed to Paul — the case came pat!

XLV.

“*Stay, dog Jew . . . gentle sir, that is!
 Resolve me! Can it be, she crowned, — Mary, by miracle, — Oh bliss! —
 My present to your burial ground?
 Certain, a ray of light has burst Your veil of darkness! Had you else, 6
 Only for Mary’s sake, unpursed
 So much hard money? Tell — oh, tell’s!*”

XLVI.

“Round — like a serpent that we took For worm and trod on — turns his bulk
 About the Jew. First dreadful look Sends Buti in a trice to skulk
 Out of sight somewhere, safe — alack!
 But our good Farmer faith made bold:
 And firm (with Florence at his back) He stood, while gruff the gutturals 7 rolled —

XLVII.

“*Ay, sir, a miracle was worked,
 By quite another power, I trow,
 Than ever yet in canvas lurked,
 Or you would scarcely face me now!
 A certain impulse did suggest A certain grasp with this right-hand,
 Which probably had put to rest Our quarrel, — thus your throat once spanned!*

XLVIII.

“*But I remembered me, subdued That impulse, and you face me still! 8
 And soon a philosophic mood Succeeding (hear it, if you will!)
 Has altogether changed my views Concerning Art. Blind prejudice!
 Well may you Christians tax us Jews With scrupulosity too nice!*

XLIX.

“*For, don’t I see, — let’s issue join! — Whenever I’m allowed pollute (I — and my little bag of coin)
 Some Christian palace of repute, — 9 Don’t I see stuck up everywhere Abundant proof that cultured taste
 Has Beauty for its only care,
 And upon Truth no thought to waste?*

I.

“Jew, since it must be, take in pledge Of payment’ — so a Cardinal Has sighed to me as if a wedge Entered his heart — ‘this best of all My treasures!’ Leda, Ganymede Or Antiope: swan, eagle, ape, (Or what’s the beast of what’s the breed)
And Jupiter in every shape!

II.

“Whereat if I presume to ask But, Eminence, though Titian’s whisk
Of brush have well performed its task,
How comes it these false godships frisk
In presence of — what yonder frame Pretends to image? Surely, odd
It seems, you let confront The Name Each beast the heathen called his god!

III.

“Benignant smiles me pity straight
The Cardinal. ’Tis Truth, we prize!
Art’s the sole question in debate!
These subjects are so many lies.
We treat them with a proper scorn When we turn lies — called gods for-
sooth —
To lies’ fit use, now Christ is born.
Drawing and colouring are Truth.

III.

“Think you I honour lies so much As scruple to parade the charms Of Leda — Titian, every touch — Because the thing within her arms Means Jupiter who had the praise
And prayer of a benighted world?
He would have mine too, if, in days
Of light, I kept the canvas furled!

IV.

“So ending, with some easy gibe.
What power has logic! I, at once, Acknowledged error in our tribe
So squeamish that, when friends ensconce
A pretty picture in its niche
To do us honour, deck our graves, We fret and fume and have an itch
To strangle folk — ungrateful knaves!

IV.

“No, sir! Be sure that — what’s its style,
Your picture? — shall possess ungrudging
A place among my rank and file Of Ledas and what not — be judged Just as a picture! and (because I fear me much I scarce have bought A Titian) Master Buti’s flaws Found there, will have the laugh flaws ought!

LVI.

“So, with a scowl, it darkens door — This bulk — no longer! Buti makes Prompt glad re-entry; there’s a score Of oaths, as the good Farmer wakes
From what must needs have been a trance,
Or he had struck (he swears) to ground
The bold bad mouth that dared advance Such doctrine the reverse of sound!

LVII.

“Was magic here? Most like! For, since, Somehow our city’s faith grows still More and more lukewarm, and our Prince Or loses heart or wants the will To check increase of cold. ’Tis ‘Live
And let live!’ Languidly repress The Dissident! In short, — contrive Christians must bear with Jews: no less!

LVIII.

“The end seems, any Israelite Wants any picture, — pishes, poohs, Purchases, hangs it full in sight
In any chamber he may choose!
In Christ’s crown, one more thorn we rue!
In Mary’s bosom, one more sword!
No, boy, you must not pelt a Jew!
O Lord, how long? How long, O
Lord?”

EPILOGUE.

οἱ δ' ἀμφορῆς οἶνον μέλανος ἀνθοσμίου. ^{μεστοὶ . . .}

I.

“The poets pour us wine —”
Said the dearest poet¹ I ever knew.
Dearest and greatest and best to me.
You clamour athirst for poetry — We pour. “But when shall a vintage
be” —

You cry — “strong grape. squeezed gold from screw, Yet sweet juice, flavoured flowery-fine?
That were indeed the wine!”

II.

One pours your cup — stark strength, Meat for a man; and you eye the pulp Strained, turbid still, from the viscous²
blood

Of the snaky bough: and you grumble
“Good!

For it swells resolve, breeds hardihood;
Dispatch it, then, in a single gulp!”
So, down, with a wry face, goes at length
The liquor: stuff for strength.

² Sticky.

III.

One pours your cup — sheer sweet,
 The fragrant fumes of a year condensed:
 Suspicion of all that's ripe or rathe, From the bud on branch to the grass in swathe.¹
 "We suck mere milk of the seasons," saith A curl of each nostril — "dew, dispensed Nowise for nerving man to feat: Boys sip such honeyed sweet!"

IV.

And thus who wants wine strong, 20 Waves each sweet smell of the year away;
 Who likes to swoon as the sweets suffuse His brain with a mixture of beams and dew Turned syrupy drink — rough strength eschews:
 "What though in our veins your wine-stock stay?
 The lack of the bloom does our palate
 wrong.
 Give us wine sweet, not strong!"

V.

Yet wine is — some affirm — Prime wine is found in the world some-
 where,
 Of potable strength with sweet to match.
 20 You double your heart its dose, yet catch — As the draught descends — a violetsmatch, Softness — however it came there, Through drops expressed by the fire and worm:
 Strong sweet wine — some affirm.

VI.

Body and bouquet both?
 'Tis easy to ticket a bottle so;
 But what was the case in the cask, my
 friends?
 Cask? Nay, the vat — where the maker mends
 His strong with his sweet (you suppose) and blends 30 His rough with his smooth, till none can
 know How it comes you may tipple, nothing
 loth,
 Body and bouquet both.

VII.

"You" being just — the world.
 No poets — who turn, themselves, the winch
 Of the press; no critics — I'll even say, (Being flustered and easy of faith to-day)

¹ The line or ridge of grass thrown together by the scythe.

Who for love of the work have learned the
 way
 Till themselves produce home-made, at a pinch:
 No! You are the world, and wine ne'er purled
 Except to please the world!

VIII.

"For, oh the common heart!
 And, ah, the irremissible sin
 Of poets who please themselves, not us Strong wine yet sweet wine pouring thus,
 How please still — Pindar and Æschylus! — Drink — dipt into by the bearded chin Alike and the bloomy lip — no part Denied the common heart!"

IX.

"And might we get such grace,
 And did you moderns but stock our vault 50 With the true half-brandy half-attar-gul,² How would seniors indulge at a hearty pull While juniors tossed off their thimbleful!
 Our Shakespeare and Milton escaped your fault,
 So, they reign supreme o'er the weaker race
 That wants the ancient grace!"

X.

If I paid myself with words (As the French say well) I were dupe
 indeed!
 I were found in belief that you quaffed and bowed
 At your Shakespeare the whole day long, 6 caroused
 In your Milton pottle-deep nor drowsed
 A moment of night — toped on, took heed
 Of nothing like modern cream-and-curd.
 Pay me with deeds, not words!

XI.

For — see your cellarage!
 There are forty barrels with Shakespeare's brand.
 Some five or six are abroad: the rest Stand spigoted, fauceted. Try and test
 What yourselves call best of the very best!
 How comes it that still untouched they 7
 stand?
 Why don't you try tap, advance a stage
 With the rest in cellarage?

XII.

For — see your cellarage!
 There are four big butts of Milton's brew.
 How comes it you make old drips and drops
 Do duty, and there devotion stops?

* Essence of roses.

Leave such an abyss of malt and hops Embellied in butts which bungs still glue?
 You hate your bard! A fig for your rage!
 Free him from cellarage!

XIII.

'Tis said I brew stiff drink,
 But the deuce a flavour of grape is there.
 Hardly a May-go-down, 'tis just A sort of a gruff Go-down-it-must — No Merry-go-down, no gracious gust Commingles the racy with Springtide's rare!
 "What wonder," say you "that we cough, and blink
 At Autumn's heady drink?"

XIV.

Is it a fancy, friends?
 Mighty and mellow are never mixed, Though mighty and mellow be born at
 once.
 Sweet for the future, — strong for the nonce!
 Stuff you should stow away, ensconce In the deep and dark, to be found fast-
 fixed
 At the century's close: such time strength spends
 A-sweetening for my friends!

xv.

And then — why, what you quaff
 With a smack of lip and a cluck of tongue,
 Is leakage and leakings — just what haps
 From the tun some learned taster taps With a promise "Prepare your watery chaps!
 Here's properest wine for old and young!
 Dispute its perfection — you make us
 laugh!
 Have faith, give thanks, but — quaff!"

xvi.

Leakage, I say, or — worse — Leakings suffice pot-valiant souls.
 Somebody, brimful, long ago, Frothed flagon he drained to the dregs;
 and lo,
 Down whisker and beard what an over-
 flow!
 Lick spilt that has trickled from classic jowls,
 Sup the single scene, sip the only verse — Old wine, not new and worse!

xvii.

I grant you: worse by much!
 Renounce that new where you never gained
 One glow at heart, one gleam at head,
 And stick to the warrant of age instead!

No dwarf's-lap! Fatten, by giants fed!
 You fatten, with oceans of drink un-drained?
 You feed — who would choke did a cobweb smutch
 The Age you love so much?

xviii.

A mine's beneath a moor:
 Acres of moor roof fathoms of mine Which diamonds dot where you please to dig;
 Yet who plies spade for the bright and big?
 Your product is — truffles, you hunt with a pig!
 Since bright-and-big, when a man would dine,
 Suits badly: and therefore the Koh-i-noor May sleep in mine 'neath moor!

xix.

Wine, pulse in might from me!
 It may never emerge in must from vat, Never fill cask nor furnish can,
 Never end sweet, which strong began — God's gift to gladden the heart of man;
 But spirit's at proof, I promise that!
 No sparing of juice spoils what should be Fit brewage — mine for me.

xx.

Man's thoughts and loves and hates!
 Earth is my vineyard, these grew there:
 From grape of the ground, I made or marred My vintage; easy the task or hard,
 Who set it — his praise be my reward!
 Earth's yield! Who yearn for the Dark Blue Sea's,
 Let them "lay, pray, bray" — the addlepates!
 Mine be Man's thoughts, loves, hates!

xxi.

But someone says "Good Sir!" ('Tis a worthy versed in what concerns The making such labour turn out well)
 "You don't suppose that the nosegay-smell Needs always come from the grape?
 Each bell
 At your foot, each bud that your culture spurns,
 The very cowslip would act like myrrh
 On the stiffest brew — good Sir!

xxii.

"Cowslips, abundant birth
 O'er meadow and hillside, vineyard too,
 — Like a schoolboy's scrawlings in and out Distasteful lesson-book — all about Greece and Rome, victory and rout — Love-verses instead of such vain ado!
 So, fancies frolic it o'er the earth
 Where thoughts have rightlier birth.

XXIII.

"Nay, thoughtlings they themselves: Loves, hates—in little and less and
 least!
 Thoughts? 'What is a man beside a mount!'
 Loves? *'Absent—poor lovers the minutes
 count!'*
 Hates? 'Fie—Pope's letters to Martha Blount!'
 These furnish a wine for a children's-
 feast:
 Insipid to man, they suit the elves Like thoughts, loves, hates themselves."

XXIV.

And, friends, beyond dispute 10 I too have the cowslips dewy and dear.
 Punctual as Springtide forth peep they:
 I leave them to make my meadow gay.
 But I ought to pluck and impound them,
 ah?
 Not let them alone, but deftly shear
 And shred and reduce to — what may suit Children, beyond dispute?

XXV.

And here's May-month, all bloom,
 All bounty: what if I sacrifice?
 If I out with shears and shear, nor stop 20 Shearing till prostrate, lo, the crop?
 And will you prefer it to ginger-pop When I've made you wine of the memories Which leave as bare as a churchyard tomb
 My meadow, late all bloom?

XXVI.

Nay, what ingratitude Should I hesitate to amuse the wits That have pulled so long at my flask, nor grudged
 The headache that paid their pains, nor budged From bungle before they sighed and judged
 "Too rough for our taste, to-day, befits
 The racy and right when the years conclude!"
 Out on ingratitude!

XXVII.

Grateful or ingrate — none,
 No cowslip of all my fairy crew Shall help to concoct what makes you wink And goes to your head till you think you
 think!
 I like them alive: the printer's ink
 Would sensibly tell on the perfume too.
 I may use up my nettles, ere I've done;
 But of cowslips — friends get none! 4

XXVIII.

Don't nettles make a broth Wholesome for blood grown lazy and thick?
 Maws out of sorts make mouths out of taste
 My Thirty-four Port — no need to waste
 On a tongue that's fur and a palate — paste!
 A magnum for friends who are sound!
 The sick —
 I'll posset and cosset them, nothing loth, Henceforward with nettle-broth!

THE AGAMEMNON OF ÆSCHYLUS.

1877.

MAY I be permitted to chat a little, by way of recreation, at the end of a somewhat tedious and perhaps fruitless adventure;

If, because of the immense fame of the following Tragedy, I wished to acquaint myself with it, and could only do so by the help of a translator, I should require him to be literal at every cost save that of absolute violence to our language. The use of certain allowable constructions which, happening to be out of daily favour, are all the more appropriate to archaic workmanship, is no violence: but I would be tolerant for once, — in the case of so immensely famous an original, of even a clumsy attempt to furnish me with the very turn of each phrase in as Greek a fashion as English will bear: while, with respect to amplifications and embellishments, — anything rather than, with the good farmer, experience that most signal of mortifications, “to gape for Æschylus and get Theognis.” I should especially decline, — what may appear to brighten up a passage, — the employment of a new word for some old one — πένος, or μέγας, or τέλος, with its congeners, occurring four times in three lines: for though such substitution may be in itself perfectly justifiable, yet this exercise of ingenuity ought to be within the competence of the unaided English reader if he likes to show himself ingenious. Learning Greek teaches Greek, and nothing else: certainly not common sense, if that have failed to precede the teaching. Further, — if I obtained a mere strict bald version of thing by thing, or at least word pregnant with thing, I should hardly look for an impossible transmission of the reputed magniloquence and sonority of the Greek; and this with the less regret, inasmuch as there is abundant musicality elsewhere, but nowhere else than in his poem the ideas of the poet. And lastly, when presented with these ideas, I should expect the result to prove very hard reading indeed if it were meant to resemble Æschylus, ἐνυβαλεῖν οὐ ῥάδιος, “not easy to understand,” in the opinion of his stoutest advocate among the ancients; while, I suppose, even modern scholarship sympathises with that early declaration of the redoubtable Salmasius, when, looking about for an example of the truly obscure for the benefit of those who found obscurity in the sacred books, he protested that this particular play leaves them all behind in this respect, with their “Hebraisms, Syriasms, Hellenisms, and the whole of such bag and baggage.”¹ For, over and above the purposed ambiguity of the Chorus, the text is sadly corrupt, probably interpolated, and certainly mutilated; and no unlearned person enjoys the scholar’s privilege of trying his fancy upon each obstacle whenever he comes to a stoppage, and effectually clearing the way by suppressing what seems to lie in it. 70

All I can say for the present performance is, that I have done as I would be done by, if need were. Should anybody, without need, honour my translation by a comparison with the original, I beg him to observe that, following no editor exclusively, I keep to the earlier readings so long as sense can be made out of them, but disregard, I hope, little of importance in recent criticism so far as I have fallen in with it. Fortunately, the poorest translation, provided only it be faithful, — though it reproduce all the artistic confusion of tenses, moods, and persons, with which the original teems, — will not only suffice to display what an eloquent friend maintains to be the all-in-all of poetry — “the action of the piece” — but may help to illustrate his assurance that “the Greeks are the highest models of expression, the unapproached masters of the grand style: their expression is so excellent because it is so admirably kept in its right degree of prominence, because it is so simple and so well subordinated, because it draws its force directly from the pregnancy of the matter which it conveys . . . not a word wasted, not a sentiment capriciously thrown in, stroke on stroke!”² So may all happen! 104

Just a word more on the subject of my

spelling — in a transcript from the Greek and there exclusively — Greek names and places precisely as does the Greek author. I began this practice, with great innocency of intention, some six-and-thirty years ago. Leigh Hunt, I remember, was accustomed to speak of his gratitude, when ignorant of Greek, to those writers (like Goldsmith) who had obliged him by using English characters, so that he might relish, for instance, the smooth quality of such a phrase as “hapalunetai galené;” he said also that Shelley was indignant at “Firenze” having displaced the Dantesque “Firenza,” and would contemptuously English the intruder “Firence.” I supposed I was doing a simple thing enough: but there has been till lately much astonishment at os and us, ai and oi, representing the same letters in Greek. Of a sudden, however, whether in translation or out of it, everybody seems committing the offence, although the adoption of u for v still presents such difficulty that it is a wonder how we have hitherto escaped “Eyrripides.” But there existed a sturdy Briton who, Ben Jonson informs us, wrote “The Life of the Emperor Anthony Pie” — whom we now acquiesce in as Antoninus Pius: for “with time and patience the mulberry leaf becomes satin.” Yet there is, on all sides, much profession of respect for what Keats called “vowelled Greek” — “consonanted,” one would expect; and, in a criticism upon a late admirable translation of something of my own, it was deplored that, in a certain verse corresponding in measure to the fourteenth of the sixth Pythian Ode, “neither Professor Jebb in his Greek, nor Mr. Browning in his English, could emulate that matchlessly musical γόνον ἰδών κάλλιστον ἀνδρῶν.” Now, undoubtedly, “Seeing her son the fairest of men” has more sense than sound to boast of: but then, would not an Italian roll us out “Rimirando il figliuolo bellissimo degli uomini!” whercat Pindar, no less than Professor Jebb and Mr. Browning, τριακῆτος οἶχεται τυχῶν.

It is recorded in the annals of Art¹ that there was once upon a time, practising so far north as Stockholm, a painter and picture-cleaner — sire of a less unhappy son — Old Muytens: and the annalist, Baron de Tessé, has not concealed his profound dissatisfaction at Old Muytens’ conceit “to have himself had something to do with the work of whatever master of eminence might pass through his hands.” Whence it was, — the Baron goes on to deplore, — that much detriment was done to that excellent piece “The Recognition of Achilles,” by Rubens, through the perversity of Old Muytens, “who must needs take on him to beautify every nymph of the twenty by the bestowment of a widened eye and an enlarged mouth.” I, at least, have left eyes and mouths everywhere as I found them, and this conservatism is all that claims praise for — what is, after all ἀκένυστος ἄμισθος ἀοιδά. No, neither “uncommanded” nor “unrewarded”: since it was commanded of me by my venerated friend Thomas Carlyle, and rewarded will it indeed become if I am permitted to dignify it by the prefatory insertion of his dear and noble name.

WARDER.

THE gods I ask deliverance from these labours,

Watch of a year's length whereby, slumbering through it

On the Atreidae's roofs on elbow, — dog-like —

I know of nightly star-groups the assemblage,

And those that bring to men winter and summer

Bright dynasts, as they pride them in the æther

— Stars, when they wither, and the uprisings of them.

And now on ward I wait the torch's token,

The glow of fire, shall bring from Troia message

And word of capture: so prevails audacious

The man's-way-planning hoping heart of woman.

But when I, driven from night-rest, dew-drenched hold to

This couch of mine — not looked upon by visions,

Since fear instead of sleep still stands beside me,

So as that fast I fix in sleep no eyelids —

And when to sing or chirp a tune I fancy,
 For slumber such song-remedy infusing, I wail then, for this House's fortune
 groaning,
 Not, as of old, after the best ways governed.
 Now, lucky be deliverance from these labours,
 At good news — the appearing dusky fire!
 O hail, thou lamp of night, a day long lightness Revealing, and of dances the ordainment!
 Halloo, halloo!
 To Agamemnon's wife I show, by shout-
 ing,
 That, from bed starting up at once, i' the household Joyous acclaim, good-omened to this torch-blaze,
 She send aloft, if haply Ilion's city Be taken, as the beacon boasts announcing.
 Ay, and, for me, myself will dance a prelude,
 For, that my masters' dice drop right, I'll reckon: Since thrice-six has it thrown to me, this signal.
 Well, may it hap that, as he comes, the loved hand
 O' the household's lord I may sustain with this hand!
 As for the rest, I'm mute: on tongue a big ox Has trodden. Yet this House, if voice it take should,
 Most plain would speak. So, willing I myself speak
 To those who know: to who know not — I'm blankness.

CHOROS.

The tenth year this, since Priamos' great
 match,
 King Menelaos, Agamemnon King,
 —The strenuous yoke-pair of the Atrei-dai's honour
 Two-throned, two-sceptred, whereof Zeus was donor —
 Did from this land the aid, the armament
 dispatch,
 The thousand-sailed force of Argives clamouring 30 "Ares" from out the indignant breast, as fling Passion forth vultures which, because of grief Away, — as are their young ones, — with the thief,
 Lofty above their brood-nests wheel in ring,
 Row round and round with oar of either
 wing,

Lament the bedded chicks, lost labour that was love:
 Which hearing, one above — Whether Apollon, Pan or Zeus — that
 wail,
 Sharp-piercing bird-shriek of the guests who fare Housemates with gods in air — Suchanone sends, against who these assail, 40
 What, late-sent, shall not fail Of punishing — Erinus. Here as there, The Guardian of the Guest, Zeus, the excelling one,
 Sends against Alexandros either son Of Atreus: for that wife, the many-husbanded,
 Appointing many a tug that tries the limb, While the knee plays the prop in dust, while, shred
 To morsels, lies the spear-shaft; in those grim Marriage-prolusions when their Fury wed Danaoi and Troes, both alike. All's said: 50 Things are where things are, and, as fate has willed,
 So shall they be fulfilled.
 Not gently-grieving, not just doling out The drops of expiation — no, nor tears distilled — Shall he we know of bring the hard about To soft — that intense ire
 At those mock rites unsanctified by fire.
 But we pay nought here: through our flesh, age-weighted, Left out from who gave aid
 In that day, — we remain, 60 Staying on staves a strength
 The equal of a child's at length.
 For when young marrow in the breast doth
 reign,
 That's the old mæn's match, — Ares out of
 place
 In either: but in oldest age's case, Foliage a-fading, why, he wends his way On three feet, and, no stronger than a
 child,
 Wanders about gone wild,
 A dream in day.
 But thou, Tundareus' daughter, Klutaim- 70
 nestra queen, What need? What new? What having heard or seen,
 By what announcement's tidings, every-
 where Settest thou, round about, the sacrifice a-flare?
 For, of all gods the city-swaying,
 Those supernal, those infernal, Those of the 'fields', those of the mart's obeying, —
 The altars blaze with gifts;
 And here and there, heaven-high the torch uplifts

- Flame — medicated with persuasions mild, With foul admixture unbeguiled —
 Of holy unguent, from the clotted chrism Brought from the palace, safe in its abysm.
 Of these things, speaking what may be indeed
 Both possible and lawful to concede, Healer do thou become! — of this solici-
 tude
 Which, now, stands plainly forth of evil
 mood,
 And, then . . . but from oblations, hope,
 to-day
- 70 Gracious, appearing, wards away
 From soul the insatiate care,
 The sorrow at my breast, devouring there!
 Empowered am I to sing
 The omens, what their force which, journeying,
 Rejoiced the potentates:
 (For still, from God, inflates My breast song-suasion: age, Born to the business, still such war can wage)
 — How the fierce bird against the Teukris
 land
- 20 Dispatched, with spear and executing hand, The Achaian's two-throned empery — o'er Hellas' youth
 Two rulers with one mind:
 The birds' king to these kings of ships, on high,
 — The black sort, and the sort that's white behind, — Appearing by the palace, on the spear-throw side,
 In right sky-regions, visible far and wide, — Devouring a hare-creature, great with
 young,
 Baulked of more racings they, as she from whom they sprung!
 Ah, Linos,¹ say — ah, Linos, song of wail!
- 30 But may the good prevail!
- The prudent army-prophet seeing two
 The Atreidai, two their tempers, knew Those feasting on the hare
 The armament-conductors were;
 And thus he spoke, explaining signs in
 view.
 "In time, this outset takes the town of Priamos:
 But all before its towers, — the people's wealth that was,
 Of flocks and herds, — as sure, shall booty-sharing thence Drain to the dregs away, by battle violence.
- 40 Only, have care lest grudge of any god disturb With cloud the unsullied shine of that great force, the curb Of Troia, struck with damp
- Beforehand in the camp!
 For envyingly is The virgin Artemis Toward — her father's flying hounds — this House —
 The sacrificers of the piteous
 And cowering beast, Brood and all, ere the birth: she hates the eagles' feast.
 Ah, Linos, say — ah, Linos, song of wail!
 But may the good prevail!
- "Thus ready is the beauteous one with
 help
 To those small dewdrop-things fierce lions whelp,
 And udder-loving litter of each brute That roams the mead; and therefore makes she suit,
 The fair one, for fulfilment to the end Of things these signs portend — Which partly smile, indeed but partly scowl —
 The phantasms of the fowl.
 I call Ieios Paian² to avert
 She work the Danaoi hurt
 By any thwarting waftures, long and fast Holdings from sail of ships:
 And sacrifice, another than the last,
 She for herself precipitate — Something unlawful, feast for no man's lips,
 Builder of quarrels, with the House cognate —
 Having in awe no husband: for remains A frightful, backward-darting in the path, Wily house-keeping chronicler of wrath, 7 That has to punish that old children's
 fate!"
- Such things did Kalchas, — with abundant gains
 As well, — vociferate, Predictions from the birds, in journeying, Above the abode of either king.
 With these, symphonious, sing —
 Ah, Linos, say — ah, Linos, song of wail!
 But may the good prevail!
- Zeus, whosoe'er he be, — if that express Aught dear to him on whom I call — 8
 So do I him address.
 I cannot liken out, by all Admeasurement of powers,
 Any but Zeus for refuge at such hours, If veritably needs I must From off my soul its vague care-burthen
 thrust.
- Not — whosoever was the great of yore, Bursting to bloom with bravery all
 round —
 Is in our mouths: he was, but is no more.
 And who it was that after came to be, 9

Met the thrice-throwing wrestler, — he Is also gone to ground.
But "Zeus" — if any, heart and soul, that
name —

Shouting the triumph-praise — proclaim, Complete in judgment shall that man be
found.

Zeus, who leads onward mortals to be wise,
Appoints that suffering masterfully teach.
In sleep, before the heart of each,

A woe-remembering travail sheds in dew Discretion, — ay, and melts the unwilling
too

By what, perchance, may be a gracious-
ness

Of gods, enforced no less, —
As they, commanders of the crew, Assume the awful seat.

And then the old leader of the Achaian fleet,

Disparaging no seer —

With bated breath to suit misfortune's inrush here

— (What time it laboured, that Achaian
host,

By stay from sailing, — every pulse at length

Emptied of vital strength, —

Hard over Kalchis shore-bound, current-crossed

In Aulis station, — while the winds which post

From Strumon, ill-delayers, famine-
fraught,

Tempters of man to sail where harbourage is naught,

Spendthrifts of ships and cables, turning
time

To twice the length, — these carded, by delay,

To less and less away

The Argeians' flowery prime:

And when a remedy more grave and grand Than aught before, — yea, for the storm and dearth, —

The prophet to the foremost in command Shricked forth, as cause of this

Adducing Artemis,

So that the Atreidai striking staves on
earth

Could not withhold the tear) —

Then did the king, the elder, speak this clear.

"Heavy the fate, indeed, — to disobey!
Yet heavy if my child I slay,

The adornment of my household: with the tide

Of virgin-slaughter, at the altar-side,
A father's hands defiling: which the way

Without its evils, say?

How shall I turn fleet-fugitive,

Failing of duty to allies?

Since for a wind-abating sacrifice

And virgin blood, — 'tis right they strive,
Nay, madden with desire.
Well may it work them — this that they require!"

But when he underwent necessity's Yoke-trace, — from soul blowing un- 50 hallowed change

Unclean, abominable, — thence — another man —

The audacious mind of him began

Its wildest range.

For this it is gives mortals hardihood —

Some vice-devising miserable mood

Of madness, and first woe of all the brood.

The sacrificer of his daughter —
strange! —

He dared become, to expedite

Woman-avenging warfare, — anchors weighed

With such prelusive rite!

60

Prayings and callings "Father" — naught they made

Of these, and of the virgin-age, —

Captains heart-set on war to wage!

His ministrants, vows done, the father
bade —

Kid-like, above the altar, swathed in pall, Take her — lift high, and have no fear at
all,

Head-downward, and the fair mouth's
guard

And frontage hold, — press hard

From utterance a curse against the House
By dint of bit — violence bridling speech. 70

And as to ground her saffron-vest she shed,
She smote the sacrificers all and each

With arrow sweet and piteous,

From the eye only sped, —

Significant of will to use a word,

Just as in pictures: since, full many a
time,

In her sire's guest-hall, by the well-heaped
board

Had she made music, — lovingly with chime

Of her chaste voice, that unpolluted thing, Honoured the third libation, — paian that 80 should bring

Good fortune to the sire she loved so well.

What followed — those things I nor saw nor tell.

But Kalchas' arts, — whate'er they indicate, —

Miss of fulfilment never: it is fate.

True, justice makes, in sufferers, a desire To know the future woe preponderate.

But — hear before is need?

To that, farewell and welcome! 'tis the same, indeed,

As grief beforehand: clearly, part for
part,

Conformably to Kalchas' art,
Shall come the event.
And be they as they may, things subsequent, —

What is to do, prosperity betide E'en as we wish it! — we, the next allied,
Sole guarding barrier of the Apian land.

I am come, reverencing power in thee,
O Klutaimnestra! For 'tis just we bow To the ruler's wife, — the male-seat man-bereaved.

10 But if thou, having heard good news, — or none, —

For good news' hope dost sacrifice thus
wide,

I would hear gladly: art thou mute, — no grudge!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Good-news-announcer, may — as is the by-word —

Morn become, truly, — news from Night his mother!

But thou shalt learn joy past all hope of How sayest? The word, from want of faith, escaped me.

CHOROS.

Joy overcreeps me, calling forth the tear-drop.

CHOROS.

But has there puffed thee up some un-winged omen?

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

As a young maid's my mind thou mockest grossly.

CHOROS.

Well, at what time was — even sacked, the city?

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Of this same mother Night — the dawn, I tell thee.

CHOROS.

And who of messengers could reach this swiftness?

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Hephaistos¹ — sending a bright blaze from Ide.

Beacon did beacon send, from fire the poster,

Hitherward: Ide to the rock Hermaian Of Lemnos: and a third great torch o' the island

Zeus' seat received in turn, the Athoan summit.

And, — so upsoaring as to stride sea over,
The strong lamp-voyager, and all for joyance —

Did the gold-glorious splendour, any sun
like,

Pass on — the pine-tree — to Makistos' watch-place;

Who did not, — tardy, — caught, no wits about him,

By sleep, — decline his portion of the missive.

And far the beacon's light, on stream Euripos

Arriving, made aware Messapios' warders, And up they lit in turn, played herald onwards,

Kindling with flame a heap of grey old heather.

And, strengthening still, the lamp, decaying nowise,

Springing o'er Plain Asopos, — full-moon-fashion

Effulgent, — toward the crag of Mount Kithairon,

Roused a new rendering-up of fire the escort —

And light, far escort, lacked no recognition

O' the guard — as burning more than burnings told you.

And over Lake Gorgopis light went leap-
ing,

And, at Mount Aigioplanktos safe arriving, Enforced the law — "to never stint the fire-stuff."

And they send, lighting up with ungrudged vigour,

Of flame a huge beard, ay, the very fore-
land

So as to strike above, in burning onward,
The look-out which commands the Strait Saronic.

Then did it dart until it reached the outpost

Mount Arachnaïos here, the city's neighbour;

And then darts to this roof of the Atreidai
This light of Ide's fire not unforefathered!
Such are the rules prescribed the flambeau-bearers:

He beats that's first and also last in running.

10 Such is the proof and token I declare thee, My husband having sent me news from Troia.

CHOROS.

The gods, indeed, anon will I pray,
woman!

But now, these words to hear, and sate my wonder

Thoroughly, I am fain — if twice thou tell them.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Troia do the Achaioi hold, this same day.
I think a noise — no mixture — reigns i'
the city.

Sour wine and unguent pour thou in one vessel —

Standers-apart, not lovers, wouldst thou style them:

And so, of captives and of conquerors, partwise

20 The voices are to hear, of fortune diverse.
For those, indeed, upon the bodies prostrate

Of husbands, brothers, children upon parents

- The old men, from a throat that's free
no longer,

Shriekingly wail the death-doom of their dearest:

While these — the after-battle hungry
labour,

Which prompts the death-faring, marshals them to breakfast

On the town's store, according to no billet

Of sharing, but as each drew lot of fortune.

In the spear-captured Troic habitations

30 House they already: from the frosts upathral

And dews delivered, will they, luckless creatures,

Without a watch to keep, slumber all night
through.

And if they fear the gods, the city-guarders,
And the gods' structures of the conquered country,

They may not — capturers — soon in turn be captive.

But see no prior lust befall the army To sack things sacred — by gain-cravings vanquished!

For there needs homeward the return's salvation,

To round the new limb back o' the double race-course.

And guilty to the gods if came the army, 44 Awakened up the sorrow of those slaughtered

Might be — should no outbursting evils happen.

But may good beat — no turn to see i' the balance!

For, many benefits I want the gain of.

CHOROS.

Woman, like prudent man thou kindly speakest.

And I, thus having heard thy trusty tokens,

The gods to rightly hail forthwith prepare me;

For, grace that must be paid has crowned our labours.

O Zeus the king, and friendly Night

Of these brave boons bestower — 50 Thou who didst fling on Troia's every

tower
The o'er-roofing snare, that neither great thing might,

Nor any of the young ones, overpass Captivity's great sweep-net — one and all

Of Ate held in thrall!

Ay, Zeus I fear — the guest's friend great — who was

The doer of this, and long since bent
The bow on Alexandros with intent

That neither wide o' the white Nor o'er the stars the foolish dart should 60

light.
The stroke of Zeus — they have it, as men
say!

This, at least, from the source track forth we may!

As he ordained, so has he done.
"No" — said someone —

"The gods think fit to care Nowise for mortals, such

As those by whom the good and fair
Of things denied their touch

Is trampled!" but he was profane.
That they do care, has been made plain 74

To offspring of the over-bold, Outbreathing "Ares" greater than is

just — Houses that spill with more than they can
hold,

More than is best for man. Be man's what must

Keep harm off, so that in himself he find

Sufficiency — the well-endowed of mind!
 For there's no bulwark in man's wealth to
 him Who, through a surfeit, kicks — into the dim
 And disappearing — Right's great altar.

Yes —

It urges him, the sad persuasiveness, Ate's insufferable child that schemes Treason beforehand: and all cure is vain.
 It is not hidden: out it glares again, A light dread-lamping-mischief, just as gleams

10 The badness of the bronze;
 Through rubbing, puttings to the touch,
 Black-clotted is he, judged at once.
 He seeks — the boy — a flying bird to clutch,
 The insufferable brand Setting upon the city of his land Whereof not any god hears prayer; While him who brought about such evils
 there,
 That unjust man, the god in grapple throws.

Such an one, Paris goes 20 Within the Atreidai's house — Shamed the guest's board by robbery of the spouse.

And, leaving to her townsmen throngs a-spread With shields, and spear-thrusts of sea-armament,
 And bringing Ilion, in a dowry's stead, Destruction — swiftly through the gates she went,
 Daring the undareable. But many a groan outbroke From prophets of the House as thus they spoke.

"Woe, woe the House, the House and Rulers, — woe

30 The marriage-bed and dints
 A husband's love imprints!
 There she stands silent! meets no honour
 — no
 Shame — sweetest still to see of things gone
 long ago!

And, through desire of one across the
 main,
 A ghost will seem within the house to
 reign:

And hateful to the husband is the grace Of well-shaped statues: from — in place of eyes
 Those blanks — all Aphrodite dies.

"But dream-appearing mournful fantasies —
 There they stand, bringing grace that's
 vain.

For vain 'tis, when brave things one seems to view;

The fantasy has floated off, hands through; Gone, that appearance, — nowise left to creep, —

On wings, the servants in the paths of
 sleep!"

Woes, then, in household and on hearth, are such

As these — and woes surpassing these by
 much.

But not these only: everywhere —
 For those who from the land Of Hellas issued in a band, Sorrow, the heart must bear, Sits in the home of each, conspicuous
 there.

Many a circumstance, at least,
 Touches the very breast.

For those Whom any sent away, — he knows:

 And in the live man's stead, Armour and ashes reach
 The house of each.

For Ares, gold-exchanger for the dead, And balance-holder in the fight o' the
 spear,

Due-weight from Ilion sends — What moves the tear on tear —
 A charred scrap to the friends:
 Filling with well-packed ashes every urn,
 For man — that was — the sole return.
 And they groan — praising much, the
 while,

Now this man as experienced in the strife,
 Now that, fallen nobly on a slaughtered
 pile,

Because of — not his own — another's
 wife.

But things there be, one barks,
 When no man harks:

A surreptitious grief that's grudge Against the Atreidai who first sought the
 judge.

But some there, round the rampart, have In Ilian earth, each one his grave:
 All fair-formed as at birth, It hid them — what they have and hold — the hostile earth.

And big with anger goes the city's word,
 And pays a debt by public curse incurred
 And ever with me — as about to hear A something night-involved — remain:
 my fear:

Since of the many-slayers — not Unwatching are the gods.

The black Erinues, at due periods — Whoever gains the lot

Of fortune with no right —

Him, by life's strain and stress Back-again-beaten from success,

They strike blind: and among the out-of-sight For who has got to be, avails no might.
 The being praised outrageously Is grave, for at the eyes of such an one Is launched, from Zeus, the thunder-stone.
 Therefore do I decide For so much and no more prosperity Than of his envy passes unespied.
 Neither a city-sacker would I be, 10 Nor life, myself by others captive, see.

A swift report has gone our city through,
 From fire, the good-news messenger: if true,
 Who knows? Or is it not a god-sent lie?
 Who is so childish and deprived of sense That, having, at announcements of the flame Thus novel, felt his own heart fired thereby,
 He then shall at a change of evidence,
 Be worsted just the same?
 It is conspicuous in a woman's nature, 20 Before its view to take a grace for granted:
 Too trustful, — on her boundary, usurpature Is swiftly made;
 But swiftly, too, decayed,
 The glory perishes by woman vaunted.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Soon shall we know — of these light-bearing torches, And beacons and exchanges, fire with fire —
 If they are true, indeed, or if, dream-fashion,
 This gladsome light came and deceived our judgment.
 Yon herald from the shore I see, o'er-shadowed 30 With boughs of olive: dust, mud's thirsty brother, Close neighbours on his garb, thus testify me That neither voiceless, nor yet kindling for thee Mountain-wood-flame, shall he explain by fire-smoke:
 But either tell out more the joyance, speaking.
 Word contrary to which, I aught but love it!
 For may good be — to good that's known — — appendage!

CHOROS.

Whoever prays for aught else to this city — May he himself reap fruit of his mind's error!

HERALD.

Ha, my forefathers' soil of earth Argeian!
 40 Thee, in this year's tenth light, am I re-turned to —

Of many broken hopes, on one hope chancing;
 For never prayed I, in this earth Argeian Dying, to share my part in tomb the dearest.
 Now, hail thou earth, and hail thou also, sunlight,
 And Zeus, the country's lord, and king the Puthian
 From bow no longer urging at us arrows!
 Enough, beside Skamandros, cam'st thou adverse:

Now, contrary, be saviour thou and healer, O king Apollon! And gods conquest-granting,

All — I invoke too, and my tutelary 50
 Hermes, dear herald, heralds' veneration, —

And Heroes our forthsenders. — friendly, once more

The army to receive, the war-spear's leavings!

Ha, mansions of my monarchs, roofs beloved,

And awful seats, and deities sun-fronting —

Receive with pomp your monarch, long time absent!

For he comes bringing light in night-time to you,

In common with all these — king Agamemnon.

But kindly greet him — for clear shows your duty —

Who has dug under Troia with the mat- 60 tock

Of Zeus the Avenger, whereby plains are out-ploughed,

Altars unrecognisable, and gods' shrines, And the whole land's seed thoroughly has perished.

And such a yoke-strap having cast round Troia,

The elder king Atreides happy man — he Comes to be honoured, worthiest of what mortals

Now are. Nor Paris nor the accomplice-city

Outvaunts their deed as more than they are done-by:

For, in a suit for rape and theft found guilty,

He missed of plunder and, in one destruc- 70
 tion,

Fatherland, house and home has mowed to atoms:

Debts the Priamidai have paid twice over.

CHOROS.

Hail, herald from the army of Achaïans!

HERALD.

I hail: — to die, will gainsay gods no longer!

CHOROS.

Love of this fatherland did exercise thee?

HERALD.

So that I weep, at least, with joy, my eyes full.

CHOROS.

What, of this gracious sickness were ye gainers?

HERALD.

How now? instructed, I this speech shall master.

CHOROS.

For those who loved you back, with longing stricken.

HERALD.

This land yearned for the yearning army, say'st thou?

CHOROS.

So as to set me oft, from dark mind,
groaning.

HERALD.

Whence came this ill mind — hatred to the army?

CHOROS.

Of old, I use, for mischief's physic, silence.

HERALD.

10 And how, the chiefs away, did you fear any?

CHOROS.

So that now, — late thy word, — much joy were — dying!

HERALD.

For well have things been worked out:
these, — in much time,

Some of them, one might say, had luck in falling,

While some were faulty: since who, gods excepted,

Goes, through the whole time of his life, ungrieving?

For labours should I tell of, and bad lodgments,

Narrow deckways ill-strewn, too, — what the day's woe

We did not groan at getting for our portion?

As for land-things, again, on went more hatred!

10 Since beds were ours hard by the foemen's ramparts,

And, out of heaven and from the earth, the meadow

Dews kept a-sprinkle, an abiding damage Of vestures, making hair a wild-beast matting.

Winter, too, if one told of it — bird-sky-
ing —

Such as, unbearable, Idaian snow
brought —

Or heat, when waveless, on its noontide couches

Without a wind, the sea would slumber falling

— Why must one mourn these? O'er and gone is labour:

O'er and gone is it, even to those dead
ones,

So that no more again they mind uprising, Why must we tell in numbers those deprived ones,

And the live man be vexed with fate's fresh outbreak?

Rather, I bid full farewell to misfortunes!
For us, the left from out the Argeian army,

The gain beats, nor does sorrow counterbalance.

So that 'tis fitly boasted of, this sunlight,
By us, o'er sea and land the aery flyers,

"Troia at last taking, the band of Argives Hang up such trophies to the gods of Hellas

Within their domes — new glory to grow ancient!"

Such things men having heard must praise
the city

And army-leaders: and the grace which wrought them —

Of Zeus, shall honoured be. Thou hast my whole word.

CHOROS.

O'ercome by words, their sense I do not gainsay.

For, aye this breeds youth in the old —
"to learn well."

But these things most the house and Klutaimnestra

Concern, 'tis likely: while they make me rich, too.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

I shouted long ago, indeed, for joyance, When came that first night-messenger of
fire

Proclaiming Ilion's capture and dispersion.
And someone, girding me, said, "Through fire-bearers

Persuaded — Troia to be sacked now, thinkest?

Truly, the woman's way, — high to lift heart up!"

By such words I was made seem witbewildered:

Yet still I sacrificed; and, — female-song
with, —

A shout one man and other, through the city,

Set up, congratulating in the gods' seats.

Soothing the incense-eating flame right fragrant.

And now, what's more, indeed, why need'st thou tell me?

I of the king himself shall learn the whole word:

And, — as may best be, — I my revered husband

Shall hasten, as he comes back, to receive: for —

What's to a wife sweeter to see than this light

(Her husband, by the god saved, back from warfare)

So as to open gates? This tell my husband —

To come at soonest to his loving city.

o A faithful wife at home may he find, coming!

Such an one as he left — the dog o' the household —

Trusty to him, adverse to the ill-minded, And, in all else, the same: no signet-impress

Having done harm to, in that time's duration.

I know nor pleasure, nor blameworthy converse

With any other man more than — bronze-dippings!

HERALD.

Such boast as this — brimful of the veracious —

Is, for a high-born dame, not bad to send forth!

CHOROS.

Ay, she spoke thus to thee — that hast a knowledge

o From clear interpreters — a speech most seemly.

But speak thou, herald! Meneleus I ask of:

If he, returning, back in safety also

Will come with you — this land's beloved chieftain?

HERALD.

There's no way I might say things false and pleasant

For friends to reap the fruits of through a long time.

CHOROS.

How then if, speaking good, things true thou chance on?

HERALD.

For not well-hidden things become they, sundered.

The man has vanished from the Achaic army,

He and his ship too. I announce no falsehood.

CHOROS.

Whether forth-putting openly from Ilion, 30
Or did storm — wide woe — snatch him from the army?

HERALD.

Like topping bowman, thou hast touched the target,

And a long sorrow hast succinctly spoken.

CHOROS.

Whether, then, of him, as a live or dead man

Was the report by other sailors bruited?

HERALD.

Nobody knows so as to tell out clearly Excepting Helios who sustains earth's nature.

CHOROS.

How say'st thou then, did storm the naval army

Attack and end, by the celestials' anger?

HERALD.

It suits not to defile a day auspicious 40
With ill-announcing speech: distinct each god's due:

And when a messenger with gloomy visage
To a city bears a fall'n host's woes — God ward off! —

One popular wound that happens to the city,

And many sacrificed from many households —

Men, scourged by that two-thonged whip Ares loves so,

Double spear-headed curse, bloody yoke-couple, —

Of woes like these, doubtless, whoe'er comes weighted,

Him does it suit to sing the Erinues' paian.

But who, of matters saved a glad-news- 50
bringer,

Comes to a city in good estate rejoicing. . . .

How shall I mix good things with evil, telling

Of storm against the Achaioi, urged by gods' wrath?

For they swore league, being arch-foes before that,

Fire and the sea: and plighted troth approved they,

Destroying the unhappy Argeian army.

At night began the bad-wave-outbreak evils;

For, ships against each other Threikian breezes Shattered: and these, butted at in a fury

By storm and typhoon, with surge rain-resounding, — Off they went, vanished, thro' a bad herd's whirling.
And, when returned the brilliant light of Helios,
We view the Aigaian sea on flower with corpses
Of men Achaian and with naval ravage.
But us indeed, and ship, unhurt i' the hull
too,
Either someone outstole us or outprayed
us —

Some god — no man it was the tiller touching.

And Fortune, saviour, willing on our ship sat.

10 So as it neither had in harbour wave-surge

Nor ran aground against a shore all rocky.
And then, the water-Haides having fled
from

In the white day, not trusting to our fer-
tune,

We chewed the cud in thoughts — this novel sorrow

O' the army labouring and badly pounded.
And now — if anyone of them is breathing —

They talk of us as having perished: why
not?

And we — that they the same fate have,
imagine.

May it be for the best! Meneleos, then,

20 Foremost and specially to come, expect thou!

If (that is) any ray o' the sun reports him Living and seeing to — by Zeus' contrivings,

Not yet disposed to quite destroy the lineage —

Some hope is he shall come again to household.

Having heard such things, know, thou truth art hearing!

CHOROS.

Who may he have been that named thus wholly with exactitude —

(Was he someone whom we see not, by forecastings of the future

Guiding tongue in happy mood?)

— Her with battle for a bridegroom, on all sides contention-wooded,

30 Helena? Since — mark the suture! —

Ship's-Hell, Man's-Hell, City's-Hell, From the delicately-pompous curtains that pavilion well,

Forth, by favour of the gale

Of earth-born Zephyros did she sail.

Many shield-bearers, leaders of the pack,

Sailed too upon their track,

Theirs who had directed oar,

Then visible no more,

To Simois' leaf-luxuriant shore —
For sake of strife all gore!

To Iliou Wrath, fulfilling her intent, This marriage-care — the rightly named so — sent:

In after-time, for the tables' abuse
And that of the hearth-partaker Zeus, Bringing to punishment

Those who honoured with noisy throat
The honour of the bride, the hymenæal
note

Which did the kinsfolk then to singing
urge.

But, learning a new hymn for that which
was,

The ancient city of Priamos

Groans probably a great and general dirge, Denominating Paris

"The man that miserably marries:" —

She who, all the while before,

A life, that was a general dirge

For citizens' unhappy slaughter, bore.

And thus a man, by no milk's help,

Within his household reared a lion's whelp

That loved the teat

In life's first festal stage:

Gentle as yet,

A true child-lover, and, to men of age,

A thing whereat pride warms;

And oft he had it in his arms

Like any new-born babe, bright-faced, to
hand

Wagging its tail, at belly's strict command.

But in due time upgrown,

The custom of progenitors was shown:

For — thanks for sustenance repaying

With ravage of sheep slaughtered —

It made unbidden feast;

With blood the house was watered,

To household came a woe there was no staying:

Great mischief many-slaying!

From God it was — some priest

Of Ate, in the house, by nurture thus increased.

At first, then, to the city of Iliou went

A soul, as I might say, of windless calm —

Wealth's quiet ornament,

An eyes'-dart bearing balm,

Love's spirit-biting flower.

But — from the true course bending —

She brought about, of marriage, bitter ending:

Ill-resident, ill-mate, in power

Passing to the Priamidai — by sending

Of Hospitable Zeus —

Erinus for a bride, — to make brides mourn, her dower.

Spoken long ago

Was the ancient saying

Still among mortals staying:
 "Man's great prosperity at height of rise Engenders offspring nor unchilded dies;
 And, from good fortune, to such families, Buds forth insatiate woe." Whereas, distinct from any,
 Of my own mind I am:
 For 'tis the unholy deed begets the many,
 Resembling each its dam.
 Of households that correctly estimate,
 Ever a beauteous child is born of Fate.
 But ancient Arrogance delights to generate Arrogance, young and strong mid mortals' sorrow,
 Or now, or then, when comes the appointed morrow.
 And she bears young Satiety;
 And, fiend with whom nor fight nor war can be,
 Unholy Daring — twin black Curses Within the household, children like their nurses.

But Justice shines in smoke-grimed habitations,
 And honours the well-omened life;
 While, — gold-besprinkled stations
 Where the hands' filth is rife,
 With backward-turning eyes Leaving, — to holy seats she hies,
 Not worshipping the power of wealth Stamped with applause by stealth:
 And to its end directs each thing begun.
 Approach then, my monarch, of Troia the sacker, of Atreus the son!
 How ought I address thee, how ought I revere thee, — nor yet overhitting Nor yet unbending the grace that is fitting?
 Many of mortals hasten to honour the seeming-to-be — Passing by justice: and, with the ill-faring, to groan as he groans all are free.
 But no bite of the sorrow their liver has reached to:
 They say with the joyful, — one outside on each, too,
 As they force to a smile smileless faces.
 But whoever is good at distinguishing races
 In sheep of his flock — it is not for the eyes Of a man to escape such a shepherd's surprise,
 As they seem, from a well-wishing mind,
 In watery friendship to fawn and be kind.
 Thou to me, then, indeed, sending an army for Helena's sake, (I will not conceal it) wast — oh, by no help of the Muses! — depicted Not well of thy midriff the rudder directing, — convicted Of bringing a boldness they did not desire to the men with existence at stake.
 But now — from no outside of mind, nor unlovingly — gracious thou art

To those who have ended the labour, fulfilling their part;
 And in time shalt thou know, by inquiry instructed,
 Who of citizens justly, and who not to purpose, the city conducted.

AGAMEMNON.

First, indeed, Argos, and the gods, the local,
 'Tis right addressing — those with me the 50 partners
 In this return and right things done the city Of Priamos: gods who, from no tongue hearing
 The rights o' the cause, for Ilion's fate manslaughter'rous
 Into the bloody vase, not oscillating, Put the vote-pebbles, while, o' the rival vessel,
 Hope rose up to the lip-edge: filled it was
 not.
 By smoke the captured city is still conspicuous:
 Ate's burnt offerings live: and, dying with
 them,
 The ash sends forth the fulsome blasts of riches.
 Of these things, to the gods grace many- 60 mindful
 'Tis right I render, since both nets outrageous
 We built them round with, and, for sake of woman,
 It did the city to dust — the Argeian monster,
 The horse's nestling, the shield-bearing people
 That made a leap, at setting of the Pleiads, And, vaulting o'er the tower, the raw-flesh-feeding
 Lion licked up his fill of blood tyrannic.
 I to the gods indeed prolonged this preface;
 But — as for thy thought, I remember hearing —
 I say the same, and thou co-pleader hast 70
 me.
 Since few of men this faculty is born with —
 To honour, without grudge, their friend, successful.
 For moody, on the heart, a poison seated Its burthen doubles to who gained the sickness:
 By his own griefs he is himself made heavy,
 And out-of-door prosperity seeing groans
 at.
 Knowing, I'd call (for well have I experienced)
 "Fellowship's mirror," "phantom of a shadow," Those seeming to be mighty gracious to
 me:

While just Odusseus — he who sailed not willing —
 When joined on, was to me the ready trace-horse.
 This of him, whether dead or whether living,
 I say. For other city-and-gods' concernment — Appointing common courts, in full assemblage We will consult. And as for what holds seemingly — How it may lasting stay well, must be counselled:
 While what has need of medicines Paionian We, either burning or else cutting kindly, 10 Will make endeavour to turn pain from sickness.
 And now into the domes and homes by altar Going, I to the gods first raise the right-hand —
 They who, far sending, back again have brought me.
 And Victory, since she followed, fixed remain she!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Men, citizens, Argeians here, my worships!
 I shall not shame me, consort-loving manners
 To tell before you: for in time there dies off
 The diffidence from people. Not from others Learning, I of myself will tell the hard life 20 I bore so long as this man was 'neath Ilion.
 First: for a woman, from the male divided,
 To sit at home alone, is monstrous evil — Hearing the many rumours back-revenging:
 And for now This to come, now That bring after Woe, and still worse woe, bawling in the household!
 And truly, if so many wounds had chanced on My husband here, as homeward used to dribble Report, he's pierced more than a net to speak of!
 While, were he dying (as the words abounded) 30 A triple-bodied Geruon the Second, Plenty above — for loads below I count not —
 Of earth a three-share cloak he'd boast of taking,
 Once only dying in each several figure!
 Because of suchlike rumours back-revenging,

Many the halters from my neck, above head, Others than I loosed — loosed from neck by main force!
 From this cause, sure, the boy stands not beside me — Possessor of our troth-plights, thine and mine too —
 As ought Orestes: be not thou astonished!
 For, him brings up our well-disposed guest-captive Strophios the Phokian — ills that told on both sides
 To me predicting — both of thee 'neath Ilion
 The danger, and if anarchy's mob-uproar Should overthrow thy council; since 'tis born with Mortals, — whoe'er has fallen, the more to kick him.
 Such an excuse, I think, no cunning carries!
 As for myself — why, of my wails the rushing Fountains are dried up: not in them a drop more!
 And in my late-to-bed eyes I have damage, Bewailing what concerned thee, those torch-holdings For ever unattended to. In dreams — why, Beneath the light wing-beats o' the gnat,
 I woke up
 As he went buzzing — sorrows that concerned thee Seeing, that filled more than their fellow-sleep-time.
 Now, all this having suffered, from soul grief-free
 I would style this man here the dog o' the stables,
 The saviour forestay of the ship, the high roof's Ground-prop, son sole-begotten to his father,
 — Ay, land appearing to the sailors past hope, Loveliest day to see after a tempest,
 To the wayfaring-one athirst a well-spring,
 — The joy, in short, of 'scaping all that's — fatal!
 I judge him worth addresses such as these are — Envy stand off! — for many those old evils We underwent. And now, to me — dear headship! — Dismount thou from this car, not earthward setting
 The foot of thine, O king, that's Ilion's spoiler!
 Slave-maids, why tarry? — whose the task allotted

To strew the soil o' the road with carpet-spreadings.
Immediately be purple-strewn the path-
way,
So that to home unhop'd may lead him — Justice!
As for the rest, care shall — by no sleep conquered — Dispose things — justly (gods to aid!) appointed.

AGAMEMNON.

Offspring of Leda, of my household warder, Suitably to my absence hast thou spoken,
For long the speech thou didst outstretch!
But aptly

To praise — from others ought to go this favour.

And for the rest, — not me, in woman's fashion,
Mollify, nor — as mode of barbarous man
is —

To me gape forth a groundward-falling clamour!

Nor, strewing it with garments, make my passage

Envied! Gods, sure, with these behoves we honour:

But, for a mortal on these varied beauties
To walk — to me, indeed, is nowise fear-
free.

I say — as man, not god, to me do homage!
Apart from foot-mats both and varied vestures,

Renown is loud, and — not to lose one's senses,

God's greatest gift. Behoves we him call happy

Who has brought life to end in loved well-being.

If all things I might manage thus — brave man, I!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Come now, this say, nor feign a feeling to
me!

AGAMEMNON.

With feeling, know indeed, I do not tamper!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Vowed'st thou to the gods, in fear, to act
thus?

AGAMEMNON.

If any, I well knew resolve I outspoke.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

What think'st thou Priamos had done, thus victor?

AGAMEMNON.

On varied vests — I do think — he had passaged.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Then, do not, struck with awe at human censure. . . .

AGAMEMNON.

Well, popular mob-outcry much avails too. 39

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Ay, but the unenvied is not the much valued.

AGAMEMNON.

Sure, 'tis no woman's part to long for battle.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Why, to the prosperous, even suits a beating.

AGAMEMNON.

What? thou this beating us in war dost prize too?

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Persuade thee! power, for once, grant me
— and willing!

AGAMEMNON.

But if this seem so to thee — shoes, let someone

Loose under, quick — foot's serviceable carriage!

And me, on these sea-products walking, may no

Grudge from a distance, from the god's eye, strike at!

For great shame were my strewment- 40 spoiling — riches

Spoiling with feet, and silver-purchased textures!

Of these things, thus then. But this female-stranger

Tenderly take inside! Who conquers mildly

God, from afar, benignantly regardeth.

For, willing, no one wears a yoke that's servile:

And she, of many valuables, outpicked The flower, the army's gift, myself has followed.

So, — since to hear thee, I am brought about thus, —

I go into the palace — purples treading.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

There is the sea — and what man shall 50 exhaust it? —

Feeding much purple's worth-its-weight-in-silver

Dye, ever fresh and fresh, our garments' tincture;

At home, such wealth, king, we begin — by gods' help —

With having, and to lack, the household knows not.

Of many garments had I vowed a treading (In oracles if fore-enjoined the household) Of this dear soul the safe-return-price scheming!

For, root existing, foliage goes up houses, O'er spreading shadow against Scirios dog-
star;

And, thou returning to the hearth domestic, Warmth, yea, in winter dost thou show returning.

And when, too, Zeus works, from the green-grape acrid,

10 Wine — then, already, cool in houses cometh —

The perfect man his home perambulating!
Zeus, Zeus Perfecter, these my prayers perfect thou!

Thy care be — yea — of things thou mayst make perfect!

CHOROS.

Wherefore to me, this fear — Groundedly stationed here Fronting my heart, the portent-watcher — flits she?

Wherefore should prophet-play
The uncalled and unpaid lay, Nor — having spat forth fear, like bad dreams — sits she

20 On the mind's throne beloved — well-suasive Boldness?

For time, since, by a throw of all the
hands,

The boat's stern-cables touched the sands,
Has passed from youth to oldness, — When under Ilion rushed the ship-borne bands.

And from my eyes I learn — Being myself my witness — their return.
Yet, all the same, without a lyre, my soul, Itself its teacher too, chants from within Erinus' dirge, not having now the whole

30 Of Hope's dear boldness: nor my inwards
sin —

The heart that's rolled in whirls against the mind

Justly presageful of a fate behind.

But I pray — things false, from my hope, may fall

Into the fate that's not-fulfilled-at-all!

Especially at least, of health that's great The term's insatiable: for, its weight — A neighbour, with a common wall between —

Ever will sickness lean;

And destiny, her course pursuing straight, 40 Has struck man's ship against a reef unseen.

Now, when a portion, rather than the treasure,

Fear casts from sling, with peril in right measure,

It has not sunk — the universal freight, (With misery freighted over-full) Nor has fear welched the hull.

Then too the gift of Zeus,

Two-handedly profuse,

Even from the furrows' yield for yearly use
Has done away with famine, the disease; But blood of man to earth once falling — 5 deadly, black —

In times ere these, —

Who may, by singing spells, call back?

Zeus had not else stopped one who rightly
knew

The way to bring the dead again.

But, did not an appointed Fate constrain The Fate from gods, to bear no more than
due,

My heart, outstripping what tongue utters,
Would have all out: which now, in darkness, mutters

Moodily grieved, nor ever hopes to find How she a word in season may unwind 6
From out the enkindling mind.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Take thyself in, thou too — I say, Kassandra!

Since Zeus — not angrily — in household placed thee

Partaker of hand-sprinklings, with the many

Slaves stationed, his the Owner's altar close to.

Descend from out this car, nor be high-minded!

And truly they do say Alkmené's child
once

Bore being sold, slaves' barley-bread his living.

If, then, necessity of this lot o'erbalance,
Much is the favour of old-wealthy masters: 7

For those who, never hoping, made fine harvest

Are harsh to slaves in all things, beyond measure.

Thou hast — with us — such usage as law warrants.

CHOROS.

To thee it was, she paused plain speech from speaking.

Being inside the fatal nets — obeying, Thou mayst obey: but thou mayst disobey too!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Why, if she is not, in the swallow's fashion, Possessed of voice that's unknown and barbaric,

I, with speech — speaking in mind's scope — persuade her.

CHOROS.

Follow! The best — as things now stand — she speaks of.
Obey thou, leaving this thy car-enthronement!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Well, with this thing at door, for me no leisure To waste time: as concerns the hearth mid-navelled,
Already stand the sheep for fireside slaying By those who never hoped to have such favour.
If thou, then, aught of this wilt do, delay
not!
But if thou, being witless, tak'st no word in,
Speak thou, instead of voice, with hand as Kars do!

CHOROS.

She seems a plain interpreter in need of,
The stranger! and her way — a beast's new-captured!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Why, she is mad, sure, — hears her own bad senses, —
Who, while she comes, leaving a town new-captured, Yet knows not how to bear the bit o' the bridle
Before she has out-frothed her bloody fierceness.
Not I — throwing away more words — will shamed be!

CHOROS.

But I, — for I compassionate, — will chafe
not.
Come, O unhappy one, this car vacating, Yielding to this necessity, prove yoke's use!

KASSANDRA.

Otototoi, Gods, Earth, — Apollon, Apollon!

CHOROS.

Why didst thou "ototoi" concerning Loxias?
Since he is none such as to suit a mourner.

KASSANDRA.

Otototoi, Gods, Earth, —
Apollon, Apollon!

CHOROS.

Ill-boding here again the god invokes she — Nowise empowered in woes to stand by helpful.

KASSANDRA.

Apollon, Apollon,
Guard of the ways, my destroyer!
For thou hast quite, this second time, de- 30 stroyed me.

CHOROS.

To prophesy she seems of her own evils:
Remains the god-gift to the slave-soul present.

KASSANDRA.

Apollon, Apollon,
Guard of the ways, my destroyer!
Ha, whither hast thou led me? to what roof now?

CHOROS.

To the Atreidai's roof: if this thou know'st
not,
I tell it thee, nor this wilt thou call falsehood.

KASSANDRA.

How! How!
God-hated, then! Of many a crime it
knew —
Self-slaying evils, halts too: 40 Man's shambles, blood-besprinkler of the ground!

CHOROS.

She seems to be good-nosed, the stranger:
dog-like,
She snuffs indeed the victims she will find
there.

KASSANDRA.

How! How!
By the witnesses here I am certain now!
These children bewailing their slaughters — flesh dressed in the fire
And devoured by their sire!

CHOROS.

Ay, we have heard of thy soothsaying glory, Doubtless: but prophets none are we in scent of!

KASSANDRA.

Ah, gods, what ever does she meditate? 50
What this new anguish great?
Great in the house here she meditates ill Such as friends cannot bear, cannot cure it: and still Off stands all Resistance Afar in the distance!

CHOROS.

Of these I witless am — these prophesyings.
But those I knew: for the whole city bruits
them.

KASSANDRA.

Ah, unhappy one, this thou consummatest?
 Thy husband, thy bed's common guest, In the bath having brightened . . . How shall I declare Consummation? It soon will be there:
 For hand after hand she outstretches,
 At life as she reaches!

CHOROS.

Nor yet I've gone with thee! for — after riddles —
 Now, in blind oracles, I feel resourceless.

KASSANDRA.

10 Eh, eh, papai, papai,
 What this, I espy?
 Some net of Haides undoubtedly!
 Nay, rather, the snare
 Is she who has share In his bed, who takes part in the murder
 there!
 But may a revolt — Unceasing assault —
 On the Race, raise a shout Sacrificial, about A victim — by stoning — 20 For murder atoning!

CHOROS.

What this Erinus which i' the house thou callest
 To raise her cry? Not mé thy word enlightens!
 To my heart has run
 A drop of the crocus-dye:
 Which makes for those On earth by the spear that lie,
 A common close
 With life's descending sun.
 Swift is the curse begun!

KASSANDRA.

30 How! How!
 See — see quick!
 Keep the bull from the cow!
 In the vesture she catching him, strikes
 him now
 With the black-horned trick,
 And he falls in the watery vase!
 Of the craft-killing cauldron I tell thee the case!

CHOROS.

I would not boast to be a topping critic
 Of oracles: but to some sort of evil I liken these. From oracles, what good
 speech
 40 To mortals, beside, is sent?
 It comes of their evils: these arts word-abounding that sing the event Bring the fear 'tis their office to teach.

KASSANDRA.

Ah me, ah me —
 Of me unhappy, evil-destined fortunes!
 For I bewail my proper woe
 As, mine with his, all into one I throw.
 Why hast thou hither me unhappy brought?
 — Unless that I should die with him — for nought!
 What else was sought?

CHOROS.

Thou art some mind-mazed creature, godpossessed:
 And all about thyself dost wail
 A lay — no lay!
 Like some brown nightingale Insatiable of noise, who — well-away! —
 From her unhappy breast Keeps moaning Itus, Itus, and his life With evils, flourishing on each side, rife.

KASSANDRA.

Ah me, ah me,
 The fate o' the nightingale, the clear resounder!
 For a body wing-borne have the gods cast round her,
 And sweet existence, from misfortunes free:
 But for myself remains a sundering With spear, the two-edged thing!

CHOROS.

Whence hast thou this on-rushing god-involving pain
 And spasms in vain?
 For, things that terrify,
 With changing unintelligible cry Thou strikest up in tune, yet all the while After that Orthian style!
 Whence hast thou limits to the oracular
 road,
 That evils bode?

KASSANDRA.

Ah me, the nuptials, the nuptials of Paris,
 the deadly to friends!
 Ah me, of Skamandros the draught Paternal! There once, to these ends, On thy banks was I brought,
 The unhappy! And now, by Kokutos and Acheron's shore
 I shall soon be, it seems, these my oracles singing once more!

CHOROS.

Why this word, plain too much, Hast thou uttered? A babe might learn
 of such!
 I am struck with a bloody bite — here under —

• The Diamastigosis.

At the fate woe-wreaking
Of thee shrill shrieking:
To me who hear — a wonder!

KASSANDRA.

Ah me, the toils — the toils of the city
The wholly destroyed: ah, pity,
Of the sacrificings my father made In the ramparts' aid — Much slaughter of grass-fed flocks — that afforded no cure
That the city should not, as it does now, the burthen endure!
But I, with the soul on fire,
Soon to the earth shall cast me and expire.

CHOROS.

To things, on the former consequent,
Again hast thou given vent:
And 'tis some evil-meaning fiend doth move
thee,
Heavily falling from above thee,
To melodise thy sorrows — else, in singing, Calamitous, death-bringing!
And of all this the end
I am without resource to apprehend.

KASSANDRA.

Well then, the oracle from veils no longer Shall be outlooking, like a bride, new-married:
But bright it seems, against the sun's uprisings Breathing, to penetrate thee: so as, wave-
like,
To wash against the rays a woe much greater Than this. I will no longer teach by riddles.
And witness, running with me, that of evils
Done long ago, I nosing track the footstep!
For, this same roof here — never quits a
Choros
One-voiced, not well-tuned since no "well" it utters:
And truly having drunk, to get more courage, Man's blood — the Komos keeps within the household
— Hard to be sent outside — of sister Furies:
They hymn their hymn — within the house close sitting —
The first beginning curse: in turn spit ferth at
The Brother's bed, to him who spurned it hostile.
Have I missed aught, or hit I like a bow-
man?
False prophet am I, — knock at doors, a babble?

Henceforward witness, swearing now, I know not By other's word the old sins of this household!

CHOROS.

And how should oath, bond honourably binding, Become thy cure? No less I wonder at
thee
— That thou, beyond sea reared, a strangetongued city Shouldst hit in speaking, just as if thou stood'st by!

KASSANDRA.

Prophet Apollon put me in this office.

CHOROS.

What, even though a god, with longing smitten?

KASSANDRA.

At first, indeed, shame was to me to say this.

CHOROS.

For, more relaxed grows everyone who fares well.

KASSANDRA.

But he was athlete to me — huge grace breathing!

CHOROS.

Well, to the work of children, went ye law's way?

KASSANDRA.

Having consented, I played false to Loxias. 50

CHOROS.

Already when the wits inspired possessed of?

KASSANDRA.

Already townsmen all their woes I foretold.

CHOROS.

How wast thou then unhurt by Loxias' anger?

KASSANDRA.

I no one aught persuaded, when I sinned
thus.

CHOROS.

To us, at least, now sooth to say thou seemest.

KASSANDRA.

Halloo, halloo, ah, evils!
Again, straightforward foresight's fearful labour Whirls me, distracting with prelusive last-lays!

Behold ye those there, in the household seated, —

Young ones, — of dreams approaching to the figures?

Children, as if they died by their beloveds — Hands they have filled with flesh, the meal domestic —

Entrails and vitals both, most piteous burthen,

Plain they are holding! — which their father tasted!

For this, I say, plans punishment a certain Lion ignoble, on the bed that wallows, House-guard (ah, me!) to the returning master

10 — Mine, since to bear the slavish yoke behooves me!

The ship's commander, Ilion's desolator, Knows not what things the tongue of the lewd she-dog

Speaking, outspreading, shiny-souled, in fashion

Of Ate hid, will reach to, by ill-fortune!
Such things she dares — the female, the male's slayer!

She is . . . how calling her the hateful bite-beast

May I hit the mark? Some amphibaina, — Skulla

Housing in rocks, of mariners the mischief, Revelling Haides' mother, — curse, no truce with,

20 Breathing at friends! How piously she shouted,

The all-courageous, as at turn of battle!
She seems to joy at the back-bringing safety!

Of this, too, if I nought persuade, all's one!
Why?

What is to be will come. And soon thou,
present,

"True prophet all too much" wilt pitying style me.

CHOROS.

Thuestes' feast, indeed, on flesh of children,
I went with, and I shuddered. Fear too holds me

Listing what's true as life, nowise outimaged.

KASSANDRA.

I say, thou Agamemnon's fate shalt look on.

CHOROS.

30 Speak good words, O unhappy! Set mouth sleeping!

KASSANDRA.

But Paian stands in no stead to the speech
here.

CHOROS.

Nay, if the thing be near: but never be it!

KASSANDRA.

Thou, indeed, prayest: they to kill are busy.

CHOROS.

Of what man is it ministered, this sorrow?

KASSANDRA.

There again, wide thou look'st of my foretellings.

CHOROS.

For, the fulfiller's scheme I have not gone
with.

KASSANDRA.

And yet too well I know the speech Hellenic.

CHOROS.

For Puthian oracles, thy speech, and hard
too.

KASSANDRA.

Papai: what fire this! and it comes upon
me!

Ototoi, Lukeion Apollon, ah me — me!
She, the two-footed lioness that sleeps with The wolf, in absence of the generous lion, Kills me the unhappy one: and as a poison Brewing, to put my price too in the anger, She vows, against her mate this weapon whetting

To pay him back the bringing me, with slaughter.

Why keep I then these things to make me laughed at,

Both wands and, round my neck, oracular fillets?

Thee, at least, ere my own fate will I ruin:
Go, to perdition falling! Boons exchange
we —

Some other Ate in my stead make wealthy!
See there — himself, Apollon stripping from me

The oracular garment! having looked upo-
me

— Even in these adornments, laughed by friends at,

As good as foes, if the balance weighed and vainly —

For, called crazed stroller, — as I had been gipsy,

Beggar, unhappy, starved to death, — I bore it.

And now the Prophet — prophet me undoing,

Has led away to these so deadly fortunes!
Instead of my sire's altar, waits the back-
block

She struck with first warm bloody sacrificing!

Yet nowise unavenged of gods will death
be:

For there shall come another, our avenger,

The mother-slaining scion, father's dooms-
man:

Fugitive, wanderer, from this land an exile,

Back shall he come, — for friends, cope stone these curses!

For there is sworn a great oath from the gods that

Him shall bring hither his fallen sire's prostration.

Why make I then, like an indweller, moan-
ing?

Since at the first I foresaw Ilion's city Suffering as it has suffered: and who took
it,

Thus by the judgment of the gods are faring.

I go, will suffer, will submit to dying!

But, Haides' gates — these same I call, I speak to,

And pray that on an opportune blow
chancing,

Without a struggle, — blood the calm death bringing

In easy outflow, — I this eye may close up!

CHOROS.

O much unhappy, but, again, much learned Woman, long hast thou outstretched!

But if truly

Thou knowest thine own fate, how comes that, like to

A god-led steer, to altar bold thou treadest?

KASSANDRA.

There's no avoidance, — strangers, no!
Some time more!

CHOROS.

He last is, anyhow, by time advantaged.

KASSANDRA.

It comes, the day: I shall by flight gain little.

CHOROS.

But know thou patient art from thy brave spirit!

KASSANDRA.

Such things hears no one of the happy-fortuned.

CHOROS.

But gloriously to die — for man is grace,
sure.

KASSANDRA.

Ah, sire, for thee and for thy noble children!

CHOROS.

But what thing is it? What fear turns thee backwards?

KASSANDRA.

Alas, alas!

CHOROS.

Why this "Alas!" if 'tis no spirit's loathing?

KASSANDRA.

Slaughter blood-dripping does the household smell of!

CHOROS.

How else? This scent is of hearth-sacrifices. 30

KASSANDRA.

Such kind of steam as from a tomb is proper!

CHOROS.

No Surian honour to the House thou speak'st of!

KASSANDRA.

But I will go, — even in the household wailing

My fate and Agamemnon's. Life suffice
me!

Ah, strangers!

I cry not "ah" — as bird at bush — through terror

Idly! to me, the dead this much bear witness:

When, for me — woman, there shall die a woman,

And, for a man ill-wived, a man shall perish!
This hospitality I ask as dying. 40

CHOROS.

O sufferer, thee — thy foretold fate I pity.

KASSANDRA.

Yet once for all, to speak a speech, I fain
am:

No dirge, mine for myself! The sun I pray to,

Fronting his last light! — to my own avengers —

That from my hateful slayers they exact
too

Pay for the dead slave — easy-managed hand's work!

CHOROS.

Alas for mortal matters! Happy-for-tuned, —

Why, any shade would turn them: if unhappy,

By throws the wetting sponge has spoiled the picture!

And more by much in mortals this I pity. 50

The being well-to-do — Insatiate a desire of this

Born with all mortals is,
 Nor any is there who Well-being forces off, aoints
 From roofs whereat a finger points, "No more come in!" exclaiming. This man, too,
 To take the city of Priamos did the celestials give,
 And, honoured by the god, he homeward comes;
 But now if, of the former, he shall pay
 The blood back, and, for those who ceased to live, 10 Dying, for deaths in turn new punishment he dooms —
 Who, being mortal, would not pray
 With an unmischievous Daimon to have been born — who would not, hearing thus?

AGAMEMNON.

Ah me! I am struck — a right-aimed stroke within me!

CHOROS.

Silence! Who is it shouts "stroke" — "right-aimedly" a wounded one?

AGAMEMNON.

Ah me! indeed again, — a second, struck by!

CHOROS.

This work seems to me completed by this "Ah me" of the king's;
 But we somehow may together share in solid counsellings.

CHOROS I.

I, in the first place, my opinion tell you:
 20 — To cite the townsmen, by help-cry, to house here.

CHOROS 2.

To me, it seems we ought to fall upon them At quickest — prove the fact by sword fresh-flowing!

CHOROS 3.

And I, of such opinion the partaker, Vote — to do something: not to wait — the main point!

CHOROS 4.

'Tis plain to see: for they prelude as though of
 A tyranny the signs they gave the city.

CHOROS 5.

For we waste time; while they, — this waiting's glory
 Treading on ground, — allow the hand no slumber.

CHOROS 6.

I know not — chancing on some plan — to tell it:
 'Tis for the doer to plan of the deed also.

CHOROS 7.

And I am such another: since I'm schemeless How to raise up again by words — a dead
 man!

CHOROS 8.

What, and, protracting life, shall we give way thus
 To the disgracers of our home, these rulers?

CHOROS 9.

Why, 'tis unbearable: but to die is better:
 For death than tyranny is the ripper finish!

CHOROS 10.

What, by the testifying "Ah me" of him,
 Shall we prognosticate the man as perished?

CHOROS 11.

We must quite know ere speak these things concerning:
 For to conjecture and "quite know" are two things.

CHOROS 12.

This same to praise I from all sides abound
 in — Clearly to know — Atreides, what he's doing!

KLUTAINNESTRA.

Much having been before to purpose spoken,
 The opposite to say I shall not shamed be:
 For how should one, to enemies, — in semblance,
 Friends, — enmity proposing, — sorrow's net-frame
 Enclose, a height superior to outleaping?
 To me, indeed, this struggle of old — not mindless
 Of an old victory — came: with time, I grant you!
 I stand where I have struck, things once accomplished:
 And so have done, — and this deny I shall
 not, —
 As that his fate was nor to fly nor ward
 off.
 A wrap-round with no outlet, as for fishes, I fence about him — the rich woe of the garment:
 I strike him twice, and in a double "Ah-
 me!"
 He let his limbs go — there! And to him, fallen,

Upon us in quickness — Neither much sickness Neither bed-keeping —
And bear unended sleeping,
Now that subdued
Is our keeper, the kindest of mood!
Having borne, for a woman's sake, much
strife —

By a woman he withered from life!
Ah me!

- 10 Law-breaking Helena who, once, Hast many, so many souls undone
'Neath Troia! and now the consummated Much-memorable curse Hast thou made flower-forth, red With the blood no rains disperse, That which was then in the House — Strife all-subduing, the woe of a spouse.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

- Nowise, of death the fate —
Burdened by these things — supplicate!
20 Nor on Helena turn thy wrath
As the man-destroyer, as "she who hath,
Being but one,
Many and many a soul undone Of the men, the Danaoi" —
And wrought immense annoy!

CHOROS.

- Daimon, who fallest Upon this household and the double-raced Tantalidai, a rule, minded like theirs displaced,
Thou rulest me with, now, 30 Whose heart thou gallest!
And on the body, like a hateful crow, Stationed, all out of tune, his chant to chant Doth Something vaunt!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

- Now, of a truth, hast thou set upright Thy mouth's opinion, — Naming the Sprite,
The triply gross,
O'er the race that has dominion:
For through him it is that Eros 10 The carnage-licker In the belly is bred: ere ended quite Is the elder throe — new ichor!

CHOROS.

- Certainly, great of might
And heavy of wrath, the Sprite Thou tellest of, in the palace (Woe, woe!)
— An evil tale of a fate
By Ate's malice Rendered insatiate!
50 Oh, oh, —
King, king, how shall I bewEEP thee?
From friendly soul whatever say?

Thou liest where webs of the spider o'ersweep thee
In impious death, life breathing away.
O me — me!
This couch, not free!
By a slavish death subdued thou art,
From the hand, by the two-edged dart.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Thou boastest this deed to be mine:
But leave off styling me
"The Agamemnonian wife!"
For, showing himself in sign Of the spouse of the corpse thou dost see,
Did the ancient bitter avenging-ghost
Of Atreus, savage host, Pay the man here as price —
A full-grown for the young one's sacrifice.

CHOROS.

That no cause, indeed, of this killing art
thou,
Who shall be witness-bearer?
How shall he bear it — how?
But the sire's avenging-ghost might be in the deed a sharer.
He is forced on and on
By the kin-born flowing of blood,
— Black Ares: to where, having gone,
He shall leave off, flowing done,
At the frozen-child's flesh food.
King, king, how shall I bewEEP thee?
From friendly soul whatever say?
Thou liest where webs of the spider o'er-
sweep thee
In impious death, life breathing away.
O me — me!
This couch, not free!
By a slavish death subdued thou art,
From the hand, by the two-edged dart.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

No death "unfit for the free"
Do I think this man's to be:
For did not himself a slavish curse
To his household decree?
But the scion of him, myself did nurse — That much-bewailed Iphigeneia, he 10 Having done well by, — and as well, nor
worse,
Been done to, — let him not in Hades loudly
Bear himself proudly!
Being by sword-destroying death amerced For that sword's punishment himself inflicted first.

CHOROS.

I at a loss am left —
Of a feasible scheme of mind bereft —
Where I may turn: for the house is falling.
I fear the bloody crash of the rain

That ruins the roof as it bursts amain:
The warning-drop
Has come to a stop.
Destiny doth Justice whet
For other deed of hurt, on other whetstones
yet.

Woe, earth, earth — would thou hadst taken me

Ere I saw the man I see,
On the pallet-bed
Of the silver-sided bath-vase, dead!
Who is it shall bury him, who Sing his dirge? Can it be true That thou wilt dare this same to do — Having slain thy husband, thine own,
To make his funeral moan:
And for the soul of him, in place
Of his mighty deeds, a graceless grace To wickedly institute? By whom Shall the tale of praise o'er the tomb
At the god-like man be sent — From the truth of his mind as he toils intent?

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

It belongs not to thee to declare This object of care!
By us did he fall — down there!
Did he die — down there! and down, no
less,
We will bury him there, and not beneath The wails of the household over his
death:
But Iphigeneia, — with kindness, —
His daughter, — as the case requires, Facing him full, at the rapid-flowing Passage of Groans shall — both hands throwing Around him — kiss that kindest of sires!

CHOROS.

This blame comes in the place of blame:
Hard battle it is to judge each claim.
"He is borne away who bears away:
And the killer has all to pay."
And this remains while Zeus is remaining,
"The doer shall suffer in time" — for,
such his ordaining.
Who may cast out of the House its cursed brood?
The race is to Ate glued!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Thou hast gone into this oracle With a true result. For me, then, — I
will
— To the Daimon of the Pleisthenidai Making an oath — with all these things comply Hard as they are to bear. For the
rest —
Going from out this House, a guest,

May he wear some other family To nought, with the deaths of kin by kin!

And, — keeping a little part of my goods, — Wholly am I contented in Having expelled from the royal House 50
These frenzied moods
The mutually-murderous.

AIGISTHOS.

O light propitious of day justice-bringing!
I may say truly, now, that men's avengers,
The gods from high, of earth behold the sorrows — Seeing, as I have, i' the spun robes of the Erinues,
This man here lying, — sight to me how pleasant! —
His father's hands' contrivances repaying.
For Atreus, this land's lord, of this man father, Thuestes, my own father — to speak 60 clearly —
His brother too, — being i' the rule contested, — Drove forth to exile from both town and household:
And, coming back, to the hearth turned, a suppliant, Wretched Thuestes found the fate assured
him
— Not to die, bloodying his paternal threshold
Just there: but host-wise this man's impious father Atreus, soul-keenly more than kindly, — seeming To joyous hold a flesh-day, — to my father
Served up a meal, the flesh of his own children.
The feet indeed and the hands' top divi- 70 sions
He hid, high up and isolated sitting:
But, their unshowing parts in ignorance taking,
He forthwith eats food — as thou seest — perdition
To the race: and then, 'ware of the deed ill-omened,
He shrieked O! — falls back, vomiting,
from the carnage,
And fate on the Pelopidai past bearing He prays down — putting in his curse together
The kicking down o' the feast — that so might perish
The race of Pleisthenes entire: and thence
is That it is given thee to see this man pros- 80
trate.
And I was rightly of this slaughter stitch-
man:

Since me, — being third from ten, — with my poor father
 He drives out — being then a babe in swathe-bands:
 But, grown up, back again has justice brought me:
 And of this man I got hold — being without-doors — Fitting together the whole scheme of ill-
 will.
 So, sweet, in fine, even to die were to me, Seeing, as I have, this man i' the toils of justice!

CHOROS.

Agisthos, arrogance in ills I love not.
 Dost thou say — willing, thou didst kill the man here, 10 And, alone, plot this lamentable slaughter?
 I say — thy head in justice will escape not The people's throwing — know that! — stones and curses!

AIGISTHOS.

Thou such things soundest — seated at the lower Oarage to those who rule at the ship's mid-bench?
 Thou shalt know, being old, how heavy is teaching
 To one of the like age — bidden be modest!
 But chains and old age and the pangs of fasting Stand out before all else in teaching, — prophets At souls'-cure! Dost not, seeing aught, see this too?
 20 Against goads kick not, lest tript up thou suffer!

CHOROS.

Woman, thou, — of him coming new from battle Houseguard — thy husband's bed the while disgracing, —
 For the Army-leader didst thou plan this ate too?

AIGISTHOS.

These words too are of groans the prime-begetters!
 Truly a tongue opposed to Orpheus hast
 thou:
 For he led all things by his voice's grace-
 charm,
 But thou, upstirring them by these wild yelpings, Wilt lead them! Forced, thou wilt appear the tamer!

CHOROS.

So — thou shalt be my king then of the Argians —

Who, not when for this man his fate thou plannedst, Darest to do this deed — thyself the slayer!

AIGISTHOS.

For, to deceive him was the wife's part,
 certes:
 I was looked after — foe, ay, old-begotten!
 But out of this man's wealth will I endeavour
 To rule the citizens: and the no-man-minder
 — Him will I heavily yoke — by no means trace-horse,
 A corned-up colt! but that bad friend in darkness, Famine its housemate, shall behold him gentle.

CHOROS.

Why then, this man here, from a coward
 spirit, Didst not thou slay thyself? But, — 4 helped, — a woman,
 The country's pest, and that of gods o' the
 country,
 Killed him! Orestes, where may he see light now?
 That coming hither back, with gracious fortune,
 Of both these he may be the all-conquering slayer?

AIGISTHOS.

But since this to do thou thinkest — and not talk — thou soon shalt know!
 Up then, comrades dear! the proper thing to do — not distant this!

CHOROS.

Up then! hilt in hold, his sword let everyone aright dispose!

AIGISTHOS.

Ay, but I myself too, hilt in hold, do not refuse to die.

CHOROS.

Thou wilt die, thou say'st, to who accept!
 We the chance demand.

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Nowise, O belovedest of men, may we do other ills!
 To have reaped away these, even, is a harvest much to me.
 Go, both thou and these the old men, to the homes appointed each, Ere ye suffer! It behoved one do these things just as we did:
 And if of these troubles there should be enough — we may assent

— By the Daimon's heavy heel unfortunately stricken ones!
So a woman's counsel hath it — if one judge it learning-worth.

AIGISTHOS.

But to think that these at me the idle tongue should thus o'erbloom, And throw out such words — the Daimon's power experimenting on —
And, of modest knowledge missing, — me, the ruler, . . .

CHOROS.

Ne'er may this befall Argeians — wicked man to fawn before!

AIGISTHOS.

Anyhow, in after days, will I, yes, I, be at thee yet!

CHOROS.

Not if hither should the Daimon make Orestes straightway come!

AIGISTHOS.

O, I know, myself, that fugitives on hopes are pasture-fed!

CHOROS.

Do thy deed, get fat, defiling justice, since is the power is thine!

AIGISTHOS.

Know that thou shalt give me satisfaction for this folly's sake!

CHOROS.

Boast on, bearing thee audacious, like a cock his females by!

KLUTAIMNESTRA.

Have not thou respect for these same idle yelpings! I and thou Will arrange it, o'er this household ruling excellently well.

[The name of a villa near Geneva; means The Sun. A.E.S. stands for Ann Egerton-Smith, who, whilst spending the autumn of 1877 with Mr. and Miss Browning at La Saisiaz, died suddenly of heart disease on the morning of the 14th of September.]

I.

Good, to forgive;
Best, to forget!
Living, we fret;
Dying, we live.
Fretless and free,
Soul, clap thy pinion!
Earth have dominion,
Body, o'er thee!

II.

Wander at will,
Day after day, —
Wander away, Wandering still — Soul that canst soar!
Body may slumber:
Body shall cumber
Soul-flight no more.

III.

Waft of soul's wing!
What lies above?
Sunshine and Love,
Skyblue and Spring!
Body hides — where?
Ferns of all feather, Mosses and heather,
Yours be the care!

LA SAISIAZ.

A.E.S. SEPTEMBER 14, 1877.

DARED and done: at last I stand upon the summit, Dear and True!
Singly dared and done; the climbing both of us were bound to do.
Petty feat and yet prodigious: every side my glance was bent O'er the grandeur and the beauty lavished through the whole ascent.
Ledge by ledge, out broke new marvels, now minute and now immense: Earth's most exquisite disclosure, heaven's own God in evidence!
And no berry in its hiding, no blue space in its outspread, Pleaded to escape my footstep, challenged my emerging head,

(As I climbed or paused from climbing, now o'erbranched by shrub and tree, Now built round by rock and boulder, now at just a turn set free, Stationed face to face with — Nature?
rather with Infinitude)
— No revelation of them all, as singly I my path pursued, But a bitter touched its sweetness, for the thought stung "Even so Both of us had loved and wondered just the same, five days ago!"
Five short days, sufficient hardly to entice, from out its den Splintered in the slab, this pink perfection of the cyclamen;
Scarce enough to heal and coat with amber gum the sloe-tree's gash, Bronze the clustered wilding apple, redden ripe the mountain-ash: Yet of might to place between us — Oh the barrier! Yon Profound Shrinks beside it, proves a pin-point: barrier this, without a bound!
Boundless though it be, I reach you:
somehow seem to have you here — Who are there. Yes, there you dwell now, plain the four low walls appear;
Those are vineyards they enclose from;
and the little spire which points — That's Collonge, henceforth your dwelling. All the same, howe'er dis-joints
Past from present, no less certain you are here, not there: have dared, Done the feat of mountain-climbing, — five days since, we both prepared Daring, doing, arm in arm, if other help should haply fail.
For you asked, as forth we sallied to see sunset from the vale,
"Why not try for once the mountain, — take a foretaste, snatch by stealth Sight and sound, some unconsidered fragment of the hoarded wealth?
Six weeks at its base, yet never once have we together won Sight or sound by honest climbing: let us two have dared and done Just so much of twilight journey as may prove to-morrow's jaunt

Not the only mode of wayfare — wheeled to reach the eagle's haunt!"

So, we turned from the low grass-path you were pleased to call "your own,"

Set our faces to the rose-bloom o'er the summit's front of stone

Where Salève obtains, from Jura and the sunken sun she hides,

Due return of blushing "Good Night," rosy as a borne-off bride's,

For his masculine "Good Morrow" when,
with sunrise still in hold,

Gay he hails her, and, magnific, thrilled her black length burns to gold.

Up and up we went, how careless — nay, how joyous! All was new,

All was strange. "Call progress toilsome? that were just insulting you!

c How the trees must temper noontide! Ah, the thicket's sudden break!

What will be the morning glory, when at dusk thus gleams the lake?

Light by light puts forth Geneva: what a land — and, of the land,

Can there be a lovelier station than this spot where now we stand?

Is it late, and wrong to linger? True, tomorrow makes amends.

Toilsome progress? child's play, call it — specially when one descends!

There, the dread descent is over — hardly our adventure, though!

Take the vale where late we left it, pace the grass-path, 'mine,' you know!

Proud completion of achievement!" And we paced it, praising still

That soft tread on velvet verdure as it wound through hill and hill;

20 And at very end there met us, coming from Collonge, the pair

— All our people of the Chalet — two, enough and none to spare.

So, we made for home together, and we reached it as the stars

One by one came lamping — chiefly that prepotency of Mars —

And your last word was "I owe you this enjoyment!" — met with "Nay:

With yourself it rests to have a month of morrrows like to-day!"

Then the meal, with talk and laughter, and the news of that rare nook

Yet untroubled by the tourist, touched on by no travel-book,

All the same — though latent — patent,
hybrid birth of land and sea,

And (our travelled friend assured you) — if such miracle might be —

30 Comparable for completeness of both blessings — all around

Nature, and, inside her circle, safety from world's sight and sound —

Comparable to our Saisiaz, "Hold it fast and guard it well!

Go and see and vouch for certain, then come back and never tell

Living soul but us; and haply, prove our sky from cloud as clear,

There may we four meet, praise fortune just as now, another year!"

Thus you charged him on departure: not without the final charge

"Mind to-morrow's early meeting! We must leave our journey marge

Ample for the wayside wonders: there's the stoppage at the inn

Three-parts up the mountain, where the hardships of the track begin;

There's the convent worth a visit; but, the 46 triumph crowning all —

There's Salève's own platform facing glory which strikes greatness small,

— Blanc, supreme above his earth-brood, needles red and white and green,

Horns of silver, fangs of crystal set on edge in his demesne.

So, some three weeks since, we saw them:
so, to-morrow we intend

You shall see them likewise; therefore Good Night till to-morrow, friend!"

Last, the nothings that extinguish embers of a vivid day:

"What might be the Marshal's next move, what Gambetta's counter-play?"

Till the landing, on the staircase saw escape the latest spark:

"Sleep you well!" "Sleep but as well, you!" — lazy love quenched, all was dark.

Nothing dark next day at sundown! Up I 50 rose and forth I fared:

Took my plunge within the bath-pool, pacified the watch-dog scared,

Saw proceed the transmutation — Jura's black to one gold glow,

Trod your level path that let me drink the morning deep and slow,

Reached the little quarry — ravage recompensed by shrub and fern —

Till the overflowing ardours told me time was for return.

So, return I did, and gaily. But, for once, from no far mound

Waved salute a tall white figure. "Has her sleep been so profound?

Foresight, rather, prudent saving strength for day's expenditure!

Ay, the chamber-window's open: out and on the terrace, sure!"

No, the terrace showed no figure, tall, 60 white, leaning through the wreaths,

Tangle-twine of leaf and bloom that intercept the air one breathes,

Interpose between one's love and Nature's loving, hill and dale

Down to where the blue lake's wrinkle marks the river's inrush pale — Mazy Arve: whereon no vessel but goes sliding white and plain, Not a steamboat pants from harbour but one hears pulsate amain, Past the city's congregated peace of homes and pomp of spires — Man's mild protest that there's something more than Nature, man requires, And that, useful as is Nature to attract the tourist's foot, Quiet slow sure money-making proves the matter's very root, — Need for body, — while the spirit also needs a comfort reached By no help of lake or mountain, but the texts whence Calvin preached.
10 "Here's the veil withdrawn from landscape:
up to Jura and beyond, All awaits us ranged and ready; yet she violates the bond, Neither leans nor looks nor listens: why is this?" A turn of eye Took the whole sole answer, gave the undisputed reason "why!"

This dread way you had your summons!
No premonitory touch,
As you talked and laughed ('tis told me) scarce a minute ere the clutch Captured you in cold for ever. Cold? nay, warm you were as life When I raised you, while the others used, in passionate poor strife, All the means that seemed to promise any aid, and all in vain.
Gone you were, and I shall never see that earnest face again 20 Grow transparent, grow transfigured with the sudden light that leapt, At the first word's provocation, from the heart-deeps where it leapt.

Therefore, paying piteous duty, what seemed You have we consigned Peacefully to — what I think were, of all earth-beds, to your mind Most the choice for quiet, yonder: low walls stop the vines' approach, Lovingly Salève protects you; village-sports will ne'er encroach On the stranger lady's silence, whom friends bore so kind and well Thither "just for love's sake," — such their own word was: and who can tell?
You supposed that few or none had known and loved you in the world:
May be! flower that's full-blown tempts the butterfly, not flower that's furled.
30 But more learned sense unlocked you, loosed the sheath and let expand

Bud to bell and outspread flower-shape at the least warm touch of hand — May be, throb of heart, beneath which,
— quickening farther than it knew, — Treasure oft was disembosomed, scent all strange and unguessed hue.
Disembosomed, re-embosomed, — must one memory suffice, Prove I knew an Alpine-rose which all beside named Edelweiss?

Rare thing, red or white, you rest now: two days slumbered through; and
since
One day more will see me rid of this same scene whereat I wince, Tetchy at all sights and sounds and pettish at each idle charm Proffered me who pace now singly where we two went arm in arm, —
I have turned upon my weakness: asked 40
"And what, forsooth, prevents That, this latest day allowed me, I fulfil of her intents One she had the most at heart — that we should thus again survey From Salève Mont Blanc together?" Therefore, — dared and done to-day Climbing, — here I stand: but you —
where?

If a spirit of the place Broke the silence, bade me question, promised answer, — what disgrace Did I stipulate "Provided answer suit my hopes, not fears!"
Would I shrink to learn my life-time's limit — days, weeks, months or years?
Would I shirk assurance on each point whereat I can but guess — "Does the soul survive the body? Is 50 there God's self, no or yes?" If I know my mood, 'twere constant — come in whatsoe'er uncouth Shape it should, nay, formidable — so the answer were but truth.

Well, and wherefore shall it daunt me, when 'tis I myself am tasked,
When, by weakness weakness questioned, weakly answers — weakly asked?
Weakness never needs be falseness: truth is truth in each degree — Thunder pealed by God to Nature, whispered by my soul to me.
Nay, the weakness turns to strength and triumphs in a truth beyond:
"Mine is but man's truest answer — how were it did God respond?" I shall no more dare to mimic such response in futile speech, Pass off human lisp as echo of the sphere- 60 song out of reach,

Than, — because it well may happen yonder, where the far snows blanch Mute Mont Blanc, that who stands near them sees and hears an avalanche, —
 I shall pick a clod and throw, — cry
 "Such the sight and such the sound!
 What though I nor see nor hear them?
 Others do, the proofs abound!"
 Can I make my eye an eagle's, sharpen ear to recognise Sound o'er league and league of silence?
 Can I know, who but surmise?
 If I dared no self-deception when, a week since, I and you Walked and talked along the grass-path, passing lightly in review
 What seemed hits and what seemed misses in a certain fence-play, — strife 10 Sundry minds of mark engaged in "On the Soul and Future Life," — If I ventured estimating what was come of parried thrust, Subtle stroke, and, rightly, wrongly, estimating could be just — Just, though life so seemed abundant in the form which moved by mine, I might well have played at feigning, fooling, — laughed "What need opine Pleasure must succeed to pleasure, else past pleasure turns to pain, And 'his first life claims a second, else I count its good no gain?" — Much less have I heart to palter when the matter to decide Now becomes "Was ending ending once and always, when you died?"
 Did the face, the form I lifted as it lay, reveal the loss 20 Not alone of life but soul? A tribute to yon flowers and moss, What of you remains beside? A memory! Easy to attest
 "Certainly from out the world that one believes who knew her best Such was good in her, such fair, which fair and good were great perchance Had but fortune favoured, bidden each shy faculty advance; After all — who knows another? Only as I know, I speak."
 So much of you lives within me while I live my year or week.
 Then my fellow takes the tale up, not unwilling to aver Duly in his turn "I knew him best of all, as he knew her: Such he was, and such he was not, and such other might have been
 But that somehow every actor, somewhere in this earthly scene, Fails." And so both memories dwindle, yours and mine together linked,
 Till there is but left for comfort, when the last spark proves extinct,

This — that somewhere new existence led by men and women new Possibly attains perfection coveted by me and you;
 While ourselves, the only witness to what work our life evolved,
 Only to ourselves proposing problems proper to be solved
 By ourselves alone, — who working ne'er shall know if work bear fruit Others reap and garner, heedless how produced by stalk and root, —
 We who, darkling, timed the day's birth, — struggling, testified to peace, — Earned, by dint of failure, triumph, — we, 40 creative thought, must cease In created word, thought's echo, due to impulse long since sped!
 Why repine? There's ever someone lives although ourselves be dead!

Well, what signifies repugnance? Truth is truth howe'er it strike.
 Fair or foul the lot 'apportioned life on earth, we bear alike.
 Stalwart body idly yoked to stunted spirit, powers, that fain Else would soar, condemned to grovel, groundlings through the fleshly chain, — Help that hinders, hindrance proved but help disguised when all too late, — Hindrance is the fact acknowledged, how-soe'er explained as Fate, Fortune, Providence: we bear, own life a burthen more or less.
 Life thus owned unhappy, is there sup- 50 plemental happiness Possible and probable in life to come? or must we count Life a curse and not a blessing, summed-up in its whole amount, Help and hindrance, joy and sorrow?

Why should I want courage here?
 I will ask and have an answer, — with no favour, with no fear, — From myself. How much, how little, do I inwardly believe True that controverted doctrine? A fact to which I cleave, Is it fancy I but cherish, when I take upon my lips Phrase the solemn Tuscan fashioned, and declare the soul's eclipse Not the soul's extinction? take his "I believe and I declare — Certain am I — from this life I pass into 60 a better, there Where that lady lives of whom enamoured was my soul" — where this Other lady, my companion dear and true, she also is?

I have questioned and am answered.

Question, answer presuppose

Two points: that the thing itself which questions, answers, — is, it knows;

As it also knows the thing perceived outside itself, — a force

Actual ere its own beginning, operative through its course, Unaffected by its end, — that this thing likewise needs must be;

Call this — God; then, call that — soul, and both — the only facts for me.

Prove them facts? that they o'erpass my power of proving, proves them such:

Fact it is I know I know not something which is fact as much.

What before caused all the causes, what effect of all effects

10 Haply follows, — these are fancy. Ask the rush if it suspects

Whence and how the stream which floats it had a rise and where and how Falls or flows on still! What answer makes the rush except that now

Certainly it floats and is, and, no less certain than itself,

Is the everyway external stream that now through shoal and shelf

Floats it onward, leaves it — may be — wrecked at last, or lands on shore

There to root again and grow and flourish stable evermore.

— May be! mere surmise not knowledge: much conjecture styled belief,

What the rush conceives the stream means through the voyage blind and brief.

Why, because I doubtless am, shall I as doubtless be? "Because 20 God seems good and wise." Yet under this our life's apparent laws Reigns a wrong which, righted once, would give quite other laws to life.

"He seems potent." Potent here, then: why are right and wrong at strife?

Has in life the wrong the better? Happily life ends so soon!

Right predominates in life? Then why two lives and double boon?

"Anyhow, we want it: wherefore want?" Because, without the want,

Life, now human, would be brutish: just that hope, however scant,

Makes the actual life worth leading; take the hope therein away,

All we have to do is surely not endure another day.

This life has its hopes for this life, hopes that promise joy: life done —

30 Out of all the hopes, how many had complete fulfilment? none.

"But the soul is not the body:" and the breath is not the flute;

Both together make the music: either marred and all is mute.

Truce to such old sad contention whence, according as we shape

Most of hope or most of fear, we issue in a half-escape:

"We believe" is sighed. I take the cup of comfort proffered thus,

Taste and try each soft ingredient, sweet infusion, and discuss

What their blending may accomplish for the cure of doubt, till — slow, Sorrowful, but how decided! needs must I o'erturn it — so!

Cause before, effect behind me — blanks! The midway point I am,

Caused, itself — itself efficient: in that 40 narrow space must cram

All experience — out of which there crowds conjecture manifold,

But, as knowledge, this comes only — things may be as I behold,

Or may not be, but, without me and above me, things there are;

I myself am what I know not — ignorance which proves no bar

To the knowledge that I am, and, since I am, can recognise

What to me is pain and pleasure: this is sure, the rest — surmise.

If my fellows are or are not, what may please them and what pain, —

Mere surmise: my own experience — that is knowledge, once again!

I have lived, then, done and suffered, loved and hated, learnt and taught

This — there is no reconciling wisdom 50 with a world distraught,

Goodness with triumphant evil, power with failure in the aim,

If — (to my own sense, remember! though none other feel the same!) —

If you bar me from assuming earth to be a pupil's place,

And life, time, — with all their chances, changes, — just probation-space,

Mine, for me. But those apparent other mortals — theirs, for them?

Knowledge stands on my experience: all outside its narrow hem,

Free surmise may sport and welcome! Pleasures, pains affect mankind

Just as they affect myself? Why, here's my neighbour colour-blind, Eyes like mine to all appearance: "green as grass" do I affirm?

"Red as grass" he contradicts me: which 60 employs the proper term?

Were we two the earth's sole tenants, with no third for referee,

How should I distinguish? just so, God must judge 'twixt man and me.

To each mortal peradventure earth becomes a new machine,

Pain and pleasure no more tally in our sense than red and green; Still, without what seems such mortal's pleasure, pain, my life were lost — Life, my whole sole chance to prove — although at man's apparent cost — What is beauteous and what ugly, right to strive for, right to shun, Fit to help and fit to hinder, — prove my forces everyone, Good and evil, — learn life's lesson, hate of evil, love of good,
 As 'tis set me, understand so much as may be understood — Solve the problem: "From thine apprehended scheme of things, deduce Praise or blame of its contriver, shown a niggard or profuse
 In each good or evil issue! nor miscalculate alike
 Counting one the other in the final balance, which to strike, Soul was born and life allotted: ay, the show of things unfurled For thy summing-up and judgment, — thine, no other mortal's world!"

What though fancy scarce may grapple with the complex and immense — "His own world for every mortal?"
 Postulate omnipotence!
 Limit power, and simple grows the complex: shrunk to atom size, That which loomed immense to fancy low before my reason lies, — I survey it and pronounce it work like other work: success Here and there, the workman's glory, — here and there, his shame no less, Failure as conspicuous. Taunt not "Human work a-pe work divine?" As the power, expect performance! God's be God's as mine is mine!
 God whose power made man and made man's wants, and made, to meet those wants,
 Heaven and earth which, through the body, prove the spirit's ministrants, Excellently all, — did He lack power or was the will in fault When He let blue heaven be shrouded o'er by vapours of the vault, Gay earth drop her garlands shrivelled at the first infecting breath Of the serpent pains which herald, swarming in, the dragon death?
 What, no way but this that man may learn and lay to heart how rife Life were with delights would only death allow their taste to life?
 Must the rose sigh "Pluck — I perish!"
 must the eve weep "Gaze — I fade!"
 — Every sweet warn "Ware my bitter!"
 every shine bid "Wait my shade"?

Can we love but on condition, that the thing we love must die?
 Needs there groan a world in anguish just to teach us sympathy — Multitudinously wretched that we,
 wretched too, may guess What a preferable state were universal happiness?
 Hardly do I so conceive the outcome of that power which went To the making of the worm there in yon clod its tenement, Any more than I distinguish aught of that which, wise and good, Framed the leaf, its plain of pasture, dropped the dew, its finless food.
 Nay, were fancy fact, were earth and all it holds illusion mere,
 Only a machine for teaching love and hate and hope and fear To myself, the sole existence, single truth mid falsehood, — well!
 If the harsh throes of the prelude die not off into the swell Of that perfect piece they sting me to become a-strain for, — if Roughness of the long rock-clamber lead not to the last of cliff, First of level country, where is sward my pilgrim-foot can prize, — Plainlier! if this life's conception new life fail to realise, — Though earth burst and proved a bubble glassing hues of hell, one huge Reflex of the devil's doings — God's work by no subterfuge — (So death's kindly touch informed me as 50 it broke the glamour, gave Soul and body both release from life's long nightmare in the grave) Still, — with no more Nature, no more Man as riddle to be read, Only my own joys and sorrows now to reckon real instead, — I must say — or chke in silence —
 "Howsoever came my fate, Sorrow did and joy did nowise, — life well weighed, — preponderate." By necessity ordained thus? I shall bear as best I can;
 By a cause all-good, all-wise, all-potent?
 No, as I am man!
 Such were God: and was it goodness that the good within my range Or had evil in admixture or grew evil's self by change?
 Wisdom — that becoming wise meant 60 making slow and sure advance From a knowledge proved in error to acknowledged ignorance?
 Power? 'tis just the main assumption reason most revolts at! power Unavailing for bestowment on its creature of an hour,

Man, of so much proper action rightly aimed and reaching aim,
So much passion, — no defect there, no excess, but still the same, — As what constitutes existence, pure perfection bright as brief For yon worm, man's fellow-creature, on yon happier world — its leaf!
No, as I am man, I mourn the poverty I must impute:
Goodness, wisdom, power, all bounded,
each a human attribute!

But, O world outspread beneath me! only for myself I speak, Nowise dare to play the spokesman for my brothers strong and weak, Full and empty, wise and foolish, good and bad, in every age, 10 Every clime, I turn my eyes from, as in one or other stage Of a torture writhe they, Job-like couched on dung and crazed with blains — Wherefore? whereto? ask the whirlwind what the dread voice thence explains!
I shall "vindicate no way of God's to man," nor stand apart,
"Laugh, be candid!" while I watch it traversing the human heart.
Traversed heart must tell its story un-commented on: no less Mine results in "Only grant a second life, I acquiesce
In this present life as failure, count misfortune's worst assaults Triumph, not defeat, assured that loss so much the more exalts Gain about to be. For at what moment did I so advance 20 Near to knowledge as when frustrate of escape from ignorance?
Did not beauty prove most precious when its opposite obtained Rule, and truth seem more than ever potent because falsehood reigned?
While for love — Oh how but, losing loves, does whoso loves succeed By the death-pang to the birth-throe — learning what is love indeed?
Only grant my soul may carry high through death her cup unspilled, Brimming though it be with knowledge, life's loss drop by drop distilled, I shall boast it mine — the balsam, bless each kindly wrench that wrung From life's tree its inmost virtue, tapped the root whence pleasure sprung, Barked the bole, and broke the bough, and bruised the berry, left all grace 30 Ashes in death's stern alembic, loosed elixir in its place!

Witness, Dear and True, how little I was
'ware of — not your worth — That I knew, my heart assures me — but of what a shade on earth Would the passage from my presence of the tall white figure throw O'er the ways we walked together!

Somewhat narrow, somewhat slow Used to seem the ways, the walking: narrow ways are well to tread When there's moss beneath the footstep, honeysuckle overhead: Walking slow to beating bosom surest solace soonest gives, Liberates the brain o'erloaded — best of all restoratives.
Nay, do I forget the open vast where soon or late converged Ways though winding? — world-wide 44 heaven-high sea where music slept or surged
As the angel had ascendant, and Beethoven's Titan mace Smote the immense to storm, Mozart would by a finger's lifting chase?
Yes, I knew — but not with knowledge such as thrills me while I view Yonder precinct which henceforward holds and hides the Dear and True.
Grant me (once again) assurance we shall each meet each some day, Walk — but with how bold a footstep!
on a way — but what a way!
— Worst were best, defeat were triumph, utter loss were utmost gain.
Can it be, and must, and will it?

Silence! Out of fact's domain, Just surmise prepared to mutter hope, and also fear — dispute Fact's inexorable ruling "Outside fact 54 surmise be mute!"
Well!

Ay, well and best, if fact's self I may force the answer from!
'Tis surmise I stop the mouth of. Not above in yonder dome All a rapture with its rose-glow, — not around, where pile and peak Strainingly await the sun's fall, — not beneath, where crickets creak, Birds assemble for their bed-time, soft the tree-top swell subside, — No, nor yet within my deepest sentient self the knowledge hides.
Aspiration, reminiscence, plausibilities of trust
— Now the ready "Man were wronged else," now the rash "and God unjust" — None of these I need. Take thou, my soul, thy solitary stand, Umpire to the champions Fancy, Reason, 64 as on either hand

Amicable war they wage and play the foe in thy behoof!
Fancy thrust and Reason parry! Thine the prize who stand aloof.

FANCY.

I concede the thing refused: henceforth no certainty more plain Than this mere surmise that after body dies soul lives again.
Two, the only facts acknowledged late, are now increased to three — God is, and the soul is, and, as certain, after death shall be.
Put this third to use in life, the time for using fact!

REASON.

I do:

Find it promises advantage, coupled with the other two.
Life to come will be improvement on the life that's now; destroy Body's thwartings, there's no longer screen betwixt soul and soul's joy.
Why should we expect new hindrance, novel tether? In this first Life, I see the good of evil, why our world began at worst: Since time means amelioration, tardily enough displayed, Yet a mainly onward moving, never wholly retrograde.
We know more though we know little, we grow stronger though still weak, Partly see though all too purblind, stammer though we cannot speak.
There is no such grudge in God as scared the ancient Greek, no fresh Substitute of trap for dragnet, once a breakage in the mesh.
Dragons were, and serpents are, and blind-worms will be: ne'er emerged Any new-created python for man's plague since earth was purged.
Failing proof, then, of invented trouble to replace the old, O'er this life the next presents advantage much and manifold: Which advantage — in the absence of a fourth and farther fact Now conceivably surmised, of harm to follow from the act — I pronounce for man's obtaining at this moment. Why delay?
Is he happy? happiness will change: anticipate the day!
Is he sad? there's ready refuge: of all sadness death's prompt cure!
Is he both, in mingled measure? cease a burthen to endure!
Pains with sorry compensations, pleasures stinted in the dole,

Power that sinks and pettiness that soars, 3c all halved and nothing whole, Idle hopes that lure man onward, forced back by as idle fears — What a load he stumbles under through his glad sad seventy years, When a touch sets right the turmoil, lifts his spirit where, flesh-freed, Knowledge shall be rightly named so, all that seems be truth indeed!
Grant his forces no accession, nay, no faculty's increase,
Only let what now exists continue, let him prove in peace Power whereof the interrupted unperfected play enticed Man through darkness; which to lighten any spark of hope sufficed, — What shall then deter his dying out of darkness into light?
Death itself perchance, brief pain that's 4c pang, condensed and infinite?
But at worst, he needs must brave it one day, while, at best, he laughs — Drops a drop within his chalice, sleep not death his science quaffs!
Any moment claims more courage when,
by crossing cold and gloom, Manfully man quits discomfort, makes for the provided room Where the old friends want their fellow, where the new acquaintance wait, Probably for talk assembled, possibly to sup in state!
I affirm and re-affirm it therefore: only make as plain
As that man now lives, that, after dying, man will live again, — Make as plain the absence, also, of a law to contravene Voluntary passage from this life to that by 5c change of scene, —
And I bid him — at suspicion of first cloud athwart his sky, Flower's departure, frost's arrival — never hesitate, but die!

FANCY.

Then I double my concession: grant, along with new life sure, This same law found lacking now: ordain that, whether rich or poor Present life is judged in aught man counts advantage — be it hope, Be it fear that brightens, blackens most or least his horoscope, — He, by absolute compulsion such as made him live at all,
Go on living to the fated end of life what-e'er befall.
What though, as on earth he darkling grovels, man descry the sphere,

Next life's — call it, heaven of freedom, close above and crystal-clear?
He shall find — say, hell to punish who in aught curtails the term, Fain would act the butterfly before he has played out the worm.
God, soul, earth, heaven, hell, — five facts now: what is to desiderate?

REASON.

Nothing! Henceforth man's existence bows to the monition "Wait!
Take the joys and bear the sorrows — neither with extreme concern!
Living here means nescience simply: 'tis next life that helps to learn.
Shut those eyes, next life will open, — stop those ears, next life will teach Hearing's office, — close those lips, next life will give the power of speech!
10 Or, if action more amuse thee than the passive attitude, Bravely bustle through thy being, busy thee for ill or good, Reap this life's success or failure! Soon shall things be unperplexed And the right and wrong, now tangled, lie unravell'd in the next."

FANCY.

Not so fast! Still more concession! not alone do I declare Life must needs be borne, — I also will that man become aware Life has worth incalculable, every moment that he spends So much gain or loss for that next life which on this life depends.
Good, done here, be there rewarded, — evil, worked here, there amerced!
Six facts now, and all established, plain to man the last as first.

REASON.

20 There was good and evil, then, defined to man by this decree?
Was — for at its promulgation both alike have ceased to be.
Prior to this last announcement "Certainly as God exists,
As He made man's soul, as soul is quenches less by the deathly mists, Yet is, all the same, forbidden premature escape from time To eternity's provided purer air and brighter clime, — Just so certainly depends it on the use to which man turns Earth, the good or evil done there, whether after death he earns Life eternal, — heaven, the phrase be, or eternal death, — say, hell.

As his deeds, so proves his portion, doing ill or doing well!"
— Prior to this last announcement, earth 34 was man's probation-place: Liberty of doing evil gave his doing good a grace; Once lay down the law, with Nature's simple "Such effects succeed Causes such, and heaven or hell depends upon man's earthly deed Just as surely as depends the straight or else the crooked line On his making point meet point or with or else without incline," — Thenceforth neither good nor evil does man, doing what he must.
Lay but down that law as stringent "Wouldst thou live again, be just!"
As this other "Wouldst thou live now, regularly draw thy breath!
For, suspend the operation, straight law's breach results in death —" And (provided always, man, addressed this 40 mode, be sound and sane) Prompt and absolute obedience, never doubt, will law obtain!
Tell not me "Look round us! nothing each side but acknowledged law, Now styled God's — now, Nature's edict!" Where's obedience without flaw Paid to either? What's the adage rife in man's mouth? Why, "The
best I both see and praise, the worst I follow" — which, despite professed Seeing, praising, all the same he follows, since he disbelieves In the heart of him that edict which for truth his head receives.
There's evading and persuading and much making law amends Somehow, there's the nice distinction 'twixt fast foes and faulty friends, — Any consequence except inevitable 50 death when "Die, Whoso breaks our law!" they publish,
God and Nature equally.
Law that's kept or broken — subject to man's will and pleasure! Whence?
How comes law to bear eluding? Not because of impotence: Certain laws exist already which to hear means to obey;
Therefore not without a purpose these man must, while those man may Keep and, for the keeping, happily gain approval and reward.
Break through this last superstructure, all is empty air — no sward Firm like my first fact to stand on "God there is, and soul there is,"
And soul's earthly life-allotment: wherein,
by hypothesis,

Soul is bound to pass probation, prove its powers, and exercise Sense and thought on fact, and then, from fact educating fit surmise, Ask itself, and of itself have solely answer, "Does the scope Earth affords of fact to judge by warrant future fear or hope?"

Thus have we come back full circle: fancy's footsteps one by one Go their round conducting reason to the point where they begun, Left where we were left so lately, Dear and True! When, half a week

Since, we walked and talked and thus I told you, how suffused a cheek
You had turned me had I sudden brought the blush into the smile

10 By some word like "Idly argued! you know better all the while!"

Now, from me — Oh not a blush but, how much more, a joyous glow, Laugh triumphant, would it strike did your "Yes, better I do know"

Break, my warrant for assurance! which assurance may not be

If, supplanting hope, assurance needs must change this life to me.

So, I hope — no more than hope, but hope — no less than hope, because I can fathom, by no plumb-line sunk in life's apparent laws,

How I may in any instance fix where change should meetly fall

Nor involve, by one revisal, abrogation of them all:

— Which again involves as utter change in life thus law-released,

20 Whence the good of goodness vanished when the ill of evil ceased.

Whereas, life and laws apparent re-in-stated, — all we know,

All we know not, — o'er our heaven again cloud closes, until, lo —

Hope the arrowy, just as constant, comes to pierce its gloom, compelled

By a power and by a purpose which, if no one else beheld,

I behold in life, so — hope!

Sad summing-up of all to say!

Athanasius contra mundum, why should he hope more than they?

So are men made notwithstanding, such magnetic virtue darts

From each head their fancy haloes to their unresisting hearts!

Here I stand, methinks a stone's throw from yon village I this morn

30 Traversed for the sake of looking one last look at its forlorn

Tenement's ignoble fortune: through a crevice, plain its floor

Piled with provender for cattle, while a dung-heap blocked the door.

In that squalid Bossex, under that obscene red roof, arose,

Like a fiery flying serpent from its egg, a soul — Rousseau's.

Turn thence! Is it Diodati joins the glimmer of the lake?

There I plucked a leaf, one week since, — ivy, plucked for Byron's sake.

Famed unfortunates! And yet, because of that phosphoric fame

Swathing blackness' self with brightness till putridity looked flame,

All the world was witched: and wherefore? what could lie beneath, allure

Heart of man to let corruption serve man's 41 head as cynosure?

Was the magic in the dictum "All that's good is gone and past;

Bad and worse still grows the present, and the worst of all comes last:

Which believe — for I believe it?" So preached one his gospel-news;

While melodious moaned the other "Dying day with dolphin-hues!

Storm, for loveliness and darkness like a woman's eye! Ye mounts

Where I climb to 'scape my fellow, and thou sea wherein he counts

Not one inch of vile dominion! What were your especial worth

Failed ye to enforce the maxim 'Of all objects found on earth

Man is meanest, much too honoured when compared with — what by odds

Beats him — any dog: so, let him go 50 a-howling to his gods!

Which believe — for I believe it!" such the comfort man received

Sadly since perforce he must: for why? the famous bard believed!

Fame! Then, give me fame, a moment! As I gather at a glance

Human glory after glory vivifying yon expanse,

Let me grasp them all together, hold on high and brandish well

Beacon-like above the rapt world ready, whether heaven or hell

Send the dazzling summons earthward, to submit itself the same,

Take on trust the hope or else despair flashed full on face by — Fame!

Thanks, thou pine-tree of Makistos, wide thy giant torch I wave!

Know ye whence I plucked the pillar, late 63 with sky for architrave?

This the trunk, the central solid knowledge, kindled core, began

Tugging earth-deeps, trying heaven-heights, rooted yonder at Lausanne.
 This which flits and spits, the aspic, — sparkles in and out the boughs Now, and now condensed, the python, coiling round and round allows Scarce the bole its due effulgence, dulled by flake on flake of Wit — Laughter so bejewels Learning, — what but Ferney nourished it?
 Nay, nor fear — since every resin feeds the flame — that I dispense With yon Bossex terebinth-tree's all-explosive Eloquence:
 No, be sure! nor, any more than thy resplendency, Jean-Jacques, Dare I want thine, Diodati! What though monkeys and macaques 10 Gibber "Byron"? Byron's ivy rears a branch beyond the crew, Green for ever, no deciduous trash macaques and monkeys chew!
 As Rousseau, then, eloquent, as Byron prime in poet's power, — Detonations, fulgurations, smiles — the rainbow, tears — the shower, — Lo, I lift the coruscating marvel — Fame!
 and, famed, declare — Learned for the nonce as Gibbon, witty as wit's self Voltaire . . .
 O the sorriest of conclusions to whatever man of sense
 Mid the millions stands the unit, takes no flare for evidence!
 Yet the millions have their portion, live their calm or troublous day, Find significance in fireworks: so, by help of mine, they may

Confidently lay to heart and lock in head 20 their life long — this:
 "He there with the brand flamboyant, broad o'er night's forlorn abyss, Crowned by prose and verse; and wielding, with Wit's bauble, Learning's rod" . . .
 Well? Why, he at least believed in Soul, was very sure of God.

So the poor smile played, that evening:
 pallid smile long since extinct Here in London's mid-November! Not so loosely thoughts were linked, Six weeks since as I, descending in the sunset from Salève, Found the chain, I seemed to forge there, flawless till it reached your grave, — Not so filmy was the texture, but I bore it in my breast Safe thus far. And since I found a something in me would not rest Till I, link by link, unravelled any tangle 30 of the chain,
 — Here it lies, for much or little! I have lived all o'er again That last pregnant hour: I saved it, just as I could save a root Disinterred for re-interment when the time best helps to shoot.
 Life is stocked with germs of torpid life;
 but may I never wake Those of mine whose resurrection could not be without earthquake!
 Rest all such, unraised for ever! Be this, sad yet sweet, the sole Memory evoked from slumber! Least part this: then what the whole?

THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC.

1878.

[Poet Number One is René Gentilhomme, page to the Prince of Condé, whose chance of succession to the French throne was spoilt by Anne of Austria giving birth to a dauphin. The poem partly turns on this incident. Poet Number Two is Maillard, who managed to make Voltaire look foolish in the circumstances narrated in this poem.]

I.

SUCH a starved bank of moss
Till that May-morn, Blue ran the flash across:
Violets were born!

II.

Sky — what a scowl of cloud Till, near and far,
Ray on ray split the shroud Splendid, a star!

III.

World — how it walled about Life with disgrace Till God's own smile came out:
That was thy face!

THE TWO POETS OF CROISIC.

I.

"FAME!" Yes, I said it and you read it.
First,
Praise the good log-fire! Winter howls without.
Crowd closer, let us! Ha, the secret nursed
Inside yon hollow, crusted roundabout With copper where the clamp was, — how the burst
Vindicates flame the stealthy feeder!
Spout
Thy splendidest — a minute and no more?
So soon again all sobered as before?

II.

Nay, for I need to see your face! One
stroke
Adroitly dealt, and lo, the pomp revealed!
Fire in his pandemonium, heart of oak Palatial, where he wrought the works concealed Beneath the solid-seeming roof I broke,
As redly up and out and off they reeled Like disconcerted imps, those thousand sparks
From fire's slow tunnelling of vaults and arcs!

III.

Up, out, and off, see! Were you never used, —
You now, in childish days or rather 30
nights, —
As I was, to watch sparks fly? not amused By that old nurse-taught game which gave the sprites
Each one his title and career, — confused Belief 'twas all long over with the flights From earth to heaven of hero, sage and bard,
And bade them once more strive for Fame's award?

IV.

New long bright life! and happy chance befell —
That I know — when some prematurely
lost
Child of disaster bore away the bell From some too-pampered son of fortune, 40 crossed
Never before my chimney broke the spell!
Octogenarian Keats gave up the ghost, While — never mind Who was it com-bered earth — Sank stifled, span-long brightness, in the birth.

V.

Well, try a variation of the game!
Our log is old ship-timber, broken bulk.
There's sea-brine spirits up the brimstone
flame,
That crimson-curly spiral proves the hulk
Was saturate with — ask the chloride's
name
From somebody who knows! I shall 50 not sulk
If yonder greenish tonguelet licked from brass
Its life, I thought was fed on copperas.

VI.

Anyhow, there they flutter! What may be The style and prowess of that purple
one?
Who is the hero other eyes shall see Than yours and mine? That yellow deep to dun—

Conjecture how the sage glows, whom not
we
But those unborn are to get warmth by!
Son
O' the coal, — as Job and Hebrew name a spark, —
What bard, in thy red soaring, scares the dark?

VII.

Oh and the lesser lights, the dearer still That they elude a vulgar eye, give ours
The glimpse repaying astronomic skill Which searched sky deeper, passed those patent powers Constellate proudly, — swords, scrolls, harps, that fill 10 The vulgar eye to surfeit, — found best flowers
Hid deepest in the dark, — named un-plucked grace
Of soul, ungathered beauty, form or face!

VIII.

Up with thee, mouldering ash men never
knew,
But I know! flash thou forth, and figure
bold,
Calm and columnar as yon flame I view!
Oh and I bid thee, — to whom fortune doled Scantly all other gifts out — bicker blue, Beauty for all to see, zinc's uncontrolled Flake-brilliance! Not my fault if these were shown, 20 Grandeur and beauty both, to me alone.

IX.

No! as the first was boy's play, this proves mere Stripling's amusement: manhood's sport be grave!
Choose rather sparkles quenched in mid
career,
Their boldness and their brightness could not save (In some old night of time on some lone drear Sea-coast, monopolised by crag or cave)
— Save from ignoble exit into smoke, Silence, oblivion, all death-damps that choke!

X.

Launched by our ship-wood, float we, once adrift
30 In fancy to that land-strip waters wash, We both know well! Where uncouth tribes made shift Long since to just keep life in, billows dash
Nigh over folk who shudder at each lift
Of the old tyrant tempest's whirlwind-lash

Though they have built the serviceable
town
Tempests but tease now, billows drench, not drown.

XI.

Croisic, the spit of sandy rock which juts Spitefully northward, bears nor tree nor shrub
To tempt the ocean, show what Guérande shuts Behind her, past wild Batz whose Saxons grub
The ground for crystals grown where ocean gluts
Their promontory's breadth with salt:
all stub
Of rock and stretch of sand, the land's last
strife
To rescue a poor remnant for dear life.

XII.

And what life! Here was, from the world to choose,
The Druids' chosen chief of homes: they reared — Only their women, — mid the slush and ooze
Of yon low islet, — to their sun, revered In strange stone guise, — a temple. May-dawn dews Saw the old structure levelled; when there peered May's earliest eve-star, high and wide once
more
Up towered the new pile perfect as before:

XIII.

Seeing that priestesses — and all were
such —
Unbuilt and then rebuilt it every May,
Each alike helping — well, if not too much!
For, mid their eagerness to outstrip day
And get work done, if any loosed her clutch And let a single stone drop, straight a
prey
Herself fell, torn to pieces, limb from limb,
By sisters in full chorus glad and grim.

XIV.

And still so much remains of that grey cult,
That even now, of nights, do women steal
To the sole Menhir standing, and insult The antagonistic church-spire by appeal
To power discrowned in vain, since each adult Believes the gruesome thing she clasps may heal
Whatever plague no priestly help can cure:
Kiss but the cold stone, the event is sure!

XV.

Nay more: on May-morns, that primeval
rite
Of temple-building, with its punishment For rash precipitation, lingers, spite Of all remonstrance; vainly are they shent,
Those girls who form a ring and, dressed in white, Dance round it, till some sister's strength be spent:
Touch but the Menhir, straight the rest turn roughs
From gentles, fall on her with fisticuffs.

XVI.

Oh and, for their part, boys from door to door
Sing unintelligible words to tunes
As obsolete: "scraps of Druidic lore," Sigh scholars, as each pale man importunes Vainly the mumbling to speak plain once
more.
Enough of this old worship, rounds and runes!
They serve my purpose, which is but to
show Croisic to-day and Croisic long ago.

XVII.

What have we sailed to see, then, wafted
there
By fancy from the log that ends its days Of much adventure 'neath skies foul or
fair,
On waters rough or smooth, in this good blaze
We two crouch round so closely, bidding
care
Keep outside with the snow-storm?
Something says
"Fit time for story-telling!" I begin—Why not at Croisic, port we first put in?

XVIII.

Anywhere serves: for point me out the
place
Wherever man has made himself a home,
And there I find the story of our race In little, just at Croisic as at Rome.
What matters the degree? the kind I trace.
30 Druids their temple, Christians have their dome:
So with mankind; and Croisic, I'll engage,
With Rome yields sort for sort, in age for age.

XIX.

No doubt, men vastly differ: and we need Some strange exceptional benevolence Of nature's sunshine to develop seed

So well, in the less-favoured clime, that
thence
We may discern how shrub means tree
indeed
Though dwarfed till scarcely shrub in evidence.
Man in the ice-house or the hot-house ranks With beasts or gods: stove-forced, give 40 warmth the thanks!

XX.

While, is there any ice-checked? Such shall learn
I am thankworthy, who propose to slake
His thirst for tasting how it feels to turn Cedar from hyssop-on-the-wall. I wake No memories of what is harsh and stern
In ancient Croisic-nature, much less rake
The ashes of her last warmth till out leaps Live Hervé Riel, the single spark she keeps.

XXI.

Take these two, see, each outbreak, — spirt and spirt
Of fire from our brave billet's either 50
edge
Which — call maternal Croisic ocean-girt!
These two shall thoroughly redeem my pledge.
One flames fierce gules, its feebler rival — vert, Heralds would tell you: heroes, I allege,
They both were: soldiers, sailors, statesmen, priests, Lawyers, physicians — guess what gods or beasts!

XXII.

None of them all, but — poets, if you
please!
"What, even there, endowed with knack
of rhyme,
Did two among the aborigines Of that rough region pass the ungracious 60
time
Suiting, to rumble-tumble of the sea's,
The songs forbidden a serener clime?
Or had they universal audience — that's To say, the folk of Croisic, ay and Batz?"

XXIII.

Open your ears! Each poet in his day Had such a mighty moment of success
As pinnaced him straight, in full display, For the whole world to worship — nothing less!
Was not the whole polite world Paris,
pray?
And did not Paris, for one moment — 70
yes, Worship these poet-flames, our red and green,
One at a time, a century between?

XXIV.

And yet you never heard their names!

Assist,
Clio, Historic Muse, while I record Great deeds! Let fact, not fancy, break the mist

And bid each sun emerge, in turn play
lord

Of day, one moment! Hear the annalist Tell a strange story, true to the least
word!

At Croisic, sixteen hundred years and ten Since Christ, forth flamed yon liquid ruby,
then.

XXV.

Know him henceforth as René Gentilhomme

10 — Appropriate appellation! noble birth And knightly blazon, the device where-
from

Was "Better do than say"! In Croisic's
dearth

Why prison his career while Christendom Lay open to reward acknowledged
worth?

He therefore left it at the proper age
And got to be the Prince of Condé's page.

XXVI.

Which Prince of Condé, whom men called "The Duke,"

— Failing the king, his cousin, of an heir, (As one might hold would hap, without rebuke,

20 Since Anne of Austria, all the world was
'ware,

Twenty-three years long sterile, scarce could look

For issue) — failing Louis of so rare
A godsend, it was natural the Prince Should hear men call him "Next King" too, nor wince.

XXVII.

Now, as this reasonable hope, by growth Of years, nay, tens of years, locked plump almost

To bursting, — would the brothers, childless both,

Louis and Gaston, give but up the ghost —

Condé, called "Duke" and "Next King," nothing loth

30 Awaited his appointment to the post,
And wiled away the time, as best he might,
Till Providence should settle things aright.

XXVIII.

So, at a certain pleasure-house, withdrawn From cities where a whisper breeds
offence,

He sat him down to watch the streak of dawn

Testify to first stir of Providence;
And, since dull country life makes courtiers
yawn,

There wanted not a poet to dispense Song's remedy for spleen-fits all and some,
Which poet was Page René Gentilhomme. 44

XXIX.

A poet born and bred, his very sire

A poet also, author of a piece Printed and published, "Ladies — their attire;"

Therefore the son, just born at his decease,

Was bound to keep alive the sacred fire,
And kept it, yielding moderate increase Of songs and sonnets, madrigals, and much Rhyming thought poetry and praised as such.

XXX.

Rubbish unutterable (bear in mind!)

Rubbish not wholly without value, 50
though,

Being to compliment the Duke designed

And bring the complimenter credit so, — Pleasure with profit happily combined.

Thus René Gentilhomme rhymed, rhymed till — lo,

This happened, as he sat in an alcove Elaborating rhyme for "love" — not "dove."

XXXI.

He was alone: silence and solitude

Befit the votary of the Muse. Around, Nature — not our new picturesque and
rude,

But trim tree-cinctured stately garden- 60
ground —

Breathed polish and politeness. Allimbued

With these, he sat absorbed in one profound

Excogitation "Were it best to hint Or boldly boast 'She loves me, — Araminte?'"

XXXII.

When suddenly flashed lightning, searing
sight

Almost, so close to eyes; then, quick on flash,

Followed the thunder, splitting earth down-
right

Where René sat a-rhyming: with huge crash

Of marble into atoms infinite —

Marble which, stately, dared the world 70 to dash

The stone-thing proud, high-pillared, from its place:

One flash, and dust was all that lay at base.

XXXIII.

So, when the horrible confusion loosed Its wrappage round his senses, and, with
 breath,
 Seeing and hearing by degrees induced Conviction what he felt was life, not
 death —
 His fluttered faculties came back to roost
 One after one, as fowls do: ay, beneath,
 About his very feet there, lay in dust Earthly presumption paid by heaven's dis-gus!

XXXIV.

For, what might be the thunder-smitten
 thing
 But, pillared high and proud, in marble
 guise,
 A ducal crown — which meant "Now Duke: Next, King"?
 Since such the Prince was, not in his own eyes Alone, but all the world's. Pebble from sling Prostrates a giant; so can pulverise Marble pretension — how much more, make moult
 A peacock-prince his plume — God's thunderbolt.

XXXV.

That was enough for René, that first fact Thus flashed into him. Up he looked:
 all blue
 And bright the sky above; earth firm, compact Beneath his footing, lay apparent too;
 Opposite stood the pillar: nothing lacked There, but the Duke's crown: see, its fragments strew
 The earth, — about his feet lie atoms fine Where he sat nursing late his fourteenth line!

XXXVI.

So, for the moment, all the universe Being abolished, all 'twixt God and
 him, —
 Earth's praise or blame, its blessing or its curse,
 Of one and the same value, — to the brim Flooded with truth for better or for
 worse, —
 He pounces on the writing-paper, prim, Keeping its place on table: not a dint Nor speck had damaged "Ode to Araminte."

XXXVII.

And over the neat crowquill calligraph
 His pen goes blotting, blurring, as an ox Tramples a flower-bed in a garden, —
 laugh

You may! — so does not he, whose quick heart knocks Audibly at his breast: an epitaph On earth's break-up, amid the falling rocks,
 He might be penning in a wild dismay, Caught with his work half-done on Judg- 40 ment Day.

XXXVIII.

And what is it so terribly he pens, Ruining "Cupid, Venus, wile and smile, Hearts, darts," and all his day's divinior
mens Judged necessary to a perfect style?
 Little recks René, with a breast to cleanse, Of Rhadamanthine law that reigned ere-
 while:
 Brimful of truth, truth's outburst will convince (Style or no style) who bears truth's brunt — the Prince.

XXXIX.

"Condé, called 'Duke,' be called just 'Duke,' not more
 To life's end! 'Next King' thou for- 50 sooth wilt be?
 Ay, when this bauble, as it decked before Thy pillar, shall again, for France to see, Take its proud station there! Let France adore
 No longer an illusive mock-sun — thee —
 But keep her homage for Sol's self, about To rise and put pretenders to the rout!

XL.

"What? France so God-abandoned that her root Regal, though many a Spring it gave no
 sign,
 Lacks power to make the bole, now branchless, shoot Greenly as ever? Nature, though be- 60
 nign, Thwarts ever the ambitious and astute.
 In store for such is punishment condign: Sure as thy Duke's crown to the earth was hurled,
 So sure, next year, a Dauphin glads the world!"

XLI.

Which penned — some forty lines to this effect —
 Our René folds his paper, marches brave Back to the mansion, luminous, erect, Triumphant, an emancipated slave.
 There stands the Prince. "How now?
 My Duke's crown wrecked?
 What may this mean?" The answer 70 René gave

Was — handing him the verses, with the due Incline of body: "Sir, God's word to you!"

XLII.

The Prince read, paled, was silent; all around,
The courtier-company, to whom he passed
The paper, read, in equal silence bound.
René grew also by degrees aghast
At his own fit of courage — palely found Way of retreat from that pale presence: classed Once more among the cony-kind. "Oh,
son,
It is a feeble folk!" saith Solomon.

XLIII.

Vainly he apprehended evil: since,
When, at the year's end, even as foretold,
Forth came the Dauphin who discrowned
the Prince
Of that long-craved mere visionary gold,
'Twas no fit time for envy to evince Malice, be sure! The timidest grew
bold:
Of all that courtier-company not one But left the semblance for the actual sun.

XLIV.

And all sorts and conditions that stood by 20 At René's burning moment, bright escape
Of soul, bore witness to the prophecy.
Which witness took the customary shape
Of verse; a score of poets in full cry Hailed the inspired one. Nantes and Tours agape, Soon Paris caught the infection; gaining
strength,
How could it fail to reach the Court at length?

XLV.

"O poet!" smiled King Louis, "and besides,
O prophet! Sure, by miracle announced,
My babe will prove a prodigy. Who chides 30 Henceforth the unchilded monarch shall be trounced

For irreligion: since the fool derides Plain miracle by which this prophet pounced

Exactly on the moment I should lift Like Simeon, in my arms, a babe, 'God's gift!"

XLVI.

"So call the boy! and call this bard and seer

By a new title! him I raise to rank Of 'Royal Poet': poet without peer!
Whose fellows only have themselves to thank
If humbly they must follow in the rear My René. He's the master: they must clank
Their chains of song, confessed his slaves;
for why?
They poetise, while he can prophesy!"

XLVII.

So said, so done; our René rose august,
"The Royal Poet;" straightway put in type
His poem-prophecy, and (fair and just Procedure) added, — now that time was ripe
For proving friends did well his word to trust, —
Those attestations, turned to lyre or
pipe,
Which friends broke out with when he dared foretell
The Dauphin's birth: friends trusted, and did well.

XLVIII.

Moreover he got painted by Du Pré, Engraved by Daret also, and prefixed
The portrait to his book: a crown of bay Circled his brows, with rose and myrtle mixed;
And Latin verses, lovely in their way, Described him as "the biforked hill betwixt:
Since he hath scaled Parnassus at one
jump,
Joining the Delphic quill and Getic trump."

XLIX.

Whereof came . . . What, it lasts, our spirt, thus long — The red fire? That's the reason must excuse
My letting flicker René's prophet-song
No longer; for its pertinacious hues Must fade before its fellow joins the throng
Of sparks departed up the chimney, dues To dark oblivion. At the word, it winks Rallies, relapses, dwindles, deathwar-sinks!

L.

So does our poet. All this burst of fam Fury of favour, Royal Poetship, Prophetship, book, verse, picture — thereo-
came — Nothing! That's why I would not let outstrip
Red his green rival flamelet: just the same Ending in smoke waits both! In vain we rip

The past, no further faintest trace remains Of René to reward our pious pains.

LI.

Somebody saw a portrait framed and glazed
At Croisic. "Who may be this glorified Mortal unheard-of hitherto?" amazed That person asked the owner by his side, Who proved as ignorant. The question raised Provoked inquiry; key by key was tried On Croisic's portrait-puzzle, till back flew The wards at one key's touch, which key was— Who?

LII.

The other famous poet! Wait thy turn,
Thou green, our red's competitor!
Enough
Just now to note 'twas he that itched to learn (A hundred years ago) how fate could puff Heaven-high (a hundred years before) then spurn
To suds so big a bubble in some huff: Since green too found red's portrait, — having heard Hitherto of red's rare self not one word.

LIII.

And he with zeal addressed him to the task Of hunting out, by all and any means, — Who might the brilliant bard be, born to bask Butterfly-like in shine which kings and queens
And baby-dauphins shed? Much need to ask!
Is fame so fickle that what perks and preens
The eyed wing, one imperial minute, dips
Next sudden moment into blind eclipse?

LIV.

After a vast expenditure of pains, Our second poet found the prize he sought: Urged in his search by something that restrains From undue triumph famed ones who have fought,
Or simply, poetising, taxed their brains: Something that tells such — dear is triumph bought
If it means only basking in the midst Of fame's brief sunshine, as thou, René, didst.

LV.

For, what did searching find at last but
this?

Quoth somebody "I somehow somewhere seem To think I heard one old De Chevaye is Or was possessed of René's works!" which gleam
Of light from out the dark proved not amiss
To track, by correspondence on the 40
theme;
And soon the twilight broadened into day,
For thus to question answered De Chevaye.

LVI.

"True it is, I did once possess the works You want account of — works — to call them so,
Comprised in one small book: the volume lurks (Some fifty leaves in duodecimo)
'Neath certain ashes which my soul it irks Still to remember, because long ago
That and my other rare shelf-occupants Perished by burning of my house at Nante, 50

LVII.

"Yet of that book one strange particular Still stays in mind with me" — and thereupon Followed the story. "Few the poems
are;
The book was two-thirds filled up with this one,
And sundry witnesses from near and far That here at least was prophesying done
By prophet, so as to preclude all doubt, Before the thing he prophesied about."

LVIII.

That's all he knew, and all the poet
learned,
And all that you and I are like to hear 60
Of René; since not only book is burned But memory extinguished, — nay, I
fear,
Portrait is gone too: nowhere I discerned
A trace of it at Croisic. "Must a tear Needs fall for that?" you smile. "How fortune fares
With such a mediocrity, who cares?"

LIX.

Well, I care — intimately care to have Experience how a human creature felt In after-life, who bore the burden grave
Of certainly believing God had dealt 70 For once directly with him: did not rave
— A maniac, did not find his reason melt
— An idiot, but went on, in peace or
strife,
The world's way, lived an ordinary life.

LX.

How many problems that one fact would solve!

An ordinary soul, no more, no less,
About whose life earth's common sights revolve,

On whom is brought to bear, by thunder-stress,

This fact — God tasks him, and will not absolve

Task's negligent performer! Can you guess

How such a soul, — the task performed to point, —

Goes back to life nor finds things out of joint?

LXI.

Does he stand stock-like henceforth? or proceed

10 Dizzily, yet with course straightforward still,

Down-trampling vulgar hindrance? — as the reed

Is crushed beneath its tramp when that blind will

Hatched in some old-world beast's brain bids it speed

Where the sun wants brute-presence to fulfil

Life's purpose in a new far zone, ere ice Enwomb the pasture-tract its fortalice.

LXII.

I think no such direct plain truth consists With actual sense and thought and what they take

To be the solid walls of life: mere mists —

20 How such would, at that truth's first piercing, break

Into the nullity they are! — slight lists Wherein the puppet-champions wage, for sake

Of some mock-mistress, mimic war: laid low

At trumpet-blast, there's shown the world, one foe!

LXIII.

No, we must play the pageant out, observe

The tourney-regulations, and regard Success — to meet the blunted spear nor swerve,

Failure — to break no bones yet fall on sword;

Must prove we have — not courage? well then, — nerve!

30 And, at the day's end, boast the crown's award —

Be warranted as promising to wield Weapons, no sham, in a true battle-field.

LXIV.

Meantime, our simulated thunderclaps
Which tell us counterfeited truths — these same

Are — sound, when music storms the soul, perhaps?

— Sight, beauty, every dart of every aim That touches just, then seems, by strange relapse,

To fall effectless from the soul it came

As if to fix its own, but simply smote And startled to vague beauty more remote?

LXV.

So do we gain enough — yet not too much —

Acquaintance with that outer element Wherein there's operation (call it such!)

Quite of another kind than we the pent On earth are proper to receive. Our hutch Lights up at the least chink: let roof be rent —

How inmates huddle, blinded at first

spasm, Cognisant of the sun's self through the chasm!

LXVI.

Therefore, who knows if this our René's quick

Subsidence from as sudden noise and glare

Into oblivion was impolitic?

No doubt his soul became at once aware That, after prophecy, the rhyming-trick

Is poor employment: human praises scare

Rather than soothe ears all a-tingle yet With tones few hear and live, but none

forget.

LXVII.

There's our first famous poet. Step thou forth

Second consummate songster! See, the tongue

Of fire that typifies thee, owns thy worth In yellow, purple mixed its green among, 6

No pure and simple resin from the North,
But composite with virtues that belong

To Southern culture! Love not more than hate

Helped to a blaze . . . But I anticipate.

LXVIII.

Prepare to witness a combustion rich
And riotously splendid, far beyond

Poor René's lambent little streamer which Only played candle to a Court grown

fond
By baby-birth: this soared to such a pitch,

Alternately such colours doffed and
donned,
That when I say it dazzled Paris — please Know that it brought Voltaire upon his knees!

LXIX.

Who did it, was a dapper gentleman, Paul Desforges Maillard, Croisickese by
birth,
Whose birth that century ended which began

By similar bestowment on our earth
Of the aforesaid René. Cease to scan The ways of Providence! See Croisic's
dearth —

o Not Paris in its plenitude — suffice To furnish France with her best poet twice!

LXX.

Till he was thirty years of age, the vein Poetic yielded rhyme by drops and spirts:

In verses of society had lain His talent chiefly; but the Muse asserts

Privilege most by treating with disdain Epics the bard mouths out, or odes he blurts

Spasmodically forth. Have people time And patience nowadays for thought in rhyme?

LXXI.

o So, his achievements were the quatrain's inch

Of homage, or at most the sonnet's ell
+ If admiration: welded lines with clinch

Of ending word and word, to every belle In Croisic's bounds; these, brisk as any linch,

He twittered till his fame had reached
as well

Guérande as Batz; but there fame stopped, for — curse

On fortune — outside lay the universe!

LXXII.

That's Paris. Well, — why not break bounds, and send

Song onward till it echo at the gates o Of Paris whither all ambitions tend,

And end too, seeing that success there sates

The soul which hungers most for fame?
Why spend

A minute in deciding, while, by Fate's Decree, there happens to be just the prize Proposed there, suiting souls that poetise?

LXXIII.

A prize indeed, the Academy's own self Proposes to what bard shall best indite

A piece describing how, through shoal and shelf,

The Art of Navigation, steered aright, Has, in our last king's reign, — the lucky 40
elf, —

Reached, one may say, Perfection's haven quite,

And there cast anchor. At a glance one sees

The subject's crowd of capabilities!

LXXIV.

Neptune and Amphitrité! Thetis, who Is either Tethys or as good — both tag!

Triton can shove along a vessel too:

It's Virgil! Then the winds that blow or lag,

De Maille, Vendôme, Vermandois! Toulouse blew

Longest, we reckon: he must puff the flag

To fullest outflare; while our lacking 50 nymph

Be Anne of Austria, Regent o'er the lymph!

LXXV.

Promised, performed! Since irritabilis gens

Holds of the feverish impotence that strives

To stay an itch by prompt resource to pen's

Scratching itself on paper; placid lives, Leisurely works mark the divinior mens:

Bees brood above the honey in their hives;

Gnats are the busy bustlers. Splash and scrawl, —

Completed lay thy piece, swift penman Paul!

LXXVI.

To Paris with the product! This dis- 60
patched,

One had to wait the Forty's slow and
sure

Verdict, as best one might. Our penman scratched

Away perforce the itch that knows no cure

But daily paper-friction: more than matched

His first feat by a second — tribute pure
And heartfelt to the Forty when their voice Should peal with one accord "Be Paul our choice!"

LXXVII.

Scratch, scratch went much laudation of that sane

And sound Tribunal, delegates august Of Phœbus and the Muses' sacred train — 70

Whom every poetaster tries to thrust

From where, high-throned, they dominate
the Seine:

Fruitless endeavour, — fail it shall and
must!

Whereof in witness have not one and all The Forty voices pealed "Our Choice be Paul"?

LXXVIII.

Thus Paul discounted his applause.
Alack

For human expectation! Scarcely ink Was dry when, lo, the perfect piece came
back

Rejected, shamed! Some other poet's clink

"Thetis and Tethys" had seduced the pack

10 Of pedants to declare perfection's pink A singularly poor production. "Whew!
The Forty are stark fools, I always knew."

LXXIX.

First fury over (for Paul's race — to-wit, Brain-vibrios — wriggle clear of proto-plasm

Into minute life that's one fury-fit), "These fools shall find a bard's enthusiasm

Comports with what should counterbalance it —

Some knowledge of the world! No doubt, orgasm

Effects the birth of verse which, born,
demands

20 Prosaic ministration, swaddling-bands!

LXXX.

"Verse must be cared for at this early
stage,

Handled, nay dandled even. I should
play

Their game indeed if, till it grew of age,
I meekly let these dotards frown away

My bantling from the rightful heritage Of smiles and kisses! Let the public
say

If it be worthy praises or rebukes, My poem, from these Forty old perukes!"

LXXXI.

So, by a friend, who boasts himself in grace 30 With no less than the Chevalier La Roque, —

Eminent in those days for pride of place, Seeing he had it in his power to block

The way or smooth the road to all the race

Of literators trudging up to knock At Fame's exalted temple-door — for
why?

He edited the Paris "Mercury": —

LXXXII.

By this friend's help the Chevalier receives Paul's poem, prefaced by the due appeal

To Cæsar from the Jews. As duly heaves
A sigh the Chevalier, about to deal

With case so customary — turns the leaves, Finds nothing there to borrow, beg or steal —

Then brightens up the critic's brow deep-lined.

"The thing may be so cleverly declined!"

LXXXIII.

Down to desk, out with paper, up with quill,

Dip and indite! "Sir, gratitude immense

For this true draught from the Pierian rill!
Our Academic clodpoles must be dense Indeed to stand unirrigated still.

No less, we critics dare not give offence

To grantees like the Forty: while we mock

We grin and bear. So, here's your piece!
La Roque."

LXXXIV.

"There now!" cries Paul: "the fellow can't avoid

Confessing that my piece deserves the palm;

And yet he dares not grant me space enjoyed

By every scribbler he permits embalm His crambo in the Journal's corner!

Cloyed

With stuff like theirs, no wonder if a qualm

Be caused by verse like mine: though that's no cause

For his defrauding me of just applause. 6

LXXXV.

"Aha, he fears the Forty, this poltroon?
First let him fear me! Change smooth speech to rough!

I'll speak my mind out, show the fellow
soon

Who is the foe to dread: insist enough
On my own merits till, as clear as noon,

He sees I am no man to take rebuff As patiently as scribblers may and must!

Quick to the onslaught, out sword, cut and thrust!"

LXXXVI.

And thereupon a fierce epistle flings
Its challenge in the critic's face. Alack!

Our bard mistakes his man! The gauntlet rings

On brazen visor proof against attack.

Prompt from his editorial throne up springs
The insulted magnate, and his mace falls, thwack, On Paul's devoted brainpan, — quite
away
From common courtesies of fencing-play!

LXXXVII.

"Sir, will you have the truth? This piece of yours
Is simply execrable past belief.
I shrank from saying so; but, since nought cures
Conceit but truth, truth's at your service! Brief, Just so long as 'The Mercury' endures,
So long are you excluded by its Chief From corner, nay, from cranny! Play the cock
O' the roost, henceforth, at Croisic!" wrote La Roque.

LXXXVIII.

Paul yellowed, whitened, as his wrath from red Waxed incandescent. Now, this man of rhyme
Was merely foolish, faulty in the head Not heart of him: conceit's a venial
crime.
"Oh by no means malicious!" cousins
said:
Fussily feeble, — harmless all the time, Piddling at so-called satire — well-advised,
He held in most awe whom he satirised.

LXXXIX.

Accordingly his kith and kin — removed From emulation of the poet's gift By power and will — these rather liked, nay, loved
The man who gave his family a lift Out of the Croisic level; "disapproved Satire so trenchant." Thus our poet sniffed Home-incense, though too churlish to unlock
The Mercury's" box of ointment was La Roque.

xc.

But when Paul's visage grew from red to
white,
And from his lips a sort of mumbling fell Of who was to be kicked, — "And serve him right" —
A gay voice interposed — "did kicking
well Answer the purpose! Only — if I might Suggest as much — a far more potent
spell

Lies in another kind of treatment. Oh, Women are ready at resource, you know!

XCI.

"Talent should minister to genius! Good:
The proper and superior smile returns.
Hear me with patience! Have you understood
The only method whereby genius earns 40 Fit guerdon nowadays? In knightly mood You entered lists with visor up; one learns Too late that, had you mounted Roland's
crest,
'Room!' they had roared — La Roque with all the rest!

XCII.

"Why did you first of all transmit your
piece
To those same priggish Forty unprepared Whether to rank you with the swans or geese
By friendly intervention? If they dared Count you a cackler, — wonders never cease!
I think it still more wondrous that you 50 bared
Your brow (my earlier image) as if praise Were gained by simple fighting nowadays!

XCIII.

"Your next step showed a touch of the true means Whereby desert is crowned: not force but wile Came to the rescue. 'Get behind the scenes!'
Your friend advised: he writes, sets forth your style
And title, to such purpose intervenes That you get velvet-compliment three-
pile;
And, though 'The Mercury' said 'nay,' nor stock
Nor stone did his refusal prove La Roque. 60

XCIV.

"Why must you needs revert to the high
hand,
Imperative procedure — what you call
'Taking on merit your exclusive stand'?
Stand, with a vengeance! Soon you went to wall,
You and your merit! Only fools command
When folk are free to disobey them,
Paul!
You've learnt your lesson, found out what's o'clock,
By this uncivil answer of La Roque.

XCV.

"Now let me counsel! Lay this piece on
 self — Masterpiece though it be! From out your desk Hand me some lighter sample, verse the
 elf
 Cupid inspired you with, no god grotesque
 Presiding o'er the Navy! I myself Hand-write what's legible yet picturesque;
 I'll copy fair and femininely frock
 Your poem masculine that courts La Roque!

XCVI.

1 "Deidamia he — Achilles thou!
 10 Ha, ha, these ancient stories come so apt!
 My sex, my youth, my rank I next avow
 In a neat prayer for kind perusal.
 Sapped
 I see the walls which stand so stoutly now!
 I see the toils about the game entrapped By honest cunning! Chains of lady'ssmock,
 Not thorn and thistle, tether fast La Roque!"

XCVII.

Now, who might be the speaker sweet and arch
 That laughed above Paul's shoulder as it heaved
 With the indignant heart? — bade steal a march 20 And not continue charging? Who conceived
 This plan which set our Paul, like pea you parch
 On fire-shovel, skipping, of a load relieved,
 From arm-chair moodiness to escritoire
 Sacred to Phœbus and the tuneful choir?

XCVIII.

Who but Paul's sister! named of course like him
 "Desforges"; but, mark you, in those days a queer Custom obtained, — who knows whence grew the whim? —
 That people could not read their title
 clear To reverence till their own true names, made dim 30 By daily mouthing, pleased to disappear, Replaced by brand-new bright ones:
 Arouet,
 For instance, grew Voltaire; Desforges — Malcraiz.

XCIX.

"Demoiselle Malcraiz de la Vigne" — because
 The family possessed at Brederac A vineyard, — few grapes, many hips-and-
 haws, —
 Still a nice Breton name. As breast and
 back
 Of this vivacious beauty gleamed through gauze,
 So did her sprightly nature nowise lack Lustre when draped, the fashionable way,
 In "Malcraiz de la Vigne" — more short,
 "Malcraiz."

C.

Out from Paul's escritoire behold escape The hoarded treasure! verse falls thick and fast,
 Sonnets and songs of every size and shape.
 The lady ponders on her prize; at last Selects one which — Oh angel and yet ape! —
 Her malice thinks is probably surpassed
 In badness by no fellow of the flock, Copies it fair, and "Now for my La Roque!"

CI.

So, to him goes, with the neat manuscript
 The soft petitionary letter. "Grant 5 A fledgeling novice that with wing unclipt
 She soar her little circuit, habitant
 Of an old manor; buried in which crypt, How can the youthful châtelaine but pant
 For disemprisonment by one ad hoc Appointed 'Mercury's' Editor, La Roque?"

CII.

'Twas an epistle that might move the Turk!
 More certainly it moved our middle-aged Pen-driver drudging at his weary work, Raked the old ashes up and disengaged 6
 The sparks of gallantry which always lurk Somehow in literary breasts, assuaged
 In no degree by compliments on style;
 Are Forty wagging beards worth one girl's smile?

CIII.

In trips the lady's poem, takes its place
 Of honour in the gratified Gazette, With due acknowledgment of power and
 grace;
 Prognostication, too, that higher yet
 The Breton Muse will soar: fresh youth, high race,
 Beauty and wealth have amicably met 7 That Demoiselle Malcraiz may fill the chair Left vacant by the loss of Deshoulières.

CIV.

"There!" cried the lively lady. "Who was right —
 You in the dumps, or I the merry maid Who know a trick or two can baffle spite Tenfold the force of this old fool's?
 Afraid
 Of Editor La Roque? But come! next
 flight
 Shall outsoar — Deshoulières alone?
 My blade,
 Sappho herself shall you confess outstript!
 Quick, Paul, another dose of manuscript!"

CV.

And so, once well a-foot, advanced the
 game:
 More and more verses, corresponding gush
 On gush of praise, till everywhere acclaim Rose to the pitch of uproar. "Sappho?
 Tush!
 Sure 'Malcraïs on her Parrot' puts to
 shame Deshoulières' pastoral, clay not worth a rush
 Beside this find of treasure, gold in crock, Unearthed in Brittany, — nay, ask La Roque!"

CVI.

Such was the Paris tribute. "Yes," you sneer,
 "Ninnies stock Noodledom, but folk more sage Resist contagious folly, never fear!" Do they? Permit me to detach one page
 From the huge Album which from far and
 near Poetic praises blackened in a rage Of rapture! and that page shall be — who stares Confounded now, I ask you? — just Vol-taire's!

CVII.

Ay, sharpest shrewdest steel that ever stabbed
 To death Imposture through the armourjoints!
 How did it happen that gross Humbug grabbed Thy weapons, gouged thine eyes out?
 Fate appoints That pride shall have a fall, or I had blabbed Hardly that Humbug, whom thy soul aoints,
 Could thus cross-buttock thee caught unawares,
 And dismalest of tumbles proved — Vol-taire's!

CVIII.

See his epistle extant yet, wherewith "Henri" in verse and "Charles" in prose he sent To do her suit and service! Here's the pith
 Of half a dozen stanzas — stones which went
 To build that simulated monolith — Sham love in due degree with homage blent
 As sham — which in the vast of volumes scares
 The traveller still: "That stucco-heap — 46 Voltaire's?"

CIX.

"Oh thou, whose clarion-voice has over-flown
 The wilds to startle Paris that's one ear!
 Thou who such strange capacity hast shown For joining all that's grand with all that's dear,
 Knowledge with power to please — Deshoulières grown Learned as Dacier in thy person! mere Weak fruit of idle hours, these crabs of
 mine
 I dare lay at thy feet, O Muse divine!

CX.

"Charles was my taskwork only; Henri trod
 My hero erst; and now, my heroine — she 50 Shall be thyself! True — is it true, great
 God?
 Certainly love henceforward must not
 be!
 Yet all the crowd of Fine Arts fail — how odd! — Tried turn by turn, to fill a void in me!
 There's no replacing love with these, alas!
 Yet all I can I do to prove no ass.

CXI.

"I labour to amuse my freedom; but Should any sweet young creature slavery
 preach,
 And — borrowing thy vivacious charm, the slut! —
 Make me, in thy engaging words, a 60
 speech,
 Soon should I see myself in prison shut With all imaginable pleasure." Reach The washhand-basin for admirers! There's A stomach-moving tribute — and Vol-taire's!

CXII.

Suppose it a fantastic billet-doux, Adulatory flourish, not worth frown!
 What say you to the Fathers of Trévoux?

These in their Dictionary have her down Under the heading "Author": "Malcraï,
too,

Is 'Author' of much verse that claims renown."

While Jean-Baptiste Rousseau . . . but why proceed?

Enough of this — something too much,
indeed!

CXIII.

At last La Roque, unwilling to be left Behindhand in the rivalry, broke

bounds

Of figurative passion; hilt and heft,

Plunged his huge downright love through what surrounds

10 The literary female bosom; reft

Away its veil of coy reserve with "Zounds!

I love thee, Breton Beauty! All's no use!
Body and soul I love, — the big word's loose!"

CXIV.

He's greatest now and to de-struc-ti-on Nearest. Attend the solemn word I quote,

O'Paul! There's no pause at per-fec-ti-on.

Thus knolls thy knell the Doctor's bronzed throat!

Greatest a period hath, no sta-ti-on!

Better and truer verse none ever wrote

20 (Despite the antique outstretched a-i-on)

Than thou, revered and magisterial Donne!

CXV.

Flat on his face, La Roque, and, — pressed to heart

His dexter hand, — Voltaire with bended knee!

Paul sat and sucked-in triumph; just
apart

Leaned over him his sister. "Well!"
smirks he,

And "Well?" she answers, smiling — woman's art

To let a man's own mouth, not hers, decree

What shall be next move which decides
the game:

Success? She said so. Failure? His the blame.

CXVI.

30 "Well!" this time forth affirmatively
comes

With smack of lip, and long-drawn sigh through teeth

Close clenched o'er satisfaction, as the gums

Were tickled by a sweetmeat teased beneath

Palate by lubricating tongue: "Well!"
crumbs

Of comfort these, undoubtedly! no
death

Likely from famine at Fame's feast! 'tis
clear

I may put claim in for my pittance, Dear!

CXVII.

"La Roque, Voltaire, my lovers! Then
disguise

Has served its turn, grows idle; let it drop!

I shall to Paris, flaunt there in men's eyes
My proper manly garb and mount atop

The pedestal that waits me, take the prize Awarded Hercules. He threw a sop

To Cerberus who let him pass, you know, Then, following, licked his heels: exactly

so!

CXVIII.

"I like the prospect — their astonishment, Confusion: wounded vanity, no doubt, Mixed motives; how I see the brows quick bent!

'What, sir, yourself, none other, brought about

This change of estimation? Phœbus sent His shafts as from Diana?' Critic pout Turns courtier smile: 'Lo, him we took for her!

Pleasant mistake! You bear no malice, sir?"

CXIX.

"Eh, my Diana?" But Diana kept Smilingly silent with fixed needle-sharp Much-meaning eyes that seemed to intercept

Paul's very thoughts ere they had time to warp

From earnest into sport the words they leapt

To life with — changed as when mal-treated harp

Renders in tinkle what some player-prig Means for a grave tune though it proves a jig.

CXX.

"What, Paul, and are my pains thus thrown away,

My lessons end in loss?" at length fall
slow

The pitying syllables, her lips allay
The satire of by keeping in full flow,

Above their coral reef, bright smiles at
play:

"Can it be, Paul thus fails to rightly
know

And altogether estimate applause
As just so many asinine hee-haws?

CXXI.

"I thought to show you": . . . "Show me," Paul in-broke,

"My poetry is rubbish, and the world That rings with my renown a sorry joke!
What fairer test of worth than that,
form furred,

I entered the arena? Yet you croak Just as if Phœbé and not Phœbus
hurled
The dart and struck the Python! What, he crawls Humbly in dust before your feet, not Paul's?

CXXII.

"Nay, 'tis no laughing matter though absurd

If there's an end of honesty on earth!
La Roque sends letters, lying every word!
Voltaire makes verse, and of himself makes mirth
To the remotest age! Rousseau's the third

Who, driven to despair amid such
dearth

Of people that want praising, finds no
one

More fit to praise than Paul the simpleton!

CXXIII.

"Somebody says — if a man writes at all
It is to show the writer's kith and kin
He was unjustly thought a natural;

And truly, sister, I have yet to win Your favourable word, it seems, for Paul Whose poetry you count not worth a pin

Though well enough esteemed by these Voltaires,

Rousseaus and suchlike: let them quack, who cares?"

CXXIV.

"— To Paris with you, Paul! Not one word's waste

Further: my scrupulosity was vain!
Go triumph! Be my foolish fears effaced From memory's record! Go, to come
again

With glory crowned, — by sister re-embraced,

Cured of that strange delusion of her
brain

Which led her to suspect that Paris gloats On male limbs mostly when in petticoats!"

CXXV.

So laughed her last word, with the little touch

Of malice proper to the outraged pride
Of any artist in a work too much Shorn of its merits. "By all means be tried

The opposite procedure! Cast your crutch

Away, no longer crippled, nor divide

The credit of your march to the World's Fair
With sister Cherry-cheeks who helped you
there!"

CXXVI.

Crippled, forsooth! what courser spright- 49 lier pranced

Paris-ward than did Paul? Nay, dreams lent wings:

He flew, or seemed to fly, by dreams entranced.

Dreams? wide-awake realities: no
things

Dreamed merely were the missives that advanced

The claim of Malcrais to consort with kings

Crowned by Apollo — not to say with queens

Cinctured by Venus for Idalian scenes.

CXXVII.

Soon he arrives, forthwith is found before The outer gate of glory. Bold tic-toc Announces there's a giant at the door. 50

"Ay, sir, here dwells the Chevalier La Roque."

"Lackey! Malcrais, — mind, no word less nor more! —

Desires his presence. I've unearthed the brock:

Now, to transfix him!" There stands Paul erect,

Inched out his uttermost, for more effect.

CXXVIII.

A bustling entrance: "Idol of my flame!
Can it be that my heart attains at last

Its longing? that you stand, the very same As in my visions? . . . Ha! hey, how?"

aghast Stops short the rapture. "Oh, my boy's 60 to blame!

You merely are the messenger! Too
fast

My fancy rushed to a conclusion. Pooh!
Well, sir, the lady's substitute is — who?"

CXXIX.

Then Paul's smirk grows inordinate.
"Shake hands!

Friendship not love awaits you, master
mine,

Though nor Malcrais nor any mistress
stands

To meet your ardour! So, you don't divine

Who wrote the verses wherewith ring the land's

Whole length and breadth? Just he whereof no line

Had ever leave to blot your Journal — eh?
Paul Desforges Maillard — otherwise Malcrais!”

CCXX.

And there the two stood, stare confronting smirk,
Awhile uncertain which should yield the pas.

In vain the Chevalier beat brain for quirk
To help in this conjuncture; at length “Bah!

Boh! Since I’ve made myself a fool, why shirk

The punishment of folly? Ha, ha, ha, Let me return your handshake!” Comic sock

10 For tragic buskin prompt thus changed La Roque.

CCXXXI.

“I’m nobody — a wren-like journalist; You’ve flown at higher game and winged your bird,

The golden eagle! That’s the grand acquist!

Voltaire’s sly Muse, the tiger-cat, has purred

Prettily round your feet; but if she missed Priority of stroking, soon were stirred

The dormant spit-fire. To Voltaire!
away,

Paul Desforges Maillard, otherwise Malcrais!”

CCXXXII.

Whereupon, arm in arm, and head in air, 20 The two begin their journey. Need I say, La Roque had felt the talon of Voltaire,

Had a long-standing little debt to pay,
And pounced, you may depend, on such a rare

Occasion for its due discharge? So,
gay

And grenadier-like, marching to assault,
They reach the enemy’s abode, there halt.

CCXXXIII.

“I’ll be announcer!” quoth La Roque:
“I know,

Better than you, perhaps, my Breton
bard,

How to procure an audience! He’s not slow

30 To smell a rat, this scamp Voltaire!
Discard

The petticoats too soon, — you’ll never
show

Your haut-de-chausses and all they’ve made or marred

In your true person. Here’s his servant.
Pray,

Will the great man see Demoiselle Malcrais?”

CCXXXIV.

Now, the great man was also, no whit less,
The man of self-respect, — more great man he!

And bowed to social usage, dressed the
dress,

And decorated to the fit degree

His person; ’twas enough to bear the stress

Of battle in the field, without, when free 40

From outside foes, inviting friends’ attack By — sword in hand? No, — ill-made coat on back!

CCXXXV.

And, since the announcement of his visitor Surprised him at his toilet, — never glass

Had such solicitation! “Black, now — or

Brown be the killing wig to wear? Alas, Where’s the rouge gone, this cheek were better for

A tender touch of? Melted to a mass, All my pomatum! There’s at all events
A devil — for he’s got among my scents!” 50

CCXXXVI.

So, “barbered ten times o’er,” as Antony Paced to his Cleopatra, did at last

Voltaire proceed to the fair presence: high In colour, proud in port, as if a blast

Of trumpet bade the world “Take note!
draws nigh

To Beauty, Power! Behold the Icono-clast,

The Poet, the Philosopher, the Rod Of iron for imposture! Ah my God!”

CCXXXVII.

For there stands smirking Paul, and — what lights fierce

The situation as with sulphur flash — 60
There grinning stands La Roque! No

carte-and-tierce Observes the grinning fencer, but, full dash

From breast to shoulder-blade, the thrusts transpiere

That armour against which so idly clash
The swords of priests and pedants! Victors there,

Two smirk and grin who have befooled — Voltaire!

CCXXXVIII.

A moment’s horror; then quick turn-about On high-heeled shoe, — flurry of ruffles, flounce

Of wig-ties and of coat-tails, — and so out Of door banged wrathfully behind, 70 goes — bounce —

Voltaire in tragic exit! vows, no doubt, Vengeance upon the couple. Did he trounce Either, in point of fact? His anger's flash Subsided if a culprit craved his cash.

CXXXIX.

As for La Roque, he having laughed his
laugh
To heart's content, — the joke defunct at
once,
Dead in the birth, you see, — its epitaph Was sober earnest. "Well, sir, for the
nonce,
You've gained the laurel; never hope to graff

10 A second spring of triumph there! Ensconce
Yourself again at Croisic: let it be Enough you mastered both Voltaire and
— me!

CXL.

"Don't linger here in Paris to parade Your victory, and have the very boys Point at you! 'There's the little mouse which made Believe those two big lions that its noise, Nibbling away behind the hedge, conveyed Intelligence that — portent which destroys

20 All courage in the lion's heart, with horn That's fable — there lay couched the unicorn!

CXLI.

"Beware us, now we've found who fooled us! Quick

To cover! 'In proportion to men's fright,
Expect their fright's revenge!' quoth politic Old Macchiavelli. As for me, — all's
right:

I'm but a journalist. But no pin's prick The tooth leaves when Voltaire is roused to bite!

So, keep your counsel, I advise! Adieu!
Good journey! Ha, ha, ha, Malcrais was — you!"

CXLII.

"— Yes, I'm Malcrais, and somebody be-
side,

30 You snickering monkey!" thus winds up the tale

Our hero, safe at home, to that black-eyed Cherry-cheeked sister, as she soothes the pale

Mortified poet. "Let their worst be tried, I'm their match henceforth — very man and male!

Don't talk to me of knocking-under! man
And male must end what petticoats began!

CXLIII.

"How woman-like it is to apprehend The world will eat its words! why, words transfixed

To stone, they stare at you in print, — at
end,

Each writer's style and title! Choose 40 betwixt

Fool and knave for his name, who should intend

To perpetrate a baseness so unmixed With prospect of advantage! What is writ Is writ: they've praised me, there's an end of it.

CXLIV.

"No, Dear, allow me! I shall print these
same

Pieces, with no omitted line, as Paul's.
Malcrais no longer, let me see folk blame What they — praised simply? — placed on pedestals,

Each piece a statue in the House of Fame!
Fast will they stand there, though their 50 presence galls

The envious crew: such show their teeth,
perhaps,

And snarl, but never bite! I know the chaps!"

CXLV.

Oh Paul, oh piteously deluded! Pace Thy sad sterility of Croisic flats, Watch, from their southern edge, the foamy
race

Of high-tide as it heaves the drowning mats

Of yellow-berried web-growth from their
place,

The rock-ridge, when, rolling as far as Batz,

One broadside crashes on it, and the crags,
That needle under, stream with weedy rags! 60

CXLVI.

Or, if thou wilt, at inland Bergerac, Rude heritage but recognised domain, Do as two here are doing: make hearth crack

With logs until thy chimney roar again Jolly with fire-glow! Let its angle lack

No grace of Cherry-cheeks thy sister, fain

To do a sister's office and laugh smooth Thy corrugated brow — that scowls forsooth!

CXLVII.

Wherefore? Who does not know how these La Roques, Voltaires, can say and unsay, praise and 70
blame,
Prove black white, white black, play at paradox

And, when they seem to lose it, win the game?
 Care not thou what this badger, and that fox,
 His fellow in rascality, call "fame!"
 Fiddlepin's end! Thou hadst it, — quack quack, quack!
 Have quietude from geese at Bergerac!

CXLVIII.

Quietude! For, be very sure of this!
 A twelvemonth hence, and men shall know or care
 As much for what to-day they clap or hiss
 As for the fashion of the wigs they wear, 10 Then wonder at. There's fame which, bale or bliss, — Got by no gracious word of great Voltaire Or not-so-great La Roque, — is taken back By neither, any more than Bergerac!

CXLIX.

Too true! or rather, true as ought to be!
 No more of Paul the man, Malcrais the maid, Thenceforth for ever! One or two, I see,
 Stuck by their poet: who the longest stayed Was Jean-Baptiste Rousseau, and even he Seemingly saddened as perforce he paid 20 A rhyming tribute "After death, survive — He hoped he should; and died while yet alive!"

CL.

No, he hoped nothing of the kind, or held His peace and died in silent good old age.
 Him it was, curiosity impelled To seek if there were extant still some page
 Of his great predecessor, rat who belled
 The cat once, and would never deign engage In after-combat with mere mice, — saved from More sonnetteering, — René Gentilhomme.

CLI.

30 Paul's story furnished forth that famous play Of Piron's "Métromanie": there you'll find He's Francaleu, while Demoiselle Malcrais Is Demoiselle No-end-of-names-behind!
 As for Voltaire, he's Damis. Good and gay
 The plot and dialogue, and all's designed To spite Voltaire: at "Something" such the laugh
 Of simply "Nothing!" (see his epitaph).

CLII.

But truth, truth, that's the gold! and all the good I find in fancy is, it serves to set Gold's inmost glint free, gold which comes 40 up rude
 And rayless from the mine. All fume and fret Of artistry beyond this point pursued Brings out another sort of burnish: yet Always the ingot has its very own Value, a sparkle struck from truth alone.

CLIII.

Now, take this sparkle and the other spirt
 Of fitful flame, — twin births of our grey brand That's sinking fast to ashes! I assert,
 As sparkles want but fuel to expand Into a conflagration no mere squirt 50
 Will quench too quickly, so might Croisic strand, Had Fortune pleased posterity to chowse, Boast of her brace of beacons luminous.

CLIV.

Did earlier Agamemnons lack their bard?
 But later bards lacked Agamemnon too!
 How often frustrate they of fame's award
 Just because Fortune, as she listed, blew
 Some slight bark's sails to belying, mauled and marred
 And forced to put about the First-rate!
 True,
 Such tacks but for a time: still — small- 60 craft ride
 At anchor, rot while Beddoes breasts the tide!

CLV.

Dear, shall I tell you? There's a simple test Would serve, when people take on them to weigh The worth of poets, "Who was better, best,
 This, that, the other bard?" (bards none gainsay As good, observe! no matter for the rest)
 "What quality preponderating may Turn the scale as it trembles?" End the strife By asking "Which one led a happy life?"

CLVI.

If one did, over his antagonist 70
 That yelled or shrieked or sobbed or wept or wailed Or simply had the dumps, — dispute who list, —
 I count him victor. Where his fellow failed, Mastered by his own means of might, — acquist

Of necessary sorrows, — he prevailed,
A strong since joyful man who stood distinct Above slave-sorrows to his chariot linked.

CLVII.

Was not his lot to feel more? What meant
"feel"
Unless to suffer! Not, to see more?
Sight —
What helped it but to watch the drunken reel
Of vice and folly round him, left and
right,
One dance of rogues and idiots! Not, to deal More with things lovely? What provoked the spite 10 Of filth incarnate, like the poet's need Of other nutriment than strife and greed!

CLVIII.

Who knows most, doubts most; entertaining hope, Means recognising fear, the keener
sense
Of all comprised within our actual scope Recoils from aught beyond earth's dim and dense.
Who, grown familiar with the sky, will grope Henceforward among groundlings?
That's offence
Just as indubitably: stars abound O'erhead, but then — what flowers make glad the ground!

CLIX.

20 So, force is sorrow, and each sorrow, force: What then? since Swiftness gives the charioteer
The palm, his hope be in the vivid horse Whose neck God clothed with thunder, not the steer Sluggish and safe! Yoke Hatred, Crime, Remorse,
Despair: but ever mid the whirling fear, Let, through the tumult, break the poet's
face Radiant, assured his wild slaves win the race!

CLX.

Therefore I say . . . no, shall not say, but think,
And save my breath for better purpose.
White
30 From grey our log has burned to: just one blink
That quivers, loth to leave it, as a sprite
The outworn body. Ere your eyelids'
wink
Punish who sealed so deep into the night

Your mouth up, for two poets dead so
long, —
Here pleads a live pretender: right your wrong!

I.

What a pretty tale you told me Once upon a time
— Said you found it somewhere (scold me!)
Was it prose or was it rhyme, Greek or Latin? Greek, you said, 40 While your shoulder propped my head.

II.

Anyhow there's no forgetting
This much if no more,
That a poet (pray, no petting!) Yes, a bard, sir, famed of yore, Went where suchlike used to go,
Singing for a prize, you know.

III.

Well, he had to sing, nor merely Sing but play the lyre; Playing was important clearly 50 Quite as singing: I desire, Sir, you keep the fact in mind
For a purpose that's behind.

IV.

There stood he, while deep attention Held the judges round,
— Judges able, I should mention,
To detect the slightest sound Sung or played amiss: such ears Had old judges, it appears!

V.

None the less he sang out boldly, 60
Played in time and tune, Till the judges, weighing coldly
Each note's worth, seemed, late or soon, Sure to smile "In vain one tries Picking faults out: take the prize!"

VI.

When, a mischief! Were they seven Strings the lyre possessed?
Oh, and afterwards eleven, Thank you! Well, sir, — who had guessed
Such ill luck in store? — it happened 70
One of those same seven strings snapped.

VII.

All was lost, then! No! a cricket (What "cicada"? Pooh!)
— Some mad thing that left its thicket For mere love of music — flew With its little heart on fire, Lighted on the crippled lyre.

VIII.

So that when (ah joy!) our singer
For his triumphant string Frets with disconcerted finger,
What does cricket else but fling Flery heart forth, sound the note Wanted by the throbbing throat?

IX.

Ay and, ever to the ending,
Cricket jumps at need,
Executes the hand's intending.
10 Promptly, perfectly, — indeed Saves the singer from defeat
With her shining bow and sweet.

X.

Till, at ending, all the judges Cry with one assent
"Take the prize — a prize who grudgees
Such a voice and instrument?
Why, we took your lyre for harp,
So it shelled us forth P sharp!"

XI.

Did the conqueror spare the creature, 20 Once its service done?
That's no such uncommon feature In the case when Musé's son Finds his Lotté's power too spent For aiding soul-development.

XII.

No! This other, on returning Homeward, prone in mud, Satisfied his bosom's yearning:
(Sir, I hope you understand?) Said "Some reward there must be 30 Of this cricket's help to me!"

XIII.

So, he made himself a statue:
Marble stood life-size;

On the lyre, he pointed at you Punctured his partner in the prize;
Never more about you found Her, he thronged from him, she crowned.

XIV.

That's the tale: its application?
Somebody I know
Hopes one day for reputation
Though his poetry that's — Oh, 40 All so learned and so wise
And deserving of a prize!

XV.

If he gains one, will some ticket,
When his statue's built,
Till the gazer "Twas a cricket Helped my crippled lyre, whose lit Sweet and low, whose strength usurped Softness' place?" the scale, she dumped!

XVI.

"For as victory was highest,
While I sang and played, — 50 With my lyre at lowest, highest, Right off, — the string that made
"Love" sound soft was snapt in twain, Never to be heard again. —

XVII.

"Had not a knee or knee-battered, Punctured upon the place Vibrated it and duly uttered
"Love, love, love, wherever the bass Asked the triller to alone 60 For its somewhat sombre drone!"

XVIII.

But you don't know music! Wherefore Keep on casting peans To a — poet? All I care for
Is — to tell him that a poet's "Love" comes soon to what gruff Or, as his singing (I note, enough)

DRAMATIC IDYLS.

FIRST SERIES.

1879.

MARTIN RELPH.

*My grandfather says he remembers he saw,
when a youngster long ago,
On a bright May day, a strange old man, with a beard as white as snow, Stand on the hill outside our town like a monument of woe,
And, striking his bare head the while,
sob out the reason — so!*

If I last as long as Methuselah I shall never forgive myself:
But — God forgive me, that I pray, unhappy Martin Relph, As coward, coward I call him — him, yes, him! Away from me!
Get you behind the man I am now, you man that I used to be!

What can have sewed my mouth up, set me a-stare, all eyes, no tongue?
People have urged "You visit a scare too hard on a lad so young!
You were taken aback, poor boy," they urge, "no time to regain your wits: Besides it had maybe cost you life." Ay, there is the cap which fits!

So, cap me, the coward, — thus! No fear!
A cuff on the brow does good:
The feel of it hinders a worm inside which bores at the brain for food.
See now, there certainly seems excuse: for a moment, I trust, dear friends, The fault was but folly, no fault of mine,
or if mine, I have made amends!

For, every day that is first of May, on the hill-top, here stand I, Martin Relph, and I strike my brow, and publish the reason why, When there gathers a crowd to mock the fool. No fool, friends, since the bite
Of a worm inside is worse to bear: pray God I have baulked him quite!

I'll tell you. Certainly much excuse! It came of the way they cooped Us peasantry up in a ring just here, close huddling because tight-hooped

By the red-coats round us villagers all:
they meant we should see the sight And take the example, — see, not speak, for speech was the Captain's right.

"You clowns on the slope, beware!" cried he: "This woman about to die Gives by her fate fair warning to such acquaintance as play the spy.
Henceforth who meddle with matters of state above them perhaps will learn That peasants should stick to their plough-tail, leave to the King the King's concern.

"Here's a quarrel that sets the land on fire, between King George and his foes:

What call has a man of your kind — much ³⁶ less, a woman — to interpose?
Yet you needs must be meddling, folk like you, not foes — so much the worse!
The many and loyal should keep themselves unmixed with the few perverse.

"Is the counsel hard to follow? I gave it you plainly a month ago, And where was the good? The rebels have learned just all that they need to know.
Not a month since in we quietly marched:
a week, and they had the news, From a list complete of our rank and file to a note of our caps and shoes.

"All about all we did and all we were doing and like to do!
Only, I catch a letter by luck, and capture who wrote it, too.
Some of you men look black enough, but the milk-white face demure Betokens the finger foul with ink: 'tis a ⁴⁰ woman who writes, be sure!

"Is it 'Dearie, how much I miss your mouth!' — good natural stuff, she pens?
Some sprinkle of that, for a blind, of course:
with talk about cocks and hens, How 'robin has built on the apple-tree, and our creeper which came to grief Through the frost, we feared, is twining afresh round casement in famous leaf.'

"But all for a blind! She soon glides frank into 'Horrid the place is grown With Officers here and Privates there, no nook we may call our own: And Farmer Giles has a tribe to house, and lodging will be to seek For the second Company sure to come ('tis whispered) on Monday week.'

"And so to the end of the chapter! There! The murder, you see, was out: Easy to guess how the change of mind in the rebels was brought about! Safe in the trap would they now lie snug, had treachery made no sign: But treachery meets a just reward, no matter if fools malign!

"That traitors had played us false, was proved — sent news which fell so pat: 10 And the murder was out — this letter of love, the sender of this sent that! 'Tis an ugly job, though, all the same — a hateful, to have to deal With a case of the kind, when a woman's in fault: we soldiers need nerves of steel!

"So, I gave her a chance, dispatched post-haste a message to Vincent Parkes Whom she wrote to; easy to find he was, since one of the King's own clerks, Ay, kept by the King's own gold in the town close by where the rebels camp: A sort of a lawyer, just the man to betray our sort — the scamp!

"If her writing is simple and honest and only the lover-like stuff it looks, And if you yourself are a loyalist, nor down in the rebels' books, Come quick,' said I, 'and in person prove you are each of you clear of crime, 20 Or martial law must take its course: this day next week's the time!'

"Next week is now: does he come? Not he! Clean gone, our clerk, in a trice! He has left his sweetheart here in the lurch: no need of a warning twice! His own neck free, but his partner's fast in the noose still, here she stands To pay for her fault. 'Tis an ugly job: but soldiers obey commands.

"And hearken wherefore I make a speech! Should any acquaintance share The folly that led to the fault that is now to be punished, let fools beware! Look black, if you please, but keep hands white: and, above all else, keep wives — Or sweethearts or what they may be — from ink! Not a word now, on your lives!"

Black? but the Pit's own pitch was white to the Captain's face — the brute With the bloated cheeks and the bulgy nose and the bloodshot eyes to suit! He was muddled with wine, they say: more like, he was out of his wits with fear; He had but a handful of men, that's true, — a riot might cost him dear.

And all that time stood Rosamund Page, with pinioned arms and face Bandaged about, on the turf marked out for the party's firing-place. I hope she was wholly with God: I hope 'twas His angel stretched a hand To steady her so, like the shape of stone you see in our church-aisle stand.

I hope there was no vain fancy pierced the bandage to vex her eyes, No face within which she missed without, no questions and no replies — "Why did you leave me to die?" — "Because . . ." Oh, fiends, too soon you grin At merely a moment of hell, like that — 4 such heaven as hell ended in!

Let mine end too! He gave the word, up went the guns in a line. Those heaped on the hill were blind as dumb, — for, of all eyes, only mine Looked over the heads of the foremost rank. Some fell on their knees in prayer, Some sank to the earth, but all shut eyes, with a sole exception there.

That was myself, who had stolen up last, Had sidled behind the group: I am highest of all on the hill-top, there stand fixed while the others stoop! From head to foot in a serpent's twine am I tightened: I touch ground? No more than a gibbet's rigid corpse which the fetters rust around!

Can I speak, can I breathe, can I burst — aught else but see, see, only see? And see I do — for there comes in sight — 5 a man, it sure must be! — Who staggeringly, stumbingly rises, falls, rises, at random flings his weight On and on, anyhow onward — a man that's mad he arrives too late!

Else why does he wave a something white high-flourished above his head? Why does not he call, cry, — curse the fool! — why throw up his arms instead? O take this fist in your own face, fool! Why does not yourself shout "Stay!

Here's a paper comes rustling, might and main, with something he's mad to say?"

And a minute, only a moment, to have hell-fire boil up in your brain,

And one you can judge things right, choose heaven, — time's over, repentance vain!

They loved a valley, a smoke and the clearing of smoke: I see no more Of the man smoke hid, nor his frantic arms, nor the something white he bore.

But street-bed on the field, some half mile off, is an object. Surely dumb!

Deaf, blind were we struck, that nobody heard, not one of us saw him come! Has he fainted through fright? One may well believe! What is it he holds so fast?

Turn him over, examine the face! Hey-day! What, Vincent Parkes at last?

Dead! dead as she, by the self-same shot: one bullet has ended both,

Her in the body and him in the soul. They laugh at our plighted troth

"Till death us do part?" "Till death us do join past parting — that sounds like Betrotal indeed! O Vincent Parkes, what need has my fist to strike?

I helped you: thus were you dead and wed: one bound, and your soul reached hers!

There is clamped in your hand the thing, signed, sealed, the paper which plain avers

She is innocent, innocent, plain as print, with the King's Arms broad engraved!

No one can hear, but if anyone high on the hill can see, she's saved!

And torn his garb and bloody his lips with heart-break — plain it grew

How the week's delay had been brought about: each guess at the end proved true.

It was hard to get at the folk in power: such waste of time! and then Such pleading and praying, with, all the while, his lamb in the lions' den!

And at length when he wrung their pardon out, no end to the stupid forms

The licence and leave: I make no doubt — what wonder if passion warms

The pulse in a man if you play with his heart? — he was something hasty in speech;

Anyhow, none would quicken the work he had to beseech, beseech!

And the thing once signed, sealed, safe in his grasp, — what followed but fresh delays?

For the floods were out, he was forced to take such a roundabout of ways!

And 'twas "Halt there!" at every turn of the road, since he had to cross the thick

Of the red-coats: what did they care for him and his "Quick, for God's sake, quick!"

Horse? but he had one: had it how long? till the first knave smirked "You brag Yourself a friend of the King's? then lend to a King's friend here your nag!"

Money to buy another? Why, piece by piece they plundered him still,

With their "Wait you must, — no help: if aught can help you, a guinea will!"

And a borough there was — I forget the name — whose Mayor must have the bench

Of Justices ranged to clear a doubt: for "Vincent," thinks he, sounds French!

It well may have driven him daft, God knows! all man can certainly know

Is — rushing and falling and rising, at last he arrived in a horror — so!

When a word, cry, gasp, would have rescued both! Ay bite me! The worm begins

At his work once more. Had cowardice proved — that only — my sin of sins!

Friends, look you here! Suppose . . . 40 suppose . . . But mad I am, needs must be!

Judas the Damned would never have dared such a sin as I dream! For, see!

Suppose I had sneakingly loved her myself, my wretched self, and dreamed

In the heart of me "She were better dead than happy and his!" — while gleamed

A light from hell as I spied the pair in a perfectest embrace,

He the saviour and she the saved, — bliss born of the very murder-place!

No! Say I was scared, friends! Call me fool and coward, but nothing worse!

Jeer at the fool and gibe at the coward! 'Twas ever the coward's curse

That fear breeds fancies in such: such take their shadow for substance still,

— A fiend at their back. I liked poor Parkes, — loved Vincent, if you will!

And her — why, I said "Good morrow" 50 to her, "Good even," and nothing more:

The neighbourly way! She was just to me as fifty had been before.
So, coward it is and coward shall be!
There's a friend, now! Thanks!
A drink
Of water I wanted: and now I can walk, get home by myself, I think.

PHEIDIPPIDES.

[Pheidippides, when the Persians went up into Attica, ran all the way from Athens to Sparta to demand aid, and ran back again in time to be at Marathon; and then, the battle over, ran to Athens to announce the victory — falling dead, having done so.]

Χαίρετε, νικῶμεν.

FIRST I salute this soil of the blessed, river and rock!
Gods of my birthplace, dæmons and heroes, honour to all!
Then I name thee, claim thee for our patron, co-equal in praise — Ay, with Zeus the Defender, with Her of the ægis and spear!¹ Also, ye of the bow and the buskin,² praised be your peer, Now, henceforth and for ever, — O latest to whom I upraise 10 Hand and heart and voice! For Athens, leave pasture and flock!
Present to help, potent to save, Pan — patron I call!

Archons of Athens, topped by the tettix,³ see, I return!
See, 'tis myself here standing alive, no spectre that speaks!
Crowned with the myrtle, did you command me, Athens and you, “Run, Pheidippides, run and race, reach Sparta for aid!
Persia has come, we are here, where is She?” Your command I obeyed, Ran and raced: like stubble, some field which a fire runs through,
Was the space between city and city: two days, two nights did I burn Over the hills, under the dales, down pits and up peaks.
20 Into their midst I broke: breath served but for “Persia has come!
Persia bids Athens proffer slaves’ tribute, water and earth;
Razed to the ground is Eretria — but Athens, shall Athens sink, Drop into dust and die — the flower of Hellas utterly die,

Die, with the wide world spitting at Sparta, the stupid, the stander-by?
Answer me quick, what help, what hand do you stretch o’er destruction’s brink?
How, — when? No care for my limbs! — there’s lightning in all and some — Fresh and fit your message to bear, once lips give it birth!”

O my Athens — Sparta love thee? Did Sparta respond?
Every face of her leered in a furrow of envy, mistrust, Malice, — each eye of her gave me its glitter of gratified hate!
Gravely they turned to take counsel, to cast for excuses. I stood Quivering, — the limbs of me fretting as fire frets, an inch from dry wood: “Persia has come, Athens asks aid, and still they debate?
Thunder, thou Zeus! Athené, are Spartans a quarry beyond Swing of thy spear? Phoibos and Artemis, clang them ‘Ye must’!”

No bolt launched from Olumpos! Lo, their answer at last!
“Has Persia come, — does Athens ask aid, — may Sparta befriend?
Nowise precipitate judgment — too weighty the issue at stake!
Count we no time lost time which lags through respect to the Gods!
Ponder that precept of old, ‘No warfare, 4 whatever the odds
In your favour, so long as the moon, halforbed, is unable to take Full-circle her state in the sky!’ Already she rounds to it fast: Athens must wait, patient as we — who judgment suspend.”

Athens, — except for that sparkle, — thy name, I had mouldered to ash!
That sent a blaze through my blood; off,
off and away was I back,
— Not one word to waste, one look to lose on the false and the vile!
Yet “O Gods of my land!” I cried, as each hillock and plain, Wood and stream, I knew, I named,
rushing past them again, “Have ye kept faith, proved mindful of honours we paid you erewhile?
Vain was the filleted victim, the fulsome 5 libation! Too rash Love in its choice, paid you so largely service so slack!

“Oak and olive and bay, — I bid you cease to enwreath

² Apollo and Artemis.

³ The grasshopper, the national emblem.

Brows made bold by your leaf! Fade at the Persian's foot,
 You that, our patrons were pledged, should never adorn a slave!
 Rather I hail thee, Parnes, — trust to thy wild waste tract!
 Treeless, herbless, lifeless mountain! What matter if slacked My speed may hardly be, for homage to crag and to cave
 No deity deigns to drape with verdure? at least I can breathe, Fear in thee no fraud from the blind, no lie from the mute!"

Such my cry as, rapid, I ran over Parnes' ridge; Gully and gap I clambered and cleared till, sudden, a bar Jutted, a stoppage of stone against me, blocking the way.
 Right! for I minded the hollow to traverse, the fissure across:
 "Where I could enter, there I depart by! Night in the fosse?" Athens to aid? Though the dive were through Erebos, thus I obey — Out of the day dive, into the day as bravely arise! No bridge Better!" — when — ha! what was it I came on, of wonders that are?

There, in the cool of a cleft, sat he — majestic Pan!
 Ivy drooped wanton, kissed his head, moss cushioned his hoof:
 All the great God was good in the eyes grave-kindly — the curl Carved on the bearded cheek, amused at a mortal's awe, As, under the human trunk, the goat-thighs grand I saw.
 "Halt, Pheidippides!" — halt I did, my brain of a whirl:
 "Hither to me! Why pale in my presence?" he gracious began:
 "How is it, — Athens, only in Hellas, holds me aloof?"

"Athens, she only, rears me no fane, makes me no feast!
 Wherefore? Than I what godship to Athens more helpful of old?
 Ay, and still, and for ever her friend! Test Pan, trust me!
 Go, bid Athens take heart, laugh Persia to scorn, have faith In the temples and tombs! Go, say to Athens, 'The Goat-God saith:
 When Persia — so much as strews not the soil — is cast in the sea, Then praise Pan who fought in the ranks with your most and least, Goat-thigh to greaved-thigh, made one cause with the free and the bold!'

"Say Pan saith: 'Let this, foreshowing the place, be the pledge!'" (Gay, the liberal hand held out this herbage I bear — Fennel — I grasped it a-tremble with dew — whatever it bode)
 "While, as for thee . . ." But enough! He was gone. If I ran hitherto — Be sure that, the rest of my journey, I ran no longer, but flew.
 Parnes to Athens — earth no more, the air was my road:
 Here am I back. Praise Pan, we stand no more on the razor's edge!
 Pan for Athens, Pan for me! I too have a guerdon rare!

Then spoke Miltiades. "And thee, best 40 runner of Greece, Whose limbs did duty indeed, — what gift is promised thyself?
 Tell it us straightway, — Athens the mother demands of her son!"
 Rosily blushed the youth: he paused: but, lifting at length
 His eyes from the ground, it seemed as he gathered the rest of his strength Into the utterance — "Pan spoke thus: 'For what thou hast done' Count on a worthy reward! Henceforth be allowed thee release From the racer's toil, no vulgar reward in praise or in pelf!"

"I am bold to believe, Pan means reward the most to my mind!
 Fight I shall, with our foremost, wherever this fennel may grow, — Pound — Pan helping us — Persia to 50 dust, and, under the deep, Whelm her away for ever; and then, — no Athens to save, — Marry a certain maid, I know keeps faith to the brave, — Hie to my house and home: and, when my children shall creep Close to my knees, — recount how the God was awful yet kind, Promised their sire reward to the full — rewarding him — so!"

Unforeseeing one! Yes, he fought on the Marathon day:
 So, when Persia was dust, all cried "To Akropolis!
 Run, Pheidippides, one race more! the meed is thy due!
 'Athens is saved, thank Pan,' go shout!"
 He flung down his shield,

* A Greek idiom for a dangerous position.

Ran like fire once more: and the space
'twixt the Fennel-field!
And Athens was stubble again, a field
which a fire runs through,
Till in he broke: "Rejoice, we conquer!"
Like wine through clay, Joy in his blood bursting his heart, he died — the bliss!

So, to this day, when friend meets friend, the word of salute Is still "Rejoice!" — his word which brought rejoicing indeed.
So is Pheidippides happy for ever, — the noble strong man Who could race like a God, bear the face of a God, whom a God loved so well; He saw the land saved he had helped to save, and was suffered to tell 10 Such tidings, yet never decline, but, gloriously as he began,
So to end gloriously — once to shout, thereafter be mute:
"Athens is saved!" — Pheidippides dies in the shout for his meed.

HALBERT AND HOB.

HERE is a thing that happened. Like wild beasts whelped, for den, In a wild part of North England, there lived once two wild men Inhabiting one homestead, neither a hovel nor hut,
Time out of mind their birthright: father and son, these — but — Such a son, such a father! Most wildness by degrees Softens away: yet, last of their line, the wildest and worst were these.
Criminals, then? Why, no: they did not murder and rob; 20 But, give them a word, they returned a blow — old Halbert as young Hob: Harsh and fierce of word, rough and savage of deed, Hated or feared the more — who knows?
— the genuine wild-beast breed.

Thus were they found by the few sparse folk of the country-side; But how fared each with other? E'en beasts couch, hide by hide, In a growling, grudging agreement: so, father and son aye curled The closelier up in their den because the last of their kind in the world.

Still, beast irks beast on occasion. One Christmas night of snow,

¹ Marathon.

Came father and son to words — such words! more cruel because the blow To crown each word was wanting, while taunt matched gibe, and curse Competed with oath in wager, like pastime in hell, — nay, worse: For pastime turned to earnest, as up there sprang at last
The son at the throat of the father, seized him and held him fast.

"Out of this house you go!" — (there followed a hideous oath) —
"This oven where now we bake, too hot to hold us both!
If there's snow outside, there's coolness:
out with you, bide a spell In the drift and save the sexton the charge of a parish shell!"

Now, the old trunk was tough, was solid as stump of oak Untouched at the core by a thousand years: more less had its seventy broke
One whipcord nerve in the muscly mass from neck to shoulder-blade Of the mountainous man, whereon his 4 child's rash hand like a feather weighed.

Nevertheless at once did the mammoth shut his eyes,
Drop chin to breast, drop hands to sides, stand stiffened — arms and thighs All of a piece — struck mute, much as a sentry stands, Patient to take the enemy's fire: his captain so commands.

Whereat the son's wrath flew to fury at such sheer scorn
Of his puny strength by the giant eld thus acting the babe new-born:
And "Neither will this turn serve!" yelled he. "Out with you! Trundle, log!
If you cannot tramp and trudge like a man, try all-fours like a dog!"

Still the old man stood mute. So, log-wise, — down to floor Pulled from his fireside place, dragged on 50 from hearth to door, — Was he pushed, a very log, staircase along, until A certain turn in the steps was reached, a yard from the house-door-sill.

Then the father opened eyes — each spark of their rage extinct, — Temples, late black, dead-blanch'd, — right-hand with left-hand linked, —

He faced his son submissive; when slow the accents came,
They were strangely mild though his son's rash hand on his neck lay all the same.

"Hob, on just such a night of a Christmas
long ago,
For such a cause, with such a gesture, did I drag — so —
My father down thus far: but, softening here, I heard A voice in my heart, and stopped: you wait for an outer word.

"For your own sake, not mine, soften you too! Untrod Leave this last step we reach, nor brave the finger of God!
I dared not pass its lifting: I did well. I nor blame Nor praise you. I stopped here: and, Hob, do you the same!"

Straightway the son relaxed his hold of the father's throat.
They mounted, side by side, to the room again: no note Took either of each, no sign made each to either: last As first, in absolute silence, their Christmas-night they passed.

At dawn, the father sate on, dead, in the self-same place,
With an outburst blackening still the old bad fighting-face:
But the son crouched all a-tremble like any lamb new-yeaned.

When he went to the burial, someone's staff he borrowed — tottered and leaned.
But his lips were loose, not locked, — kept muttering, mumbling. "There!
At his cursing and swearing!" the youngsters cried: but the elders thought "In prayer."
A boy threw stones: he picked them up and stored them in his vest.

So tottered, muttered, mumbled he, till he died, perhaps found rest.
"Is there a reason in nature for these hard hearts?" O Lear, That a reason out of nature must turn them soft, seems clear!

IVÀN IVÀNOVITCH.

"THEY tell me, your carpenters," quoth I to my friend the Russ,
"Make a simple hatchet serve as a toolbox serves with us.

Arm but each man with his axe, 'tis a hammer and saw and plane
And chisel, and — what know I else?
We should imitate in vain
The mastery wherewithal, by a flourish of just the adze,
He cleaves, clamps, dovetails in, — no ³⁰ need of our nails and brads, — The manageable pine: 'tis said he could shave himself
With the axe, — so all adroit, now a giant and now an elf, Does he work and play at once!"
Quoth my friend the Russ to me,
"Ay, that and more beside on occasion!
It scarce may be
You never heard tell a tale told children, time out of mind,
By father and mother and nurse, for a moral that's behind, Which children quickly seize. If the incident happened at all,
We place it in Peter's time when hearts were great not small, Germanised, Frenchified. I wager 'tis old
to you
As the story of Adam and Eve, and pos- ⁴⁰ sibly quite as true."

In the deep of our land, 'tis said, a village from out the woods Emerged on the great main-road 'twixt two great solitudes.
Through forestry right and left, black verst¹ and verst of pine, From village to village runs the road's long wide bare line.
Clearance and clearance break the else-unconquered growth
Of pine and all that breeds and broods there, leaving loth Man's inch of masterdom, — spot of life, spirt of fire, —
To star the dark and dread, lest right and rule expire
Throughout the monstrous wild, ahungered to resume
Its ancient sway, suck back the world into ⁵⁰ its womb:
Defrauded by man's craft which clove from North to South This highway broad and straight e'en from the Neva's mouth To Moscow's gates of gold. So, spot of life and spirt
Of fire aforesaid, burn, each village deathbegirt
By wall and wall of pine — unprobed undreamed abyss.

Early one winter morn, in such a village as
this,

¹ About two-thirds of a mile.

Snow-whitened everywhere except the middle road Ice-roughed by track of sledge, there worked by his abode Ivàn Ivànovitch, the carpenter, employed On a huge shipmast trunk; his axe now trimmed and toyed
 With branch and twig, and now some chop athwart the bole Changed bole to billets, bared at once the sap and soul.
 About him, watched the work his neighbours sheepskin-clad;
 Each bearded mouth puffed steam, each grey eye twinkled glad To see the sturdy arm which, never stopping play, 10 Proved strong man's blood still boils, freeze winter as he may.
 Sudden, a burst of bells. Out of the road, on edge Of the hamlet — horse's hoofs galloping.
 "How, a sledge?"
 What's here?" cried all as — in, up to the open space, Workyard and market-ground, folk's common meeting-place, — Stumbled on, till he fell, in one last bound for life,
 A horse: and, at his heels, a sledge held — "Dmitri's wife!
 Back without Dmitri too! and children — where are they?
 Only a frozen corpse!"

They drew it forth: then — "Nay, Not dead, though like to die! Gone hence a month ago:
 20 Home again, this rough jaunt — alone through night and snow —
 What can the cause be? Hark — Droug, old horse, how he groans:
 His day's done! Chafe away, keep chafing, for she moans:
 She's coming to! Give here: see, motherkin, your friends!
 Cheer up, all safe at home! Warm inside makes amends For outside cold, — sup quick! Don't look as we were bears!
 What is it startles you? What strange adventure stares Up at us in your face? You know friends — which is which?
 I'm Vassili, he's Sergei, Ivàn Ivànovitch . . ."

At the word, the woman's eyes, slow-wandering till they neared 30 The blue eyes o'er the bush of honey-coloured beard, Took in full light and sense and — torn to rags, some dream

Which hid the naked truth — O loud and long the scream
 She gave, as if all power of voice within her throat Poured itself wild away to waste in one dread note!
 Then followed gasps and sobs, and then the steady flow Of kindly tears: the brain was saved, a man might know.
 Down fell her face upon the good friend's propping knee;
 His broad hands smoothed her head, as fain to brush it free From fancies, swarms that stung like bees unhived. He soothed —
 "Loukèria, Louscha!" — still he, fondling, smoothed and smoothed.
 At last her lips formed speech.

"Ivàn, dear — you indeed! You, just the same dear you! While I . . . O intercede, Sweet Mother, with thy Son Almighty — let his might Bring yesterday once more, undo all done last night!
 But this time yesterday, Ivàn, I sat like you,
 A child on either knee, and, dearer than the two,
 A babe inside my arms, close to my heart — that's lost In morsels o'er the snow! Father, Son, Holy Ghost, Cannot you bring again my blessed yesterday?"

When no more tears would flow, she told 50 her tale: this way.

"Maybe, a month ago, — was it not? — news came here,
 They wanted, deeper down, good workmen fit to rear
 A church and roof it in. 'We'll go,' my husband said:
 'None understands like me to melt and mould their lead.'
 So, friends here helped us off — Ivàn, dear, you the first!
 How gay we jingled forth, all five — (my heart will burst) — While Dmitri shook the reins, urged Droug upon his track!

"Well, soon the month ran out, we just were coming back,
 When yesterday — behold, the village was on fire!
 Fire ran from house to house. What help, 60 as, nigh and nigher,
 The flames came furious? 'Haste,' cried Dmitri, 'men must do

The little good man may: to sledge and in with you,
 You and our three! We check the fire by laying flat Each building in its path, — I needs must stay for that, —
 But you . . . no time for talk! Wrap round you every rug, Cover the couple close, — you'll have the babe to hug.
 No care to guide old Droug, he knows his way, by guess, Once start him on the road: but chirrup, none the less!
 The snow lies glib as glass and hard as steel, and soon You'll have rise, fine and full, a marvel of a moon.
 10 Hold straight up, all the same, this lighted twist of pitch!
 Once home and with our friend Ivàn Ivànovitch, All's safe: I have my pay in pouch, all's right with me,
 So I but find as safe you and our precious three!
 'Off, Droug!' — because the flames had reached us, and the men Shouted 'But lend a hand, Dmìtri — as good as ten!'
 "So, in we bundled — I, and these God gave me once; Old Droug, that's stiff at first, seemed youthful for the nonce:
 He understood the case, galloping straight ahead.
 Out came the moon: my twist soon dwindled, feebly red 20 In that unnatural day — yes, daylight, bred between Moon-light and snow-light, lamped those grotto-depths which screen Such devils from God's eye. Ah, pines, how straight you grow Nor bend one pitying branch, true breed of brutal snow!
 Some undergrowth had served to keep the devils blind While we escaped outside their border!
 "Was that — wind?
 Anyhow, Droug starts, stops, back go his ears, he snuffs, Snorts, — never such a snort! then plunges, knows the sough's Only the wind: yet, no — our breath goes up too straight!
 Still the low sound, — less low, loud, louder, at a rate 30 There's no mistaking more! Shall I lean out — look — learn The truth whatever it be? Pad, pad!
 At last. I turn —

"'Tis the regular pad of the wolves in pursuit of the life in the sledge!
 An army they are: close-packed they press like the thrust of a wedge:
 They increase as they hunt: for I see, through the pine-trunks ranged each side, Slip forth new fiend and fiend, make wider and still more wide
 The four-footed steady advance. The foremost — none may pass:
 They are elders and lead the line, eye and eye — green-glowing brass!
 But a long way distant still. Droug, save us! He does his best:
 Yet they gain on us, gain, till they reach, — one reaches . . . How utter the rest?
 O that Satan-faced first of the band! 40 How he lolls out the length of his tongue, How he laughs and lets gleam his white teeth! He is on me, his paws pry among The wraps and the rugs! O my pair, my twin-pigeons, lie still and seem dead!
 Stepàn, he shall never have you for a meal, — here's your mother instead!
 No, he will not be counselled — must cry, poor Stìdpka, so foolish! though first
 Of my boy-brood, he was not the best: nay, neighbours have called him the worst:
 He was puny, an undersized slip, — a darling to me, all the same!
 But little there was to be praised in the boy, and a plenty to blame.
 I loved him with heart and soul, yes — but, deal him a blow for a fault,
 He would sulk for whole days. 'Foolish boy! lie still or the villain will vault, 50 Will snatch you from over my head!' No use! he cries, screams, — who can hold Fast a boy in a frenzy of fear! It follows — as I foretold!
 The Satan-face snatched and snapped: I tugged, I tore — and then His brother too needs must shriek! If one must go, 'tis men The Tsar needs, so we hear, not ailing boys! Perhaps My hands relaxed their grasp, got tangled in the wraps:
 God, he was gone! I looked: there tumbled the cursed crew, Each fighting for a share: too busy to pursue!
 That's so far gain at least: Droug, gallop another verst
 Or two, or three — God sends we beat them, arrive the first!
 A mother who boasts two boys was ever 60 accounted rich:

Some have not a boy: some have, but lose him, — God knows which Is worse: how pitiful to see your weakling pine
And pale and pass away! Strong brats, this pair of mine!

"O misery! for while I settle to what near seems

Content, I am 'ware again of the tramp, and again there gleams —

Point and point — the line, eyes, levelled green brassy fire!

So soon is resumed your chase? Will nothing appease, nought tire

The furies? And yet I think — I am certain the race is slack,

And the numbers are nothing like. Not a quarter of the pack!

10 Feasters and those full-fed are staying behind . . . Ah why?

We'll sorrow for that too soon! Now, — gallop, reach home, and die,

Nor ever again leave house, to trust our life in the trap

For life — we call a sledge! Teriðscha, in my lap!

Yes, I'll lie down upon you, tight-tie you with the strings

Here — of my heart! No fear, this time, your mother flings . . .

Flings? I flung? Never! but think!
a woman, after all

Contending with a wolf! Save you I must and shall,

Terenti!

"How now? What, you still head the race,

Your eyes and tongue and teeth crave fresh food, Satan-face?

20 There and there! Plain I struck green fire out! Flash again?

All a poor fist can do to damage eyes proves vain!

My fist — why not crunch that? He is wanton for . . . O God,

Why give this wolf his taste? Common wolves scrape and prod

The earth till out they scratch some corpse — mere putrid flesh!

Why must this glutton leave the faded, choose the fresh?

Terenti! — God, feel! — his neck keeps fast thy bag

Of holy things, saints' bones, this Satanface will drag

Forth, and devour along with him, our Pope declared

The relics were to save from danger!

"Spurned, not spared.

30 'Twas through my arms, crossed arms, he — nuzzling now with snout,

Now ripping, tooth and claw — plucked, pulled Terenti out,

A prize indeed! I saw — how could I else but see? —

My precious one — I bit to hold back — pulled from me!

Up came the others, fell to dancing — did the imps! —

Skipped as they scampered round.
There's one is grey, and limps:

Who knows but old bad Märpha, — she always owed me spite

And envied me my births, — skulks out of doors at night

And turns into a wolf, and joins the sister-
hood,

And laps the youthful life, then slinks from out the wood,

Squats down at door by dawn, spins there 40 demure as erst

— No strength, old crone, — not she! — to crawl forth half a verst!

"Well, I escaped with one: 'twixt one and none there lies

The space 'twixt heaven and hell. And see, a rose-light dyes

The endmost snow: 'tis dawn, 'tis day,
'tis safe at home!

We have outwitted you! Ay, monsters, snarl and foam,

Fight each the other fiend, disputing for a share,

Forgetful, in your greed, our finest off we
bear,

Tough Droug and I, — my babe, my boy that shall be man,

My man that shall be more, do all a hunter
can

To trace and follow and find and catch 50 and crucify

Wolves, wolfkins, all your crew! A thousand deaths shall die

The whimperingest cub that ever squeezed the teat!

'Take that!' we'll stab you with, — 'the tenderness we met

When, wretches, you danced round — not this, thank God — not this!

Hellhounds, we baulk you!

"But — Ah, God above! — Bliss, bliss — Not the band, no! And yet — yes, for Droug knows him! One —

This only of them all has said 'She saves a son!'

His fellows disbelieve such luck: but he believes,

He lets them pick the bones, laugh at him 60
in their sleeves:

He's off and after us, — one speck, one spot, one ball

Grows bigger, bound on bound, — one wolf as good as all!

Oh but I know the trick! Have at the snaky tongue!
That's the right way with wolves! Go, tell your mates I wrung The panting morsel out, left you to howl your worst!
Now for it — now! Ah me! I know him — thrice-accurst Satan-face, — him to the end my foe!

“All fight's in vain:

This time the green brass points pierce to my very brain.

I fall — fall as I ought — quite on the babe I guard:

I overspread with flesh the whole of him.
Too hard

To die this way, torn piecemeal? Move hence? Not I — one inch!

Gnaw through me, through and through:
flat thus I lie nor flinch!

O God, the feel of the fang furrowing my shoulder! — see!

It grinds — it grates the bone. O Kìrill under me.

Could I do more? Beside he knew wolf's way to win:

I clung, closed round like wax: yet in he wedged and in,

Past my neck, past my breasts, my heart, until . . . how feels

The onion-bulb your knife parts, pushing through its peels,

Till out you scoop its clove wherein lie stalk and leaf

And bloom and seed unborn?

“That slew me: yes, in brief,
I died then, dead I lay doubtlessly till Droug stopped

Here, I suppose. I come to life, I find me
propped

Thus — how or when or why, — I know not. Tell me, friends,

All was a dream: laugh quick and say the nightmare ends!

Soon I shall find my house: 'tis over there:
in proof,

Save for that chimney heaped with snow, you'd see the roof

Which holds my three — my two — my one — not one?

“Life's mixed

With misery, yet we live — must live.
The Satan fixed

His face on mine so fast, I took its print as pitch

Takes what it cools beneath. Ivàn Ivànovitch,

'Tis you unhardened me, you thaw, disperse
the thing!

Only keep looking kind, the horror will not cling.

Your face smooths fast away each print of Satan. Tears

— What good they do! Life's sweet, and all its after-years,

Ivàn Ivànovitch, I owe you! Yours am
I!

May God reward you, dear!”

Down she sank. Solemnly

Ivàn rose, raised his axe, — for fitly, as she knelt,

Her head lay: well-apart, each side, her arms hung, — dealt

Lightning-swift thunder-strong one blow — no need of more!

Headless she knelt on still: that pine was sound at core

(Neighbours were used to say) — cast-iron-kernelled — which Taxed for a second stroke Ivàn Ivànovitch.

The man was scant of words as strokes.

“It had to be:

I could no other: God it was bade ‘Act
for me!’”

Then stooping, peering round — what is it now he lacks?

A proper strip of bark wherewith to wipe his axe.

Which done, he turns, goes in, closes the door behind.

The others mute remain, watching the blood-snake wind

Into a hiding-place among the splinterheaps.

At length, still mute, all move: one lifts, — from where it steeps

Redder each ruddy rag of pine, — the head: two more

Take up the dripping body: then, mute 50 still as before,

Move in a sort of march, march on till marching ends

Opposite to the church; where halting, — who suspends,

By its long hair, the thing, deposits in its
place

The piteous head: once more the body shows no trace

Of harm done: there lies whole the Loùscha, maid and wife

And mother, loved until this latest of her
life.

Then all sit on the bank of snow which bounds a space

Kept free before the porch for judgment:
just the place!

Presently all the souls, man, woman, child, which make

The village up, are found assembling for 60 the sake

- Of what is to be done. The very Jews are there:
 A Gipsy-troop, though bound with horses for the Fair, Squats with the rest. Each heart with its conception seethes And simmers, but no tongue speaks: one may say, — none breathes.
- Anon from out the church totters the Pope — the priest — Hardly alive, so old, a hundred years at least.
 With him, the Commune's head, a hoary senior too, Stàrosta, that's his style, — like Equity Judge with you, — Natural Jurisconsult: then, fenced about with furs, 10 Pomeschik, — Lord of the Land, who wilds — and none demurs — A power of life and death. They stoop, survey the corpse.
- Then, straightened on his staff, the Stàrosta — the thorpe's Sagaciousest old man — hears what you just have heard, From Droug's first inrush, all, up to Ivàn's last word
 "God bade me act for him: I dared not disobey!"
- Silence — the Pomeschik broke with "A wild wrong way Of righting wrong — if wrong there were, such wroth to rouse!
 Why was not law observed? What article allows Whoso may please to play the judge, and, judgment dealt, 20 Play executioner, as promptly as we pelt To death, without appeal, the vermin whose sole fault
 Has been — it dared to leave the darkness of its vault, Intrude upon our day! Too sudden and too rash!
 What was this woman's crime? Suppose the church should crash Down where I stand, your lord: bound are my serfs to dare Their utmost that I 'scape: yet, if the crashing scare
 My children, — as you are, — if sons fly, one and all, Leave father to his fate, — poor cowards though I call
 The runaway, I pause before I claim their life 30 Because they prized it more than mine. I would each wife Died for her husband's sake, each son to save his sire:
- 'Tis glory, I applaud — scarce duty, I require.
 Ivàn Ivànovitch has done a deed that's named Murder by law and me: who doubts, may speak unblamed!"
- All turned to the old Pope. "Ay, children, I am old — How old, myself have got to know no longer. Rolled Quite round, my orb of life, from infancy to age, Seems passing back again to youth. A certain stage
 At least I reach, or dream I reach, where I discern Truer truths, laws behold more lawlike than we learn When first we set our foot to tread the course I trod With man to guide my steps: who leads me now is God.
 'Your young men shall see visions:' and in my youth I saw And paid obedience to man's visionary law:
 'Your old men shall dream dreams:' and, in my age, a hand Conducts me through the cloud round law to where I stand Firm on its base, — know cause, who, before, knew effect.
- "The world lies under me: and nowhere I detect So great a gift as this — God's own — of human life.
 'Shall the dead praise thee?' No! 'The whole live world is rife, God, with thy glory,' rather! Life then, God's best of gifts, For what shall man exchange? For life — when so he shifts
 The weight and turns the scale, lets life for life restore God's balance, sacrifice the less to gain the more, Substitute — for low life, another's or his own — Life large and liker God's who gave it: thus alone May life extinguish life that life may trulier be!
 How low this law descends on earth, is not for me To trace: complexed becomes the simple, intricate The plain, when I pursue law's winding. 60
 'Tis the straight
 Outflow of law I know and name: to law, the fount Fresh from God's footstool, friends, follow while I remount.

"A mother bears a child: perfection is complete
 So far in such a birth. Enabled to repeat The miracle of life, — herself was born so just A type of womankind, that God sees fit to trust Her with the holy task of giving life in turn.
 Crowned by this crowning pride, — how say you, should she spurn Regality — decrowned, unchilded, by her choice Of barrenness exchanged for fruit which made rejoice Creation, though life's self were lost in giving birth To life more fresh and fit to glorify God's earth?
 How say you, should the hand God trusted with life's torch Kindled to light the world — aware of sparks that scorch, Let fall the same? Forsooth, her flesh a fire-flake stings:
 The mother drops the child! Among what monstrous things Shall she be classed? Because of motherhood, each male Yields to his partner place, sinks proudly in the scale:
 His strength owned weakness, wit — folly, and courage — fear, Beside the female proved male's mistress — only here.
 The fox-dam, hunger-pined, will slay the felon sire
 Who dares assault her whelp: the beaver, stretched on fire, Will die without a groan: no pang avails to wreat
 Her young from where they hide — her sanctuary breast.
 What's here then? Answer me, thou dead one, as, I trow, Standing at God's own bar, he bids thee answer now!
 Thrice crowned wast thou — each crown of pride, a child — thy charge!
 Where are they? Lost? Enough: no need that thou enlarge On how or why the loss: life left to utter 'lost' Condemns itself beyond appeal. The soldier's post Guards from the foe's attack the camp he sentinels:
 That he no traitor proved, this and this only tells —
 Over the corpse of him trod foe to foe's success.
 Yet — one by one thy crowns torn from thee — thou no less

To scare the world, shame God, — livedst!
 I hold He saw
 The unexampled sin, ordained the novel law, Whereof first instrument was first intelligence Found loyal here. I hold that, failing human sense,
 The very earth had oped, sky fallen, to efface Humanity's new wrong, motherhood's first disgrace.
 Earth oped not, neither fell the sky, for prompt was found A man and man enough, head-sober and heart-sound, Ready to hear God's voice, resolute to obey.
 Ivàn Ivànovitch, I hold, has done, this day,
 No otherwise than did, in ages long ago,
 Moses when he made known the purport of that flow Of fire athwart the law's twain-tables! I proclaim Ivàn Ivànovitch God's servant!"

At which name
 Uprose that creepy whisper from out the crowd, is wont
 To swell and surge and sink when fellow-men confront
 A punishment that falls on fellow flesh and blood, Appallingly beheld — shudderingly understood,
 No less, to be the right, the just, the merciful.
 "God's servant!" hissed the crowd.
 When that Amen grew dull
 And died away and left acquittal plain adjudged.
 "Amen!" last sighed the lord. "There's none shall say I grudged Escape from punishment in such a novel case.
 Deferring to old age and holy life, — be grace Granted! say I. No less, scruples might shake a sense Firmer than I boast mine. Law's law, and evidence Of breach therein lies plain, — blood-red-bright, — all may see!
 Yet all absolve the deed: absolved the deed must be!

"And next — as mercy rules the hour — methinks 'twere well You signify forthwith its sentence, and dispel
 The doubts and fears, I judge, which busy now the head Law puts a halter round — a halo — you, instead!

Ivàn Ivànovitch — what think you he expects Will follow from his feat? Go, tell him — law protects Murder, for once: no need he longer keep behind
 The Sacred Pictures — where skulks Innocence enshrined, Or I missay! Go, some! You others, haste and hide
 The dismal object there: get done, what-e'er betide!"

So, while the youngsters raised the corpse, the elders trooped Silently to the house: where halting, some — one stooped, Listened beside the door; all there was silent too.

o Then they held counsel; then pushed door and, passing through,
 Stood in the murderer's presence.

Ivàn Ivànovitch
 Knelt, building on the floor that Kremlin rare and rich
 He deftly cut and carved on lazy winter nights.
 Some five young faces watched, breathlessly, as, to rights, Piece upon piece, he reared the fabric nigh complete.
 Stèscha, Ivàn's old mother, sat spinning by the heat Of the oven where his wife Kàtia stood baking bread.
 Ivàn's self, as he turned his honey-coloured head,
 Was just in act to drop, 'twixt fir-cones, — each a dome, —

20 The scooped-out yellow gourd presumably the home Of Kolokol the Big: the bell, therein to hitch, — An acorn-cup — was ready: Ivàn Ivànovitch Turned with it in his mouth.

They told him he was free
 As air to walk abroad. "How other-wise?" asked he.

TRAY.

SING me a hero! Quench my thirst
 Of soul, ye bards!

Quoth Bard the first:
 "Sir Olaf, the good knight, did don His helm and eke his habergeon . . ."
 Sir Olaf and his bard — —!

30 "That sin-scathed brow" (quoth Bard the second)
 "That eye wide ope as though Fate beckoned

My hero to some steep, beneath Which precipice smiled tempting death . . .
 You too without your host have reckoned!

"A beggar-child" (let's hear this third!)
 "Sat on a quay's edge: like a bird Sang to herself at careless play, And fell into the stream. 'Dismay!
 Help, you the standers-by!' None stirred.

"Bystanders reason, think of wives And children ere they risk their lives.
 Over the balustrade has bounced
 A mere instinctive dog, and pounced Plumb on the prize. 'How well he dives!

"Up he comes with the child, see, tight In mouth, alive too, clutched from quite A depth of ten feet — twelve, I bet!
 Good dog! What, off again? There's yet Another child to save? All right!

"How strange we saw no other fall!
 It's instinct in the animal.
 Good dog! But he's a long while under:
 If he got drowned I should not wonder — Strong current, that against the wall!"

"Here he comes, holds in mouth this time — What may the thing be? Well, that's prime!
 Now, did you ever? Reason reigns In man alone, since all Tray's pains Have fished — the child's doll from the slime!"

"And so, amid the laughter gay, Trotted my hero off, — old Tray, — Till somebody, prerogative
 With reason, reasoned: 'Why he dived, His brain would show us, I should say.

"John, go and catch — or, if needs be,
 Purchase — that animal for me!
 By vivisection, at expense Of half-an-hour and eighteenpence, How brain secretes dog's soul, we'll see!"

NED BRATTS.

[See John Bunyan's inimitable "Life and Death of Mr. Badman," where the story is told as only Bunyan can tell a story.]

'Twas Bedford Special Assize, one daft 70 Midsummer's Day:
 A broiling blasting June, — was never its like, men say.
 Corn stood sheaf-ripe already, and trees looked yellow as that;

- Ponds drained dust-dry, the cattle lay foaming around each flat.
Inside town, dogs went mad, and folk kept bibbing beer
While the parsons prayed for rain. 'Twas horrible, yes — but queer: Queer — for the sun laughed gay, yet nobody moved a hand To work one stroke at his trade: as given to understand That all was come to a stop, work and such worldly ways,
And the world's old self about to end in a merry blaze.
Midsummer's Day moreover was the first of Bedford Fair, With Bedford Town's tag-rag and bobtail a-bowsing there.
- o But the Court House, Quality crammed:
through doors ope, windows wide, High on the Bench you saw sit Lordships side by side.
There frowned Chief Justice Jukes, fumed learned Brother Small, And fretted their fellow Judge: like threshers, one and all, Of a reek with laying down the law in a furnace. Why?
Because their lungs breathed flame — the regular crowd forbye — From gentry pouring in — quite a nosegay, to be sure!
How else could they pass the time, six mortal hours endure Till night should extinguish day, when matters might haply mend?
Meanwhile no bad resource was — watching begin and end
- so Some trial for life and death, in a brisk five minutes' space,
And betting which knave would 'scape, which hang, from his sort of face.
- So, their Lordships toiled and moiled, and a deal of work was done (I warrant) to justify the mirth of the crazy sun
As this and t'other lout, struck dumb at the sudden show
Of red robes and white wigs, boggled nor answered "Boh!"
When asked why he, Tom Styles, should not — because Jack Nokes Had stolen the horse — be hanged: for Judges must have their jokes, And louts must make allowance — let's say, for some blue fly Which punctured a dewy scalp where the frizzles stuck awry —
- so Else Tom had fleeced scot-free, so nearly over and done
Was the main of the job. Full-measure, the gentles enjoyed their fun,
- As a twenty-five were tried, rank puritans caught at prayer
In a cow-house and laid by the heels, — have at 'em, devil may care! — And ten were prescribed the whip, and ten a brand on the cheek, And five a slit of the nose — just leaving enough to tweak.
- Well, things at jolly high-tide, amusement steeped in fire, While noon smote fierce the roof's red tiles to heart's desire,
The Court a-simmer with smoke, one ferment of oozy flesh, One spirituous humming musk mount-mounting until its mesh Entoiled all heads in a fluster, and Serjeant 40 Postlethwayte
— Dashing the wig oblique as he mopped his oily pate — Cried "Silence, or I grow grease! No loophole lets in air?
Jurymen, — Guilty, Death! Gainsay me if you dare!"
— Things at this pitch, I say, — what hubbub without the doors?
What laughs, shrieks, hoots and yells, what rudest of uproars?
- Bounce through the barrier throng a bulk comes rolling vast!
Thumps, kicks, — no manner of use! — spite of them rolls at last Into the midst a ball which, bursting, brings to view Publican Black Ned Bratts and Tabby his big wife too:
Both in a muck-sweat, both . . . were 50 never such eyes uplift
At the sight of yawning hell, such nostrils
— snouts that sniffed Sulphur, such mouths a-gape ready to swallow flame!
Horried, hideous, frank fiend-faces! yet,
all the same,
Mixed with a certain . . . eh? how shall I dare style — mirth
The desperate grin of the guess that, could they break from earth, Heaven was above, and hell might rage in impotence
Below the saved, the saved!
- "Confound you! (no offence!) Out of our way, — push, wife! Yonder their Worship be!" Ned Bratts has reached the bar, and "Hey, my Lords," roars he,
"A Jury of life and death, Judges the prime 60
of the land, Constables, javelineers, — all met, if I understand,

- To decide so knotty a point as whether
'twas Jack or Joan Robbed the henroost, pinched the pig, hit the King's Arms with a stone, Dropped the baby down the well, left the tithesman in the lurch, Or, three whole Sundays running, not once attended church!
What a pothor — do these deserve the parish-stocks or whip, More or less brow to brand, much or little nose to snip, — When, in our Public, plain stand we — that's we stand here, I and my Tab, brass-bold, brick-built of beef and beer,
— Do not we, slut? Step forth and show your beauty, jade!
10 Wife of my bosom — that's the word now!
What a trade
We drove! None said us nay: nobody loved his life So little as wag a tongue against us, — did they, wife?
Yet they knew us all the while, in their hearts, for what we are — Worst couple, rogue and quean, un-hanged — search near and far!
Eh, Tab? The pedlar, now — o'er his noggin — who warned a mate To cut and run, nor risk his pack where its loss of weight Was the least to dread, — aha, how we two laughed a-good As, stealing round the midden, he came on where I stood With billet poised and raised, — you, ready with the rope, — 20 Ah, but that's past, that's sin repented of we hope!
Men knew us for that same, yet safe and sound stood we!
The lily-livered knaves knew too (I've balked a d——)
Our keeping the 'Pied Bull' was just a mere pretence:
Too slow the pounds make food, drink, lodging, from out the pence!
There's not a stoppage to travel has chanced, this ten long year, No break into hall or grange, no lifting of nag or steer,
Not a single roguery, from the clipping of a purse
To the cutting of a throat, but paid us toll.
Od's curse!
When Gipsy-Smouch made bold to cheat us of our due, 30 — Eh, Tab? the Squire's strong-box we helped the rascal to — I think he pulled a face, next Sessions' swinging-time!
He danced the jig that needs no floor, — and, here's the prime,
- 'Twas Scroggs that houghed the mare!
Ay, those were busy days!
- "Well, there we flourished brave, like scripture-trees called bays, Faring high, drinking hard, in money up to
head
— Not to say, boots and shoes, when . . .
Zounds, I nearly said — Lord, to unlearn one's language! How shall we labour, wife?
Have you, fast hold, the Book? Grasp, grip it, for your life!
See, sirs, here's life, salvation! Here's — hold but out my breath — When did I speak so long without once 40 swearing? 'Sdeath, No, nor unhelped by ale since man and boy! And yet
All yesterday I had to keep my whistle wet While reading Tab this Book: book?
don't say 'book' — they're plays, Songs, ballads and the like: here's no such strawy blaze,
But sky wide ope, sun, moon, and seven stars out full-flare!
Tab, help and tell! I'm hoarse. A mug!
or — no, a prayer!
Dip for one out of the Book! Who wrote it in the Jail
— He plied his pen unhelped by beer, sirs, I'll be bail!
- "I've got my second wind. In trundles she — that's Tab.
'Why, Gammer, what's come now, that — 50 bobbing like a crab On Yule-tide bowl — your head's a-work and both your eyes Break loose? Afeard, you fool? As if the dead can rise!
Say — Bagman Dick was found last May with fuddling-cap Stuffed in his mouth: to choke's a natural mishap!
'Gaffer, be — blessed,' cries she, 'and Bag-man Dick as well!
I, you, and he are damned: this Public is our hell:
We live in fire: live coals don't feel! — Once quenched, they learn — Cinders do, to what dust they moulder while they burn!
- "If you don't speak straight out,' says I 30
— belike I swore —
'A knobstick, well you know the taste of shall, once more, Teach you to talk, my maid!' She ups with such a face, Heart sunk inside me. 'Well, pad on, my prate-apace!
- "I've been about those laces we need for
. . . never rained!

If henceforth they tie hands, 'tis mine they'll have to bind.
You know who makes them best — the Tinker in our cage, Pulled-up for gospelling, twelve years ago:
no age
To try another trade, — yet, so he scorned
to take Money he did not earn, he taught himself the make
Of laces, tagged and tough — Dick Bag-man found them so!
Good customers were we! Well, last week, you must know His girl, — the blind young chit, who hawks about his wares, — She takes it in her head to come no more — such airs
These hussies have! Yet, since we need a stoutish lace, —
"I'll to the jail-bird father, abuse her to his face!"
So, first I filled a jug to give me heart, and
then,
Primed to the proper pitch, I posted to their den — Patmore — they style their prison! I tip the turnkey, catch My heart up, fix my face, and fearless lift the latch —
Both arms a-kimbo, in bounce with a good round oath Ready for rapping out: no "Lawks" nor
"By my troth!"
"There sat my man, the father. He looked up: what one feels When heart that leapt to mouth drops down again to heels!
He raised his hand . . . Hast seen, when drinking out the night,
And in, the day, earth grow another something quite Under the sun's first stare? I stood a very stone.
"Woman!" (a fiery tear he put in every tone),
"How should my child frequent your house where lust is sport, Violence — trade? Too true! I trust no vague report.
Her angel's hand, which stops the sight of sin, leaves clear
The other gate of sense, lets outrage through the ear.
What has she heard! — which, heard shall never be again.
Better lack food than feast, a Dives in the
— wain
Or reign or train — of Charles!" (His language was not ours:
'Tis my belief, God spoke: no tinker has such powers).

"Bread, only bread they bring — my laces:
if we broke
Your lump of leavened sin, the loaf's first crumb would choke!"
"Down on my marrow-bones! Then all at once rose he:
His brown hair burst a-spread, his eyes were suns to see: Up went his hands: "Through flesh, I reach, I read thy soul!
So may some stricken tree look blasted, bough and bole, Champed by the fire-tooth, charred without, and yet, thrice-bound With dremiment about, within may life be
found,
A prisoned power to branch and blossom 40
as before,
Could but the gardener cleave the cloister, reach the core,
Loosen the vital sap: yet where shall help
be found?
Who says 'How save it?' — nor 'Why cumberbs it the ground?'
Woman, that tree art thou! All sloughed about with scurf, Thy stag-horns fright the sky, thy snake-roots sting the turf!
Drunkenness, wantonness, theft, murder gnash and gnarl Thine outward, case thy soul with coating like the marle Satan stamps flat upon each head beneath his hoof!
And how deliver such? The strong men keep aloof,
Lover and friend stand far, the mocking 50 ones pass by,
Tophet gapes wide for prey: lost soul, despair and die!
What then? 'Look unto me and be ye saved!' saith God:
'I strike the rock, outstreats the life-stream at my rod!
Be your sins scarlet, wool shall they seem like, — although As crimson red, yet turn white as the driven snow!"
"There, there, there! All I seem to somehow understand Is — that, if I reached home, 'twas through the guiding hand
Of his blind girl which led and led me through the streets
And out of town and up to door again.
What greets
First thing my eye, as limbs recover from 60 their swoon?
A book — this Book she gave at parting.
"Father's boon —
The Book he wrote: it reads as if he spoke
himself:

He cannot preach in bonds, so, — take it down from shelf
When you want counsel, — think you hear his very voice!"

"Wicked dear Husband, first despair and then rejoice!
Dear wicked Husband, waste no tick of moment more, Be saved like me, bald trunk! There's greenness yet at core, Sap under slough! Read, read!"

"Let me take breath, my lords!
I'd like to know, are these — hers, mine, or Bunyan's words?

I'm 'wildered — scarce with drink, — nowise with drink alone!
You'll say, with heat: but heat's no stuff to split a stone 10 Like this black boulder — this flint heart of mine: the Book — That dealt the crashing blow! Sirs, here's the fist that shook His beard till Wrestler Jem howled like a just-lugged bear!
You had brained me with a feather: at once I grew aware Christmas was meant for me. A burden at your back, Good Master Christmas? Nay, — yours was that Joseph's sack,
— Or whose it was, — which held the cup,
— compared with mine!
Robbery loads my loins, perjury cracks my chine, Adultery . . . nay, Tab, you pitched me as I flung!
One word, I'll up with fist . . . No, sweet spouse, hold your tongue!

20 "I'm hasting to the end. The Book, sir, — take and read!
You have my history in a nutshell, — ay,
indeed!
It must off, my burden! See, — slack straps and into pit, Roll, reach the bottom, rest, rot there — a plague on it!
For a mountain's sure to fall and bury Bedford Town,
'Destruction' — that's the name, and fire shall burn it down!
O 'scape the wrath in time! Time's now, if not too late.
How can I pilgrimage up to the wicket-
gate?
Next comes Despond the slough: not that I fear to pull Through mud, and dry my clothes at brave House Beautiful — 30 But it's late in the day, I reckon: had I left years ago

Town, wife, and children dear . . . Well, Christmas did, you know! — Soon I had met in the valley and tried my cudgel's strength
On the enemy horned and winged,
a-straddle across its length!
Have at his horns, thwack — thwack: they snap, see! Hoof and hoof — Bang, break the fetlock-bones! For love's sake, keep aloof Angels! I'm man and match, — this cudgel for my flail, — To thresh him, hoofs and horns, bat's wing and serpent's tail!
A chance gone by! But then, what else does Hopeful ding
Into the deafest ear except — hope, hope's
the thing?
Too late! the day for me to thrud the windings: but There's still a way to win the race by death's short cut!
Did Master Faithful need climb the Delightful Mounts?
No, straight to Vanity Fair, — a fair, by all accounts,
Such as is held outside, — lords, ladies, grand and gay, —
Says he in the face of them, just what you hear me say.
And the Judges brought him in guilty, and brought him out To die in the market-place — St. Peter's Green's about
The same thing: there they flogged, flayed buffeted, lanced with knives, Pricked him with swords, — I'll swear he'd full a cat's nine lives, — So to his end at last came Faithful, — ha ha, he!
Who holds the highest card? for there stands hid, you see,
Behind the rabble-rout, a chariot, pair and
all:
He's in, he's off, he's up, through clouds at trumpet-call,
Carried the nearest way to Heaven-gate Odds my life —
Has nobody a sword to spare? not even knife?
Then hang me, draw and quarter! 'Ta
— do the same by her!
O Master Worldly-Wiseman . . . that!
Master Interpreter,
Take the will, not the deed! Our gibbet handy close: Forestall Last Judgment-Day! Be kindly not morose!
There wants no earthly judge-and-jurying here we stand — Sentence our guilty selves: so, hang us out of hand!
Make haste for pity's sake! A singmoment's loss

Means — Satan's lord once more: his whisper shoots across All singing in my heart, all praying in my brain,
'It comes of heat and beer!' — hark how he guffaws plain!
'To-morrow you'll wake bright, and, in a safe skin, hug Your sound selves, Tab and you, over a foaming jug!
You've had such qualms before, time out of mind!' He's right!
Did not we kick and cuff and curse away,
that night
When home we blindly reeled, and left poor humpback Joe I' the lurch to pay for what . . . somebody did, you know!
Both of us maundered then 'Lame humpback, — never more Will he come limping, drain his tankard at our door!
He'll swing, while — somebody . . .
Says Tab, 'No, for I'll peach!'
'I'm for you, Tab,' cries I, 'there's rope enough for each!'
So blubbered we, and bussed, and went to bed upon
The grace of Tab's good thought: by morning, all was gone!
We laughed — 'What's life to him, a cripple of no account?'
Oh, waves increase around — I feel them mount and mount!
Hang us! To-morrow brings Tom Bear-ward with his bears:
One new black-muzzled brute beats Sackerson, he swears: (Sackerson, for my money!) And, baiting o'er, the Brawl
They lead on Turner's Patch, — lads, lasses, up tails all, — I'm i' the thick o' the throng! That means the Iron Cage, — Means the Lost Man inside! Where's hope for such as wage War against light? Light's left, light's here, I hold light still,
So does Tab — make but haste to hang us both! You will?"

I promise, when he stopped you might have heard a mouse Squeak, such a death-like hush sealed up the old Mote House.
But when the mass of man sank meek upon his knees, While Tab, alongside, wheezed a hoarse
"Do hang us, please!"
Why, then the waters rose, no eye but ran with tears,
Hearts heaved, heads thumped, until, paying all past arrears

Of pity and sorrow, at last a regular scream outbroke
Of triumph, joy and praise.

My Lord Chief Justice spoke, First mopping brow and cheek, where still,
for one that budged, Another bead broke fresh: "What Judge, that ever judged Since first the world began, judged such a case as this?
Why, Master Bratts, long since, folk smelt you out, I wis!
I had my doubts, i' faith, each time you played the fox Convicting geese of crime in yonder witness-box —
Yea, much did I misdoubt, the thief that 40 stole her eggs
Was hardly goosey's self at Reynard's game, i' feggs!
Yet thus much was to praise — you spoke to point, direct — Swore you heard, saw the theft: no jury could suspect — Dared to suspect, — I'll say, — a spot in white so clear:
Goosey was throttled, true: but thereof godly fear Came of example set, much as our laws
intend;
And, though a fox confessed, you proved the Judge's friend.
What if I had my doubts? Suppose I gave them breath,
Brought you to bar: what work to do, ere 'Guilty, Death,' —
Had paid our pains! What heaps of wit- 50 nesses to drag
From holes and corners, paid from out the County's bag!
Trial three dog-days long! Amicus Curia — that's Your title, no dispute — truth-telling Master Bratts!
Thank you, too, Mistress Tab! Why doubt one word you say?
Hanging you both deserve, hanged both shall be this day!
The tinker needs must be a proper man.
I've heard
He lies in Jail long since: if Quality's good
word Warrants me letting loose, — some householder, I mean — Freeholder, better still, — I don't say but
— between Now and next Sessions . . . Well! Con- 60
sider of his case,
I promise to, at least: we owe him so much
grace.
Not that — no, God forbid! — I lean to think, as you,

The grace that such repent is any jail-bird's
 due:
 I rather see the fruit of twelve years' pious
 reign — Astræa Redux, Charles restored his rights
 again!
 — Of which, another time! I somehow feel a peace Stealing across the world. May deeds like this increase!
 So, Master Sheriff, stay that sentence I pronounced
 On those two dozen odd: deserving to be trounced Soundly, and yet . . . well, well, at all events dispatch

This pair of — shall I say, sinner-saints?
 — ere we catch Their jail-distemper too. Stop tears, or I'll indite
 All weeping Bedfordshire for turning Bun-yanite!"

So, forms were galloped through. If Justice, on the spur, Proved somewhat expeditious, would Quality demur?
 And happily hanged were they, — why lengthen out my tale? — Where Bunyan's Statue stands facing where stood his Jail.

DRAMATIC IDYLS.

SECOND SERIES.

1880.

"You are sick, that's sure" — they say;
 "Sick of what?" — they disagree.
 "'Tis the brain" — thinks Doctor A;
 "'Tis the heart" — holds Doctor B;
 "The liver — my life I'd lay!"
 "The lungs!" "The lights!"

Ah me!

So ignorant of man's whole Of bodily organs plain to see — So sage and certain, frank and free, About what's under lock and key — Man's soul!

ECHETLOS.

[“The holder of the ploughshare,” a gigantic figure noticeable during the fight at Marathon slaying the Persians with a ploughshare. After the fight was over the figure was seen no more.]

HERE is a story shall stir you! Stand up, Greeks dead and gone,
 Who breasted, beat Barbarians, stemmed Persia rolling on,
 Did the deed and saved the world, for the day was Marathon!

No man but did his manliest, kept rank and fought away
 In his tribe and file: up, back, out, down
 — was the spear-arm play: Like a wind-whipt branchy wood, all spear-arms a-swing that day!

But one man kept no rank and his sole arm plied no spear, As a flashing came and went, and a form
 i' the van, the rear, Brightened the battle up, for he blazed now there, now here.

Nor helmed nor shielded, he! but, a goatskin all his wear, Like a tiller of the soil, with a clown's limbs broad and bare, Went he ploughing on and on: he pushed with a ploughman's share.

Did the weak mid-line give way, as tunnies on whom the shark

Precipitates his bulk? Did the right-wing halt when, stark
 On his heap of slain lay stretched Kallimachos Polemarch?¹

Did the steady phalanx falter? To the rescue, at the need,
 The clown was ploughing Persia, clearing Greek earth of weed, As he routed through the Sakian and rooted up the Mede.

But the deed done, battle won, — nowhere ³⁰ to be descried
 On the meadow, by the stream, at the marsh, — look far and wide From the foot of the mountain, no, to the last blood-plashed seaside, —

Not anywhere on view blazed the large limbs thonged and brown, Shearing and clearing still with the share before which — down To the dust went Persia's pomp, as he ploughed for Greece, that clown!

How spake the Oracle? “Care for no name at all!
 Say but just this: ‘We praise one helpful whom we call The Holder of the Ploughshare.’ The great deed ne'er grows small.”

Not the great name! Sing — woe for the great name Miltiadés And its end at Paros isle! Woe for The- ⁴⁰ mistokles
 — Satrap in Sardis court! Name not the clown like these!

CLIVE.

[The famous Robert Clive was born, 1725, in Shropshire. He suffered greatly from low spirits, and twice attempted his life before he had attained manhood. His career in India is well known from Ma-

¹ General. The commander at Marathon was Miltiades, but Kallimachos had presided at the preliminary council of war and given his casting vote in favour of fighting.

caulay's Essay. He fought the battle of Plassy in 1757. He was impeached for various malfeasances, but acquitted. He killed himself in 1774.]

I AND Clive were friends — and why not?

Friends! I think you laugh, my lad. Clive it was gave England India, while your father gives — e'gad, England nothing but the graceless boy who lures him on to speak

"Well, Sir, you and Clive were comrades —" with a tongue thrust in your cheek!

Very true: in my eyes, your eyes, all the world's eyes, Clive was man,

I was, am and ever shall be — mouse, nay, mouse of all its clan Sorriest sample, if you take the kitchen's estimate for fame;

While the man Clive — he fought Plassy, spoiled the clever foreign game, Conquered and annexed and Englished!

Never mind! As o'er my punch 10 (You away) I sit of evenings, — silence, save for biscuit-crunch,

Black, unbroken, — thought grows busy, thrds each pathway of old years,

Notes this forthright, that meander, till the long-past life appears

Like an outspread map of country plodded through, each mile and rood,

Once, and well remembered still: I'm startled in my solitude

Ever and anon by — what's the sudden mocking light that breaks

On me as I slap the table till no rummerglass but shakes

While I ask — aloud, I do believe, God help me! — "Was it thus?"

Can it be that so I faltered, stopped when just one step for us —

(Us, — you were not born, I grant, but surely some day born would be)

20 "— One bold step had gained a province" (figurative talk, you see)

"Got no end of wealth and honour, — yet I stood stock still no less?"

— "For I was not Clive," you comment:
but it needs no Clive to guess

Wealth were handy, honour ticklish, did no writing on the wall

Warn me "Trespasser," ware man-traps!"
Him who braves that notice — call

Hero! none of such heroics suit myself who read plain words,

Doff my hat, and leap no barrier. Scripture says the land's the Lord's:

Louts then — what avail the thousand, noisy in a smock-frocked ring,

All-agog to have me trespass, clear the fence, be Clive their king?

Higher warrant must you show me ere I set one foot before

T'other in that dark direction, though I stand for evermore

Poor as Job and meek as Moses. Evermore? No! By-and-by Job grows rich and Moses valiant, Clive turns out less wise than I.

Don't object "Why call him friend, then?"
Power is power, my boy, and still

Marks a man, — God's gift magnific, exercised for good or ill.

You've your boot now on my hearth-rug, tread what was a tiger's skin:

Rarely such a royal monster as I lodged the bullet in!

True, he murdered half a village, so his own death came to pass;

Still, for size and beauty, cunning, courage
— ah, the brute he was!

Why, that Clive, — that youth, that greenhorn, that quill-driving clerk, in fine, —

He sustained a siege in Arcot. . . . But the world knows! Pass the wine.

Where did I break off at? How bring Clive in? Oh, you mentioned

"fear"! Just so: and, said I, that minds me of a story you shall hear.

We were friends then, Clive and I: so when the clouds, about the orb

Late supreme, encroaching slowly, surely threatened to absorb

Ray by ray its noontide brilliance, — friendship might, with steadier eye

Drawing near, bear what had burned close now no blaze — all majesty.

Too much bee's-wing floats my figure Well, suppose a castle's new:

None presume to climb its ramparts, no find foothold sure for shoe

'Twixt those squares and squares of granite plating the impervious pile

As his scale-mail's warty iron cuirasses a crocodile.

Reels that castle thunder-smitten, storm dismantled? From without

Scrambling up by crack and crevice, ever cockney prates about

Towers — the heap he kicks now! turret — just the measure of his cane!

Will that do? Observe moreover — (same similitude again) —

Such a castle seldom crumble: Ly shee stress of cannonade:

'Tis when foes are foiled and fighting finished that vile rains invade,

Grass o'ergrows, o'ergrows till night-bird congregating find no holes

Fit to build in like the topmost socket made for banner-poles.

So Clive crumbled slow in London — crashed at last.

A week before,
 Dining with him, — after trying churchyard-chat of days of yore, — Both of us stopped, tired as tombstones, head-piece, foot-piece, when they lean Each to other, drowsed in fog-smoke, o'er a coffined Past between.
 As I saw his head sink heavy, guessed the soul's extinguishment
 By the glazing eyeball, noticed how the furtive fingers went Where a drug-box skulked behind the honest liquor, — "One more throw Try for Clive!" thought I: "Let's venture some good rattling question!"
 So —
 "Come, Clive, tell us" — out I blurted —
 "what to tell in turn, years hence, When my boy — suppose I have one — asks me on what evidence I maintain my friend of Plassy proved a warrior every whit Worth your Alexanders, Cæsars, Marl-boroughs and — what said Pitt? — Frederick the Fierce himself! Clive told me once" — I want to say —
 "Which feat out of all those famous doings bore the bell away
 — In his own calm estimation, mark you, not the mob's rough guess — Which stood foremost as evincing what Clive called courageousness!
 Come! what moment of the minute, what speck-centre in the wide Circle of the action saw your mortal fairly deified?
 (Let alone that filthy sleep-stuff, swallow bold this wholesome Port!) If a friend has leave to question, — when were you most brave, in short?" Up he arched his brows o' the instant — formidably Clive again!
 "When was I most brave? I'd answer, were the instance half as plain As another instance that's a brain-lodged crystal — curse it! — here Freezing when my memory touches — ough! — the time I felt most fear.
 Ugh! I cannot say for certain if I showed fear — anyhow, Fear I felt, and, very likely, shuddered, since I shiver now."
 "Fear!" smiled I. "Well, that's the rarer: that's a specimen to seek, Ticket up in one's museum, Mind-Freaks, Lord Clive's Fear, Unique!" Down his brows dropped. On the table painfully he pored as though Tracing, in the stains and streaks there, thoughts encrusted long ago.
 When he spoke 'twas like a lawyer reading word by word some will,

Some blind jungle of a statement, — beating on and on until Out there leaps fierce life to fight with.

"This fell in my factor-days.
 Desk-drudge, slaving at St. David's, one must game, or drink, or craze.
 I chose gaming: and, — because your high-flown gamesters hardly take Umbrage at a factor's elbow if the factor pays his stake, —
 I was winked at in a circle where the company was choice, Captain This and Major That, men high of colour, loud of voice, Yet indulgent, condescending to the modest juvenile Who not merely risked but lost his hard-earned guineas with a smile.

"Down I sat to cards, one evening, — had for my antagonist Somebody whose name's a secret — you'll know why — so, if you list, Call him Cock o' the Walk, my scarlet son of Mars from head to heel!
 Play commenced: and, whether Cocky fancied that a clerk must feel Quite sufficient honour came of bending over one green baize, I the scribe with him the warrior, — guessed no penman dared to raise Shadow of objection should the honour stay but playing end More or less abruptly, — whether disin-clined he grew to spend Practice strictly scientific on a booby born to stare At — not ask of — lace-and-ruffles if the hand they hide plays fair, — Anyhow, I marked a movement when he bade me 'Cut!'"

"I rose.
 'Such the new manœuvre, Captain? I'm a novice: knowledge grows.
 What, you force a card, you cheat, Sir?'"

"Never did a thunder-clap Cause emotion, startle Thyrsis locked with Chloe in his lap, As my word and gesture (down I flung my cards to join the pack) Fired the man of arms, whose visage, simply red before, turned black.

When he found his voice, he stammered
 "That expression once again!"

"Well, you forced a card and cheated!"

"Possibly a factor's brain, Busied with his all-important balance accounts, may deem

Weighing words superfluous trouble: cheat to clerkly ears may seem Just the joke for friends to venture: but we are not friends, you see!
 When a gentleman is joked with, — if he's good at repartee, He rejoins, as do I — Sirrah, on your knees, withdraw in full!
 Beg my pardon, or be sure a kindly bullet through your skull Lets in light and teaches manners to what brain it finds! Choose quick — Have your life snuffed out or, kneeling, pray me trim yon candle-wick!

“Well, you cheated!”

“Then outbroke a howl from all the friends around.
 To his feet sprang each in fury, fists were clenched and teeth were ground.
 ‘End it! no time like the present! Captain, yours were our disgrace!
 No delay, begin and finish! Stand back, leave the pair a space!
 Let civilians be instructed: henceforth simply ply the pen, Fly the sword! This clerk’s no swordsmen? Suit him with a pistol, then!
 Even odds! A dozen paces ’twixt the most and least expert Make a dwarf a giant’s equal: nay, the dwarf, if he’s alert, Likelier hits the broader target!’

“Up we stood accordingly.
 As they handed me the weapon, such was my soul’s thirst to try Then and there conclusions with this bully, tread on and stamp out Every spark of his existence, that, — crept close to, curled about By that toying tempting teasing fool-finger’s middle joint, — Don’t you guess? — the trigger yielded. Gone my chance! and at the point Of such prime success moreover: scarce an inch above his head Went my ball to hit the wainscot. He was living, I was dead.

Up he marched in flaming triumph — ’twas his right, mind! — up, within just an arm’s length. ‘Now, my clerkling,’ chuckled Cocky with a grin
 As the levelled piece quite touched me, ‘Now, Sir Counting-House, repeat That expression which I told you proved bad manners! Did I cheat?’

“Cheat you did, you knew you cheated, and, this moment, know as well.
 As for me, my homely breeding bids you — fire and go to Hell!”

“Twice the muzzle touched my forehead. Heavy barrel, flurried wrist, Either spoils a steady lifting. Thrice: then, ‘Laugh at Hell who list, I can’t! God’s no fable either. Did this boy’s eye wink once? No!
 There’s no standing him and Hell and God all three against me, — so, I did cheat!’

“And down he threw the pistol, out rushed — by the door Possibly, but, as for knowledge if by chimney, roof or floor, He effected disappearance — I’ll engage no glance was sent That way by a single starrer, such a blank astonishment Swallowed up their senses: as for speaking — mute they stood as mice.

“Mute not long, though! Such reaction, such a hubbub in a trice!
 ‘Rogue and rascal! Who’d have thought it? What’s to be expected next,
 When His Majesty’s Commission serves a sharper as pretext For . . . But where’s the need of wasting time now? Nought requires delay:
 Punishment the Service cries for: let disgrace be wiped away Publicly, in good broad daylight! Resignation? No, indeed Drum and life must play the Rogue’s March, rank and file be free to speed Tardy marching on the rogue’s part by appliance in the rear — Kicks administered shall right this wronged civilian, — never fear, Mister Clive, for — though a clerk — you bore yourself — suppose we say — Just as would beseem a soldier!’

“Gentlemen, attention — pray! First, one word!”

“I passed each speaker severally in review.
 When I had precise their number, names and styles, and fully knew Over whom my supervision thenceforth must extend, — why, then —

“Some five minutes since, my life lay — as you all saw, gentlemen — At the mercy of your friend there. Not a single voice was raised In arrest of judgment, not one tongue — before my powder blazed — Ventured “Can it be the youngster blundered, really seemed to mark Some irregular proceeding? We conjecture in the dark,

Guess at random, — still, for sake of fair play — what if for a freak,
 In a fit of absence, — such things have been! — if our friend proved weak — What's the phrase? — corrected fortune! Look into the case, at least!"

Who dared interpose between the altar's victim and the priest?
 Yet he spared me! You cleven! Whosoever, all or each,
 To the disadvantage of the man who spared me, utters speech — To his face, behind his back, — that speaker has to do with me:
 Me who promise, if positions change and mine the chance should be,
 Not to imitate your friend and waive advantage!"

"Twenty-five Years ago this matter happened: and 'tis certain," added Clive,
 "Never, to my knowledge, did Sir Cocky have a single breath Breathed against him: lips were closed throughout his life, or since his death, For if he be dead or living I can tell no more than you.

All I know is — Cocky had one chance more; how he used it, — grew Out of such unlucky habits, or relapsed, and back again Brought the late-ejected devil with a score more in his train, — That's for you to judge. Reprieve I procured, at any rate.
 Ugh — the memory of that minute's fear makes gooseflesh rise! Why prate Longer? You've my story, there's your instance: fear I did, you see!"

"Well" — I hardly kept from laughing —
 "if I see it, thanks must be Wholly to your Lordship's candour. Not that — in a common case — When a bully caught at cheating thrusts a pistol in one's face, I should underrate, believe me, such a trial to the nerve!
 'Tis no joke, at one-and-twenty, for a youth to stand nor swerve.
 Fear I naturally look for — unless, of all men alive,
 I am forced to make exception when I come to Robert Clive.
 Since at Arcot, Plassy, elsewhere, he and death — the whole world knows — Came to somewhat closer quarters."

Quarters? Had we come to blows, Clive and I, you had not wondered — up he sprang so, out he rapped Such a round of oaths — no matter! I'll endeavour to adapt

To our modern usage words he — well, 'twas friendly licence — flung At me like so many fire-balls, fast as he could wag his tongue.

"You — a soldier? You — at Plassy?
 Yours the faculty to nick Instantaneously occasion when your foe, if lightning-quick, — At his mercy, at his malice, — has you, through some stupid inch Undefended in your bulwark? Thus laid open, — not to flinch — That needs courage, you'll concede me. Then, look here! Suppose the man, Checking his advance, his weapon still extended, not a span Distant from my temple, — curse him! — quietly had bade me 'There!
 Keep your life, calumniator! — worthless a life I freely spare:
 Mine you freely would have taken — murdered me and my good fame Both at once — and all the better! Go, and thank your own bad aim Which permits me to forgive you! What if, with such words as these,
 He had cast away his weapon? How should I have borne me, please?
 Nay, I'll spare you pains and tell you. This, and only this, remained — Pick his weapon up and use it on myself. I so had gained Sleep the earlier, leaving England probably to pay on still Rent and taxes for half India, tenant at the Frenchman's will."

"Such the turn," said I, "the matter takes with you? Then I abate — No, by not one jot nor tittle, — of your 5c act my estimate.
 Fear — I wish I could detect there: courage fronts me, plain enough — Call it desperation, madness — never mind! for here's in rough Why, had mine been such a trial, fear had overcome disgrace.
 True, disgrace were hard to bear: but such a rush against God's face — None of that for me, Lord Plassy, since I go to church at times, Say the creed my mother taught me! Many years in foreign climes Rub some marks away — not all, though! We poor sinners reach life's brink, Overlook what rolls beneath it, recklessly enough, but think There's advantage in what's left us — ground to stand on, time to call 'Lord, have mercy!' ere we topple over — 6a do not leap, that's all!"

Oh, he made no answer, — re-absorbed into his cloud. I caught Something like "Yes — courage: only fools will call it fear."

If aught

Comfort you, my great unhappy hero Clive, in that I heard,

Next week, how your own hand dealt you doom, and uttered just the word

"Fearfully courageous!" — this, be sure, and nothing else I groaned.

I'm no Clive, nor parson either: Clive's worst deed — we'll hope condoned.

MULÉYKEH.

If a stranger passed the tent of Hóseyn, he cried "A churl's!"

Or haply "God help the man who has neither salt nor bread!"

— "Nay," would a friend exclaim, "he needs nor pity nor scorn

10 More than who spends small thought on the shore-sand, picking pearls,

— Holds but in light esteem the seed-sort, bears instead

On his breast a moon-like prize, some orb which of night makes morn.

"What if no flocks and herds enrich the son of Sinán?

They went when his tribe was mulct, ten thousand camels the due,

Blood-value paid perforce for a murder done of old.

'God gave them, let them go! But never since time began,

Muléykeh, peerless mare, owned master
the match of you,

And you are my prize, my Pearl: I laugh at men's land and gold!"

"So in the pride of his soul laughs Hóseyn — and right, I say.

20 Do the ten steeds run a race of glory? Out-stripping all,

Ever Muléykeh stands first steed at the victor's staff.

Who started, the owner's hope, gets shamed and named, that day.

'Silence,' or, last but one, is 'The Cuffed,' as we use to call

Whom the paddock's lord thrusts forth.
Right, Hóseyn, I say, to laugh!"

"Boasts he Muléykeh the Pearl?" the stranger replies: "Be sure

On him I waste nor scorn nor pity, but lavish both

On Duhl the son of Sheybán, who withers away in heart

For envy of Hóseyn's luck. Such sickness admits no cure.

A certain poet has sung, and sealed the same with an oath,
'For the vulgar — flocks and herds! The Pearl is a prize apart.'"

Lo, Duhl the son of Sheybán comes riding to Hóseyn's tent,

And he casts his saddle down, and enters and "Peace!" bids he.

"You are poor, I know the cause: my plenty shall mend the wrong.

'Tis said of your Pearl — the price of a hundred camels spent

In her purchase were scarce ill paid: such prudence is far from me

Who proffer a thousand. Speak! Long parley may last too long."

Said Hóseyn "You feed young beasts a many, of famous breed,

Slit-eared, unblemish'd, fat, true offspring of Múzennem:

There stumbles no weak-eyed she in the line as it climbs the hill.

But I love Muléykeh's face: her forefront whitens indeed

Like a yellowish wave's cream-crest.
Your camels — go gaze on them!

Her fetlock is foam-splashed too. Myself am the richer still."

A year goes by: lo, back to the tent again rides Duhl.

"You are open-hearted, ay — moist-handed, a very prince.

Why should I speak of sale? Be the mare your simple gift!

My son is pined to death for her beauty:
my wife prompts 'Fool,

Beg for his sake the Pearl! Be God the rewarder, since

God pays debts seven for one; who squanders on Him shows thrift."

Said Hóseyn "God gives each man one life, like a lamp, then gives

That lamp due measure of oil: lamp lighted — hold high, wave wide

Its comfort for others to share! once quench it, what help is left?

The oil of your lamp is your son: I shine while Muléykeh lives.

Would I beg your son to cheer my dark if Muléykeh died?

It is life against life: what good avails to the life-bereft?"

Another year, and — hist! What craft is it Duhl designs?

He alights not at the door of the tent as he did last time,

But, creeping behind, he gropes his stealthy way by the trench

Half-round till he finds the flap in the folding, for night combines With the robber — and such is he: Duhl, covetous up to crime, Must wring from Hóseyn's grasp the Pearl, by whatever the wretch.

"He was hunger-bitten, I heard: I tempted with half my store, And a gibe was all my thanks. Is he generous like Spring dew?
Account the fault to me who chaffered with such an one!
He has killed, to feast chance comers, the creature he rode: nay, more — For a couple of singing-girls his robe has he torn in two:
I will beg! Yet I nowise gained by the tale of my wife and son.

"I swear by the Holy House, my head will I never wash
Till I filch his Pearl away. Fair dealing I tried, then guile, And now I resort to force. He said we must live or die: Let him die, then, — let me live! Be bold — but not too rash!
I have found me a peeping-place: breast, bury your breathing while I explore for myself! Now, breathe! He deceived me not, the spy!

"As he said — there lies in peace Hóseyn — how happy! Beside Stands tethered the Pearl: thrice winds her headstall about his wrist:
'Tis therefore he sleeps so sound — the moon through the roof reveals.
And, loose on his left, stands too that other,
known far and wide, Buhéyseh, her sister born: fleet is she yet ever missed
The winning tail's fire-flash a-stream past the thunderous heels.

"No less she stands saddled and bridled, this second, in case some thief Should enter and seize and fly with the first, as I mean to do.
What then? The Pearl is the Pearl: once mount her we both escape." Through the skirt-fold in glides Duhl, — so a serpent disturbs no leaf In a bush as he parts the twigs entwining a nest: clean through,
He is noiselessly at his work: as he planned, he performs the rape.

He has set the tent-door wide, has buckled the girth, has clipped The headstall away from the wrist he leaves thrice bound as before,

He springs on the Pearl, is launched on the 30 desert like bolt from bow.
Up starts our plundered man: from his breast though the heart be ripped, Yet his mind has the mastery: behold, in a minute more,
He is out and off and away on Buhéyseh, whose worth we know!

And Hóseyn — his blood turns flame, he has learned long since to ride, And Buhéyseh does her part, — they gain
— they are gaining fast
On the fugitive pair, and Duhl has Ed-Dárraj to cross and quit,
And to reach the ridge El-Sabán, — no safety till that be spied!
And Buhéyseh is, bound by bound, but a horse-length off at last,
For the Pearl has missed the tap of the heel, the touch of the bit.

She shortens her stride, she chafes at her 40 rider the strange and queer: Buhéyseh is mad with hope — beat sister she shall and must Though Duhl, of the hand and heel so clumsy, she has to thank.
She is near now, nose by tail — they are neck by croup — joy! fear!
What folly makes Hóseyn shout "Dog Duhl, Damned son of the Dust, Touch the right ear and press with your foot my Pearl's left flank!"

And Duhl was wise at the word, and Muléykeh as prompt perceived Who was urging redoubled pace, and to hear him was to obey, And a leap indeed gave she, and vanished for evermore.
And Hóseyn looked one long last look as who, all bereaved, Looks, fain to follow the dead so far as the 50 living may:
Then he turned Buhéyseh's neck slow homeward, weeping sore.

And, lo, in the sunrise, still sat Hóseyn upon the ground Weeping: and neighbours came, the tribesmen of Bénu-Asád In the vale of green Er-Rass, and they questioned him of his grief;
And he told from first to last how, serpent-like, Duhl had wound His way to the nest, and how Duhl rode like an ape, so bad!
And how Buhéyseh did wonders, yet Pearl remained with the thief.

And they jeered him, one and all: "Poor Hóseyn is crazed past hope!

How else had he wrought himself his ruin, in fortune's spite?
 To have simply held the tongue were a task for a boy or girl, And here were Muléykeh again, the eyed like an antelope,
 The child of his heart by day, the wife of his breast by night!" —
 "And the beaten in speed!" wept Hóseyn:
 "You never have loved my Pearl."

PIETRO OF ABANO.

[An Italian physician, born 1246, died 1320. Professor of Medicine at Padua.
 Accused of the black arts, but died in time to avoid being burnt. A voluminous author on occult and semi-scientific subjects.]

Petrus Aponensis — there was a magician!
 When that strange adventure happened, which I mean to tell my hearers, Nearly had he tried all trades — beside physician, Architect, astronomer, astrologer, — or
 worse:

10 How else, as the old books warrant, was he
 able,
 All at once, through all the world, to prove the promptest of appearers Where was prince to cure, tower to build as high as Babel, Star to name or sky-sign read, — yet pouch, for pains, a curse?

— Curse: for when a vagrant, — foot-sore, travel-tattered,
 Now a young man, now an old man, Turk or Arab, Jew or Gipsy, — Proffered folk in passing — O for pay, what mattered? —

"I'll be doctor, I'll play builder, star I'll name — sign read!"
 Soon as prince was cured, tower built, and fate predicted,

"Who may you be?" came the question;
 when he answered, "Petrus ipse," 20 "Just as we divined!" cried folk — "A wretch convicted Long ago of dealing with the devil — you

 indeed!"

So, they cursed him roundly, all his labour's payment,

Motioned him — the convalescent prince would — to vacate the presence:

Babylonians plucked his beard and tore his raiment,

Drove him from that tower he built: while,
 had he peered at stars,

Town howled "Stone the quack who styles our Dog-star — Sirius!"

Country yelled "Aroint the churl who prophesies we take no pleasance Under vine and fig-tree, since the year's delirious, Bears no crop of any kind, — all through the planet Mars!"

Straightway would the whilom youngster grow a grisard,

Or, as case might hap, the hoary eld drop off and show a stripling.

Town and country groaned — indebted to a wizard!

"Curse — nay, kick and cuff him — fit requital of his pains!

Gratitude in word or deed were wasted truly!

Rather make the Church amends by crying out on, cramping, crippling

One who, on pretence of serving man, serves duly

Man's arch foe: not ours, be sure, but Satan's — his the gains!"

Peter grinned and bore it, such disgraceful usage:

Somehow, cuffs and kicks and curses seem ordained his like to suffer:

Prophet's pay with Christians, now as in 4
 the Jews' age,

Still is — stoning: so, he meekly took his wage and went,

— Safe again was found ensconced in those old quarters,

Padua's blackest blindest by-street, — none the worse, nay, somewhat tougher:

"Calculating," quoth he, "soon I join the martyrs,

Since, who magnify my lore on burning me are bent."¹

Therefore, on a certain evening, to his alley

Peter slunk, all bruised and broken, sore in body, sick in spirit,

Just escaped from Cairo where he launched a galley

Needing neither sails nor oars nor help of wind or tide,

¹ "Studiando le mie cifre col compasso,

Rilevo che sarò presto sotterra,

Perchè del mio saper si fa gran chiasso,

E gl'ignoranti m'hanno mosso guerra."

Said to have been found in a well at Abano in the last century. They were extemporaneously Englished thus: not as Father Prout chose to prefer them:—

Studying my ciphers with the compass,

I reckon — I soon shall be below-ground;

Because of my lore folk make great rumpus,

And war on myself makes each dull rogue round. — R. B.

— Needing but the fume of fire to set a-flying Wheels like mad which whirled you quick — North, South, where'er you pleased require it, —
That is — would have done so had not priests come prying, Broke his engine up and bastinadoed him
beside.

As he reached his lodging, stopped there unmolested, (Neighbours feared him, urchins fled him, few were bold enough to follow) While his fumbling fingers tried the lock and tested Once again the queer key's virtue, oped the sullen door, — Someone plucked his sleeve, cried "Master, pray your pardon!
Grant a word to me who patient wait you in your archway's hollow!
Hard on you men's hearts are: be not your heart hard on Me who kiss your garment's hem, O Lord of magic lore!

"Mage — say I, who no less, scorning tittle-tattle,
To the vulgar give no credence when they prate of Peter's magic, Deem his art brews tempest, hurts the crops and cattle, Hinders fowls from laying eggs and worms from spinning silk, Rides upon a he-goat, mounts at need a broomstick:
While the price he pays for this (so turns to comic what was tragic) Is — he may not drink — dreads like the Day of Doom's tick — One poor drop of sustenance ordained mere men — that's milk!

"Tell such tales to Padua! Think me no such dullard!
Not from these benighted parts did I derive my breath and being!
I am from a land whose cloudless skies are coloured Livelier, suns orb largelier, airs seem incense, — while, on earth — What, instead of grass, our fingers and our thumbs cull, Proves true moly! sounds and sights there help the body's hearing, seeing, Till the soul grows godlike: brief, — you front no numbscull Shaming by ineptitude the Greece that gave him birth!

"Mark within my eye its iris mystic-lettered —

That's my name! and note my ear — its swan-shaped cavity, my emblem!
Mine's the swan-like nature born to fly unfettered Over land and sea in search of knowledge — food for song.
Art denied the vulgar! Geese grow fat on barley, Swans require ethereal provend, undesir-ous to resemble 'em — Soar to seek Apollo, — favoured with a parley
Such as, Master, you grant me — who will not hold you long.

"Leave to learn to sing — for that your swan petitions:
Master, who possess the secret, say not nay to such a suitor!
All I ask is — bless mine, purest of ambitions!
Grant me leave to make my kind wise, 40 free, and happy! How?
Just by making me — as you are mine — their model!
Geese have goose-thoughts: make a swan their teacher first, then coadjutor, — Let him introduce swan-notions to each noddle, — Geese will soon grow swans, and men become what I am now!

"That's the only magic — had but fools discernment, Could they probe and pass into the solid through the soft and seeming!
Teach me such true magic — now and no adjournment!
Teach your art of making fools subserve
the man of mind!
Magic is the power we men of mind should practise, Draw fools to become our drudges, docile 50 henceforth, never dreaming — While they do our hests for fancied gain — the fact is What they toil and moil to get proves falsehood: truth's behind!

"See now! you conceive some fabric — say, a mansion Meet for monarch's pride and pleasure:
this truth — a thought has fired you, Made you fain to give some cramped concept expansion,
Put your faculty to proof, fulfil your nature's task.
First you fascinate the monarch's self: he fancies
He it was devised the scheme you execute as he inspired you:
He in turn sets slaving insignificances Toiling, moiling till your structure stands 60 there — all you ask!

"Soon the monarch's known for what he was — a ninny:
 Soon the rabble-rout leave labour, take their work-day wage and vanish:
 Soon the late puffed bladder, pricked, shows lank and skinny —
 'Who was its inflator?' ask we, 'whose the giant lungs?'
*Petri en pulmones!*¹ What though men prove ingrates?
 Let them — so they stop at crucifixion — buffet, ban and banish!
 Peter's power's apparent: human praise — its din grates Harsh as blame on ear unused to aught save angels' tongues.

"Ay, there have been always, since our world existed, to Mages who possessed the secret — needed but to stand still, fix eye On the foolish mortal: straight was he enlisted Soldier, scholar, servant, slave — no matter for the style!
 Only through illusion; ever what seemed profit — Love or lucre — justified obedience to the Ipse dixi:
 Work done — palace reared from pavement up to soffit —
 Was it strange if builders smelt out cheating all the while?

"Let them pelt and pound, bruise, bray you in a mortar!
 What's the odds to you who seek reward of quite another nature?
 You've enrolled your name where sages of your sort are, 20 — Michael of Constantinople, Hans of Halberstadt!
 Nay and were you nameless, still you've your conviction
 You it was and only you — what signifies the nomenclature? — Ruled the world in fact, though how you ruled be fiction Fit for fools: true wisdom's magic you — if e'er man — had't!

"But perhaps you ask me 'Since each ignoramus While he profits by such magic persecutes the benefactor, What should I expect but — once I render famous You as Michael, Hans and Peter — just one ingrate more?
 If the vulgar prove thus, whatsoe'er the pelf be,

Pouched through my beneficence — and doom me dungeoned, chained, or racked, or Fairly burned outright — how grateful will yourself be When, his secret gained, you match your — master just before?"

"That's where I await you! Please, revert a little!
 What do folk report about you if not this — which, though chimeric, Still, as figurative, suits you to a tittle — That, — although the elements obey your nod and wink, Fades or flowers the herb you chance to smile or sigh at, While your frown bids earth quake pall by obscuration atmospheric, — Brief, although through nature nought resists your fiat, There's yet one poor substance mocks you 40 — milk you may not drink!

"Figurative language! Take my explanation!
 Fame with fear, and hate with homage, these your art procures in plenty.
 All's but daily dry bread: what makes moist the ration?
 Love, the milk that sweetens man his meal — alas, you lack:
 I am he who, since he fears you not, can love you.
 Love is born of heart not mind, de corde natus haud de mente;
 Touch my heart and love's yours, sure as shines above you Sun by day and star by night though earth should go to wrack!

"Stage by stage you lift me — kiss by kiss, I hallow Whose but your dear hand my helper, 50 punctual as at each new impulse I approach my aim? Shell chipped, the eaglet callow Needs a parent's pinion-push to quit the cyrie's edge:
 But once fairly launched forth, denizen of æther, While each effort sunward bids the blood more freely through each limb pulse,
 Sure the parent feels, as gay they soar together, Fully are all pains repaid when love redeems its pledge!"

Then did Peter's tristful visage lighten somewhat, Vent a watery smile as though inveterate mistrust were thawing.
 "Well, who knows?" he slow broke silence. "Mortals — come what Come there may — are still the dupes of hope there's luck in store.

 Many scholars seek me, promise mounts and marvels:
 Here stand I to witness how they step
 'twixt me and clapperclawing!
 Dry bread, — that I've gained me: truly
 I should starve else:
 But of milk, no drop was mine! Well, shuffle cards once more!"

At the word of promise thus implied, our stranger —

What can he but cast his arms, in rapture of embrace, round Peter?

"Hold! I choke!" the mage grunts.

"Shall I in the manger

Any longer play the dog? Approach, my calf, and feed!

Bene . . . won't you wait for grace?"
 But sudden incense

Wool-white, serpent-solid, curled up — perfume growing sweet and sweeter

Till it reached the young man's nose and seemed to win sense

Soul and all from out his brain through nostril: yes, indeed!

Presently the young man rubbed his eyes.
 "Where am I?

Too much bother over books! Some reverie has proved amusing.

What did Peter prate of? 'Faith, my brow is clammy!

How my head throbs, how my heart thumps! Can it be I swooned?

Oh, I spoke my speech out — cribbed from Plato's tractate,

Dosed him with 'the Fair and Good,' swore — Dog of Egypt — I was choos-

ing

Plato's way to serve men! What's the hour? Exact eight!

Home now, and to-morrow never mind how Plato mooned!

"Peter has the secret! Fair and Good are products

(So he said) of Foul and Evil: one must bring to pass the other.

Just as poisons grow drugs, steal through sundry odd ducts

Doctors name, and ultimately issue safe and changed.

You'd abolish poisons, treat disease with dainties

Such as suit the sound and sane? With all such kickshaws vain you pother!

Arsenic's the stuff puts force into the faint
 eyes,

Opium sets the brain to rights — by cark and care deranged.

"What, he's safe within door? — 'would escape — no question —

Thanks, since thanks and more I owe, and mean to pay in time befitting.

What most presses now is — after night's digestion,

Peter, of thy precepts! — promptest practice of the same.

Let me see! The wise man, first of all,
 scorns riches:

But to scorn them must obtain them:
 none believes in his permitting

Gold to lie ungathered: who picks up, then pitches

Gold away — philosophises: none dis-puts his claim.

"So with worldly honours: 'tis by abdicating,

Incontestably he proves he could have kept 40 the crown discarded.

Sulla cuts a figure, leaving off dictating: Simpletons laud private life? 'The grapes are sour,' laugh we.

So, again — but why continue? All's tumultuous

Here: my head's a-whirl with knowledge.
 Speedily shall be reward'd

He who taught me! Greeks prove in-grates? So insult you us?

When your teaching bears its first-fruits, Peter — wait and see!"

As the word, the deed proved; ere a brief year's passage,

Fop — that fool he made the jokes on — now he made the jokes for, gratis:

Hunks — that hoarder, long left lonely in his crass age —

Found now one appreciative differential 5^m
 friend:

Powder-paint-and-patch, Hag Jezebel — recovered,

Strange to say, the power to please, got courtship till she cried Jam satis!

Fop be-flattered, Hunks be-friended, Hag be-lovered —

Nobody o'erlooked, save God — he soon attained his end.

As he lounged at ease one morning in his villa,

(Hag's the dowry) estimated (Hunks' bequest) his coin in coffer, Mused on how a fool's good word (Fop's word) could fill a Social circle with his praise, promote him man of mark, —

All at once — "An old friend fain would see your Highness!"

There stood Peter, skeleton and scarecrow, 64 plain writ Phi-lo-so-pher

- In the woe-worn face — for yellowness and dryness, Parchment — with a pair of eyes — one hope their feeble spark.
- “Did I counsel rightly? Have you, in accordance, Prospered greatly, dear my pupil? Sure,
at just the stage I find you, When your hand may draw me forth from the mad war-dance Savages are leading round your master — down, not dead.
Padua wants to burn me: baulk them, let me linger Life out — rueful though its remnant — hid in some safe hole behind you!
Prostrate here I lie: quick, help with but a finger
- 10 Lest I house in safety's self — a tombstone o'er my head!
- “Lodging, bite and sup, with — now and then — a copper
— Alms for any poorer still, if such there be, — is all my asking.
Take me for your bedesman, — nay, if you think proper,
Menial merely, — such my perfect passion for repose!
Yes, from out your plenty Peter craves a pittance
— Leave to thaw his frozen hands before the fire whereat you're basking!
Double though your debt were, grant this boon — remittance
He proclaims of obligation: 'tis himself that owes!”
- “Venerated Master — can it be, such treatment
- 20 Learning meets with, magic fails to guard you from, by all appearance?
Strange! for, as you entered, — what the famous feat meant,
I was full of, — why you reared that fabric, Padua's boast.
Nowise for man's pride, man's pleasure, did you slyly Raise it, but man's seat of rule whereby the world should soon have clearance.
(Happy world) from such a rout as now so vilely Handles you — and hampers me, for which I grieve the most.
- “Since if it got wind you now were my familiar, How could I protect you — nay, defend myself against the rabble?
Wait until the mob, now masters, willy-nilly are
- 30 Servants as they should be: then has gratitude full play!

Surely this experience shows how unbefitting
'Tis that minds like mine should rot in ease and plenty. Geese may gabble, Gorge, and keep the ground: but swans are soon for quitting Earthly fare — as fain would I, your swan, if taught the way.

“Teach me, then, to rule men, have them at my pleasure!
Solely for their good, of course, — impart a secret worth rewarding, Since the proper life's-prize! Tantalus's treasure
Aught beside proves, vanishes and leaves no trace at all.
Wait awhile, nor press for payment prematurely!
Over-haste defrauds you. Thanks! since, 4
— even while I speak, — discarding Sloth and vain delights, I learn how — swiftly, surely — Magic sways the sceptre, wears the crown and wields the ball!

“Gone again — what, is he? 'Faith, he's soon disposed of!
Peter's precepts work already, put within my lump their leaven!
Ay, we needs must don glove would we pluck the rose — doff Silken garment would we climb the tree and take its fruit.
Why sharp thorn, rough rind? To keep unviolated Either prize! We garland us, we mount from earth to feast in heaven, Just because exist what once we estimated Hindrances which, better taught, as helps 5 we now compute.

“Foolishly I turned disgusted from my fellows!
Pits of ignorance — to fill, and heaps of prejudice — to level — Multitudes in motley, whites and blacks and yellows —
What a hopeless task it seemed to discipline the host!
Now I see my error. Vices act like virtues
— Not alone because they guard — sharp thorns — the rose we first dishevel, Not because they scrape, scratch — rough rind — through the dirt-shoes Bare feet cling to bole with, while the half-moon boot we boast.

“No, my aim is nobler, more disinterested!
Man shall keep what seemed to thwart him, 6 since it proves his true assistance, Leads to ascertaining which head is the best
head,

Would he crown his body, rule its members — lawless else.

Ignorant the horse stares, by deficient vision

Takes a man to be a monster, lets him mount, then, twice the distance

Horse could trot unriden, gallops — dream Elysian! —

Dreaming that his dwarfish guide's a giant,
— jockeys tell 's."

Brief, so worked the spell, he promptly had a riddance:

Heart and brain no longer felt the pricks which passed for conscience-scruples:

Free henceforth his feet, — Per Bacco, how they did dance

Merrily through lets and checks that stopped the way before!

Politics the prize now, — such adroit adviser,

Opportune suggester, with the tact that triples and quadruples

Merit in each measure, — never did the Kaiser

Boast a subject such a statesman, friend, and something more!

As he, up and down, one noonday, paced his closet

— Council o'er, each spark (his hint) blown flame, by colleagues' breath applauded,

Strokes of statecraft hailed with "Salomo si nõsset!"

(His the nostrum) — every throw for luck come double-six, —

As he, pacing, hugged himself in satisfaction,

Thump — the door went. "What, the Kaiser? By none else were I defrauded

Thus of well-earned solace. Since 'tis fate's exaction, —

Enter, Liege my Lord! Ha, Peter, you here? Teneor vix!"

"Ah, Sir, none the less, contain you, nor wax irate!

You so lofty, I so lowly, — vast the space which yawns between us!

Still, methinks, you — more than ever — at a high rate

Needs must prize poor Peter's secret since it lifts you thus.

Grant me now the boon whereat before you boggled!

Ten long years your march has moved — one triumph — (though e's short) — hactenus,

While I down and down disastrously have joggled

• Till I pitch against Death's door, the true Nec Ultra Plus.

"Years ago — some ten 'tis — since I sought for shelter,

Craved in your whole house a closet, out of all your means a comfort.

Now you soar above these: as is gold to spelter

So is power — you urged with reason — paramount to wealth.

Power you boast in plenty: let it grant me refuge!

Houseroom now is out of question: find for me some stronghold — some fort —

Privacy wherein, immured, shall this blind deaf huge

Monster of a mob let stay the soul I'd save by stealth!

"Ay, for all too much with magic have I tampered!

— Lost the world, and gained, I fear, a 40 certain place I'm to describe loth!

Still, if prayer and fasting tame the pride long pampered,

Mercy may be mine: amendment never comes too late.

How can I amend beset by cursers, kickers?

Pluck this brand from out the burning!
Once away, I take my Bible-oath,

Never more — so long as life's weak lamp-flame flickers —

No, not once I'll tease you, but in silence bear my fate!"

"Gently, good my Genius, Oracle unerr-
ing!

Strange now! can you guess on what — as in you peeped — it was I pondered?

You and I are both of one mind in preferring

Power to wealth, but — here's the point — 50 what sort of power, I ask?

Ruling men is vulgar, easy and ignoble: Rid yourself of conscience, quick you have at beck and call the fond herd.

But who wields the crozier, down may fling
the crow-bill:

That's the power I covet now; soul's sway o'er souls — my task!

"Well but, you object, 'you have it, who by glamour

Dress up lies to look like truths, mask folly in the garb of reason:

Your soul acts on theirs, sure, when the people clamour,

Hold their peace, now fight now fondle, — earwigged through the brains.'

Possibly! but still the operation's mundane,

Grosser than a taste demands which — 4 craving manna — kecks at peason —

Power o'er men by wants material: why should one deign Rule by sordid hopes and fears — a grunt for all one's pains?

"No, if men must praise me, let them praise to purpose!

Would we move the world, not earth but heaven must be our fulcrum — pou sto!

Thus I seek to move it: Master, why interpose —

Baulk my climbing close on what's the ladder's topmost round?

Statecraft 'tis I step from: when by priestcraft hoisted

Up to where my foot may touch the highest rung which fate allows toe,

Then indeed ask favour! On you shall be foisted

10 No excuse: I'll pay my debt, each penny of the pound!

"Ho, my knaves without there! Lead this worthy downstairs!

No farewell, good Paul — nay, Peter — what's your name remembered rightly?

Come, he's humble: out another would have flounced — airs

Suitors often give themselves when our sort bow them forth.

Did I touch his rags? He surely kept his distance:

Yet, there somehow passed to me from him — where'er the virtue might lie —

Something that inspires my soul — Oh, by assistance

Doubtlessly of Peter! — still, he's worth just what he's worth!

"'Tis my own soul soars now: soaring — how? By crawling!

20 I'll to Rome, before Rome's feet the temporal-supreme lay prostrate!

'Hands' (I'll say) 'proficient once in pulling, hauling

This and that way men as I was minded — feet now clasp!

Ay, the Kaiser's self has wrung them in his fervour!

Now — they only sue to slave for Rome, nor at one doit the cost rate.

Rome's adopted child — no bone, no muscle, nerve or

Sinew of me but I'll strain, though out my life I gasp!"

As he stood one evening proudly — (he had traversed

Rome on horseback — peerless pageant!
— claimed the Lateran as new Pope) —

Thinking "All's attained now! Pontiff!
Who could have erst

Dreamed of my advance so far when, some 30
ten years ago,

I embraced devotion, grew from priest to bishop,

Gained the Purple, bribed the Conclave, got the Two-thirds, saw my coop ope,

Came out — what Rome hails me! O were there a wish-shop,

Not one wish more would I purchase — lord of all below!

"Ha! — who dares intrude now — puts aside the arras?

What, old Peter, here again, at such a time, in such a presence?

Satan sends this plague back merely to embarrass

Me who enter on my office — little needing
you!

'Faith, I'm touched myself by age, but you look Tithon!

Were it vain to seek of you the sole prize 40 left — rejuvenescence?

Well, since flesh is grass which Time must lay his scythe on,

Say your say and so depart and make no more ado!"

Peter faltered — coughing first by way of prologue —

"Holiness, your help comes late: a death at ninety little matters.

Padua, build poor Peter's pyre now, on log roll log,

Burn away — I've lived my day! Yet here's the sting in death —

I've an author's pride: I want my Book's survival:

See, I've hid it in my breast to warm me mid the rags and tatters!

Save it — tell next age your Master had no rival!

Scholar's debt discharged in full! be 50
'Thanks' my latest breath!"

"Faugh, the frowsy bundle — scribblings
harum-scarum

Scattered o'er a dozen sheepskins! What's the name of this farrago?

Ha — 'Conciliator Differentiarum' —

Man and book may burn together, cause the world no loss!

Stop — what else? A tractate — eh, 'De Speciebus

Ceremonialis Ma-gi-æ?' I dream sure!
Hence, away, go,

Wizard, — quick avoid me! Vain you clasp my knee, buss

Hand that bears the Fisher's ring or foot that boasts the Cross!

"Help! The old magician clings like an octopus!

Ah, you rise now — fuming, fretting, frowning, if I read your features!

Frown, who cares? We're Pope — once Pope, you can't unpope us!

Good — you muster up a smile: that's better! Still so brisk?

All at once grown youthful? But the case is plain! Ass —

Here I dally with the fiend, yet know the Word — compels all creatures Earthly, heavenly, hellish. Apage, Sathanas

Dicam verbum Salomonis — " — dicite?" When — whisk! —

What was changed? The stranger gave his eyes a rubbing:

There smiled Peter's face turned back a moment at him o'er the shoulder,

As the black door shut, bang! "So he 'scapes a drubbing!"

(Quoth a boy who, unespied, had stopped to hear the talk).

"That's the way to thank these wizards when they bid men

Benedicite! What ails you? You, a man, and yet no bolder?

Foreign Sir, you look but foolish!" "Idmen, idmen!"

Groaned the Greek. "O Peter, cheese at last I know from chalk!"

Peter lived his life out, menaced yet no martyr,

Knew himself the mighty man he was — such knowledge all his guerdon,

Left the world a big book — people but in part err

When they style a true Scientiæ Compendium:

"Admirationem incutit" they sourly Smile, as fast they shut the folio which myself was somehow spurred on

Once to ope: but love — life's milk which daily, hourly, Blockheads lap — O Peter, still thy taste of love's to come!

Greck, was your ambition likewise doomed to failure?

True, I find no record you wore purple, walked with axe and fasces,

Played some antipope's part: still, friend, don't turn tail, you're Certain, with but these two gifts, to gain earth's prize in time!

Cleverness uncurbed by conscience — if you ransacked

o Peter's book you'd find no potent speli like these to rule the masses;

Nor should want example, had I not to transact

Other business. Go your ways, you'll thrive! So ends my rhyme.

When these parts Tiberius, — not yet Caesar, — travelled,

Passing Padua, he consulted Padua's Oracle of Geryon

(God three-headed, thrice wise) just to get unravelled

Certain tangles of his future. "Fling at Abano

Golden dice," it answered: "dropt within the fount there,

Note what sum the pips present!" And still we see each die, the very one,

Turn up, through the crystal, — read the whole account there

Where 'tis told by Suetonius, — each its 40 highest throw.

Scarce the sportive fancy-dice I fling show "Venus:"

Still — for love of that dear land which I so oft in dreams revisit —

I have — oh, not sung! but lilted (as — between us — Grows my lazy custom) this its legend. What the lilt?

DOCTOR —

A RABBI told me: On the day allowed Satan for carping at God's rule, he came, Fresh from our earth, to brave the angel-crowd.

"What is the fault now?" "This I find to blame:

Many and various are the tongues below, Yet all agree in one speech, all proclaim

"Hell has no might to match what earth can show:

Death is the strongest-born of Hell, and yet

Stronger than Death is a Bad Wife, we know."

"Is it a wonder if I fume and fret —

Robbed of my rights, since Death am I, and mine

The style of Strongest? Men pay Nature's debt

10 "Because they must at my demand; decline

To pay it henceforth surely men will please,

Provided husbands with bad wives combine

"To baffle Death. Judge between me and these!"

"Thyself shalt judge. Descend to earth in shape

Of mortal, marry, drain from froth to lees

"The bitter draught, then see if thou escape

Concluding, with men sorrowful and sage,
A Bad Wife's strength Death's self in vain would ape!"

How Satan entered on his pilgrimage, 20 Conformed himself to earthly ordinance, Wived and played husband well from youth to age

Intrepidly — I leave untold, advance Through many a married year until I reach

A day when — of his father's countenance

The very image, like him too in speech
As well as thought and deed, — the union's fruit

Attained maturity. "I needs must teach

"My son a trade: but trade, such son to suit,

Needs seeking after. He a man of war?

30 Too cowardly! A lawyer wins repute —

"Having to toil and moil, though — both which are Beyond this sluggard. There's Divinity:

No, that's my own bread-winner — that be far

"From my poor offspring! Physic? Ha, we'll try

If this be practicable. Where's my wit? Asleep? — since, now I come to think . . .

Ay, ay!

"Hither, my son! Exactly have I hit On a profession for thee. Medicus — Behold, thou art appointed! Yea, I spit

"Upon thine eyes, bestow a virtue thus That henceforth not this human form I wear

Shalt thou perceive alone, but — one of us

"By privilege — thy fleshly sight shall bear Me in my spirit-person as I walk

The world and take my prey appointed there.

"Doctor once dubbed — what ignorance shall baulk

Thy march triumphant? Diagnose the gout Ascholic, and prescribe it cheese for chalk —

"No matter! All's one: cure shall come about

And win thee wealth — fees paid with such a roar

Of thanks and praise alike from lord and lout

"As never stunned man's ears on earth before.

"How may this be?" Why, that's my sceptic! Soon

Truth will corrupt thee, soon thou doubt'st no more!

"Why is it I bestow on thee the boon Of recognising me the while I go Invisibly among men, morning, noon

"And night, from house to house, and — quick or slow —

Take my appointed prey? They summon thee

For help, suppose: obey the summons! so!

"Enter, look round! Where's Death? Know — I am he,

Satan who work all evil: I who bring Pain to the patient in whate'er degree.

"I, then, am there: first glance thine eye shall fling

Will find me — whether distant or at hand,

As I am free to do my spiriting.

"At such mere first glance thou shalt understand

Wherefore I reach no higher up the room Than door or window, when my form is scanned.

"Howe'er friends' faces please to gather
gloom,
Bent o'er the sick, — howe'er himself de-sponds, —
In such case Death is not the sufferer's
doom.

"Contrariwise, do friends rejoice my bonds Are broken, does the captive in his turn Crow 'Life shall conquer'? Nip these foolish fronds

"Of hope a-sprout, if haply thou discern Me at the head — my victim's head, be
sure!
Forth now! This taught thee, little else to learn!"

ro And forth he went. Folk heard him ask demure

"How do you style this ailment? (There
he peeps, My father, through the arras!) Sirs, the cure

"Is plain as A. B. C.! Experience steeps Blossoms of pennyroyal half an hour In sherris. Sumat! — Lo, how sound he sleeps —

"The subject you presumed was past the
power
Of Galen to relieve!" Or else "How's
this?
Why call for help so tardily? Clouds lour "Portentously indeed, Sirs! (Nought's

amiss:
20 He's at the bed-foot merely.) Still, the storm
May pass averted — not by quacks, I wis

"Like you, my masters! You, forsooth, perform
A miracle? Stand, sciolists, aside!
Blood, ne'er so cold, at ignorance grows warm!"

Which boasting by result was justified, Big as might words be: whether drugged or left Drugless, the patient always lived, not died.

Great the heir's gratitude, so nigh bereft Of all he prized in this world: sweet the
smile

30 Of disconcerted rivals: "Cure? — say,
theft

"From Nature in despite of Art — so
style

This off hand kill-or-cure work! You did
much,
I had done more: folk cannot wait
awhile!"

But did the case change? was it —
"Scarcely such

The symptoms as to warrant our recourse To your skill, Doctor! Yet since just a touch

"Of pulse, a taste of breath, has all the
force

With you of long investigation claimed By others, — tracks an ailment to its source

"Intuitively, — may we ask unblamed 40 What from this pimple you prognosticate?"
"Death!" was the answer, as he saw and named

The coucher by the sick man's head.
"Too late

You send for my assistance. I am bold Only by Nature's leave, and bow to Fate!

"Besides, you have my rivals: lavish gold!
How comfortably quick shall life depart Cosseted by attentions manifold!

"One day, one hour ago, perchance my art Had done some service. Since you have 50 yourselves
Chosen — before the horse — to put the cart,

"Why, Sirs, the sooner that the sexton delves
Your patient's grave, the better! How you stare
— Shallow, for all the deep books on your shelves!

"Fare you well, fumlbers!" Do I need declare What name and fame, what riches recompensed
The Doctor's practice? Never anywhere

Such an adept as daily evidenced Each new vaticination! Oh, not he Like dolts who dallied with their scruples, 60 fenced

With subterfuge, nor gave out frank and
free Something decisive! If he said "I save The patient," saved he was: if "Death
will be

"His portion," you might count him dead.
Thus brave,
Behold our worthy, sans competitor
Throughout the country, on the architrave

Of Glory's temple golden-lettered for Machaon redivivus! So, it fell That, of a sudden, when the Emperor

Was smit by sore disease, I need not tell If any other Doctor's aid was sought To come and forthwith make the sick Prince well.

"He will reward thee as a monarch ought.
Not much imports the malady; but then,
He clings to life and cries like one distraught

20 "For thee — who, from a simple citizen, Mayst look to rise in rank, — nay, haply
wear
A medal with his portrait, — always when

"Récovery is quite accomplished. There!
Pass to the presence!" Hardly has he crossed
The chamber's threshold when he halts, aware

Of who stands sentry by the head. All's lost.

"Sire, nought avails my art: you near the goal,
And end the race by giving up the ghost."

"How?" cried the monarch: "Names upon your roll

20 Of half my subjects rescued by your skill — Old and young, rich and poor — crowd cheek by jowl

"And yet no room for mine? Be saved I
will!

Why else am I earth's foremost potentate?
Add me to these and take as fee your fill

"Of gold — that point admits of no debate Between us: save me, as you can and
must, —

Gold, till your gown's pouch cracks beneath the weight!"

This touched the Doctor. "Truly a home-thrust,

30 Parent, you will not parry! Have I dared Entreat that you forego the meal of dust

"— Man that is snake's meat — when I saw prepared

Your daily portion? Never! Just this
once,

Go from his head, then, — let his life be spared!"

Whisper met whisper in the gruff response "Fool, I must have my prey: no inch I budge

From where thou see'st me thus myself ensconce."

"Ah," moaned the sufferer, "by thy look I judge Wealth fails to tempt thee: what if honours prove More efficacious? Nought to him I grudge

"Who saves me. Only keep my head
above
The cloud that's creeping round it — I'll divide My empire with thee! No? What's left but — love?

"Does love allure thee? Well then, take as bride
My only daughter, fair beyond belief!
Save me — to-morrow shall the knot be tied!"

"Father, you hear him! Respite ne'er so brief
Is all I beg: go now and come again Next day, for aught I care: respect the grief

"Mine will be if thy first-born sues in vain!"

"Fool, I must have my prey!" was all he got

In answer. But a fancy crossed his brain

"I have it! Sire, methinks a meteor shod Just now across the heavens and neutralised Jove's salutary influence: 'neath the blot

"Plumb are you placed now: well that I surmised

The cause of failure! Knaves, reverse the bed!"

"Stay!" groaned the monarch, "I shall be capsized —

"Jolt — jolt — my heels uplift where late
my head

Was lying — sure I'm turned right round
at last!

What do you say now, Doctor?" Nought
he said:

For why? With one brisk leap the Antic
passed

From couch-foot back to pillow, — as
before,

Lord of the situation. Long aghast

The Doctor gazed, then "Yet one trial
more

Is left me" inwardly he uttered. "Shame Upon thy flinty heart! Do I implore

"This trifling favour in the idle name Of mercy to the moribund? I plead The cause of all thou dost affect: my aim

"Befits my author! Why would I succeed?
Simply that by success I may promote The growth of thy pet virtues — pride and greed.

"But keep thy favours! — curse thee! I devote Henceforth my service to the other side.
No time to lose: the rattle's in his throat.

"So, — not to leave one last resource untried, — Run to my house with all haste, somebody!
Bring me that knobstick thence, so often plied

10 "With profit by the astrologer — shall I Disdain its help, the mystic Jacob's-Staff?
Sire, do but have the courage not to die

"Till this arrive! Let none of you dare laugh!
Though rugged its exterior, I have seen That implement work wonders, send the chaff

"Quick and thick flying from the wheat — I mean, By metaphor, a human sheaf it thrashed Flail-like. Go fetch it! Or — a word between

"Just you and me, friend! — go bid, unabashed, 20 My mother, whom you'll find there, bring the stick Herself — herself, mind!" Out the lackey dashed

Zealous upon the errand. Craft and trick Are meat and drink to Satan: and he grinned
— How else? — at an excuse so politic

For failure: scarce would Jacob's-Staff rescind Fate's firm decree! And ever as he neared
The agonising one, his breath like wind

Froze to the marrow, while his eye-flash scared
Sense in the brain up: closelier and more
close

30 Pressing his prey, when at the door appeared — Who but his Wife the Bad? Whereof one dose,

One grain, one mite of the medicament, Sufficed him. Up he sprang. One word, too gross

To soil my lips with, — and through ceiling
went Somehow the Husband. "That a storm's dispersed
We know for certain by the sulphury scent!

"Hail to the Doctor! Who but one so versed
In all Dame Nature's secrets had prescribed
The staff thus opportunely? Style him
first

"And foremost of physicians!" "I've imbibed Elixir surely," smiled the prince, —
"have gained New lease of life. Dear Doctor, how you bribed

"Death to forego me, boots not: you've obtained My daughter and her dowry. Death, I've heard,
Was still on earth the strongest power that reigned,

"Except a Bad Wife!" Whereunto demurred Nowise the Doctor, so refused the fee
— No dowry, no bad wife!

"You think absurd
This tale?" — the Rabbi added: "True, our Talmud Boasts sundry such: yet — have our 50 elders erred
In thinking there's some water there, not all mud?"
I tell it, as the Rabbi told it me.

PAN AND LUNA.

Si credere dignum est. — Georgic. iii. 390.

O WORTHY of belief I hold it was,
Virgil, your legend in those strange three lines!
No question, that adventure came to pass
One black night in Arcadia: yes, the pines, Mountains and valleys mingling made one mass
Of black with void black heaven: the earth's confines,
The sky's embrace, — below, above,
around,
All hardened into black without a bound. 60
Fill up a swart stone chalice to the brim With fresh-squeezed yet fast-thickening poppy-juice:
See how the sluggish jelly, late a-swim,

- Turns marble to the touch of who would loose
The solid smooth, grown jet from rim to rim, By turning round the bowl! So night can fuse Earth with her all-comprising sky. No less, Light, the least spark, shows air and emptiness.
- And thus it proved when — diving into space, Stript of all vapour, from each web of mist Utterly film-free — entered on her race
The naked Moon, full-orbed antagonist 10 Of night and dark, night's dowry: peak to base, Upstart mountains, and each valley, kissed To sudden life, lay silver-bright: in air Flew she revealed, Maid-Moon with limbs all bare.
- Still as she fled, each depth — where refuge seemed — Opening a lone pale chamber, left distinct Those limbs: mid still-retreating blue, she teemed Herself with whiteness, — virginal, uncinct
By any halo save what finely gleamed To outline not disguise her: heaven was linked 20 In one accord with earth to quaff the joy, Drain beauty to the dregs without alloy.
- Whereof she grew aware. What help?
When, lo,
A succourable cloud with sleep lay dense:
Some pine-tree-top had caught it sailing slow,
And tethered for a prize: in evidence Captive lay fleece on fleece of piled-up snow Drowsily patient: flake-heaped how or whence,
The structure of that succourable cloud,
What matter? Shamed she plunged into its shroud.
- 30 Orbed — so the woman-figure poets call Because of rounds on rounds — that apple-shaped Head which its hair binds close into a ball
Each side the curving ears — that pure undraped Pout of the sister paps — that . . . Once for all, Say — her consummate circle thus escaped With its innumerable circlets, sank absorbed, Safe in the cloud — O naked Moon full-orbed!
- But what means this? The downy swathes combine, Conglobe, the smothery coy-caressing stuff Curdles about her! Vain each twist and twine Those lithe limbs try, encroached on by a fluff Fitting as close as fits the dented spine
Its flexile ivory outside-flesh: enough!
The plummy drifts contract, condense, constringe, Till she is swallowed by the feathery springe.
- As when a pearl slips lost in the thin foam Churned on a sea-shore, and, o'er-frothed, conceits Herself safe-housed in Amphitrite's dome, —
If, through the bladdery wave-worked yeast, she meets What most she loathes and leaps from, — 50 elf from gnome
No gladlier, — finds that safest of retreats Bubble about a treacherous hand wide open To grasp her — (divers who pick pearls so grieve) —
- So lay this Maid-Moon clasped around and caught By rough red Pan, the god of all that tract:
He it was schemed the snare thus subtly wrought With simulated earth-breath, — wool-tufts packed Into a billowy wrappage. Sheep far-sought For spotless shearings yield such: take the fact As learned Virgil gives it, — how the 60 breed Whitens itself for ever: yes, indeed!
- If one forefather ram, though pure as chalk From tinge on fleece, should still display a tongue Black 'neath the beast's moist palate, prompt men baulk
The propagating plague: he gets no young:
They rather slay him, — sell his hide to caulk Ships with, first steeped in pitch, — nor hands are wrung In sorrow for his fate: protected thus,
The purity we love is gained for us.
- So did Girl-moon, by just her attribute 70
Of unmatched modesty betrayed, lie trapped, Bruised to the breast of Pan, half-god half-brute, Raked by his bristly boar-sward while he lapped

— Never say, kissed her! that were to pollute Love's language — which moreover proves unapt
 To tell how she recoiled — as who finds thorns Where she sought flowers — when, feeling, she touched — horns!

Then — does the legend say? — first moon-eclipse Happened, first swooning-fit which puzzled sore
 The early sages? Is that why she dips Into the dark, a minute and no more,
 Only so long as serves her while she rips
 The cloud's womb through and, faultless as before, Pursues her way? No lesson for a maid Left she, a maid herself thus trapped, betrayed?

Ha, Virgil? Tell the rest, you! "To the deep Of his domain the wildwood, Pan forth-with Called her, and so she followed" — in her sleep, Surely? — "by no means spurning him."
 The myth

Explain who may! Let all else go, I keep — As of a ruin just a monolith — Thus much, one verse of five words, each a boon:
 Arcadia, night, a cloud, Pan, and the 20 moon.

"TOUCH him ne'er so lightly, into song he broke:
 Soil so quick-receptive, — not one feather-seed,
 Not one flower-dust fell but straight its fall awoke Vitalising virtue: song would song succeed Sudden as spontaneous — prove a poet-soul!"

Indeed?

Rock's the song-soil rather, surface hard and bare:
 Sun and dew their mildness, storm and frost their rage Vainly both expend, — few flowers awaken there:
 Quiet in its cleft broods — what the after age Knows and names a pine, a nation's heritage. 30

JOCOSERIA.

1883.

WANTING is — what?
Summer redundant, Blueness abundant,
— Where is the blot?

Beamy the world, yet a blank all the same,
— Framework which waits for a picture to frame:

What of the leafage, what of the flower?
Roses embowering with nought they embower!

Come then, complete incompletion, O comer,

10 Pant through the blueness, perfect the summer!

Breathe but one breath Rose-beauty above,
And all that was death Grows life, grows love, Grows love!

DONALD.

“WILL you hear my story also,
— Huge Sport, brave adventure in plenty?”

The boys were a band from Oxford,
The oldest of whom was twenty.

20 The bothy we held carouse in Was bright with fire and candle;
Tale followed tale like a merry-go-round Whereof Sport turned the handle.

In our eyes and noses — turf-smoke:
In our ears a tune from the trivet, Whence “Boiling, boiling,” the kettle sang,
“And ready for fresh Glenlivet.”

So, feat capped feat, with a vengeance:
Truth, though, — the lads were loyal:

30 “Grouse, five score brace to the bag!
Deer, ten hours’ talk of the Royal!”

Of boasting, not one bit, boys!
Only there seemed to settle Somehow above your curly heads,
— Plain through the singing kettle,

Palpable through the cloud,
As each new-puffed Havanna Rewarded the teller’s well-told tale, — This vaunt “To Sport — Hosanna!

“Hunt, fish, shoot,
Would a man fulfil life’s duty!
Not to the bodily frame alone Does Sport give strength and beauty,

“But character gains in — courage!
Ay, Sir, and much beside it!
You don’t sport, more’s the pity:
You soon would find, if you tried it,

“Good sportsman means good fellow, Sound-hearted he, to the centre;
Your mealy-mouthed mild milksops
— There’s where the rot can enter!

“There’s where the dirt will breed,
The shabbiness Sport would banish!
Oh no, Sir, no! In your honoured case
All such objections vanish.

“’Tis known how hard you studied:
A Double-First — what, the jigger!
Give me but half your Latin and Greek,
I’ll never again touch trigger!

“Still, tastes are tastes, allow me!
Allow, too, where there’s keenness For Sport, there’s little likelihood Of a man’s displaying meanness!”

So, put on my mettle, I interposed.
“Will you hear my story?” quoth I.
“Never mind how long since it happened,
I sat, as we sit, in a bothy;

“With as merry a band of mates, too, Undergrads all on a level:
(One’s a Bishop, one’s gone to the Bench, 7 And one’s gone — well, to the Devil.)

“When, lo, a scratching and tapping!
Iri hobbled a ghastly visitor.
Listen to just what he told us himself
— No need of our playing inquisitor!”

Do you happen to know in Ross-shire Mount . . . Ben . . . but the name scarce matters:
Of the naked fact I am sure enough,
Though I clothe it in rags and tatters.

You may recognise Ben by description; 8 Behind him — a moor’s immenseness:

Up goes the middle mount of a range,
Fringed with its firs in denseness.

Rimming the edge, its fir-fringe, mind!
For an edge there is, though narrow;
From end to end of the range, a stripe
Of path runs straight as an arrow.

And the mountaineer who takes that path Saves himself miles of journey
He has to plod if he crosses the moor Through heather, peat and burnie.

But a mountaineer he needs must be,
For, look you, right in the middle Projects bluff Ben — with an end in ich — Why planted there, is a riddle:

Since all Ben's brothers little and big Keep rank, set shoulder to shoulder,
And only this burliest out must bulge Till it seems — to the beholder

From down in the gully — as if Ben's
breast
To a sudden spike diminished, Would signify to the boldest foot
"All further passage finished!"

Yet the mountaineer who sidles on And on to the very bending, Discovers, if heart and brain be proof,
No necessary ending.

Foot up, foot down, to the turn abrupt Having trod, he, there arriving, Finds — what he took for a point was breadth,
A mercy of Nature's contriving.

So, he rounds what, when 'tis reached proves straight,
From one side gains the other:
The wee path widens — resume the march,
And he foils you, Ben my brother!

But Donald — (that name, I hope, will
do) —
I wrong him if I call "foiling" The tramp of the callant, whistling the
while
As blithe as our kettle's boiling.

He had dared the danger from boyhood
up,
And now, — when perchance was waiting
A lass at the brig below, — 'twixt mount
And moor would he stand debating?

Moreover this Donald was twenty-five,
A glory of bone and muscle;
Did a fiend dispute the right of way,
Donald would try a tussle.

Lightsomely marched he out of the broad
On to the narrow and narrow;
A step more, rounding the angular rock,
Reached the front straight as an arrow. 5a

He stepped it, safe on the ledge he stood,
When — whom found he full-facing?
What fellow in courage and wariness too,
Had scouted ignoble pacing,

And left low safety to timid mates,
And made for the dread dear danger,
And gained the height where — who could guess
He would meet with a rival ranger?

'Twas a gold-red stag that stood and stared,
Gigantic and magnific, 6a
By the wonder — ay, and the peril —
struck
Intelligent and pacific:

For a red deer is no fallow deer Grown cowardly through park-feeding;
He batters you like a thunderbolt
If you brave his haunts unheeding.

I doubt he could hardly perform volte-face
Had valour advised discretion:
You may walk on a rope, but to turn on a rope
No Blondin makes profession. 7a

Yet Donald must turn, would pride permit,
Though pride ill brooks retiring:
Each eyed each — mute man, motionless
beast —
Less fearing than admiring.

These are the moments when quite new
sense,
To meet some need as novel, Springs up in the brain: it inspired resource:
—"Nor advance nor retreat but — grovel!"

And slowly, surely, never a whit Relaxing the steady tension 8a
Of eye-stare which binds man to beast, —
By an inch and inch declension,

Sank Donald sidewise down and down:
Till flat, breast upwards, lying At his six-foot length, no corpse more still, —"If he cross me! The trick's worth trying."

Minutes were an eternity;
But a new sense was created

In the stag's brain too; he resolves!
 Slow, sure,
 With eye-stare unabated,

Feelingly he extends a foot Which tastes the way ere it touches Earth's solid and just escapes man's soft, Nor hold of the same unclutches

Till its fellow foot, light as a feather whisk, Lands itself no less finely:
 So a mother removes a fly from the face 10 Of her babe asleep supinely.

And now 'tis the haunch and hind foot's
 turn — That's hard: can the beast quite raise it?
 Yes, traversing half the prostrate length,
 His hoof-tip does not graze it.

Just one more lift! But Donald, you see,
 Was sportsman first, man after:
 A fancy lightened his caution through,
 — He well-nigh broke into laughter.

"It were nothing short of a miracle!
 20 Unrivalled, unexampled —
 All sporting feats with this feat matched Were down and dead and trampled!"

The last of the legs as tenderly Follows the rest: or never Or now is the time! His knife in reach,
 And his right-hand loose — how clever!

For this can stab up the stomach's soft,
 While the left-hand grasps the pastern.
 A rise on the elbow, and — now's the
 time
 30 Or never: this turn's the last turn!

I shall dare to place myself by God Who scanned — for He does — each feature Of the face thrown up in appeal to Him
 By the agonising creature.

Nay, I hear plain words: "Thy gift brings
 this!"
 Up he sprang, back he staggered, Over he fell, and with him our friend — At following game no laggard.

Yet he was not dead when they picked next
 day 40 From the gully's depth the wreck of
 him;
 His fall had been stayed by the stag beneath
 Who cushioned and saved the neck of
 him.

But the rest of his body — why, doctors said, Whatever could break was broken; Legs, arms, ribs, all of him looked like a toast

In a tumbler of port-wine soaken.

"That your life is left you, thank the stag!"

Said they when — the slow cure ended —

They opened the hospital door, and thence — Strapped, spliced, main fractures mended,

And minor damage left wisely alone, —
 Like an old shoe clouted and cobbled, Out — what went in a Goliath well-nigh, —
 Some half of a David hobbled.

"You must ask an alms from house to
 house:

Sell the stag's head for a bracket,
 With its grand twelve tines¹ — I'd buy it
 myself —
 And use the skin for a jacket!"

He was wiser, made both head and hide His win-penny: hands and knees on, Would manage to crawl — poor crab — by the roads
 In the misty stalking-season.

And if he discovered a bothy like this,
 Why, harvest was sure: folk listened.
 He told his tale to the lovers of Sport: Lips twitched, cheeks glowed, eyes glistened.

And when he had come to the close, and spread

His spoils for the gazers' wonder, With "Gentlemen, here's the skull of the stag

I was over, thank God, not under!" —

The company broke out in applause;
 "By Jingo, a lucky cripple!
 Have a munch of grouse and a hunk of bread,
 And a tug, besides, at our tippie!"

And "There's my pay for your pluck!" cried This.

"And mine for your jolly story!" Cried That, while T'other — but he was drunk —

Hiccapped "A trump, a Tory!"

I hope I gave twice as much as the rest;
 For, as Homer would say, "within grate 8 Though teeth kept tongue," my whole soul
 growled

"Rightly rewarded, — Ingrate!"

SOLOMON AND BALKIS.

SOLOMON King of the Jews and the Queen of Sheba Balkis

Talk on the ivory throne, and we well may conjecture their talk is Solely of things sublime: why else has she sought Mount Zion,

Climbed the six golden steps, and sat betwixt lion and lion?

She proves him with hard questions: before she has reached the middle

He smiling supplies the end, straight solves them riddle by riddle;

Until, dead-beaten at last, there is left no spirit in her,

And thus would she close the game whereof she was first beginner:

"O wisest thou of the wise, world's marvel and well-nigh monster,

One crabbed question more to construe or vulgo conster!

Who are those, of all mankind, a monarch of perfect wisdom

Should open to, when they knock at spheteron do — that's his dome?"

The King makes tart reply: "Whom else but the wise his equals

Should he welcome with heart and voice? — since, king though he be, such weak walls

Of circumstance — power and pomp — divide souls each from other

That whoso proves kingly in craft I needs must acknowledge my brother.

"Come poet, come painter, come sculptor, come builder — whate'er his condition,

Is he prime in his art? We are peers! My insight has pierced the partition

And hails — for the poem, the picture, the statue, the building — my fellow!

Gold's gold though dim in the dust: court-polish soon turns it yellow.

"But tell me in turn, O thou to thy weakling sex superior,

That for knowledge has travelled so far yet seemest no whit the wearier, —

Who are those, of all mankind, a queen like thyself, consummate

In wisdom, should call to her side with an affable 'Up hither, come, mate!'"

"The Good are my mates — how else? Why doubt it?" the Queen up-bridled:

"Sure even above the Wise, — or in travel my eyes have idled, —

I see the Good stand plain: be they rich, poor, shrewd or simple, If Good they only are. . . . Permit me to drop my wimple!"

And in that bashful jerk of her body, she — peace, thou scoffer! —

Jostled the King's right-hand stretched 30 courteously help to proffer,

And so disclosed a portent: all unaware the Prince eyed

The Ring which bore the Name — turned outside now from inside!

The truth-compelling Name! — and at once "I greet the Wise — Oh,

Certainly welcome such to my court — with this proviso:

The building must be my temple, my person stand forth the statue,

The picture my portrait prove, and the poem my praise — you cat, you!"

But Solomon nonplussed? Nay! "Be truthful in turn!" so bade he:

"See the Name, obey its hest!" And at once subjoins the lady —"Provided the Good are the young, men strong and tall and proper,

Such servants I straightway enlist, — 40 which means . . ." but the blushes stop her.

"Ah, Soul," the Monarch sighed, "that wouldst soar yet ever crawlst,

How comes it thou canst discern the greatest yet choose the smallest,

Unless because heaven is far, where wings find fit expansion,

While creeping on all-fours suits, suffices the earthly mansion?

"Aspire to the Best! But which? There are Bests and Bests so many,

With a habitat each for each, earth's Best as much Best as any!

On Lebanon roots the cedar — soil lofty, yet stony and sandy —

While hyssop, of worth in its way, on the wall grows low but handy.

"Above may the Soul spread wing, spurn body and sense beneath her;

Below she must condescend to plodding 50 unbuoyed by aether.

In heaven I yearn for knowledge, account all else inanity;

On earth I confess an itch for the praise of fools — that's Vanity.

"It is nought, it will go, it can never presume above to trouble me;

But here, — why, it toys and tickles and teases, how'er I redouble me

In a doggedest of endeavours to play the indifferent. Therefore, Suppose we resume discourse? Thou hast travelled thus far: but wherefore?

"Solely for Solomon's sake, to see whom earth styles Sagest?"

Through her blushes laughed the Queen.
"For the sake of a Sage? The gay jest!

On high, be communion with Mind — there, Body concerns not Balkis:

Down here, — do I make too bold? Sage Solomon, — one fool's small kiss!"

CRISTINA AND MONALDESCHI.

[This is a well-known story. Cristina was the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, and succeeded to the throne of Sweden on his death in 1632. She was an ill-regulated woman of free life, of whom many curious tales are told. She abdicated in 1654 and became a Roman Catholic. Monaldeschi was an Italian reprobate, who became her Master of the Horse. She fell in love with him, and he made a fool of her. Discovering the truth, Cristina had him barbarously murdered at Fontainebleau. She then retired to Rome, where she died in 1689.]

Ah, but how each loved each, Marquis!

Here's the gallery they trod

Both together, he her god,

10 She his idol, — lend your rod,

Chamberlain! — ay, there they are —

"Quis

Separabit?" — plain those two

Touching words come into view,

Apposite for me and you:

Since they witness to incessant

Love like ours: King Francis, he —

Diane the adored one, she —

Prototypes of you and me.

Everywhere is carved her Crescent

20 With his Salamander-sign —

Flame-fed creature: flame benign

To itself or, if malign,

Only to the meddling curious,

— So, be warned, Sir! Where's my head?

How it wanders! What I said

Merely meant — the creature, fed

Thus on flame, was scarce injurious

Save to fools who woke its ire,

Thinking fit to play with fire.

30 'Tis the Crescent you admire?

Then, be Diane! I'll be Francis.

Crescents change, — true! — wax and wane,

Woman-like: male hearts retain Heat nor, once warm, cool again.
So, we figure — such our chance is — I as man and you as . . . What?
Take offence? My Love forgot
He plays woman, I do not?

I — the woman? See my habit, Ask my people! Anyhow,
Be we what we may, one vow Binds us, male or female. Now, — Stand, Sir! Read! "Quis separabit?" Half a mile of pictured way Past these palace-walls to-day Traversed, this I came to say.

You must needs begin to love me;
First I hated, then, at best,
— Have it so! — I acquiesced;
Pure compassion did the rest.
From below thus raised above me,
Would you, step by step, descend, Pity me, become my friend,
Like me, like less, loathe at end?

That's the ladder's round you rose by!
That — my own foot kicked away,
Having raised you: let it stay, Serve you for retreating? Nay.
Close to me you climbed: as close by,
Keep your station, though the peak Reached proves somewhat bare and bleak!
Woman's strong if man is weak.

Keep here, loving me for ever!
Love's look, gesture, speech, I claim;
Act love, lie love, all the same — Play as earnest were our game!
Lonely I stood long: 'twas clever
When you climbed, before men's eyes, Spurned the earth and scaled the skies, Gained my peak and grasped your prize.

Here you stood, then, to men's wonder;
Here you tire of standing? Kneel!
Cure what giddiness you feel,
This way! Do your senses reel?
Not unlikely! What rolls under?
Yawning death in yon abyss
Where the waters whirl and hiss Round more frightful peaks than this.

Should my buffet dash you thither . . .
But be sage! No watery grave Needs await you: seeming brave Kneel on safe, dear timid slave!
You surmised, when you climbed hither,
Just as easy were retreat Should you tire, conceive unmeet Longer patience at my feet?

Me as standing, you as stooping, —
Who arranged for each the pose?

Lest men think us friends turned foes,
Keep the attitude you chose!
Men are used to this same grouping —
I and you like statues seen.
You and I, no third between,
Kneel and stand! That makes the scene.

Mar it — and one buffet . . . Pardon!
Needless warmth — wise words in
waste!

'Twas prostration that replaced Kneeling, then? A proof of taste.
Crouch, not kneel, while I mount guard on Prostrate love — become no waif,
No estray to waves that chafe Disappointed — love's so safe!

Waves that chafe? The idlest fancy!
Peaks that scare? I think we know Walls enclose our sculpture: so Grouped, we pose in Fontainebleau.
Up now! Wherefore hesitancy?
Arm in arm and cheek by cheek,
Laugh with me at waves and peak!
Silent still? Why, pictures speak.

See, where Juno strikes Ixion, Primæve speaks plainly! Pooh — Rather, Florentine Le Roux!
I've lost head for who is who — 'Tis it swims and wanders! Fie on What still proves me female! Here, By the staircase! — for we near That dark "Gallery of the Deer."

Look me in the eyes once! Steady!
Are you faithful now as erst
On that eve when we two first Vowed at Avon, blessed and cursed Faith and falsehood? Pale already?
Forward! Must my hand compel Entrance — this way? Exit — well, Somehow, somewhere. Who can tell?

What if to the self-same place in Rustic Avon, at the door Of the village church once more,
Where a tombstone paves the floor
By that holy-water basin
You appealed to — "As, below, This stone hides its corpse, e'en so I your secrets hide?" What ho!

Friends, my four! You, Priest, confess
him!

I have judged the culprit there:
Execute my sentence! Care
For no mail such cowards wear!
Dóre, Priest? Then, absolve and bless
him!

Now — you three, stab thick and fast, Deep and deeper! Dead at last?
Thanks, friends — Father, thanks!
Aghast?

What one word of his confession Would you tell me, though I lured With that royal crown abjured Just because its bars immured Love too much? Love burst compression, Fled free, finally confessed
All its secrets to that breast Whence . . . let Avon tell the rest!

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT AND FUSELI.

[Mary Wollstonecraft, the famous author of "A Vindication of the Rights of Woman," and the mother of the second Mrs. Shelley, was born in 1759. She fell in love with Fuseli, the well-known artist, who, however, with the able assistance of Mrs. Fuseli, contrived not to be won. Mary Wollstonecraft then went to Paris, and lived with Mr. Imlay, nor was it till after his desertion of her that she met and eventually married William Godwin. She was barely thirty-nine years old when she died in 1797.]

OH but is it not hard, Dear?

Mine are the nerves to quake at a mouse:

If a spider drops I shrink with fear:

I should die outright in a haunted
house;

While for you — did the danger dared bring help —

From a lion's den I could steal his whelp, With a serpent round me, stand stock-
still,

Go sleep in a churchyard, — so would will ?
Give me the power to dare and do Valiantly — just for you!

Much amiss in the head, Dear,

I toil at a language, tax my brain Attempting to draw — the scratches here!

I play, play, practise and all in vain:

But for you — if my triumph brought you
pride,

I would grapple with Greek Plays till I
died,

Paint a portrait of you — who can tell?

Work my fingers off for your "Pretty 84
well:"

Language and painting and music too, Easily done — for you!

Strong and fierce in the heart, Dear,

With — more than a will — what seems a power

To pounce on my prey, love outbroke here
In flame devouring and to devour.

Such love has laboured its best and worst
To win me a lover; yet, last as first.

I have not quickened his pulse one beat,
Fixed a moment's fancy, bitter or sweet:
Yet the strong fierce heart's love's labour's due,
Utterly lost, was — you!

ADAM, LILITH, AND EVE.

- ONE day it thundered and lightened.
Two women, fairly frightened, Sank to their knees, transformed, trans-
fixed,
At the feet of the man who sat betwixt; And "Mercy!" cried each — "if I tell the
truth
10 Of a passage in my youth!"
- Said This: "Do you mind the morning
I met your love with scorning?
As the worst of the venom left my lips,
I thought 'If, despite this lie, he strips The mask from my soul with a kiss — I crawl
His slave, — soul, body and all!"
- Said That: "We stood to be married;
The priest, or someone, tarried;
'If Paradise-door prove 'locked?' smiled
you 20 I thought, as I nodded, smiling too,
'Did one, that's away, arrive — nor late Nor soon should unlock Hell's gate!'"
- It ceased to lighten and thunder.
Up started both in wonder, Looked round and saw that the sky was
clear,
Then laughed "Confess you believed us,
Dear!"
"I saw through the joke!" the man replied
They re-seated themselves beside.

IXION.

- [A king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly, who in consequence of his murdering his wife's father was "boycotted" by mankind.
Zeus took compassion on him and let him into heaven, where, however, he fell in love with Heré, and was permitted to think he had embraced her in the form of a cloud.
Zeus banished him, and as a punishment Ixion was tied to a perpetually revolving wheel.]
- HIGH in the dome, suspended, of Hell, sad triumph, behold us!
30 Here the revenge of a God, there the amends of a Man.
Whirling for ever in torment, flesh once mortal, immortal Made — for a purpose of hate — able to die and revive,

Pays to the uttermost pang, then, newly for payment replenished, Doles out — old yet young — agonies ever
afresh;
Whence the result above me: torment is bridged by a rainbow, — Tears, sweat, blood, — each spasm, ghastly once, glorified now.
Wrung, by the rush of the wheel ordained my place of reposing, Off in a sparklike spray, — flesh become vapour thro' pain, — Flies the bestowment of Zeus, soul's vaunted bodily vesture, Made that his feats observed gain the approval of Man, — Flesh that he fashioned with sense of the earth and the sky and the ocean, Framed should pierce to the star, fitted to pore on the plant, — All, for a purpose of hate, re-framed, refashioned, re-fitted Till, consummate at length, — lo, the employment of sense!
Pain's mere minister now to the soul, once pledged to her pleasure — Soul, if untrammelled by flesh, unap-prehensive of pain!
Body, professed soul's slave, which serving beguiled and betrayed her, Made things false seem true, cheated thro' eye and thro' ear, Lured thus heart and brain to believe in the lying reported, — Spurn but the traitorous slave, utter-most atom, away, What should obstruct soul's rush on the real, the only apparent?
Say I have erred, — how else? Was I Ixion or Zeus?
Foiled by my senses I dreamed; I doubtless awoken in wonder: This proves shine, that — shade? Good was the evil that seemed?
Shall I, with sight thus gained, by torture be taught I was blind once?
Sisuphos, teaches thy stone — Tantalos, teaches thy thirst Aught which unaided sense, purged pure less plainly demonstrates?
No, for the past was dream: now that the dreamers awake, Sisuphos scouts low fraud, and to Tantalos treason is folly.
Ask of myself, whose form melts on the murderous wheel,
What is the sin which throe and throe prove sin to the sinner!
Say the false charge was true, — thus do I expiate, say, Arrogant thought, word, deed, — mere man who concited me godlike, Sat beside Zeus, my friend — knelt before Heré, my love!

- What were the need but of pitying power to touch and disperse it, Film-work — eye's and ear's — all the distraction of sense?
How should the soul not see, not hear, — perceive and as plainly Render, in thought, word, deed, back again truth — not a lie?
“Ay, but the pain is to punish thee!”
Zeus, once more for a pastime, Play the familiar, the frank! Speak and have speech in return!
I was of Thessaly king, there ruled and a people obeyed me:
Mine to establish the law, theirs to obey it or die: Wherefore? Because of the good to the people, because of the honour 10 Thence accruing to me, king, the king's law was supreme.
What of the weakling, the ignorant criminal? Not who, excuseless, Breaking my law braved death, knowing his deed and its due — Nay, but the feeble and foolish, the poor transgressor, of purpose No whit more than a tree, born to erect-ness of bole,
Palm or plane or pine, we laud if lofty, columnar — Loathe if athwart, askew, — leave to the axe and the flame!
Where is the vision may penetrate earth and beholding acknowledge Just one pebble at root ruined the straightness of stem?
Whose fine vigilance follows the sapling, accounts for the failure, 20 — Here blew wind, so it bent: there the snow lodged, so it broke?
Also the tooth of the beast, bird's bill, mere bite of the insect Gnawed, gnarled, warped their worst:
passive it lay to offence.
King — I was man, no more: what I recognised faulty I punished, Laying it prone: be sure, more than a man had I proved,
Watch and ward o'er the sapling at birth-time had saved it, nor simply Owned the distortion's excuse, — hindered it wholly: nay, more — Even a man, as I sat in my place to do judgment, and pallid Criminals passing to doom shuddered away at my foot, Could I have probed thro' the face to the heart, read plain a repentance, 30 Crime confessed fools' play, virtue ascribed to the wise,
Had I not staved the consignment to doom, not dealt the renewed ones Life to retrace the past, light to retrieve the misdeed?
Thus had I done, and thus to have done much more it behoves thee, Zeus who madest man — flawless or faulty, thy work!
What if the charge were true, as thou moutheest, — Ixion the cherished Minion of Zeus grew vain, vied with the godships and fell, Forfeit thro' arrogance? Stranger! I clothed, with the grace of our human, Inhumanity — gods, natures I likened to ours.
Man among men I had borne me till gods forsooth must regard me
— Nay, must approve, applaud, claim 40 as a comrade at last.
Summoned to enter their circle, I sat — their equal, how other?
Love should be absolute love, faith is in fulness or nought.
“I am thy friend, be mine!” smiled Zeus:
“If Heré attract thee,” Blushed the imperial check, “then — as thy heart may suggest!”
Faith in me sprang to the faith, my love hailed love as its fellow, “Zeus, we are friends — how fast!
Heré, my heart for thy heart!” Then broke smile into fury of frown, and the thunder of “Hence, fool!” Then thro' the kiss laughed scorn “Limbs or a cloud was to clasp?” Then from Olympus to Erebus, then from the rapture to torment, Then from the fellow of gods — misery's 50 mate, to the man!
— Man henceforth and for ever, who lent from the glow of his nature Warmth to the cold, with light coloured the black and the blank.
So did a man conceive of your passion, you passion-protesters!
So did he trust, so love — being the truth of your lie!
You to aspire to be Man! Man made you who vainly would ape him:
You are the hollowness, he — filling you, falsifies void.
Even as — witness the emb!m, Hell's sad triumph suspended, Born of my tears, sweat, blood — bursting to vapour above — Arching my torment, an iris ghostlike startles the darkness, Cold white — jewelry quenched — jus- 60
tifies, glorifies pain.
Strive, mankind, though strife endure through endless obstruction, Stage after stage, each rise marred by ac-certain a fall!

Baffled for ever — yet never so baffled but,
e'en in the baffling,

When Man's strength proves weak, checked in the body or soul —

Whatsoever the medium, flesh or essence, — Ixion's

Made for a purpose of hate, — clothing
the entity Thou,

— Medium whence that entity strives for the Not-Thou beyond it,

Fire elemental, free, frame unencumbered, the All, —

Never so baffled but — when, on the verge of an alien existence,

Heartened to press, by pangs burst to the infinite Pure,

Nothing is reached but the ancient weakness still that arrests strength,

10 Circumbient still, still the poor human array,

Pride and revenge and hate and cruelty — all it has burst through,

Thought to escape, — fresh formed, found in the fashion it fled, —

Never so baffled but — when Man pays the price of endeavour,

Thunderstruck, downthrust, Tartarosdoomed to the wheel, —

Then, ay, then, from the tears and sweat and blood of his torment,

E'en from the triumph of Hell, up let him look and rejoice!

What is the influence, high o'er Hell, that turns to a rapture

Pain — and despair's murk mists blends in a rainbow of hope?

What is beyond the obstruction, stage by stage tho' it baffle?

10 Back must I fall, confess "Ever the weakness I fled"?

No, for beyond, far, far is a Purity allunobstructed!

Zeus was Zeus — not Man: wrecked by his weakness, I whirl.

Out of the wreck I rise — past Zeus to the Potency o'er him!

I — to have hailed him my friend! I — to have clasped her — my love!

Pallid birth of my pain, — where light, where light is, aspiring

Thither I rise, whilst thou — Zeus, keep the godship and sink!

JOCHANAN HAKKADOSH.

[Rabbi Yehudah Hannasi, otherwise Jochanan (John) Hakkadosh, was born in the second Christian century. Hakkadosh means holy.]

"THIS now, this other story makes amends
And justifies our Mishna," quoth the Jew Aforesaid. "Tell it, learnedest of friends!"

A certain morn broke beautiful and blue O'er Schiphaz¹ city, bringing joy and mirth, — So had ye deemed; while the reverse was true,

Since one small house there gave a sorrow
birth

In such black sort that, to each faithful eye, Midnight, not morning settled on the earth.

How else, when it grew certain thou wouldst die

Our much-enlightened master, Israel's prop,

Eximious Jochanan Ben Sabbathai?²

Old, yea but, undiminished of a drop,
The vital essence pulsed through heart and

brain;
Time left unsickled yet the plenteous crop

On poll and chin and cheek, whereof a skein

Handmaids might weave — hairs silk-soft, silver-white,

Such as the wool-plant's; none the less in vain

Had Physic striven her best against the spite

Of fell disease: the Rabbi must succumb; And, round the couch whereon in piteous plight

He lay a-dying, scholars, — awe-struck, dumb

Throughout the night-watch, — roused themselves and spoke

One to the other: "Ere death's touch be-numb

"His active sense, — while yet 'neath Reason's yoke

Obedient toils his tongue, — befits we claim

The fruit of long experience, bid this oak

"Shed us an acorn which may, all the
same,

Grow to a temple-pillar, — dear that
day! —

When Israel's scattered seed finds place and name

"Among the envious nations. Lamp us,
pray,

Thou the Enlightener! Partest hence in
peace?

Hailst without regret — much less, dismay —

² Probably an imaginary Rabbi.

"The hour of thine approximate release From fleshly bondage soul hath found obstruct?

Calmly envisagest the sure increase "Of knowledge? Eden's tree must hold unplucked

Some apple, sure, has never tried thy tooth, Juicy with sapience thou hast sought, not sucked?

"Say, does age acquiesce in vanished
youth?

Still towers thy purity above — as erst — Our pleasant follies? Be thy last word —
truth!"

10 The Rabbi groaned; then, grimly, "Last as first

The truth speak I — in boyhood who began Striving to live an angel, and, amerced

"For such presumption, die now hardly
man.

What have I proved of life? To live, in-
deed,

That much I learned: but here lies Jochanan

"More luckless than stood David when, to speed

His fighting with the Philistine, they brought

Saul's harness forth: whereat, 'Alack, I
need

"'Armour to arm me, but have never fought

20 With sword and spear, nor tried to manage shield,

Proving arms' use, as well-trained warrior
ought.

"'Only a sling and pebbles can I wield!'

So he: while I, contrariwise, 'No trick Of weapon helpful on the battle-field

"'Comes unfamiliar to my theoretic:

But, bid me put in practice what I know, Give me a sword — it stings like Moses'
stick,

"'A serpent I let drop apace.' E'en so, I, — able to comport me at each stage

30 Of human life as never here below

"Man played his part, — since mine the heritage

Of wisdom carried to that perfect pitch, Ye rightly praise, — I, therefore, who, thus
sage,

"Could sure act man triumphantly, enrich Life's annals with example how I played Lover, Bard, Soldier, Statist, — (all of which

"Parts in presentment failing, cries invade The world's ear — 'Ah, the Past, the pearl-gift thrown

To hogs, time's opportunity we made

"'So light of, only recognised when flown! 40 Had we been wise!') — in fine, I — wise
enough, —

What profit brings me wisdom never shown

"Just when its showing would from each rebuff

Shelter weak virtue, threaten back to bounds

Encroaching vice, tread smooth each track too rough

"For youth's unsteady footstep, climb the rounds

Of life's long ladder, one by slippery one, Yet make no stumble? Me hard fate con-founds

"With that same crowd of wailers I outrun
By promising to teach another cry 50 Of more hilarious mood than theirs, the
sun

"I look my last at is insulted by.

What cry, — ye ask? Give ear on every
side!

Witness yon Lover! 'How entrapped am
I!

"'Methought, because a virgin's rose-lip vied

With ripe Khubbezleh's,¹ needs must beauty mate

With meekness and discretion in a bride:

"'Bride she became to me who wail — too
late —

Unwise I loved! That's one cry.
'Mind's my gift:

I might have loaded me with lore, full 60 weight

"'Pressed down and running over at each rift

O' the brain-bag where the famished clung and fed.

I filled it with what rubbish! — would not sift

"'The wheat from chaff, sound grain from musty — shed

Poison abroad as oft as nutriment —
And sighing say but as my fellows said,

"'Unwise I learned! That's two. 'In dwarf's-play spent

Was giant's prowess: warrior all unversed In war's right waging, I struck brand, was lent

"For steel's fit service, on mere stone — and cursed Alike the shocked limb and the shivered
steel, Seeing too late the blade's true use which erst

"How was I blind to! My cry swells the
peal —
Unwise I fought!" That's three. But wherefore waste Breath on the wailings longer? Why reveal

"A root of bitterness whereof the taste
Is noisome to Humanity at large?
First we get Power, but Power absurdly placed

10 "In Folly's keeping, who resigns her charge
To Wisdom when all Power grows nothing worth:
Bones marrowless are mocked with helm and target

"When, like your Master's, soon below the
earth
With worms shall warfare only be. Fare-
well, Children! I die a failure since my birth!"

"Not so!" arose a protest as, pell-mell, They pattered from his chamber to the
street,
Bent on a last resource. Our Targums!
tell

That such resource there is. Put case, there meet

20 The Nine Points of Perfection — rarest
chance — Within some saintly teacher whom the fleet

Years, in their blind implacable advance, O'ertake before fit teaching born of these Have magnified his scholars' countenance, —

If haply folk compassionating please
To render up — according to his store,
Each one — a portion of the life he sees

Hardly worth saving when 'tis set before Earth's benefit should the Saint, Hakka-dosh,

30 Favoured thereby, attain to full fourscore — If such contribute (Scoffer, spare thy "Bosh!")

A year, a month, a day, an hour — to eke
Life out, — in him away the gift shall wash

* Chaldean versions of the Old Testament dephrased out of the oral translations and paraphrases of the Scriptures read in the synagogues of the Jews.

That much of ill-spent time recorded,
streak
The twilight of the so-assisted sage With a new sunrise: truth, though strange to speak!

Quick to the doorway, then, where youth and age,
All Israel, thronging, waited for the last News of the loved one. "'Tis the final
stage:

"Art's utmost done, the Rabbi's feet tread 40
fast
The way of all flesh!" So announced that

³ The Jews called the constellation Krome-trus, or the "Great Bear;" the Bier and the tail stars of the Bear they called the Three Daughters.
Banoth means daughters.

trow,
Such martyrdom might tax flesh to afford:

thou hoard
Each minute of long years thou look'st
to spend
In dalliance with thy spouse? Hast thou

And teacher, warbling like a woodland
bird,
There's left no Selah, 'twixt two psalms, to lend averred

The fighter born to plant our lion-flag Once more on Zion's mount, — doth, all-unheard,

some rag Shall staunch our wound, some minute never missed
From swordsman's lustihood like thine!

¹ Rabbi Akiba was a Jewish teacher, who had much to do with the great collection of Rabbinical discussions on the law of Moses known as the Mishnah. The comments on the Mishnah are called Gemara, and both together make up the Talmud. Akiba took part in the famous rebellion against Rome led by Barcocheba A.D. 132-135, who was believed to be the Messiah. The rebellion failed, and Akiba is said to have been scraped to death with an iron comb.

So valued were advice from thee" . . .
But here
He stopped short: such a hubbub! Not
alone

From those addressed, but, far as well as near,
The crowd broke into clamour: "Mine, mine, mine
Lop from my life the excrescence, never

To me that privilege of granting life — Mine, mine!" Then he: "Be patient! I

Change at fit season to the butterfly!
And here a story strikes me, to confirm "This judgment. Of our worthies, none ranks high

As Perida² who kept the famous school: 50 None rivalled him in patience: none! For
why?

Whatever he expounded, to repeat — Ay, and keep on repeating, lest some fool

³ Job.

- "Of light was found to have illumed the rows
Of pupils round their pedagogue. 'What,
still Impenetrable to me? Then — here goes!'"
- "And for a second time he sets the rill Of knowledge running, and five hundred
times
More re-repeats the matter — and gains nil.
- "Out broke a voice from heaven: 'Thy patience climbs Even thus high. Choose! Wilt thou, rather, quick Ascend to bliss — or, since thy zeal sublimes

- "'To heaven with me!' was in the good man's mouth, When all his scholars, — cruel-kind were
they! —
Stopped utterance, from East, West, North

Born to endure, eternal, unimpaired
By custom the accloyer, time the thief.
- "Had Age's hard cold knowledge only spared
That ignorance of Youth! But now the
dream,
Fresh as from Paradise, alighting fared
- o "As fares the pigeon, finding what may seem
Her nest's safe hollow holds a snake inside Coiled to encasp her. See, Eve stands supreme
- "In youth and beauty! Take her for thy bride!
What Youth deemed crystal, Age finds out was dew
Morn set a-sparkle, but which noon quick dried
- "While Youth bent gazing at its red and
blue Supposed perennial, — never dreamed the
sun
Which kindled the display would quench it too.
- "Graces of shape and colour — everyone
With its appointed period of decay When ripe to purpose! 'Still, these dead and done,
- "Survives the woman-nature — the soft sway
Of undefinable omnipotence O'er our strong male-stuff, we of Adam's clay."
- "Ay, if my physics taught not why and whence
The attraction! Am I like the simple steer
Who, from his pasture lured inside the fence
- "Where yoke and goad await him, holds that mere Kindliness prompts extension of the
hand Hollowed for barley, which drew near and near
- "His nose — in proof that, of the horned
band,
- The farmer best affected him? Beside, Steer, since his calfhood, got to understand
- "Farmers a many in the world so wide Were ready with a handful just as choice Or choicer — maize and cummin, treats untried.
- "Shall I wed wife, and all my days rejoice I gained the peacock? 'Las me, round I
look,
And lo — 'With me thou wouldst have blamed no voice
- "Like hers that daily deafens like a rook: 40
I am the phoenix! — 'I, the lark, the dove, — The owl,' for aught, knows he who blindly took
- "Peacock for partner, while the vale, the grove,
The plain held bird-mates in abundance.
There!
Youth, try fresh capture! Age has found out Love
- "Long ago. War seems better worth man's care.
But leave me! Disappointment finds a balm Haply in slumber." "This first step o' the stair
- "To knowledge fails me, but the victor's palm Lies on the next to tempt him overleap 50 A stumbling-block. Experienced, gather calm,
- "Thou excellence of Judah, cured by
sleep
Which ushers in the Warrior, to replace The Lover! At due season I shall reap
- "Fruit of my planting!" So, with lengthened face, Departed Tsaddik: and three moons more waxed
And waned, and not until the Summer-
space
- Waned likewise, any second visit taxed The Rabbi's patience, But at three months' end,
Behold, supine beneath a rock, relaxed 60
- The sage lay musing till the noon should spend Its ardour. Up comes Tsaddik, who but
he,
With "Master, may I warn thee, nor offend,

- "That time comes round again? We look to see Sprout from the old branch — not the youngling twig — But fruit of sycamine: deliver me,
- "To share among my fellows, some plump fig, Juicy as seedy! That same man of war,
Who, with a scantling of his store, made big
- "Thy starveling nature, caused thee, safe from scar,
To share his gains by long acquaintance-ship With bump and bruise and all the knocks that are
- 10 "Of battle dowry, — he bids loose thy lip, Explain the good of battle! Since thou know'st Let us know likewise! Fast the moments slip,
- "More need that we improve them!" —
"Ay, we boast,
We warriors in our youth, that with the sword Man goes the swiftest to the uttermost —
- "Takes the straight way thro' lands yet unexplored To absolute Right and Good, — may so obtain God's glory and man's weal too long ignored,
- "Too late attained by preachments all in vain — 20 The passive process. Knots get tangled worse By toying with: does cut cord close again?
- "Moreover there is blessing in the curse Peace-praisers call war. What so sure evolves All the capacities of soul, proves nurse
- "Of that self-sacrifice in men which solves
The riddle — Wherein differs Man from beast?
Foxes boast cleverness and courage wolves:
- "Nowhere but in mankind is found the least Touch of an impulse 'To our fellows — good 30 I' the highest! — not diminished but increased
- "By the condition plainly understood
— Such good shall be attained at price of hurt I' the highest to ourselves! Fine sparks, that brood
- "Confusedly in Man, 'tis war bids spurt Forth into flame: as fares the meteor-mass, Whereof no particle but holds inert
- "Some seed of light and heat, however crass
The enclosure, yet avails not to discharge Its radiant birth before there come to pass
- "Some push external, — strong to set at 40 large Those dormant fire-seeds, whirl them in a trice Through heaven and light up earth from marge to marge:
- "Since force by motion makes — what erst was ice — Crash into fervency and so expire, Because some Djinn has hit on a device
- "For proving the full prettiness of fire!
Ay, thus we prattle — young: but old — why, first, Where's that same Right and Good — (the wise inquire) —
- "So absolute, it warrants the outburst Of blood, tears, all war's woeful consequence, That comes of the fine flaring? Which plague cursed
- "The more your benefited Man — offence, Or what suppressed the offender? Say it did — Show us the evil cured by violence,
- "Submission cures not also! Lift the lid From the maturing crucible, we find Its slow sure coaxing-out of virtue hid
- "In that same meteor-mass, hath uncombined Those particles and, yielding for result Gold, not mere flame, by so much leaves 60 behind
- "The heroic product. E'en the simple cult Of Edom's¹ children wisely bids them turn Cheek to the smiter with 'Sic Jesus vult.'
- "Say there's a tyrant by whose death we earn

Freedom, and justify a war to wage:
Good! — were we only able to discern

"Exactly how to reach and catch and cage Him only and no innocent beside!
Whereas the folk whereon war wreaks its rage

"— How shared they his ill-doing? Far and wide
The victims of our warfare strew the plain, Ten thousand dead, whereof not one but died

"In faith that vassals owed their suzerain to Life: therefore each paid tribute, — honest soul, — To that same Right and Good ourselves are fain

"To call exclusively our end. From bole (Since ye accept in me a sycamine) Pluck, eat, digest a fable — yea, the sole

"Fig I afford you! 'Dost thou dwarf my vine?'
(So did a certain husbandman address The tree which faced his field), 'Receive condign

"Punishment, prompt removal by the stress
Of axe I forthwith lay unto thy root!
20 Long did he hack and hew, the root no less

"As long defied him, for its tough strings
shoot
As deep down as the boughs above aspire:
All that he did was — shake to the tree's
foot

"Leafage and fruitage, things we most require
For shadow and refreshment: which good
deed
Thoroughly done, behold the axe-haft tires

"His hand, and he desisting leaves unfreed The vine he hacked and hewed for. Comes a frost,
One natural night's work, and there's little need

30 "Of hacking, hewing: lo, the tree's a ghost!
Perished it starves, black death from topmost bough
To farthest-reaching fibre! Shall I boast

"My rough work, — warfare, — helped more? Loving, now — That, by comparison, seems wiser, since The loving fool was able to avow

"He could effect his purpose, just evince Love's willingness, — once 'ware of what she lacked,
His loved one, — to go work for that, nor wince

"At self-expenditure: he neither hacked Nor hewed, but when the lady of his field 40 Required defence because the sun attacked,

"He, failing to obtain a fitter shield,
Would interpose his body, and so blaze, Blest in the burning. Ah, were mine to wield

"The intellectual weapon — poet-lays, — How preferably had I sung one song Which . . . but my sadness sinks me: go your ways!

"I sleep out disappointment." "Come along,
Never lose heart! There's still as much
again
Of our bestowment left to right the wrong. 50

"Done by its earlier moiety — explain Wherefore, who may! The Poet's mood comes next.
Was he not wishful the poetic vein

"Should pulse within him? Jochanan, thou reck'st
Little of what a generous flood shall soon Float thy clogged spirit free and unperplexed

"Above dry dubitation! Song's the boon Shall make amends for my untoward mistake
That Joshua-like thou couldst bid sun and moon —

"Fighter and Lover, — which for most 60 men make All they descry in heaven, — stand both stockstill
And lend assistance. Poet shalt thou wake!"

Autumn brings Tsaddik. "Ay, there speeds the rill Loaded with leaves: a scowling sky, be-
side:
The wind makes olive-trees up yonder hill

"Whiten and shudder — symptoms far and
wide
Of gleanings-time's approach; and glean good store:
May I presume to trust we shall, thou tried

"And ripe experimenter! Three months
more

Have ministered to growth of Song: that graft
Into thy sterile stock has found at core

"Moisture, I warrant, hitherto unquaffed By boughs, however florid, wanting sap Of prose-experience which provides the draught

"Which song-sprouts, wanting, wither:
vain we tap

A youngling stem all green and immature:
Experience must secrete the stuff, our hap

"Will be to quench Man's thirst with, glad and sure

10 That fancy wells up through corrective
fact:

Missing which test of truth, though flowers allure

"The goodman's eye with promise, soon the pact

Is broken, and 'tis flowers, — mere words,
— he finds

When things, — that's fruit, — he looked for. Well, once cracked

"The nut, how glad my tooth the kernel grinds!

Song may henceforth boast substance!
Therefore, hail

Proser and poet, perfect in both kinds!

"Thou from whose eye hath dropped the envious scale

Which hides the truth of things and substitutes

20 Deceptive show, unaided optics fail "To transpierce, — hast entrusted to the lute's

Soft but sure guardianship some unrevealed Secret shall lift mankind above the brutes

"As only knowledge can?" "A fount un-scaled"

(Sighed Jochanan) "should seek the heaven in leaps

To die in dew-gems — not find death, con-gealed

"By contact with the cavern's nether deeps, Earth's secretest foundation where, en-swathed

in dark and fear, primæval mystery
sleeps —

30 "Petrific fount wherein my fancies bathed And straight turned ice. My dreams of good and fair

In soaring upwards had dissolved, unscathed

"By any influence of the kindly air, Singing, as each took flight, The Future
— that's

Our destination, mists turn rainbows there,

"Which sink to fog, confounded in the flats O' the Present! Day's the song-time for the lark,

Night for her music boasts but owls and bats.

"And what's the Past but night — the deep and dark

Ice-spring I speak of, corpse-thickened with 40 its drowned

Dead fancies which no sooner touched the mark

"They aimed at — fact — than all at once they found

Their film-wings freeze, henceforth unfit
to reach

And roll in æther, revel — robed and crowned

"As truths, confirmed by falsehood all and
each —

Sovereign and absolute and ultimate!

Up with them, skyward, Youth, ere Age
impeach

"Thy least of promises to re-instate Adam in Eden! Sing on, ever sing, Chirp till thou burst! — the fool cicada's 50
fate,

"Who holds that after Summer next comes
Spring,

Than Summer's self sun-warmed, spice-scented more.

Fighting was better! There, no fancy-fling

"Pitches you past the point was reached
of yore

By Samsons, Abners, Joabs, Judases,
The mighty men of valour who, before

"Our little day, did wonders none profess To doubt were fable and not fact, so trust
By fancy-flights to emulate much less.

"Were I a Statesman, now! Why, that 60 were just

To pinnacle my soul, mankind above, Atop the universe: no vulgar lust

"To gratify — fame, greed, at this remove Looked down upon so far — or overlooked So largely, rather — that mine eye should rove

"World-wide and rummage earth, the many-nooked,

Yet find no unit of the human flock Caught straying but straight comes back hooked and crooked

"By the strong shepherd who, from-out his stock
Of aids proceeds to treat each ailing fleece, Here stimulate to growth, curtail and dock

"There, baldness or excrescence, — that,
with grease,
This, with up-grubbing of the bristly patch Born of the tick-bite. How supreme a
peace

"Steals o'er the Statist, — while, in wit, a
match
10 For shrewd Ahithophel, in wisdom . . .
well,
His name escapes me — somebody, at
watch

"And ward, the fellow of Ahithophel In guidance of the Chosen!" — at which
word
Eyes closed and fast asleep the Rabbi fell.

"Cold weather!" shivered Tsaddik.
"Yet the hoard
Of the sagacious ant shows garnered grain, Ever abundant most when fields afford

"Least pasture, and alike disgrace the
plain
Tall tree and lowly shrub. 'Tis so with us 20 Mortals: our age stores wealth ye seek in vain

"While busy youth culls just what we discuss
At leisure in the last days: and the last Truly are these for Jochanan, whom thus

"I make one more appeal to! Thine amassed Experience, now or never, let escape
Some portion of! For I perceive aghast

"The end approaches, while they jeer and jape,
These sons of Shimei: 'Justify your boast!
What have ye gained from Death by twelve months' rape?"

30 "Statesman, what cure hast thou for — least and most — Popular grievances? What nostrum, say, Will make the Rich and Poor, expertly dosed,

"Forget disparity, bid each go gay That, with his bauble, — with his burden,
this?
Propose an alkahest shall melt away

"Men's lacquer, show by prompt analysis Which is the metal, which the make-
believe,
So that no longer brass shall find, gold miss

"Coinage and currency? Make haste, retrieve
The precious moments, Master!" Where- 40 unto

There snarls an "Ever laughin' in thy
sleeve,

"Pert Tsaddik? Youth indeed sees plain a clue
To guide man where life's wood is intricate:
How shall he fail to thrid its thickest
through

"When every oak trunk takes the eye?
Elate
He goes from bole to brushwood, plunging finds — Smothered in briars — that the small's the great!

"All men are men: I would all minds were minds!
Whereas 'tis just the many's mindless
mass
That most needs helping: labourers and 50 hinds

"We legislate for — not the cultured class Which law-makes for itself nor needs the whip
And bridle, — proper help for mule and
ass,

"Did the brutes know! In vain our statesmanship Strives at contenting the rough multitude: Still the ox cries "Tis me thou shouldst equip

"With equine trappings!" o., in humbler
mood,
'Cribful of corn for me! and, as for work —
Adequate rumination o'er my food!

"Better remain a Poet! Needs it irl 60
Such an one if light, kindled in his sphere, Fail to transfuse the Mizraim cold and murk

"Round about Goshen? Though light disappear,
Shut inside, — temporary ignorance Got outside of, lo, light emerging clear

"Shows each astonished starrer the expanse Of heaven made bright with knowledge!
That's the way,
The only way — I see it at a glance —

- "To legislate for earth! As poet. . . .
Stay!
What is . . . I would that . . . were it
. . . I had been . . .
O sudden change, as if my arid clay
- "Burst into bloom! . . ." "A change indeed, I ween,
And change the last!" sighed Tsaddik as he kissed
The closing eyelids. "Just as those serene
- "Princes of Night apprised me! Our acquist
Of life is spent, since corners only four Hath Aisch, and each in turn was made desist
- 10 "In passage round the Pole (O Mishna's lore — Little it profits here!) by strenuous tug Of friends who eked out thus to full fourscore
- "The Rabbi's years. I see each shoulder
shrug!
What have we gained? Away the Bier may roll!
To-morrow, when the Master's grave is dug,
- "In with his body I may pitch the scroll
I hoped to glorify with, text and gloss, My Science of Man's Life: one blank's
the whole!
- "Love, war, song, statesmanship — no gain, all loss, 20 The stars' bestowment! We on our return To-morrow merely find — not gold but dross,
- "The body not the soul. Come, friends, we learn
At least thus much by our experiment — That — that . . . well, find what, whom it may concern!"
- But next day through the city rumours
went
Of a new persecution; so, they fled All Israel, each man, — this time, — from his tent,
- Tsaddik among the foremost. When, the dread
Subsiding, Israel ventured back again 30 Some three months after, to the cave they sped
- Where lay the Sage, — a reverential train!
Tsaddik first enters. "What is this I
view?
The Rabbi still alive? No stars remain
- "Of Aisch to stop within their courses
True,
I mind me, certain gamesome boys must urge
Their offerings on me: can it be — one threw
- "Life at him and it stuck? There needs the scourge
To teach that urchin manners! Prithee, grant
Forgiveness if we pretermit thy dirge
- "Just to explain no friend was ministrant, 40
This time, of life to thee! Some jackanapes,
I gather, has presumed to foist his scant
- "Scurvy unripe existence — wilding grapes Grass-green and sorrel-sour — on that grand wine,
Mighty as mellow, which, so fancy shapes
- "May fitly image forth this life of
thine
Fed on the last low fattening lees — condensed Elixir, no milk-mildness of the vine!
- "Rightly with Tsaddik wert thou now incensed
Had he been witting of the mischief 50
wrought
When, for elixir, verjuice he dispensed!"
- And slowly woke, — like Shushan's flower¹ besought
By over-curious handling to unloose
The curtained secrecy wherein she thought
- Her captive bee, mid store of sweets to
choose,
Would loll, in gold pavilioned lie unteased, Sucking on, sated never, — whose, O whose
- Might seem that countenance, uplift, all eased
Of old distraction and bewilderment, Absurdly happy? "How ye have ap- 60 peased
- "The strife within me, bred this whole
content,
This utter acquiescence in my past, Present and future life, — by whom was lent
- "The power to work this miracle at last, — Exceeds my guess. Though — ignorance confirmed By knowledge sounds like paradox, I cast

"Vainly about to tell you — fittier termed —
Of calm struck by encountering opposites, Each nullifying either! Henceforth wormed

"From out my heart is every snake that bites
The dove that else would brood there:
doubt, which kills
With hiss of 'What if sorrows end delights?'

"Fear which stings ease with 'Work the Master wills!
Experience which coils round and strangles
quick Each hope with 'Ask the Past if hoping skills to "To work accomplishment, or proves a trick Wiling thee to endeavour! Strive, fool, stop Nowise, so live, so die — that's law! why kick

"Against the pricks?' All out-wormed!
Slumber, drop Thy films once more and veil the bliss
within!
Experience strangle hope? Hope waves
a-top

"Her wings triumphant! Come what will,
I win,
Whoever loses! Every dream's assured Of soberest fulfilment. Where's a sin

"Except in doubting that the light, which lured 20 The unwary into darkness, meant no
wrong
Had I but marched on bold, nor paused immured

"By mists I should have pressed thro', passed along My way henceforth rejoicing? Not the boy's Passionate impulse he conceits so strong,

"Which, at first touch, truth, bubble-like, destroys, —
Not the man's slow conviction 'Vanity
Of vanities — alike my griefs and joys!'

"Ice! — thawed (look up) each bird, each insect by — (Look round) by all the plants that break in bloom,
30 (Look down) by every dead friend's memory

"That smiles 'Am I the dust within my tomb?'
Not either, but both these — amalgam
rare —
Mix in a product, not from Nature's womb,

"But stuff which He the Operant — who shall dare
Describe His operation? — strikes alive And thaumaturgic. I nor know nor care

"How from this tohu-bohu¹ — hopes which dive,
And fears which soar — faith, ruined
through and through By doubt, and doubt, faith treads to dust — revive

"In some surprising sort, — as see, they 40
do! —
Not merely foes no longer but fast friends.
What does it mean unless — O strange and
new

"Discovery! — this life proves a winepress — blends Evil and good, both fruits of Paradise, Into a novel drink which — who intends

"To quaff, must bear a brain for ecstasies Attempered, not this all-inadequate Organ which, quivering within me, dies

"— Nay, lives! — what, how, — too soon, or else too late — I was — I am . . ." ("He babbleth!" 50 Tsaddik mused)
"O Thou Almighty who canst reinstate

"Truths in their primal clarity, confused By man's perception, which is man's and
made
To suit his service, — how, once disabused

"Of reason which sees light half shine half
shade,
Because of flesh, the medium that adjusts Purity to his visuals, both an aid

"And hindrance, — how to eyes earth's air encrusts,
When purged and perfect to receive truth's beam
Pouring itself on the new sense it trusts 60

"With all its plenitude of power, — how seen
The intricacies now, of shade and shine, Oppugnant natures — Right and Wrong, we deem

* Void and waste.

"Irreconcilable? O eyes of mine, Freed now of imperfection, ye avail
To see the whole sight, nor may uncombine

"Henceforth what, erst divided, caused you quail —
So huge the chasim between the false and
true,
The dream and the reality! All hail,

"Day of my soul's deliverance — day the
new,
The never-ending! What though every
shape
Whereon I wreaked my yearning to pursue

10 "Even to success each semblance of escape From my own bounded self to some all-
fair
All-wise external fancy, proved a rape

"Like that old giant's, feigned of fools — on air,
Not solid flesh? How otherwise? To
love —
That lesson was to learn not here — but
there —

"On earth, not here! 'Tis there we learn,
— there prove
Our parts upon the stuff we needs must spoil,
Striving at mastery, there bend above

"The spoiled clay potsherds, many a year of toil

20 Attests the potter tried his hand upon,
Till sudden he arose, wiped free from soil

"His hand, cried 'So much for attempt —
anon
Performance! Taught to mould the living vasc,
What matter the cracked pitchers dead and
gone?"

"Could I impart and could thy mind embrace
The secret, Tsaddik!" "Secret none to
me!"
Quoth Tsaddik, as the glory on the face

Of Jochanan was quenched. "The truth
I see
Of what that excellence of Judah wrote, 30 Doughty Halaphta. This a case must be "Wherein, though the last breath have passed the throat,

So that 'The man is dead' we may pronounce,
Yet is the Ruach — (thus do we denote

"The imparted Spirit) — in no haste to bounce
From its entrusted Body, — some three days
Lingers ere it relinquish to the pounce

"Of hawk-clawed Death his victim.
Further says
Halaphta, 'Instances have been, and yet Again may be, when saints, whose earthly ways

"Tend to perfection, very nearly get 40
To heaven while still on earth: and, as a fine Interval shows where waters pure have met

"Waves brackish, in a mixture, sweet with brine,
That's neither sea nor river but a taste
Of both — so meet the earthly and divine

"And each is either.' Thus I hold him graced — Dying on earth, half inside and half out, Wholly in heaven, who knows? My mind
embraced

"Thy secret, Jochanan, how dare I doubt?
Follow thy Ruach, let earth, all it can, Keep of the leavings!" Thus was brought 50
about

The sepulture of Rabbi Jochanan:
Thou hast him, — sinner-saint, live-dead, boy-man, —
Schiphaz, on Bendimir, in Farzistan!

NOTE. — This story can have no better authority than that of the treatise, existing dispersedly in fragments of Rabbinical writing, מִשְׁךְ שֶׁל רִבּוּי בְּרִיּוֹת, from which I might have helped myself more liberally.
Thus, instead of the simple reference to 60
"Moses' stick," — but what if I make amends by attempting three illustrations, when some thirty might be composed on the same subject, equally justifying that pithy proverb מִמֶּשֶׁה עַד מֹשֶׁה לֹא קָם כְּמֹשֶׁה.

I.

MOSES the Meek was thirty cubits high,
The staff he strode with — thirty cubits
long:

And when he leapt, so muscular and strong

Was Moses that his leaping neared the sky
By thirty cubits more: we learn thereby 70 He reached full ninety cubits — am I
wrong? —

When, in a fight slurred o'er by sacred song,

With staff outstretched he took a leap to try
The just dimensions of the giant Og.
And yet he barely touched — this marvel lacked

Posterity to crown earth's catalogue Of marvels — barely touched — to be exact —

The giant's ankle-bone, remained a frog
That fain would match an ox in stature:
fact!

II.

And this same fact has met with unbelief!
How saith a certain traveller? "Young,
I chanced

o To come upon an object — if thou canst,

Guess me its name and nature! 'Twas, in
brief,

White, hard, round, hollow, of such length, in chief,

— And this is what especially enhanced My wonder — that it seemed, as I advanced,

Never to end. Bind up within thy sheaf Of marvels, this — Posterity! I walked

From end to end, — four hours walked I, who go

A goodly pace, — and found — I have not balked

Thine expectation, Stranger? Ay or No?

20 'Twas but Og's thigh-bone, all the while,
I stalked

Alongside of: respect to Moses, though!"

III.

Og's thigh-bone — if ye deem its measure
strange,

Myself can witness to much length of shank

Even in birds. Upon a water's bank Once halting, I was minded to exchange

Noon heat for cool. Quoth I "On many a grange

I have seen storks perch — legs both long and lank:

Yon stork's must touch the bottom of this tank,

Since on its top doth wet no plume derange 30 Of the smooth breast. I'll bathe there!"

"Do not so!"

Warned me a voice from heaven. "A man let drop

His axe into that shallow rivulet —

As thou accountest — seventy years ago:
It fell and fell and still without a stop

Keeps falling, nor has reached the bottom yet."

[Note. — Dr. Berdoo says the Hebrew in this note means — the first quotation, "Collection of Many Fables;" and the second, "From Moses to Moses (Maimonides) there was never one like Moses."]

NEVER THE TIME AND THE
PLACE.

NEVER the time and the place

And the loved one all together!

This path — how soft to pace!

This May — what magic weather!

Where is the loved one's face? 40

In a dream that loved one's face meets
mine,

But the house is narrow, the place is bleak

Where, outside, rain and wind combine

With a furtive ear, if I strive to speak,

With a hostile eye at my flushing cheek,

With a malice that marks each word, each sign!

O enemy sly and serpentine,

Uncoil thee from the waking man!

Do I hold the Past

Thus firm and fast 50

Yet doubt if the Future hold I can?

This path so soft to pace shall lead

Thro' the magic of May to herself indeed!

Or narrow if needs the house must be,

Outside are the storms and strangers:
we —

Oh, close, safe, warm sleep I and she,

— I and she!

PAMBO.

[Pambo was a monk of the Desert in the time of St. Anthony, who, after learning the first verse of the 39th Psalm, refused to learn any more, saying that one was enough for him if he learnt it properly.
The poem is apparently based on a passage in Socrates' "Ecclesiastical History," Book iv. c. 18. In Butler's "Lives of the Saints" there is a glowing account of St.
Pambo.]

SUPPOSE that we part (work done, comes
play)

With a grave tale told in crambo

— As our hearty sires were wont to say — 60

Whereof the hero is Pambo?

Do you happen to know who Pambo was?

Nor I — but this much have heard of
him:

He entered one day a college-class,

And asked — was it so absurd of him? —

"May Pambo learn wisdom ere practise
it?

In wisdom I fain would ground me:

Since wisdom is centred in Holy Writ, Some psalm to the purpose expound
me!"

"That psalm," the Professor smiled,
 "shall be Untroubled by doubt which dirtieth Pellucid streams when an ass like thee Would drink there — the Nine-andthirtieth.

"Verse first: *I said I will look to my
 ways
 That I with my tongue offend not.*
 How now? Why stare? Art struck in amaze?
 Stop, stay! The smooth line hath an end knot!

"He's gone! — disgusted my text should
 prove

Too easy to need explaining?
 Had he waited, the blockhead might find
 I move
 To matter that pays remaining!"

Long years went by, when — "Ha, who's
 this?

Do I come on the restive scholar
 I had driven to Wisdom's goal, I wis,
 But that he slipped the collar?

"What? Arms crossed, brow bent, thought-immersed?

A student indeed! Why scruple To own that the lesson proposed him first Scarce suited so apt a pupil?

"Come back! From the beggarly elements

To a more recondite issue
 We pass till we reach, at all events, Some point that may puzzle . . . Why
 'pish' you?"

From the ground looked piteous up the
 head:

"Daily and nightly, Master,
 Your pupil plods thro' that text you read,
 Yet gets on never the faster.

"At the self-same stand, — now old, then
 young!

I will look to my ways — were aching 30
 As easy as saying! — *that I with my
 tongue
 Offend not* — and 'scape pooh-poohing

"From sage and simple, doctor and dunce?
 Ah, nowise! Still doubts so muddy The stream I would drink at once, — but
 once!

That — thus I resume my study!"

Brother, brother, I share the blame, Arcades sumus ambo!

Darkling, I keep my sunrise-aim,

Lack not the critic's flambeau, 40 And look to my ways, yet, much the
 same,

Offend with my tongue — like Pambol

FERISHTAH'S FANCIES.

1884.

[Ferishtah is the name of a Persian historian of the seventeenth century, but the poet has not done more than make use of the historian's name. There is no Persian poet called Ferishtah, and the stories are all inventions.]

"His genius was jocular, but, when disposed, he could be very serious." — Article "Shakespear," JEREMY COLLIER'S Historical &c. Dictionary, 2nd edition, 1701.

"You, Sir, I entertain you for one of my Hundred; only, I do not like the fashion of your garments: you will say they are Persian: but let them be changed." — King Lear, act iii. sc. 6.

PROLOGUE.

PRAY, Reader, have you eaten ortolans Ever in Italy?

Recall how cooks there cook them: for my plan's

To — Lyre with Spit ally.

They pluck the birds, — some dozen luscious lumps,

Or more or fewer, —

Then roast them, heads by heads and rumps by rumps,

Stuck on a skewer.

But first, — and here's the point I fain would press, —

Don't think I'm tattling! —

They interpose, to curb its lusciousness, — What, 'twixt each fatling?

First comes plain bread, crisp, brown, a toasted square:

Then, a strong sage-leaf:

(So we find books with flowers dried here
and there

Lest leaf engage leaf.)

First, food — then, piquancy — and last
of all

Follows the thirdling:

Through wholesome hard, sharp soft, your tooth must bite

Ere reach the birdling.

Now, were there only crust to crunch, you'd wince:

Unpalatable!

Sage-leaf is bitter-pungent — so's a quince: Eat each who's able!

But through all three bite boldly — lo, the gust!

Flavour — no fixture —

Flies, permeating flesh and leaf and crust
In fine admixture.

So with your meal, my poem: masticate Sense, sight and song there! ³⁰ Digest these, and I praise your peptics'
state,

Nothing found wrong there.

Whence springs my illustration who can tell?

— The more surprising

That here eggs, milk, cheese, fruit suffice
so well

For gormandising.

A fancy-freak by contrast born of thee,

Delightful Gressoney!

Who laughest "Take what is, trust what may be!"

That's Life's true lesson, — eh? ⁴⁰

MAISON DELAPIERRE, GRESSONEY ST. JEAN, VAL D'AOSTA, September 12, '83.

THE EAGLE.

DERVISH — (though yet un-dervished, call him so

No less beforehand: while we drudged our
way,

Other his worldly name was: when he wrote

Those verses we Persians praise him for, — True fairy-work — Ferishtah grew his

style) —

Dervish Ferishtah walked the woods one
eve,

And noted on a bough a raven's nest

Whereof each youngling gaped with callow beak

Widened by want; for why? beneath the tree

Dead lay the mother-bird. "A piteous so
chance!

How shall they 'scape destruction?" sighed the sage

— Or sage about to be, though simple still.
Responsive to which doubt, sudden there swooped

An eagle downward, and behold he bore (Great-hearted) in his talons flesh where-
with

He stayed their craving, then resought the sky.

"Ah, foolish, faithless me!" the observer smiled,

"Who toil and toil to eke out life,
when lo

Providence cares for every hungry mouth!"
To profit by which lesson, home went he,
And certain days sat musing, — neither meat

Nor drink would purchase by his handi-
work.

Then, — for his head swam and his limbs grew faint, —

Sleep overtook the unwise one, whom in
dream

God thus admonished: "Hast thou marked my deed?"

15 Which part assigned by providence dost
judge

Was meant for man's example? Should he play

The helpless weakling, or the helpful
strength

That captures prey and saves the perish-
ing?

Sluggard, arise: work, eat, then feed who lack!"

Waking, "I have arisen, work I will, Eat, and so following. Which lacks food
the more,

Body or soul in me? I starve in soul:
So may mankind: and since men congregate

In towns, not woods, — to Ispahan forth-
with!"

20 Round us the wild creatures, overhead the trees,

Underfoot the moss-tracks, — life and love
with these!

I to wear a fawn-skin, thou to dress in
flowers:

All the long lone Summer-day, that greenwood life of ours!

Rich-pavilioned, rather, — still the world without, —

Inside — gold-roofed silk-walled silence round about!

Queen it thou on purple, — I, at watch and
ward

Couched beneath the columns, gaze, thy slave, love's guard!

So, for us no world? Let throngs press thee to me!

Up and down amid men, heart by heart fare we!

30 Welcome squalid vesture, harsh voice, hateful face!

God is soul, souls I and thou: with souls should souls have place.

THE MELON-SELLER.

GOING his rounds one day in Ispahan, — Half-way on Dervishhood, not wholly
there, —

Ferishtah, as he crossed a certain bridge, Came startled on a well-remembered face.

"Can it be? What, turned melon-seller
— thou?"

Clad in such sordid garb, thy seat yon
step

Where dogs brush by thee and express contempt?

Methinks, thy head-gear is some scooped-out gourd!

Nay, sunk to slicing up, for readier sale,
One fruit whereof the whole scarce feeds a swine?

Wast thou the Shah's Prime Minister, men saw

Ride on his right-hand while a trumpet blew

And Persia hailed the Favourite? Yea, twelve years

Are past, I judge, since that transcendancy,
And thou didst peculate and art abased;

No less, twelve years since, thou didst hold
in hand

Persia, couldst halve and quarter, mince its pulp

As pleased thee, and distribute — melon-
like —

Portions to whoso played the parasite,
Or suck — thyself — each juicy morsel.

How Enormous thy abjection, — hell from
heaven,

Made tenfold hell by contrast! Whisper
me!

Dost thou curse God for granting twelve years' bliss

Only to prove this day's the direr lot?"

Whereon the beggar raised a brow, once
more

Luminous and imperial, from the rags.

"Fool, does thy folly think my foolishness Dwells rather on the fact that God appoints

A day of woe to the unworthy one, Than that the unworthy one, by God's

award, Tasted joy twelve years long? Or buy a slice,

Or go to school!"

To school Ferishtah went;
And, schooling ended, passed from Ispahan

To Nishapur, that Elburz looks above — Where they dig turquoise: there kept school himself,

The melon-seller's speech, his stock in trade.

Some say a certain Jew adduced the word

Out of their book, it sounds so much the same,

אֲתֵדַע מֵאֵת הָאֱלֹהִים

וְאִתְּהֵרֵט לֹא נִקְבֵּל: In Persian phrase,
"Shall we receive good at the hand of God And evil not receive?" But great wits jump.

Wish no word unspoken, want no look
away!

What if words were but mistake, and looks — too sudden, say!

Be unjust for once, Love! Bear it — well
I may!

Do me justice always? Bid my heart — their shrine —

Render back its store of gifts, old looks and words of thine

— Oh, so all unjust — the less deserved, the more divine?

SHAH ABBAS.

ANYHOW, once full Dervish, youngsters
came

To gather up his own words, 'neath a rock
Or else a palm, by pleasant Nishapur.

Said someone, as Ferishtah paused abrupt, Reading a certain passage from the roll Wherein is treated of Lord Ali's life:

"Master, explain this incongruity!
When I dared question 'It is beautiful,
But is it true?' — thy answer was 'In truth Lives beauty.' I persisting — 'Beauty —

yes,

In thy mind and in my mind, every mind That apprehends: but outside — so to
speak —

Did beauty live in deed as well as word, Was this life lived, was this death died — not dreamed?"

'Many attested it for fact' saidst thou.
'Many!' but mark, Sir! Half as long ago

As such things were, — supposing that they were, —

Reigned great Shah Abbas: he too lived and died

How say they? Why, so strong of arm, of foot

So swift, he stayed a lion in his leap On a stag's haunch, — with one hand grasped the stag,

With one struck down the lion: yet, no
less,

Himself, that same day, feasting after sport,
Perceived a spider drop into his wine,
Let fall the flagon, died of simple fear.

So all say, — so dost thou say?"

"Wherefore not?"

Ferishtah smiled: "though strange, the story stands

Clear-chronicled: none tells it otherwise:
The fact's eye-witness bore the cup, be- 4c
side."

"And dost thou credit one cup-bearer's
tale,

False, very like, and futile certainly,

Yet hesitate to trust what many tongues

Combine to testify was beautiful

In deed as well as word? No fool's report

Of lion, stag and spider, but immense

With meaning for mankind, — thy race,
— thyself?"

Whereto the Dervish: "First amend, my
son,

Thy faulty nomenclature, call belief

Belief indeed, nor grace with such a name 50

The easy acquiescence of mankind

In matters nowise worth dispute, since
life

Lasts merely the allotted moment. Lo —

That lion-stag-and-spider tale leaves fixed

The fact for us that somewhen Abbas
reigned,

Died, somehow slain, — a useful registry, —

Which therefore we — 'believe'? Stand forward, thou,

My Yakub, son of Yusuf, son of Zal!

I advertise thee that our liege, the Shah

Happily regnant, hath become assured, 60

By opportune discovery, that thy sires,

Son by the father upwards, track their line

To — whom but that same bearer of the
cup

Whose inadvertency was chargeable

With what therefrom ensued, disgust and
death

To Abbas Shah, the over-nice of soul?

Whence he appoints thee, — such his clemency, —

Not death, thy due, but just a double tax

To pay, on thy particular bed of reeds

Which flower into the brush that makes a 70 broom

Fit to sweep ceilings clear of vermin. Sure,

Thou dost believe the story nor dispute

That punishment should signalise its
truth?

Down therefore with some twelve dinars!

Why start,

— The stag's way with the lion hard on haunch?

'Believe the story?' — how thy words throng fast! —

'Who saw this, heard this, said this, wrote down this,

That and the other circumstance to prove

So great a prodigy surprised the world?"

Needs must thou prove me fable can be
fact

Or ere thou coax one piece from out my pouch!"

"There we agree, Sir: neither of us
knows,

Neither accepts that tale on evidence Worthy to warrant the large word — belief.

Now I get near thee! Why didst pause
abrupt,

Disabled by emotion at a tale

Might match — be frank! — for credibility

The figment of the spider and the cup?

10 — To wit, thy roll's concerning Ali's life, Unepived — thine own word! Little boots

Our sympathy with fiction! When I read

The annals and consider of Tahmasp

And that sweet sun-surpassing star his love,

I weep like a cut vine-twig, though aware

Zurah's sad fate is fiction, since the snake

He saw devour her, — how could such exist,

Having nine heads? No snake boasts more than three!

I weep, then laugh — both actions right
alike.

20 But thou, Ferishtah, sapiency confessed, When at the Day of Judgment God shall ask

'Didst thou believe?' — what wilt thou plead? Thy tears?

(Nay, they fell fast and stain the parchment still)

What if thy tears meant love? Love lacking ground

— Belief, — avails thee as it would avail

My own pretence to favour since, forsooth,

I loved the lady — I, who needs must
laugh

To hear a snake boasts nine heads: they have three!"

"Thanks for the well-timed help that's born, behold,

30 Out of thy words, my son, — belief and
love!

Hast heard of Ishak son of Absal? Ay,

The very same we heard of, ten years since,

Slain in the wars: he comes back safe and
sound, —

Though twenty soldiers saw him die at Yezdt, —

Just as a single mule-and-baggage boy

Declared 'twas like he some day would,
— for why?

The twenty soliders lied, he saw him stout,

Cured of all wounds at once by smear of salve,

A Mubid's manufacture: such the tale.

40 Now, when his pair of sons were thus apprised

Effect was twofold on them. 'Hail!' crowed This:

'Dearer the news than dayspring after
night!

The cure-reporting youngster warrants me

Our father shall make glad our eyes once
more,

For whom, had outpoured life of mine sufficed

To bring him back, free broached were every vein!

'Avaunt, delusive tale-concocter, news

Cruel as meteor simulating dawn!

Whispered the other: 'Who believes this boy

Must disbelieve his twenty seniors: no,

Return our father shall not! Might my
death

Purchase his life, how promptly would the dole

Be paid as due!' Well, ten years pass, —
aha,

Ishak is marching homeward, — doubts, not he,

Are dead and done with! So, our townsfolk straight

Must take on them to counsel. 'Go thou
gay,

Welcome thy father, thou of ready faith!

Hide thee, contrariwise, thou faithless one,

Expect paternal frowning, blame and blows!

So do our townsfolk counsel: dost demur?"

"Ferishtah like those simpletons — at loss In what is plain as pikestaff? Pish!

Suppose

The trustful son had sighed 'So much the
worse!

Returning means — retaking heritage

Enjoyed these ten years, who should say me nay?"

How would such trust reward him?
Trustlessness

— O' the other hand — were what procured most praise

To him who judged return impossible,

Yet hated heritage procured thereby.

A fool were Ishak if he failed to prize

Mere head's work less than heart's work:
no fool he!

"Is God less wise? Resume the roll!"

They did.

You groped your way across my room i'
the drear dark dead of night;

At each fresh step a stumble was: but,
once your lamp alight,

Easy and plain you walked again: so soon all wrong grew right!

What lay on floor to trip your foot? Each object, late awry, Looked fitly placed, nor proved offence to footing free — for why?
The lamp showed all, discordant late, grown simple symmetry.

Be love your light and trust your guide, with these explore my heart!
No obstacle to trip you then, strike hands and souls apart!
Since rooms and hearts are furnished so, — light shows you, — needs love start?

THE FAMILY.

A CERTAIN neighbour lying sick to death, Ferishtah grieved beneath a palm-tree,
whence

He rose at peace: whereat objected one
"Gudarz our friend gasps in extremity.
Sure, thou art ignorant how close at hand Death presses, or the cloud, which fouled so late

Thy face, had deepened down not lightened
off."

"I judge there will be respite, for I prayed."

"Sir, let me understand, of charity!
Yestereve, what was thine admonishment?
'All-wise, all-good, all-mighty — God is
such!'

How then should man, the all-unworthy,
dare

Propose to set aside a thing ordained?
To pray means — substitute man's will for God's:

Two best wills cannot be: by consequence,
What is man bound to but — assent, say I?
Rather to rapture of thanksgiving; since That which seems worst to man to God is
best,

So, because God ordains it, best to man.
Yet man — the foolish, weak and wicked — prays!

Urges 'My best were better, didst Thou
know!'

"List to a tale. A worthy householder Of Shiraz had three sons, beside a spouse Whom, cutting gourds, a serpent bit, whereon

The offended limb swelled black from foot to fork.

The husband called in aid a leech renowned

World-wide, confessed the lord of surgery, And bade him dictate — who forthwith declared

'Sole remedy is amputation.' Straight

The husband sighed 'Thou knowest: be
it so!'

His three sons heard their mother sentenced: 'Pause!'

Outbroke the elder: 'Be precipitate Nowise, I pray thee! Take some gentler
way,

Thou sage of much resource! I will not 40
doubt

But science still may save foot, leg and thigh!'

The next in age snapped petulant: 'Too rash!

No reason for this maiming! What, Sir Leech,

Our parent limps henceforward while we leap?

Shame on thee! Save the limb thou must and shalt!'

'Shame on yourselves, ye bold ones!' followed up

The brisk third brother, youngest, pertest
too:

'The leech knows all things, we are ignorant;

What he proposcs, gratefully accept!
For me, had I some unguent bound to heal 50

Hurts in a twinkling, hardly would I dare Essay its virtue and so cross the sage

By cure his skill pronounces folly. Quick!
No waiting longer! There the patient

lies:
Out then with implements and operate!''

"Ah, the young devil!"

"Why, his reason chimed Right with the Hakim's."

"Hakim's, ay — but chit's?
How? what the skilled eye saw and judged of weight

To overbear a heavy consequence,
That — shall a sciolist affect to see? 60

All he saw — that is, all such oaf should
see,

Was just the mother's suffering."

"In my tale,
Be God the Hakim: in the husband's case, Call ready acquiescence — aptitude

Angelic, understanding swift and sure:
Call the first son — a wise humanity,

Slow to conceive but duteous to adopt:
See in the second son — humanity,

Wrong-headed yet right-hearted, rash but
kind.

Last comes the cackler of the brood, our 70 chit

Who, aping wisdom all beyond his years, Thinks to discard humanity itself:

Fares like the beast which should affect to fly

Because a bird with wings may spurn the
ground,
So, missing heaven and losing earth — drops how But hell-ward? No, be man and nothing
more —
Man who, as man conceiving, hopes and
fears,
And craves and deprecates, and loves, and loathes,
And bids God help him, till death touch his eyes
And show God granted most, denying all."

Man I am and man would be, Love — merest man and nothing more.
Bid me seem no other! Eagles boast of pinions — let them soar!
10 I may put forth angel's plumage, once unmanned, but not before.

Now on earth, to stand suffices, — nay, if kneeling serves, to kneel: Here you front me, here I find the all of heaven that earth can feel:
Sense looks straight, — not over, under, — perfect sees beyond appeal.

Good you are and wise, full circle: what to me were more outside?
Wiser wisdom, better goodness? Ah, such want the angel's wide Sense to take and hold and keep them!
Mine at least has never tried.

THE SUN.

"AND what might that bold man's adnouncement be" —

Ferishtah questioned — "which so moved thine ire

That thou didst curse, nay, cuff and kick
— in short,

20 Confute the announcer? Wipe those drops away

Which start afresh upon thy face at mere Mention of such enormity: now, speak!"

"He scrupled not to say — (thou warrantest,

O patient Sir, that I unblamed repeat Abominable words which blister tongue?)
God once assumed on earth a human shape: (Lo, I have spitten!) Dared I ask the grace, Fain would I hear, of thy subtilty, From out what hole in man's corrupted
heart

30 Creeps such a maggot: fancies verminous Breed in the clots there, but a monster born Of pride and folly like this pest — thyself Only canst trace to egg-shell it hath chipped."

The sun rode high. "During our ignorance" —

Began Ferishtah — "folk esteemed as God Yon orb: for argument, suppose him so, — Be it the symbol, not the symbolised,
I and thou safelier take upon our lips.

Accordingly, yon orb that we adore — What is he? Author of all light and
life:

Such one must needs be somewhere: this is he.

Like what? If I may trust my human
eyes,

A ball composed of spirit-fire, whence springs

— What, from this ball, my arms could circle round?

All I enjoy on earth. By consequence, Inspiring me with — what? Why, love and praise.

I eat a palatable fig — there's love
In little: who first planted what I pluck, Obtains my little praise, too: more of both Keeps due proportion with more cause for
each:

So, more and ever more, till most of all Completes experience, and the orb, described

Ultimate giver of all good, perforce Gathers unto himself all love, all praise, Is worshipped — which means loved and praised at height.

Back to the first good: 'twas the gardener
gave

Occasion to my palate's pleasure: grace, Plain on his part, demanded thanks on
mine.

Go up above this giver, — step by step, Gain a conception of what — (how and
why,

Matters not now) — occasioned him to
give,

Appointed him the gardener of the
ground, —

I mount by just progression slow and sure To some prime giver — here assumed yon
orb —

Who takes my worship. Whom have I in
mind,

Thus worshipping, unless a man, my like Howe'er above me? Man, I say — how
else,

I being man who worship? Here's my
hand

Lifts first a mustard-seed, then weight on weight

Greater and ever greater, till at last It lifts a melon, I suppose, then stops —

Hand-strength expended wholly: so, my
love

First lauds the gardener for the fig his gift, Then, looking higher, loves and lauds still
more,

Who hires the ground, who owns the ground, Sheikh, Shah, On and away, away and ever on,
Till, at the last, it loves and lauds the orb Ultimate cause of all to laud and love.
Where is the break, the change of quality In hand's power, soul's impulsion? Gift was grace,
The greatest as the smallest. Had I stopped Anywhere in the scale, stayed love and
praise
As so far only fit to follow gift, Saying 'I thanked the gardener for his fig, But now that, lo, the Shah has filled my purse
With tomans which avail to purchase me
A fig-tree forest, shall I pay the same With love and praise, the gardener's proper fee?'
Justly would whoso bears a brain object
'Giving is giving, gift claims gift's return, Do thou thine own part, therefore: let the Shah
Ask more from who has more to pay.' Per-
chance
He gave me from his treasure less by much Than the soil's servant: let that be! My
part Is plain — to meet and match the gift and
gift
With love and love, with praise and praise, till both Cry 'All of us is thine, we can no more!'
So shall I do man's utmost — man to man:
For as our liege the Shah's sublime estate Merely enhaloes, leaves him man the same,
So must I count that orb I call a fire (Keep to the language of our ignorance) Something that's fire and more beside.
Mere fire
— Is it a force which, giving, knows it
gives,
And wherefore: so may look for love and
praise
From me, fire's like so far, however less In all beside? Prime cause this fire shall
be,
Uncaused, all-causing: hence begin the
gifts,
Thither must go my love and praise — to
what?
Fire? Symbol fitly serves the symbolised Herein, — that this same object of my
thanks,
While to my mind nowise conceivable Except as mind no less than fire, refutes Next moment mind's conception: fire is
fire — While what I needs must thank, must needs include Purpose with power, — humanity like
mine,

Imagined, for the dear necessity,
One moment in an object which the next Confesses unimaginable. Power!
— What need of will, then? nought opposes power:
Why, purpose? any change must be for
worse:
And what occasion for beneficence
When all that is, so is and so must be?
Best being best now, change were for the 50
worse.
Accordingly discard these qualities Proper to imperfection, take for type Mere fire, eject the man, retain the orb, —
The perfect and, so, inconceivable, — And what remains to love and praise? A stone
Fair-coloured proves a solace to my eye, Rolled by my tongue brings moisture curling drouth,
And struck by steel emits a useful spark:
Shall I return it thanks, the insentient
thing?
No, — man once, man for ever — man in 60
soul
As man in body: just as this can use Its proper senses only, see and hear, Taste, like or loathe according to its law
And not another creature's, — even so Man's soul is moved by what, if it in turn Must move, is kindred soul: receiving good — Man's way — must make man's due acknowledgment,
No other, even while he reasons out Plainly enough that, were the man unmanned,
Made angel of, angelic every way, 70
The love and praise that rightly seek and
find
Their man-like object now, — instructed
more,
Would go forth idly, air to emptiness.
Our human flower, sun-ripened, proffers
scent
Though reason prove the sun lacks nose to feed
On what himself made grateful: flower and man,
Let each assume that scent and love alike
Being once born, must needs have use!
Man's part
Is plain — to send love forth, — astray,
perhaps:
No matter, he has done his part." 80

"Wherefrom
What is to follow — if I take thy sense —
But that the sun — the inconceivable Confessed by man — comprises, all the
same,
Man's every-day conception of himself — No less remaining unconceived!"

"Agreed!"

"Yet thou, insisting on the right of man To feel as man, not otherwise, — man,
bound

By man's conditions neither less nor more, Obliged to estimate as fair or foul, Right, wrong, good, evil, what man's faculty

Adjudges such, — how canst thou, — plainly bound

To take man's truth for truth and only
truth, —

Dare to accept, in just one case, as truth Falsehood confessed? Flesh simulating
fire —

10 Our fellow-man whom we his fellows know For dust — instinct with fire unknow-
able!

Where's thy man-needed truth — its proof, nay print

Of faintest passage on the tablets traced By man, termed knowledge? 'Tis conceded thee,

We lack such fancied union — fire with
flesh:

But even so, to lack is not to gain Our lack's suppliance: where's the trace of such Recorded?"

"What if such a tracing were?

If some strange story stood, — whate'er its worth, —

20 That the immensely yearned-for, once befell,

— The sun was flesh once? — (keep the figure!)"

"How?

An union inconceivable was fact?"

"Son, if the stranger have convinced himself

Fancy is fact — the sun, besides a fire, Holds earthly substance somehow fire pervades

And yet consumes not, — earth, he understands,

With essence he remains a stranger to, — Fittler thou saidst 'I stand appalled before Conception unattainable by me

30 Who need it most' — than this — 'What?
boast he holds

Conviction where I see conviction's need, Alas, — and nothing else? then what remains

But that I straightway curse, cuff, kick the
fool!"

Fire is in the flint: true, once a spark escapes,

Fire forgets the kinship, soars till fancy shapes

Some befitting cradle where the babe had
birth —

Wholly heaven's the product, unallied to
earth.

Splendours recognised as perfect in the star! —

In our flint their home was, housed as now they are.

MIHRAB SHAH.

QUOTH an inquirer, "Praise the Merciful!
My thumb which yesterday a scorpion nipped —

(It swelled and blackened) — lo, is sound
again!

By application of a virtuous root
The burning has abated: that is well:
But now methinks I have a mind to ask, — Since this discomfort came of culling herbs Nor meaning harm, — why needs a scorpion be?

Yea, there began, from when my thumb last throbbed,

Advance in question framing, till I asked Wherefore should any evil hap to man —
From ache of flesh to agony of soul —

Since God's All-mercy mates All-potency?
Nay, why permits He evil to Himself — Man's sin, accounted such? Suppose a
world

Purged of all pain, with fit inhabitant — Man pure of evil in thought, word and
deed —

Were it not well? Then, wherefore otherwise?

Too good result? But he is wholly good!
Hard to effect? Ay, were He impotent?
Teach me, Ferishtah!"

Said the Dervish: "Friend, My chance, escaped to-day, was worse than
thine:

I, as I woke this morning, raised my head, Which never tumbled but stuck fast on neck.

Was not I glad and thankful!"

"How could head Tumble from neck, unchopped — inform me first!

Unless we take Firdausi's tale for truth,
Who ever heard the like?"

"The like might hap
By natural law: I let my staff fall thus — It goes to ground, I know not why. Suppose,

Whene'er my hold was loosed, it skyward sprang

As certainly, and all experience proved That, just as staves when unsupported
sink,

So, unconfined, they soar?"

"Let such be law —

Why, a new chapter of sad accidents
Were added to humanity's mischance,
No doubt at all, and as a man's false step Now lays him prone on earth, contrariwise, Removal from his shoulder of a weight Might start him upwards to perdition. Ay!
But, since such law exists in just thy brain,
I shall not hesitate to doff my cap
For fear my head take flight."

"Nor feel relief

Finding it firm on shoulder. Tell me,
now!
What were the bond 'twixt man and man,
dost judge,
Pain once abolished? Come, be true!
Our Shah —
How stands he in thy favour? Why that shrug?
Is not he lord and ruler?"

"Easily!

His mother bore him, first of those four wives
Provided by his father, such his luck: Since when his business simply was to breathe
And take each day's new bounty. There he stands —
Where else had I stood, were his birth-star
mine?
No, to respect men's power, I needs must
see Men's bare hands seek, find, grasp and wield the sword Nobody else can brandish! Bless his
heart,
'Tis said, he scarcely counts his fingers
right!"

"Well, then — his princely doles! from every feast
Off go the feasted with the dish they ate And cup they drank from, — nay, a change besides Of garments" . . .

"Sir, put case, for service done, —

Or best, for love's sake, — such and such a slave
Sold his allowance of sour lentil soup To therewith purchase me a pipe-stick, —
nay,
If he, by but one hour, cut short his sleep
'To clout my shoe, — that were a sacrifice!"

"All praise his gracious bearing."

"All praise mine —

Or would praise did they never make approach
Except on all-fours, crawling till I bade

'Now that with eyelids thou hast touched
the earth,
Come close and have no fear, poor nothingness!"

What wonder that the lady-rose I woo
And palisade about from every wind, 4c Holds herself handsomely? The wilding,
now,
Ruffled outside at pleasure of the blast,
That still lifts up with something of a smile
Its poor attempt at bloom" . . .

"A blameless life,

Where wrong might revel with impunity — Remember that!"

"The falcon on his fist —

Reclaimed and trained and belled and beautified Till she believes herself the Simorgh's
match —
She only deigns destroy the antelope, Stoops at no carrion-crow: thou mar- 5a vellest?"

"So be it, then! He wakes no love in thee For any one of divers attributes Commonly deemed lovable. All the
same,
I would he were not wasting, slow but sure,
With that internal ulcer" . . .

"Say'st thou so?

How should I guess? Alack, poor soul!
But stay —
Sure in the reach of art some remedy
Must lie to hand: or if it lurk, — that leech Of fame in Tebriz, why not seek his aid?
Couldst not thou, Dervish, counsel in the 6a
case?"

"My counsel might be — what imports a pang
The more or less, which puts an end to one Odious in spite of every attribute Commonly deemed lovable?"

"Attributes?

Faugh! — nay, Ferishtah, — 'tis an ulcer,
think!
Attributes, quotha? Here's poor flesh and
blood,
Like thine and mine and every man's, a
prey
To hell-fire! Hast thou lost thy wits for
once?"

"Friend, here they are to find and profit by!
Put pain from out the world, what room 7c were left For thanks to God, for love to Man? Why
thanks, —
Except for some escape, whate'er the
style,

From pain that might be, name it as thou mayst?

Why love, — when all thy kind, save me,
suppose,

Thy father, and thy son, and . . . well,
thy dog,

To eke the decent number out — we few Who happen — like a handful of chance stars

From the unnumbered host — to shine o'erhead

And lend thee light, — our twinkle all thy
store, —

We only take thy love! Mankind, forsooth?

Who sympathises with their general joy

10 Foolish as undeserved? But pain — see God's

Wisdom at work! — man's heart is made to judge

Pain deserved nowhere by the common
flesh

Our birthright, — bad and good deserve
alike

No pain, to human apprehension! Lust, Greed, cruelty, injustice, crave (we hold)

Due punishment from somebody, no doubt:
But ulcer in the midriff! that brings flesh

Triumphant from the bar whereto arraigned

Soul quakes with reason. In the eye of
God

20 Pain may have purpose and be justified:
Man's sense avails to only see, in pain,

A hateful chance no man but would avert Or, failing, needs must pity. Thanks to God

And love to man, — from man take these
away,

And what is man worth? Therefore,
Mihrab Shah,

Tax me my bread and salt twice over,
claim

Laila my daughter for thy sport, — go on!
Slay my son's self, maintain thy poetry

Beats mine, — thou meritest a dozen deaths!

30 But — ulcer in the stomach, — ah, poor
soul,

Try a fig-plaster: may it ease thy pangs!"

So, the head aches and the limbs are faint!

Flesh is a burthen — even to you!

Can I force a smile with a fancy quaint?

Why are my ailments none or few?

In the soul of me sits sluggishness:

Body so strong and will so weak!

The slave stands fit for the labour — yes,

But the master's mandate is still to seek.

You, now — what if the outside clay Helped, not hindered the inside flame?

My dim to-morrow — your plain to-day,
Yours the achievement, mine the aim?

So were it rightly, so shall it be!

Only, while earth we pace together For the purpose apportioned you and me, Closer we tread for a common tether.

You shall sigh "Wait for his sluggish
soul!

Shame he should lag, not lamed as I!"

May not I smile "Ungained her goal:

Body may reach her — by-and-by?"

A CAMEL-DRIVER.

"How of his fate, the Pilgrims' soldier-guide

Condemned" (Ferishtah questioned), "for he slew

The merchant whom he convoyed with his bales

— A special treachery?"

"Sir, the proofs were plain:
Justice was satisfied: between two boards

The rogue was sawn asunder, rightly served."

"With all wise men's approval — mine at
least."

"Himself, indeed, confessed as much. 'I
die

Justly' (groaned he) 'through over-greedi-
ness

Which tempted me to rob: but grieve the most

That he who quickened sin at slumber, —
ay,

Prompted and pestered me till thought grew deed, —

The same is fled to Syria and is safe, Laughing at me thus left to pay for both.

My comfort is that God reserves for him Hell's hottest' . . ."

"Idle words."

"Enlighten me!
Wherefore so idle? Punishment by man

Has thy assent, — the word is on thy lips.
By parity of reason, punishment

By God should likelier win thy thanks and
praise."

"Man acts as man must: God, as God beseems.

A camel-driver, when his beast will bite, Thumps her athwart the muzzle; why?"

"How else Instruct the creature — mouths should munch, not bite?"

"True, he is man, knows but man's trick to teach.
Suppose some plain word, told her first of all,
Had hindered any biting?"

"Find him such,
And fit the beast with understanding first!
No understanding animals like Rakhsh Nowadays, Master! Till they breed on
earth,
For teaching — blows must serve."

"Who deals the blow — What if by some rare method, — magic,
say, —
He saw into the biter's very soul,
And knew the fault was so repented of It could not happen twice?"

"That's something: still,
I hear, methinks, the driver say 'No less Take thy fault's due! Those long-necked sisters, see,
Lean all a-stretch to know if biting meets Punishment or enjoys impunity.
For their sakes — thwack!'"

"The journey home at end,
The solitary beast safe-stabled now,
In comes the driver to avenge a wrong Suffered from six months since, — apparently
With patience, nay, approval: when the jaws
Met? the small of the arm, 'Ha, Ladykin, Still at thy frolics, girl of gold?' laughed he:
'Eat flesh? Rye-grass content thee rather
with,
Whereof accept a bundle!' Now, — what
change!
Laughter by no means! Now 'tis 'Fiend, thy frisk
Was fit to find thee provender, didst judge?
Behold this red-hot twy-prong, thus I stick To hiss i' the soft of thee!'"

"Behold? behold
A crazy noddle, rather! Sure the brute Might wellnigh have plain speech coaxed out of tongue,
And grow as voluble as Rakhsh himself At such mad outrage. 'Could I take thy
mind,
Guess thy desire? If biting was offence Wherefore the rye-grass bundle, why each day's Patting and petting, but to intimate My playsomeness had pleased thee?
Thou endowed
With reason, truly!'"

"Reason aims to raise Some makeshift scaffold-vantage midway,
whence
Man dares, for life's brief moment, peer 40
below:
But ape omniscience? Nay! The ladder
lent
To climb by, step and step, until we reach
The little foothold-rise allowed mankind To mount on and thence guess the sun's survey —
Shall this avail to show us world-wide truth Stretched for the sun's descreying? Reason bids
'Teach, Man, thy beast his duty first of all Or last of all, with blows if blows must be, — How else accomplish teaching?' Reason adds
'Before man's First, and after man's poor 50
Last,
God operated and will operate.'
— Process of which man merely knows this much, —
That nowise it resembles man's at all, Teaching or punishing."

"It follows, then,
That any malefactor I would smite With God's allowance, God himself will spare Presumably. No scapegrace? Then, rejoice
Thou snatch-grace safe in Syria!"

"Friend, such view
Is but man's wonderful and wide mistake.
Man lumps his kind i' the mass: God 60 singles thence Unit by unit. Thou and God exist — So think! — for certain: think the mass —
mankind —
Disparts, disperses, leaves thyself alone!
Ask thy lone soul what laws are plain to
thee, —
Thee and no other, — stand or fall by
them!
That is the part for thee: regard all else
For what it may be — Time's illusion.
This
Be sure of — ignorance that sins, is safe.
No punishment like knowledge! Instance,
now!
My father's choicest treasure was a book 70
Wherein he, day by day and year by year, Recorded gains of wisdom for my sake When I should grow to manhood. While a child,
Coming upon the casket where it lay Unguarded, — what did I but toss the
thing
Into a fire to make more flame therewith, Meaning no harm? So acts man three-
years old!
I grieve now at my loss by witlessness,

But guilt was none to punish. Man mature —

Each word of his I lightly held, each look I turned from — wish that wished in vain — nay, will

That willed and yet went all to waste —
'tis these

Rankle like fire. Forgiveness? rather grant

Forgetfulness! The past is past and lost.
However near I stand in his regard,
So much the nearer had I stood by steps Offered the feet which rashly spurned their
help.

10 That I call Hell; why further punishment?"

When I vexed you and you chid me,
And I owned my fault and turned My cheek the way you bid me, And confessed the blow well earned, —

My comfort all the while was — Fault was faulty — near, not quite!
Do you wonder why the smile was?
O'erpunished wrong grew right.

30 But faults you ne'er suspected, Nay, praised, no faults at all, — Those would you had detected — Crushed eggs whence snakes could crawl!

TWO CAMELS.

QUOTH one: "Sir, solve a scruple! No true sage

I hear of, but instructs his scholar thus:
'Wouldst thou be wise? Then mortify thyself!

Baulk of its craving every bestial sense!
Say "If I relish melons — so do swine!
Horse, ass and mule consume their provender

Nor leave a pea-pod: fasting feeds the
soul."

30 Thus they admonish: while thyself, I note, Eatest thy ration with an appetite,
Nor faltest foul of whoso licks his lips And sighs — 'Well-saffroned was that barley soup!

Can wisdom co-exist with — gorge-and-swill,

I say not, — simply sensual preference
For this or that fantastic meat and drink?
Moreover, wind blows sharper than its wont

This morning, and thou hast already donned

Thy sheepskin over-garment: sure the sage

40 Is busied with conceits that soar above
A petty change of season and its chance

Of causing ordinary flesh to sneeze?
I always thought, Sir" . . .

"Son," Ferishtah said,
"Truth ought to seem as never thought
before.

How if I give it birth in parable?
A neighbour owns two camels, beasts of price

And promise, destined each to go, next
week,

Swiftly and surely with his merchandise
From Nishapur to Sebzevar, no truce To tramp, but travel, spite of sands and drouth,

In days so many, lest they miss the Fair.
Each falls to meditation o'er his crib Piled high with provender before the start.
Quoth this: 'My soul is set on winning
praise

From goodman lord and master, — hump to hoof,

I dedicate me to his service. How?
Grass, purslane, lupines and I know not
what,

Crammed in my manger? Ha, I see — I
see!

No, master, spare thy money! I shall trudge

The distance and yet cost thee not a doit Beyond my supper on this mouldy bran.'

'Be magnified, O master, for the meal So opportunely liberal!' quoth that.

'What use of strength in me but to surmount

Sands and simooms, and bend beneath thy bales

No knee until I reach the glad bazaar?
Thus I do justice to thy fare: no sprig

Of toothsome chervil must I leave unchewed!

Too bitterly should I reproach myself Did I sink down in sight of Sebzevar,

Remembering how the merest mouthful
more

Had heartened me to manage yet a mile!' — And so it proved: the too-abstemious brute

Midway broke down, his pack rejoiced the thieves,

His carcass fed the vultures: not so he
The wisely thankful, who, good market-

drudge,
Let down his lading in the market-place,

No damage to a single pack. Which
beast,

Think ye, had praise and patting and a brand

Of good-and-faithful-servant fixed on 8 flank?

So, with thy squeamish scruple. What imports

Fasting or feasting? Do thy day's work,
dare

Refuse no help thereto, since help refused

Is hindrance sought and found. Win but the race —
Who shall object 'He tossed three wine cups off,
And, just at starting, Lilith kissed his lips' ?
"More soberly, — consider this, my Son — Put case I never have myself enjoyed, Known by experience what enjoyment
means,
How shall I — share enjoyment? — no,
indeed! —
Supply it to my fellows, — ignorant,
As so I should be of the thing they crave,
How it affects them, works for good or ill.
Style my enjoyment self-indulgence —
sin —
Why should I labour to infect my kind With sin's occasion, bid them too enjoy,
Who else might neither catch nor give again
Joy's plague, but live in righteous misery?
Just as I cannot, till myself convinced, Impart conviction, so, to deal forth joy Adroitly, needs must I know joy myself.
Renounce joy for my fellows' sake?
That's joy Beyond joy; but renounced for mine, not theirs?
Why, the physician called to help the sick, Cries 'Let me, first of all, discard my health!'
No, Son: the richness hearted in such joy Is in the knowing what are gifts we give,
Not in a vain endeavour not to know!
Therefore, desire joy and thank God for it!
The Adversary said, — a Jew reports, — החנם רא אוב אלהים In Persian phrase, 'Does Job fear God for nought?'
Job's creatureship is not abjured, thou fool!
He nowise isolates himself and plays
The independent equal, owns no more Than himself gave himself, so why thank
God?
A proper speech were this מאלהים
'Equals we are, Job, labour for thyself, Nor bid me help thee: bear, as best flesh
may,
Pains I inflict not nor avail to cure:
Beg of me nothing thou thyself mayst win
By work, or waive with magnanimity, Since we are peers acknowledged, — scarcely peers,
Had I implanted any want of thine
Only my power could meet and gratify.'
No: rather hear, at man's indifference —
'Wherefore did I contrive for thee that ear Hungry for music, and direct thine eye To where I hold a seven-stringed instrument,
Unless I meant thee to beseech me play?'" Once I saw a chemist take a pinch of powder

— Simple dust it seemed — and half-unstop a phial:
— Out dropped harmless dew. "Mixed 50 nothings make" — quoth he — "Something!" So they did: a thunder-clap, but louder — Lightning-flash, but fiercer — put spectators' nerves to trial:
Sure enough, we learned what was, imagined what might be.

Had I no experience how a lip's mere tremble, Look's half hesitation, cheek's just change of colour,
These effect a heartquake, — how should I conceive What a heaven there may be? Let it but resemble Earth myself have known! No bliss that's finer, fuller, Only — bliss that lasts, they say, and fain would I believe.

CHERRIES.

"WHAT, I disturb thee at thy morning- 60
meal:
Cherries so ripe already? Eat apace!
I recollect thy lesson yesterday.
Yet — thanks, Sir, for thy leave to interrupt" . . .
"Friend, I have finished my repast, thank God!"

"There now, thy thanks for breaking fast on fruit! — Thanks being praise, or tantamount there-
to.
Prithee consider, have not things degree, Lofty and low? Are things not great and small,
Thence claiming praise and wonder more or less?
Shall we confuse them, with thy warrant too, 70
Whose doctrine otherwise begins and ends With just this precept 'Never faith enough In man as weakness, God as potency'?
When I would pay soul's tribute to that
same,
Why not look up in wonder, bid the stars
Attest my praise of the All-mighty One?
What are man's puny members and as
mean Requirements weighed with Star-King Mushtari?
There is the marvel!"

"Not to man — that's me.
List to what happened late, in fact or 80
dream.
A certain stranger, bound from far away,

Still the Shah's subject, found himself
before

Isfahan palace-gate. As duty bade, He enters in the courts, will, if he may,
See so much glory as befits a slave Who only comes, of mind to testify How great and good is shown our lord the Shah.

In he walks, round he casts his eye about, Looks up and down, admires to heart's
content,

Ascends the gallery, tries door and door,

10 None says his reverence nay: peeps in at
each,

Wonders at all the unimagined use, Gold here and jewels there, — so vast, that hall —

So perfect yon pavilion! — lamps above Bidding look up from luxuries below, — Evermore wonder topping wonder, —
last —

Sudden he comes upon a cosy nook,
A nest-like little chamber, with his name,
His own, yea, his and no mistake at all,
Plain o'er the entry: what, and he descries

20 Just those arrangements inside, — oh, the care! —

Suited to soul and body both, — so snug
The cushion — nay, the pipe-stand furnished so!

Whereat he cries aloud, — what think'st thou, Friend?

'That these my slippers should be just my
choice,

Even to the colour that I most affect,
Is nothing: ah, that lamp, the central sun,
What must it light within its minaret I scarce dare guess the good of! Who lives there?

That let me wonder at, — no slipper-toys 30 Meant for the foot, forsooth, which kicks them — thus!

"Never enough faith in omnipotence, — Never too much, by parity, of faith In impuissance, man's — which turns to
strength

When once acknowledged weakness every
way.

How? Hear the teaching of another tale.

"Two men once owed the Shah a mighty
sum,

Beggars they both were: this one crossed his arms

And bowed his head, — 'whereof,' — sighed he — 'each hair

Proved it a jewel: how the host's amount

40 Were idly strewed for payment at thy feet!

'Lord, here they lie, my havings poor and scant!

All of the berries on my currant-bush, What roots of garlic have escaped the
mice,

And some five pippins from the seedling
tree, —

Would they were half-a-dozen! anyho Accept my all, poor beggar that I am!

'Received in full of all demands!' smil
back

The apportioner of every lot of ground
From inch to acre. Littleness of love Befits the littleness of loving thing.

What if he boasted 'Seeing I am great Great must my corresponding tribute be Mushtari, — well, suppose him seven tim seven

The sun's superior, proved so by son
sage:

Am I that sage? To me his twinkle bl Is all I know of him and thank him for,

And therefore I have put the same
verse —

'Like yon blue twinkle, twink's thine ey
my Love!'

"Neither shalt thou be troubled overmuc Because thy offering, — littleness itself, —
Is lessened by admixture sad and strang Of mere man's-motives, — praise wi fear, and love

With looking after that same love's rewar Alas, Friend, what was free from th
alloy, —

Some smatch thereof, — in best and pure
love

Proffered thy earthly father? Dust the art,

Dust shalt be to the end. Thy father too The dust, and kindly called the handful -
gold,

Nor cared to count what sparkled here ar
there,

Sagely unanalytic. Thank, praise, love (Sum up thus) for the lowest favours fir
The commonest of comforts! aught besid Very omnipotence had overlooked

Such needs, arranging for thy little life.
Nor waste thy power of love in wonde
ment

At what thou wiselier lettest shine unsoile By breath of word. That this last chem soothes

A roughness of my palate, that I know:
His Maker knows why Mushtari wa
made."

Verse-making was least of my virtues:
viewed with despair

Wealth that never yet was but might be - all that verse-making were

If the life would but lengthen to wish, l the mind be laid bare.

So I said "To do little is bad, to do nothin is worse" — And made verse.

Love-making, — how simple a matter
No depths to explore,

No heights in a life to ascend! No disheartening Before, No affrighting Hereafter, — love now will be love evermore.
So I felt "To keep silence were folly:" — all language above, I made love.

PLOT-CULTURE.

"Ay, but, Ferishtah," — a disciple smirked, —
"That verse of thine 'How twink's thine eye, my Love, Blue as yon star-beam!' much arrides
myself
Who haply may obtain a kiss therewith This eve from Laila where the palms abound —
My youth, my warrant — so the palms be
close!
Suppose when thou art earnest in dis-
course Concerning high and holy things, —
abrupt
I out with — 'Laila's lip, how honey-
sweet!' —
What say'st thou, were it scandalous or no?
I feel thy shoe sent flying at my mouth
For daring — prodigy of impudence — Publish what, secret, were permissible.
Well, — one slide further in the imagined slough, — Knee-deep therein, (respect thy reverence!) —
Suppose me well aware thy very self Stooped prying through the palm-screen, while I dared Solace me with caressings all the same?
Uniterable, nay — unthinkable, Undreamable a deed of shame! Alack, How will it fare shouldst thou impress on
me
That certainly an Eye is over all And each, to mark the minute's deed, word, thought,
As worthy of reward or punishment?
Shall I permit my sense an Eye-viewed
shame,
Broad daylight perpetration, — so to
speak, —
I had not dared to breathe within the Ear, With black night's help about me? Yet I
stand
A man, no monster, made of flesh not cloud:
Why made so, if my making prove offence
To Maker's eye and ear?"

"Thou wouldst not stand Distinctly Man," — Ferishtah made reply,
"Not the mere creature, — did no limit-
line

Round thee about, apportion thee thy
place
Clean-cut from out and off the illimitable, — Minuteness severed from immensity.
All of thee for the Maker, — for thyself, 46 Workings inside the circle that evolve Thine all, — the product of thy cultured plot.
So much of grain the ground's lord bids thee yield Bring sacks to granary in Autumn! spare Daily intelligence of this manure, That compost, how they tend to feed the soil:
There thou art master sole and absolute — Only, remember doomsday! Twitt'rs thou me Because I turn away my outraged nose Shouldst thou obtrude thereon a shovelful 50
Of fertilising kisses? Since thy sire Wills and obtains thy marriage with the maid,
Enough! Be reticent, I counsel thee, Nor venture to acquaint him, point by
point,
What he procures thee. Is he so obtuse?
Keep thy instruction to thyself! My ass —
Only from him expect acknowledgment
The while he champs my gift, a thistle-bunch,
How much he loves the largess: of his love
I only tolerate so much as tells 60
By wrinkling nose and inarticulate grunt, The meal, that heartens him to do my
work, Tickles his palate as I meant it should."

Not with my Soul, Love! — bid no Soul
like mine
Lap thee around nor leave the poor Sense room!
Soul, — travel-worn, toil-weary, — would confine Along with Soul, Soul's gains from glow and gloom,
Captures from soarings high and divings
deep.
Spoil-laden Soul, how should such memories sleep?
Take Sense, too — let me love entire and 70
whole —
Not with my Soul!

Eyes shall meet eyes and find no eyes between,
Lips feed on lips, no other lips to fear!
No past, no future — so thine arms but screen
The present from surprise! not there,
'tis here —
Not then, 'tis now: — back, memories that intrude!

Make, Love, the universe our solitude,
And, over all the rest, oblivion roll — Sense quenching Soul!

A PILLAR AT SEBZEVAR.

"KNOWLEDGE deposed, then!" — groaned whom that most grieved As foolishlest of all the company.
"What, knowledge, man's distinctive attribute,
He doffs that crown to emulate an ass
Because the unknowing long-ears loves at least Husked lupines, and belike the feeder's self — Whose purpose in the dole what ass divines?"

- 10 "Friend," quoth Ferishtah, "all I seem to know Is — I know nothing save that love I can Boundlessly, endlessly. My curls were crowned In youth with knowledge, — off, alas, crown slipped Next moment, pushed by better knowledge still Which nowise proved more constant: gain, to-day, Was toppling loss to-morrow, lay at last — Knowledge, the golden? — lacquered ignorance!
As gain — mistrust it! Not as means to gain:
Lacquer we learn by: cast in fining-pot, 20 We learn, — when what seemed ore assayed proves dross, — Surelier true gold's worth, guess how purity
I' the lode were precious could one light on ore Clarified up to test of crucible.
The prize is in the process: knowledge means Ever-renewed assurance by defeat
That victory is somehow still to reach,
But love is victory, the prize itself:
Love — trust to! Be rewarded for the trust In trust's mere act. In love success is sure, 30 Attainment — no delusion, whatsoe'er
The prize be: apprehended as a prize,
A prize it is. Thy child as surely grasps An orange as he fails to grasp the sun Assumed his capture. What if soon he finds The foolish fruit unworthy grasping?
Joy
In shape and colour, — that was joy as true — Worthy in its degree of love — as grasp Of sun were, which had singed his hand beside.

What if he said the orange held no juice
Since it was not that sun he hoped to suck?
This constitutes the curse that spoils our life
And sets man maundering of his misery,
That there's no meanest atom he obtains Of what he counts for knowledge but he cries
'Hold here, — I have the whole thing, — know, this time, Nor need search farther!' Whereas, strew his path With pleasures, and he scorns them while he stoops:
'This fitly call'st thou pleasure, pick up this And praise it, truly? I reserve my thanks For something more substantial.' Fool not thus In practising with life and its delights!
Enjoy the present gift, nor wait to know The unknowable. Enough to say 'I feel Love's sure effect, and, being loved, must love
The love its cause behind, — I can and do!' Nor try to turn thy brain-power on the fact, (Apart from as it strikes thee, here and now — Its how and why; i' the future and elsewhere)
Except to — yet once more, and ever again, Confirm thee in thy utter ignorance:
Assured that, whatsoe'er the quality Of love's cause, save that love was caused thereby,
This — nigh upon revelation as it seemed A minute since — defies thy longing looks, Withdrawn into the unknowable once more.
Wholly distrust thy knowledge, then, and trust
As wholly love allied to ignorance!
There lies thy truth and safety. Love is praise,
And praise is love! Refine the same, contrive An intellectual tribute — ignorance Appreciating ere approbative Of knowledge that is infinite? With us
The small, who use the knowledge of our kind Greater than we, more wisely ignorance Restricts its apprehension, sees and knows No more than brain accepts in faith of sight, Takes first what comes first, only sure so far.
By Sebzevar a certain pillar stands
So aptly that its gnomon tells the hour;
What if the townsmen said 'Before we thank Who placed it, for his serviceable craft,

And go to dinner since its shade tells noon,
Needs must we have the craftsman's purpose clear On half a hundred more recondite points
Than a mere summons to a vulgar meal!
Better they say 'How opportune the help!
Be loved and praised, thou kindly-hearted sage Whom Hudhud taught, — the gracious spirit-bird, —
How to construct the pillar, teach the time!
So let us say — not 'Since we know, we love,'
But rather 'Since we love, we know enough.'
Perhaps the pillar by a spell controlled Mushtari in his courses? Added grace Surely I count it that the sage devised, Beside celestial service, ministry
To all the land, by one sharp shade at noon Falling as folk foresee. Once more then,
Friend —
(What ever in those careless ears of thine Withal I needs must round thee) — knowledge doubt Even wherein it seems demonstrable!
Love, — in the claim for love, that's gratitude For apprehended pleasure, nowise doubt!
Pay its due tribute, — sure that pleasure is,
While knowledge may be, at the most.
See, now!
Eating my breakfast, I thanked God. —
'For love
Shown in the cherries' flavour? Consecrate So petty an example?' There's the fault!
We circumscribe omnipotence. Search sand To unearh water: if first handful scooped Yields thee a draught, what need of digging-down Full fifty fathoms deep to find a spring Whereof the pulse might deluge half the land?
Drain the sufficient drop, and praise what checks
The drouth that glues thy tongue, — what more would help A brimful cistern? Ask the cistern's boon When thou wouldst solace camels: in thy case, Relish the drop and love the loveable!"

"And what may be unloveable?"

"Why, hate!
If out of sand comes sand and nought but sand Affect not to be quaffing at mirage, Nor nickname pain as pleasure. That, be-like,

Constitutes just the trial of thy wit
And worthiness to gain promotion, — hence, Proves the true purpose of thine actual life.
Thy soul's environment of things perceived,
Things visible and things invisible, Fact, fancy — all was purposed to evolve
This and this only — was thy wit of worth To recognise the drop's use, love the same,
And loyally declare against mirage Though all the world asseverated dust 50
Was good to drink? Say, 'what made moist my lip, That I acknowledged moisture:' thou art saved!

"For why? The creature and creator stand Rightly related so. Consider well!
Were knowledge all thy faculty, then God Must be ignored: love gains him by first leap.
Frankly accept the creatureship: ask good To love for: press bold to the tether's end Allotted to this life's intelligence!
'So we offend?' Will it offend thyself 60
If, — impuissance praying potency, — Thy child beseech that thou command the sun Rise bright to-morrow — thou, he thinks supreme In power and goodness, why shouldst thou refuse?
Afterward, when the child matures, perchance
The fault were greater if, with wit full-grown,
The stripling dared to ask for a dinar, Than that the boy cried 'Pluck Sitara'¹
down
And give her me to play with!' 'Tis for him
To have no bounds to his belief in thee: 70
For thee it also is to let her shine Lustrous and lonely, so best serving him!"

Ask not one least word of praise!
Words declare your eyes are bright?
What then meant that summer day's Silence spent in one long gaze?
Was my silence wrong or right?

Words of praise were all to seek!
Face of you and form of you,
Did they find the praise so weak 80
When my lips just touched your cheek—Touch which let my soul come through?

A BEAN-STRIPE: ALSO, APPLE-EATING.

"Look, I strew beans" . . .

(Ferishtah, we premise, Strove this way with a scholar's cavilment Who put the peevisish question: "Sir, be frank!
A good thing or a bad thing — Life is
which?
Shine and shade, happiness and misery Battle it out there: which force beats, I ask?
If I pick beans from out a bushelful — This one, this other, — then demand of
thee
What colour names each justly in the main, — 10 'Black' I expect, and 'White' ensues
reply:
No hesitation for what speck, spot, splash
Of either colour's opposite, intrudes To modify thy judgment. Well, for beans Substitute days, — show, ranged in order,
Life —
Then, tell me its true colour! Time is short,
Life's days compose a span, — as brief be
speech!
Black I pronounce for, like the Indian
Sage, —
Black — present, past and future, interspersed
With blanks, no doubt, which simple folk style Good 20 Because not Evil: no, indeed? Forsooth Black's shade on White is White too!
What's the worst Of Evil but that, past, it overshades
The else-exempted present? — memory, We call the plague! 'Nay, but our memory fades
And leaves the past unsullied!' Does it
so?
Why, straight the purpose of such breathing-space,
Such respite from past ill, grows plain
enough!
What follows on remembrance of the past?
Fear of the future! Life, from birth to
death, 30 Means — either looking back on harm escaped,
Or looking forward to that harm's return With tenfold power of harming. Black, not White,
Never the whole consummate quietude Life should be, troubled by no fear! — nor
hope —
I'll say, since lamplight dies in noontide,
hope

Loses itself in certainty. Such lot Man's might have been: I leave the consequence
To bolder critics of the Primal Cause; Such am not I: but, man — as man I
speak:
Black is the bean-throw: evil is the Life!")
"Look, I strew beans" — resumed Ferish-tah — "beans Blackish and whitish; what they figure
forth Shall be man's sum of moments, bad and
good,
That make up Life, — each moment when he feels Pleasure or pain, his poorest fact of sense, Consciousness anyhow: there's stand the
first;
Whence next advance shall be from points to line, Singulars to a series, parts to whole, And moments to the Life. How look they
now, Viewed in the large, those little joys and griefs Ranged duly all a-row at last, like beans — These which I strew? This bean was white, this — black,
Set by itself, — but see if, good and bad
Each following either in companionship, Black have not grown less black and white less white,
Till blackish seems but dun, and whitish —
grey,
And the whole line turns — well, or black
to thee
Or white belike to me — no matter which:
The main result is — both are modified According to our eye's scope, power of
range Before and after. Black dost call this bean?
What, with a whiteness in its wake, which
— see — Suffuses half its neighbour? — and, in
turn,
Lowers its pearliness late absolute, Frowned upon by the jet which follows
hard — Else wholly white my bean were. Choose a joy!
Bettered it was by sorrow gone before,
And sobered somewhat by the shadowy
sense
Of sorrow which came after or might come.
Joy, sorrow, — by precedence, subse-
quence —
Either on each, make fusion, mix in Life That's both and neither wholly: grey or dun?
Dun thou decidest? grey prevails, say I: Wherefore? Because my view is wide
enough,

- Reaches from first to last nor winks at all:
Motion achieves it: stop short — fast we stick, — Probably at the bean that's blackest.
- “Since —
Son, trust me, — this I know and only this — I am in motion, and all things beside That circle round my passage through their midst, — Motionless, these are, as regarding me:
— Which means, myself I solely recognise.
They too may recognise themselves, not me,
For aught I know or care: but plain they serve This, if no other purpose — stuff to try And test my power upon of raying light
And lending hue to all things as I go Moonlike through vapour. Mark the flying orb!
Think'st thou the halo, painted still afresh
At each new cloud-fleece pierced and passed through,
This was and is and will be evermore Coloured in permanence? The glory swims Girdling the glory-river, swallowed straight By night's abysmal gloom, unglorified Behind as erst before the advancer: gloom?
Faced by the onward-faring, see, succeeds
From the abandoned heaven a next surprise,
And where's the gloom now? — silver-smitten straight,
One glow and variegation! So with me,
Who move and make, — myself, — the black, the white,
The good, the bad, of life's environment.
Stand still! black stays black: start again! there's white Asserts supremacy: the motion's all That colours me my moment: seen as joy?
I have escaped from sorrow, or that was Or might have been: as sorrow? — thence shall be Escape as certain: white preceded black,
Black shall give way to white as duly, — so,
Deepest in black means white most imminent.
Stand still, — have no before, no after! — life Proves death, existence grows impossible To man like me. 'What else is blessed sleep But death, then?' Why, a rapture of release From toil, — that's sleep's approach: as certainly,
- The end of sleep means, toil is triumphed o'er:
These round the blank unconsciousness between Brightness and brightness, either pushed to blaze
Just through that blank's interposition.
Hence
The use of things external: man — that's I — Practise thereon my power of casting light,
And calling substance, — when the light I cast Breaks into colour, — by its proper name
— A truth and yet a falsity: black, white, Names each bean taken from what lay so close
And threw such tint: pain might mean pain indeed Seen in the passage past it, — pleasure prove No mere delusion while I paused to look, — Though what an idle fancy was that fear Which overhung and hindered pleasure's hue!
While how, again, pain's shade enhanced the shine Of pleasure, else no pleasure! Such effects Came of such causes. Passage at an end, — Past, present, future pains and pleasures fused
So that one glance may gather blacks and whites Into a life-time, — like my bean-streak there, Why, white they whirl into, not black — for me!”
- “Ay, but for me? The indubitable blacks, Immeasurable miseries, here, there And everywhere i' the world — world outside thine Paled off so opportunely, — body's plague, Torment of soul, — where's found thy fellowship With wide humanity all round about Reeling beneath its burden? What's despair?
Behold that man, that woman, child — 70 nay, brute!
Will any speck of white unblacken life Splashed, splotched, dyed hell-deep now from end to end
For him or her or it — who knows? Not I!”
- “Nor I, Ser.: 'It' shall stand for bird, beast, fish,
Reptile, and insect even: take the last!
There's the palm-aphis, minute miracle
As wondrous every whit as thou or I: Well, and his world's the palm-front there he's born,

Lives, breeds and dies in that circumference,
 An inch of green for cradle, pasture-ground, Purlieu and grave: the palm's use, ask of him!
 'To furnish these,' replies his wit: ask thine —
 Who see the heaven above, the earth below, Creation everywhere, — these, each and all Claim certain recognition from the tree
 For special service rendered branch and bole, Top-tuft and tap-root: — for thyself, thus seen, 10 Palms furnish dates to eat, and leaves to shade, — Maybe, thatch huts with, — have another use Than strikes the aphid. So with me, my Son!
 I know my own appointed patch i' the world,
 What pleasures me or pains there: all outside —
 How he, she, it, and even thou, Son, live, Are pleased or pained, is past conjecture, once I pry beneath the semblance, — all that's fit,
 To practise with, — reach where the fact may lie Fathom-deep lower. There's the first and last 20 Of my philosophy. Blacks blur thy white?
 Not mine! The aphid feeds, nor finds his leaf Untenable because a lance-thrust, nay, Lightning strikes sere a moss-patch close beside,
 Where certain other aphids live and love.
 Restriction to his single inch of white,
 That's law for him, the aphid: but for me,
 The man, the larger-souled, beside my stretch Of blacks and whites, I see a world of woe
 All round about me: one such burst of black 30 Intolerable o'er the life I count White in the main, and, yea — white's faintest trace Were clean abolished once and evermore.
 Thus fare my fellows, swallowed up in gloom
 So far as I discern: how far is that?
 God's care be God's! 'Tis mine — to boast no joy Unobeyed by such sorrows of my kind As sully with their shade my life that shines."
 "Reflected possibilities of pain,

Forsooth, just chasten pleasure! Pain itself, — Fact and not fancy, does not this affect The general colour?"

"Here and there a touch Taught me, betimes, the artifice of things —
 That all about, external to myself,
 Was meant to be suspected, — not revealed Demonstrably a cheat, — but half seen through,
 Lest white should rule unchecked along the line:
 Therefore white may not triumph. All the same,
 Of absolute and irretrievable
 And all-subduing black, — black's soul of black Beyond white's power to disintensify, — Of that I saw no sample: such may wreck
 My life and ruin my philosophy
 To-morrow, doubtless: hence the constant shade Cast on life's shine, — the tremor that intrudes When firmest seems my faith in white.
 Dost ask
 'Who is Ferishtah, hitherto exempt From black experience? Why, if God be just,
 Were sundry fellow-mortals singled out To undergo experience for his sake,
 Just that the gift of pain, bestowed on them,
 In him might temper to the due degree Joy's else-excessive largess?' Why, indeed!
 Back are we brought thus to the starting-point — Man's impotency, God's omnipotence, These stop my answer. Aphid that I am, How leave my inch-allotment, pass at will Into my fellow's liberty of range, Enter into his sense of black and white,
 As either, seen by me from outside, seems Predominatingly the colour? Life, Lived by my fellow, shall I pass into And myself live there? No — no more than pass From Persia, where in sun since birth I bask Daily, to some ungracious land afar, Told of by travellers, where the might of snow Smothers up day, and fluids lose themselves Frozen to marble. How I bear the sun, Beat though he may unduly, that I know:
 How blood once curdled ever creeps again Baffles conjecture: yet since people live Somehow, resist a clime would conquer me.

Somehow provided for their sake must dawn Compensative resource. 'No sun, no grapes, —
 Then, no subsistence!' — were it wisely
 said?
 Or this well-reasoned — 'Do I dare feel warmth
 And please my palate here with Persia's
 vine,
 Though, over-mounts, — to trust the traveller, —
 Snow, feather thick, is falling while I
 feast?
 What if the cruel winter force his way Here also?' Son, the wise reply were
 this:
 When cold from over-mounts spikes
 through and through Blood, bone and marrow of Ferishtah, —
 then,
 Time to look out for shelter — time, at
 least,
 To wring the hands and cry 'No shelter serves!'
 Shelter, of some sort, no experienced chill Warrants that I despair to find."

"No less,
 Doctors have differed here; thou say'st thy say;
 Another man's experience masters thine,
 That controverted by the sourly-Sage,
 The Indian witness who, with faculty Fine as Ferishtah's, found no white at all Chequer the world's predominating black,
 No good oust evil from supremacy,
 So that Life's best was that it led to death.
 How of his testimony?"

"Son, suppose My camel told me: 'Threescore days and ten
 I traversed hill and dale, yet never found Food to stop hunger, drink to stay my drouth;
 Yet, here I stand alive, which take in proof That to survive was found impossible!' Nay, rather take thou, non-surviving
 beast'
 (Reply were prompt), 'on flank this thwack of staff
 Nowise affecting flesh that's dead and dry!
 Thou wincest? Take correction twice, amend Next time thy nomenclature! Call white — white!' The sourly-Sage, for whom life's best was
 death,
 Lived out his seventy years, looked hale, laughed loud,
 Liked — above all — his dinner, — lied,
 in short."

"Lied is a rough phrase: say he fell from
 truth
 In climbing towards it! — sure less faulty
 so Than had he sat him down and stayed 40
 content
 With thy safe orthodoxy, 'White, all
 white,
 White everywhere for certain I should see Did I but understand how white is black, As clearer sense than mine would.'
 Clearer sense, — Whose may that be? Mere human eyes I
 boast,
 And such distinguish colours in the main,
 However any tongue, that's human too, Please to report the matter. Dost thou
 blame
 A soul that strives but to see plain, speak
 true,
 Truth at all hazards? Oh, this false for 50
 real,
 This emptiness which feigns solidity, — Ever some grey that's white, and dun that's black, —
 When shall we rest upon the thing itself Not on its semblance? — Soul — too weak, forsooth,
 To cope with fact — wants fiction every-
 where!
 Mine tires of falsehood: truth at any cost!"

"Take one and try conclusions — this,
 suppose!
 God is all-good, all-wise, all-powerful:
 truth?
 Take it and rest there. What is man?
 Not God:
 None of these absolutes therefore, — yet 60
 himself,
 A creature with a creature's qualities.
 Make them agree, these two conceptions!
 Each
 Abolishes the other. Is man weak, Foolish and bad? He must be Ahriman, Co-equal with an Ormuzd, Bad with
 Good,
 Or else a thing made at the Prime Sole
 Will,
 Doing a maker's pleasure — with results Which — call, the wide world over, 'what must be' —
 But, from man's point of view, and only
 point
 Possible to his powers, call — evidence 70
 Of goodness, wisdom, strength? we mock ourselves
 In all that's best of us, — man's blind but
 sure
 Craving for these in very deed not word, Reality and not illusion. Well, — Since these nowhere exist — nor there where cause

Must have effect, nor here where craving
means Craving unfulfilled by fit consequence And full supply, aye sought for, never
found — These — what are they but man's own rule of right?
A scheme of goodness recognised by man, Although by man unrealisable, — Not God's with whom to will were to perform: Nowise performed here, therefore never willed.
What follows but that God, who could the
best,
-c Has willed the worst, — while man, with power to match
Will with performance, were deservedly Hailed the supreme — provided . . .
here's the touch
That breaks the bubble . . . this concept of man's Were man's own work, his birth of heart and brain,
His native grace, no alien gift at all.
The bubble breaks here. Will of man create?
No more than this my hand which strewed the beans
Produced them also from its finger-tips.
Back goes creation to its source, source prime 20 And ultimate, the single and the sole.”

“How reconcile discordancy, — unite Notion and notion — God that only can Yet does not, — man that would indeed
But just as surely cannot, — both in one?
What help occurs to thy intelligence?”

“Ah, the beans, — or, — example better
yet, —
A carpet-web I saw once leave the loom
And lie at gorgeous length in Ispahan!
The weaver plied his work with lengths of silk 30 Dyed each to match some jewel as it might,
And wove them, this by that. ‘How comes it, friend,’ — (Quoth I) — ‘that while, apart, this fiery hue,
That watery dimness, either shocks the
eye,
So blinding bright, or else offends again By dulness, — yet the two, set each by
each,
Somehow produce a colour born of both,
A medium profitable to the sight?’
‘Such medium is the end whereto I aim,’ — Answered my craftsman: ‘there's no single tinct 40 Would satisfy the eye's desire to taste
The secret of the diamond: join extremes,

Results a serviceable medium-ghost,
The diamond's simulation. Even so I needs must blend the quality of man With quality of God, and so assist Mere human sight to understand my Life, What is, what should be, — understand
thereby Wherefore I hate the first and love the
last, —
Understand why things so present themselves
To me, placed here to prove I understand.
Thus, from beginning runs the chain to
end,
And binds me plain enough. By consequence,
I bade thee tolerate, — not kick and cuff
The man who held that natures did in
fact Blend so, since so thyself must have them blend
In fancy, if it take a flight so far.”

“A power, confessed past knowledge, nay, past thought,
— Thus thought thus known!”

“To know of, think about —
Is all man's sum of faculty effects
When exercised on earth's least atom, Son!
What was, what is, what may such atom
be?
No answer! Still, what seems it to man's
sense?
An atom with some certain properties Known about, thought of as occasion
needs,
— Man's — but occasions of the universe?
Unthinkable, unknowable to man.
Yet, since to think and know fire through and through Exceeds man, is the warmth of fire unknown,
Its uses — are they so unthinkable?
Pass from such obvious power to powers unseen, Undreamed of save in their sure consequence:
Take that, we spoke of late, which draws
to ground
The staff my hand lets fall: it draws, at
least —
Thus much man thinks and knows, if nothing more.”

“Ay, but man puts no mind into such
power!
He neither thanks it, when an apple drops, Nor prays it spare his pate while under-
neath.
Does he thank Summer though it plumped the rind?
Why thank the other force — whate'er its
name —

Which gave him teeth to bite and tongue to taste
And throat to let the pulp pass? Force and force, No end of forces! Have they mind like
man?"

"Suppose thou visit our lord Shalim-Shah, Bringing thy tribute as appointed. 'Here Come I to pay my due!' Whereat one
slave

Obeisquous spreads a carpet for thy foot,
His fellow offers sweetmeats, while a third Prepares a pipe: what thanks or praise have they?

o Such as befit prompt service. Gratitude Goes past them to the Shah whose gracious nod

Set all the sweet civility at work;
But for his ordinance, I much suspect,
My scholar had been left to cool his heels Uncarpeted, or warm them—likelier still—With bastinado for intrusion. Slaves Needs must obey their master: 'force and
force,

No end of forces,' act as bids some force Supreme o'er all and each: where find that
one?

20 How recognise him? Simply as thou didst

The Shah,—by reasoning 'Since I feel a
debt,

Behoves me pay the same to one aware
I have my duty, he his privilege.'

Didst thou expect the slave who charged thy pipe

Would serve as well to take thy tribute-bag
And save thee further trouble?"

"Be it so!

The sense within me that I owe a debt Assures me — somewhere must be somebody

Ready to take his due. All comes to this—

30 Where due is, there acceptance follows:
find

Him who accepts the due! and why look
far?

Behold thy kindred compass thee about!
Ere thou wast born and after thou shalt
die,

Heroic man stands forth as Shahan-Shah.
Rustem and Gew, Gudarz and all the rest, How come they short of lordship that's to seek

Dead worthies! but men live undoubtedly Gifted as Sindokht, sage Sulayman's
match,

Valiant like Kawah: ay, and while earth
lasts

40 Such heroes shall abound there — all for
thee

Who profitest by all the present, past,
And future operation of thy race.

Why, then, o'erburdened with a debt of
thanks,

Look wistful for some hand from out the clouds

To take it, when, all round, a multitude Would ease thee in a trice?"

"Such tendered thanks

Would tumble back to who craved riddance, Son!

— Who but my sorry self? See! stars are out —

Stars which, unconscious of thy gaze be-
neath,

Go glorying, and glorify thee too 50

— Those Seven Thrones, Zurah's beauty, weird Parwin!

Whether shall love and praise to stars be paid

Or — say — some Mubid who, for good
to thee

Blind at thy birth, by magic all his own Opened thine eyes, and gave the sightless

sight,
Let the stars' glory enter? Say his charm

Worked while thyself lay sleeping: as he went

Thou wakedst: 'What a novel sense have
I!

Whom shall I love and praise?' 'The stars, each orb

Thou standest rapt beneath,' proposes 60
one:

'Do not they live their life, and please
themselves,

And so please thee? What more is requisite?'

Make thou this answer: 'If indeed no mage

Opened my eyes and worked a miracle, Then let the stars thank me who apprehend

That such an one is white, such other blue!
But for my apprehension both were blank.

Cannot I close my eyes and bid my brain Make whites and blues, conceive without stars' help,

New qualities of colour? were my sight 70

Lost or misleading, would yon red — I
judge

A ruby's benefaction — stand for aught But green from vulgar glass? Myself ap-
praise

Lustre and lustre; should I overlook Fomalhaut and declare some fen-fire king,

Who shall correct me, lend me eyes he trusts

No more than I trust mine? My mage for
me!

I never saw him: if he never was,
I am the arbitrator! No, my Son!

Let us sink down to thy similitude: 80

I eat my apple, relish what is ripe —
The sunny side, admire its rarity

Since half the tribe is wrinkled, and the
rest

Hide commonly a maggot in the core, — And down Zerdusht goes with due smack of lips:

But — thank an apple? He who made my mouth

To masticate, my palate to approve,
My maw to further the concoction — Him I thank, — but for whose work, the orchard's wealth

Might prove so many gall-nuts — stocks or stones

For aught that I should think, or know, or care."

10 "Why from the world," Ferishtah smiled,
"should thanks

Go to this work of mine? If worthy
praise,

Praised let it be and welcome: as verse ranks,

So rate my verse: if good therein outweighs

Aught faulty judged, judge justly!
Justice says:

Be just to fact, or blaming or approving:
But — generous? No, nor loving!

"Loving! what claim to love has work of
mine?

Concede my life were emptied of its gains

To furnish forth and fill work's strict confide,

20 Who works so for the world's sake — he complains

With cause when hate, not love, rewards his pains.

I looked beyond the world for truth and beauty:

Sought, found and did my duty."

EPILOGUE.

OH, Love — no, Love! All the noise below, Love,

Groanings all and moanings — none of Life I lose!

All of Life's a cry just of weariness and woe, Love —

"Hear at least, thou happy one!" How can I, Love, but choose?

Only, when I do hear, sudden circle round
me

— Much as when the moon's might frees a space from cloud —

Iridescent splendours: gloom — would else confound me —

Barrièred off and banished far — bright-edged the blackest shroud!

Thronging through the cloud-rift, whose are they, the faces

Faint revealed yet sure divined, the famous ones of old?

"What" — they smile — "our names,
our deeds so soon erases

Time upon his tablet where Life's glory lies enrolled?

"Was it for mere fool's-play, make-believe and mumming,

So we battled it like men, not boylike sulked or whined?

Each of us heard clang God's 'Come!'
and each was coming:

Soldiers all, to forward-face, not sneaks to lag behind!

"How of the field's fortune? That concerned our Leader!

Led, we struck our stroke nor cared for doings left and right:

Each as on his sole head, failer or succeeder,

Lay the blame or lit the praise: no care for cowards: fight!"

Then the cloud-rift broadens, spanning earth that's under,

Wide our world displays its worth man's strife and strife's success:

All the good and beauty, wonder crowning wonder,

Till my heart and soul applaud perfection, nothing less.

Only, at heart's utmost joy and triumph, terror

Sudden turns the blood to ice: a chill wind disencharms

All the late enchantment! What if all be error —

If the halo irised round my head were,
Love, thine arms?

INTRODUCED BY

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN APOLLO AND THE FATES; CONCLUDED BY

ANOTHER BETWEEN JOHN FUST AND HIS FRIENDS.

1887.

IN MEMORIAM J. MILSAND, OBIT IV. SEPT. MDCCCLXXXVI.

Absens absentem auditque videtque.

APOLLO AND THE FATES.

A PROLOGUE.

(Hymn. in Mercurium, v. 559. Eumenides, vv. 693-4, 697-8. Alcestit, vv. 12, 33.)

APOLLO. [From above.]

FLAME at my footfall, Parnassus! Apollo, Breaking a-blaze on thy topmost peak, Burns thence, down to the depths — dread hollow —

Haunt of the Dire Ones. Haste! They wreak

Wrath on Admetus whose respite I seek.

THE FATES. [Below. Darkness.]

Dragonwise couched in the womb of our Mother,
Coiled at thy nourishing heart's core,
Night!

Dominant Dreads, we, one by the other,
Deal to each mortal his dole of light
On earth — the upper, the glad, the bright.

CLOTHO.

Even so: thus from my loaded spindle Plucking a pinch of the fleece, lo,
"Birth"

Brays from my bronze lip: life I kindle:
Look, 'tis a man! go, measure on
earth

The minute thy portion, whatever its worth!

LACHESIS.

Woe-purged, weal-prankt, — if it speed, if it linger, —

Life's substance and show are determined by me,

Who, meting out, mixing with sure thumb and finger,

Lead life the due length: is all smoothness and glee,

All tangle and grief? Take the lot, my ~~so~~ decree!

ATROPOS.

— Which I make an end of: the smooth as the tangled

My shears cut asunder: each snap shrieks "One more

Mortal makes sport for us Moirai who dangled

The puppet grotesquely tilt earth's solid floor

Proved firm he fell through, lost in Nought as before."

CLOTHO.

I spin thee a thread. Live, Admetus!
Produce him!

LACHESIS.

Go, — brave, wise, good, happy! Now chequer the thread!

He is slaved for, yet loved by a god. I unloose him

A goddess-sent plague. He has conquered, is wed,

Men crown him, he stands at the height, — ~~30~~

ATROPOS.

He is . . .

APOLLO: [Entering: Light.
"Dead?"

Nay, swart spinsters! So I surprise you Making and marring the fortunes of
Man?

Huddling — no marvel, your enemy eyes
you —

Head by head bat-like, blots under the ban

Of daylight earth's blessing since time
began!

THE FATES.

Back to thy blest earth, prying Apollo!

Shaft upon shaft transpierce with thy beams

Earth to the centre, — spare but this hollow

10 Hewn out of Night's heart, where our mystery seems

Mewed from day's malice: wake earth from her dreams!

APOLLO.

Crones, 'tis your dusk selves I startle from slumber:

Day's god deposes you — queens Night-
crowned!

— Plying your trade in a world ye en-cumber,

Fashioning Man's web of life — spun,
wound,

Left the length ye allot till a clip strews the
ground!

Behold I bid truce to your doleful amusement —

Annulled by a sunbeam!

THE FATES.

Boy, are not we peers?

APOLLO.

You with the spindle grant birth: whose inducement

20 But yours — with the niggardly digits — endears

To mankind chance and change, good and evil? Your shears . . .

ATROPOS.

Ay, mine end the conflict: so much is no fable.

We spin, draw to length, cut asunder:
what then?

So it was, and so is, and so shall be: art
able

To alter life's law for ephemeral men?

APOLLO.

Nor able nor willing. To threescore and ten

Extend but the years of Admetus! Disaster

O'ertook me, and, banished by Zeus, I became

A servant to one who forbore me though master:

True lovers were we. Discontinue your
game,

Let him live whom I loved, then hate on,
all the same!

THE FATES.

And what if we granted — law-flouter, use-trampler —

His life at the suit of an upstart?
Judge, thou —

Of joy were it fuller, of span because ampler?

For love's sake, not hate's, end Admetus
— ay, now —

Not a grey hair on head, nor a wrinkle on brow!

For, boy, 'tis illusion: from thee comes a glimmer

Transforming to beauty life blank at the
best.

Withdraw — and how looks life at worst, when to shimmer

Succeeds the sure shade, and Man's lot frowns — confessed

Mere blackness chance-brightened?
Whereof shall attest

The truth this same mortal, the darling thou stylest,

Whom love would advantage, — eke out, day by day,

A life which 'tis solely thyself reconcil-est

Thy friend to endure, — life with hope:
take away

Hope's gleam from Admetus, he spurns it.
For, say —

What's infancy? Ignorance, idleness, mischief:

Youth ripens to arrogance, foolishness,
greed:

Age — impotence, churlishness, rancour:
call this chief

Of boons for thy loved one? Much rather bid speed

Our function, let live whom thou hatest
indeed!

Persuade thee, bright boy-thing! Our eld be instructive!

APOLLO.

And certes youth owns the experience of age.

Ye hold then, grave seniors, my beams are productive

— They solely — of good that's mere semblance, engage Man's eye — gilding evil, Man's true heritage?

THE FATES.

So, even so! From without, — at due distance

If viewed, — set a-sparkle, reflecting thy rays, —

Life mimics the sun: but withdraw such assistance,

The counterfeit goes, the reality stays —

An ice-ball disguised as a fire-orb.

APOLLO.

What craze

Possesses the fool then whose fancy conceits him

As happy?

THE FATES.

Man happy?

APOLLO.

If otherwise — solve

This doubt which besets me! What friend ever greets him

Except with "Live long as the seasons revolve,"

Not "Death to thee straightway"?

Your doctrines absolve

Such hailing from hatred: yet Man should know best.

He talks it, and glibly, as life were a load

Man fain would be rid of: when put to the test,

He whines "Let it lie, leave me trudging the road

That is rugged so far, but methinks . . ."

THE FATES.

Ay, 'tis owed

To that glamour of thine, he bethinks him "Once past

The stony, some patch, nay, a smoothness of sward

Awaits my tired foot: life turns easy at last" —

Thy largess so lures him, he looks for reward

Of the labour and sorrow.

APOLLO.

It seems, then — debarred

Of illusion — (I needs must acknowledge the plea)

Man desponds and despairs. Yet, — still further to draw

Due profit from counsel, — suppose there should be

Some power in himself, some compensative law

By virtue of which, independently . . .

THE FATES.

Faugh!

Strength hid in the weakling!

30

What bowl-shape hast there,

Thus laughingly proffered? A gift to our shrine?

Thanks — worsted in argument! Not so? Declare

Its purpose!

APOLLO.

I proffer earth's product, not mine.

Taste, try, and approve Man's invention of — WINE!

THE FATES.

We feeding suck honeycombs.

APOLLO.

Sustenance meagre!

Such fare breeds the fumes that show all things amiss.

Quaff wine, — how the spirits rise nimble and eager,

Unscale the dim eyes! To Man's cup grant one kiss

Of your lip, then allow — no enchantment like this!

CLOTHO.

Unhook wings, unhood brows! Dost ⁴⁰ hearken?

LACHESIS.

I listen:

I see — smell the food these fond mortals prefer

To our feast, the bee's bounty!

ATROPOS.

The thing leaps! But — glisten

Its best, I withstand it — unless all concur

In adventure so novel.

APOLLO.

Ye drink?

THE FATES.

We demur.

APOLLO.

Sweet Trine, be indulgent nor scout the contrivance

Of Man — Bacchus-prompted! The juice, I uphold, Illuminates gloom without sunny connivance, Turns fear into hope and makes cowardice bold, — Touching all that is leadlike in life turns it gold!

THE FATES.

Faith foolish as false!

APOLLO.

But essay it, soft sisters!
 Then mock as ye may. Lift the chalice to lip!
 Good: thou next — and thou! Seems the web, to you twisters Of life's yarn, so worthless?

CLOTHO.

Who guessed that one sip
 Would impart such a lightness of limb?

LACHESIS.

I could skip

10 In a trice from the pied to the plain in my woof!

What parts each from either? A hair's breadth, no inch.

Once learn the right method of stepping
 aloof,

Though on black next foot falls, firm
 I fix it, nor flinch,

— Such my trust white succeeds!

ATROPOS.

One could live — at a pinch!

APOLLO.

What beldames? Earth's yield, by Man's skill, can effect

Such a cure of sick sense that ye spy the relation

Of evil to good? But drink deeper, correct

Bear sight more convincingly still!
 Take your station

Beside me, drain dregs! Now for edification!

20 Whose gift have ye gulped? Thank not me but my brother,

Blithe Bacchus, our youngest of god-ships. 'Twas he Found all boons to all men, by one god or other

Already conceded, so judged there
 must be

New guerdon to grace the new advent,
 you see!

Else how would a claim to Man's homage arise?

The plan lay arranged of his mixed woe and weal,

So disposed — such Zeus' will — with design to make wise

The witless — that false things were mingled with real,

Good with bad: such the lot whereto law set the seal.

Now, human of instinct — since Semele's
 son,

Yet minded divinely — since fathered
 by Zeus,

With nought Bacchus tampered, undid not things done,

Owned wisdom anterior, would spare wont and use,

Yet change — without shock to old rule — introduce.

Regard how your cavern from crag-tip to base

Frowns sheer, height and depth adamantine, one death!

I rouse with a beam the whole rampart, displace

No splinter — yet see how my flambeau, beneath

And above, bids this gem wink, that crystal unsheath!

Withdraw beam — disclosure once more Night forbids you

Of spangle and sparkle — Day's chance-gift, surmised

Rock's permanent birthright: my potency rids you

No longer of darkness, yet light — recognised —

Proves darkness a mask: day lives on though disguised.

If Bacchus by wine's aid avail so to fluster Your sense, that life's fact grows from adverse and thwart

To helpful and kindly Ly means of a cluster —

Mere hand-squeeze, earth's nature sublimed by Man's art —

Shall Bacchus claim thanks wherein Zeus has no part?

Zeus — wisdom anterior? No, maids, be admonished!

If morn's touch at base worked such wonders, much more

Had noontide in absolute glory astonished Your den, filled atop to o'erflowing.

I pour

No such mad confusion. 'Tis Man's to explore

Up and down, inch by inch, with the taper his reason:

No torch, it suffices — held deftly and
straight.

Eyes, purblind at first, feel their way in due season,

Accept good with bad, till unseemly debate

Turns concord — despair, acquiescence in fate.

Who works this but Zeus? Are not instinct and impulse,

Not concept and incept his work through Man's soul

On Man's sense? Just as wine ere it reach brain must brim pulse,

Zeus' flash stings the mind that speeds body to goal,

Bids pause at no part but press on, reach
the whole.

For petty and poor is the part ye envisage When — (quaff away, cummers!) — ye view, last and first,

As evil Man's earthly existence. Come!

Is age,

Is infancy — manhood — so uninter-spersed

With good — some faint sprinkle?

CLOTHO.

I'd speak if I durst.

APOLLO.

Draughts dregward loose tongue-tie.

LACHESIS.

I'd see, did no web

Set eyes somehow winking.

APOLLO.

Drains-deep lies their purge

— True collyrium!

ATROPOS.

Words, surging at high-tide, soon ebb
From starved ears.

APOLLO.

Drink but down to the source, they resurge.

Join hands! Yours and yours too!

A dance or a dirge?

CHORUS.

Quashed be our quarrel! Sourly and smilingly,

Bare and gowned, bleached limbs and browned,

Drive we a dance, three and one, reconcilingly,

Thanks to the cup where dissension is drowned,

Defeat proves triumphant and slavery
crowned.

Infancy? What if the rose-streak of morning

Pale and depart in a passion of tears?

Once to have hoped is no matter for scorn-
ing!

Love once — e'en love's disappointment endears!

A minute's success pays the failure of 34
years.

Manhood — the actual? Nay, praise the potential!

(Bound upon bound, foot it around!)

What is? No, what may be — sing!
that's Man's essential!

(Ramp, tramp, stamp and compound Fancy with fact — the lost secret is found!)

Age? Why, fear ends there: the contest concluded,

Man did live his life, did escape from the fray:

Not scratchless but unscathed, he somehow eluded

Each blow fortune dealt him, and conquers to-day:

To-morrow — new chance and fresh 40 strength, — might we say?

Laud then Man's life — no defeat but a triumph!

[Explosion from the earth's centre.

CLOTHO.

Ha, loose hands!

LACHESIS.

I reel in a swoond.

ATROPOS.

Horror yawns under me, while from on high — humph!

Lightnings astound, thunders resound, Vault-roof reverberates, groans the ground! [Silence.

APOLLO.

I acknowledge.

THE FATES.

Hence, trickster! Straight sobered are we!

The portent assures 'twas our tongue spoke the truth,

Not thine. While the vapour encompassed us three

We conceived and bore knowledge — a bantling uncouth,

Old brains shudder back from: so — take it, rash youth!

Lick the lump into shape till a cry comes!

APOLLO.

I hear.

THE FATES.

Dumb music, dead eloquence! Say it, or sing!

What was quickened in us and thee also?

APOLLO.

I fear.

THE FATES.

Half female, half male — go, ambiguous thing!

While we speak — perchance sputter — pick up what we fling!

Known yet ignored, nor divined nor un-
guessed,

10 Such is Man's law of life. Do we strive to declare

What is ill, what is good in our spinning?
Worst, best,

Change hues of a sudden: now here and now there

Flits the sign which decides: all about yet nowhere.

'Tis willed so, — that Man's life be lived, first to last,

Up and down, through and through, — not in portions, forsooth,

To pick and to choose from. Our shuttles fly fast,

Weave living, not life sole and whole:
as age — youth,

So death completes living, shows life in its
truth.

Man learningly lives: till death helps him
— no lore!

20 It is doom and must be. Dost submit?

APOLLO.

I assent —

Concede but Admetus! So much if no
more

Of my prayer grant as peace-pledge!
Be gracious though, blent,

Good and ill, love and hate streak your life-gift!

THE FATES.

Content!

Such boon we accord in due measure.
Life's term

We lengthen should any be moved for love's sake

To forego life's fulfilment, renounce in the germ

Fruit mature — bliss or woe — either infinite. Take

Or leave thy friend's lot: on his head be the stake!

APOLLO.

On mine, griesly gammers! Admetus, I know thee!

Thou prizest the right these unwittingly give

Thy subjects to rush, pay obedience they owe thee!

Importunate one with another they strive

For the glory to die that their king may survive.

Friends rush: and who first in all Phææ appears

But thy father to serve as thy substitute?

CLOTHO.

Bah!

APOLLO.

Ye wince? Then his mother, well-stricken in years,

Advances her claim — or his wife —

LACHESIS.

Tra-la-la!

APOLLO.

But he spurns the exchange, rather dies!

ATROPOS.

Ha, ha, ha!

[Apollo ascends. Darkness.]

WITH BERNARD DE MANDE- VILLE.

[For an account of this celebrated writer see "Dictionary of National Biography," vol. xxxvi. His famous paradox, "private vices public benefits," excited the utmost fury; and his best-known book, "The Fable of the Bees," was ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. It contains passages of great eloquence and unrivalled sarcasm, and is well worth reading.]

I.

Av, this same midnight, by this chair of
mine,

Come and review thy counsels: art thou
still

Staunch to their teaching? — not as fools opine

Its purport might be, but as subtler skill

Could, through turbidity, the loaded line Of logic casting, sound deep, deeper, till It touched a quietude and reached a shrine
And recognised harmoniously combine Evil with good, and hailed truth's triumph
— thine,
Sage dead long since, Bernard de Mandeville!

II.

Only, 'tis no fresh knowledge that I crave, Fuller truth yet, new gainings from the grave;
Here we alive must needs deal fairly, turn 10 To what account Man may Man's portion, learn Man's proper play with truth in part, before Entrusted with the whole. I ask no more Than smiling witness that I do my best With doubtful doctrine: afterward the rest!
So, silent face me while I think and speak!
A full disclosure? Such would outrage law.
Law deals the same with soul and body: seek Full truth my soul may, when some babe, I saw A new-born weakling, starts up strong — not weak — 20 Man every whit, absolved from earning awe, Pride, rapture, if the soul attains to wreak
Its will on flesh, at last can thrust, lift, draw,
As mind bids muscle — mind which long has striven, Painfully urging body's impotence
To effort whereby — once law's barrier riven, Life's rule abolished — body might dispense With infancy's probation, straight be given — Not by foiled darings, fond attempts back-driven, Fine faults of growth, brave sins which saint when shriven — 30 To stand full-statured in magnificence.

III.

No: as with body so deals law with soul
That's stung to strength through weakness, strives for good Through evil, — earth its race-ground, heaven its goal, Presumably: so far I understood Thy teaching long ago. But what means this — Objected by a mouth which yesterday Was magisterial in antithesis To half the truths we hold, or trust we may,

Though tremblingly the while? "No sign" — groaned he —
"No stirring of God's finger to denote 46
He wills that right should have supremacy On earth, not wrong! How helpful could we quote But one poor instance when he interposed Promptly and surely and beyond mistake Between oppression and its victim, closed Accounts with sin for once, and bade us wake
From our long dream that justice bears no sword, Or else forgets whereto its sharpness serves!
So might we safely mock at what unnerves Faith now, be spared the sapping fear's 50
increase
That haply evil's strife with good shall cease Never on earth. Nay, after earth, comes peace Born out of life-long battle? Man's lip curves With scorn: there, also, what if justice swerves From dealing doom, sets free by no swift stroke Right fettered here by wrong, but leaves life's yoke — Death should loose man from — fresh laid, past release?"

IV.

Bernard de Mandeville, confute for me
This parlous friend who captured or set free Thunderbolts at his pleasure, yet would 60 draw Back, panic-stricken by some puny straw Thy gold-rimmed amber-headed cane had whisked Out of his pathway if the object risked Encounter, 'scaped thy kick from buckled shoe!
As when folk heard thee in old days pooh-pooh Addison's tye-wig preachment, grant this friend — (Whose groan I hear, with guffaw at the end Disposing of mock-melancholy) — grant His bilious mood one potion, ministrant Of homely wisdom, healthy wit! For, 70 hear!
"With power and will, let preference appear By intervention ever and aye, help good When evil's mastery is understood In some plain outrage, and triumphant wrong Tramples weak right to nothingness: nay, long Ere such sad consummation brings despair

To right's adherents, ah, what help it were If wrong lay strangled in the birth — each
 head
 Of the hatched monster promptly crushed, instead
 Of spared to gather venom! We require No great experience that the inch-long
 worm,
 Free of our heel, would grow to vomit
 fire,
 And one day plague the world in dragon
 form.
 So should wrong merely peep abroad to meet Wrong's due quietus, leave our world's way safe 10 For honest walking."

v.

Sage, once more repeat Instruction! 'Tis a sore to soothe not chafe.
 Ah, Fabulist, what luck, could I contrive To coax from thee another "Grumbling Hive"!
 My friend himself wrote fables short and
 sweet:
 Ask him — "Suppose the Gardener of Man's ground Plants for a purpose, side by side with
 good,
 Evil — (and that he does so — look
 around!
 What does the field show?) — were it understood That purposely the noxious plant was
 found 20 Vexing the virtuous, poison close to food, If, at first stealing-forth of life in stalk And leaflet-promise, quick his spud should baulk
 Evil from budding foliage, bearing fruit?
 Such timely treatment of the offending
 root Might strike the simple as wise husbandry, But swift sure extirpation scarce would suit Shrewder observers. Seed once sown thrives: why Frustrate its product, miss the quality Which sower binds himself to count upon?
 30 Had seed fulfilled the destined purpose,
 gone
 Unhindered up to harvest — what know I But proof were gained that every growth of good Sprang consequent on evil's neighbourhood?"
 So said your shrewdness: true — so did not say That other sort of theorists who held Mere unintelligence prepared the way For either seed's upsprouting: you repelled

Their notion that both kinds could sow
 themselves.
 True! but admit 'tis understanding delves And drops each germ, what else but folly 40 thwarts
 The doer's settled purpose? Let the sage Concede a use to evil, though there starts Full many a burgeon thence, to disengage With thumb and finger lest it spoil the yield Too much of good's main tribute! But our main Tough-tendoned mandrake-monster — purge the field
 Of him for once and all? It follows plain Who set him there to grow beholds repealed
 His primal law: his ordinance proves
 vain:
 And what beseems a king who cannot 50
 reign,
 But to drop sceptre valid arm should wield?

vi.

"Still there's a parable" — retorts my
 friend —
 "Shows agriculture with a difference!
 What of the crop and weeds which solely blend Because, once planted, none may pluck them thence?
 The Gardener contrived thus? Vain
 pretence!
 An enemy it was who unawares Ruined the wheat by interspersing tares.
 Where's our desiderated forethought?
 Where's Knowledge, where power and will in evi- 60
 dence
 'Tis Man's-play merely! Craft foils recti-
 tude, Malignity defeats beneficence.
 And grant, at very last of all, the feud
 'Twixt good and evil ends, strange thoughts intrude Though good be garnered safely and good's foe Bundled for burning. Thoughts steal:
 'even so —
 Why grant tares leave to thus o'ertero'ertower
 Their field-mate, boast the stalk and flaunt the flower, Triumph one sunny minute? Knowledge,
 power
 And will thus worked? Man's fancy 70 makes the fault!
 Man, with the narrow mind, must cram
 inside
 His finite God's infinitude, — earth's vault
 He bids comprise the heavenly far and
 wide,

Since Man may claim a right to understand

What passes understanding. So, succinct And trimly set in order, to be scanned And scrutinised, lo—the divine lies linked

Fast to the human, free to move as moves

Its proper match: awhile they keep the grooves,

Discreetly side by side together pace,
Till sudden comes a stumble incident Likely enough to Man's weak-footed race,

o And he discovers — wings in rudiment, Such as he boasts, which full-grown, freedistent

Would lift him skyward, fail of flight while pent

Within humanity's restricted space.
Abjure each fond attempt to represent The formless, the illimitable! Trace No outline, try no hint of human face Or form or hand!"

VII.

Friend, here's a tracing meant To help a guess at truth you never knew.

Bend but those eyes now, using mind's eye
too,

so And note — sufficient for all purposes —
The ground-plan — map you long have yearned for — yes,

Made out in markings — more what artist
can? —

Goethe's Estate in Weimar, — just a plan!
A. is the House, and B. the Garden-gate,
And C. the Grass-plot — you've the whole estate

Letter by letter, down to Y. the Pond,
And Z. the Pig-stye. Do you look beyond The algebraic signs, and captious say

"Is A. the House? But where's the Roof to A.,

so Where's Door, where's Window? Needs must House have such!"

Ay, that were folly. Why so very much More foolish than our mortal purblind
way

Of seeking in the symbol no mere point To guide our gaze through what were else inane,

But things — their solid selves? "Is,
joint by joint,

Orion man-like, — as these dots explain His constellation? Flesh composed of suns —

How can such be?" exclaim the simple ones.

Look through the sign to the thing signified —

! Shown nowise, point by point at best descried,

Each an orb's topmost sparkle: all beside

Its shine is shadow: turn the orb one
jot —

Up flies the new flash to reveal 'twas not The whole sphere late flamboyant in your ken!

VIII.

"What need of symbolising? Fitlier men Would take on tongue mere facts — few, faint and far,

Still facts not fancies: quite enough they
are,

That Power, that Knowledge, and that Will, — add then

Immensity, Eternity: these jar Nowise with our permitted thought and 50
speech.

Why human attributes?"

A myth may teach:

Only, who better would expound it thus Must be Euripides not Æschylus.

IX.

Boundingly up through Night's wall dense and dark,

Embattled crags and clouds, outbroke the Sun

Above the conscious earth, and one by one Her heights and depths absorbed to the last spark

His fluid glory, from the far fine ridge Of mountain-granite which, transformed to gold, Laughed first the thanks back, to the vale's 60 dusk fold

On fold of vapour-swathing, like a bridge Shattered beneath some giant's stamp.

Night wist
Her work done and betook herself in mist

To marsh and hollow there to bide her
time

Blindly in acquiescence. Everywhere Did earth acknowledge Sun's embrace

sublime
Thrilling her to the heart of things: since

there
No ore ran liquid, no spar branched anew, No arrowy crystal gleamed, but straightway grew Glad through the inrush — glad nor more 70 nor less

Than, 'neath his gaze, forest and wilderness,

Hill, dale, land, sea, the whole vast stretch and spread,

The universal world of creatures bred
By Sun's munificence, alike gave praise —

All creatures but one only: gaze for gaze, Joyless and thankless, who — all scowling

can — Protests against the innumerable praises? 90
Man,

Sullen and silent.

Stand thou forth then, state Thy wrong, thou sole aggrieved — discon-solate —
While every beast, bird, reptile, insect, gay And glad acknowledges the bounteous
day!

X.

Man speaks now: "What avails Sun's earth-felt thrill To me? Sun penetrates the ore, the plant —
They feel and grow: perchance with subtler skill
He interfuses fly, worm, brute, until Each favoured object pays life's ministrant 10 By pressing, in obedience to his will,
Up to completion of the task prescribed, So stands and stays a type. Myself imbited
Such influence also, stood and stand complete —
The perfect Man, — head, body, hands and feet,
True to the pattern: but does that suffice?
How of my superadded mind which needs
— Not to be, simply, but to do, and pleads For — more than knowledge that by some device
Sun quickens matter: mind is nobly fain 20 To realise the marvel, make — for sense As mind — the unseen visible, condense — Myself — Sun's all-pervading influence
So as to serve the needs of mind, explain What now perplexes. Let the oak increase
His corrugated strength on strength, the palm Lift joint by joint her fan-fruit, ball and balm, —
Let the coiled serpent bask in bloated
peace, —
The eagle, like some skyey derelict, Drift in the blue, suspended, glorying, — 30 The lion lord it by the desert-spring, — What know or care they of the power which pricked Nothingness to perfection? I, instead,
When all-developed still am found a thing All-incomplete: for what though flesh had force Transcending theirs — hands able to un-ring
The tightened snake's coil, eyes that could outcourse
The eagle's soaring, voice whereat the
king
Of carnage couched discrowned? Mind seeks to see,
Touch, understand, by mind inside of me, 40 The outside mind — whose quickening I attain
To recognise — I only. All in vain

Would mind address itself to render plain The nature of the essence. Drag what lurks
Behind the operation — that which works Latently everywhere by outward proof — Drag that mind forth to face mine? No!
aloof
I solely crave that one of all the beams Which do Sun's work in darkness, at my
will Should operate — myself for once have
skill
To realise the energy which streams 5 Flooding the universe. Above, around, Beneath — why mocks that mind my own thus found Simply of service, when the world grows
dark,
To half-surmise — were Sun's use understood,
I might demonstrate him supplying food, Warmth, life, no less the while? To grant one spark Myself may deal with — make it thaw my blood
And prompt my steps were truer to the mark
Of mind's requirement than a half-surmise
That somehow secretly is operant 6 A power all matter feels, mind only tries To comprehend! Once more — no idle vaunt
'Man comprehends the Sun's self!'
Mysteries
At source why probe into? Enough: display,
Make demonstrable, how, by night as day, Earth's centre and sky's outspan, all's informed Equally by Sun's efflux! — source from whence
If just one spark I drew, full evidence Were mine of fire ineffably enthroned — Sun's self made palpable to Man!" 7

XI.

Thus moaned Man till Prometheus helped him, — as we learn, —
Offered an artifice whereby he drew Sun's rays into a focus, — plain and true,
The very Sun in little: made fire burn And henceforth do Man service — glassconglobed Though to a pin-point circle — all the
same Comprising the Sun's self, but Sun disrobed
Of that else-unconceived essential flame Borne by no naked sight. Shall mind's eye strive Achingly to companion as it may 8

The supersubtle effluence, and contrive
To follow beam and beam upon their way Hand-breadth by hand-breadth, till sense faint — confessed

Frustrate, eluded by unknown unguessed Infinitude of action? Idle quest!

Rather ask aid from optics. Sense, descri

The spectrum — mind, infer immensity!
Little? In little, light, warmth, life are blessed —

Which, in the large, who sees to bless?
Not I

More than yourself: so, good my friend, keep still

Trustful with — me? with thee, sage Mandeville!

WITH DANIEL BARTOLI.¹

[Born at Ferrara, 1608; died at Rome, 1685. Rector of the College of Jesuits at Rome. He wrote a history of the Jesuits, and various treatises on physics.]

I.

DON, the divinest women that have walked Our world were scarce those saints of whom we talked.

My saint, for instance — worship if you
will!

'Tis pity poets need historians' skill:
What legendary's worth a chronicle?

II.

Come, now! A great lord once upon a
time

Visited — oh a king, of kings the prime,
To sign a treaty such as never was:

For the king's minister had brought to pass That this same duke — so style him — must engage

Two of his dukedoms as an heritage
After his death to this exorbitant Craver of kingship. "Let who lacks go
scant,

Who owns much, give the more to!"
Why rebuke?

So bids the devil, so obeys the duke.

III.

Now, as it happened, at his sister's house — Duchess herself — indeed the very spouse

¹ A learned and ingenious writer. "Fu Gesuita e Storico della Compagnia; onde scrisse lungheissime storie, le quali sarebbero lette se non fossero ripiene traboccanti di tutte le superstizioni . . . Egli vi ha ficcati dentro tanti miracoloni, che diviene una noia insopportabile a chiunque voglia leggere quelle storie; e anche a me, non mi bastò l'animo di proseguire molto avanti." — Angelo Cerutti. (R. B.)

Of the king's uncle, — while the deed of gift

Whereby our duke should cut his rights ³
adrift

Was drawing, getting ripe to sign and seal —

What does the frozen heart but uncongeal And, shaming his transcendent kin and kith,

Whom do the duke's eyes make acquaintance with?

A girl. "What, sister, may this wonder
be?"

"Nobody! Good as beautiful is she,
With gifts that match her goodness, no faint flaw

I' the white: she were the pearl you think you saw,

But that she is — what corresponds to
white?

Some other stone, the true pearl's op- ⁴⁰
posite,

As cheap as pearls are costly. She's — now, guess

Her parentage! Once — twice — thrice?
Foiled, confess!

Drugs, duke, her father deals in — faugh, the scents! —

Manna and senna — such medicaments For payment he compounds you. Stay — stay — stay!

I'll have no rude speech wrong her!
Whither away,

The hot-head? Ah, the scapegrace!
She deserves

Respect — compassion, rather! Right it serves

My folly, trusting secrets to a fool!
Already at it, is he? She keeps cool — ⁵⁰

Helped by her fan's spread. Well, our state atones

For thus much licence, and words break no bones!"

(Hearts, though, sometimes.)

IV.

Next morn 'twas "Reason, rate, Rave, sister, on till doomsday! Sure as
fate,

I wed that woman — what a woman is Now that I know, who never knew till
this!"

So swore the duke. "I wed her: once
again —

Rave, rate, and reason — spend your breath in vain!"

V.

At once was made a contract firm and
fast,

Published the bauns were, only marriage, ⁶⁰
last,

Required completion when the Church's rite

Should bless and bid depart, make happy quite The coupled man and wife for evermore:
 Which rite was soon to follow. Just before —
 All things at all but end — the folk o' the bride Flocked to a summons. Pomp the duke defied:
 "Of ceremony — so much as empowers, Nought that exceeds, suits best a tie like ours —"
 He smiled — "all else were mere futility.
 We vow, God hears us: God and you and I — 10 Let the world keep at distance! This is why We choose the simplest forms that serve to bind Lover and lover of the human kind,
 No care of what degree — of kings or clowns — Come bloom and breeding. Courtly smiles and frowns Miss of their mark, would idly soothe or strike
 My style and yours — in one style merged alike — God's man and woman merely. Long ago
 'Twas rounded in my ears 'Duke, wherefore slow To use a privilege? Needs must one who reigns 20 Pay reigning's due: since statecraft so ordains — Wed for the commonweal's sake! law prescribes One wife: but to submission licence bribes Unruly nature: mistresses accept — Well, at discretion! Prove I so inept A scholar, thus instructed? Dearest, be Wife and all mistresses in one to me, Now, henceforth, and for ever!" So smiled he.

VI.

Good: but the minister, the crafty one,
 Got ear of what was doing — all but done — 30 Not sooner, though, than the king's very self, Warned by the sister on how sheer a shelf Royalty's ship was like to split. "I bar
 The abomination! Mix with muck my star?
 Shall earth behold prodigiously enorbed
 An upstart marsh-born meteor sun-absorbed?
 Nuptial me no such nuptials!" "Past dispute, Majesty speaks with wisdom absolute," Admired the minister: "yet, all the same,

I would we may not — while we play his game,
 The ducal meteor's — also lose our own, 4
 The solar monarch's: we relieve your throne
 Of an ungracious presence, like enough:
 Baulked of his project he departs in huff,
 And so cuts short — dare I remind the king? —
 Our not so unsuccessful bargaining.
 The contract for eventual heritage Happens to pari passu reach the stage Attained by just this other contract, — each Unfixed by signature though fast in speech.
 Off goes the duke in dudgeon — off withal 5
 Go with him his two dukedoms past recall.
 You save a fool from tasting folly's fruit, Obtain small thanks thereby, and lose to boot Sagacity's reward. The jest is grim:
 The man will mulct you — for americing him?
 Nay, for . . . permit a poor similitude!
 A witless wight in some fantastic mood
 Would drown himself: you plunge into the wave, Pluck forth the undeserving: he, you save,
 Pulls you clean under also for your pains. 6
 Sire, little need that I should tax my brains
 To help your inspiration!" "Let him sink!
 Always contriving" — hints the royal wink —
 "To keep ourselves dry while we claim his clothes."

VII.

Next day, the appointed day for plighting troths
 At eve, — so little time to lose, you see,
 Before the Church should weld indissolubly Bond into bond, wed these who, side by side, Sit each by other, bold groom, blushing bride, —
 At the preliminary banquet, graced 7
 By all the lady's kinsfolk come in haste
 To share her triumph, — lo, a thunder-clap!
 "Who importunes now?" "Such is my mishap — In the king's name! No need that any stir Except this lady!" bids the minister:
 "With her I claim a word apart, no more:
 For who gainsays — a guard is at the door.
 Hold, duke! Submit you, lady, as I bow
 To him whose mouthpiece speaks his pleasure now!
 It well may happen I no whit arrest 8

Your marriage: be it so, — we hope the best!
By your leave, gentles! Lady, pray you, hence!
Duke, with my soul and body's deference!"

VIII.

Doors shut, mouth opens and persuasion flows Copiously forth. "What flesh shall dare oppose

The king's command? The matter in debate

— How plain it is! Yourself shall arbitrate, Determine. Since the duke affects to rate

His prize in you beyond all goods of earth, 10 Accounts as nought old gains of rank and birth,

Ancestral obligation, recent fame,
(We know his feats) — nay, ventures to disclaim

Our will and pleasure almost — by report —

Waives in your favour dukeliness, in short, —

We — ('tis the king speaks) — who might forthwith stay

Such suicidal purpose, brush away
A bad example shame would else record, —

Lean to indulgence rather. At his word
We take the duke: allow him to complete

20 The cession of his dukedoms, leave our feet

Their footstool when his own head, safe in vault,

Sleeps sound. Nay, would the duke repair his fault

Handsomely, and our forfeited esteem Recover, — what if wisely he redeem

The past, — in earnest of good faith, at once

Give us such jurisdiction for the nonce
As may suffice — prevent occasion slip —

And constitute our actual ownership?
Concede this — straightway be the marriage blessed 30 By warrant of this paper! Things at rest, This paper duly signed, down drops the bar,

To-morrow you become — from what you are,

The druggist's daughter — not the duke's mere spouse,

But the king's own adopted: heart and house

Open to you — the idol of a court
'Which heaven might copy' — sing our poet-sort.

In this emergency, on you depends
The issue: plead what bliss the king intends!

Should the duke frown, should arguments and prayers, Nay, tears if need be, prove in vain, — 40
who cares?

We leave the duke to his obduracy, Companionless, — you, madam, follow me Without, where divers of the body-guard Wait signal to enforce the king's award Of strict seclusion: over you at least Vibratingly the sceptre threats increased Precipitation! How avert its crash?"

IX.

"Re-enter, sir! A hand that's calm not rash, Averts it!" quietly the lady said.

"Yourself shall witness."

At the table's head
Where, mid the hushed guests, still the duke sat glued

In blank bewilderment, his spouse pursued

Her speech to end — syllabled quietude.

X.

"Duke, I, your duchess of a day, could take

The hand you proffered me for love's sole sake,

Conscious my love matched yours; as you, myself

Would waive, when need were, all but love — from self

To potency. What fortune brings about Haply in some far future, finds me out,

Faces me on a sudden here and now. 60
The better! Read — if beating heart allow —

Read this, and bid me rend to rags the shame!

I and your conscience — hear and grant our claim!

Never dare alienate God's gift you hold Simply in trust for him! Choose muck for gold?

Could you so stumble in your choice, cajoled

By what I count my least of worthiness — The youth, the beauty, — you renounce them — yes,

With all that's most too: love as well you lose,

Slain by what slays in you the honour! 70
Choose!

Dear — yet my husband — dare I love you yet?"

XI.

How the duke's wrath o'erboiled, — words, words and yet

More words, — I spare you such fool's fever-fret.

They were not of one sort at all, one size,

As souls go — he and she. 'Tis said, the eyes
Of all the lookers-on let tears fall fast.
The minister was mollified at last:
"Take a day, — two days even, ere through pride You perish, — two days' counsel — then decide!"

X I.

— "If I shall save his honour and my soul?
Husband, — this one last time, — you tear the scroll?
Farewell, duke! Sir, I follow in your train!"

XIII.

So she went forth: they never met again
■ The duke and she. The world paid compliment (Is it worth noting?) when, next day, she sent Certain gifts back — "jewelry fit to deck Whom you call wife." I know not round what neck
They took to sparkling, in good time — weeks thence.

XIV.

Of all which was the pleasant consequence,
So much and no more — that a fervid
youth,
Big-hearted boy, — but ten years old, in
truth, —
Laid this to heart and loved, as boyhood
can,
The unduchessed lady: boy and lad grew
man: 20 He loved as man perchance may: did
meanwhile
Good soldier-service, managed to beguile
The years, no few, until he found a
chance:
Then, as at trumpet-summons to advance, Outbroke the love that stood at arms so
long, Brooked no withstanding longer. They were wed.
Whereon from camp and court alike he fled, Renounced the sun-king, dropped off into
night,
Evermore lost, a ruined satellite:
And, oh, the exquisite deliciousness 30 That lapped him in obscurity! You guess Such joy is fugitive: she died full soon.
He did his best to die — as sun, so moon Left him, turned dusk to darkness absolute.
Failing of death — why, saintship seemed to suit:
Yes, your sort, Don! He trembled on the verge
Of monkhood: trick of cowl and taste of scourge

He tried: then, kicked not at the pricks
perverse,
But took again, for better or for worse,
The old way in the world, and, much the
same Man o' the outside, fairly played life's 4 game.

XV.

"Now, Saint Scholastica,¹ what time she fared
In Paynimrie, behold, a lion glared Right in her path! Her waist she promptly strips
Of girdle, binds his teeth within his lips,
And, leashed all lamblike, to the Soldan's
court Leads him." Ay, many a legend of the sort
Do you praiseworthily authenticate: Spare me the rest. This much of no debate Admits: my lady flourished in grand days
When to be duchess was to dance the hays 50 Up, down, across the heaven amid its host:
While to be hailed the sun's own self almost —
So close the kinship — was — was —

Saint, for this,
Be yours the feet I stoop to — kneel and
kiss!
So human? Then the mouth too, if you
will!
Thanks to no legend but a chronicle.

XVI.

One leans to like the duke, too: up we'll patch
Some sort of saintship for him — not to
match
Hers — but man's best and woman's worst amount
So nearly to the same thing, that we count 6
In man a miracle of faithfulness
If, while unfaithful somewhat, he lay stress On the main fact that love, when love in-
deed,
Is wholly solely love from first to last — Truth — all the rest a lie. Toolikely, fast Enough that necklace went to grace the throat
— Let's say, of such a dancer as makes doat
The senses when the soul is satisfied — Trogalia, say the Greeks — a sweetmeat tried Approvingly by sated tongue and teeth, 70 Once body's proper meal consigned be-
neath
Such unconsidered munching.

Fancy's flight

Makes me a listener when, some sleepless
night,
The duke reviewed his memories, and agbask

Found that the Present intercepts the Past With such effect as when a cloud enwraps
The moon and, moon-suffused, plays moon

perhaps
To who walks under, till comes, late or
soon,

A stumble: up he looks, and lo, the moon Calm, clear, convincingly herself once
more!

to How could he 'scape the cloud that thrust
between

Him and fulgence? Speak, fool — duke, I mean!

XVIII

"Who bade you come, brisk-marching bold
she-shape,

A terror with those black-balled worlds
of eyes,

That black hair bristling solid-built from nape

To crown it coils about? O dread surmise!

Take, tread on, trample under past escape Your capture, spoil and trophy! Do — devise

Insults for one who, fallen once, ne'er shall rise!

"Mock on, triumphant o'er the prostrate
shame!

20 Laugh 'Here lies he among the false to Love —

Love's loyal liegeman once: the very same Who, scorning his weak fellows, towered
above

Inconstancy: yet why his faith defame?
Our eagle's victor was at least no dove.

No dwarfish knight picked up our giant's glove —

"When, putting prowess to the proof, faith urged

Her champion to the challenge: had it chanced

That merely virtue, wisdom, beauty — merged

All in one woman — merely these advanced

30 Their claim to conquest, — hardly had he purged

His mind of memories, dearnesses enhanced

Rather than harmed by death, nor, disentranced,

"Promptly had he abjured the old pretence

To prove his kind's superior — first to
last

Display erect on his heart's eminence
An altar to the never-dying Past.

For such feat faith might boast fit play of fence

And easily disarm the iconoclast
Called virtue, wisdom, beauty: impudence

"Fought in their stead, and how could 44 faith but fall?

There came a bold she-shape brisk-marching, bent

No inch of her imperious stature, tall As some war-engine from whose top was sent

One shattering volley out of eye's black ball,

And prone lay faith's defender! Mock-cry spent?

Malice discharged in full? In that event,

"My queenly impudence, I cover close,
I wrap me round with love of your black
hair,

Black eyes, black every wicked inch of those

Limbs' war-tower tallness: so much 50 truth lives there

'Neath the dead heap of lies. And yet —
who knows?

What if such things are? No less, such things were.

Then was the man your match whom now you dare

"Treat as existent still. A second truth!
They held — this heap of lies you rightly scorn —

A man who had approved himself in
youth

More than a match for — you? for sea-foam-born

Venus herself: you conquer him forsooth?
'Tis me his ghost: he died since left and lorn,

As needs must Samson when his hair is 60 shorn.

"Some day, and soon, be sure himself will
rise,

Called into life by her who long ago Left his soul whiling time in flesh-disguise.

Ghosts tired of waiting can play tricks,
you know!

Tread, trample me — such sport we ghosts
devise,

Waiting the morn-star's re-appearance — though

You think we vanish scared by the cock's crow."

WITH CHRISTOPHER SMART.

[An unfortunate poet (1722-1771) known to all Boswellians from anecdotes in the great Biography. He was a Fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, and until he lost his reason a very indifferent versifier. He married a daughter of Newbery the publisher, and suffered much poverty. He lives as the author of the "Song to David," a series of magnificent stanzas composed while their author was in confinement for unsoundness of mind.]

I.

It seems as if . . . or did the actual
chance Startle me and perplex? Let truth be
said!
How might this happen? Dreaming, blindfold led
By visionary hand, did soul's advance Precede my body's, gain inheritance Of fact by fancy — so that when I read At length with waking eyes your Song, instead
Of mere bewilderment, with me first glance
Was but full recognition that in trance Or merely thought's adventure some old
day
Of dim and done-with boyishness, or —
well,
Why might it not have been, the miracle Broke on me as I took my sober way Through veritable regions of our earth And made discovery, many a wondrous one?

II.

Anyhow, fact or fancy, such its birth:
I was exploring some huge house, had gone Through room and room complacently, no
dearth
Anywhere of the signs of decent taste, Adequate culture: wealth had run to waste
Nowise, nor penury was proved by stint:
All showed the Golden Mean without a hint
Of brave extravagance that breaks the rule.
The master of the mansion was no fool Assuredly, no genius just as sure!
Safe mediocrity had scorned the lure Of now too much and now too little cost,
And satisfied me sight was never lost
Of moderate design's accomplishment In calm completeness. On and on I went,
With no more hope than fear of what came
next,
Till lo, I push a door, sudden uplift
A hanging, enter, chance upon a shift

Indeed of scene! So — thus it is thou deck'st, High heaven, our low earth's brick-and-mortar work?

III.

It was the Chapel. That a star, from murk
Which hid, should flashingly emerge at last,
Were small surprise: but from broad day
I passed
Into a presence that turned shine to shade.
There fronted me the Rafael Mother-Maid, 40 Never to whom knelt votarist in shrine
By Nature's bounty helped, by Art's divine More varied — beauty with magnificence — Than this: from floor to roof one evidence Of how far earth may rival heaven. No
niche
Where glory was not prisoned to enrich Man's gaze with gold and gems, no space but glowed
With colour, gleamed with carving — hues which owed
Their outburst to a brush the painter fed With rainbow-substance — rare shapes 50 never wed
To actual flesh and blood, which, brain-born once,
Became the sculptor's dowry, Art's response
To earth's despair. And all seemed old yet new:
Youth, — in the marble's curve, the canvas'
hue,
Apparent, — wanted not the crowning thrill
Of age the consecrator. Hands long still Had worked here — could it be, what lent them skill Retained a power to supervise, protect,
Enforce new lessons with the old, connect Our life with theirs? No merely modern 60
touch
Told me that here the artist, doing much, Elsewhere did more, perchance does better,
lives —
So needs must learn.

IV.

Well, these provocatives Having fulfilled their office, forth I went Big with anticipation — well-nigh fear — Of what next room and next for startled
eyes
Might have in store, surprise beyond surprise.
Next room and next and next — what followed here?
Why, nothing! not one object to arrest
My passage — everywhere too manifest 70
The previous decent null and void of best
And worst, mere ordinary right and fit,

Calm commonplace which neither missed, nor hit Inch-high, inch-low, the placid mark proposed.

V.

Armed with this instance, have I diagnosed Your case, my Christopher? The man was sound
And sane at starting: all at once the
ground
Gave way beneath his step, a certain
smoke Curled up and caught him, or perhaps down broke A fireball wrapping flesh and spirit both in conflagration. Then — as heaven were
loth
To linger — let earth understand too well How heaven at need can operate — off fell The flame-robe, and the untransfigured
man
Resumed sobriety, — as he began,
So did he end nor alter pace, not he!

VI.

Now, what I fain would know is — could it be
That he — whoe'er he was that furnished
forth
The Chapel, making thus, from South to North,
Rafael touch Leighton, Michelagnolo Join Watts, was found but once combining
so
The elder and the younger, taking stand On Art's supreme, — or that yourself who sang
A Song where flute-breath silvers trumpet-clang,
And stations you for once on either hand With Milton and with Keats, empowered to claim Affinity on just one point — (or blame Or praise my judgment, thus it fronts you full) —
How came it you resume the void and null, Subside to insignificance, — live, die — Proved plainly two mere mortals who drew nigh
One moment — that, to Art's best hierarchy,
This, to the superhuman poet-pair?
What if, in one point only, then and there
The otherwise all-unapproachable Allowed impingement? Does the sphere pretend To span the cube's breadth, cover end to
end
The plane with its embrace? No, surely!
Still,
Contact is contact, sphere's touch no whit
less

Than cube's superimposure. Such success
Befell Smart only out of throngs between Milton and Keats that donned the singing- 40
dress —
Smart, solely of such songmen, pierced the screen
'Twixt thing and word, lit language straight from soul, —
Left no fine film-flake on the naked coal Live from the censer — shapely or uncouth Fire-suffused through and through, one blaze of truth Undeclared by a lie, — (you have my
mind) —
For, think! this blaze outleapt with black behind
And blank before, when Hayley and the
rest . . .
But let the dead successors worst and best Bury their dead: with life be my concern — 50 Yours with the fire-flame: what I fain would learn Is just — (suppose me haply ignorant Down to the common knowledge, doctors vaunt)
Just this — why only once the fire-flame
was:
No matter if the marvel came to pass
The way folk judged — if power too long suppressed Broke loose and maddened, as the vulgar
guessed,
Or simply brain-disorder (doctors said),
A turmoil of the particles disturbed Brain's workaday performance in your 60
head, Spurred spirit to wild action health had curbed:
And so verse issued in a cataract Whence prose, before and after, unperturbed
Was wont to wend its way. Concede the
fact
That here a poet was who always could — Never before did — never after would — Achieve the feat: how were such fact explained?

VII.

Was it that when, by rarest chance, there
fell Disguise from Nature, so that Truth remained
Naked, and whoso saw for once could tell 70 Us others of her majesty and might In large, her lovelinesses infinite In little, — straight you used the power wherewith Sense, penetrating as through rind to pith Each object, thoroughly revealed might view
And comprehend the old things thus made
new,

So that while eye saw, so to tongue could trust Thing which struck word out, and once more adjust Real vision to right language, till heaven's vault Pompous with sunset, storm-stirred sea's assault
 On the swilled rock-ridge, earth's embosomed brood Of tree and flower and weed, with all the life That flies or swims or crawls, in peace or strife, Above, below, — each had its note and name For Man to know by, — Man who, now — the same 10 As erst in Eden, needs that all he sees Be named him ere he note by what degrees Of strength and beauty to its end Design Ever thus operates — (your thought and mine, No matter for the many dissident) — So did you sing your Song, so truth found vent
 In words for once with you?

VIII.

Then — back was furled
 The robe thus thrown aside, and straight the world Darkened into the old oft-catalogued Repository of things that sky, wave, land, 20 Or show or hide, clear late, accretion-clogged Now, just as long ago, by tellings and Re-tellings to satiety, which strike Muffled upon the ear's drum. Very like None was so startled as yourself when friends Came, hailed your fast-returning wits:
 "Health mends
 Importantly, for — to be plain with you — This scribble on the wall was done — in lieu Of pen and paper — with — ha, ha! — your key Denting it on the wainscot! Do you see 30 How wise our caution was? Thus much we stopped Of babble that had else grown print: and lopped
 From your trim bay-tree this unsightly bough — Smart's who translated Horace! Write us now" . . .
 Why, what Smart did write — never afterward
 One line to show that he, who paced the sward, Had reached the zenith from his mad-house cell.

IX.

Was it because you judged (I know full well You never had the fancy) — judged — as some —
 That who makes poetry must reproduce Thus ever and thus only, as they come, 40
 Each strength, each beauty, everywhere diffuse Throughout creation, so that eye and ear, Seeing and hearing, straight shall recognise,
 At touch of just a trait, the strength appear, — Suggested by a line's lapse see arise
 All evident the beauty, — fresh surprise Startling at fresh achievement? "So, indeed, Wallows the whale's bulk in the waste of brine, Nor otherwise its feather-tufts make fine Wild Virgin's Bower when stars faint off 50 to seed!" (My prose — your poetry I dare not give, Purpling too much my mere grey argument.)
 — Was it because you judged — when fugitive Was glory found, and wholly gone and spent Such power of startling up deaf ear, blind eye,
 At truth's appearance, — that you humbly bent
 The head and, bidding vivid work good-bye, Doffed lyric dress and trod the world once more
 A drab-clothed decent proseman as before?
 Strengths, beauties, by one word's flash 60 thus laid bare — That was effectual service: made aware Of strengths and beauties, Man but hears the text, Awaits your teaching. Nature? What comes next?
 Why all the strength and beauty? — to be shown Thus in one word's flash, thenceforth let alone
 By Man who needs must deal with ough that's known Never so lately and so little? Friend, First give us knowledge, then appoint its use!
 Strength, beauty are the means: ignore their end?
 As well you stopped at proving how profuse 70 Stones, sticks, nay stubble lie to left and right Ready to help the builder, — careless quite If he should take, or leave the same to strew

Earth idly, — as by word's flash bring in view

Strength, beauty, then bid who beholds the
same

Go on beholding. Why gains unemployed?

Nature was made to be by Man enjoyed First; followed duly by enjoyment's fruit, Instruction — haply leaving joy behind:
And you, the instructor, would you slack pursuit

Of the main prize, as poet help mankind Just to enjoy, there leave them? Play the
fool,

Abjuring a superior privilege?

Please simply when your function is to rule —

By thought incite to deed? From edge to edge

Of earth's round, strength and beauty everywhere

Pullulate — and must you particularise
All, each and every apparition? Spare Yourself and us the trouble! Ears and
eyes

Want so much strength and beauty, and no
less

Nor more, to learn life's lesson by. Oh,
yes —

The other method's favoured in our day!
The end ere the beginning: as you may, Master the heavens before you study
earth,

Make you familiar with the meteor's birth Ere you descend to scrutinise the rose!
I say, o'erstep no least one of the rows That lead man from the bottom where he plants

Foot first of all, to life's last ladder-top: Arrived there, vain enough will seem the vaunts

Of those who say — "We scale the skies, then drop

To earth — to find, how all things there are
loth

To answer heavenly law: we understand The meteor's course, and lo, the rose's growth —

How other than should be by law's command!"

Would not you tell such — "Friends, beware lest fume

Offuscate sense: learn earth first ere presume to teach heaven legislation. Law must

be

Active in earth or nowhere: earth you
see, —

Or there or not at all, Will, Power and Love Admit discovery, — as below, above

Seek next law's confirmation! But reverse

to The order, where's the wonder things grow
worse

Than, by the law your fancy formulates, They should be? Cease from anger at the fates

Which thwart themselves so madly. Live and learn,

Not first learn and then live, is our concern.

WITH GEORGE BUBB DODING- TON.

[See "Dictionary of National Biography," vol. xv.; also the thin volume of his Memoirs or Diary first published in 1784. The author was born 1691, and died 1762. He early became a politician, and attached himself to Walpole. He was accomplished, profuse, and corrupt, and has become by common consent of historians a convenient by-word for eighteenth-century immoralities of public men.]

I.

AH, George Bubb Dodington Lord Mel-combe, — no,

Yours was the wrong way! — always understand,

Supposing that permissibly you planned How statesmanship — your trade — in outward show

Might figure as inspired by simple zeal For serving country, king, and common- 50
weal,

(Though service tire to death the body, tease

The soul from out an o'ertasked patriotdrudge)

And yet should prove zeal's outward show agrees

In all respects — right reason being judge — With inward care that, while the statesman spends

Body and soul thus freely for the sake Of public good, his private welfare take

No harm by such devotedness. Intends Scripture aught else — let captious folk inquire —

Which teaches "Labourers deserve their 60 hire,

And who neglects his household bears the bell

Away of sinning from an infidel?"?

Wiselier would fools that carp bestow a
thought

How birds build nests; at outside, roughly
wrought,

Twig knots with twig, loam plastered up each chink,

Leaving the inmate rudely lodged — you
think?

Peep but inside! That specious rude-and-
rough

Covers a domicile where downy fluff Embeds the ease-deserving architect, Who toiled and moiled not merely to effect
 'Twixt sprig and spray a stop-gap in the teeth
 Of wind and weather, guard what swung
 beneath
 From upset only, but contrived himself
 A snug interior, warm and soft and sleek.
 Of what material? Oh, for that, you seek How nature prompts each volatile! Thus
 — self 10 Smoothens the human mudlark's lodging,
 power
 Demands some hardier wrappage to embrace Robuster heart-beats: rock, not tree nor tower,
 Contents the building eagle: rook shoves
 close
 To brother rook on branch, while crow morose Apart keeps balance perched on topmost
 bough.
 No sort of bird but suits his taste somehow: Nay, Darwin tells of such as love the bower —
 His bower-birds opportunely yield us yet
 The lacking instance when at loss to get 20 A feathered parallel to what we find The secret motor of some mighty mind That worked such wonders — all for vanity!
 Worked them to haply figure in the eye
 Of intimates as first of — doers' kind?
 Actors', that work in earnest sportively, Paid by a sourish smile. How says the Sage?
 Birds born to strut prepare a platform-
 stage
 With sparkling stones and speckled shells, all sorts Of slimy rubbish, odds and ends and orts, 30 Whereon to pose and posture and engage The priceless female simper.

II.

I have gone
 Thus into detail, George Bubb Dodington, Lest, when I take you presently to task For the wrong way of working, you should ask What fool conjectures that profession
 means Performance? that who goes behind the scenes
 Finds, — acting over, — still the sootstuff screens
 Othello's visage, still the self-same cloak's Bugle-bright-blackness half reveals half chokes 40 Hamlet's emotion, as ten minutes since?" No, each resumes his garb, stands — Moor or prince —

Decently draped: just so with statesman-
 ship
 All outside show, in short, is sham — why
 wince?
 Concede me — while our parley lasts! You trip Afterwards — lay but this to heart! (there lurks
 Somewhere in all of us a lump which irks Somewhat the sprightliest-scheming brain that's bent
 On brave adventure, would but heart consent!
 — Here trip you, that — your aim allowed as right — Your means thereto were wrong. Come, 5 we, this night,
 Profess one purpose, hold one principle, Are at odds only as to — not the will But way of winning solace for ourselves — No matter if the ore for which zeal
 delves
 Be gold or coprolite, while zeal's pretence Is — we do good to men at — whose expense
 But ours? who tire the body, tease the soul, Simply that, running, we may reach fame's
 goal
 And wreathe at last our brows with bay
 — the State's Disinterested slaves, nay — please the 6
 Fates — Saviours and nothing less: such lot has been!
 Statesmanship triumphs pedestalled, serene, —
 O happy consummation! — brought about By managing with skill the rabble-rout For which we labour (never mind the
 name —
 People or populace, for praise or blame) Making them understand — their heaven, their hell,
 Their every hope and fear is ours as well.
 Man's cause — what other can we have at
 heart?
 Whence follows that the necessary part 7 High o'er Man's head we play, — and freelier breathe
 Just that the multitude which gasps beneath
 May reach the level where unstified stand Ourselves at vantage to put forth a hand, Assist the prostrate public. 'Tis by right Merely of such pretence, we reach the height
 Where storms abound, to brave — nay, court their stress, Though all too well aware — of pomp the
 less,
 Of peace the more! But who are we, to spurn
 For peace's sake, duty's pointing? Up, 8 then — earn

Albeit no prize we may but martyrdom!
Now, such fit height to launch salvation
from,
How get and gain? Since help must needs be craved
By would-be saviours of the else-unsaved, How coax them to co-operate, lend a lift, Kneel down and let us mount?

III.

You say "Make shift By sham — the harsh word: preach and teach, persuade Somehow the Public — not despising aid Of salutary artifice — we seek Solely their good: our strength would raise the weak,
Our cultivated knowledge supplement Their rudeness, rawness: why to us were lent
Ability except to come in use?
Who loves his kind must by all means induce
That kind to let his love play freely, press In Man's behalf to full performance!"

IV.

Yes —

Yes, George, we know! — whereat they hear, believe,
And bend the knee, and on the neck receive Who fawned and cringed to purpose?
Not so, George!
Try simple falsehood on shrewd folk who forge
Lies of superior fashion day by day And hour by hour? With craftsmen versed as they What chance of competition when the tools Only a novice wields? Are knaves such fools?
Disinterested patriots, spare your tongue
The tones thrice-silvery, cheek save smiles it flung Pearl-like profuse to swine — a herd, whereof
No unit needs be taught, his neighbour's trough Scarce holds for who but grunts and whines the husks
Due to a wrinkled snout that shows sharp tusks.
No animal — much less our lordly Man — Obeys its like: with strength all rule began,
The stoutest awes the pasture. Soon succeeds
Discrimination, — nicer power Man needs
To rule him than is bred of bone and thew:
Intelligence must move strength's self.
This too
Lasts but its time: the multitude at length Looks inside for intelligence and strength

And finds them here and there to pick and choose:

"All at your service, mine, see!" Ay, but 40 who's

My George, at this late day, to make his
boast

"In strength, intelligence, I rule the roast, Beat, all and some, the ungraced who crowd your ranks?"

"Oh, but I love, would lead you, gain your
thanks

By unexampled yearning for Man's sake — Passion that solely waits your help to take Effect in action!" George, which one of us

But holds with his own heart communion
thus:

"I am, if not of men the first and best,
Still — to receive enjoyment — properest: 50
Which since by force I cannot, nor by wit Most likely — craft must serve in place of
it.

Flatter, cajole! If so I bring within My net the gains which wit and force should win, What hinders?" 'Tis a trick we know of
old:

Try, George, some other of tricks manifold!
The multitude means mass and mixture —
right

Are mixtures simple, pray, or composite?
Dive into Man, your medley: see the waste!

Sloth-stifled genius, energy disgraced 60
By ignorance, high aims with sorry skill, Will without means and means in want of
will

— Sure we might fish, from out the mothers'
sons

That welter thus, a dozen Dodingtons!
Why call up Dodington, and none beside,
To take his seat upon our backs and ride
As statesman conquering and to conquer?

Well,

The last expedient, which must needs excel
Those old ones — this it is, — at any rate
To-day's conception thus I formulate: 70

As simple force has been replaced, just so Must simple wit be: men have got to know Such wit as what you boast is nowise held
The wonder once it was, but, paralleled Too plentifully, counts not, — puts to
shame

Modest possessors like yourself who claim, By virtue of it merely, power and place — Which means the sweets of office. Since our race

Teems with the like of you, some special
gift,

Your very own, must coax our hands to 80
lift,

And backs to bear you: is it just and right To privilege your nature?

v.

“State things quite Other than so” — make answer! “I pretend
No such community with men. Perpend My key to domination! Who would use Man for his pleasure needs must introduce The element that awes Man. Once for
all,
His nature owns a Supernatural In fact as well as phrase — which found
must be — Where, in this doubting age? Old mystery 10 Has served its turn — seen through and sent adrift
To nothingness: new wizard-craft makes shift Nowadays shorn of help by robe and
book, — Otherwise, elsewhere, for success must look
Than chalked-ring, incantation-gibberish.
Somebody comes to conjure: that's he?
Pish!
He's like the roomful of rapt gazers, —
there's
No sort of difference in the garb he wears From ordinary dressing, — gesture, speech, Department, just like those of all and
each 20 That eye their master of the minute.
Stay!
What of the something — call it how you
may — Uncanny in the — quack? That's easy
said!
Notice how the Professor turns no head
And yet takes cognisance of who accepts, Denies, is puzzled as to the adept's Supremacy, yields up or lies in wait To trap the trickster! Doubtless, out of date
Are dealings with the devil: yet, the stir
Of mouth, its smile half smug half sinister, 30 Mock-modest boldness masked in diffi-
dence, —
What if the man have — who knows how or whence? — Confederate potency unguessed by us — Prove no such cheat as he pretends?”

vi.

Ay, thus

Had but my George played statesmanship's new card
That carries all! “Since we” — avers the Bard — “All of us have one human heart” — as
good
As say — by all of us is understood Right and wrong, true and false — in rough, at least,

We own a common conscience. God, man,
beast —
How should we qualify the statesman-
shape
I fancy standing with our world agape?
Disguise, flee, fight against with tooth and nail
The outrageous designation! “Quack” men quail
Before? You see, a little year ago They heard him thunder at the thing which, lo,
To-day he vaunts for unscathed, while what erst
Heaven-high he lauded, lies hell-low, accursed!
And yet where's change? Who, awestruck, cares to point Critical finger at a dubious joint In armour, true as triplex, breast and back 5 Binding about, defiant of attack, An imperturbability that's — well,
Or innocence or impudence — how tell One from the other? Could ourselves broach lies,
Yet brave mankind with those unaltered
eyes,
Those lips that keep the quietude of truth?
Dare we attempt the like? What quick uncouth
Disturbance of thy smug economy, O coward visage! Straight would all descry
Back on the man's brow the boy's blush
6 once more!
No: he goes deeper — could our sense explore — Finds conscience beneath conscience such as ours.
Genius is not so rare, — prodigious powers —
Well, others boast such, — but a power like
this Mendacious intrepidity — quid vis?
Besides, imposture plays another game, Admits of no diversion from its aim Of captivating hearts, sets zeal a-flare
In every shape at every turn, — nowhere Allows subsidence into ash. By stress 70 Of what does guile succeed but earnestness, Earnest word, look and gesture? Touched with aught
But earnestness, the levity were fraught With ruin to guile's film-work. Grave is guile;
Here no act wants its qualifying smile,
Its covert pleasantry to neutralise The outward ardour. Can our chief despise
Even while most he seems to adulate?
As who should say “What though it be my
fate
To deal with fools? Among the crowd 80 must lurk

Some few with faculty to judge my work Spite of its way which suits, they under-
stand,

The crass majority: — the Sacred Band, No duping them forsooth!" So tells a touch

Of subintelligent nod and wink — Turning foes friends. Coarse flattery moves the gorge:

Mine were the mode to awe the many,
George!

They guess you half despise them while most bent

On demonstrating that your sole intent o Strives for their service. Sncer at them?
Yourself

'Tis you disparage, — tricky as an elf, Scorning what most you strain to bring to
pass,

Laughingly careless, — triply cased in brass, —

While pushing strenuous to the end in view.
What follows? Why, you formulate within

The vulgar headpiece this conception
"Win

A master-mind to serve us needs we must,
One who, from motives we but take on
trust,

Acts strangelier — haply wiselier than we
know —

Stronglier, for certain. Did he say 'I throw

Aside my good for yours, in all I do Care nothing for myself and all for you' — We should both understand and disbelieve:

Said he 'Your good I laugh at in my
sleeve,

My own it is I solely labour at, Pretending yours the while' — that, even
that

We, understanding well, give credence to,
And so will none of it. But here 'tis
through

Our recognition of his service, wage o Well earned by work, he mounts to such a stage

Above competitors as all save Bubb Would agonise to keep. Yet, — here's the rub —

So slightly does he hold by our esteem Which solely fixed him fast there, that we seem

Mocked every minute to our face, by gibe And jest — scorn insuppressive: what ascribe

The rashness to? Our pay and praise to boot —

Do these avail him to tread underfoot Something inside us all and each, that stands

o Somehow instead of somewhat which commands

'Lie not'? Folk. fear to jeopardise their
soul,

Stumble at times, walk straight upon the whole, —

That's nature's simple instinct: what may
be

The portent here, the influence such as we Are strangers to?" —

VII.

Exact the thing I call Man's despot, just the Supernatural Which, George, was wholly out of — far beyond

Your theory and practice. You had conned

But to reject the precept "To succeed In gratifying selfishness and greed, 50 Asseverate such qualities exist

Nowise within yourself! then make acquit
By all means, with no sort of fear!"

Alack,
That well-worn lie is obsolete! Fall back On still a working pretext — "Hearth and

Home,
The Altar, love of England, hate of
Rome" —

That's serviceable lying — that perchance Had screened you decently: but 'ware
advance

By one step more in perspicacity Of these our dupes! At length they get to 60
see

As through the earlier, this the latter plea

And find the greed and selfishness at source!

Venium est ad triarios: last resource Should be to what but — exquisite disguise

Disguise-abjuring, truth that looks like
lies,

Frankness so sure to meet with unbelief?
Say — you hold in contempt — not them in chief —

But first and foremost your own self! No
use

In men but to make sport for you, induce The puppets now to dance, now stand 70
stock-still,

Now knock their heads together, at your
will

For will's sake only — while each plays his part

Submissive: why? through terror at the
heart:

"Can it be — this bold man, whose hand we saw

Openly pull the wires, obeys some law Quite above Man's — nay, God's?" On face fall they.

This was the secret missed, again I say,
Out of your power to grasp conception of, Much less employ to purpose. Hence the scoff

That greets your very name: folk see but
 one Fool more, as well as knave, in Doding-ton.

WITH FRANCIS FURINI.

[F. Furini, born at Florence 1600, died 1649. A famous painter of the nude, who at the age of forty became a parish priest and a devout liver. He is said to have regretted his undraped pictures.]

I.

NAV, that, Furini, never I at least Mèan to believe! What man you were I
 know,
 While you walked Tuscan earth, a painter-
 priest,
 Something about two hundred years ago.
 Priest — you did duty punctual as the sun That rose and set above Saint Sano's
 church,
 Blessing Mugello: of your flock not one 10 But showed a whiter fleece because of smirch,
 Your kind hands wiped it clear from: were they poor?
 Bounty broke bread apace, — did marriage lag
 For just the want of moneys that ensure Fit hearth-and-home provision? — straight your bag Unplumped itself, — reached hearts by way of palms Goodwill's shake had but tickled. All
 about Mugello valley, felt some parish qualms At worship offered in bare walls without The comfort of a picture? — prompt such need 20 Our painter would supply, and throngs to
 see Witnessed that goodness — no unholy
 greed
 Of gain — had coaxed from Don Furini —
 he
 Whom princes might in vain implore to toil
 For worldly profit — such a masterpiece.
 Brief — priest, you poured profuse God's wine and oil Praiseworthy, I know: shall praising
 cease
 When, priestly vesture put aside, mere man, You stand for judgment? Rather — what acclaim — "Good son, good brother, friend in whom we scan 30 No fault nor flaw" — salutes Furini's
 name,
 The loving as the liberal! Enough:
 Only to ope a lily, though for sake
 Of setting free its scent, disturbs the rough

Loose gold about its anther. I shall take No blame in one more blazon, last of all — Good painter were you: if in very deed
 I styled you great — what modern art dares
 call

My word in question? Let who will take heed

Of what he seeks and misses in your brain
 To balance that precision of the brush Your hand could ply so deftly: all in vain Strives poet's power for outlet when the push

Is lost upon a barred and bolted gate Of painter's impotency. Agnolo —

Thine were alike the head and hand, by
 fate

Doubly endowed! Who boasts head only
 — woe

To hand's presumption should brush emu-
 late

Fancy's free passage by the pen, and show Thought wrecked and ruined where the inexpert

Foolhardy fingers half grasped, half let go Film-wings the poet's pen arrests unhurt!
 No — painter such as that miraculous Michael, who deems you? But the ample
 gift

Of gracing walls else blank of this our
 house

Of life with imagery, one bright drift Poured forth by pencil, — man and woman
 mere,

Glorified till half owned for gods, — the
 dear

Fleshly perfection of the human shape, — This was apportioned you whereby to
 praise

Heaven and bless earth. Who clumsily essays,

By slighting painter's craft, to prove the ape
 Of poet's pen-creation, just betrays Two-fold ineptitude.

II.

By such sure ways

Do I return, Furini, to my first And central confidence — that he I proved Good priest, good man, good painter, and rehearsed

Praise upon praise to show — not simply loved

For virtue, but for wisdom honoured too Needs must Furini be, — it follows — who Shall undertake to breed in me belief That, on his death-bed, weakness played
 the thief

With wisdom, folly ousted reason quite?
 List to the chronicler! With main and might —

So fame runs — did the poor soul beg his friends

To buy and burn his hand-work, make amends

For having reproduced therein — (Ah me!

Sighs fame — that's friend Filippo) — nudity!

Yes, I assure you: he would paint — not men

Merely — a pardonable fault — but when He had to deal with — oh, not mother Eve Alone, permissibly in Paradise Naked and unashamed, — but dared achieve

Dreadful distinction, at soul-safety's price By also painting women — (why the need?)

Just as God made them: there, you have the truth!

Yes, rosed from top to toe in flush of youth,

One foot upon the moss fringe, would some Nymph

Try, with its venturesome fellow, if the lymph Were chillier than the slab-stepped fountain-edge;

The while a-heap her garments on its ledge

Of boulder lay within hand's easy reach, — No one least kid skin cast around her!

Speech Shrinks from enumerating ease and ease Of — were it but Diana at the chase,

With tunic tucked discreetly hunting-high! No, some Queen Venus set our necks awry,

Turned faces from the painter's all-too-frank Triumph of flesh! For — whom had he to thank — This self-appointed nature-student? Whence Picked he up practice? By what evidence Did he unhandsonely become adept

In simulating bodies? How except By actual sight of such? Himself confessed

The enormity: quoth Philip "When I pressed

The painter to acknowledge his abuse Of artistry else potent — what excuse

Made the infatuated man? I give His very words: 'Did you but know, as I,

— O scruple-splitting sickly-sensitive Mild-moral-monger, what the agony

Of Art is ere Art satisfy herself In imitating Nature — (Man, poor elf, Striving to match the finger-mark of Him The immeasurably matchless) — gay or

grim,

Pray, would you: smile he? Leave mere fools to tax

Art's high-strung brain's intentness as so lax

That, in its mid throes, idle fancy sees The moment for admittance! Plead ings these — Specious, I grant." So adds, and seems to whine

Somewhat, our censor — but shall truth convince

Blockheads like Baldinucci? ¹

III.

I resume

My incredulity: your other kind Of soul, Furini, never was so blind,

Even through death mist, as to grope in gloom

For cheer beside a bonfire piled to turn 50 Ashes and dust all that your noble life

Did homage to life's Lord by, — bid them burn

These Baldinucci blockheads — pictures rise

With record, in each rendered loveliness, That one appreciative creature's debt

Of thanks to the Creator more or less, Was paid according as heart's will had met

Hand's power in Art's endeavour to express

Heaven's most consummate of achievements, bless

Earth by a semblance of the seal God set 60 On woman his supremest work. I trust

Rather, Furini, dying breath had vent In some fine fervour of thanksgiving just

For this — that soul and body's power you spent —

Agonised to adumbrate, trace in dust That marvel which we dream the firmament

Copies in star-device when fancies stray Outlining, orb by orb, Andromeda —

God's best of beauteous and magnificent 70 Revealed to earth — the naked female form.

Nay, I mistake not: wrath that's but lukewarm

Would boil indeed were such a critic styled Himself an artist: artist! Ossa piled Topping Olympus — the absurd which crowns The extravagant — whereat one laughs, not frowns.

Paints he? One bids the poor pretender take

His sorry self, a trouble and disgrace, From out the sacred presence, void the place Artists claim only. What — not merely wake

Our pity that suppressed concupiscence — 80 A satyr masked as matron — nukes pretence

To the coarse blue fly's instinct — can perceive

No better reason why she should exist

— God's lily-limbed and blush-rose-bosomed Eve —
Than as a hot-bed for the sensualist To fly-blow with his fancies, make pure
stuff
Breed him back filth — this were not crime
enough?
But further — fly to style itself — nay,
more —
To steal among the sacred ones, crouch
down
Though but to where their garments sweep the floor —
— Still catching some faint sparkle from the crown
Crowning transcendent Michael, Leonard, 20 Rafael, — to sit beside the feet of such,
Unspurned because unnoticed, then reward Their toleration — mercy overmuch — By stealing from the throne-step to the fools
Curious outside the gateway, all-agape
To learn by what procedure, in the schools Of Art, a merest man in outward shape May learn to be Correggio! Old and young,
These learners got their lesson: Art was just
A safety-screen — (Art, which Correggio's
tongue 20 Calls "Virtue") — for a skulking vice:
mere lust Inspired the artist when his Night and Morn
Slept and awoke in marble on that edge Of heaven above our awestruck earth:
lust-born
His Eve low bending took the privilege Of life from what our eyes saw — God's own palm That put the flame forth — to the love and
thanks
Of all creation save this recreant!

IV.

Our phrase, Furini! Not the artist-ranks Claim riddance of an interloper: no — 30 This Baldinucci did but grunt and sniff Outside Art's pale — ay, grubbed, where pine-trees grow,
For pignuts only.

V.

You the Sacred! If Indeed on you has been bestowed the dower Of Art in fulness, graced with head and
hand,
Head — to look up not downwards, hand
— of power
To make head's gain the portion of a
world
Where else the uninstructed ones too sure

Would take all outside beauty — film that's furled
About a star — for the star's self, endure
No guidance to the central glory, — nay, 4 (Sadder) might apprehend the film was fog,
Or (worst) wish all but vapour well away,
And sky's pure product thickened from earth's bog —
Since so, nor seldom, have your worthiest failed
To trust their own soul's insight — why? except
For warning that the head of the adept May too much prize the hand, work un-assailed
By scruple of the better sense that finds An orb within each halo, bids gross flesh Free the fine spirit-pattern, nor enmesh 5 More than is meet a marvel custom blinds Only the vulgar eye to. Now, less fear That you, the foremost of Art's fellowship, Will oft — will ever so offend! But — hip
And thigh — smite the Philistine! You — slunk here —
Connived at, by too easy tolerance, Not to scrape palette simply or squeeze
brush,
But dub your very self an Artist? Tush —
You, of the daubings, is it, dare advance This doctrine that the Artist-mind must needs
Own to affinity with yours — confess Provocative acquaintance, more or less,
With each impurely-peevish worm that breeds
Inside your brain's receptacle?

VI.

Enough.
Who owns "I dare not look on diadems Without an itch to pick out, purloin gems Others contentedly leave sparkling" — gruff
Answers the guard of the regalia: "Why — Consciously kleptomaniac — thrust yourself
Where your illicit craving after pelf
Is tempted most — in the King's treasury?
Go elsewhere! Sort with thieves, if thus you feel —
When folk clean-handed simply recognise Treasure whereof the mere sight satisfies —
But straight your fingers are on itch to steal!
Hence with you!"

Pray, Furini!

VII.

"Bounteous God,
Deviser and Dispenser of all gifts

To soul through sense, — in Art the soul uplifts Man's best of thanks! What but Thy measuring-rod Meted forth heaven and earth? more intimate,
 Thy very hands were busied with the task Of making, in this human shape, a mask —
 A match for that divine. Shall love abate Man's wonder? Nowise! True — true — all too true —
 No gift but, in the very plenitude Of its perfection, goes maimed, misconstrued
 By wickedness or weakness: still, some few
 Have grace to see Thy purpose, strength to mar
 Thy work by no admixture of their own,
 — Linn truth not falsehood, bid us love
 alone
 The type untampered with, the naked star!"

VIII.

And, prayer done, painter — what if you should preach?
 Not as of old when playing pulpiteer
 To simple-witted country folk, but here In actual London try your powers of speech On us the cultured, therefore sceptical — What would you? For, suppose he has his
 word
 In faith's behalf, no matter how absurd, This painter-theologian? One and all We lend an ear — nay, Science takes thereto —
 Encourages the meanest who has racked Nature until he gains from her some fact,
 To state what truth is from his point of
 view,
 Mere pin-point though it be: since many
 such Conduce to make a whole, she bids our
 friend
 Come forward unabashed and haply lend His little life-experience to our much Of modern knowledge. Since she so insists,
 Up stands Furini.

IX.

"Evolutionists!
 At truth I glimpse from depths, you glance from heights,
 Our stations for discovery opposites, — How should ensue agreement? I explain:
 'Tis the tip-top of things to which you strain
 Your vision, until atoms, protoplasm, And what and whence and how may be the spasm
 Which sets all going, stop you: down perforce

Needs must your observation take its ac-
 course,
 Since there's no moving upwards: link by link
 You drop to where the atoms somehow
 think,
 Feel, know themselves to be: the world's begun,
 Such as we recognise it. Have you done Descending? Here's ourself, — Man, known to-day,
 Duly evolved at last, — so far, you say.
 The sum and seal of being's progress.
 Good!
 Thus much at least is clearly understood —
 Of power does Man possess no particle:
 Of knowledge — just so much as shows 50 that still
 It ends in ignorance on every side:
 But righteousness — ah, Man is deified Thereby, for compensation! Make survey
 Of Man's surroundings, try creation —
 nay,
 Try emulation of the minimised Minuteness fancy may conceive! Surprised
 Reason becomes by two defeats for one —
 Not only power at each phenomenon Baffled, but knowledge also in default — Asking what is minuteness — yonder vault 60 Speckled with suns, or this the millionth —
 thing,
 How shall I call? — that on some insect's wing
 Helps to make out in dyes the mimic star?
 Weak, ignorant, accordingly we are:
 What then? The worst for Nature!
 Where began Righteousness, moral sense except in Man?
 True, he makes nothing, understands no
 whit:
 Had the initiator-spasm seen fit Thus doubly to endow him, none the worse
 And much the better were the universe. 70
 What does Man see or feel or apprehend Here, there, and everywhere, but faults to mend,
 Omissions to supply, — one wide disease Of things that are, which Man at once would ease
 Had will but power and knowledge? failing both —
 Things must take will for deed — Man, nowise loth,
 Accepts pre-eminency: mere blind force — Mere knowledge undirected in its course
 By any care for what is made or marred In either's operation — these award 80 The crown to? Rather let it deck thy brows,
 Man, whom alone a righteousness endows Would cure the wide world's ailing! Who disputes

- Thy claim thereto? Had Spasm more attributes Than power and knowledge in its gift, before Man came to pass? The higher that we soar,
 The less of moral sense like Man's we find:
 No sign of such before, — what comes behind,
 Who guesses? But until there crown our sight
 "The quite new — not the old mere infinite Of changings, — some fresh kind of sun and moon, —
 Then, not before, shall I expect a boon 10 Of intuition just as strange, which turns Evil to good, and wrong to right, unlearns All Man's experience learned since Man was he.
 Accept in Man, advanced to this degree,
 The Prime Mind, therefore! neither wise nor strong — Whose fault? but were he both, then right, not wrong
 As now, throughout the world were paramount
 According to his will, — which I account
 The qualifying faculty. He stands Confessed supreme — the monarch whose commands 20 Could he enforce, how bettered were the world!
 He's at the height this moment — to be hurled Next moment to the bottom by rebound Of his own peal of laughter. All around Ignorance wraps him, — whence and how and why Things are, — yet cloud breaks and lets blink the sky Just overhead, not elsewhere! What assures His optics that the very blue which lures Comes not of black outside it, doubly dense?
 Ignorance overwraps his moral sense, 30 Winds him about, relaxing, as it wraps,
 So much and no more than lets through perhaps The murmured knowledge — 'Ignorance exists.'

x.

"I at the bottom, Evolutionists, Advise beginning, rather. I profess To know just one fact — my self-consciousness, —
 'Twixt ignorance and ignorance enisled, — Knowledge: before me was my Cause — that's styled God: after, in due course succeeds the rest, —
 All that my knowledge comprehends —
 at best —

At worst, conceives about in mild despair. 4 Light needs must touch on either darkness:
 where?
 Knowledge so far impinges on the Cause Before me, that I know — by certain laws Wholly unknown, whate'er I apprehend Within, without me, had its rise: thus blend
 I, and all things perceived, in one Effect.
 How far can knowledge any ray project
 On what comes after me — the universe?
 Well, my attempt to make the cloud disperse Begins — not from above but underneath: 5 I climb, you soar, — who soars soon loses
 breath
 And sinks, who climbs keeps one foot firm on fact Ere hazarding the next step: soul's first
 act (Call consciousness the soul — some name we need)
 Getting itself aware, through stuff decreed Thereto (so call the body) — who has stept
 So far, there let him stand, become adept In body ere he shift his station thence One single hair's breadth. Do I make pre-
 tence
 To teach, myself unskilled in learning? 6
 Lo,
 My life's work! Let my pictures prove I
 know
 Somewhat of what this fleshly frame of ours
 Or is or should be, how the soul empowers
 The body to reveal its every mood
 Of love and hate, pour forth its plenitude Of passion. If my hand attained to give Thus permanence to truth else fugitive, Did not I also fix each fleeting grace Of form and feature — save the beauteous
 face —
 Arrest decay in transitory might Of bone and muscle — cause the world to bless
 For ever each transcendent nakedness Of man and woman? Were such feats achieved
 By sloth, or strenuous labour unrelieved, — Yet lavished vainly? Ask that under-
 ground
 (So may I speak) of all on surface found Of flesh-perfection! Depths on depths to probe
 Of all-inventive artifice, disrobe Marvel at hiding under marvel, pluck Veil after veil from Nature — were the luck Ours to surprise the secret men so name, That still eludes the searcher — all the
 same, Repays his search with still fresh proof —
 'Externe, Not inmost, is the Cause, fool! Look and
 learn!
 Thus teach my hundred pictures: firm and fast

There did I plant my first foot. And the next?
 Nowhere! 'Twas put forth and withdrawn, perplexed At touch of what seemed stable and proved stiff Such as the coloured clouds are: plain enough There lay the outside universe: try Man — My most immediate! and the dip began From safe and solid into that profound Of ignorance I tell you surges round My rock-spit of self-knowledge. Well and ill, Evil and good irreconcilable Above, beneath, about my every side, —
 How did this wild confusion far and wide Tally with my experience when my stamp —
 So far from stirring — struck out, each a lamp, Spark after spark of truth from where I stood — Pedestalled triumph? Evil there was good, Want was the promise of supply, defect Ensured completion, — where and when and how?
 Leave that to the First Cause! Enough that now, Here where I stand, this moment's me and mine, Shows me what is, permits me to divine What shall be. Wherefore? Nay, how otherwise?
 Look at my pictures! What so glorifies
 The body that the permeating soul Finds there no particle elude control Direct, or fail of duty, — most obscure When most subservient? Did that Cause ensure The soul such raptures as its fancy stings Body to furnish when, uplift by wings
 Of passion, here and now, it leaves the earth, Loses itself above, where bliss has birth — (Heaven, be the phrase) — did that same Cause contrive Such solace for the body, soul must dive At drop of fancy's pinion, condescend To bury both alike on earth, our friend
 And fellow, where minutely exquisite Low lie the pleasures, now and here — no herb But hides its marvel, peace no doubts perturb In each small mystery of insect life — — Shall the soul's Cause thus gift the soul, yet strife Continue still of fears with hopes, — for why?
 What if the Cause, whereof we now descry
 So far the wonder-working, lack at last Will, power, benevolence — a protoplast, No consummator, sealing up the sum

Of all things, — past and present and to come Perfection? No, I have no doubt at all!
 There's my amount of knowledge — great or small,
 Sufficient for my needs: for see! advance
 Its light now on that depth of ignorance 54
 I shrank before from — yonder where the world Lies wreck-strewn, — evil towering, prone good — hurled From pride of place, on every side. For me (Patience, beseech you!) knowledge can but be Of good by knowledge of good's opposite — Evil, — since, to distinguish wrong from right, Both must be known in each extreme, beside — (Or what means knowledge — to aspire or bide Content with half-attaining? Hardly so!) Made to know on, know ever, I must know 60
 All to be known at any halting-stage
 Of my soul's progress, such as earth, where wage War, just for soul's instruction, pain with joy, Folly with wisdom, all that works annoy
 With all that quiets and contents, — in brief, Good strives with evil.

“Now then for relief,
 Friends, of your patience kindly curbed so long.
 ‘What?’ snarl you, ‘Is the fool's conceit thus strong — Must the whole outside world in soul and sense Suffer, that he grow sage at its expense?’ 70
 By no means! ‘Tis by merest touch of toe
 I try — not trench on — ignorance, just know —
 And so keep steady footing: how you fare, Caught in the whirlpool — that's the Cause's care, Strong, wise, good, — this I know at any rate
 In my own self, — but how may operate With you — strength, wisdom, goodness — no least blink Of knowledge breaks the darkness round me. Think!
 Could I see plain, be somehow certified All was illusion, — evil far and wide 80
 Was good disguised, — why, out with one huge wipe Goes knowledge from me. Type needs anti-type:
 As night needs day, as shine needs shade, so good Needs evil: how were pity understood

Unless by pain? Make evident that pain Permissibly masks pleasure — you abstain From outstretch of the finger-tip that saves A drowning fly. Who proffers help of
hand

To weak Andromeda exposed on strand
At mercy of the monster? Were all true, Help were not wanting: 'But 'tis false,' cry you,

'Mere fancy-work of paint and brush!'
No less,

Were mine the skill, the magic, to impress 10 Beholders with a confidence they saw Life, — veritable flesh and blood in awe Of just as true a sea-beast, — would they stare

Simply as now, or cry out, curse and swear,
Or call the gods to help, or catch up stick And stone, according as their hearts were quick

Or sluggish? Well, some old artificer Could do as much, — at least, so books aver, —

Able to make-believe, while I, poor wight, Make-fancy, nothing more. Though wrong were right,

20 Could we but know — still wrong must needs seem wrong

To do right's service, prove men weak or
strong,

Choosers of evil or of good. 'No such Illusion possible!' Ah, friends, you touch Just here my solid standing-place amid The wash and welter, whence all doubts are bid

Back to the ledge they break against in foam,

Futility: my soul, and my soul's home
This body, — how each operates on each,
And how things outside, fact or feigning,
teach

30 What good is and what evil, — just the
same,

Be feigning or be fact the teacher, — blame Diffidence nowise if, from this I judge
My point of vantage, not an inch I budge.
All — for myself — seems ordered wise and well

Inside it, — what reigns outside, who can tell?

Contrariwise, who needs be told 'The space Which yields thee knowledge, — do its bounds embrace

Well-willing and wise-working, each at height?

Enough: beyond thee lies the infinite —

40 Back to thy circumscription!

"Back indeed!

Ending where I began — thus: retrocede,
Who will, — what comes first, take first,
I advise!

Acquaint you with the body ere your eyes Look upward: this Andromeda of mine —

Gaze on the beauty, Art hangs out for sign There's finer entertainment underneath.
Learn how they ministrate to life and
death —

Those incommensurably marvellous Contrivances which furnish forth the house Where soul has sway! Though Master
keep aloof,

Signs of His presence multiply from roof To basement of the building. Look around,

Learn thoroughly, — no fear that you con-
found

Master with message! He's away, no
doubt,

But what if, all at once, you come upon A startling-proof — not that the Master
gone

Was present lately — but that something
— whence

Light comes — has pushed Him into residence?

Was such the symbol's meaning, — old,
uncouth —

That circle of the serpent, tail in mouth? 6
Only by looking low, ere looking high, Comes penetration of the mystery."

XI.

Thanks! After sermonising, psalmody!
Now praise with pencil, Painter! Fools attain

Your fame, forsooth, because its power inclines

To livelier colours, more attractive lines Than suit some orthodox sad sickly saint.

— Grey male emaciation, haply streaked Carbuncle by scourgings — or they want, far worse —

Some self-scathed woman, framed to bless 7 not curse

Nature that loved the form whereon hate wreaked

The wrongs you see. No, rather paint some full

Benignancy, the first and foremost boon
Of youth, health, strength, — show beauty's May, ere June

Undo the bud's blush, leave a rose to cull
— No poppy, neither! yet less perfect-pure,

Divinely-precious with life's dew besprent.
Show saintliness that's simply innocent

Of guessing sinnership exists to cure
All in good time! In time let age advance 8

And teach that knowledge helps — not ignorance —

The healing of the nations. Let my spark Quicken your tinder! Burn with — Joan of Arc!

Not at the end, nor midway when there
grew

The brave delusions, when rare fancies flew

Before the eyes, and in the ears of her Strange voices woke imperiously astir:
No, — paint the peasant girl all peasant-
like,
Spirit and flesh — the hour about to strike When this should be transfigured, that inflamed,
By heart's admonishing "Thy country shamed, Thy king shut out of all his realm except One sorry corner!" and to life forth leapt The indubitable lightning "Can there be Country and king's salvation — all through
me?"

Memorise that burst's moment, Francis!
Tush —
None of the nonsense-writing! Fittler brush
Shall clear off fancy's film-work and let
show
Not what the foolish feign but the wise
know —
Ask Sainte-Beuve¹ else! — or better, Quicherat,²
The downright-digger into truth that's —
Bah, Bettered by fiction? Well, of fact thus
much Concerns you, that "of prudishness no
touch
From first to last defaced the maid; anon, Camp-use compelling" — what says D'Al-ençon Her fast friend? — "though I saw while she undressed
How fair she was — especially her breast — Never had I a wild thought!" — as indeed I nowise doubt. Much less would she take heed —
When eve came, and the lake, the hills
around
Were all one solitude and silence, — found Barriered impenetrably safe about, — Take heed of interloping eyes shut out,
But quietly permit the air imbibe Her naked beauty till . . . but hear the scribe!

Now as she fain would bathe, one even-tide, God's maid, this Joan,³ from the pool's edge
she spied
The fair blue bird clowns call the Fisher-
king:
And "Las," sighed she, "my Liege is such a thing
As thou, lord but of one poor lonely place
Out of his whole wide France: were mine the grace
To set my Dauphin free as thou, blue bird!"
Properly Martin-fisher — that's the word,

Not yours nor mine: folk said the rustic
oath
In common use with her was — "Py my 4:
troth"?
No, — "By my Martin"! Paint this!
Only, turn
Her face away — that face about to burn Into an angel's when the time is ripe!
That task's beyond you. Finished, Francis? Wipe Pencil, scrape palette, and retire content!
"Omnia non omnibus" — no harm is meant!

WITH GERARD DE LAIRESSE.

[Gerard de Lairese was a Flemish painter, born at Liège in 1640; he died in 1711. He was a famous figure in his day, extravagant and dissipated. He painted rapidly, and was fond of the violin. He was supposed to be the author of a treatise on Painting which bears his name, but some doubt this.]

I.

AH, but — because you were struck blind, could bless
Your sense no longer with the actual view Of man and woman, those fair forms you drew
In happier days so duteously and true, — 53
Must I account my Gerard de Lairese All sorrow-smitten? He was hindered too — Was this no hardship? — from producing, plain
To us who still have eyes, the pagantry Which passed and passed before his busy
brain
And, captured on his canvas, showed our sky
Traversed by flying shapes, earth stocked with brood
Of monsters, — centaurs bestial, satyrs lewd, —
Not without much Olympian glory, shapes
Of god and goddess in their gay escapes 60
From the severe serene: or haply paced The antique ways, god-counselled, nymph-embraced,
Some early human kingly personage.
Such wonders of the teeming poet's-age Were still to be: nay, these indeed began — Are not the pictures extant? — till the ban Of blindness struck both palette from his thumb
And pencil from his finger.

II.

Blind — not dumb,
Else, Gerard, were my inmost bowels stirred
With pity beyond pity: no, the word

² A great authority on Joan of Arc.

³ Mr. Browning's son has painted a picture of Joan bathing.

Was left upon your unmolested lips:
 Your mouth unsealed, despite of 'eyes'
 eclipse, Talked all brain's yearning into birth. I lack Somehow the heart to wish your practice
 back Which boasted hand's achievement in a score
 Of veritable pictures, less or more, Still to be seen: myself have seen them, —
 moved
 To pay due homage to the man I loved Because of that prodigious book he wrote 10 On Artistry's Ideal, by taking note, Making acquaintance with his artist-work.
 So my youth's piety obtained success
 Of 'all-too dubious sort: for, though it irk
 To tell the issue, few or none would guess From extant lines and colours, De Lairese, Your faculty, although each deftly-grouped And aptly-ordered figure-piece was judged Worthy a prince's purchase in its day.
 Bearded experience bears not to be duped 20 Like boyish fancy: 'twas a boy that budged No foot's breadth from your visioned steps
 away
 The while that memorable "Walk" he trudged
 In your companionship, — the Book must
 say Where, when and whither, — "Walk," come what come may,
 No measurer of steps on this our globe Shall ever match for marvels. Faustus'
 robe,
 And Fortunatus' cap were gifts of price:
 But — oh, your piece of sober sound advice
 That artists should descry abundant worth 30 In trivial commonplace, nor groan at dearth If fortune bade the painter's craft be plied In vulgar town and country! Why despond
 Because hemmed round by Dutch canals?
 Beyond
 The ugly actual, lo, on every side Imagination's limitless domain Displayed a wealth of wondrous sounds and sights
 Ripe to be realised by poet's brain Acting on painter's brush! "Ye doubt?
 Poor sights,
 What if I set example, go before, 40 While you come after, and we both explore Holland turned Dreamland, taking care to
 note Objects whereto my pupils may devote Attention with advantage?"

III.

So commenced

That "Walk" amid true wonders — none
 to you,

But huge to us ignobly common-sensed, Purlblind, while plain could proper optics
 view
 In that old sepulchre by lightning split, Whereof the lid bore carven, — any dolt Imagines why, — Jove's very thunderbolt:
 You who could straight perceive, by glance at it, This tomb must needs be Phaeton's! In a trice,
 Confirming that conjecture, close on hand, Behold, half out, half in the ploughed-up
 sand,
 A chariot-wheel explained its bolt-device:
 What other than the Chariot of the Sun Ever let drop the like? Consult the tome —¹
 I bid inglorious tarriers-at-home —
 For greater still surprise the while that
 "Walk"
 Went on and on, to end as it begun, Choke-full of chances, changes, every one No whit less wondrous. What was there to baulk Us, who had eyes, from seeing? You with none
 Missed not a marvel: wherefore? Let us talk.

IV.

Say am I right? Your sealed sense moved your mind,
 Free from obstruction, to compassionate Art's power left powerless, and supply the blind
 With fancies worth all facts denied by fate.
 Mind could invent things, and to — take
 away,
 At pleasure, leave out trifles mean and base Which vex the sight that cannot say them
 nay
 But, where mind plays the master, have no
 place.
 And bent on banishing was mind, be sure,
 All except beauty from its mustered tribe Of objects apparitional which lure Painter to show and poet to describe — That imagery of the antique song Truer than truth's self. Fancy's rainbow-
 birth Conceived mid clouds in Greece, could glance along
 Your passage o'er Dutch veritable earth,
 As with ourselves, who see, familiar throng
 About our paces men and women worth Nowise a glance — so poets apprehend — Since nought avails portraying them in verse:
 While painters turn upon the heel, intend To spare their work the critic's ready curse
 Due to the daily and undignified.

 Lairese. Translated by J. F. Fritsch, 1778.

v.

I who myself contentedly abide Awake, nor want the wings of dream, — who tramp Earth's common surface, rough, smooth, dry or damp,
 — I understand alternatives, no less — Conceive your soul's leap, Gerard de Lairese!
 How were it could I mingle false with true, Boast, with the sights I see, your vision too?
 Advantage would it prove or detriment If I saw double? Could I gaze intent On Dryope plucking the blossoms red, As you, whereat her lote-tree writhed and
 bled,
 Yet lose no gain, no hard fast wide-awake Having and holding nature for the sake Of nature only — nymph and lote-tree thus Gained by the loss of fruit not fabulous, Apple of English homesteads, where I see Nor seek more than crisp buds a struggling bee Uncrumples, caught by sweet he clambers
 through?
 Truly, a moot point: make it plain to me, Who, bee-like, sate sense with the simply
 true,
 Nor seek to heighten that sufficiency
 By help of feignings proper to the page — Earth's surface-blank whereon the elder
 age
 Put colour, poetising — poured rich life On what were else a dead ground — nothingness —
 Until the solitary world grew rife
 With Joves and Junos, nymphs and satyrs.
 Yes,
 The reason was, fancy composed the strife
 'Twixt sense and soul: for sense, my De Lairese,
 Cannot content itself with outward things, Mere beauty: soul must needs know whence there springs — How, when and why — what sense but loves, nor lists
 To know at all.

vi.

Not one of man's acquits Ought he resignedly to lose, methinks:
 So, point me out which was it of the links Snapt first, from out the chain which used to bind
 Our earth to heaven, and yet for you, since
 blind,
 Subsisted still efficient and intact?
 Oh, we can fancy too! but somehow fact Has got to — say, not so much push aside Fancy, as to declare its place supplied By fact unscen but no less fact the same, Which mind bids sense accept. Is mind
 to blame,
 Or sense, — does that usurp, this abdicate?

First of all, as you "walked" — were it too
 late

For us to walk, if so we willed? Confess
 We have the sober feet still, De Lairese!
 Why not the freakish brain too, that must
 needs

Supplement nature — not see flowers and weeds

Simply as such, but link with each and all The ultimate perfection — what we call Rightly enough the human shape divine?
 The rose? No rose unless it disentwine From Venus' wreath the while she bends to kiss

Her deathly love?

vii.

Plain retrogression, this!

No, no: we poets go not back at all:

What you did we could do — from great to small

Sinking assuredly: if this world last

One moment longer when Man finds its Past

Exceed its Present — blame the Protoplast! 6a
 If we no longer see as you of old,

'Tis we see deeper. Progress for the bold!

You saw the body, 'tis the soul we see.

Try now! Bear witness while you walk
 with me,

I see as you: if we loose arms, stop pace,
 'Tis that you stand still, I conclude the race

Without your company. Come, walk once
 more

The "Walk": if I to-day as you of yore See just like you the blind — then sight shall cry

 — The whole long day quite gone through 7a
 — victory!

viii.

Thunders on thunders, doubling and re-doubling

Doom o'er the mountain, while a sharp white fire

Now shone, now sheared its rusty herbage, troubling

Hardly the fir-boles, now discharged its ire Full where some pine-tree's solitary spire

Crashed down, defiant to the last: till —
 lo,

The motive of the malice! — all aglow, Circled with flame there yawned a sudden rift

I' the rock-face, and I saw a form erect Front and defy the outrage, while — as 8a checked,

Chidden, beside him dauntless in the drift —

Cowered a heaped creature, wing and wing outspread

In deprecation o'er the crouching head Still hungry for the feast foregone awhile.

O thou, of scorn's unconquerable smile

Was it when this — Jove's feathered fury — slipped Gore-glutted from the heart's core whence he ripped —
 This eagle-hound — neither reproach nor prayer —
 Baffled, in one more fierce attempt to tear Fate's secret from thy safeguard, — was it
 then
 That all these thunders rent earth, ruined
 air
 To reach thee, pay thy patronage of men?
 He thundered, — to withdraw, as beast to lair,
 Before the triumph on thy pallid brow.
 10 Gather the night again about thee now, Hate on, love ever! Morn is breaking
 there —
 The granite ridge pricks through the mist, turns gold
 As wrong turns right. O laughter manifold
 Of ocean's ripple at dull earth's despair!

IX.

But morning's laugh sets all the crags alight
 Above the baffled tempest: tree and tree Stir themselves from the stupor of the night, And every strangled branch resumes its
 right
 To breathe, shakes loose dark's clinging dregs, waves free 20 In dripping glory. Prone the runnels plunge,
 While earth, distent with moisture like a sponge, Smokes up, and leaves each plant its gem
 to see, Each grass-blade's glory-glitter. Had I
 known
 The torrent now turned river? — masterful Making its rush o'er tumbled ravage —
 stone
 And stub which barred the froths and foams: no bull Ever broke bounds in formidable sport
 . More overwhelmingly, till lo, the spasm Sets him to dare that last mad leap: report 30 Who may — his fortunes in the deathly chasm
 That swallows him in silence! Rather
 turn Whither, upon the upland, pedestalled Into the broad day-splendour, whom discern
 These eyes but thee, supreme one, rightly called Moon-maid in heaven above and, here
 below,
 Earth's huntress-queen? I note the garb succinct Saving from smirch that purity of snow From breast to knee — snow's self with just the tinct

Of the apple-blossom's heart-blush. Ah, the bow Slack-strung her fingers grasp, where, ivory-linked Horn curving blends with horn, a moon-like pair
 Which mimic the brow's crescent sparkling
 so —
 As if a star's live restless fragment winked Proud yet repugnant, captive in such hair
 What hope along the hillside, what far bliss Lets the crisp hair-plaits fall so low they kiss
 Those lucid shoulders? Must a morn so blithe, Needs have its sorrow when the twang and hiss
 Tell that from out thy sheaf one shaft makes writhe
 Its victim, thou unerring Artemis?
 Why did the chamois stand so fair a mark Arrested by the novel shape he dreamed Was bred of liquid marble in the dark Depths of the mountain's womb which ever teemed
 With novel births of wonder? Not one
 spark
 Of pity in that steel-grey glance which gleamed
 At the poor hoof's protesting as it stamped Idly the granite? Let me glide unseen From thy proud presence: well mayst thou be queen
 Of all those strange and sudden deaths which damped
 So oft Love's torch and Hymen's taper lit
 For happy marriage till the maidens paled
 And perished on the temple-step, assailed
 By — what except to envy must man's wit Impute that sure implacable release Of life from warmth and joy? But death means peace.

X.

Noon is the conqueror, — not a spray, no
 leaf,
 Nor herb, nor blossom but has rendered up Its morning dew: the valley seemed one
 cup
 Of cloud-smoke, but the vapour's reign was brief, Sun-smitten, see, it hangs — the filmy
 haze —
 Grey-garmenting the herbless mountain-
 side,
 To soothe the day's sharp glare: while far
 and wide
 Above unclouded burns the sky, one blaze
 With fierce immitigable blue, no bird Ventures to spot by passage. E'en of peaks Which still presume there, plain each pale point speaks
 In wan transparency of waste incurred

By over-daring: far from me be such!
 Deep in the hollow, rather, where combine Tree, shrub and briar to roof with shade and cool
 The remnant of some lily-strangled pool, Edged round with mossy fringing soft and
 fine.
 Smooth lie the bottom slabs, and overhead Watch elder, bramble, rose, and service-
 tree
 And one beneficent rich barberry Jewelled all over with fruit-pendants red.
 What have I seen! O Satyr, well I know How sad thy case, and what a world of woe Was hid by the brown visage furry-framed Only for mirth: who otherwise could
 think —
 Marking thy mouth gape still on laughter's
 brink,
 Thine eyes a-swim with merriment unnamed
 But haply guessed at by their furtive wink?
 And all the while a heart was panting sick Behind that shaggy bulwark of thy
 breast —
 Passion it was that made those breathbursts thick
 I took for mirth subsiding into rest.
 So, it was Lyda — she of all the train Of forest-thridding nymphs, — 'twas only
 she Turned from thy rustic homage in disdain, Saw but that poor uncouth outside of thee,
 And, from her circling sisters, mocked a pain Echo had pitied — whom Pan loved in vain —
 For she was wishful to partake thy glee, Mimic thy mirth — who loved her not
 again,
 Savage for Lyda's sake. She crouches
 there —
 Thy cruel beauty, slumberously laid Supine on heaped-up beast-skins, unaware Thy steps have traced her to the briary glade, Thy greedy hands disclose the cradling
 lair,
 Thy hot eyes reach and revel on the maid!

XI.

Now, what should this be for? The sun's decline
 Seems as he lingered lest he lose some act Dread and decisive, some prodigious fact Like thunder from the safe sky's sapphirine About to alter earth's conditions, packed With fate for nature's self that waits, aware What mischief unsuspected in the air Menaces momentarily a cataract.
 Therefore it is that yonder space extends Untrenched upon by any vagrant tree, Shrub, weed well nigh; they keep their bounds, leave free

The platform for what actors? Foes or
 friends,
 Here come they trooping silent: heaven
 suspends
 Purpose the while they range themselves.
 I see!
 Bent on a battle, two vast powers agree
 This present and no after-contest ends 50
 One or the other's grasp at rule in reach Over the race of man — host fronting host,
 As statue statue fronts — wrath-molten
 each,
 Solidified by hate, — earth halved almost,
 To close once more in chaos. Yet two shapes
 Show prominent, each from the universe
 Of minions round about him, that disperse Like cloud-obstruction when a bolt escapes.
 Who flames first? Macedonian is it thou?
 Ay, and who fronts thee, King Darius, 60 drapes
 His form with purple, fillet-folds his brow.

XII.

What, then the long day dies at last?
 Abrupt
 The sun that seemed, in stooping, sure to melt
 Our mountain ridge, is mastered: black the belt
 Of westward crags, his gold could not corrupt, Barriers again the valley, lets the flow Of lavish glory waste itself away — Whither? For new climes, fresh eyes breaks the day!
 Night was not to be baffled. If the glow Were all that's gone from us! Did clouds, 70 afloat
 So filmily but now, discard no rose, Sombre throughout the fleeciness that grows
 A sullen uniformity. I note Rather displeasure, — in the overspread Change from the swim of gold to one pale lead Oppressive to malevolence, — than late Those amorous yearnings when the aggregate
 Of cloudlets pressed that each and all might save
 Its passion and partake in relics red Of day's bequeathment: now, a frown 80
 instead Estranges, and affrights who needs must fare
 On and on till his journey ends: but
 where?
 Caucasus? Lost now in the night. Away
 And far enough lies that Arcadia.
 The human heroes tread the world's dark
 way
 No longer. Yet I dimly see almost —

Yes, for my last adventure! 'Tis a ghost.
So drops away the beauty! There he stands Voiceless, scarce strives with deprecating
hands.

XIII.

- Enough! Stop further fooling, De Laisse!
My fault, not yours! Some fitter way express
Heart's satisfaction that the Past indeed Is past, gives way before Life's best and
last,
The all-including Future! What were life Did soul stand still therein, forego her
strife
- 10 Through the ambiguous Present to the goal Of some all-reconciling Future? Soul, Nothing has been which shall not bettered
be Hereafter, — leave the root, by law's decree
Whence springs the ultimate and perfect
tree!
Busy thee with unearthing root? Nay, climb —
Quit trunk, branch, leaf and flower — reach, rest sublime
Where fruitage ripens in the blaze of day!
O'erlook, despise, forget, throw flower
away, Intent on progress? No whit more than stop
- 20 Ascent therewith to dally, screen the top Sufficiency of yield by interposed Twistwork bold foot gets free from.
Wherefore glozed
The poets — "Dream afresh old godlike
shapes,
Recapture ancient fable that escapes, Push back reality, repeople earth With vanished falseness, recognise no
worth
In fact new-born unless 'tis rendered back Pallid by fancy, as the western rack Of fading cloud bequeaths the lake some gleam
- 30 Of its gone glory!"

XIV.

Let things be — not seem,
I counsel rather, — do, and nowise dream!
Earth's young significance is all to learn:
The dead Greek lore lies buried in the urn Where who seeks fire finds ashes. Ghost, forsooth!
What was the best Greece babbled of as
truth?
"A shade, a wretched nothing, — sad,
thin, drear,
Cold, dark, it holds on to the lost loves here, If hand have haply spring'd o'er the
dead

Three charitable dust-heaps, made mouth
red
One moment by the sip of sacrifice:
Just so much comfort thaws the stubborn
ice Slow-thickening upward till it choke at length
The last faint flutter craving — not for
strength,
Not beauty, not the riches and the rule O'er men that made life life indeed." Sad school
Was Hades! Gladly, — might the dead but slink
To life back, — to the dregs once more would drink
Each interloper, drain the humblest cup Fate mixes for humanity.

XV.

Cheer up, —
Be death with me, as with Achilles erst,
Of Man's calamities the last and worst:
Take it so! By proved potency that still Makes perfect, be assured, come what come will,
What once lives never dies — what here attains
To a beginning, has no end, still gains And never loses aught: when, where, and
how —
Lies in Law's lap. What's death then?
Even now
With so much knowledge is it hard to bear Brief interposing ignorance? Is care For a creation found at fault just there — There where the heart breaks bond and outruns time,
To reach, not follow what shall be?

XVI.

Here's rhyme
Such as one makes now, — say, when Spring repeats
That miracle the Greek Bard sadly greets:
"Spring for the tree and herb — no Spring for us!"
Let Spring come: why, a man salutes her
thus:

Dance, yellows and whites and reds, — Lead your gay orgy, leaves, stalks, heads Astir with the wind in the tulip-beds!

There's sunshine; scarcely a wind at all Disturbs starved grass and daisies small On a certain mound by a churchyard
wall.

Daisies and grass be my heart's bedfellows On the mound wind spares and sunshine mellows:

Dance you, reds and whites and yellows!

WITH CHARLES AVISON.

* [See "Dictionary of National Biography," vol. ii. Charles Avison was born at Newcastle in 1710 (?), and died there in 1770. He was organist of St. Nicholas' Church. He published in 1752 "An Essay on Musical Expression," which attracted much notice, and is still respected. Avison preferred the French and Italian schools of music to the German.]

I.

How strange! — but, first of all, the little
fact Which led my fancy forth. This bitter morn
Showed me no object in the stretch forlorn Of garden-ground beneath my window, backed
By yon worn wall wherefrom the creeper, tacked
To clothe its brickwork, hangs now, rent and racked
By five months' cruel winter, — showed no torn And tattered ravage worse for eyes to see Than just one ugly space of clearance, left to Bare even of the bones which used to be Warm wrappage, safe embracement: this one cleft —
— O what a life and beauty filled it up Startlingly, when methought the rude clay
cup
Ran over with poured bright wine! 'Twas a bird Breast-deep there, tugging at his prize, deterred
No whit by the fast-falling snow-flake:
gain
Such prize my blackcap must by might and main —
The cloth-shred, still a-flutter from its nail That fixed a spray once. Now, what told the tale
to To thee, — no townsman but born orchard-thief, —
That here — surpassing moss-tuft, beard from sheaf
Of sun-scorched barley, horsehairs long and stout,
All proper country-pillage — here, no
doubt,
Was just the scrap to steal should line thy nest
Superbly? Off he flew, his bill possessed
The booty sure to set his wife's each wing Greenly a-quiver. How they climb and cling,
Hang parrot-wise to bough, these blackcaps! Strange Seemed to a city-dweller that the finch

Should stray so far to forage: at a pinch, 34 Was not the fine wool's self within his range — Filchings on every fence? But no: the need
Was of this rag of manufacture, spoiled
By art, and yet by nature near unsoiled, New-suited to what scheming finch would breed
In comfort, this uncomfortable March.

II.

Yet — by the first pink blossom on the larch! —
This was scarce stranger than that memory, —
In want of what should cheer the stay-at-
home,
My soul, — must straight clap pinion, well 40 nigh roam
A century back, nor once close plume, descry
The appropriate rag to plunder, till she pounced —
Pray, on what relic of a brain long still?
What old-world work proved forage for the bill Of memory the far-flyer? "March" announced,
I verily believe, the dead and gone Name of a music-maker: one of such In England as did little or did much,
But, doing, had their day once. Avison!
Singly and solely for an air of thine, 50 Bold-stepping "March," foot stept to ere my hand Could stretch an octave, I o'erlooked the band
Of majesties familiar, to decline
On thee — not too conspicuous on the list Of worthies who by help of pipe or wire Expressed in sound rough rage or soft desire —
Thou, whilom of Newcastle organist!

III.

So much could one — well, thinnish air
effect.
Am I ungrateful? for, your March, styled
"Grand,"
Did veritably seem to grow, expand, 60
And greaten up to title as, unchecked, Dream-marchers marched, kept marching,
slow and sure,
In time, to tune, unchangeably the same, From nowhere into nowhere, — out they
came,
Onward they passed, and in they went.
No lure
Of novel modulation pricked the flat Forthright persisting melody, — no hint That discord, sound asleep beneath the flint,

— Struck — might spring spark-like, claim due tit-for-tat, Quenched in a concord. No! Yet, such
 the night
 Of quietude's immutability, That somehow coldness gathered warmth, well nigh Quickened — which could not be! — grew burning bright
 With life-shriek, cymbal-clash and trumpetblare,
 To drum-accentuation: pacing turned Striding, and striding grew gigantic,
 spurned
 At last the narrow space 'twixt earth and
 air, 10 So shook me back into my sober self.

IV.

And where woke I? The March had set me down There whence I plucked the measure, as his brown Frayed flannel-bit my blackcap. Great John Relfe,
 Master of mine, learned, redoubtable,
 It little needed thy consummate skill To fity figure such a bass! The key Was — should not memory play me false — well, C.
 Ay, with the Greater Third, in Triple
 Time,
 Three crotchets to a bar: no change, I
 grant,
 20 Except from Tonic down to Dominant.
 And yet — and yet — if I could put in rhyme
 The manner of that marching! — which had stopped
 — I wonder, where? — but that my weak self dropped From out the ranks, to rub eyes disentranced
 And feel that, after all the way advanced, Back must I foot it, I and my com-
 peers,
 Only to reach, across a hundred years,
 The bandsman Avison whose little book And large tune thus had led me the long
 way 30 (As late a rag my blackcap) from today
 And to-day's music-manufacture, — Brahms, Wagner, Dvorak, Liszt, — to where — trumpets, shawns, Show yourselves joyfull! — Handel reigns
 — supreme?
 By no means! Buononcini's work is theme
 For fit laudation of the impartial few:
 (We stand in England, mind you!) Fashion too

Favours Geminiani! — of those choice Concertos: nor there wants a certain voice Raised in thy favour likewise, famed Pepusch?
 Dear to our great-grandfathers! In a bush
 Of Doctor's wig, they prized thee timing beats While Greenway trilled "Alexis." Such were feats Of music in thy day — dispute who list — Avison, of Newcastle organist!

V.

And here's your music all alive once
 more
 As once it was alive, at least: just so
 The figured worthies of a waxwork-show Attest — such people, years and years ago, Looked thus when outside death had life
 below,
 — Could say "We are now," not "We were of yore,"
 "Feel how our pulses leap!" and not
 "Expire —
 Explain why quietude has settled o'er Surface once all-aw-^{rk}!" Ay, such a
 "Suite"
 Roused heart to rapture, such a "Fugue" would catch Soul heavenwards up, when time was:
 why attach Blame to exhausted faultlessness, no
 match
 For fresh achievement? Feat once — ever feat!
 How can completion grow still more complete?
 Hear Avison? He tenders evidence That music in his day as much absorbed Heart and soul then as Wagner's music
 now.
 Perfect from centre to circumference — Orbed to the full can be but fully orbed:
 And yet — and yet — whence comes it that "O Thou" — Sighed by the soul at eve to Hesperus — Will not again take wing and fly away (Since fatal Wagner fixed it fast for us)
 In some unmodulated minor? Nay, Even by Handel's help!

VI.

I state it thus:
 There is no truer truth obtainable
 By Man than comes of music. "Soul" — (accept A word which vaguely names what no adept

* An Italian fiddler, who came to London in 1714.

* A German musician, organist at the Charter House; died 1752.

In word-use fits and fixes so that still Thing shall not slip word's fetter and remain Innominate as first, yet, free again,
 Is no less recognised the absolute Fact underlying that same other fact Concerning which no cavil can dispute Our nomenclature when we call it
 "Mind" — Something not Matter) — "Soul," who seeks shall find Distinct beneath that something. You exact
 to An illustrative image? This may suit.

VII.

We see a work: the worker works behind, Invisible himself. Suppose his act
 Be to o'erarch a gulf: he digs, transports, Shapes and, through enginery — all sizes,
 sorts,
 Lays stone by stone until a floor compact Proves our bridged causeway. So works Mind — by stress
 Of faculty, with loose facts, more or less, Builds up our solid knowledge: all the
 same,
 Underneath rolls what Mind may hide not tame,
 to An element which works beyond our guess, Soul, the unsounded sea — whose lift of surge,
 Spite of all superstructure, lets emerge, In flower and foam, Feeling from out the deeps Mind arrogates no mastery upon — Distinct indisputably. Has there gone To dig up, drag forth, render smooth from rough Mind's flooring, — operosity enough?
 Still the successive labour of each inch, Who lists may learn: from the last turn of winch to That let the polished slab-stone find its
 place,
 To the first prod of pick-axe at the base Of the unquarried mountain, — what was
 all Mind's varied process except natural,
 Nay, easy, even, to descry, describe, After our fashion? "So worked Mind: its tribe
 Of senses ministrant above, below, Far, near, or now or haply long ago Brought to pass knowledge." But Soul's sea, — drawn whence, Fed how, forced whither, — by what evidence
 to Of ebb and flow, that's felt beneath the tread, Soul has its course 'neath Mind's work overhead, —
 Who tells of, tracks to source the founts of
 Soul?

Yet wherefore heaving sway and restless roll
 This side and that, except to emulate Stability above? To match and mate Feeling with knowledge, — make as manifest Soul's work as Mind's work, turbulence as
 rest,
 Hates, loves, joys, woes, hopes, fears, that rise and sink Ceaselessly, passion's transient flit and
 wink,
 A ripple's tinting or a spume-sheet's spread 54 Whitening the wave, — to strike all this life dead,
 Run mercury into a mould like lead,
 And henceforth have the plain result to
 show —
 How we Feel, hard and fast as what we Know —
 This were the prize and is the puzzle! —
 which Music essays to solve: and here's the hitch That baulks her of full triumph else to boast.

VIII.

All Arts endeavour this, and she the most Attains thereto, yet fails of touching:
 why?
 Does Mind get Knowledge from Art's 60 ministry?
 What's known once is known ever: Arts arrange,
 Dissociate, re-distribute, interchange Part with part, lengthen, broaden, high or deep Construct their bravest, — still such pains produce Change, not creation: simply what lay loose
 At first lies firmly after, what design Was faintly traced in hesitating line Once on a time, grows firmly resolute Henceforth and evermore. Now, could we shoot
 Liquidity into a mould, — some way 70 Arrest Soul's evanescent moods, and keep Unalterably still the forms that leap To life for once by help of Art! — which
 years
 To save its capture: Poetry discerns, Painting is 'ware of passion's rise and
 fall,
 Bursting, subsidence, intermixture — all A-seethe within the gulf. Each Art
 a-strain
 Would stay the apparition, — nor in vain:
 The Poet's word-mesh, Painter's sure and swift Colour-and-line-throw — proud the prize 80 they lift!
 Thus felt Man and thus looked Man, — passions caught

I' the midway swim of sea, — not much, if aught,
 Of nether-brooding loves, hates, hopes and
 fears, Enwombed past Art's disclosure. Fleet
 the years,
 And still the Poet's page holds Helena At gaze from topmost Troy — "But where are they,
 My brothers, in the armament I name Hero by hero? Can it be that shame For their lost sister holds them from the war?"
 — Knowing not they already slept afar 10 Each of them in his own dear native land.
 Still on the Painter's fresco, from the hard
 Of God takes Eve the life-spark whereunto
 She trembles up from nothingness. Outdo Both of them, Music! Dredging deeper
 yet, Drag into day, — by sound, thy master-net, —
 The abysmal bottom-growth, ambiguous
 thing
 Unbroken of a branch, palpitating
 With limbs' play and life's semblance!
 There it lies,
 Marvel and mystery, of mysteries 20 And marvels, most to love and laud thee
 for!
 Save it from chance and change we most abhor!
 Give momentary feeling permanence,
 So that thy capture hold, a century hence, Truth's very heart of truth as, safe to-day,
 The Painter's Eve, the Poet's Helena, Still rapturously bend, afar still throw The wistful gaze! Thanks, Homer, Angelo!
 Could Music rescue thus from Soul's profound,
 Give feeling immortality by sound, 30 Then were she queenliest of Arts! Alas —
 As well expect the rainbow not to pass!
 "Praise 'Radaminta'¹ — love attains therein
 To perfect utterance! Pity — what shall win Thy secret like 'Rinaldo'?"¹ — so men
 said:
 Once all was perfume — now, the flower is dead —
 They spied tints, sparks have left the spar!
 Love, hate,
 Joy, fear, survive, — alike importunate
 As ever to go walk the world again, Nor ghost-like pant for outlet all in vain 40 Till Music loose them, fit each filimly With form enough to know and name it by For any recogniser sure of ken And sharp of ear, no grosser denizen

Of earth than needs be. Nor to such appeal
 Is Music long obdurate: off they steal — How gently, dawn-doomed phantoms!
 back come they Full-blooded with new crimson of broad
 day — Passion made palpable once more. Ye
 look Your last on Handel? Gaze your first on Gluck!
 Why wistful search, O waning ones, the 50 chart
 Of stars for you while Haydn, while Mozart Occupies heaven? These also, fanned to
 fire, Flamboyant wholly, — so perfections tire, — Whiten to wanness, till . . . let others
 note
 The ever-new invasion!

IX.

I devote Rather my modicum of parts to use What power may yet avail to re-infuse (In fancy, please you!) sleep that looks like death
 With momentary liveliness, lend breath
 To make the torpor half inhale. O Relfe, 60
 An all-unworthy pupil, from the shelf
 Of thy laboratory, dares unstop Bottle, ope box, extract thence pinch and
 drop
 Of dusts and dews a many thou didst
 shrine
 Each in its right receptacle, assign To each its proper office, letter large Label and label, then with solemn charge, Reviewing learnedly the list complete Of chemical reactives, from thy feet Push down the same to me, attent below, 70
 Power in abundance: armed wherewith
 I go
 To play the enlivener. Bring good antique stuff!
 Was it alight once? Still lives spark
 enough
 For breath to quicken, run the smouldering ash Red right-through. What, "stone-dead" were fools so rash
 As style my Avison, because he lacked Modern appliance, spread out phrase un-raked
 By modulations fit to make each hair Stiffen upon his wig? See there — and
 there!
 I sprinkle my reactives, pitch broadcast 80 Discords and resolutions, turn aghast Melody's easy-going, jostle law
 With licence, modulate (no Bach in awe), Change enharmonically (Hudl to thank),

And lo, upstart the flamelets, — what was blank Turns scarlet, purple, crimson! Straightway scanned
 By eyes that like new lustre — Love once
 more Yearns through the Largo, Hatred as
 before Rages in the Rubato: e'en thy March, My Avison, which, sooth to say — (ne'er arch Eyebrows in anger!) — timed, in Georgian
 years
 The step precise of British Grenadiers
 To such a nicety, — if score I crowd,
 If rhythm I break, if beats I vary, — tap At bar's off-starting turns true thunder-
 clap,
 Ever the pace augmented till — what's
 here?
 Titanic striding toward Olympus!

X.

Fear

No such irreverent innovation! Still Glide on, go rolling, water-like, at will — Nay, were thy melody in monotone, The due three-parts dispensed with!

XI.

This alone

Comes of my tiresome talking: Music's
 throne
 Seats somebody whom somebody unseats, And whom in turn — by who knows what new feats Of strength, — shall somebody as sure push down, Consign him dispossessed of sceptre, crown,
 And orb imperial — whereto? — Never
 dream
 That what once lived shall ever die!
 They seem Dead — do they? lapsed things lost in limbo? Bring Our life to kindle theirs, and straight each
 king
 Starts, you shall see, stands up, from head
 to foot
 No inch that is not Purcell! Wherefore?
 (Suit Measure to subject, first — no marching on Yet in thy bold C Major, Avison, As suited step a minute since: no: wait —
 Into the minor key first modulate — Gently with A, now — in the Lesser Third!)

XII.

Of all the lamentable debts incurred By Man through buying knowledge, this were worst:

That he should find his last gain prove his
 first
 Was futile — merely nescience absolute, Not knowledge in the bud which holds a fruit Haply undreamed of in the soul's Spring-
 tide,
 Pursed in the petals Summer opens wide, 40
 And Autumn, withering, rounds to perfect ripe, —
 Not this, — but ignorance, a blur to wipe From human records, late it graced so
 much.
 "Truth — this attainment? Ah, but such and such Beliefs of yore seemed inexpugnable When we attained them! E'en as they, so will
 This their successor have the due morn,
 noon,
 Evening and night — just as an old-world
 tune Wears out and drops away, until who hears Smilingly questions — 'This it was brought 50
 tears
 Once to all eyes, — this roused heart's rapture once?'
 So will it be with truth that, for the nonce, Styles itself truth perennial: 'ware its wile!
 Knowledge turns nescience, — foremost on the file, Simply proves first of our delusions."

XIII.

Now —

Blare it forth, bold C Major! Lift thy
 brow,
 Man, the immortal, that wast never fooled
 With gifts no gifts at all, nor ridiculed — Man knowing — he who nothing knew!
 As Hope,
 Fear, Joy, and Grief, — though ampler 60 stretch and scope
 They seek and find in novel rhythm, fresh
 phrase, —
 Were equally existent in far days
 Of Music's dim beginning — even so, Truth was at full within thee long ago,
 Alive as now it takes what latest shape May startle thee by strangeness. Truths escape
 Time's insufficient garniture: they fade, They fall — those sheathings now grown sere, whose aid
 Was infinite to truth they wrapped, saved
 fine
 And free through March frost: May dews 70 crystalline Nourish truth merely, — does June boast the fruit
 As — not new vesture merely but, to boot, Novel creation? Soon shall fade and fall Myth after myth — the husk-like lies I
 call

New truth's corolla-safeguard: Autumn
comes,
So much the better!

XIV.

Therefore — bang the drums, Blow the trumpets, Avison! March-motive? that's Truth which en^dures r setting. Sharps and flats, Lavish at need, shall dance athwart thy score
When ophicleide and bombard...s uproar Mate the approaching trample, even now Big in the distance — or my ears deceive — Of federated England, fitly weave to March-music for the Future!

XV.

Or suppose

Back, and not forward, transformation goes?
Once more some sable-stoled procession —
say,
From Little-ease to Tyburn — wends its
way,
Out of the dungeon to the gallows-tree Where heading, hacking, hanging is to be Of half-a-dozen recusants — this day Three hundred years ago! How duly drones Elizabethan plain-song — dim antique Grown clarion-clear the while I humbly wreak
to A classic vengeance on thy March! It moans —
Larges and Longs and Breves displacing
quite Crotchet-and-quaver pertness — brushing bars
Aside and filling vacant sky with stars Hidden till now that day returns to night.

XVI.

Nor night nor day: one purpose move us
both,
Be thy mood mine! As thou wast minded,
Man's
The cause our music champions: I were
loth
To think we cheered our troop to Preston Pans Ignobly: back to times of England's best!
to Parliament stands for privilege — life and limb
Guards Hollis, Haselrig, Strode, Hampden, Pym,
The famous Five: There's rumour of arrest.
Bring up the Train Bands, Southwark!
They protest: Shall we not all join chorus? Hark the hymn,
— Rough, rude, robustious — homely heart a-throb,

Harsh voice a-hallo, as beseems the mob!
How good is noise! what's silence but
despair
Of making sound match gladness never
there?
Give me some great glad "subject," glorious Bach,
Where cannon-roar not organ-peal we lack! 10 Join in, give voice robustious rude and
rough, —
Avison helps — so heart lend noise enough!
Fife, trump, drum, sound! and singers
then,
Marching, say "Pym, the man of men!"
Up, heads, your proudest — out, throats, your loudest —
"Somerset's Pym!"

Strafford from the block, Eliot from the den, Foes, friends, shout "Pym, our citizen!" Wail, the foes he quelled, — hail, the friends he held,
"Tavistock's Pym!" 50

Hearts prompt heads, hands that ply the pen
Teach babes unborn the where and when — Tyrants, he braved them, — patriots, he saved them —
"Westminster's Pym!"

Lustily.

FUST AND HIS FRIENDS.

AN EPILOGUE

[Fust or Faust was a German printer, and a partner of Gutenberg from about 1450 to 1455. On the dissolution of the partnership, Fust carried on the business with his son-in-law, Peter Schöffer. Whether Fust was really the inventor of the movable types, is uncertain.]

Inside the House of Fust, Mayence, 1457.

FIRST FRIEND.

Up, up, up — next step of the staircase Lands us, lo, at the chamber of dread!

SECOND FRIEND.

Locked and barred?

THIRD FRIEND.

Door open — the rare case!

FOURTH FRIEND.

Ay, there he leans — lost wretch!

FIFTH FRIEND.

His head
Sunk on his desk 'twixt his arms outspread!

SIXTH FRIEND.

Hallo, — wake, man, ere God thunder-strike Mayence
— Mulct for thy sake who art Satan's, John Fust!

Satan installed here, God's rule in abeyance, Mayence some morning may crumble to
dust.

Answer our questions thou shalt and thou
must!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Softly and fairly! Wherefore a-gloom?
Greet us, thy gossipry, cousin and sib!
Raise the forlorn brow, Fust! Make room —

Let daylight through arms which, en-folding thee, crib From those clenched lids the comfort of sunshine!

FIRST FRIEND.

So glib

Thy tongue slides to "comfort" already?
Not mine!

Behoves us deal roundly: the wretch is distraught — Too well I guess wherefore! Behoves a Divine

— Such as I, by grace, boast me — to threaten one caught

In the enemy's toils, — setting "comfort" ²⁰ at nought.

SECOND FRIEND.

Nay, Brother, so hasty? I heard — nor long since —

Of a certain Black Artsman who, — helplessly bound

By rash pact with Satan, — through pay ing — why mince

The matter? — fit price to the Church, — safe and sound
Full a year after death in his grave-clothes was found.

Whereas 'tis notorious the Fiend claims his due

During lifetime, — comes clawing, with talons aflame,
The soul from the flesh-rags left smoking and blue:

So it happed with John Faust; lest John Fust fare the same, — Look up, I adjure thee by God's holy
name!

For neighbours and friends — no foul hell-brood flock we!

Saith Solomon "Words of the wise are as goads:"

Ours prick but to startle from torpor, set
free

Soul and sense from death's drowse.

FIRST FRIEND.

And soul, wakened, unloads Much sin by confession: no mere palinodes!

—"I was youthful and wanton, am old yet no sage:

When angry I cursed, struck and slew:
did I want?

Right and left did I rob: though no war I dared wage

With the Church (God forbid!) — harm her least ministrant —

Still I outraged all else. Now that strength is grown scant,

I am probity's self" — no such bleatings as these!

But avowal of guilt so enormous, it balks

Tongue's telling. Yet penitence prompt may appease

God's wrath at thy bond with the Devil who stalks

— Strides hither to strangle thee!

FUST.

Childhood so talks.

Not rare wit nor ripe age — ye boast them, my neighbours! —

Should lay such a charge on your townsman, this Fust

Who, known for a life spent in pleasures and labours

If freakish yet venial, could scarce be induced

To traffic with fiends.

FIRST FRIEND.

So, my words have unloosed

A plie from those pale lips corrugate but now?

FUST.

Lost count me, yet not as ye lean to surmise.

FIRST FRIEND.

To surmise? to establish! Unbury that
brow!

Look up, that thy judge may read clear in thine eyes!

SECOND FRIEND.

By your leave, Brother Barnabite! Mine to advise!

— Who arraign thee, John Fust! What was bruited erewhile

Now bellows through Mayence. All cry — thou hast trucked

Salvation away for lust's solace! Thy
smile

Takes its hue from hell's smoulder!

FUST.

Too certain! I sucked — Got drunk at the nipple of sense.

SECOND FRIEND.

Thou hast ducked —

Art drowned there, say rather! Faugh — fleshly disport!

How else but by help of Sir Belial didst
win

That Venus-like lady, no drudge of thy sort

Could lure to become his accomplice in sin?

Folk nicknamed her Helen of Troy!

FIRST FRIEND.

Best begin

At the very beginning. Thy father, — all knew,

A mere goldsmith . . .

FUST.

Who knew him, perchance may know this —

He dying left much gold and jewels no few:
Whom these help to court with but seldom shall miss

The love of a leman: true witchcraft, I wis!

FIRST FRIEND.

Dost flout me? 'Tis said, in debauchery's guild Admitted prime guttler and guzzler —
 O swine! —
 To honour thy headship, those tosspots so swilled
 That out of their table there sprouted a vine Whence each claimed a cluster, awaiting thy sign
 To out knife, off mouthful: when — who could suppose Such malice in magic? — each sot woke and found Cold steel but an inch from the neighbour's red nose
 He took for a grape-bunch!

FUST.

Does that so astound Sagacity such as ye boast, — who surround

Your mate with eyes staring, hairs standing erect
 At his magical feats? Are good burghers unversed
 In the humours of toping? Full oft, I suspect,
 Ye, counting your fingers, call thumbkin their first,
 And reckon a groat every guilder disbursed.

What marvel if wags, while the skinker fast brimmed
 Their glass with rare tipples' enticement, should gloat
 — Befooled and befuddled — through optics drink-dimmed — On this draught and that, till each found in his throat
 Our Rhenish smack rightly as Raphael?
 For, note —

They fancied — their fuddling deceived them so grossly — That liquor sprang out of the table itself Through gimlet-holes drilled there, — nor noticed now closely The skinker kept plying my guests, from the shelf
 O'er their heads, with the potable madness.
 No elf

Had need to persuade them a vine rose umbrageous,
 Fruit - bearing, thirst - quenching!
 Enough! I confess To many such fool-pranks, but none so outrageous

That Satan was called in to help me:
 excess
 I own to, I grieve at — no more and no 30
 less.

SECOND FRIEND.

Strange honours were heaped on thee — medal for breast, Chain for neck, sword for thigh: not a lord of the land But acknowledged thee peer! What ambition possessed
 A goldsmith by trade, with craft's grime on his hand,
 To seek such associates?

FUST.

Spare taunts! Understand —

I submit me! 'Of vanities under the sun, Pride seized me at last as concupiscence
 first,
 Crapulosity ever: true Fiends, everyone, Haled this way and that my poor soul:
 thus amerced —
 Forgive and forget me!

44

FIRST FRIEND.

Had flesh sinned the worst,

Yet help were in counsel: the Church could absolve:
 But say not men truly thou barredst escape
 By signing and sealing . . .

SECOND FRIEND.

On me must devolve
 The task of extracting . . .

FIRST FRIEND.

Shall Barnabites ape Us Dominican experts?

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Nay, Masters, — agape

When Hell yawns for a soul, 'tis myself claim the task Of extracting, by just one plain question, God's truth!
 Where's Peter Genesheim thy partner?
 I ask Why, cloistered up still in thy room, the pale youth Slaves tongue-tied — thy trade brooks no 50 tattling forsooth!

No less he, thy fantulus, suffers entrapping, Succumbs to good fellowship: barrel a-broach

Runs freely nor needs any subsequent tapping:

Quoth Peter "That room, none but I dare approach,

Holds secrets will help me to ride in my coach."

He prattles, we profit: in brief, he assures Thou hast taught him to speak so that all men may hear

— Each alike, wide world over, Jews, Pagans, Turks, Moors,

The same as we Christians — speech heard far and near

At one and the same magic moment!

FUST.

That's clear!

Said he — how?

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Is it like he was licensed to learn?

10 Who doubts but thou dost this by aid of the Fiend?

Is it so? So it is, for thou smilest! Go, burn

To ashes, since such proves thy portion, unscreened

By bell, book and candle! Yet lately I weened

Balm yet was in Gilead, — some healing in store

For the friend of my bosom. Men said thou wast sunk

In a sudden despondency: not, as before, Fust gallant and gay with his pottle and punk,

But sober, sad, sick as one yesterday drunk!

FUST.

Spare Fust, then, thus contrite! — who, youthful and healthy,

20 Equipped for life's struggle with culture of mind,

Sound flesh and sane soul in coherence, born wealthy,

Nay, wise — how he wasted endowment designed

For the glory of God and the good of mankind!

That much were misused such occasions of grace

• Ye well may upbraid him, who bows to the rod.

But this should bid anger to pity give place —

He has turned from the wrong, in the right path to plod,

Makes amends to mankind and craves pardon of God.

Yea, friends, even now from my lips the Heureka —

Soul saved!" was nigh bursting — unduly elate!

Have I brought Man advantage, or hatched — so to speak — a Strange serpent, no cygnet? 'Tis this I debate

Within me. Forbear, and leave Fust to his fate!

FIRST FRIEND.

So abject, late lofty? Methinks I spy respite.

Make clean breast, discover what my teries hide

In thy room there!

SECOND FRIEND.

Ay, out with them! Do Satan despite!

Remember what caused his undoing was pride!

FIRST FRIEND.

Dumb devil! Remains one resource to be tried!

SECOND FRIEND.

Exorcise!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Nay, first — is there any remembers In substance that potent "Ne pulvis" — a psalm

Whereof some live spark haply lurks mid the embers

Which choke in my brain. Talk of "Gilead and balm"?

I mind me, sung half through, this gave such a qualm

To Asmodeus inside of a Hussite, that, queasy,

He broke forth in brimstone with curses, I'm strong

In — at least the commencement: the rest should go easy,

Friends helping. "Ne pulvis et ignis" . . .

SIXTH FRIEND.

All wrong!

FIFTH FRIEND.

I've conned till I captured the whole.

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Get along!

"Ne pulvis et cinis superbe te geras, Nam fulmina" . . .

SIXTH FRIEND.

Fiddlestick! Peace, dolts and dorr! Thus runs it "Ne Numinis fulminas" —

Then "Hominis perfidi justa sunt sors Fulmen et grando et horrida mors."

SEVENTH FRIEND.

You blunder. "Irati ne" . . .

SIXTH FRIEND.

Mind your own business!

FIFTH FRIEND.

I do not so badly, who gained the monk's leave To study an hour his choice parchment. A dizziness May well have surprised me. No Christian dares thief, Or I scarce had returned him his treasure. These cleave:

10 "Nos pulvis et cinis, trementes, gementes, Venimus" — some such word — "ad te, Domine.
Da lumen, juvamen, ut sancta sequentes Cor . . . corda . . ." Plague take it!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

— "erecta sint spe:"

Right text, ringing rhyme, and ripe Latin for me!

SIXTH FRIEND.

A Canon's self wrote it me fair: I was tempted To part with the sheepskin.

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Didst grasp and let go
Such a godsend, thou Judas? My purse had been emptied Ere part with the prize!

FUST.

Do I dream? Say ye so?
Clouds break, then! Move, world! I have gained my "Pou sto"!

20 I am saved: Archimedes, salute me!

OMNES.

Assistance!

Help, Angels! He summons . . .
Aroint thee! — by name,
His familiar!

FUST.

Approach!

OMNES.

Devil, keep thy due distance!

FUST.

Be tranquillised, townsmen! The knowledge ye claim Behold, I prepare to impart. Praise or blame, —

Your blessing or banning, whatever betide me, At last I accept. The slow travail of years,
The long-teeming brain's birth — applaud me, deride me, — At last claims revealment. Wait!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Wait till appears Uncaged Archimedes cooped-up there?

SECOND FRIEND.

Who fears?

Here's have at thee!

30

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Correctly now! "Pulvis et cinis" . . .

FUST.

The verse ye so value, it happens I hold
In my memory safe from inilium to finis.
Word for word, I produce you the whole,
plain enrolled,
Black letters, white paper — no scribe's red and gold!

OMNES.

Aroint thee!

FUST.

I go and return.
[He enters the inner room.]

FIRST FRIEND.

No doubt: but as boldly ^{Ay, 'tis "ibis"} "redibis" — who'll say?
I rather conjecture "in Orco peribis!"

SEVENTH FRIEND.

Come, neighbours!

SIXTH FRIEND.

I'm with you! Show courage and stay Hell's outbreak? Sirs, cowardice here wins the day!

FIFTH FRIEND.

What luck had that student of Bamberg 40 who ventured

To peep in the cell where a wizard of note
Was busy in getting some black deed debentured
By Satan? In dog's guise there sprang at his throat
A flame-breathing fury. Fust favours, I
note,

An ugly huge lurcher!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

If I placed reliance
As thou, on the beads thou art telling so
fast,
I'd risk just a peep through the keyhole.

SIXTH FRIEND.

Appliance
Of ear might be safer. Five minutes are past.

OMNES.

Saints, save us! The door is thrown open
at last!

FUST (*re-enters, the door closing behind
him*).

10 As I promised, behold I perform! Apprehend you
The object I offer is poison or pest?
Receive without harm from the hand I extend you
A gift that shall set every scruple at rest!
Shrink back from mere paper-strips? Try them and test!

Still hesitate? Myk, was it thou who la-mentedst Thy five wits clean failed thee to render aright

A poem read once and no more? — who repentedst Vile pelf had induced thee to banish from sight
The characters none but our clerics indite?

20 Take and keep!

FIRST FRIEND.

Blessed Mary and all Saints about her!

SECOND FRIEND.

What imps deal so deftly, — five minutes
suffice
To play thus the penman?

THIRD FRIEND.

By Thomas the Doubter, Five minutes, no more!

FOURTH FRIEND.

Out on arts that entice Such scribes to do homage!

FIFTH FRIEND.

Stay! Once — and now twice —

Yea, a third time, my sharp eye completes the inspection Of line after line, the whole series, and finds
Each letter join each — not a fault for detection!

Such upstrokes, such downstrokes, such strokes of all kinds
In the criss-cross, all perfect!

SIXTH FRIEND.

There's nobody minds

His quill-craft with more of a conscience, 30 o'erscratches A sheepskin more nimbly and surely with ink,
Than Paul the Sub-Prior: here's paper that matches
His parchment with letter on letter, no link
Overleapt — underlost!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

No erasure, I think —

No blot, I am certain!

FUST.

Accept the new treasure!

SIXTH FRIEND.

I remembered full half!

SEVENTH FRIEND.

But who other than I (Bear witness, bystanders!) when he broke the measure Repaired fault with "fulmen"?

FUST.

Put bickerings by!
Here's for thee — thee — and thee, too:
at need a supply [distributing Proofs].

For Mayence, though seventy times seven 40 should muster!

How now? All so feeble of faith that no
face
Which fronts me but whitens — or yellows, were juster?
Speak out lest I summon my Spirits!

OMNES.

Grace — grace!
Call none of thy — helpmates! We'll answer apace!

My paper — and mine — and mine also — they vary

In nowise — agree in each tittle and jot!
Fust, how — why was this?

FUST.

Shall such "Cur" miss a "quare"?
Within, there! Throw doors wide!
Behold who complot
To abolish the scribe's work — blur, blunder and blot!

(The doors open, and the Press is discovered in operation.)

Prave full-bodied birth of this brain that conceived thee

In splendour and music, — sustained the slow drag

Of the days stretched to years dim with doubt, — yet believed thee,

Had faith in thy first leap of life! Pulse might flag —

— Mine fluttered how faintly! — Arch-moment might lag

Its longest — I bided, made light of endurance,

Held hard by the hope of an advent which — dreamed,

Is done now: night yields to the dawn's reassurance:

I have thee — I hold thee — my fancy that seemed,

My fact that proves palpable! Ay, Sirs,
I schemed

Completion that's fact: see this Engine — be witness

Yourselves of its working! Nay, handle my Types!

Each block bears a Letter: in order and fitness

I range them. Turn, Peter, the winch!
See, it gripes

What's under! Let loose — draw! In regular stripes

Lies plain, at one pressure, your poem — touched, tinted,

Turned out to perfection! The sheet, late a blank,

Filled — ready for reading, — not written but PRINTED!

Omniscient omnipotent God, Thee I
thank,

Thee ever, Thee only! — Thy creature that shrank

From no task Thou, Creator, imposedst!
Creation

Revealed me no object, from insect to
Man,
But bore Thy hand's impress: earth ³⁰ glowed with salvation:

"Hast sinned? Be thou saved, Fust!
Continue my plan,
Who spake and earth was: with my word things began.

"As sound so went forth, to the sight be extended

Word's mission henceforward! The task I assign,

Embrace — thy allegiance to evil is ended!
Have cheer, soul impregnate with purpose! Combine

Soul and body, give birth to my concept — called thine!

"Far and wide, North and South, East and West, have dominion

O'er thought, winged wonder, O Word!
Traverse world

In sun-flash and sphere-song! Each ⁴⁰ beat of thy pinion

Bursts night, beckons day: once Truth's banner unfurled,

Where's Falsehood? Sun-smitten, to nothingness hurled!"

More humbly — so, friends, did my fault find redemption.

I sinned, soul-entailed by the tether of
sense:

My captor reigned master: I plead no exemption

From Satan's award to his servant:
defence

From the fiery and final assault would be
— whence?

By making — as man might — to truth restitution!

Truth is God: trample lies and lies' father, God's foe!

Fix fact fast: truths change by an hour's ⁵⁰ revolution:

What deed's very doer, unaided, can
show

How 'twas done a year — month — week — day — minute ago?

At best, he relates it — another reports it — A third — nay, a thousandth records it:
and still

Narration, tradition, no step but distorts it, As down from truth's height it goes sliding until

At the low level lie-mark it stops — whence no skill

Of the scribe, intervening too tardily, rescues

— Once fallen — lost fact from lie's fate there. What scribe

— Eyes horny with poring, hands crippled with desk-use, Brains fretted by fancies — the volatile tribe
That tease weary watchers — can boast that no bribe

Shuts eye and frees hand and remits brain from toiling?

Truth gailed — can we stay, at whatever the stage, Truth a-slide, — save her snow from its ultimate soiling
In mire, — by some process, stamp promptly on page Fact spoiled by pen's plodding, make truth heritage

Not merely of clerics, but poured out, full
measure,

10 On clowns — every mortal endowed with a mind?

Read, gentle and simple! Let labour win leisure

At last to bid truth do all duty assigned,
Not pause at the noble but pass to the hind!

How bring to effect such swift sure simultaneous

Unlimited multiplication? How spread By an arm-sweep a hand-throw — no helping extraneous —

Truth broadcast o'er Europe? "The goldsmith," I said,
"Graves limning on gold: why not letters on lead?"

So, Tuscan artificer, grudge not thy pardon

20 To me who played false, made a furtive descent,

Found the sly secret workshop, — thy genius kept guard on

Too slackly for once, — and surprised thee low-bent

O'er thy labour — some chalice thy tool would indent

With a certain free scroll-work framed round by a border

Of foliage and fruitage: no scratching so
fine,

No shading so shy but, in ordered disorder,

Each flourish came clear, — unbewil-dered by shine,

On the gold, irretrievably right, lay each
line.

How judge if thy hand worked thy will?
By reviewing,

Revising again and again, piece by 3
piece,

Tool's performance, — this way, as I watched. 'Twas through glueing A paper-like film-stuff — thin, smooth, void of crease,

On each cut of the graver: press hard! at release,

No mark on the plate, but the paper showed double:

His work might proceed: as he judged — space or speck

Up he filled, forth he flung — was relieved thus from trouble

Lest wrong — once — were right never more: what could check

Advancement, completion? Thus lay at my beck —

At my call — triumph likewise! "For," cried I, "what hinders

That graving turns Printing? Stamp 4 one word — not one

But fifty such, phoenix-like, spring from death's cinders, —

Since death is word's doom, clerics hide from the sun

As some churl closets up this rare chalice." Go, run

Thy race now, Fust's child! High, O Printing, and holy

Thy mission! These types, see, I chop and I change

Till the words, every letter, a pageful, not slowly

Yet surely lies fixed: last of all, I arrange

A paper beneath, stamp it, loosen it!

FIRST FRIEND.

Strange!

SECOND FRIEND.

How simple exceedingly!

FUST.

Bustle, my Schaeffer!

Set type, — quick, Genesheim! Turn 50 screw now!

THIRD FRIEND.

Just that!

FOURTH FRIEND.

And no such vast miracle!

FUST.

"Plough with my heifer,

Ye find out my riddle," quoth Samson, and pat

He speaks to the purpose. Grapes squeezed in the vat

Yield to sight and to taste what is simple — a liquid

Mere urchins may sip: but give time, let ferment —

You've wine, manhood's master! Well,
"rectius si quid Novistis im-per-ti-be!" Wait the event, Then weigh the result! But whate'er Thy intent,

O Thou, the one force in the whole variation

Of visible nature, — at work — do I
doubt? —

From Thy first to our last, in perpetual creation —

A film hides us from Thee — 'twixt inside and out,

A film, on this earth where Thou bringest
about

New marvels, new forms of the glorious,
the gracious,

We bow to, we bless for: no star bursts heaven's dome.

But Thy finger impels it, no weed peeps audacious

Earth's clay-floor from out, but Thy finger makes room

For one world's-want the more in Thy Cosmos: presume

Shall Man, Microcosmos, to claim the conception

Of grandeur, of beauty, in thought, word or deed?

I toiled, but Thy light on my dubious-est step shone:

If I reach the glad goal, is it I who succeed

Who stumbled at starting tripped up by a reed,

Or Thou? Knowledge only and absolute, glory

As utter be Thine who concedest a spark

Of Thy spheric perfection to earth's transitory

Existences! Nothing that lives, but Thy mark

Gives law to — life's light: what is doomed to the dark?

Where's ignorance? Answer, creation!
What height,

What depth has escaped Thy commandment — to Know?

What birth in the ore-bed but answers
aright

Thy sting at its heart which impels — bids "E'en so,

Not otherwise move or be motionless, —
grow,

"Decline, disappear!" Is the plant in default

How to bud, when to branch forth?
The bird and the beast

— Do they doubt if their safety be found in assault

Or escape? Worm or fly, of what atoms the least

But follows light's guidance, — will famish, not feast?

In such various degree, fly and worm, ore and plant,

All know, none is witless: around each,
a wall

Encloses the portion, or ample or scant,
Of Knowledge: beyond which one hair's breadth, for all

Lies blank — not so much as a blackness 40
— a pall

Some sense unimagined must penetrate:
plain

Is only old licence to stand, walk or sit, Move so far and so wide in the narrow domain

Allotted each nature for life's use: past
it

How immensity spreads does he guess?
Not a whit.

Does he care? Just as little. Without?
No, within

Concerns him? he knows. Man Ignores — thanks to Thee

Who madest him know, but — in knowing — begin

To know still new vastness of knowledge
must be

Outside him — to enter, to traverse, in fee 50

Have and hold! "Oh, Man's ignorance!" hear the fool whine!

How were it, for better or worse, didst thou grunt

Contented with sapience — the lot of the swine

Who knows he was born for just trifles to hunt? —

Monks' Paradise — "Semper sint res uti sunt!"

No, Man's the prerogative — knowledge once gained —

To ignore, — find new knowledge to press for, to swerve

In pursuit of, no, not for a moment:
attained —

Why, onward through ignorance! Dare and deserve!

As still to its asymptote speedeth the curve, 60

So approximates Man — Thee, who, reachable not,

Hast formed him to yearningly follow Thy whole Sole and single omniscience!

Such, friends, is my lot:
I am back with the world: one more step to the goal Thanks for reaching I render — Fust's help to Man's soul!

Mere mechanical help? So the hand gives a toss
To the falcon, — aloft once, spread pinions and fly, Beat air far and wide, up and down and across!

My Press strains a-tremble: whose masterful eye
Will be first, in new regions, new truth to descrie?

10 Give chase, soul! Be sure each new capture consigned
To my Types will go forth to the world, like God's bread
— Miraculous food not for body but mind, Truth's manna! How say you? Put case that, instead Of old leasing and lies, we superiorly fed These Heretics, Hussites . . .

FIRST FRIEND.

First answer my query!
If saved, art thou happy?

FUST.

I was and I am.

FIRST FRIEND.

Thy visage confirms it: how comes, then,
that — weary
And woe-begone late — was it show, was it sham? —
We found thee sunk thiswise?

SECOND FRIEND.

— In need of the dram

20 From the flask which a provident neighbour might carry!

FUST.

Ah, friends, the fresh triumph soon flickers, fast fades!
I hailed Word's dispersion: could heart-leaps but tarry!
Through me does Print furnish Truth wings? The same aids Cause Falsehood to range just as widely.
What raids

On a region undreamed of does Printing enable Truth's foe to effect! Printed leasing and lies May speed to the world's farthest corner — gross fable
No less than pure fact — to impede, neutralize,
Abolish God's gift and Man's gain!

FIRST FRIEND.

Dost surmise

What struck me at first blush? Our 30
Beghards, Waldenses, Jeronimites, Hussites — does one show
his head, Spout heresy now? Not a priest in his senses
Deigns answer mere speech, but piles faggots instead,
Refines as by fire, and, him silenced, all's
said.

Whereas if in future I pen an opusculé Defying retort, as of old when rash tongues
Were easy to tame, — straight some knave of the Huss-School Prints answer forsooth! Stop invisible lungs?
The barrel of blasphemy broached once,
who bungs?

SECOND FRIEND.

Does my sermon, next Easter, meet fitting 40 acceptance?
Each captious disputative boy has his quirk “An cuique credendum sit?” Well the Church kept “ans.”
In order till Fust set his engine at
work!
What trash will come flying from Jew, Moor and Turk

When, goosequill, thy reign o'er the world is abolished!
Goose — ominous name! With a goose woe began:
Quoth Huss — which means “goose” in his idiom unpolished — “Ye burn now a Goose: there succeeds me a Swan Ye shall find quench your fire!”

FUST.

I foresee such a man.¹

ASOLANDO :

FANCIES AND FACTS.

1889.

(Published on December 12, the day on which Mr. Browning died at Venice. A copy of the volume had, however, been received by him before his death.)

For an explanation of title, see the dedication to Mrs. Arthur Bronson.

TO MRS. ARTHUR BRONSON.

To whom but you, dear Friend, should I dedicate verses — some few written, all of them supervised, in the comfort of your presence, and with yet another experience of the gracious hospitality now bestowed on me since so many a year, — adding a charm even to my residences at Venice, and leaving me little regret for the surprise and delight at my visits to Asolo in bygone days?

I unite, you will see, the disconnected poems by a title-name popularly ascribed to the inventiveness of the ancient secretary of Queen Cornaro whose palace-tower still overlooks us: Asolare — “to disport in the open air, amuse oneself at random.” The objection that such a word nowhere occurs in the works of the Cardinal is hardly important — Bembo was too thorough a purist to conserve in print a term which in talk he might possibly toy with: but the word is more likely derived from a Spanish source. I use it for love of the place, and in requital of your pleasant assurance that an early poem of mine first attracted you thither — where and elsewhere, at La Mura as Cà Alvisi, may all happiness attend you!

Gratefully and affectionately yours,
R. B.

ASOLO: October 15, 1889.

PROLOGUE.

“THE Poet’s age is sad: for why?

In youth, the natural world could show
No common object but his eye

At once involved with alien glow —
His own soul’s iris-bow.

“And now a flower is just a flower:

Man, bird, beast are but beast, bird,
man —

Simply themselves, uncinct by dower
Of dyes which, when life’s day began, Round each in glory ran.”

14

Friend, did you need an optic glass, Which were your choice? A lens to drape

In ruby, emerald, chrysopras, Each object — or reveal its shape Clear outlined, past escape,

The naked very thing? — so clear That, when you had the chance to gaze,
You found its inmost self appear Through outer seeming — truth ablaze,
Not falsehood’s fancy-haze?

20

How many a year, my Asolo, Since — one step just from sea to land —
I found you, loved yet feared you so —
For natural objects seemed to stand Palpably fire-clothed! No —

No mastery of mine o’er these!
Terror with beauty, like the Bush Burning but unconsumed. Bend knees, Drop eyes to earthward! Language?
Tush!

Silence ’tis awe decrees.

34

And now? The lambent flame is —
where?

Lost from the naked world: earth, sky,
Hill, vale, tree, flower, — Italia’s rare O’er-running beauty crowds the eye — But flame? The Bush is bare.

Hill, vale, tree, flower — they stand distinct,
Nature to know and name. What then?

A Voice spoke thence which straight unlinked Fancy from fact: see, all’s in ken:

Has once my eyelid winked?

46

No, for the purged ear apprehends Earth's import, not the eye late dazed:
 The Voice said "Call my works thy
 friends!
 At Nature dost thou shrink amazed?
 God is it who transcends."

ASOLO: Sept. 6, 1889.

ROSNY.

[Rosny is the name of the château where the celebrated Duke of Sully (1560-1641) was born. It lies half-way between Mantes and Bonnières. Henri Quatre slept at the château after Ivry.]

WOE, he went galloping into the war,
 Clara, Clara!

Let us two dream: shall he 'scape with a scar?

Scarcely disfigurement, rather a grace 10 Making for manhood which nowise we
 mar:

See, while I kiss it, the flush on his face—Rosny, Rosny!

Light does he laugh: "With your love in my soul" —

(Clara, Clara!)

"How could I other than — sound, safe and whole —

Cleave who opposed me asunder, yet
 stand

Scatheless beside you, as, touching love's
 goal,

Who won the race kneels, craves reward at your hand —

Rosny, Rosny?"

20 Ay, but if certain who envied should see!

Clara, Clara,

Certain who simper: "The hero for me Hardly of life were so chary as miss

Death — death and fame — that's love's guerdon when She

Boasts, proud bereaved one, her choice fell on this

Rosny, Rosny!"

So, — go on dreaming, — he lies mid a heap

(Clara, Clara,)

Of the slain by his hand: what is death but a sleep?

30 Dead, with my portrait displayed on his
 breast:

Love wrought his undoing: "No prudence could keep

The love-maddened wretch from his fate." That is best,

Rosny, Rosny!

DUBIETY.

I WILL be happy if but for once:
 Only help me, Autumn weather,
 Me and my cares to screen, ensconce
 In luxury's sofa-lap of leather!

Sleep? Nay, comfort — with just a cloud Suffusing day too clear and bright:
 Eve's essence, the single drop allowed To sully, like milk, Noon's water-white.

Let gauziness shade, not shroud, — adjust, Dim and not deaden, — somehow sheathe Aught sharp in the rough world's busy
 thrust,
 If it reach me through dreaming's vapour-wreath.

Be life so, all things ever the same!
 For, what has disarmed the world?
 Outside,
 Quiet and peace: inside, nor blame Nor want, nor wish whate'er betide.

What is it like that has happened before? 5 A dream? No dream, more real by
 much.

A vision? But fanciful days of yore Brought many: mere musing seems not
 such.

Perhaps but a memory, after all!
 — Of what came once when a woman
 leant

To feel for my brow where her kiss might fall.

Truth ever, truth only the excellent!

NOW.

OUT of your whole life give but a moment!
 All of your life that has gone before,
 All to come after it, — so you ignore, 6
 So you make perfect the present, — condense,

In a rapture of rage, for perfection's endowment,

Thought and feeling and soul and sense — Merged in a moment which gives me at
 last

You around me for once, you beneath me, above me —

Me — sure that despite of time future, time past, —

This tick of our life-time's one moment you love me!

How long such suspension may linger?
 Ah, Sweet —

The moment eternal — just that and no more — When ecstasy's utmost we clutch at the core While cheeks burn, arms open, eyes shut and lips meet!

HUMILITY.

WHAT girl but, having gathered flowers,
 Stript the beds and spoilt the bowers,
 From the lapful light she carries Drops a careless bud? — nor tarries To regain the waif and stray:
 "Store enough for home" — she'll say.

So say I too: give your lover Heaps of loving — under, over, Whelm him — make the one the wealthy!
 Am I all so poor who — stealthy Work it was! — picked up what fell:
 Not the worst bud — who can tell?

POETICS.

"So say the foolish!" Say the foolish, so,
 Love?

"Flower she is, my rose" — or else
 "My very swan is she" —

Or perhaps "Yon maid-moon, blessing earth below, Love, That art thou!" — to them, belike: no such vain words from me.

"Hush, rose, blush! no balm like breath," I chide it:

"Bend thy neck its best, swan, — hers the whiter curve!"

Be the moon the moon: my Love I place beside it:

What is she? Her human self, — no lower word will serve.

SUMMUM BONUM.

ALL the breath and the bloom of the year in the bag of one bee:

All the wonder and wealth of the mine in the heart of one gem:

In the core of one pearl all the shade and the shine of the sea:

Breath and bloom, shade and shine, — wonder, wealth, and — how far above
 them —

Truth, that's brighter than gem,

Trust, that's purer than pearl, —

Brightest truth, purest trust in the universe — all were for me

In the kiss of one girl.

A PEARL, A GIRL.

A SIMPLE ring with a single stone
 To the vulgar eye no stone of price:
 Whisper the right word, that alone —
 Forth starts a sprite, like fire from ice, And lo, you are lord (says an Eastern scroll)
 Of heaven and earth, lord whole and sole Through the power in a pearl.

A woman ('tis I this time that say) With little the world counts worthy 40
 praise
 Utter the true word — out and away Escapes her soul: I am wrapt in blaze, Creation's lord, of heaven and earth Lord whole and sole — by a minute's
 birth —
 Through the love in a girl!

SPECULATIVE.

OTHERS may need new life in Heaven — Man, Nature, Art — made new, assume!
 Man with new mind old sense to leaven,
 Nature — new light to clear old gloom,
 Art that breaks bounds, gets scaring-room. 50

I shall pray: "Fugitive as precious — Minutes which passed, — return, remain!

Let earth's old life once more enmesh us,
 You with old pleasure, me — old pain,
 So we but meet nor part again!"

WHITE WITCHCRAFT.

[White witchcraft was helpful and not harmful magic.]

If you and I could change to beasts, what beast should either be?

Shall you and I play Jove for once? Turn fox then, I decree!

Shy wild sweet stealer of the grapes! Now do your worst on me!

And thus you think to spite your friend — turned loathsome? What, a toad?
 So, all men shrink and shun me! Dear 60 men, pursue your road!
 Leave but my crevice in the stone, a reptile's fit abode!

Now say your worst, Canidia!¹ "He's loathsome, I allow:

There may or may not lurk a pearl beneath his puckered brow:

But see his eyes that follow mine — love lasts there anyhow."

BAD DREAMS. I.

LAST night I saw you in my sleep:
 And how your charm of face was changed!
 I asked "Some love, some faith you keep?"
 You answered "Faith gone, love estranged."

Whereat I woke — a twofold bliss:
 Waking was one, but next there came This other: "Though I felt, for this,
 My heart break, I loved on the same."

BAD DREAMS. II.

10 You in the flesh and here —
 Your very self! Now, wait!
 One word! May I hope or fear?
 Must I speak in love or hate?
 Stay while I ruminate!

The fact and each circumstance Dare you disown? Not you!
 That vast dome, that huge dance,
 And the gloom which overgrew
 A — possibly festive crew!

20 For why should men dance at all — Why women — a crowd of both — Unless they are gay? Strange ball — Hands and feet plighting troth, Yet partners enforced and loth!

Of who danced there, no shape Did I recognise: thwart, perverse, Each grasped each, past escape
 In a whirl or weary or worse:
 Man's sneer met woman's curse,

30 While he and she toiled as if Their guardian set galley-slaves
 To supple chained limbs grown stiff:
 Unmanacled trulls and knaves —
 The lash for who misbehaves!

And a gloom was, all the while,
 Deeper and deeper yet O'ergrowing the rank and file
 Of that army of haters — set To mimic love's fever-fret.

40 By the wall-side close I crept, Avoiding the livid maze,
 And, safely so far, outstepped
 On a chamber — a chapel, says My memory or betrays —

Closet-like, kept aloof From unseemly witnessing What sport made floor and roof
 Of the Devil's palace ring While his Damned amused their king.

Ay, for a low lamp burned,
 And a silence lay about What I, in the midst, discerned Though dimly till, past doubt,
 'Twas a sort of throne stood out —

High seat with steps, at least:
 And the topmost step was filled By — whom? What vested priest
 A stranger to me, — his guild, His cult, unreconciled

To my knowledge how guild and cult Are clothed in this world of ours:
 I pondered, but no result Came to — unless that Giaours So worship the Lower Powers.

When suddenly who entered?
 Who knelt — did you guess I saw?
 Who — raising that face where centre Allegiance to love and law
 So lately — off-casting awe,

Down-treading reserve, away Thrusting respect . . . but mine Stands firm — firm still shall stay!
 Ask Satan! for I decline
 To tell — what I saw, in fine!

Yet here in the flesh you come —
 Your same self, form and face, — In the eyes, mirth still at home!
 On the lips, that commonplace Perfection of honest grace!

Yet your errand is — needs must be To palliate — well, explain, Expurgate in some degree
 Your soul of its ugly stain.
 Oh, you — the good in grain —

How was it your white took tinge?
 "A mere dream" — never object!
 Sleep leaves a door on hinge Whence soul, ere our flesh suspect Is off and away: detect

Her vagaries when loose, who can!
 Be she pranksome, be she rude, Disguise with the day began:
 With the night — ah, what ensued
 From draughts of a drink hell-brewed

Then She: "What a queer wild drea—And perhaps the best fun is — Myself had its fellow — I seem Scarce awake from yet. 'Twas this Shall I tell you? First, a kiss!

"For the fault was just your own, —
 'Tis myself expect apology:
 You warned me to let alone (Since our studies were mere philology That ticklish (you said) Anthology.

"So, I dreamed that I passed exam Till a question posed me sore:
'Who translated this epigram
By — an author we best ignore?'
And I answered 'Hannah More'!"

BAD DREAMS. III.

THAT was my dream: I saw a Forest Old as the earth, no track nor trace Of unmade man. Thou, Soul, explor-
est —

Though in a trembling rapture — space Immeasurable! Shrubs, turned trees, Trees that touch heaven, support its frieze Studded with sun and moon and star: While — oh, the enormous growths that bar

Mine eye from penetrating past Their tangled twine where lurks — nay,
lives

Royally lone, some brute-type cast
I the rough, time cancels, man forgives.

On, Soul! I saw a lucid City Of architectural device
Every way perfect. Pause for pity, Lightning! nor leave a cicatrice
On those bright marbles, dome and spire, Structures palatial, — streets which mire Dares not defile, paved all too fine For human footstep's smirch, not thine — Proud solitary traverser,
My Soul, of silent lengths of way —
With what ecstatic dread, aver, Lest life start sanctioned by thy stay!

Ah, but the last sight was the hideous!
A City, yes, — a Forest, true, —
But each devouring each. Perfidious Snake-plants had strangled what I knew Was a pavilion once: each oak Held on his horns some spoil he broke By surreptitiously beneath Upthrusting: pavements, as with teeth, Gripped huge weed widening crack and split
In squares and circles stone-work erst.
Oh, Nature — good! Oh, Art — no whit Less worthy! Both in one — accurst!

BAD DREAMS. IV.

It happened thus: my slab, though new,
Was getting weather-stained, — beside,
Herbage, balm, peppermint o'ergrew Letter and letter: till you cried Somewhat, the Name was scarce descried.

That strong stern man my lover came:
— Was he my lover? Call him, pray,
My life's cold critic bent on blame

Of all poor I could do or say To make me worth his love one day — 50

One far day when, by diligent And dutiful amending faults, Foibles, all weaknesses which went To challenge and excuse assaults Of culture wronged by taste that halts —

Discrepancies should mar no plan Symmetric of the qualities Claiming respect from — say — a man That's strong and stern. "Once more 60 he prires Into me with those critic eyes!"

No question! — so — "Conclude, condemn
Each failure my poor self avows!
Leave to its fate all you condemn!
There's Solomon's selected spouse: Earth needs must hold such maids — choose them!"

Why, he was weeping! Surely gone Sternness and strength: with eyes to
ground

And voice a broken monotone —
"Only be as you were! Abound 70 In foibles, faults, — laugh, robed and crowned

"As Folly's veriest queen, — care I One feather-fluff? Look pity, Love, On prostrate me — your foot shall try This forehead's use — mount thence
above,
And reach what Heaven you dignify!"

Now, what could bring such change about?
The thought perplexed: till, following His gaze upon the ground, — why, out Came all the secret! So, a thing 80
Thus simple has deposed my king!

For, spite of weeds that strove to spoil Plain reading on the lettered slab,
My name was clear enough — no soil Effaced the date when one chance stab Of scorn . . . if only ghosts might blab!

INAPPREHENSIVENESS.

WE two stood simply friend-like side by
side,
Viewing a twilight country far and wide, Till she at length broke silence. "How it towers Yonder, the ruin¹ o'er this vale of ours! 90

¹ Of the palace of Queen Cornaro, who, exiled from Cyprus, lived at Asolo, with Cardinal Bembo acting as Secretary.

The West's faint flare behind it so relieves Its rugged outline — sight perhaps de-
ceives,

Or I could almost fancy that I see A branch wave plain — belike some wind-sown tree

Chance-rooted where a missing turret was.
What would I give for the perspective glass
At home, to make out if 'tis really so!

Has Ruskin noticed here at Asolo

That certain weed-growths on the ravaged
wall

to Seem" . . . something that I could not say at all,

My thought being rather — as absorbed she sent

Look onward after look from eyes distent With longing to reach Heaven's gate left ajar —

"Oh, fancies that might be, oh, facts that
are!

What of a wilding? By you stands, and may

So stand unnoticed till the Judgment Day,
One who, if once aware that your regard Claimed what his heart holds, — woke, as from its sward

The flower, the dormant passion, so to
speak —

to Then what a rush of life would startling
wreak

Revenge on your inapprehensive stare While, from the ruin and the West's faint
flare,

You let your eyes meet mine, touch what you term

Quietude — that's an universe in germ —
The dormant passion needing but a look To burst into immense life!"

"No, the book Which noticed how the wall-growths wave" said she

"Was not by Ruskin."

I said "Vernon Lee?"

WHICH?

30 So, the three Court-ladies began Their trial of who judged best

In esteeming the love of a man:

Who preferred with most reason was thereby confessed

Boy-Cupid's exemplary catcher and cager; An Abbé crossed legs to decide on the wager.

First the Duchesse: "Mine for
me —

Who were it but God's for Him,
And the King's for — who but he?

* The authoress of Euphorion and other books (Miss Violet Paget).

Both faithful and loyal, one grace more shall brim

His cup with perfection: a lady's true lover,

He holds — save his God and his king — none above her."

"I require" — outspoke the Marquise —

"Pure thoughts, ay, but also fine
deeds:

Play the paladin must he, to please

My whim, and — to prove my knight's service exceeds

Your saint's and your loyalist's praying and kneeling —

Show wounds, each wide mouth to my mercy appealing."

Then the Comtesse: "My choice be a wretch,

Merc losel in body and soul,

Thrice accurst! What care I, so he stretch

Arms to me his sole saviour, love's ultimate goal,

Out of earth and men's noise — names of 'infidel,' 'traitor,'

Cast up at him? Crown me, crown's adjudicator!"

And the Abbé uncrossed his legs,

Took snuff, a reflective pinch,

Broke silence: "The question begs Much pondering ere I pronounce. Shall I flinch?

The love which to one and one only has reference

Seems terribly like what perhaps gains God's preference."

THE CARDINAL AND THE DOG.

CRESCENZIO, the Pope's Legate at the High Council, Trent,

— Year Fifteen hundred twenty-two,
March Twenty-five — intent

On writing letters to the Pope till late into the night,

Rose, weary, to refresh himself, and saw a monstrous sight:

(I give mine Author's very words: he penned, I reindite.)

A black Dog of vast bigness, eyes flaming, ears that hung

Down to the very ground almost, into the chamber sprung

And made directly for him, and laid himself right under

The table where Crescenzo wrote — who called in fear and wonder

His servants in the ante-room, commanded everyone

To look for and find out the beast: but, looking, they found none.

The Cardinal fell melancholy, then sick, soon after died:

And at Verona, as he lay on his death-bed, he cried

Aloud to drive away the Dog that leapt on his bed-side.

Heaven keep us Protestants from harm: the rest . . . no ill betide!

THE POPE AND THE NET.

WHAT, he on whom our voices unanimously ran,

Made Pope at our last Conclave? Full low his life began:

His father earned the daily bread as just a fisherman.

So much the more his boy minds book, gives proof of mother-wit,

Becomes first Deacon, and then Priest, then Bishop: see him sit

No less than Cardinal ere long, while no one cries "Unfit!"

But someone smirks, some other smiles, jogs elbow and nods head:

Each winks at each: "P-faith, a rise! Saint Peter's net, instead Of sword and keys, is come in vogue!" You think he blushes red?

Not he, 'of humble holy heart! "Unworthy me!" he sighs:

"From fisher's drudge to Church's prince — it is indeed a rise:

So, here's my way to keep the fact for ever in my eyes!"

And straightway in his palace-hall, where commonly is set

Some coat-of-arms, some portraiture ancestral, lo, we met

His mean estate's reminder in his fisher-father's net!

Which step conciliates all and some, stops cavil in a trice:

"The humble holy heart that holds of new-born pride no spice!

He's just the saint to choose for Pope!" Each adds "'Tis my advice."

So, Pope he was: and when we flocked — its sacred slipper on —

To kiss his foot, we lifted eyes, alack the thing was gone —

That guarantee of lowlihead, — eclipsed that star which shone!

Each eyed his fellow, one and all kept silence. I cried "Pish!

I'll make me spokesman for the rest, express the common wish.

Why, Father, is the net removed?" "Son, 30 it hath caught the fish."

THE BEAN-FEAST.

HE was the man — Pope Sixtus, that Fifth, that swineherd's son:

He knew the right thing, did it, and thanked God when 'twas done:

But of all he had to thank for, my fancy somehow leans

To thinking, what most moved him was a certain meal on beans.

For one day, as his wont was, in just enough disguise

As he went exploring wickedness, — to see with his own eyes

If law had due observance in the city's entrail dark

As well as where, if the open, crime stood an obvious mark, —

He chanced, in a blind alley, on a tumble-down once house

Now hovel, vilest structure in Rome the 40 ruinous:

And, as his tact impelled him, Sixtus adventured bold,

To learn how lowliest subjects bore hunger, toil, and cold.

There sat they at high-supper — man and wife, lad and lass,

Poor as you please but cleanly all and care-free: pain that was — Forgotten, pain as sure to be let bide aloof its time, —

Mightily munched the brave ones — what mattered gloom or grime?

Said Sixtus "Feast, my children! who works hard needs eat well.

I'm just a supervisor, would hear what you can tell.

Do any wrongs want righting? The Father tries his best,

But, since he's only mortal, sends such as I 50 to test

The truth of all that's told him — how folk like you may fare:

Come! — only don't stop eating — when mouth has words to spare —

"You" — smiled he — "play the spokesman, bell-wether of the flock!

Are times good, masters gentle? Your grievances unlock!

How of your work and wages? — pleasures, if such may be — Pains, as such are for certain." Thus smiling questioned he.

But somehow, spite of smiling, awe stole upon the group —
An inexpressible surmise: why should a priest thus stoop — Pry into what concerned folk? Each visage fell. Aware, Cries S' t'is interposing: "Nay, children, have no care!

'Fear nothing! Who employs me requires the plain truth. Pelf Beguiles who should inform me: so, I inform myself.

See!" And he threw his hood back, let the close vesture ope, 10 Showed face, and where on tippet the cross lay: 'twas the Pope.

Imagine the joyful wonder! "How shall the like of us —

Poor souls — requite such blessing of our rude bean-feast?" "Thus — Thus amply!" laughed Pope Sixtus. "I early rise, sleep late:

Who works may eat: they tempt me, your beans there: spare a plate!"

Down sat he on the door-step: 'twas they this time said grace:

He ate up the last mouthful, wiped lips, and then, with face

Turned heavenward, broke forth thankful: "Not now, that earth obeys

Thy word in mine, that through me the peoples know Thy ways —

But that Thy care extendeth to Nature's homely wants,

10 And, while man's mind is strengthened, Thy goodness nowise scants

Man's body of its comfort, — that I whom kings and queens

Crouch to, pick crumbs from off my table, relish beans!

The thunders I but seem to launch, there plain Thy hand all see:

That I have appetite, digest, and thrive — that boon's for me."

MUCKLE-MOUTH MEG

FROWNED the Laird on the Lord: "So, red-handed I catch thee?

Death-doomed by our Law of the Border!

We've a gallows outside and a chiel to dispatch thee:

Who trespasses — hangs: all's in order."

He met frown with smile, did the young English gallant:

Then the Laird's dame: "Nay, Husband, I beg!

He's comely: be merciful! Grace for the callant

— If he marries our Muckle-mouth Meg!"

"No mile-wide-mouthed monster of yours do I marry:

Grant rather the gallows!" laughed he.

"Foul fare kith and kin of you — why do you tarry?"

"To tame your fierce temper!" quoth
she.

"Shove him quick in the Hole, shut him fast for a week:

Cold, darkness and hunger work wonders:

Who lion-like roars now, mouse-fashion will squeak,

And 'it rains' soon succeed to 'it thunders."

A week did he bide in the cold and the
dark

— Not hunger: for duly at morning

In flitted a lass, and a voice like a lark

Chirped "Muckle-mouth Meg still ye're scorning?

"Go hang, but here's parritch to hearten ye
first!"

"Did Meg's muckle-mouth boast within some

Such music as yours, mine should match it or burst:

No frog-jaws! So tell folk, my Winsome!"

Soon week came to end, and, from Hole's door set wide,

Out he marched, and there waited the lassie:

"Yon gallows, or Muckle-mouth Meg for a bride!

Consider! Sky's blue and turf's grassy:

"Life's sweet: shall I say ye wed Mucklemouth Meg?"

"Not I," quoth the stout heart: "too eerie

The mouth that can swallow a bubblyjock's¹ egg:

Shall I let it munch mine? Never, Dearie!"

"Not Muckle-mouth Meg? Wow, the obstinate man!

Perhaps he would rather wed me!"

* A turkey.

"Ay, would he — with just for a dowry your can!"

"I'm Muckle-mouth Meg" chirruped
she.

"Then so — so — so — so —" as he kissed her apace —

"Will I widen thee out till thou turnest From Margaret Minnikin-mou', by God's
grace,

To Muckle-mouth Meg in good earnest!"

ARCADES AMBO.

A. You blame me that I ran away?

Why, Sir, the enemy advanced:

Balls flew about, and — who can say

But one, if I stood firm, had glanced

In my direction? Cowardice?

I only know we don't live twice,

Therefore — shun death, is my advice.

B. Shun death at all risk? Well, at some!

True, I myself, Sir, though I scold

The cowardly, by no means come

Under reproof as overbold

— I, who would have no end of brutes

Cut up alive to guess what suits

My case and saves my toe from shoots.

THE LADY AND THE PAINTER.

She. Yet womanhood you reverence,
So you profess!

He. With heart and soul.

She. Of which fact this is evidence!

To help Art-study, — for some dole

Of certain wretched shillings, — you

Induce a woman — virgin too —

To strip and stand stark-naked?

He. True.

She. Nor feel you so degrade her?

He. What

— (Excuse the interruption) — clings

Half-savage-like around your hat?

She. Ah, do they please you? Wild-bird-wings

Next season, — Paris-prints assert, —

We must go feathered to the skirt:

My modiste keeps on the alert.

Owls, hawks, jays — swallows most approve . . .

He. Dare I speak plainly?

She. Oh, I trust!

He. Then, Lady Blanche, it less would move

In heart and soul of me disgust

Did you strip off those spoils you wear,

And stand — for thanks. not shil- 44 lings — bare,

To help Art like my Model there.

She well knew what absolved her —
praise

In me for God's surpassing good,

Who granted to my reverent gaze

A type of purest womanhood.

You — clothed with murder of His
best

Of harmless beings — stand the test!

What is it you know?

She. That you jest

PONTE DELL' ANGELO, VENICE.

[This story is amongst the many stories told in the honour of the Virgin Mary by St. Alphonsus Liguori in "The Glories of Mary."]

STOP rowing! This one of our bye-canals O'er a certain bridge you have to cross 50 That's named "Of the Angel": listen
why!

The name "Of the Devil" too much appals Venetian acquaintance, so — his the loss, While the gain goes . . . look on high!

An angel visibly guards yon house:

Above each scutcheon — a pair — stands
he,

Enfolds them with droop of either wing:

The family's fortune were perilous

Did he thence depart — you will soon agree,

If I hitch into verse the thing. 60

For, once on a time, this house belonged To a lawyer of note, with law and to spar,
But also with overmuch lust of gain:

In the matter of law you were nowise
wronged,

But alas for the lucre! He picked you
bare

To the bone. Did folk complain?

"I exact" growled he "work's rightful due:

'Tis folk seek me, not I seek them.

Advice at its price! They succeed or fail,

Get law in each case — and a lesson too: 70

Keep clear of the Courts — is advice adrem:

They'll remember, I'll be bail!"

So, he pocketed fee without a qualm.

What reason for squeamishness? Labour done,

To play he betook him with lightened
heart,

Ate, drank and made merry with song or psalm,

Since the yoke of the Church is an easy
one — Fits neck nor causes smart.

Brief: never was such an extortionate Rascal — the word has escaped my teeth And yet — (all's down in a book no ass Indited, believe me!) — this reprobate Was punctual at prayer-time: gold lurked
beneath

"Alloy of the rankest brass.

For, play the extortioner as he might, 10 Fleece folk each day and all day long,
There was this redeeming circumstance:
He never lay down to sleep at night But he put up a prayer first, brief yet
strong,
"Our Lady avert mischance!"

Now it happened at close of a fructuous
week,

"I must ask" quoth he "some Saint to
dine:

I want that widow well out of my ears With her ailing and wailing. Who bade her seek

Redress at my hands? 'She was wronged!' Folk whine

30 If to Law wrong right appears.

"Matteo da Bascio — he's my man!
No less than Chief of the Capucins:
His presence will surely suffumigate
My house — fools think lies under a ban
If somebody loses what somebody wins.
Hark, there he knocks at the grate!

"Come in, thou blessed of Mother Church!
I go and prepare — to bid, that is,
My trusty and diligent servitor

30 Get all things in readiness. Vain the search

Through Venice for one to compare with
this

My model of ministrants: for —

"For — once again, nay, three times over, My helpmate's an ape! so intelligent,
I train him to drudge at household work:
He toils and he moils, I live in clover:
Oh, you shall see! There's a goodly scent —

From his cooking, or I'm a Turk!

"Scarce need to descend and supervise:

40 I'll do it, however: wait here awhile!"
So, down to the kitchen gaily scuttles
Our host, nor notes the alarmed surmise Of the holy man. "O depth of guile!
He blindly guzzles and guttles,

"While — who is it dresses the food and pours

The liquor? Some fiend — I make no
doubt —

In likeness of — which of the loathly brutes?

An ape! Where hides he? No bull that gores,

No bear that hugs — 'tis the mock and flout
Of an ape, fiend's face that suits.

"So — out with thee, creature, wherever thou hidest!

I charge thee, by virtue of . . . right do I
judge!

There skulks he perdue, crouching under the bed.

Well done! What, forsooth, in beast's shape thou confidest?

I know and would name thee but that I begrudge

Breath spent on such carrion. Instead —

"I adjure thee by — " "Stay!" laughed the portent that rose

From floor up to ceiling: "No need to adjure!

See Satan in person, late ape by command Of Him thou adjurest in vain. A saint's

nose
Scents brimstone though incense be burned for a lure.

Yet, hence! for I'm safe, understand!

"'Tis my charge to convey to fit punishment's place

This lawyer, my liegeman, for cruelty
wrought

On his clients, the widow and orphan, poor souls

He has plagued by exactions which proved law's disgrace,

Made equity void and to nothingness
brought

God's pity. Fiends, on with fresh coals!"

"Stay!" nowise confounded, withstands Hell its match:

"How comes it, were truth in this story of
thine,

God's punishment suffered a minute's delay?

Weeks, months have elapsed since thou squattedst at watch

For a spring on thy victim: what caused thee decline

Advantage till challenged to-day?"

"That challenge I meet with contempt," quoth the fiend.

"Thus much I acknowledge: the man's armed in mail:

I wait till a joint's loose, then quick ply my claws.

Thy friend's one good custom — he knows not — has screened

- His flesh hitherto from what else would assail:
At "Save me, Madonna!" I pause.
- "That prayer had the losel but once pre-termit, My pounce were upon him. I keep me attent:
He's in safety but till he's caught napping.
Enough!"
"Ay, enough!" smiles the saint — "for the biter is bit,
The spy caught in somnolence. Vanish!
I'm sent
To smooch up what fiends do in rough."
- "I vanish? Through wall or through roof?" the ripost Grinned gaily. "My orders were —
'Leave not unharmed The abode of this lawyer! Do damage to prove
'Twas for something thou quittedst the land of the lost — To add to their number this unit!' Though charmed
From descent there, on earth that's above
"I may haply amerce him." "So do, and begone,
I command thee! For, look! Though there's doorway behind And window before thee, go straight through the wall, Leave a breach in the brickwork, a gap in the stone
For who passes to stare at!" "Spare speech! I'm resigned:
Here goes!" roared the goblin, as all—
- Wide bat-wings, spread arms and legs, tail out a-stream, Crash obstacles went, right and left, as he soared Or else sank, was clean gone through the hole anyhow.
The Saint returned thanks: then a satisfied gleam
On the bald polished pate showed that triumph was scored.
"To dinner with appetite now!"
- Down he trips. "In good time!" smirks the host. "Didst thou scent Rich savour of roast meat? Where hides he, my ape?
Look alive, be alert! He's away to wash plates.
Sit down, Saint! What's here? Dost examine a rent
In the napkin thou twistest and twirlest?
Agape . . .
Ha, blood is it drips nor abates
- "From thy wringing a cloth, late was lavendered fair?
What means such a marvel?" "Just this does it mean:
I convince and convict thee of sin!" answers straight
The Saint, wringing on, wringing ever — O rare! — Blood — blood from a napery snow not more clean.
"A miracle shows thee thy state!
- "See — blood thy extortions have wrung from the flesh
Of thy clients who, sheep-like, arrived to be 44
shorn
And left thee — or fleeced to the quick or so flayed
That, behold, their blood gurgles and grumbles afresh
To accuse thee! Ay, down on thy knees, get up sworn
To restore! Restitution once made,
- "Sin no more! Dost thou promise? Absolved, then, arise!
Upstairs follow me! Art amazed at yon breach?
Who battered and shattered and scattered,
escape
From thy purlieus obtaining? That Father of Lies Thou wast wont to extol for his feats, all
and each
The Devil's disguised as thine ape!" 50
- Be sure that our lawyer was torn by remorse,
Shed tears in a flood, vowed and swore so to alter His ways that how else could our Saint but declare
He was cleansed of past sin? "For sin future — fare worse Thou undoubtedly wilt," warned the Saint,
"shouldst thou falter
One whit!" "Oh, for that have no care!
- "I am firm in my purposed amendment.
But, prithee,
Must ever affront and affright me yon gap?
Who made it for exit may find it of use For entrance as easy. If, down in his 60 smithy
He forges me fetters — when heated, may-
hap,
He'll up with an armful! Broke loose —
- "How bar him out henceforth?" "Judiciously urged!"
Was the good man's reply. "How to baulk him is plain.

There's nothing the Devil objects to so
 much,
 So speedily flies from, as one of those purged
 Of his presence, the angels who erst formed his train — His, their emperor. Choose one of such!
 "Get fashioned his likeness and set him on high
 At back of the breach thus adroitly filled
 up:
 Display him as guard of two scutcheons, thy arms:
 I warrant no devil attempts to get by And disturb thee so guarded. Eat, drink, dine and sup 10 In thy rectitude, safe from alarms!"

So said and so done. See, the angel has
 place Where the Devil had passage! All's down in a book.
 Gainsay me? Consult it! Still faithless? Trust me?
 Trust Father Boverio who gave me the
 case
 In his Annals — gets of it, by hook or by crook,
 Two confirmative witnesses: three

Are surely enough to establish an act:
 And thereby we learn — would we ascertain truth —

To trust wise tradition which took, at the
 time,

20 Note that served till slow history ventured on fact,
 Though folk have their fling at tradition
 forsooth!

Row, boys, fore and aft, rhyme and chime!

BEATRICE SIGNORINI.

[Beatrice was a Roman lady married to the painter Romanelli, who after his marriage fell in love with a famous lady painter, Artemisia Gentileschi, a pupil of Guido's.
 Baldinucci tells the story Browning repeats.]

THIS strange thing happened to a painter
 once:

Viterbo boasts the man among her sons
 Of note, I seem to think: his ready tool Picked up its precepts in Cortona's school —

That's Pietro Berretini, whom they call Cortona, these Italians: greatish-small,
 Our painter was his pupil, by repute

30 His match if not his master absolute, Though whether he spoiled fresco more or
 less,

And what's its fortune, scarce repays your guess.

Still, for one circumstance, I save his
 name

— Francesco Romanelli: do the same!

He went to Rome and painted: there he knew

A wonder of a woman painting too —

For she, at least, was no Cortona's
 drudge:

Witness that ardent fancy-shape — I
 judge

A semblance of her soul — she called
 "Desire"

With starry front for guide, where sits the
 fire

She left to brighten Buonarroti's house.

If you see Florence, pay that piece your vows,

Though blockhead Baldinucci's mind,
 imbued

With monkish morals, bade folk "Drape the nude

And stop the scandal!" quoth the record prim

I borrow this of: hang his book and him!
 At Rome, then, where these fated ones met
 first,

The blossom of his life had hardly burst While hers was blooming at full beauty's
 stand:

No less Francesco — when half-ripe he scanned

Consummate Artemisia — grew one want To have her his and make her ministrant

With every gift of body and of soul To him. In vain. Her sphery self was
 whole —

Might only touch his orb at Art's sole
 point.

Suppose he could persuade her to enjoin Her life — past, present, future — all in his

At Art's sole point by some explosive kiss Of love through lips, would love's success defeat

Artistry's haunting curse — the Incomplete?

Artists no doubt they both were, — what beside

Was she? who, long had felt heart, soul spread wide

Her life out, knowing much and loving
 well,

On either side Art's narrow space where fell

Reflection from his own speck: but the germ

Of individual genius — what we term
 The very self, the God-gift whence had grown

Heart's life and soul's life, — how make that his own?

Vainly his Art, reflected, smiled in small

On Art's one facet of her ampler ball;
 The rest, touch-free, took in, gave back heaven, earth, All where he was not. Hope, well-nigh ere birth
 Came to Desire, died off all-unfulfilled.
 "What though in Art I stand the ablerskilled,"
 (So he conceited: mediocrity Turns on itself the self-transforming eye)
 "If only Art were suing, mine would plead To purpose: man — by nature I exceed Woman the bounded: but how much be-
 side
 She boasts, would sue in turn and be denied!
 Love her? My own wife loves me in a sort
 That suits us both: she takes the world's report
 Of what my work is worth, and, for the
 rest, Concedes that, while his consort keeps her
 nest,
 The eagle soars a licensed vagrant, lives A wide free life which she at least forgives —
 Good Beatrice Signorini! Well And wisely did I choose her. But the spell
 To subjugate this Artemisia — where?
 She passionless? — she resolute to care Nowise beyond the plain sufficiency Of fact that she is she and I am I — Acknowledged arbitrator for us both In her life as in mine which she were
 loth
 Even to learn the laws of? No, and no Twenty times over! Ay, it must be so:
 I for myself, alas!"

Whereon, instead

Of the checked lover's utterance — why,
 he said
 — Leaning above her easel: "Flesh is red" (Or some such just remark) — "by no means white As Guido's practice teaches: you are
 right." Then came the better impulse: "What if
 pride
 Were wisely trampled on, whate'er betide?
 If I grow hers, not mine — join lives, confuse
 Bodies and spirits, gain not her but lose Myself to Artemisia? That were love!
 Of two souls — one must bend, one rule
 above:
 If I crouch under proudly, lord turned
 slave,
 Were it not worthier both than if she gave Herself — in treason to herself — to me?"

And, all the while, he felt it could not be.
 Such love were true love: love that way
 who can!
 Someone that's born half woman not whole
 man:
 For man, prescribed man better or man
 worse,
 Why, whether microcosm or universe, What law prevails alike through great and
 small,
 The world and man — world's miniature:
 we call?
 Male is the master. "That way" — smiled and sighed
 Our true male estimator — "puts her pride 50
 My wife in making me the outlet whence She learns all Heaven allows: 'tis my pretence
 To paint: her lord should do what else but paint?
 Do I break brushes, cloister me turned
 saint?
 Then, best of all suits sanctity her spouse Who acts for Heaven, allows and dis-allows
 At pleasure, past appeal, the right, the
 wrong
 In all things. That's my wife's way.
 But this strong Confident Artemisia — an adept In Art does she conceit herself? 'Except 6 In just this instance,' tell her, 'no one draws More rigidly observant of the laws Of right design: yet here, — permit me
 hint, —
 If the acromion had a deeper dint, That shoulder were perfection.' What surprise
 — Nay scorn, shoots black fire from those startled eyes!
 She to be lessoned in design forsooth!
 I'm doomed and dore for, since I spoke
 the truth.
 Make my own work the subject of dispute —
 Fails it of just perfection absolute 70 Somewhere? Those motors, flexors, — don't I know
 Ser Santi, styled 'Tirititoto
 The pencil-prig,' might blame them?
 Yet my wife —
 Were he and his nicknamer brought to
 life,
 Tito and Titian, to pronounce again — Ask her who knows more. — I or the great Twain
 Our colourist and draughtsman!
 "I help her,
 Not she helps me; and neither shall demur Because my portion is —" he chose to
 think —
 "Quite other than a woman's: I may 80
 drink

At many waters, must repose by none —
Rather rise and fare forth, having done Duty to one new excellence the more, Ablent thereby, though impotent before So much was gained of knowledge. Best depart

From this last lady I have learned by
heart!"

Thus he concluded of himself — resigned To play the man and master: "Man boasts mind:

Woman, man's sport calls mistress, to the
same

10 Does body's suit and service. Would she claim

— My placid Beatrice-wife — pretence
Even to blame her lord if, going hence, He wistfully regards one whom — did
fate

Concede — he might accept queen, abdicate

Kingship because of? — one of no meek
sort

But masterful as he: man's match in short?

Oh, there's no secret I were best conceal!
Bicé shall know; and should a stray tear
steal

From out the blue eye, stain the rose cheek — bah!

20 A smile, a word's gay reassurance — ah, With kissing interspersed, — shall make amends,

Turn pain to pleasure."

"What, in truth so ends

Abruptly, do you say, our intercourse?" Next day, asked Artemisia: "I'll divorce Husband and wife no longer. Go your
ways,

Leave Rome! Viterbo owns no equal,
says

The bye-word, for fair women: you, no
doubt,

May boast a paragon all specks without,
Using the painter's privilege to choose 30 Among what's rarest. Will your wife refuse

Acceptance from — no rival — of a gift?
You paint the human figure I make shift Humbly to reproduce: but, in my hours Of idlesse, what I fain would paint is — flowers.

Look now!"

She twitched aside a veiling cloth.

"Here is my keepsake — frame and picture both:

For see, the frame is all of flowers fes-toon'd

About an empty space, — left thus, to wound

No natural susceptibility:

40 How can I guess? 'Tis you must fill,
not I,

The central space with — her whom you like best!

That is your business, mine has been the
rest.

But judge!"

How judge them? Each of us, in flowers,

Chooses his love, allies it with past hours,
Old meetings, vanished forms and faces:
no —

Here let each favourite unmolested blow For one heart's homage, no tongue's banal praise,

Whether the rose appealingly bade "Gaze Your fill on me, sultana who dethrone

The gaudy tulip!" or 'twas "Me alone

Rather do homage to, who lily am,
No unabashed rose!" "Do I vainly cram

My cup with sweets, your jonquil?"

"Why forget

Vernal endearments with the violet?"
So they contested yet concerted, all

As one, to circle round about, enthrall Yet, self-forgetting, push to prominence
The midmost wonder, gained no matter
whence.

There's a tale extant, in a book I conned Long years ago, which treats of things be- 6c yond

The common, antique times and countries queer

And customs strange to match. "'Tis said, last year,"

(Recounts my author,) "that the King had
mind

To view his kingdom — guessed at from behind

A palace-window hitherto. Announced No sooner was such purpose than 'twas pounced

Upon by all the ladies of the land — Loyal but light of life: they formed a band

Of loveliest ones but lithest also, since Proudly they all combined to bear their 7c
prince.

Backs joined to breasts, — arms, legs,
— nay, ankles, wrists,

Hands, feet, I know not by what turns and twists,

So interwoven lay that you believed 'Twas one sole beast of burden which received

The monarch on its back, of breadth not scant

Since fifty girls made one white elephant." So with the fifty flowers which shapes and hues

Blent, as I tell, and made one fast yet loose

Mixture of beauties, composite, distinct No less in each combining flower that 8c linked

With flower to form a fit environment For — whom might be the painter's heart's intent
Thus, in the midst enhaloed, to enshrine?

"This glory-guarded middle space — is mine?"

For me to fill?"

"For you, my Friend! We part, Never perchance to meet again. Your Art —

What if I mean it — so to speak — shall
wed

My own, be witness of the life we led When sometimes it has seemed our souls near found

10 Each one the other as its mate — unbound Had yours been haply from the better
choice

— Beautiful Bicé: 'tis the common voice, The crowning verdict. Make whom you like best

Queen of the central space, and manifest
Your predilection for what flower beyond All flowers finds favour with you. I am fond

Of — say — yon rose's rich predominance, While you — what wonder? — more affect the glance

20 The gentler violet from its leafy screen Ventures: so — choose your flower and paint your queen!"

Oh but the man was ready, head as hand, Instructed and adroit. "Just as you
stand,

Stay and be made — would Nature but relent —

By Art immortal!"

Every implement
In tempting reach — a palette primed, each squeeze

Of oil-paint in its proper patch — with
these,

Brushes, a veritable sheaf to grasp!

He worked as he had never dared.

"Unclasp
My Art from yours who can!" — he cried at length,

30 As down he threw the pencil — "Grace from Strength

Dissociate, from your flowery fringe detach

My face of whom it frames, — the feat will match

What that of Time should Time from me extract

Your memory, Artemisia!" And in fact, —

What with the pricking impulse, sudden glow

Of soul — head, hand co-operated so

That face was worthy of its frame, 'tis
said —

Perfect, suppose!

They parted. Soon instead Of Rome was home, — of Artemisia —
well,

The placid-perfect wife. And it befell 40

That after the first incontestably Blessedest of all blisses (— wherefore try Your patience with embracings and the
rest

Due from Calypso's all-unwilling guest To his Penelope?) — there somehow came The coolness which as duly follows flame.
So, one day, "What if we inspect the gifts My Art has gained us?"

Now the wife uplifts
A casket-lid, now tries a medal's chain

Round her own lithe neck, fits a ring in 50
vain

— Too loose on the fine finger, — vows and swears

The jewel with two pendent pearls like pears

Betters a lady's bosom — witness else!
And so forth, while Ulysses smiles.

"Such spells Subdue such natures — sex must worship
toys

— Trinkets and trash: yet, ah, quite other joys

Must stir from sleep the passionate abyss
Of — such an one as her I know — not
this

My gentle consort with the milk for
blood!

Why, did it chance that in a careless mood 60 (In those old days, gone — never to return —

When we talked — she to teach and I to learn)

I dropped a word, a hint which might imply

Consorts exist — how quick flashed fire from eye,

Brow blackened, lip was pinched by furious lip!

I needed no reminder of my slip:

One warning taught me wisdom. Whereas here . . .

Aha, a sportive fancy! Eh, what fear

Of harm to follow? Just a whim indulged!

"My Beatrice, there's an undivulged 70 Surprise in store for you: the moment's fit

For letting loose a secret: out with it!

Tributes to worth, you rightly estimate

These gifts of Prince and Bishop, Church and State:

Yet, may I tell you? Tastes so disagree!
There's one gift, preciouslest of all to me,
I doubt if you would value as well worth

The obvious sparkling gauds that men unearth

For toy-cult mainly of you womankind; Such make you marvel, I concede: while blind

The sex proves to the greater marvel here I veil to baulk its envy. Be sincere!
Say, should you search creation far and
wide,
Was ever face like this?"

He drew aside
The veil, displayed the flower-framed portrait kept
For private delectation.

No adept
In florist's lore more accurately named 10 And praised or, as appropriately, blamed Specimen after specimen of skill, Than Biccé. "Rightly placed the daffodil —

Scarcely so right the blue germander.
Grey

Good mouse-ear! Hardly your auricula Is powdered white enough. It seems to me Scarlet not crimson, that anemone;
But there's amends in the pink saxifrage.
O darling dear ones, let me disengage
You innocents from what your harmlessness

20 Clasps lovingly! Out thou from their caress, Serpent!"

Whereat forth-flashing from her coils

On coils of hair, the spilla in its toils Of yellow wealth, the dagger-plaything kept

To pin its plaits together, life-like leapt
And — woe to all inside the coronal!
Stab followed stab, — cut, slash, she ruined
all

The masterpiece. Alack for eyes and
mouth

And dimples and endearment — North and South,

East, West, the tatters in a fury flew:

30 There yawned the circlet. What remained
to do?

She flung the weapon, and, with folded arms

And mien defiant of such low alarms As death and doom beyond death, Biccé
stood

Passively statuesque, in quietude Awaiting judgment.

And out judgment burst
With frank unloading of love's laughter,
first

Freed from its unsuspected source. Some throe

Must needs unlock love's prison-bars, let flow

The joyance.

40 "Then you ever were, still are,
And henceforth shall be — no occulted star

But my resplendent Biccé, sun-revealed, Full-rondure! Woman-glory unconcealed, So front me, find and claim and take your
own —

My soul and body yours and yours alone, As you are mine, mine wholly! Heart's love, take —

Use your possession — stab or stay at will Here — hating, saving — woman with the skill

To make man beast or god!"

And so it proved:
For, as beseemed new godship, thus he
loved,

Past power to change, until his dying- 50
day, —

Good fellow! And I fain would hope — some say

Indeed for certain — that our painter's
'toils

At fresco-splashing, finer stroke in oils,
Were not so mediocre after all;

Perhaps the work appears unduly small From having loomed too large in old esteem,

Patronised by late Papacy. I seem Myself to have cast eyes on certain work

In sundry galleries, no judge needs shirk From moderately praising. He designed 60 Correctly, nor in colour lagged behind

His age: but both in Florence and in Rome
The elder race so make themselves at home

That scarce we give a glance to ceilingfuls
Of such like as Francesco. Still, one culls

From out the heaped laudations of the
time

The pretty incident I put in rhyme.

FLUTE-MUSIC, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT.

He. AH, the bird-like fluting Through the ash-tops yonder —

Bullfinch-bubbings, soft sounds suit- 70
ing

What sweet thoughts, I wonder?

Fine-pearled notes that surely

Gather, dewdrop-fashion,

Deep-down in some heart which purely

Secrets globuled passion —

Passion insuppressive —

Such is piped, for certain;

Love, no doubt, nay, love excessive

'Tis, your ash-tops curtain.

Would your ash-tops open 80

We might spy the player —

Seek and find some sense which no
pen

Yet from singer, sayer,

Ever has extracted:

Never, to my knowledge,

Yet has pedantry enacted That, in Cupid's College, Just this variation
Of the old old yearning Should by plain speech have salvation,
Yield new men new learning.

"Love!" but what love, nicely
New from old parted,
Would the player teach precisely?
First of all, he started In my brain Assurance — Trust — entire Contentment — Passion proved by much endurance;
Then came — not resentment,
No, but simply Sorrow:
What was seen had vanished:
Yesterday so blue! To-morrow Blank, all sunshine banished.

Hark! 'Tis Hope resurges, Struggling through obstruction — Forces a poor smile which verges On Joy's introduction.
Now, perhaps, mere Musing:
"Holds earth such a wonder?
Fairy-mortal, soul-sense-fusing Past thought's power to sunder!" What? calm Acquiescence?
"Daisied turf gives room to Trefoil, plucked once in her presence —
Growing by her tomb too!"

She. All's your fancy-spinning!
Here's the fact: a neighbour Never-ending, still beginning, Recreates his labour:
Deep o'er desk he drudges, Adds, divides, subtracts and Multiplies, until he judges Noonday-hour's exact sand Shows the hourglass emptied:
Then comes lawful leisure, Minutes rare from toil exempted,
Fit to spend in pleasure.

Out then with — what treatise?
Youth's Complete Instructor
How to play the Flute. Quid petis?
Follow Youth's conductor
On and on, through Easy,
Up to Harder, Hardest
Flute-piece, till thou, flautist wheezy, Possibly discardest Tootlings hoarse and husky, Mayst expend with courage Breath — on tunes once bright now dusky —
Meant to cool thy porridge.

That's an air of Tulou's
He maltreats persistent,

Till as lief I'd hear some Zulu's Bone-piped bag, breath-distent, Madden native dances.
I'm the man's familiar:
Unexpectedness enhances What your ear's auxiliar — Fancy — finds suggestive.
Listen! That's legato Rightly played, his fingers restive Touch as if staccato.

He. Ah, you trick-betrayer!
Telling tales, unwise one?
So the secret of the player Was — he could surprise one Well-nigh into trusting Here was a musician Skilled consummately, yet lusting Through no vile ambition After making captive
All the world, — rewarded Amplly by one stranger's rapture, Common praise discarded.

So, without assistance
Such as music rightly Needs and claims, — defying distance, Overleaping lightly Obstacles which hinder, —
He, for my approval,
All the same and all the kinder Made mine what might move all Earth to kneel adoring:
Took — while he piped Gounod's Bit of passionate imploring — Me for Juliet: who knows?

No! as you explain things, All's mere repetition,
Practise-pother: of all vain things Why waste pooh or pish on Toilsome effort — never Ending, still beginning — After-what should pay endeavour — Right-performance? winning Weariness from you who,
Ready to admire some Owl's fresh hooting — Tu-whit, tu-who —
Find stale thrush-songs tiresome.

She. Songs, Spring thought perfection, Summer criticises:
What in May escaped detection, August, past surprises,
Notes, and names each blunder.
You, the just-initiate, Praise to heart's content (what wonder?)
Tootlings I hear vitiate Romeo's serenading —
I who, times full twenty,
Turned to ice — no ash-tops aiding —
At his caldamente.

So, 'twas distance altered Sharps to flats? The missing Bar when syncopation faltered (You thought — paused for kissing!)
 Ash-tops too felonious Intercepted? Rather Say — they well-nigh made euphonious Discord, helped to gather Phrase, by phrase, turn patches Into simulated Unity which botching matches, — Scraps reintegrated.

He. Sweet, are you suggestive
 Of an old suspicion
 Which has always found me restive
 To its admonition
 When it ventured whisper
 "Fool, the strifes and struggles Of your trembler — blusher — lisper Were so many juggles, Tricks tried — oh, so often! —
 Which once more do duty,
 Find again a heart to soften, Soul to snare with beauty."

Birth-blush of the briar-rose, Mist-bloom of the hedge-sloe, Someone gains the prize: admire
 rose Would he, when noon's wedge —
 slow —
 Sure, has pushed, expanded Rathe pink to raw redness?
 Would he covet sloe when sanded
 By road-dust to deadness?
 So — restore their value!
 Ply a water-sprinkle!
 Then guess sloe is fingered, shall
 you?
 Find in rose a wrinkle?

Here what played Aquarius?
 Distance — ash-tops aiding,
 Reconciled scraps else contrarious, Brightened stuff fast fading.
 Distance — call your shyness:
 Was the fair one peevish?
 Coyness softened out of slyness.
 Was she cunning, thievish,
 All-but-proved impostor?
 Bear but one day's exile, Ugly traits were wholly lost or Screened by fancies flexible —

Ash-tops these, you take me?
 Fancies' interference
 Changed . . .
 But since I sleep, don't wake me!
 What if all's appearance?
 Is not outside seeming Real as substance inside?

Both are facts, so leave me dreaming.
 If who loses wins I'd Ever lose, — conjecture,
 From one phrase trilled deftly,
 All the piece. So, end your lecture, Let who lied be left lie!

"IMPERANTE AUGUSTO NATUS EST —"

WHAT it was struck the terror into me?
 This, Publius: closer! while we wait our
 turn I'll tell you. Water's warm (they ring inside)
 At the eighth hour, till when no use to bathe.
 Here in the vestibule where now we sit,
 One scarce stood yesterday, the throng was
 such
 Of loyal gapers, folk all eye and ear
 While Lucius Varius Rufus¹ in their midst Read out that long-planned late-completed
 piece,
 His Panegyric on the Emperor.
 "Nobody like him" little Flaccus² laughed
 "At leading forth an Epos with due pomp!
 Only, when godlike Cæsar swells the
 theme,
 How should mere mortals hope to praise
 aright?
 Tell me, thou offshoot of Etruscan kings!"
 Whereat Mæcenas smiling sighed assent.

I paid my quadrans,³ left the Thermæ's roar
 Of rapture as the poet asked "What place Among the godships Jove, for Cæsar's sake, Would bid its actual occupant vacate In favour of the new divinity?" And got the expected answer "Yield thine
 own!" — Jove thus dethroned, I somehow wanted
 air,
 And found myself a-pacing street and
 street,
 Letting the sunset, rosy over Rome, Clear my head dizzy with the hubbub —
 say
 As if thought's dance therein had kicked up dust
 By trampling on all else: the world lay prone,
 As — poet-propped, in brave hexameters — Their subject triumphed up from man to God.
 Caius Octavius Cæsar the August — Where was escape from his prepotency?
 I judge I may have passed — how many piles

³ Roman coin of small value.

- Of structure dropt like doles from his free hand To Rome on every side? Why, right and left,
For temples you've the Thundering Jupiter, Avenging Mars, Apollo Palatine:
How count Piazza, Forum — there's a third All but completed. You've the Theatre Named of Marcellus — all his work, such work! —
One thought still ending, dominating all — With warrant Varius sang "Be Cæsar God!"
- 10 By what a hold arrests he Fortune's wheel, Obtaining and retaining heaven and earth
Through Fortune, if you like, but favour no!
For the great deeds flashed by me, fast and thick
As stars which storm the sky on autumn nights —
Those conquests! but peace crowned them, — so, of peace!
Count up his titles only — these, in few — Ten years Triumvir, Consul thirteen times, Emperor, nay — the glory topping all — Hailed Father of his Country, last and best
- 20 Of titles, by himself accepted so:
And why not? See but feats achieved in Rome —
Not to say, Italy — he planted there Some thirty colonies — but Rome itself All new-built, "marble now, brick once," he boasts:
This Portico, that Circus. Would you sail?
He has drained Tiber for you: would you walk?
He strengthened out the long Flaminian Way.
Poor? Profit by his score of donatives!
Rich — that is, mirthful? Half-a-hundred games
- 30 Challenge your choice! There's Rome — for you and me Only? The centre of the world besides!
For, look the wide world over, where ends Rome?
To sunrise? There's Euphrates — all between!
To sunset? Ocean and immensity:
North, — stare till Danube stops you:
South, see Nile,
The Desert and the earth-upholding Mount.
Well may the poet-people each with each Vie in his praise, our company of swans, Virgil and Horace, singers — in their way —
- 40 Nearly as good as Varius, though less famed:
Well may they cry, "No mortal, plainly God!"
- Thus to myself myself said, while I walked.
Or would have said, could thought attain to speech, Clean baffled by enormity of bliss
The while I strove to scale its heights and sound Its depths — this masterdom o'er all the world Of one who was but born, — like you, like me, Like all the world he owns, — of flesh and blood.
But he — how grasp, how gauge his own conceit
Of bliss to me near inconceivable? 50
Or — since such flight too much makes reel the brain — Let's sink — and so take refuge, as it were,
From life's excessive altitude — to life's Breathable wayside shelter at its base!
If looms thus large this Cæsar to myself — Of senatorial rank and somebody — How must he strike the vulgar nameless crowd, Innumerable swarm that's nobody at all?
Why, — for an instance, — much as yon gold shape Crowned, sceptred, on the temple oppo- 60
site —
Fulgurant Jupiter — must daze the sense Of — say, yon outcast begging from its step!
What, anti-Cæsar, monarch in the mud,
As he is pinnaced above thy pate?
Ay, beg away! thy lot contrasts full well
With his whose bounty yields thee this support — Our Holy and Inviolable One, Cæsar, whose bounty built the fane above!
Dost read my thought? Thy garb, alack, displays
Sore usage truly in each rent and stain — 70 Faugh! Wash though in Subura!¹ ¹Ware the dogs
Who may not so disdain a meal on thee!
What, stretchest forth a palm to catch my alms?
Aha, why yes: I must appear — who knows? —
I, in my toga, to thy rags and thee — Quæstor nay, Edile, Censor Pol!
perhaps
The very City-Prætor's noble self!
As to me Cæsar, so to thee am I?
Good: nor in vain shall prove thy quest, poor rogue!
Hither — hold palm out — take this 80 quarter-as!
- And' who did take it? As he raised his head, (My gesture was a trifle — well, abrupt)

Back fell the broad flap of the peasant's-hat,
 The homespun cloak that muffled half his cheek Dropped somewhat, and I had a glimpse — just one!
 One was enough. Whose — whose might be the face?
 That unkempt careless hair — brown, yellowish — Those sparkling eyes beneath their eye-brows' ridge (Each meets each, and the hawk-nose rules between) — That was enough, no glimpse was needed more!
 And terrifyingly into my mind 10 Came that quick-hushed report was whispered us,
 "They do say, once a year in sordid garb
 He plays the mendicant, sits all day long, Asking and taking alms of who may pass,
 And so averting, if submission help, Fate's envy, the dread chance and change of things
 When Fortune — for a word, a look, a nought — Turns spiteful and — the petted lioness — Strikes with her sudden paw, and prone falls each Who patted late her neck superiorly,
 * Or trifled with those claw-tips velvet-sheathed."
 "He's God!" shouts Lucius Varius Rufus:
 "Man
 And worms'—meat any moment!" mutters low
 Some Power, admonishing the mortal-born.
 Ay, do you mind? There's meaning in the fact That whoso conquers, triumphs, enters Rome, Climbing the Capitolian, soaring thus To glory's summit, — Publius, do you mark — Ever the same attendant who, behind, Above the Conqueror's head supports the crown 20 All-too-demonstrative for human wear, — One hand's employment — all the while reserves Its fellow, backward flung, to point how, close Appended from the car, beneath the foot Of the up-borne exulting Conqueror, Frown — half-descried — the instruments of shame,
 The malefactor's due. Crown, now — Cross, when?
 Who stands secure? Are even Gods so safe?

Jupiter that just now is dominant — Are not there ancient dismal tales how once A predecessor reigned ere Saturn came, 4
 And who can say if Jupiter be last?
 Was it for nothing the grey Sibyl wrote
 "Cæsar Augustus regnant, shall be born In blind Judæa" — one to master him, Him and the universe? An old-wife's tale?

Bath-drudge! Here, slave! No cheating! Our turn next.
 No loitering, or be sure you taste the lash!
 Two strigils,¹ two oil-drippers, each a sponge!

DEVELOPMENT.

My Father was a scholar and knew Greek.
 When I was five years old, I asked him 50
 once
 "What do you read about?"
 "The siege of Troy."
 "What is a siege and what is Troy?"
 Whereat
 He piled up chairs and tables for a town, Set me a-top for Priam, called our cat
 — Helen, enticed away from home (he said)
 By wicked Paris, who couched somewhere close Under the footstool, being cowardly,
 But whom — since she was worth the pains, poor puss — Towzer and Tray, — our dogs, the Atreidai, — sought By taking Troy to get possession of 60
 — Always when great Achilles ceased to sulk, (My pony in the stable) — forth would prance
 And put to flight Hector — our page-boy's self.
 This taught me who was who and what was what:
 So far I rightly understood the case At five years old: a huge delight it proved And still proves — thanks to that instructor sage My Father, who knew better than turn straight Learning's full flare on weak-eyed ignorance, Or, worse yet, leave weak eyes to grow 70 sand-blind,
 Content with darkness and vacuity.
 It happened, two or three years afterward,
 That — I and playmates playing at Troy's Siege — My Father came upon our make-believe.

"How would you like to read yourself the tale

Properly told, of which I gave you first Merely such notion as a boy could bear?
Pope, now, would give you the precise account

Of what, some day, by dint of scholarship,

You'll hear — who knows? — from Homer's very mouth.

Learn Greek by all means, read the 'Blind Old Man,

Sweetest of Singers' — tuphlos which means 'blind,'

Hedistos which means 'sweetest.' Time
enough!

10 Try, anyhow, to master him some day; Until when, take what serves for substitute, Read Pope, by all means!"

So I ran through Pope, Enjoyed the tale — what history so true?
Also attacked my Primer, duly drudged, Grew fitter thus for what was promised
next —

The very thing itself, the actual words, When I could turn — say, Buttmann to account.

Time passed, I ripened somewhat: one fine day,

"Quite ready for the Iliad, nothing less?"

20 There's Heine, where the big books block
the shelf:

Don't skip a word, thumb well the Lexicon!"

I thumbed well and skipped nowise till I learned

Who was who, what was what, from Homer's tongue,

And there an end of learning. Had you asked

The all-accomplished scholar, twelve years
old,

"Who was it wrote the Iliad?" — what a
laugh!

"Why, Homer, all the world knows: of his life

Doubtless some facts exist: it's every-
where:

We have not settled, though, his place of
birth:

30 He begged, for certain, and was blind
beside:

Seven cities claimed him — Scio, with best
right,

Thinks Byron. What he wrote? Those Hymns we have.

Then there's the 'Battle of the Frogs and Mice,'

That's all — unless they dig 'Margites' up (I'd like that) nothing more remains to
know."

Thus did youth spend a comfortable time; Until — "What's this the Germans say is
fact

That Wolf found out first? It's unpleasant work

Their chop and change, unsettling one's belief:

All the same, while we live, we learn, that's 40
sure."

So, I bent brow o'er Prolegomena.

And, after Wolf, a dozen of his like

Proved there was never any Troy at all, Neither Besiegers nor Besieged, — nay,

worse, —

No actual Homer, no authentic text,

No warrant for the fiction I, as fact,

Had treasured in my heart and soul so
long —

Ay, mark you! and as fact held still, still
hold,

Spite of new knowledge, in my heart of hearts

And soul of souls, fact's essence freed and 50
fixed

From accidental fancy's guardian sheath.

Assuredly thenceforward — thank my stars! —

However it got there, deprive who could — Wring from the shrine my precious tenantry,

Helen, Ulysses, Hector and his Spouse, Achilles and his Friend? — though Wolf

— ah, Wolf!

Why must he needs come doubting, spoil
a dream?

But then "No dream's worth waking" — Browning says:

And here's the reason why I tell thus much 60
I, now mature man, you anticipate,

May blame my Father justifiably

For letting me dream out my nonage thus,

And only by such slow and sure degrees

Permitting me to sift the grain from chaff,

Get truth and falsehood known and named as such.

Why did he ever let me dream at all,

Not bid me taste the story in its strength?

Suppose my childhood was scarce qualified

To rightly understand mythology,

Silence at least was in his power to keep: 70

I might have — somehow — correspondingly —

Well, who knows by what method, gained my gains,

Been taught, by forthrights not meander-
ings,

My aim should be to loathe, like Peleus'
son,

A lie as Hell's Gate, love my wedded wife,

Like Hector, and so on with all the rest.

Could not I have excogitated this Without believing such men really were?

That is — he might have put into my hand

The "Ethics"? In translation, if you please,

Exact, no pretty lying that improves,
To suit the modern taste: no more, no less —

The "Ethics": 'tis a treatise I find hard To read aright now that my hair is grey,
And I can manage the original.

At five years old — how ill had fared its leaves!

Now, growing double o'er the Stagirite,
At least I soil no page with bread and milk,

10 Nor crumple, dogsear and deface — boys' way.

REPHAN.¹

[The prose story referred to, in the note is "How it Strikes a Stranger" in the Contributions of Q. Q. Probably no child has ever wholly forgotten this story if he or she had the good luck to read it in infancy. These Taylors lived at Ongar, not Norwich.]

How I lived, ere my human life began
In this world of yours, — like you, made man, —

When my home was the Star of my God Rephan?

Come then around me, close about,
World-weary earth-born ones! Darkest doubt

Or deepest despondency keeps you out?

Nowise! Before a word I speak,
Let my circle embrace your worn, your weak,

Brow-furrowed old age, youth's hollow cheek —

20 Diseased in the body, sick in soul Pinched poverty, satiate wealth, — your whole

Array of despairs! Have I read the roll?

All here? Attend, perpend! O Star Of my God Rephan, what wonders are In thy brilliance fugitive, faint and far!

Far from me, native to thy realm,
Who shared its perfections which o'erwhelm

Mind to conceive. Let drift the helm,

Let drive the sail, dare unconfined

30 Embark for the vastitude, O Mind,
Of an absolute bliss! Leave earth behind!

¹ Suggested by a very early recollection of a prose story by the noble woman and imaginative writer, Jane Taylor, of Norwich. — R. B.

Here, by extremes, at a mean you guess:
There, all's at most — not more, not less:
Nowhere deficiency nor excess.

No want — whatever should be, is now:
No growth — that's change, and change comes — how

To royalty born with crown on brow?

Nothing begins — so needs to end:
Where fell it short at first? Extend Only the same, no change can mend!

46

I use your language: mine — no word
Of its wealth would help who spoke, who heard,

To a gleam of intelligence. None preferred,

None felt distaste when better and worse
Were uncontrastable: bless or curse
What — in that uniform universe?

Can your world's phrase, your sense of things

Forth-figure the Star of my God? No springs,

No winters throughout its space. Time brings

No hope, no fear: as to-day, shall be To-morrow: advance or retreat need we At our stand-still through eternity?

50

All happy: needs must we so have been,
Since who could be otherwise? All serene:
What dark was to banish, what light to screen?

Earth's rose is a bud that's checked or grows

As beams may encourage or blasts oppose:
Our lives leapt forth, each a full-orbed
rose —

Each rose sole rose in a sphere that spread Above and below and around — rose-red: 60
No fellowship, each for itself instead.

One better than I — would prove I lacked Somewhat: one worse were a jarring fact Disturbing my faultlessly exact.

How did it come to pass there lurked Somehow a seed of change that worked Obscure in my heart till perfection irked? —

Till out of its peace at length grew strife — Hopes, fears, loves, hates, — obscurely
rise, —

My life grown a-tremble to turn your life? 72

Was it Thou, above all lights that are, Prime Potency, did Thy hand unbar
The prison-gate of Rephan my Star?

In me did such potency wake a pulse Could trouble tranquillity that lulls Not lashes inertion till throes convulse

Soul's quietude into discontent?
As when the completed rose bursts, rent By ardours till forth from its orb are sent o New petals that mar — unmake the disc — Spoil rondure: what in it an brave risk, Changed apathy's calm to strife, bright,

brisk,

Pushed simple to compound, sprang and spread
Till, fresh-formed, faceted, floreted,
The flower that slept woke a star instead?

No mimic of Star Rephan! How long
I stagnated there where weak and strong,
The wise and the foolish, right and wrong,

Are merged alike in a neutral Best,
Can I tell? No more than at whose behest
The passion arose in my passive breast,

And I yearned for no sameness but difference
In thing and thing, that should shock my
sense
With a want of worth in them all, and
thence

Startle me up, by an Infinite Discovered above and below me — height
And depth alike to attract my flight,

Repel my descent: by hate taught love.
Oh, gain were indeed to see above 30 Supremacy ever — to move, remove,

Not reach — aspire yet never attain To the object aimed at! Scarce in vain, —
As each stage I left nor touched again.

To suffer, did pangs bring the loved one
bliss,
Wring knowledge from ignorance, — just for this —
To add one drop to a love-abyss!

Enough: for you doubt, you hope, O men,
You fear, you agonise, die: what then?
Is an end to your life's work out of ken?

40 Have you no assurance that, earth at end, Wrong will prove right? Who made shall mend
In the higher sphere to which yearnings tend?

Why should I speak? You divine the test.
When the trouble grew in my pregnant
breast

A voice said "So wouldst thou strive, not
rest?"

"Burn and not smoulder, win by worth, Not rest content with a wealth that's dearth?"

Thou art past Rephan, thy place be Earth!"

REVERIE.

I KNOW there shall dawn a day
— Is it here on homely earth? 50

Is it yonder, worlds away,
Where the strange and new have birth,
That Power comes full in play?

Is it here, with grass about,
Under befriending trees,
When shy buds venture out,
And the air by mild degrees Puts winter's death past doubt?

Is it up amid whirl and roar 60
Of the elemental flame
Which star-flecks heaven's dark floor,
That, new yet still the same,
Full in play comes Power once more?

Somewhere, below, above,
Shall a day dawn — this I know — When Power, which vainly strove
My weakness to o'erthrow, Shall triumph. I breathe, I move,

I truly am, at last! 70
For a veil is rent between Me and the truth which passed Fitful, half-guessed, half-seen, Grasped at — not gained, held fast.

I for my race and me Shall apprehend life's law:
In the legend of man shall see Writ large what small I saw In my life's tale: both agree.

As the record from youth to age 80
Of my own, the single soul —
So the world's wide book: one page Deciphered explains the whole Of our common heritage.

How but from near to far Should knowledge proceed, increase?
Try the clod ere test the star!
Bring our inside strife to peace Ere we wage, on the outside, war!

So, my annals thus begin:
With body, to life awoke 90

Soul, the immortal twin Of body which bore soul's yoke Since mortal and not akin.

By means of the flesh, grown fit, Mind, in surview of things,
Now soared, anon alit
To treasure its gatherings
From the ranged expanse — to-wit,

10 Nature, — earth's, heaven's wide show Which taught all hope, all fear:
Acquainted with joy and woe,
I could say "Thus much is clear, Doubt annulled thus much: I know.

"All is effect of cause:
As it would, has willed and done Power: and my mind's applause Goes, passing laws each one,
To Omnipotence, lord of laws."

20 Head praises, but heart refrains From loving's acknowledgment.
Whole losses outweigh half-gains:
Earth's good is with evil blent:
Good struggles but evil reigns.

Yet since Earth's good proved good — Incontrovertibly Worth loving — I understood
How evil — did mind descry Power's object to end pursued —

30 Were haply as cloud across God's orb, no orb itself:
Mere mind — were it found at loss Did it play the tricky elf
And from life's gold purge the dross?

Power is known infinite:
Good struggles to be — at best Seems — scanned by the human sight,
'Tried by the senses' test — Good palpably: but with right

40 Therefore to mind's award Of loving, as power claims praise?
Power — which finds nought too hard,
Fulfilling itself all ways Unchecked, unchanged: while barred,

Baffled, what good began Ends evil on every side.
To Power submissive man Breathes "E'en as Thou art, abide!"
While to good "Late-found, long-sought,

50 "Would Power to a plenitude
But liberate, but enlarge Good's strait confine, — renewed Were ever the heart's discharge Of loving!" Else doubts intrude.

For you dominate, stars all!
For a sense informs you — brute, Bird, worm, fly, great and small,
Each with your attribute Or low or majestic!

Thou earth that embosomest Offspring of land and sea —
How thy hills first sank to rest, How thy vales bred herb and tree Which dizen thy mother-breast —

Do I ask? "Be ignorant Ever!" the answer clangs:
Whereas if I plead world's want,
Soul's sorrows and body's pangs, Play the human applicant, —

Is a remedy far to seek?
I question and find response:
I — all men, strong or weak, Conceive and declare at once For each want its cure. "Power, speak!"

"Stop change, avert decay, Fix life fast, banish death, Eclipse from the star bid stay, Abridge of no moment's breath
One creature! Hence, Night, hail, Day!"

What need to confess again
No problem this to solve By impotence? Power, once plain Proved Power, — let on Power devolve Good's right to co-equal reign!

Past mind's conception — Power!
Do I seek how star, earth, beast, Bird, worm, fly, gained their dower
For life's use, most and least?
Back from the search I cower.

Do I seek what heals all harm, Nay, hinders the harm at first,
Saves earth? Speak, Power, the charm!
Keep the life there unamerced
By chance, change, death's alarm!

As promptly as mind conceives, Let Power in its turn declare Some law which wrong retrieves, Abolishes everywhere
What thwarts, what irks, what grieves!

Never to be! and yet How easy it seems — to sense Like man's — if somehow met Power with its match — immense Love, limitless, unbeset

By hindrance on every side!
Conjectured, nowise known,
Such may be: could man confide

Such would match — were Love but shown

Strip of the veils that hide —

Power's self now manifest!

So reads my record: thine,

O world, how pure —! Gossamer

Were the purport of that prime line, Prophetic of all the rest!

"In a beginning God

Made heaven and earth!" Forth dashed

Knowledge from that time

Man knew things — that dashed Closed its long period.

Knowledge obtained Power praise.

Had it not been manifest,

Enough of its loveless stain.

Unchequered as unexpressed.

In all things Good at best —

Then praise — all praise, no blame —

Had hailed the perfection. No!

As Power's display, the same

Be Good's — praise forth shall flow

Unisonous in acclaim!

Even as the world its life,

So have I lived my own —

Power seen with Love at strife,

That strife, this unity shown,

— Good part and evil rife

Whereof the effect be — faith

That, some far day, were found

Rightness in things now rather

Wrong, righted, each claim unbound,

Renewal born out of scathe.*

Why faith — sure to lift the load,

To leaven the lump, where lies

Mind prostrate through knowledge owed

To the loveless Power it tries

To withstand, how vain! In flowed

Ever resistless fact

No more than the passive clay

Disputes the potter's art.

Could the dreamed mind disobey

Knowledge the cataract.

But, perfect in every part,

Has the potter's moulded shape,

Leap of man's quickened heart,

Three of his thought's escape,

Stings of his soul, which dart

Through the barrier of flesh, till keen

See things from the calm and clear.

Through turbidity all between,

From the known to the unknown here,

Heaven's "Shall be," from Earth's "Has been"? —

* Early.

* Harm.

That Power is — the power that sleep

Rise and the rest, that Power

From earth's loveless Power — sleep

Things perfect, all things at rest.

To the Power's world, the world sleep.

Where, amid what strifes and storms

May wait the adventurous quest,

Power is Love — transports, transforms 64

Who aspired from worst to best,

Sought the soul's world, spurned the worms'.

I have faith such end shall be

From the first, Power was — I knew.

Life has made clear to me

That, strive but for closer view,

Love were as plain to see.

When see? When there dawns a day,

If not on the homely earth,

Then yonder, worlds away,

Where the strange and new have birth, 70

And Power comes full in play.

EPILOGUE.

At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-
time,

When you set your fancies free,

Will they pass to where — by death, fools

the world expressed —

Low he lies who once so loved you, whom you loved so,

— Pity me?

Oh to love so, be so loved, yet so mistaken!

What had I on earth to do

With the slothful, with the mawkish, the 80 unmanly?

Like the aimless, helpless, hopeless, did I drivel

— Being — who?

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,

Never doubted clouds would break,

Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph.

Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,

Sleep to wake.

No, at noonday in the bustle of man's worktime

Greet the unseen with a cheer!

Bid him forward, breast and back as either 87

should be,

"Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed, — fight on, fare ever

There as here!"

APPENDIX

OF THE BROWNING MSS.

BY FREDERIC G. KENYON

THE sale room of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge in the first week of May 1913 was a melancholy sight for the lovers of English literature. On the hundred and first anniversary of Robert Browning's birth, a large portion of his library, containing many volumes presented to him and his wife by friends, relations, and admirers, and many with their own autograph inscriptions, were dispersed under the auctioneer's hammer. The next day their personal relics—photographs, busts, chairs, tables, inkstands, blotting books, penwipers, Mrs. Browning's watch, a locket with Milton's hair, and the love token which formed the subject of the Sonnet from the Portuguese beginning "I never gave a lock of hair away"—passed through the same unsympathetic medium—it may be hoped, into the keeping of those who will cherish them with fitting affection. Two days earlier, a crowded room witnessed the sight of rival dealers competing for the autograph MSS. of "Aurora Leigh," of the "Sonnets from the Portuguese," and, most intimate and sacred of all, the love-letters of the two poets; to be informed afterwards that they had been purchased by the victors in the several duels, not on commission for devoted admirers of Robert and Elizabeth Browning, but as articles to be placed in their stock and disposed of to the first purchaser prepared to pay the price to which this competition had forced them up.

It was a sorry sight; and yet it was one not for which any of those who were concerned in the sale as principals could be blamed. So far as could be ascertained, all the nearest relations on both sides were anxious to avoid a sale, and particularly a public sale, and would have been prepared, if a sale were inevitable, that at any rate the most personal and intimate objects should pass into some national collection, as a permanent memorial of the two poets. But amid the tangle of different interests, the claims of creditors, the advice of lawyers and auctioneers, sentiment had small chance in competition with legal safety, and a public sale could not be averted. With the results, at any rate the creditors will be satisfied, and presumably the lawyers, auctioneers, and dealers will have no cause to complain; and with this modicum of satisfaction one must be content.

Perhaps one may find other grounds of consolation. The disposal of the minor volumes in the poet's library will, no doubt, have enabled many of the devotees of Robert Browning to secure as mementos books which once belonged to him, and which bear inscriptions in his handwriting. The larger manuscripts were few in number. There was, of course, first of all in sentimental interest, the wonderful collection of those 284 letters which Robert Browning wrote to Elizabeth Barrett between January 10, 1845, and September 19, 1846, and the 287 which he received from her during the same period. These, so far as is at present publicly known, await a purchaser who will make a sufficient advance on the £650 for which they were knocked down by Messrs. Sotheby. There was the MS. of Robert Browning's last volume, "Asolando," purchased for £900—it is understood for America. There were two copies, one perfect and one imperfect, of the "Sonnets from the Portuguese," Elizabeth Barrett's high-water mark in poetry, and there was the complete MS. of "Aurora Leigh," which Ruskin declared to be the greatest poem in the English language. Further, there were several hundreds of Mrs. Browning's letters, before and after marriage, to various correspondents, of which the cream has, no doubt, in the main been skimmed off for previous publication, but of which many remain unpublished. With regard to the "Asolando" volume, which the poet intended to go to Balliol College, with the rest of his MSS. from "Balaustion" to the "Parleyings," and which his son retained only for his own lifetime, one may regret that their expressed desire has been balked of its fulfilment; but with respect to the others, however much one may wish that they could have remained in England, it is only fair to remember that America, where appreciation of both poets, and especially of Robert Browning, was earlier and more enthusiastic than in England, has earned the right to possess any of these relics which she cares to acquire, and will respect them not less than they would have been respected here. Readers of Mrs. Browning's letters will not doubt that both of them would have gladly recognised the claims of America in this respect. And it is to be remembered, finally, that the two greatest MSS. of all, the complete "Ring and the Book" and the copy of the "Sonnets from the Portuguese" which Mrs. Browning gave to her husband in the early days of their marriage (pushing them into his pocket and hastily retiring from the room), which were until recently in the hands to which they were given by the poet and by the poet's son—those of the late Mrs. George Murray Smith, the wife of Browning's publisher and most valued friend—are still treasured in her family. It is also good to know that the surviving copyright in all things Browning now belongs to the firm which have been the Browning publishers since 1868, Smith, Elder & Co.

But among the minor manuscripts were many which have a literary as well as a sentimental interest. One might perhaps wish that the unpublished verses of both poets had been destroyed by them out of hand when once the decision had been taken not to publish them. Such waifs and strays are a permanent difficulty to editors. If the author is sufficiently eminent, publication of everything of his that remains above ground is eventually inevitable, and an editor is torn between the natural desire to make his edition complete, and his equally natural reluctance to print matter which is not worthy of its author, and which the author himself did not consider worthy of publication. The ultimate solution is probably some limbo of an appendix, which can be searched once for all by the curious and then left to its obscurity. Yet even in such an outer darkness one does not care to meet Browning's freakish rhymes to "rhinoceros" or "Timbuctoo"; while it is an injustice to two, if not three, of the stars of our Victorian literature to reprint, at any time or in any place, the "Lines to Edward FitzGerald."

One little group of manuscripts, however, in the delicate handwriting of Mrs. Browning, has a special interest, personal and literary, and its publication can do no harm to anyone. In September and October 1845 Robert Browning was engaged in preparing for the press the poems which were published in November as Part VII of his "Bells and Pomegranates," under the general title of "Dramatic Romances and Lyrics." Five of them had previously appeared in Hood's Magazine during 1844 and the spring of 1845, and these had come to Miss Barrett's notice in July; the rest were sent to her in manuscript and proof in the course of the autumn. Her criticisms were asked for honestly and were sent loyally; and they lie before us now in these little sheets. They are not criticisms in the larger sense of the term, not appreciations of the general scheme of the poems, but merely suggestions for verbal alterations, the little queries which a friend may make of a friend's work, especially when the critic is himself (or herself, as in this instance) a poet. Those who do not care for the minutiae of poetic production, or are content with the result without inquiring as to the means, will have no concern with these; but some of those whose interests are bound up with the poetry of Robert Browning may care to see how the poet who was afterwards to be his wife helped him.

Those who have any acquaintance with the bibliography of Browning's poetry (and some such acquaintance is really essential to an understanding of the development of his genius, since the familiar classification of the shorter poems has obscured their chronological order) know that the original "Dramatic Romances and Lyrics" of 1845 are a very different group of poems from the "Dramatic Romances" as they appear in every edition after 1863. Part VII of "Bells and Pomegranates" consisted of twenty-one poems. Of these, only six remained under the heading of "Dramatic Romances" in 1863. Thirteen were transferred to the "Dramatic Lyrics," and two to "Men and Women," where we still find them to-day. Of the original twenty-one, twelve receive annotations from Miss Barrett in the papers now before us, in addition to "A Soul's Tragedy" and "Luria," which formed the eighth and last part of "Bells and Pomegranates," published a few months later, in April 1846. These twelve poems include the five which had previously appeared in Hood's Magazine ("The Tomb at St. Praxed's," "The Flower's Name," "Sibrandus Schafnaburgensis," "The Laboratory," and "The Boy and the Angel"), together with "How they brought the Good News," "Pictor Ignotus," "Italy in England," "England in Italy," "The Confessional," "Saul," and "Time's Revenges." In addition, some comments (but of a more general nature) on "The Lost Leader," "The Lost Mistress," "Home Thoughts from Abroad," "The Flight of the Duchess," "Earth's Immortalities," "Nay, but you who do not love her," "Night and Morning," "Claret and Tokay," and "The Glove," which constitute the rest of the volume, appear in the published letters, and so complete Miss Barrett's criticisms on the whole group of poems.

These criticisms for the most part relate to small details of phrase or rhythm. It is curious to find Elizabeth Barrett, whose ear, to judge from her own poetry, was not remarkably sensitive, criticising the imperfect rhythm of Robert Browning. But Miss Barrett was a better critic than poet at this period (which, be it remembered, was before the "Sonnets from the Portuguese" and "Aurora Leigh"); and it is rather in imperfect rhymes than in defective rhythms that her ear is mostly at fault. On the other hand, Browning in his earlier lyrics had a certain staccato jerkiness, of which he subsequently cured himself; and most readers will agree that his correspondent's criticisms were justified. Miss Barrett's notes upon "Saul" will illustrate this point, and at the same time furnish a fair sample of her comments in general:

"Nor till from his tent

Would you not rather write 'until,' here, to break the course of monosyllables, with another reason?

"For in the black mid-tent silence Three drear days—

A word seems omitted before 'silence'—and the short line is too short to the ear—not to say that 'drear days' conspires against 'drear ways' found afterwards. And the solemn flow of the six lines should be uninterrupted, I think.

"The entrance of David into the tent is very visible and characteristic,—and you see his youthfulness in the activity of it,—and the repetition of the word 'foldskirts' has an Hebraic effect.

"But soon I descried Something more black than the blackness.

Should it not be 'A something'—more definitely? And the rhythm cries aloud for it, it seems to me.

"The vast, upright—

Quære—'the upright' . . . for rhythm.

"Then a sunbeam burst thro' the blind tent—
roof
Showed Saul.

Now, will you think whether to enforce the admirable effect of your sudden sunbeam, this first line shall not be rendered more rapid by the removal of the clogging epithet 'blind'—which you repeat, too, I believe, farther on in the next page? What if you tried the line thus,

"Then a sunbeam that burst through the tent—
roof—
Showed Saul!

The manifestation in the short line appears to me completer from the rapidity being increased in the long one. I only ask. It is simply an impression. I have told you how very fine I do think all this showing of Saul by the sunbeam—and how, the more you come to see him, the finer it is. The 'all heavily hangs,' as applied to the king-serpent, you quite feel in your muscles.

"The breaking of the band of lilies round the harp is a relief and refreshment in itself after that dreadful sight. And then how beautifully true it is that the song should begin so . . . with the sheep—

"As one after one
Docile they come to the pen door—

But the rhythm should not interrupt itself where the sheep come docilely—and is not a word wanted . . . a syllable rather . . . before that 'Docile'? Will you consider?

"The long grasses stifling the water' . . .
How beautiful that is!

"One after one seeks its lodging
As star follows star
Into the blue far above us,
—So blue and so far!

It appears to me that the two long lines require a syllable each at the beginning, to keep the procession of sheep uninterrupted. The ear expects to read every long and short line, in the sequence of this metre, as one long line,—and where it cannot do so, a loss . . . an abruptness . . . is felt—and there should be nothing abrupt in the movement of these pastoral, starry images—do you think so? Is it not Goethe who compares the stars to sheep? Which you reverse here.

"Would we might help thee, my brother?

Why not, 'Oh, would,' &c.—it throws a wall into the line, and swells the rhythm rightly, I think.

"Next she whom we count
The beauty, the pride of our dwelling—

Why not 'For the beauty' or 'As the beauty'?

"But I stopped—for here, in the darkness
Saul groaned.

Very fine—and the preceding images full of beauty and characteristic life!—but in this long line, I just ask if the rhythm would gain by repeating 'here' . . . thus . . .

"But I stop here—for here in the darkness—
I just ask, being doubtful.

"And the shaking of the tent from the shudder of the king . . . what effect it all has!—and I like the jewels waking in his turban!

"So the head—but the body stirred not.

If you wrote 'So the head—but the body . . . that stirred not'—Just see the context.

"The water was wont to go warbling
Softly and well.

Is not a syllable wanted at the beginning of the short line, to make the water warble softly . . . 'right softly'?

"And heard her faint tongue
Join in, while it could, to the witness—

Would 'joining in' be better to the ear?

"And promise and wealth for the future
I think you meant to write 'the' before promise.

"All I said about the poem in my note, I think more and more. Full of power and beauty it is—and the conception, very striking.

That is one little batch of notes, one morning's work, it may be, of the invalid lying on her back on her couch, and writing in her tiny hand on tiny sheets of note-paper—for, as she said, she was a small woman, and liked to have small things about her. The reader who will take the pains to compare the criticisms with the poem as it stands to-day (remembering that, in its original form it was printed in alternate long and short lines, in place of the uniform long lines to which we are accustomed) will see that in almost every case Browning had the wisdom to accept his critic's suggestions. It was the most useful form of criticism—accepting and admiring the general conception and treatment, but suggesting minor improvements in detail which could be adopted without difficulty. The criticism which begins by telling a poet to alter his whole method is rarely of any use.

It would be tedious to go through the other poems in detail. In the lyric poems Miss Barrett's criticisms are mostly directed to improvements in rhythm and the removal of small obscurities. In "Luria," on the other hand, she did good service by discouraging a trick of inversion, and pointing out the greater force given by directness. No one who knows this noble poem will question the inferiority of the first form of these lines (Act I, ll. 139-142)—

If in the struggle when the soldier's sword
Before the statist's hand should sink its point,
And to the calm head yield the violent hand,
Virtue on virtue still have fallen away . . .

to the simple, directer form in which they now stand. "Tell me if an air of stiffness is not given by such unnecessary inversions," says the critic in another instance; and again, when she has set straight another contorted phrase, "You allow the reader to see at a glance what otherwise he will seek studiously." This is a pregnant phrase, which Browning in later years might have done well to bear in mind. Not that the want of directness in some of the later poems, as compared with these of the Italian period, is to be attributed to the loss of his wife's correcting hand; for we know that the married poets made a point of keeping their work independent and apart until it was ready for the press. Nevertheless, the lesson indicated by these few criticisms seems to have borne fruit in the greater clarity of the poems published between 1845 and 1864 ("Dramatis Personæ"), and was not always forgotten afterwards.

A few more general expressions of opinion may be quoted in conclusion. Of "Sibrandus Schafnaburgensis," that delightful story of vengeance on a pedant, Miss Barrett writes:

Do you know that this poem is a great favourite with me—it is so new, and full of a creeping, crawling, grotesque life. Ah, but . . . do you know, besides, it is almost reproachable in you to hold up John Knox to derision in this way!

Of "The Tomb of St. Praxed's" (as the poem was originally called, of which Ruskin said that he knew no other piece of modern English in which there is so much told of the Renaissance spirit):

This is a wonderful poem, I think, and classes with those works of yours which show most power . . . most unquestionable genius in the high sense. You force your reader to sympathise positively in his glory in being buried.

She notices also "the rushing and hurrying life of the descriptions" in "England in Italy" (with its alternative title "Autumn at Sorrento"), "tossed in one upon another like the grape bunches in the early part, and not kept under by ever so much breathless effort on the poet's part," and adds "For giving the sense of Italy, it is worth a whole library of travel-books." Of the companion poem, "Italy in England," which Mazzini read to his fellow-exiles as a proof that at least one Englishman sympathised with them, she says: "I like the simplicity of the great-heartedness of it (though perhaps half-Saxon in character), with the Italian scenery all around—it is very impressive."

It is not always easy for the first critic of a new poem (and Browning's were so new that nothing like them, except the "Dramatic Lyrics" in Part III of the "Bells and Pomegranates," had ever appeared in English literature) to hit on just the features to which its ultimate reputation is due; but Miss Barrett does so again and again with unerring touch. Of "Pictor Ignotus" she says: "This poem is so fine, so full of power, as to claim every possible attention to the working of it: it begins greatly, grandly, and ends so,—the winding up winds up the soul of it. The versification too is noble. . . . I cannot tell you how much it impresses me." And she appreciates fully the verve and vigour of the great ride from Ghent to Aix:

You have the very trampling and breathing of the horses all through—and the sentiment is left in its right place, through all the physical force and display. . . . I know you must be proud of the poem, and nobody can forget it who has looked at it once. . . . By the way, how the "galloping" is a good galloping word! And how you felt it, and took the effect up and dilated it by repeating it over and over in your first stanza . . . doubling, finding one upon another, the hoof-treads.

The textual criticism of Browning cannot have quite the same value as that of an artist in words, such as Tennyson, the lessons of whose fastidious taste are so well brought out in his son's biography. Nevertheless there is interest in tracing the development of his power of self-expression from the turbid waters of "Pauline" and the tangled thickets of "Sordello" up to the supreme mastery of thought and phrase which marks the fifty "Men and Women" of 1855, and which endured through the finest poems of "Dramatis Personæ" to the best books of "The Ring and the Book." And in the fragments of the story which have here been offered to the sympathetic reader there is the further interest that they form an episode in the beautiful idyll of the love of Elizabeth Barrett and Robert Browning.

NEW POEMS

BY ROBERT BROWNING

THE FIRST-BORN OF EGYPT

[Robert Browning destroyed much of his very early work; this poem and the one that follows it are the only surviving examples. They were written in his fourteenth year, and we are indebted for their preservation to Miss Sarah Flower (afterwards Mrs. Adams, author of "Nearer, my God, to Thee"), who copied out the two poems in a letter addressed to William Johnson Fox in 1827 (see p. 1330). This letter was brought to light at the sale of the Browning Collections in 1913, being purchased with other papers by Mr. Bertram Dobell. Both the writer of the letter and its recipient were friends of the youthful poet. The poems were first printed, in an article by Mr. Bertram Dobell, in the Cornhill Magazine for January, 1914.]

THAT night came on in Egypt with a step
So calmly stealing in the gorgeous train Of sunset glories flooding the pale clouds With liquid gold, until at length the glow Sank to its shadowy impulse and soft sleep Bent o'er the world to curtain it from life—

Vitality was hushed beneath her wing—Pomp sought his couch of purple—care-worn grief

Flung slumber's mantle o'er him. At that hour

He in whose brain the burning fever fiend Held revelry—his hot cheek turn'd awhile Upon the cooler pillow. In his cell
The captive wrapped him in his squalid rags,
And sank amid his straw. Circean sleep!
Bathed in thine opiate dew false hope vacates Her seat in the sick soul, leaving awhile Her dreamy fond imaginings—pale fear His wild misgivings, and the warm life-springs
Flow in their wonted channels—and the train—
The harpy train of care forsakes the heart. 20

Was it the passing sigh of the night wind Or some lorn spirit's wail—that moaning cry That struck the ear? 'tis hushed—no! it swells on
On—as the thunder peal when it essays To wreck the summer sky—that fearful
shriek
Still it increases—'tis the dolorous plaint,
The death cry of a nation—

It was a fearful thing—that hour of night.
I have seen many climes, but that dread hour Hath left its burning impress on my soul 30 Never to be erased. Not the loud crash When the shuddering forest swings to the red bolt

Or march of the fell earthquake when it whelms

A city in its yawning gulf, could quell That deep voice of despair. Pharaoh arose Startled from slumber, and in anger sought
The reason of the mighty rushing throng
At that dark hour around the palace gates,
—And then he dashed his golden crown away
And tore his hair in frenzy when he knew 40 That Egypt's heir was dead—From every
home,

The marbled mansion of regality.
To the damp dungeon's walls—gay pleasure's
seat

And poverty's lone hut, that cry was heard
As guided by the Seraph's vengeful arm
The hand of death held on its withering
course,

Blighting the hopes of thousands.—

I sought the street to gaze upon the grief
Of congregated Egypt—there the slave Stood by him late his master, for that hour 50 Made vain the world's distinctions—for could wealth

Or power arrest the woe?—Some were there As sculptured marble from the quarry late
Of whom the foot first in the floating dance,
The glowing cheek hued with the deep'ning flush

In the night revel—told the young and gay.
No kindly moisture dewed their stony eye.

Or damp'd their ghastly glare—for they felt
not.

The chain of torpor bound around the heart Had stifled it for ever. Tears stole down The furrow'd channels of those withered
cheeks

Whose fount had long been chill'd, but that night's term

Had loosed the springs—for 'twas a fearful
thing

To see a nation's hope so blasted. One Press'd his dead child unto his heart—no spot
Of livid plague was nigh—no purple cloud

10 Of scathing fever—and he struck his brow To rouse himself from that wild phantasy
Deeming it but a vision of the night.

*I marked one old man with his only son Lifeless within his arms—his withered hand Wandering o'er the features of his child Bidding him [wake] from that long dreary sleep,
And lead his old blind father from the crowd
To the green meadows* ¹—but he answer'd not;

And then the terrible truth flash'd on his
brain,

20 And when the throng roll'd on some bade him
rise

And cung not so unto the dead one there, Nor voice nor look made answer—he was gone.

But one thought chain'd the powers of each
mind

Amid that night's felt horror—each one owned In silence the dread majesty—the might Of Israel's God, whose red hand had avenged His servants' cause so fearfully.

THE DANCE OF DEATH

And as they footed it around,
They sang their triumphs o'er mankind!
de Stael.

FEVER

30 Bow to me, bow to me;
Follow me in my burning breath, Which brings as the simoom destruction and
death.

My spirit lives in the hectic glow
When I bid the life streams tainted flow
In the fervid sun's deep brooding beam
When seething vapours in volumes steam, And they fall—the young, the gay—as the flower

'Neath the fiery wind's destructive power.
This day I have gotten a noble prize—

40 There was one who saw the morning rise,

¹ It is to be presumed that these lines were thus italicised by Miss Flower because she wished to draw Mr. Fox's attention to them as being particularly good.

And watch'd fair Cynthia's golden streak Kiss the misty mountain peak,
But I was there, and my poisonous flood Envenom'd the gush of the youth's warm
blood.

They hastily bore him to his bed,
But o'er him death his swart pennons spread:
The skilled leech's art was vain, Delirium revelled in each vein.
I mark'd each deathly change in him;
I watch'd his lustrous eye grow dim,
The purple cloud on his deep swol'n brow,
The gathering death sweat's chilly flow,
The dull dense film obscure the eye,
Heard the last quick gasp and saw him die.

PESTILENCE

My spirit has past on the lightning's wing O'er city and land with its withering;
In the crowded street, in the flashing hall
My tramp has been heard: they are lonely all.
A nation has swept at my summons away
As mists before the glare of day.

See how proudly reigns my hand
In the black'ning heaps on the surf-beat strand [Where]² the rank grass grows in deserted streets

[Where] the terrified stranger no passer meets [And all] around the putrid air [Glams] lurid and red in Erin's stare Where silence reigns, where late swell'd the lute,

Thrilling lyre, mellifluous flute.
There if my prowess ye would know Seek ye—and bow to your rival low.

AGUE

Bow to me, bow to me;
My influence is in the freezing deeps
Where the icy power of torpor sleeps,
Where the frigid waters flow
My marble chair is more cold below;
When the Grecian brav'd the Hellespont's flood

How did I curdle his fever'd blood,
And sent his love in tumescent wave
To meet with her lover an early grave.
When Hellas' victor sought the rush Of the river to lave in its cooling gush, Did he not feel my iron clutch
When he fainted and sank at my algid touch?
These are the least of the trophies I claim—Bow to me then, and own my fame.

MADNESS

Hear ye not the gloomy yelling
Or the tide of anguish swelling, Hear ye the clank of fetter and chain,
Hear ye the wild cry of grief and pain,

² Paper removed where sealed.

Followed by the shuddering laugh.
 As when fiends the life blood quaff?
 See! see that hand,
 See how their bursting eyeballs gleam,
 As the tiger's when crouched in the jungle's lair,
 In India's sultry land.
 Now they are seized in the rabies fell,
 Hark! 'tis a shriek as from fiends of hell;
 Now there is a plaining moan,
 As the flow of the sullen river—
 List! there is a hollow groan.
 Doth it not make e'en you to shiver—These are they struck of the barbs of my quiver.
 Slaves before my haughty throne,
 Bow then, bow to me alone.

CONSUMPTION

'Tis for me, 'tis for me;
 Mine the prize of Death must be;
 My spirit is o'er the young and gay
 As on snowy wreaths in the bright noonday They wear a melting and vermeille flush E'en while I bid their pulses hush, Hueing o'er their dying brow
 With the spring (?) of health's best roseate glow
 When the lover watches the full dark eye Robed in tints of ianthine dye, Beaming eloquent as to declare The passions that deepen the glories there.
 The frost in its tide of dazzling whiteness,
 As Juno's brow of crystal brightness, Such as the Grecian's hand could give When he bade the sculptured marble "live,"
 The ruby suffusing the Hebe cheek,
 The pulses that love and pleasure speak
 Can his fond heart claim but another day, And the loathsome worm on her form shall
 prey.
 She is scathed as the tender flower,
 When mildews o'er its chalice lour.
 Tell me not of her balmy breath,
 Its tide shall be shut in the fold of death;
 Tell me not of her honied lip,
 The reptile's fangs shall its fragrance sip.
 Then will I say triumphantly Bow to the deadliest—bow to me!

THE EARLIEST POEMS OF ROBERT BROWNING

WHEN I was writing my "Sidelights on Charles Lamb," I happened in the course of my search for materials to look through the volume of The Monthly Repository for 1835. Therein I found, with other matter on my subject, an article entitled "An Evening with Charles Lamb and Coleridge," over the signature "S. Y." I found this so interesting from its vivid and sympathetic sketches of the two authors that I searched the volume for other writings with the same signature. I found that "S. Y." was a frequent contributor of verse and prose to the magazine. In all these contributions I recognized the work of a mind "touched to fine issues," and I became very curious as to the personality hidden behind the mask "S. Y." I felt assured the writer could not be altogether unknown to fame; but I could find no clue that would connect him—or her—with any known author. I was particularly struck with the excellence of the various poems by "S. Y.," and when I printed "An Evening with Charles Lamb and Coleridge" in my book, I printed also a poem "Morning, Noon, and Night" which I then thought—and still think—worthy of being included in any anthology of English verse.¹

Some time after the publication of my book I was informed—I cannot now remember by whom—that "S. Y." stood for "Sally," the usual signature in letters to friends and relatives of Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams, well known as the author of what is now, perhaps, the most popular hymn in our language, "Nearer, my God, to Thee"; but otherwise, save to a very few, practically unknown. The fame she has hitherto enjoyed, despite its narrow limits, has yet been of a not unenviable kind; for it would be impossible to name any poem, not of a religious character, which is so often in the minds and on the lips of humanity as the hymn which I have mentioned. It is one which, like Newman's "Lead, kindly Light," can never fall into disuse; since its appeal is universal and does not depend upon any doctrine which may not be subscribed to by the members of any church or creed.

Eliza and Sarah Flower were the daughters of Benjamin Flower, a printer, and a man of liberal opinions, at a time when the open avowal of such opinions was extremely likely to lead to unpleasant consequences. He was the publisher of The Cambridge Intelligencer, in which paper some of Coleridge's poems first appeared, and to which, when he discontinued his Watchman, the poet recommended his readers to subscribe. Some disrespectful remarks, which were printed in the paper, upon Bishop Watson, then famous as the Church's champion against Paine's Age of Reason, were construed as a breach of the privileges of the House of Lords, and the unfortunate publisher was condemned to six months' imprisonment and a fine of a hundred pounds. Yet this seeming misfortune was, it appears, something like a blessing in disguise. Eliza Gould, a Devon schoolmistress, and a reader of The Intelligencer, found herself compelled to choose between giving up her school or giving up her newspaper. She was a woman of spirit, and chose rather to sacrifice her school than her liberal opinions. She visited Flower in prison, with the result that a mutual affection sprang up between them; and this led, on his release, to their marriage. She became in 1803 the mother of Eliza, and in 1805 of Sarah Flower. Like her daughters, she was destined to an early death: she passed away in 1810.

The Flower sisters, it appears, had become acquainted with the Browning family through a mutual friend, a Miss Sturtevant. This happened in 1827, or it may be a year or so earlier. Robert Browning was then between fourteen and fifteen years of age; and the sisters, naturally enough, took much interest in the "boy Genius." He had already written a "book full" of verse, which he had entitled "Incondita," and which he was "mad to publish." His mother showed this book to the sisters; and Eliza Flower, it is said, admired the book so much that she copied out the whole of it. But perhaps I had better quote from Mrs. Orr's Life of Browning her account of this matter:

The young author gave his work the title of "Incondita," which conveyed a certain idea of depreciation. He was, nevertheless, very anxious to see it in print; and his father and mother, poetry lovers of the old school, also found in it sufficient merit to justify its publication. No publisher, however, could be found; and we can easily believe that he soon afterwards destroyed the little manuscript, in some mingled reaction of disappointment and disgust. But his mother, meanwhile, had shown it to an acquaintance of hers, Miss Flower, who herself admired its contents so much as to make a copy of them for the inspection of her friend, the well-known Unitarian minister, Mr. W. J. Fox. The copy was transmitted to Mr. Browning after Fox's death, by his daughter, Mrs. Bridell Fox; and this, if no other, was in existence in 1871, when, at his urgent request, that lady also returned to him a fragment of verse contained in a letter from Miss Sarah Flower. Nor was it till much later that a friend, who had earnestly begged for a sight of it, definitely heard of its destruction. The fragment, which doubtless shared the same fate, was, I am told, a direct imitation of Coleridge's "Fire, Famine and Slaughter."

Mrs. Orr wrote the above from the best information then available; but her statement can now be amplified. It may be true that Eliza Flower copied out the whole of the "Incondita" volume for Mr. Fox's inspection; but it is certain that it was not she, but her sister, who first introduced the poems—or at least two of them—to Mr. Fox's notice. We shall see, too, that the letter of Sarah Flower is, fortunately, still in existence, and that it contains, not "a fragment of verse," but two complete poems, of quite sufficient length to show of what the young poet was then capable. Nor is the fragment spoken of a direct imitation of Coleridge's "Fire, Famine and Slaughter." It may have been suggested by it; but it cannot fairly be called a mere imitation.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER FROM SARAH FLOWER (AFTERWARDS MRS. ADAMS, AUTHOR OF "NEARER, MY GOD, TO THEE") TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX.

DALSTON

May 31st (1827).

"What in the name of fortune is the girl going to do with this tremendous sheet of paper?" Now dread the worst my dear Mr. Fox but suspend your judgment one minute—now in reward you shall hear what a delicious treat you may expect when you have turned over a new leaf. Now do not peep. Yes you may just take one, only one. I do most positively forbid your reading that Genius's poetry tho' I grant it looks very tempting until you have waded thro' the prosy part. No! No! I am quite too cunning for that. So now having done as they do with children (—there—take your physic there's a good child and then you shall have something Oh so nice afterwards), shall I tell you whose mine these gems come from?—and yet I wish they were mine with all my soul—and I'm sure it would be worth all my soul if they were—"Bah"—forgive me and if you knew what a bad muddling cold I have had you would—They are "the boy" Browning's at. 14—and so they as well as he can speak for themselves.

I do not know of any equally promising work by one who was no older than Browning at the time these poems were written; unless indeed it was that of his future wife, whose epic of "The Battle of Marathon" was a still more juvenile production. Shelley, at about the same age, was still in his witch, hobgoblin, and Minerva Press period, and had written nothing but wild and incoherent rhapsodies from which no favourable forecast of his future achievements could possibly have been derived. The feeling we should have for his early writings would be something like contempt, if we did not know that they were the necessary prelude to "The Cenci" and "Prometheus Unbound." But we can have no such feeling about "The First-born of Egypt," or "The Dance of Death." Faulty they may be, but there is evidence enough in them that their author had within him the elements from which so many and such vigorous creations were to spring. And those who will take the trouble to search for them will, I am sure, discover in the later work of the poet a good many parallels to lines or passages in these early efforts.

Six months after writing the letter printed above Sarah Flower wrote another, of a very different character, to Mr. Fox.¹ There is one passage in the letter which must be quoted here. She writes to Mr. Fox to tell him that she has recently become very unhappy because she had begun to entertain doubts about the creed in which she has been brought up, and in which she had hitherto believed. She goes on to say:

My mind has been wandering a long time, and now it seems to have lost sight of that only invulnerable hold against the assaults of this warring world, a firm belief in the genuineness of the Scriptures. . . . The cloud has come over me gradually, and I did not discover the darkness in which my soul was shrouded until, in seeking to give light to others, my own gloomy state became too settled to admit of doubt. It was in answering Robert Browning that my mind refused to bring forward argument, turned recreant and sided with the enemy.

It is, of course, because of its reference to Robert Browning that I have quoted the above passage. The young poet was then very much like what Shelley had been at his age, a very pronounced freethinker, and one who was eager to make converts to his own way of thing. And it was, I believe, Shelley's "Queen Mab" which was responsible for Browning's scepticism. This mood had passed away, it seems, before the publication of "Pauline," in which the poet expresses his repentance for his youthful errors.

SONNET

[This sonnet is interesting from its early date, and from its being the first of Browning's rare contributions to periodical literature. It was published in Mr. W. J. Fox's magazine, The Monthly Repository, in October 1834, and bears the date of August 17 in that year, with the signature "Z." Browning's subsequent contributions to this magazine (all with the same signature) were the song "A King lived long ago" (afterwards incorporated in "Pippa Passes"), "Porphyria," "Johannes Agricola," and the lines, "Still ailing, wind," which reappeared in 1864 in "James Lee's Wife."

The present sonnet has been reprinted in Edmund Gosse's Personalia (1890, pp. 34-35); in the Browning Society's Papers, Part XII.; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes, p. 469; in Hall (Griffin and Minchin's Life of Browning (1910), p. 306; in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 11; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works (1912), vol. iii., p. 417. The circumstances of its composition are not known.]

Eyes calm beside thee (Lady, could'st thou know!)

May turn away thick with fast-gathering tears:

I glance not where all gaze: thrilling and low

Their passionate praises reach thee—my cheek wears

Alone no wonder when thou passest by;

Thy tremulous lids bent and suffused reply

To the irrepressible homage which doth glow

On every lip but mine: if in thine ears

Their accents linger—and thou dost recall

Me as I stood, still, guarded, very pale,

Beside each votarist whose lighted brow

Wore worship like an aureole, "O'er them all

My beauty," thou wilt murmur, "did prevail

Save that one only":—Lady, could'st thou know!

A FOREST THOUGHT²

[This early and attractive poem was written on November 4, 1837, on the occasion of Browning standing godfather to the eldest son of his friend William Alexander Dow. He was asked to write something in an album after the christening, and these lines were produced on the spot. The album is still preserved in the family of the poet's friend, but the poem never appeared in print until 1905, when it was published in the periodical Country Life (June 10). It was reprinted in Robert Browning and Alfred Dowell, 1906, p. xi.; in Hall (Griffin and Minchin's Life, p. 305; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. iii., pp. 418-9.

The opening lines are a reminiscence of Browning's visit to Russia in the winter of 1833-4.]

IN far Esthonian solitudes

The parent-firs of future woods

² "Written and inscribed to W. A. and A. D. by their Sincere Friend, Robert Browning, 13 Nelson Sq., November 4, 1837."

Gracefully, airily spire at first
 Up to the sky, by the soft sand nurst; Self-sufficient are they, and strong With outspread arms, broad, level and long;
 But soon in the sunshine and the storm
 They darken, changing fast their form—Low boughs fall off, and in the bole
 Each tree spends all its strenuous soul—
 Till the builder gazes wistfully
 So Such noble ship-mast wood to see,
 And cares not for its soherer hue,
 Its rougher bark and leaves more few.

But just when beauty passes away
 And you half regret it could not stay,
 For all their sap and vigorous life,— Under the shade, secured from strife
 A seedling springs—the forest-tree In miniature, and again we see The delicate leaves that will fade one day,
 So The fan-like shoots that will drop away,
 The taper stem a breath could strain—
 Which shall foil one day the hurricane:
 We turn from this infant of the copse
 To the parent-firs,—in their waving tops
 To find some trace of the light green tuft
 A breath could stir,—in the bole aloft Column-like set against the sky,
 The spire that flourished airily
 And the marten bent as she rustled by.

So So shall it be, dear Friends, when days Pass, and in this fair child we trace Goodness, full-formed in you, tho' dim Faint-budding, just astir in him:
 When rudiments of generous worth And frankest love in him have birth, We'll turn to love and worth full-grown,
 And learn their fortune from your own.
 Nor shall we vainly search to see His gentleness—simplicity—
 So Not lost in your maturer grace—Perfected, but not changing place.

May this grove be a charmed retreat . . .
 May northern winds and savage sleet Leave the good trees untouched, unshorn,
 A crowning pride of woods unborn:
 And gracefully beneath their shield May the seedling grow! All pleasures yield Peace below and peace above,
 The glancing squirrels' summer love,
 So And the brood-song of the cushat-dove!

THE "MOSES" OF MICHAEL ANGELO

[The MS. of this sonnet by Robert Browning, which he gave to his wife at the time it was written, was discovered lately among some papers of the late Mr. George Smith, his publisher and friend. It is a translation of a sonnet by G. B. F. Zappi, which may be found in A. Rubbi's Parnaso Italiano, 1789, tom. 42, p. 162. It was first printed in the Cornhill Magazine for September 1914.]

AND who is He that, sculptured in huge stone, Sitteth a giant, where no works arrive Of straining Art, and hath so prompt and
 live

The lips, I listen to their very tone?
 Moses is He—Ay, that, makes clearly known The chin's thick boast, and brow's prerogative

Of double ray: so did the mountain give Back to the world that visage, God was grown Great part of! Such was he when he suspended

Round him the sounding and vast waters; 6
 such

When he shut sea on sea o'er Mizraim.
 And ye, his hordes, a vile calf raised, and bended

The knee? This Image had ye raised, not
 much

Had been your error in adoring Him.

 love's sake," Siena. Sept. 27, '50.)

BEN KARSHOOK'S WISDOM

[This poem, like the last, belongs to the Italian period of Browning's life. It appeared in The Keepsake for 1856, with the date, Rome, April 27, 1854, but was not reprinted until it appeared in the first part of the Browning Society's Papers in 1881. It has since been reprinted in Mr. W. G. Kingsland's Robert Browning, Chief Poet of the Age, 1890, p. 26; in Mr. W. Sharp's Life of Browning, 1890, p. 167; in Mrs. Orr's Life, 1891 (p. 198 of the edition of 1906); in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes, 1895, p. 450; in Hall Griffin and Minchin's Life, p. 307; in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 372; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. iii., p. 420.

In the poem, "One Word More," which forms the epilogue to the "Men and Women" of 1855, occurred (in the original edition, and in the Poetical Works of 1863 and 1868) the line "Karshook, Cleon, Norbert and the fifty." This, however, was a slip of the pen. "Karshook" cannot have formed one of the fifty when the epilogue was written, less than two months before the publication of the volumes; and in 1881, in reply to an inquiry from Dr. Furnivall, Browning wrote as follows: "Karshish is the proper word, referring as it does to him of the 'Epistle.' Karshook (Heb.: a Thistle) just belongs to the snarling verses I remember to have written, but forget for whom; the other was the only one of the Fifty" (Wise, Letters of Robert Browning, i., 71). The correction appeared in the Tauchnitz edition of 1872, and in subsequent English editions (certainly from 1879 onwards).]

"Would a man 'scape the rod?" Rabbi Ben Karshook saith,
"See that he turn to God
"The day before his death."

"Ay, could a man inquire
"When it shall come!" I say.
The Rabbi's eye shoots fire—
"Then let him turn to-day!"

II

Quoth a young Sadducee:
"Reader of many rolls,
"Is it so certain we "Have, as they tell us, souls?"

"Son, there is no reply!"
The Rabbi bit his beard;
"Certain, a soul have I—
"We may have none," he sneer'd.

Thus Karshook, the Hiram's-Hammer,
The Right-hand Temple-column, Taught babes in grace their grammar,
And struck the simple, solemn.

LINES TO THE MEMORY OF HIS PAR- ENTS (1866)

[These lines by Robert Browning, addressed apparently to the memory of his parents—from a MS. in the handwriting of Miss Browning—were among the papers disposed of at the Browning Sale in May 1913. They were probably written in 1866, the year of his father's death. They were first printed in the Cornhill Magazine, February 1914.]

"WORDS I might else have been compelled to
say
In silence to my heart—great love, great
praise
Of thee, my Father—have been freely said By those whom none shall blame; and while thy life
Endures, a beauteous thing, in their record
I may desire, that thou wert oft and often They lie beside thee whom thou lovest most;
Soft sanctuary-tapers of thy house, Close-curtained when the Priest came forth,— on these
Let peace be, peace on thee, my Mother, too!
The child that never knew you, and the Girl In whom your gentle souls seemed born again To bless us longer. Peace like yours be mine Till the same quiet home receive us all."

A ROUND ROBIN

(Written by Robert Browning and sent to Miss Harriet Hosmer in Rome)

[Browning and his sister were staying in Scotland with Lady Ashburton; other members of the party were the Storys, Lady Marian Alford, and Sir Roderick Murchison. Miss Harriet Hosmer, an American sculptress of considerable repute, with a studio in Rome, had associated with the Brownings both in Florence and in Rome. The lines were first printed in Harriet Hosmer, Letters and Memories, edited by Cornelia Carr (John Lane, 1913), pp. 275-6.]

Loch Luichart, Dingwall, N. B.

DEAR HOSMER; or still dearer, Hasty—Mixture of miele and of latte,
So good and sweet and—somewhat fatty—

Why linger still in Rome's old glory
When Scotland lies in cool before ye?
Make haste and come!—quoth Mr. Story. 50

Sculpture is not a thing to sit to In summertime; do find a fit toe To kick the clay aside a bit—oh, Yield to our prayers! quoth Mrs. Ditto.

Give comfort to us poor and needy Who, wanting you, are waiting greedy
Our meat and drink, yourself, quoth Edie.
Nay, though, past clay, you chip the Parian, Throw chisel down! quoth Lady Marian.

Be welcome, as to cow—the fodder rick!
Excuse the simile!—quoth Sir Roderick.

Say not (in Scotch) "in troth it canna be"— But, honey, milk and, indeed, manna bel Forgive a stranger!—Sarianna B.

Don't set an old acquaintance frowning,
But come and quickly! quoth R. Browning,
For since prodigious fault is found with you,
I—that is, Robin—must be Round with you.

PS. Do wash your hands, or leave the dirt on,
But leave the tool as Gammer Gurton

Her needle lost,—Lady Ashburton.
Thus ends this letter—ease my sick heart,
And come to my divine Loch Lulchart!

HELEN'S TOWER

(Written at the request of the Marquis Dufferin)

[This sonnet was written as far back as 1870, but was not published until it appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, on December 28, 1883. It was written at the invitation of Lord Dufferin, for the tower which he built at Clondeboye in memory of his mother, Helen, Countess of Gifford, and bears the date of April 26, 1870. Tennyson's lines on the same occasion are printed in his Tiresias and other Poems (1885). It is strange that Browning should not have included so fine a poem in any of his subsequent volumes.]

It was reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 601; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. ix., p. 348.]

Who hears of Helen's Tower, may dream perchance

How the Greek beauty from the Scaean gate Gazed on old friends unanimous in hate, Death-doom'd because of her fair countenance.

Hearts would leap otherwise at thy advance,
Lady, to whom this tower is consecrate!

Like hers, thy face once made all eyes elate, 20 Yet, unlike hers, was bless'd by every glance.
The Tower of Hate is outworn, far and strange:

A transitory shame of long ago,
It dies into the sand from which it sprang;
But thine, Love's rock-built Tower, shall fear no change:

God's self laid stable earth's foundations so,

When all the morning stars together sang.
April 26, 1870.

"OH LOVE, LOVE"

[The following lines are a translation of Euripides' "Hippolytus," ll. 525-544, and were contributed by Browning to a little handbook on the Greek poet by Professor J. P. Mahaffy, in 1870. They have been reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1881, Pt. I., p. 69; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 874; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. ix., p. 345.]

Oh Love, Love, thou that from the eyes dif-fusest

Yearning, and on the soul sweet grace in-ducest—

Souls against whom thy hostile march is made—

Never to me be manifest in ire,
Nor, out of time and tune, my peace invade!

Since neither from the fire—

No, nor the stars—is launched a bolt more mighty

Than that of Aphrodité

Hurled from the hands of Love, the boy with Zeus for sire.

Idly, how idly, by the Alpheian river
And in the Pythian shrines of Phœbus, quiver Blood-offerings from the bull, which Hellas heaps:

While Love we worship not—the Lord of men!
Worship not him, the very key who keeps 40
Of Aphrodité, when

She closes up her dearest chamber-portals:

—Love, when he comes to mortals,

Wide-wasting, through those deeps of woes beyond the deep.

VERSES FROM "THE HOUR WILL COME"

[These lines are a translation of a poem in a German tale entitled "The Hour will Come," by Wilhelmine von Hillern. An English version of it was made by Miss Clara Bell, which appeared in 1879; and for this Browning's lines were written. His name was not attached to the translation, but acknowledgments are made "to the kindness of a friend."] 30

The poem has been reprinted in the Whitehall Review, March 1, 1883; in the Browning Society's Papers; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 910, and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. ix., p. 346.]

The blind man to the maiden said,
 "O thou of hearts the truest, Thy countenance is hid from me;
 Let not my question anger thee!
 Speak, though in words the fewest.

"Tell me, what kind of eyes are thine?
 Dark eyes, or light ones rather?"
 "My eyes are a decided brown—
 So much at least, by looking down, From the brook's glass I gather."

"And is it red—thy little mouth?
 That too the blind must care for."
 "Ah! I would tell it soon to thee, Only—none yet has told it me, I cannot answer, therefore.

"But dost thou ask what heart I have—
 There hesitate I never.
 In thine own breast 'tis borne, and so
 'Tis thine in weal, and thine in woe, For life, for death—thine ever!"

TRANSLATION FROM PINDAR'S SEVENTH OLYMPIAN, EPODE III

[The following draft letter and poem, found among the poet's papers, were sold with the Browning Collections in 1913. Although addressed to the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, the letter appears not to have been sent; in any case, a search through the file of the paper about that time does not reveal its publication. In December of the same year, however, the editor printed no less than three poems by Browning: the sonnet on "Goldoni," some lines from Horace ("On Singers"), and the important poem "Helen's Tower," all given in this volume. This is one of many instances showing that the poet loved to exercise his masterly knowledge of the classics. The occasion was an incident in the celebrated trial "Belt v. Lawes," when the Judge, on the strength of a passage in Aristotle, intimated that a Middlesex jury was as good a judge of Art as a Royal Academician.]

LETTER TO "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

SIR,—We have recently been favoured with a Greek quotation,—warranted however rather by the bench than the Book——on the subject of Art. Another one, as apposite, might be made from another old authority; and, curiously enough, it immediately precedes the passage which was illustrated, some years ago, by one of the finest pictures of the President. For the general reader, I venture a rough version: the Middlesex Jury needs no reminding that the original occurs in Pindar's Seventh Olympian, Epode III.

Gave the supremacy, in every art,—
 And, nobly labouring play the craftsman's part

Beyond all dwellers underneath the sun.
 So that the very ways by which ye pass Bore sculpture, living things that walk or creep

Like as the life: whence very high and deep Indeed the glory of the artist was.

For, in the well-instructed artist, skill, However great, receives our greeting,
 As something greater still,
 When unaccompanied by cheating.

SONNET TO RAWDON BROWN

[Rawdon Brown was, as indicated in this sonnet, an Englishman. Visiting Venice temporarily, he remained for forty years, and died there in 1883. He is mentioned in travel books as having a very perfect knowledge of the city. Toni was his gondolier. The epitaph on his tomb is taken from the third and fourth lines. The sonnet was first printed in the Century Magazine, February, 1884, vol. xxvii., p. 640; being reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1884, Pt. V., p. 132; and in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition of the Poet's Works (1895), p. 947.]

 crony—

Venice and London—London's "Death the bony"

Compared with Life—that's Venice! What a sky,

A sea, this morning! One last look! Good-by, Cà Pesaro! No lion—I'm a coney To weep! I'm dazzled; 'tis that sun I view Rippling the . . . the . . . Cospello, Toni!

Down

With carpet-bag, and off with valise-straps!
Bella Venezia, non ti lascio più!
 Nor did Brown ever leave her: well, perhaps Browning, next week, may find himself quite Brown!

Nov. 28, 1883.

GOLDONI

[The origin of the Goldoni sonnet is given by the poet himself in a letter to Dr Furnivall of December 3, 1883 (Wise, Letters of R. Browning, ii., 31):

"They are going to unveil and display here a monument erected to Goldoni, and the committee did me the honour to request a word or two for insertion in an Album to which the principal men of letters in Italy have contributed. I made a sonnet, which they please to think so well of that they preface the work with it."

Mrs. Bronson (Cornhill Magazine, February, 1902, p. 10) adds that the sonnet was written very rapidly, and only two or three trifling alterations were made in the original copy.

The sonnet was printed in the Pall Mall Gazette, December 8, 1883, and has since been reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1884, Pt. V., p. 99; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 910; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works, vol. ix., p. 347.]

GOLDONI—good, gay, sunniest of souls—

Glassing half Venice in that verse of thine—
What though it just reflect the shade and shine

Of common life, nor render, as it rolls, Grandeur and gloom? Sufficient for thy shoals

Was Carnival: Parini's depths enshrine Secrets unsuited to that opaline

Surface of things which laughs along thy scrolls.

There throng the people: how they come and go, o Lisp the soft language, flaunt the bright garb—see—

On Piazza, Calle, under Portico

And over Bridge! Dear king of Comedy, Be honoured! Thou that didst love Venice so, Venice, and we who love her, all love thee.

ON SINGERS

[First printed in the Pall Mall Gazette, December 13, 1883, and reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1884, Pt. V., p. 99. Robert Browning was asked to write in a lady's album, where he saw some one had written the lines from Horace:]

OMNIBUS hoc vitium est cantoribus, inter amicos

Ut nunquam inducant animum cantare rogati, Injussi nunquam desistant.

He immediately appended the following translation:

All singers, trust me, have this common vice,
To sing 'mid friends you'll have to ask them twice.

If you don't ask them 'tis another thing,
Until the judgment-day be sure they'll sing.

GEROUSIOS OINOS

[This poem, which was put into type at the same time as the volume "Jocoseria" (1883), was not eventually published, but came to light in its present form as a rough printed proof in what is known as a "galley-slip" among the poet's papers offered at the sale of the Browning Collections in May 1913, and purchased by the well-known bibliophile, Mr. Bertram Dobell. It was first published in the Cornhill Magazine and the Century Magazine, April 1914.]

I DREAMED there was once held a feast:

That lords assembled, most and least,

And set them down to dine;

Till, eating ended—high of heart

Each guest,—the butler did his part,

Poured out their proper wine.

Good tippie and of various growth

(You may believe without an oath)

Glorified every glass:

All drank in honour of the host,

Then—high of heart,—rose least and most,

And left the room—alas.

For in rushed straightway loon and lout,

Mere servingmen who skulked without:

"Our masters turn their backs,

And now's the time to taste and try

What meat lords munch,—and, by and by,

What wine they swill—best smacks."

So said, so done: first, hunger spends

Its rage on victual, odds and ends:

But seeing that rage appeased,

"Now for the lords' wine," all agree,

"Kept from the like of you and me!

Wet whistles, chins once greased!

"How! not content with loading crop, These lords have scarcely left a drop

In every glass deep-drained.

The niggards mean our feast to prove

A horse-regale! But, one remove

From wine is water stained.

"Fill up each glass with water! Get

Such flavour as may stick fast yet,

Fancy shall do the rest!

Besides we boast our private flasks,

Good stiff mundungus, home-brewed casks

Beating their bottled best!

"So here's your health to watered port!

Thanks: mine is sherry of a sort.

Claret, though thinnish, clear.

My Burgundy's the genuine stuff—

Bettered and bittered just enough

By mixing it with beer."

Oh, England (I awoke and laughed)
 True wine thy lordly Poets quaffed, Yet left,—for, what cared they!— Each glass its heel-tap—flavouring sup
 For funkeys when, to liquor up, In swarmed—who, need I say!

THE FOUNDER OF THE FEAST

(To Arthur Chappell)

[In 1884 Browning contributed these lines to the Album presented to Mr. Arthur Chappell, the organiser of the Popular Concerts at St. James's Hall, thus testifying to his love of music and to his frequent attendance at concerts. The poem was printed in The World for April 16, 1884, and has been reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1884, Pt. VII., p. 18; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 947, and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works (1912), vol. ix., p. 349. It has hitherto contained fifteen lines, but the following version, reduced to the sonnet form of fourteen lines (by the deletion of line nine and the consequent revision of line ten), is printed from a cutting taken from the World and corrected by Browning, which was found among his papers.]

"ENTER my palace," if a prince should say—
 "Feast with the Painters! See, in bounteous row,

'They range from Titian up to Angelo!"
 o Could we be silent at the rich survey?
 A host so kindly, in as great a way Invites to banquet, substitutes for show Sound that's diviner still, and bids us know Bach like Beethoven; are we thankless, pray?
 To him whose every guest not idly vaunts,
 "Sense has received the utmost Nature grants,
 My cup was filled with rapture to the brim, When, night by night—ah, memory, how it haunts!—
 Music was poured by perfect ministrants, 20 By Halle, Schumann, Piatti, Joachim."

THE NAMES

(To Shakespeare)

[Written for the Shakespearean Show-Book published in May 1884, in connection with the Shakespearean Show held at the Albert Hall in aid of the Hospital for Women in the Fulham Road. It was reprinted in the Pall Mall Gazette for May 29; in the Browning Society's Papers, 1884, Pt. V., p. 105; in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 947; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works (1912), vol. ix., p. 350.]

SHAKESPEARE!—to such name's sounding what succeeds

Fitly as silence? Falter forth the spell,— Act follows word, the speaker knows full
 well,

Nor tampers with its magic more than needs.
 Two names there are: That which the Hebrew reads

With his soul only: if from lips it fell, Echo, back thundered by earth, heaven
 and hell,

Would own "Thou did'st create us!" Nought impedes

We voice the other name, man's most of
 might,

Awesomely, lovingly: let awe and love 30
 Mutely await their working, leave to sight

All of the issue as—below—above—Shakespeare's creation rises: one remove,
 Though dread—this finite from that infinite.

WHY I AM A LIBERAL

[Browning never took an active part in politics, and this statement of his political faith, composed in response to an invitation from Mr. Andrew Reid, and published by him in a volume with the same title issued in 1885 in support of the then waning Liberal cause, appeared only a few months before he ceased to support the official Liberal party. The principles expressed in it, however, had no reference to the temporary policies of any party, and remained his principles to the end of his life.

The lines were reprinted in the Browning Society's Papers, 1885, p. 89; in Sonnets of the Century, edited by W. Sharp (1886); in Nicoll and Wise's Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, vol. i. (1895); in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 948; and in the Centenary Edition of the Poet's Works (1912), vol. ix., p. 351.]

"WHY?" Because all I haply can and do, All that I am now, all I hope to be—Whence comes it save from fortune setting
 free

Body and soul the purpose to pursue, God traced for both? If fetters, not a few,
 Of prejudice, convention, fall from me, 40
 These shall I bid men—each in his degree

Also God-guided—bear, and gaily too?
 But little do or can the best of us:

That little is achieved through Liberty.
 Who, then, dares hold—emancipated thus—

His fellow shall continue bound? Not I Who live, love, labour freely, nor discuss

A brother's right to freedom. That is
 "Why."

LINES FOR THE TOMB OF LEVI LINCOLN THAXTER

[Mr. Thaxter, who was born at Waterford in Massachusetts in 1824 and died in 1884, was an enthusiastic student of Browning's poems, and in his later years gave readings from the poet's works. These lines have been printed in Mrs. Orr's Life, 1908, p. 335, and in the Cambridge (Boston, U. S. A.) Edition (1895), p. 948.]

THOU, whom these eyes saw never,—Say friends true

Who say my soul, helped onward by my song, Though all unwittingly, has helped thee too?

I gave but of the little that I knew:

How were the gift requited, while along

Life's path I pace, couldst thou make weakness strong,

Help me with knowledge—for Life's Old—Death's New!

R. B. to L. L. T., April 19, 1885.

EPPS

As far as can now be recollected, it was about the year 1884 that Robert Browning announced to Mrs. Edmund Gosse and Lady Alma-Tadema, whose maiden name was Epps, that he was proposing to write a poem about their "Kentish ancestor." They were not aware of any relationship with the hero, but Browning laughingly insisted that they must not throw any doubt upon the fact, because he proposed to endow them with this "ancestor." Shortly afterwards he showed them the MS. of the verses, which he did not treat as a serious specimen of his poetic art. It is not recollected what became of the MS., of which the ladies kept no copy; it was doubtless returned to Mr. Browning.

EDMUND GOSSE.

January 12, 1914.

[The MS. was included in the sale of the Browning Collections in 1913. The poem was first printed in the Cornhill Magazine and the New York Outlook, October 1913. As a result of that publication, Mr. Edmund Gosse has very kindly given the above interesting facts in connection with this characteristic historical poem.]

Asks anyone—"Where's a tag for steps?"

I answer—"Waiting its time

10 Till somebody versed in the English tongue

Shall start at the challenge, cry 'unsung

Till now, and all for want of a rhyme,

Is the prowess of Kentish Epps?"

Two hundred and eighty years ago

Befell the siege of Ostend;

Epps soldiered it there: and, hew or hack
At his breast as the enemy might, his back

Got never a scratch: yet life must end Somehow,—Epps ended—so!

He had lost an eye on the walls, look out

No longer could Epps: said he—

"Give me Saint George's cross—our flag

To carry: I can't see them—foes brag:

At all events they shall soon see me, Knight and knave, lord and lout!"

"Epps got loose again!" yelled the curs:

"At him—the blind side best!

Together as one—in rush, on a heap,

Buffet the old maiméd bull! Fame's cheap

This morn for whoso has mind to wrest 30 Yon flag from his hold, win spurs!"

As a big wave bursts on a rock, broke they

On bannerman Epps: as staunch

The drowned rock stands, but emerging feels

Weeds late on its head lie loose at his heels,

So left bare, swirl-stript, root and branch,

Of his { band company } stood—Epps laughed
gay:

"I with my flag—that's well, no fear

The colours stick to the staff:

But the staff 'tis a mere hand holds—lets fall 40

If there stab me or shoot one knave of them
all:

To hinder which game—"I hear Epps
laugh—

"Stick, flag, to a new staff—here!"

And off in a trice from the staff that's wood,

And on to a staff that's flesh,

Tears Epps and { ties } round { binds } tight } about his breast

The flag in a red swathe: "Here's the vest

For my lifelong wear; at the foe afresh!

Flagstaff, show your hardihood!

Whereat, in a twinkling, man and horse 50

Went down—one, two and three,

And how many more? But they shot and slashed

Two { bullets } have riddled, two sword-{ balls } blades gashed

The staff through the flag, { leave } free { left }

To despoilers,—you think,—a corse?

No! Back from his slayers, staggeringly

But, staff-like, stout to the last,

Up to his mates—of the checked advance—

Reels Epps, his soul in his countenance,

As he falters "See! Flag to the staff sticks
fast,
And, flag saved, staff may die!"

And die did Epps, with his English round:
Not so the fame of the feat:
For Donne and Dekker, brave poets and rare, Gave it honour and praise: and I join the pair With heart that's loud though my voice competes

As a pipe with their trumpet-sound!

THE ISLE'S ENCHANTRESS

[Lines, on Felix Moscheles' painting called "The Isle's Enchantress," given by Robert Browning to the painter and printed in the Pall Mall Gazette by the poet's permission.—
March 26, 1889.]

WIND wafted from the sunset, o'er the swell 10 Of summer's slumbrous sea, herself asleep Come shoreward, in her iridescent shell Cradled, the isle's enchantress. You who keep A drowsy watch beside her,—watch her well!

UNFINISHED DRAFT OF A POEM WHICH MAY BE ENTITLED "ÆSCHYLUS' SOLILOQUY"

[At the sale of the Browning MSS. on May 2, 1913, this MS. was catalogued as:

Lot 188. Browning (R) Auto. Draft of a poem, in blank verse, 4 pp. 8vo, unfinished and perhaps unpublished, apparently intended for "Aristophanes' Apology," but not used, beginning:

"I am an old and solitary man."

This description is correct in that the poem had never been published, but it is evident that it was not a draft for "Aristophanes' Apology," but a soliloquy of the aged Æschylus, just before the prophecy as to his death was fulfilled by an eagle dropping a tortoise upon his head. The poem was first printed in the Cornhill Magazine and the New York Independent, November 1913, strictly according to the original MS., now in the British Museum, as it reads with the poet's variants and queries. In line 56 "Dephos" is obviously a slip of the pen for "Delphos," and in line 59 "rush" seems the best interpretation of a scarcely legible word, of which the MS. contains many.]

I AM an old and solitary man
And now at set of sun in Sicily
I sit down in the middle of this plain Which drives between the mountains and the sea

Its blank of nature. If a traveller came Seeing my bare bald skull and my still brows
And massive features coloured to a stone 20
The tragic mask of a humanity Whose part is played to an end,—he might mistake me
For some god Terminus set on these flats Or broken marble Faunus. Let it be.
Life has ebbed from me—I am on dry ground—
All sounds of life I held so thunderous sweet Shade off to silence—all the perfect shapes Born of perception and men's images (imagery?)

Which thronged against the outer rim of earth
And hung with floating faces over it 30 Grow dim and dimmer—all the motions drawn

From Beauty in action which spun audibly My brain round in a rapture, have grown still.
There's a gap 'twixt me and the life once mine,
Now others' and not mine, which now roars off In gradual declination—till at last I hear it in the distance droning small Like a bee at sunset. Ay, and that bee's hum
The buzzing fly and mounting of the grass Cropped slowly near me by some straying 40
sheep

Are strange to me with life—and separate from me

The outside of my being—I myself Grow to silence, fasten to the calm Of inorganic nature . . . sky and rocks—
I shall pass on into their unity
When dying down into impersonal dusk.

Ah, ha—these flats are wide!

The prophecy which said the house would fall And thereby crush me, must bring down the sky

The only roof above me where I sit 50
Or ere it prove its oracle to-day.

Stand fast ye pillars of the constant Heavens
As Life doth in me—I who did not die
That day in Athens when the people's scorn Hissed toward the sun as if to darken it Because my thoughts burned too much for the eyes

Over my head, because I spoke my Greek Too deep down in my soul to suit their case.
Who did not die to see the solemn vests 60
Of my white chorus round the thyme Flutter like doves, and sweep back like a cloud Before the shrill lipped people . . . but stood calm

And cold, and felt the theatre wax hot With mouthing whispers . . . the man Æschylus

Is gray I fancy—and his wrinkles ridge
The smoothest of his phrases—or the times Have grown too polished for this old rough
work—

We have no Sphynxes in the Parthenon Nor any flints at Dephos—or forsooth,
I think the Sphynxes wrote this Attic Greek—70
Our Sophocles hath something more than this Cast out on and their smile - I would not die (?)

At this time by the crushing of a house Who lived that Day out . . . I would go to death
With voluntary and majestic steps Jove thundering on the right hand. Let it be.

I am an old and solitary man
Mine eyes feel dimly out the setting sun
Which drops its great red fruit of bitterness To-day as other days, as every day o Within the patient waters. What do I say?
I whistle out my scorn against the sun
Who (knell) his trilogy morn, noon and night
And set this tragic world against the sun Forgive me, great Apollo.—Bitter fruit
I think we never found that holy sun Or ere with conjurations of our hands Drove up the saltness of our hearts to it A blessed fruit, a full Hesperian fruit
Which the fair sisters with their starry eyes 20 Did warm to scarlet bloom. O holy sun, My eyes are weak and cannot hold thee
round!

But in my large soul there is room for thee—All human wrongs and shames cast out from
it,—

And I invite thee, sun, to sphere thyself
In my large soul, and let my thoughts in white Keep chorus round thy glory—Oh the days
In which I sate upon Hymettus hill Ilissus seeming louder: and the groves
Of blessed olive thinking of their use 30 A little tunicked child and felt my thoughts (?)
Rise past the golden bees against thy face Great sun upon the sea. The city lay Beneath me like an eaglet in an egg,
The beak and claws shut whitely up in calm And calm were the great waters—and the hills Holding at arm's length their unmolten snows Plunged in the light of heaven which trickled
back

On all sides, a libation to the world.

There I sate a child

40 Half hidden in purple thyme with knees drawn up
By clasping of my little arms, and cheek Laid slant across them with obtruded nose And full eyes gazing . . . ay, my eyes climbed
up

Against the heated metal of thy shield
Till their persistent look clove through the fire And struck it into manifold fires (?)
And opened out the secret of the night Hid in the day-source Darkness mixed with
light.

Then shot innumerable arrows in my eyes 50 From all sides of the Heavens—so blinding
me—

As countless as the norland snowflakes fall
Before the north winds—rapid, wonderful, Some shafts as bright as sun rays none times
drawn

Thro' the heart of the sun—some black as night in Hell—

All mixed, sharp, driven against me! and as I gazed

(For I gazed still) I saw the sea and earth Leap up as wounded by the innumerable shafts
And hurry round, and whirl into a blot Across which evermore fell thick the shafts
As norland snow falls thick before the wind 60 (?flakes fall)

Until the northmen at the cavern's mouth Can see no pine tree through. I could see
nought,

No earth, no sea, no sky, no sun itself,
Only that arrowy rush of black and white Across a surf of rainbows infinite

Drove {piercing?? } and blinding and astonishing

And through it all Homerus the blind man Did chant his vowel'd music in my brain.
And then it was revealed, it was revealed That I should be a priest of the Unseen 70 And build a bridge of sound across the
straight

From Heaven to earth whence all the Gods might walk

Nor bend it with their soles (?)

And then I saw the Gods tread past me slow
From out the portals of the hungry dark

And each one as he past, breathed in my face And made me greater—First old Saturn came Blind with eternal watches—calm and blind—

Then Zeus—his eagle blinking on his wrist
To his hand's rod of fires—in thunder rolls }
He glode on grandly—While the troop of 80
Prayers

Buzzed dimly in the {mist } of his light shadow }
With murmurous sounds, and poor beseech-ing tears.

And Neptune with beard and locks drawn
straight

As seaweed—ay and Pluto with his Dark Cutting the dark as Lightning cuts the sun Made individual by intensity.

And then Apollo trenching on the dusk With a white glory, while the lute he bore Struck on the air. 90

JOAN OF ARC AND THE KINGFISHER

[This and the following ten fragments of verse are from MSS. in the autograph of Robert Browning which were included in the sale of the Browning Collections in 1913.
They are now printed for the first time, and they may be said to reveal the poet in historical, social, and humorous moods. The following lines were written as a motto for a picture painted by his son.]

Now, as she fain would bathe, one eventide,
—God's Maid, this Joan—from a pool's edge
she spied

That fair blue bird clowns call the Fisher
King: And "Las," sighed she, "my Liege is such a
thing
As thou, lord but of one poor lonely place Out of his whole wide France: were mine the
grace
To set my Dauphin free as thou, blue bird!"

"Joan of Arc," Canto I.

A SCENE IN THE BUILDING OF THE INQUISITORS AT ANTWERP

[Probably, like the last, a motto for a picture by his son.]

THEREFORE the hand of God Thy sentence with His finger Hath written, and this tribunal Consigneth it now straightway Unto the secular arm.

REPLY TO A TELEGRAPHIC GREETING

BANCROFT, the message-bearing wire Which flashes thy "All Hail" to-day, Moves slower than my heart's desire That, half what pen writes, tongue might say.

REPLIES TO CHALLENGES TO RHYME

IF ever you meet a rhinoceros
And a tree be in sight, Climb quick! for his might
Is a match for the gods: he could toss Eros!

HANG your kickshaws and your made-dishes Give me bread and cheese and radishes—Even stalish bread and baddish cheese.

YOU may at Pekin as at Poggibonsi, Instead of tricksy priest, a dodgy bonze see.

AH, massa! such a fiery oss
As him I rode at Timbuctoo!
Him would not suit a quiet boss!
Him kick, him rear, and him buck too!

VENUS, sea froth's child, Playing old gooseberry, Marries Lord Rosebery¹
To Miss de Rothschild!²

"HORNS make the buck" cried rash Burdett:
And then used speech befitting Timbuctoo:
"I would the horns of the creature met I' the belly o' the king and so made him buck

Baron Meyer de Rothschild, died 1890.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN FATHER AND DAUGHTER

F. THEN, what do you say to the poem of D. An out and out masterpiece—that's what it is, Pa!

THE DOGMA TRIUMPHANT

MISS ELIZABETH BARRETT BAR- RETT'S CRITICISMS ON SOME OF HER FUTURE HUSBAND'S POEMS (1845)

[From a MS., consisting of 56 pages, octavo, found among her papers and included in the sale of the Browning Collections, in 1913.
Some extracts were published in an article "Of the Browning MSS." by Sir Frederic G.
Kenyon, K. C. B., in the Cornhill Magazine, August 1913 (see page 1323).]

A SOUL'S TRAGEDY

One who don't forego—
The after-battle work—

Strictly speaking, is not "doesn't": the right abbreviation for only the third person? I don't—he doesn't. "Who won't go" you might say with accuracy, perhaps.

"Who's me"—it sounds awkward—
"what's I?" Yet I doubt altogether what fine part of the dialogue all this is. Would "what's me" sound less awkward? "What's me"—"it's man in me." Yes, I think it should be "what": for the relation of the
"it" afterwards.

Wast not enough that I must strive, I said
To grow so far familiar with all you As find and take some way to get you—which To do, an age seemed far too little.

There is something obscure, as it strikes me in the expression of this. "As to find" seems necessary to the construction. But "all you" (besides) appears to lead the thought from Eulalia, and you mean Eu-lalia—I think. The reader will doubt here, and have first and second thoughts

Nor missed a cloak from wardrobe, nor a dish from table

Why such a dragging line just here? An oversight, probably. The second "nor a" might drop out to advantage.

THE FLOWER'S NAME

But this—so surely this met her eye

Is it hypercritical to complain of the "this eye"? I seldom like the singular "eye" and then, when it is a Spanish eye! The line is not a great favourite of mine altogether—and the poem is—and you see the least speck on a Venice glass: and if it is "my fancy" at least I speak it off my mind and have done with it. The beauty and melody we never shall have done with . . . none of us.

Flower, you Spaniard, look you grow not.

I inquire if it should not be "look that you grow not."

Mind the pink shut mouth opens never.

A clogged line—is it not? Difficult to read.

Roses, are you so fair after all?

And I just ask whether to put it in the affirmative thus—

Roses, ye are not so fair after all, does not satisfy the ear and mind better? It is only asking, you know.

SIBRANDUS SCHAFNABURGENSIS

And under the arbutus and laurustine.

Are these pluralities quite correct? You know best. . . . And I doubt, at worst. If you wrote:

And under the arbutus and laurustine

it would seem to me a more consistent course . . . but I do not attempt even to decide.

Oh the droppings have played their tricks.

"Oh well have the droppings" you had written—and better written, I think.

While slowly our poor friend's leaves were swamping, Clasps cracking, and covers suppling.

Or query . . . "while clasps were cracking and covers suppling." A good deal is to be said for the abrupt expression of the "text" . . . but the other is safer . . . and less trusting the reader. You will judge. Do you know that this poem is a great favourite with me—it is so new, and full of a creeping, crawling grotesque life. Ah, but . . . do you know besides, it is almost reproachable in you to hold up John Knox to derision in this way!

THE BOY AND THE ANGEL

Morning, noon, eve and night.

Do you prefer this to Morning, evening, noon and night—for rhythm, I mean?

As if thy voice to-day.

I think you must have meant to write

As well as if thy voice to-day.

Not that the short lines are not good in their places.

In heaven God said "nor day nor night Brings one voice of my delight."

Taking this verse with the context, will you consider if "God said in heaven" is not of a simple and rather solemn intonation. The next line I do not like much. It might be more definite in meaning, I think.

Entered the empty cell

And played the craftsman well

Do you prefer to have short lines in this place, and why?

Then forth sprang Gabriel's wings, off fell
The flesh, remained the cell.

Is not something wrong here? If you mean that the flesh remained in the cell (named before), you do not say; and what else is said?

To the east with prayer he turned:
And in the angel burned.

I like and see plainly this burning in of the angel upon Theocrite as he looks to the east; but I doubt whether it will be as clear to all readers, you suggest it so very barely. Would not a touch or two improve the revelation? Do think.

Be again the boy all curled.

At any rate you will write "be then again" . . . will you not? But I doubt about the curled boy—any one "becurled" may be right—but a curled boy "tout rond" does strike me as of questionable correctness. Think, yourself. And I do ask you to think besides, whether a little dilation of the latter stanzas of this simple noble ballad would not increase the significance and effect of the whole. Readers will not see at a glance all you have cast into it, unless you make more surface—it is my impression, at least.

THE TOMB AT ST. PRAXED'S

Old Gandolf came me in, despite my care,
For a shrewd snatch, &c.

Is the "came me in" a correct expression . . . or, rather, does it express? . . . Does it not make the meaning hard to get at?

This is a wonderful poem, I think, and classes with those works of yours which show most power . . . most unquestionable genius in the high sense. You force your reader to sympathise positively in his glory in being buried! And what a grand passage that is, beginning—

And then, Lord, I shall lie through centuries
And hear the blessed mutter of the mass, &c.

THE LABORATORY

The soul from those strong grey eyes—say no.

Will you read this line with the context, and see if the rhythm is not perplexed in it?

Could I keep them but one half minute fixed, she'd fall.

Why not "she would fall"?

Not that I bid you spare her pain.

And the rhythm here! Is it well done that it should change?

But brush the dust off me, lest horror then springs.

The lest words are clogged, I think . . . and the expression seems forced.

ENGLAND IN ITALY. AUTUMN AT SORRENTO

While I lull you asleep till he's o'er With his black in the skies.

I don't like "he's o'er" much, or at all perhaps. There is something to me weak and un-sirocco-like in the two contractions. Would

Till he carries His black from the skies be more active?

'Twas time, for your long dry autumn.

I just doubt if "and dry" might not improve the rhythm—doubt. Only if the emphasis is properly administered to "long," nothing of course is wanted—only, again, it is trusting to the reader!

What was in store.

Surely "what change" or "what fate" or some additional word should assist the rhythm in this place. The line is broken and short.

Touch the strange lamps.

I do like all this living description—living description which never lived before in poetry, and now will live always. These fishes have suffered no earth-change, though they lie here so grotesquely plain between rhyme and rhyme. And the grave fisher too—and the children "brown as his shrimps"!

You see round his neck.

Why not "and you see round his neck" . . . for rhythm? The line stops you: and you need not stop, when you are looking at him, to "see round his neck."

The treading of the grapes is admirable painting—That "breathless he grows" so true to life—and the effort to "keep the grapes under"—all admirable.

Back to my side, etc.

Is not some word, some dissyllable (as if you were to write "back again," &c.) wanted for rhythm—reading it with the preceding line?

Ever some new head and breast of them.

Should it not be written "with ever some, etc."?

These mountains and their infinite movement are finely true.

How the soft plains they look on and love so As they would pretend Tower beneath them—(lower).

I do not see the construction. "Is lower" put here as a verb? and, if correctly, is it clearly, so put.

All's silent and grave.

Why not "all is silent and grave," without abbreviation? The rhythm gains by it, I think.

Greenly as ever.

Would not "as greenly as ever" take the rhythm on better?

Years cannot sever.

Quaere . . . "and years" or "For years."

Though the one breast high in the water Quaere . . . "bosom-high" for rhythm.

When shall we sail there together.

You have effaced . . . "Oh when shall we." But the exclamation seems wanted for rhythm and expression—does it not?

Oh to sail round them, close over The line is broken, I think. Should it not either be

And oh, to sail round them,
or
Oh, to sail round and round them?

That ruffle the grey sea-water.

Why not "The grey ocean water" for rhythm?
All beautiful description.

The square black tower on the largest.

Did you write "built on the largest" because the eternal rhythm? How tired you are! as you said once to me.

Strikes the great gloom.

For clearness, the personal pronoun is wanted, I fancy. What "strikes"?

And now come out, you best one.

Quære, if it would not be well to repeat the "come out"—

And now come out, come out, &c.
The priests mean to stamp. (stomp). R. B.

But is this word "stamp," and is it to rhyme to "pomp." I object to that rhyme—I!!

I think it will strike you, when you come to finish this unfinished poem, that all the rushing and hurrying life of the descriptions of it, tossed in one upon another like the grape bunches in the early part, and not "kept under" by ever so much breathless effort on the poet's part, can be very little adapted to send anybody to sleep . . . even if there were no regular dinner in the middle of it all.
Do consider. For giving the sense of Italy, it is worth a whole library of travel-books.

ITALY IN ENGLAND

A serene, noble poem this is—an heroic repose in it—but nothing to imagine queries out of, with whatever good will. I like the simplicity of the great-heartedness of it (though perhaps half Saxon in character), with the Italian scenery all round—it is very impressive.

I would grasp Metternich until I felt his throat, and had my will.

After all the abjuring of queries, . . . is not "had my will" a little wrong?—I would what I would. There is a weakness in the expression. Is there not?

PICTOR IGNOTUS—FLORENCE

like a thunder sunk
To the centre of an instant.

Is there not something obscure in the expression? And it is all so fine here, that you should let the reader stand up as straight as he can to look round.

Or rapture drooped her eyes as when her brood Pulled down the nesting dove's heart to its place.

A most exquisite image, and perfect in the expression of it, I think.

Ever new hearts made beat and bosoms swell.

The construction seems to be entangled a little by this line; and the reader pauses, he clears meaning to himself. Why not clear it for him by writing the line thus, for instance?—

New hearts being made to beat, and breasts to swell.

Or something better which will strike you.
Will you consider?

And thus to reach my home, where Age should greet.

Should you not write it. . . . "Of reaching thus my home," &c.? The construction taking you back to what he dreamed of—first he dreamed "of going," and then "of reaching" his home, &c.—

And then not go to heaven, &c.

Fine, all this!

These men may buy us, sell us, &c.

Meaning pictures, by "us." But the reader cannot see it until afterwards, and gets confused. Is it not so? And, moreover, I do think that by a touch or two you might give a clearer effect to the previous verses about the "gibing," &c. This poem is so fine, so full of power, as to claim every possible attention to the working of it; it begins greatly, grandly, and ends so—the winding up winds up the soul in it. The versification too, is noble—and altogether it classes with your finest poems of the length. Does it not in your own mind? I cannot tell you how much it impresses mine.

THE CONFESSIONAL

With love and truth his brow was bright.

Looked bright—seemed so—should it not be,
for the meaning?

And lo!—there, smiled the father's face.

You know the best, of course; but to me, it seems strange that she should have seen "the father's face" at all in the shadow of that scaffold.

definitely? And the rhythm cries aloud for it, it seems to me.

The vast, upright—

Quaere—"the upright" . . . for rhythm?

Then a sunbeam burst thro' the blind tent-roof Showed Saul.

Now, will you think whether to enforce the admirable effect of your sudden sunbeam, this first line should not be rendered more rapid by the removal of the clogging epithet "blind"—which you repeat, too, I believe, farther on in the next page. What if you tried the line thus—

Then a sunbeam that burst through the tent-roof—
Showed Saul!

The manifestation in the short line appears to me completer, from the rapidity being increased in the long one. I only ask—It is simply an impression—I have told you how very fine I do think all this showing of Saul by the sunbeam—and how the more you come to see him, the finer it is. The "All heavily hangs," as applied to the king-serpent, you quite feel in your muscles.

PART II

The breaking of the band of lilies round the harp is a relief and refreshment in itself after that dreadful sight. And then how beautifully true it is that the song should begin so . . . with the sheep—

As one after one
Docile they come to the pen-door.

But the rhythm should not interrupt itself where the sheep come docilely—and is not a word wanted . . . a syllable rather . . . before that "Docile." Will you consider?

"The long grasses stifling the water."
How beautiful that is!

One after one seeks its lodging
As star follows star
Into the blue far above us,
—So blue and so far!

It appears to me that the two long lines require a syllable each at the beginning, to keep the procession of sheep uninterrupted. The ear expects to read every long and short line in the sequence of this metre as one long line. And where it cannot do so, a loss . . . an abruption . . . is felt—and there should be nothing abrupt in the movement of these pastoral, starry images. Do you think so? Is it not Goethe who compares the stars to sheep? Which you reverse here

PART III

Would we might help thee, my brother?

Why not "Oh, would," &c.—it throws a wail into the line, and swells the rhythm rightly, I think.

Next she whom we count
The beauty, the pride of our dwelling.

Why not "For the beauty"—or "As the beauty"?

But I stopped—for here, in the darkness
Saul groaned.

Very fine—and the preceding images full of beauty and characteristic life!—but in this long line, I just ask if the rhythm would gain by repeating "here" . . . thus—

But I stop here—for here in the darkness—
I just ask, being doubtful.

And the shaking of the tent from the shudder of the King. . . . What effect it all has!—and I like the jewels waking in his turban!

So the head—but the body stirred not.

If you wrote "So the head—but the body . . . that stirred not." Just see the context.

PART IV

The water was wont to go warbling
Softly and well.

Is not a syllable wanted at the beginning of the short line, to make the water warble softly . . . "right softly"?

And heard her faint tongue
Join in, while it could, to the witness.

Would "Joining in" be better to the ear?

And promise and wealth for the future.

I think you meant to write "the" before promise.

All I said about the poem in my note, I think more and more. Full of power and beauty it is,—and the conception, very striking.

E. B. B.

LURIA

ACT I, SCENE I

And vaunted Luria, Luria, who but he?

Whom but him—is it not?

This Moor of the bad faith, etc.

You say afterwards "The boy" and "the stranger." Why not "This boy" and "this stranger" to carry forward the emphasis?

Which pass not, to yourself no question put.

You are fond of that absolute construction—but I think that sometimes it makes the meaning a little doubtful, and here there is some weakness from the inversion—you simply mean to say—"Which, do not pass without consideration." Then, the "put" is a bad word at all times to my ear.

Who think themselves your lords, such slaves art they?

Do you gain anything by the inversion? If you write "They are such slaves," do you not on the contrary gain in force of opposition, propriety of accent, and directness?

If as you bid this sentence they pronounce.

I cease to protest against the frequent inversions. Why not simply

If they pronounce this sentence as you bid?

Is there an objection? And it gives the effect, I think, of more impulse to these noble lines.

From the adoring army at his back

Query—from that adoring.
How I like

That thin flitting instantaneous steel Against the blind bull front of a brute-force world?

It is a noble, expressive figure.

The description of Luria, too, admirable, or more. The "bared black arms held out into the sun from the tent opening"—what a picture!—and the laugh when the horse drops his forage—one knows Luria from henceforth.

Finely characteristic, the "You too have thought that."

Bury it . . . so I write the Signory.

I think you ought to have the preposition, either by "Bury it . . . write I to the Signory," or by putting the "to" into the text as it is, which would not ruffle the line too much.

And yet renounce the same, its hour gone by.

This eloquence of Braccio should be quite uninvolved—now should it not?—the connection of the two different sentences run clearly. Why not without the inversion?

Have ever proved too much for Florentines Even for the best and bravest of ourselves—
If in the struggle, when the soldier's sword
Before the statish hand should sink its point,

And to the calm head, yield, the violent hand,
Virtue on virtue still have fallen away
Before ambition—

By shifting a few of the unimportant words so, you make it clear to run and read. And then by this shifting, you escape a rather questionable-looking opposition of "after" and "before," in "If virtue after virtue still have fallen before ambition."

So shall in him rebellion be less guilt,
And punishment for me the easier task.

I propose, still without the inversion—

So shall rebellion be less guilt in him,
And punishment the easier task for me.

Is not the emphasis better marked so?

Even these reasons while I urge them most—

This sounds to my ear numerically a weak line—this setting of "Even" as a dissyllable to open a line. "Why, even these reasons while I urge them most" would seem to give more freedom—Will you ring it, and later?

And which it took for earnest, &c.

Did you mean to write "All which"?
A slip of the pen perhaps?

Florence, to feel, in someone over me.

I quite understand—but the construction is not clear notwithstanding. A word will do it. And how fine and joyous and generous all this is of Luria! And this turning (afterwards) from the east's "drear vastness," and the acclimating of his soul to the west . . . noble it is, as he spoke it.

Yes, and how worth note, the truly great ones.

If you put "that those same great ones," you make it clearer. To apprehend the construction at once, the reader seeks a "that," it seems to me. The thought is excellent.

Convinces me . . . no child's play was the past.

Now if you wrote straightforwardly "Convinces me the past was no child's play"—is there an objection? Because there is a "most say" in the next line which occupies the precisely corresponding place to "child's play" and, so, jingles. Or is it a mere fancy of mine? And then, where nothing is gained by an inversion, the simpler form seems better.

Now make the duplicate, if this should fail,

Query, ". . . lest this should fail"?

"So plays,"—

Is the connection clear? Or the meaning even? Do you mean "So in plays." . . . "It is so in plays." But then you set your readers thinking . . . or rather looking through the dictionary.

ACT II

Well, Florence, shall I reach thee, pierce thy heart Thro' all the safeguards, pass 'twixt all the
"play
Of arrowy wiles.

Does it not look, at least, like a confusion of metaphor? Though a person may be defended from a dagger, for instance, by a shower of arrows preventing the approach of an assassin, still it would simplify it, if you made the means of defence the sevenfold of a shield, or the subtle linkings of a mail. Is it worth a consideration?

Nor man's device, nor heaven to keep in mind
The wickedness forgot too soon.

Might it be written

Nor man's device, nor heaven's pure memory
Of wickedness forgot on earth too soon But thy own heart, 'tis Hell, I trust, and thee
That firm thou keep, &c.

I do not understand exactly—" 'tis Hell and thee."—If you wrote

It is for hell and thee

To keep thy first course firmly to the end, that would be clear—but would it be as you desire?

And this wild mass of rage that I prepare,
Luria, to launch against thee.

Do observe that this line and a half seem to have fallen down from the height of the argument into a strange place. It is a distracted construction . . . a little. Would it be straighter to be more coherent, if you wrote it somewhat thus:

turn aside

For gratitude a single step, or shame . . .
Grace thou this Luria, . . . this wild mass of rage

I now prepare to launch against thyself, . . .
With other payment.

For the expected wreath the strange blow came

Query—

The strange blow came for the expected wreath.

When Florence on plain fact pronouncing so Could to such actions such an end decree—for mort le mort.

Tell me if an air of stiffness is not given by such unnecessary inversions. You throw important words, too, at arm's length from their emphasis by it in this instance. Query—

Could judge such actions worthy of such an end.

not one

Possible way of getting his fair fame.

If you repeat "one,"

not one

One possible way of getting his fair fame;

you strengthen the line, do you not? It seems a willowy line otherwise.

Devoted brows are to be crowned no longer Whom the smile paid, or word of praise, so
well.

It is not clear—will not be to the reader, I think—and a word or two more will ensure the desired purpose.

And, either way the fight's event he keeps.

It would be clearer and more unquestionable if you wrote it, perhaps.

And, let the fight end either way, he keeps.

This is the pettiest, paltriest, criticism of straws! But just these straws hide the path, with you, sometimes.

Pisa's last safeguard, all to intercept
The rage of her implacablest of foes From Pisa.

Does the construction seem clear to yourself? Give us a little light.

Therefore should the preponderating gift Of love and trust Florence was first to throw, Made you her own not Pisa's, void the scale.

I dare to propose "Which made you her own not Pisa's, void the scale," because without it, the thread of meaning gets entangled.

And after all you will look gallantly Found dead here with that letter in your

breast.

Very fine all this. I infinitely admire the whole interview between Luria and Fiburzio—nothing can be nobler. And the suppressed emotion tells.

That as they know my deeds, with me they deal.

Why not "That as they know my deeds they deal with me"?

Oh this Luria! how great he is.
The palm trees and the pyramid o'er all. . .

Don't coop up such a wide desert line by the contracted "o'er," jingling with "all" too. There is room for "over all" surely, said out broadly.

Treachery even—that such an one say.

The line seems to want strengthening by another syllable—"Of treachery even. . . ?" I only ask.

ACT III

No, did this urge me, that if judge I must.

You will wonder when I complain of darkness here—but certainly it is doubtfully worded—"Nor did this urge me."

Each knowledge that broke through a heart to life,

Each reasoning it cost a brain to yield.

A noble first line and thought! And should you not interpose a word in the second? . . . "Each reasoning that it cost," &c., or if you wrote. . . "Each reasoning which to work out, cost a brain." Oh, it is only that the second line appears to sound feebly in comparison with the great thing it has to say, and also with the great line preceding it in utterance. And then I write down what comes into my head. Braccio's justification of Florence is (for the rest) very subtle and noble—one half forgives Braccio in it.

Who did the several acts yourselves gave names.

You mean "Gave names to." Then why not say "yourselves have named"? For clearness.

He goes on like the brute he is against It falls before him, or he dies in his course.

Did you mean to write "against," and not rather "until"? The interest is carried nobly on through this act. Poor Luria!

ACT IV

Just where you left them blacks and whites you'll find.

Why not, O you inverter?—

You'll find just where you left them, blacks and whites.

I like the thought so much.

Your tricks with me too well succeed for that.

Query—Your tricks succeed with me too well for that?

Is there an objection?

Duty to do O have I, and faith to keep.

Query—"Duty O have I to do." Puccio speaks admirably yet like a soldier.

Set for your heart on stoutness ne'er so firm.

Which line I do not very much like. I don't like a firm stoutness, or a heart set firmly on stoutness . . . read it any way, and I set about objections.

Far too plain

Souls show themselves for men to choose and read.

It seems to me that the whole of this passage is somewhat diffusely given, and not distinctly. If this soul-reading is so easily achievable by boys, is it a consequence that Luria should be read wrong? Will you look and raise your wand once?

How thinkest thou? I have turned on them their arms.

Is there an objection to making this clear by repeating the word "light"?

I have turned their light on them.

Then in the next line—

A transient thing was this our thirst of war.

If you wrote "They called our thirst of war a transient thing," you allow the reader to see at a glance what otherwise he will seek studiously. And so worthy of all admiration it is, this discourse of Husein's with his true doctrine, that "all work is fighting."

I proclaim

The angel in thee and reject the sprites.

A fine expression—the first; but why not write "spirits" at length?

Above them which still safelier bids them live.

Not a very favourite line perhaps of mine—but the "weaklier" must stand so near it, anyway. See below.

The word "break" too ends two several lines. My belief is that the whole passage will strike you as diffused and that you will teach it to coil up gathering strength. Domizia speaks her speech for the rest eloquently and well—she has her side of truth like the rest—and one feels for poor Luria so much the more—"Tis well for them to see—but him?" Poor Luria, how great and benignant in circumstances which makes misanthropes of other men! It is very fine . . . all to the end.

ACT V

Even affects the other course to choose.

I do not like the lines which begin "Even," making a dissyllable of it; they sound weak to me. But there is an objection here besides, because . . . observe the meaning . . . you do not mean to say "it even affects the other course," &c., but that "It affects even the other course," &c. Do you see? I am always making that mistake myself, and everybody makes it . . . but there is a right and a wrong way after all. If you wrote "affects the other course even, left to choose" or "Affects even the other course we have to choose"—see?—I admire the dialogue here. It is suggestive and full besides.

And having disbelieved your innocence
How can she trust your magnanimity?

True and overcoming . . . and put so excellently well. The suggested pathos of this situation . . . how deep it is! Poor great Luria! I feel that I ought not to be able to count the trefoil when lifted to the summit of a mountain. But I do not like that little ending word to Puccio's speech, "You bid." "Bid"—the accent on "bid." Won't you say "you bid me," at least?

Being the thrice chivalric soul we know.

Is there an objection to saying . . . "He being the," &c., because there seems a weakness otherwise—to the ear, I mean.

As greater now who better still hath been.

Why not . . . "As greater now who hath been better still?" It is more natural, more clear, less stiff perhaps.

God's finger marks distinction all so fine, &c.

I admire this excellent true thought, which cannot be said better nor clearer.

Whose lambent play so all innocuous seemed.

Or . . . "Whose lambent play seemed so innocuous." Why object to natural sequence of words?

The everlasting minute of creation Arrested.

Fine, that is. But I do not see what business "arrested" has—it darkens. I fancy "suspended" might convey the thought—might it not? But perhaps neither word is needed.

The play ends nobly, bearing itself up to its own height to the last . . . and leaving an impression which must be an emotion with all readers. Do think that just my first thoughts have been set down in these notes, and take them at their worth—or no-worth.

ROBERT BROWNING'S ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS CONCERNING SOME OF HIS POEMS¹

By A. Allen Brockington

IN the early days of 1888 a club, styled
March 1914.

"The Day's End Club," was formed in the city of Exeter, to study contemporary literature.

On February 18, 1889, a member read to the Club six of Robert Browning's shorter poems. He had paraphrased some, and his reading and notes provoked much discussion. The Rev. Sackville A. Berkeley, who had become acquainted with Browning at Oxford, offered to write to the poet, and state the difficulties of the members.

Answering the questions Browning wrote:

"I am delighted that you remember me, and have interest enough in my writings to put the questions concerning them which you obligingly do: I suppose the readiest way of answer will be to return them with what explanations occur to me duly appended."

This letter, dated February 22, 1889, was written at 29 De Vere Gardens. Though Browning was within a few months of his death at this time, the handwriting shows no trace of weakness. It is as firm and characteristic as in those of his earlier life.

The following is a copy of the paper. The poet's answers are italicised.

QUERIES

My Last Duchess

Was she in fact shallow and easily and equally well pleased with any favour: or did the Duke so describe her as a supercilious cover to real and well justified jealousy?

As an excuse—mainly to himself—for taking revenge on one who had unwittingly wounded his absurdly pretentious vanity, by failing to recognise his superiority in even the most trifling matters.

"Frà Pandolf by design":
By what design?

To have some occasion for telling the story, and illustrating part of it.

In a Gondola

Was she true, or in the conspiracy?

Out of it.

Earth's Immortalities

"Love":

Is the refrain—" (Love me for ever) " cynical, or sad, or trustful?

A mournful comment on the short duration of the conventional "For Ever!"

Parting at Morning

"And the need of a world of men for me":

Is this an expression by her of her sense of loss of him, or the despairing cry of a ruined woman?

Neither: it is his confession of how fleeting is the belief (implied in the first part) that such raptures are self-sufficient and enduring—as for the time they appear.

The question concerning "Parting at Morning" expresses a difficulty that has been felt by many readers. Indeed one would hardly conclude that Browning referred to the "Sun" in the third line:

And straight was a path of gold for him.

In the preface to his Selections published in 1872, Browning says:

A few years ago, had such opportunity presented itself, I might have been tempted to say a word in reply to the objections my poetry was used to encounter. Time has kindly co-operated with my disinclination to write the poetry and the criticism besides. The readers I am at last privileged to expect meet me fully half-way; and if, from the fitting stand-point, they must still "censure me in their wisdom," they have previously "awakened their senses that they may the better judge." Nor do I apprehend any more charges of being wilfully obscure, unconsciously careless, or perversely harsh.

The passages which follow will explain the questions and answers which were given by the poet.

MY LAST DUCHESS

Ferrara

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall, Looking as if she were alive. I call

That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's hands

Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Will't please you sit and look at her? I said

"Frà Pandolf" by design: for never read

Strangers like you that pictured countenance,

The depth and passion of its earnest glance,

But to myself they turned (since none put by The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)

And seemed as they would ask me, if they

durst,

How such a glance came there; so, not the first

Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not

Her husband's presence only, called that spot

Of joy into the Duchess' cheek:

. . . . She thanked men—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked

My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name

With anybody's gift.

EARTH'S IMMORTALITIES

Love

So the year's done with!

20

(Love me for ever!)

All March begun with,

April's endeavour;

May-wreaths that bound me

June needs must sever;

Now snows fall round me,

Quenching June's fever—

(Love me for ever!)

Round the cape of a sudden came the sea,

And the sun looked over the mountain's rim: 30

And straight was a path of gold for him,

And the need of a world of men for me.

 A Rabbi told me: On the day allowed, 1187
 A simple ring with a single stone, 1295
 Ah, but — because you were struck blind, 1271
 Ah, but how each loved each, Marquis! 1198
 Ah, did you once see Shelley plain, 258 Ah, George Bubb Dodington Lord Melcombe,
 — no, 1259
 Ah, Love, but a day, 487
 Ah, the bird-like fluting, 1308
 All I believed is true! 338
 All I can say is — I saw it! 1071
 All June I bound the rose in sheaves, 252
 All service ranks the same with God, 176 All's over, then: does truth sound bitter, 227
 All that I know, 245 All the breath and the bloom of the year in the bag of one bee: 1295
 Among these latter busts we count by scores, 371
 And so you found that poor room dull, 1074
 "And what might that bold man's announcement be," 1222
 Anyhow, once full Dervish, youngsters came, 1219 Ask I ride, as I ride, 221
 Ask not one least word of praise, 1233
 "As like as a Hand to another Hand!" 490
 At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-time 1317
 "Ay, but Ferishtah," — a disciple smirked, 1231 Ay, this same midnight, by this chair of mine, 1246 Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead! 229 Boot, saddle, to horse, and away! 219
 But do not let us quarrel any more, 451
 But give them me, the mouth, the eyes, the brow!
 517 Christ God who savest man, save most, 334 Cleon the poet (from the sprinkled isles, 467
 Could I but live again, 1070
 Crescenzo, the Pope's Legate at the High Council, Trent, 1298
 Dared and Done at last I stand upon the summit, 1122
 Dear and great Angel, wouldst thou only leave, 257
 Dear, had the world in its caprice, 254 Dervish — (though yet un-dervished, call him 80, 1217
 Don, the divinest women that have walked, 1251
 Escape me? 254
 "Fame!" Yes, I said it and you read it, 1133
 Fear death? — to feel the fog in my throat, 516 Fee, faw, fum! bubble and squeak! 360
 Fire is in the flint: true, once a spark escapes, 1224 First I salute this soil of the blessed, river and rock! 1156
 Flower — I never fancied, jewel — I profess you!
 1072 Fortù, Fortù, my beloved one, 343 Frowned the Laird on the Lord: "So, red-handed I catch thee?" 1300 Give her but a least excuse to love me! 185
 Going his rounds one day in Ispahan, 1218
 Good to forgive, 1122
 Grand rough old Martin Luther, 351 Grow old along with me! 501 Gr-r-r — there go, my heart's abhorrence! 224 Had I but plenty of money, money enough and to spare, 232 Hamelin Town's in Brunswick, 353
 Heap cassia, sandal-buds and stripes, 48 He was the man — Pope Sixtus, that Fifth, that swineherd's son, 1200
 "Heigho!" yawned one day King Francis, 339 Here is a story shall stir you! Stand up, Greeks dead and gone, 1173 Here is a thing that happened. Like wild beasts whelped, for den, 1158
 Here's my case. Of old I used to love him, 1071
 Here's the garden she walked across, 222
 Here's to Nelson's memory! 222
 Here was I with my arm and heart, 497 High in the dome, suspended, of Hell, sad triumph, behold us! 1200
 Hist, but a word, fair and soft! 250
 How I lived, ere my human life began, 1314
 How of his fate, the Pilgrims' soldier-guide, 1226 How strange! — but, first of all, the little fact, 1277
 How very hard it is to be, 428
 How well I know what I mean to do, 245
 I and Clive were friends — and why not?
 Friends! I think you laugh, my lad, 1174
 I am a goddess of the ambrosial courts, 440
 I am a painter who cannot paint, 184
 I am indeed the personage you know, 1078
 I am poor brother Lippo, by your leave! 446
 I could have painted pictures like that youth's, 445
 I dream of a red-rose tree, 256
 I hear a voice, perchance I heard, 28
 I know a Mount, the gracious Sun perceives, 471
 I know there shall dawn a day, 1315
 I leaned on the turf, 488
 I — "Next Poet?" No, my hearties, 1066
 I only knew one poet in my life, 438
 I said — Then, dearest, since 'tis so, 352
 I send my heart up to thee, all my heart, 346
 I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris, and he, 220
 I've a Friend, over the sea, 341
 I will be happy if but for once, 1294
 I will be quiet and talk with you, 488
 I wish that when you died last May, 516
 I wonder do you feel to-day, 250
 If a stranger passed the tent of Hósey, he cried
 "A chur's!" 1178
 If one could have that little head of hers, 518

If you and I could change to beasts, what beast should either be? 1295
Is all our fire of shipwreck wood, 487
It happened thus: my slab, though new, 1297
It is a lie — their Priests, their Pope, 226
It once might have been, once only 577
It seems as if . . . or did the actual chance, 1256
It was roses, roses, all the way, 333

June was not over, 252
Just for a handful of silver he left us, 220

Karshish, the picker-up of learning's crumbs, 441
Kentish Sir Byng stood for his King, 210
King Charles, and who'll do him right now? 210
"Knowledge deposed, then!" — groaned whom that most grieved, 1232

Last night I saw you in my sleep, 1296
Let them fight it out, friend! things have gone too far, 256
Let's contend no more, Love, 228
Let us begin and carry up this corpse, 366
"Look, I strew beans," 1234

Man I am and man would be, Love — merest man and nothing more, 1222
May I print, Shelley, how it came to pass, 1083
Morning, evening, noon and night, 336
Moses the Meek was thirty cubits high, 1214
My father was a scholar and knew Greek, 1312
My first thought was, he lied in every word, 375 My grandfather says he remembers he saw, when a youngster long ago, 1153
My heart sank with our Claret-flask, 222
My love, this is the bitterest, that thou, 249

Nay but you, who do not love her, 228
Nay, that, Furini, never I at least, 1264 Never any more, 255
Never the time and the place, 1215
Nobly, nobly Cape Saint Vincent to the Northwest died away, 239
"No, boy, we must not" — so began, 1086
No, for I'll save it! Seven years since, 538 No more wine? then we'll push back chairs and
talk, 456
No protesting, dearest! 1075
Not with my Soul, Love! — bid no Soul like
mine, 1237
Now, don't, sir! Don't expose me! Just this
once! 510
Now that I, tying thy glass mask tightly, 225

O the old wall here! How I could pass, 1060
O worthy of belief I hold it was, 1191
Of the million or two, more or less, 337
Oh but it is not hard, Dear? 1109 Oh Galuppi, Baldassaro, this is very sad to
find! 233
Oh, good gigantic smile o' the brown old earth, 490 Oh, Love — no, Love! All the noise below,
Love, 1240
Oh, the beautiful girl, too white, 491
Oh, to be in England, 230
Oh, what a dawn of day! 230
Once I saw a chemist take a pinch of powder, 1220
On the first of the Feast of Feasts, 539 On the sea and at the Hogue, sixteen hundred ninety-two, 1076
One day it thundered and lightened, 1200
Only the prism's obstructions shows aright, 516

Others may need new life in Heaven, 1295
Out of the little chapel I burst, 415
Out of your whole life give but a moment! 1294 Overhead the tree-tops meet, 193
Over the hall of it, 1070
Over the sea our galleys went, 51

Petrus Aponensis — there was a magician! 1180
Plague take all your pedants, say I! 223
Pray, Reader, have you eaten ortolans, 1217

Query: was ever a quainter, 1060
Quoth an inquirer, "Praise the Merciful! 1224 Quoth one: "Sir, solve a scruple! No true sage, 1228

Room after room, 254
Round the cape of a sudden came the sea, 228
Round us the wild creatures, overhead the trees, 1218

Said Abner, "At last thou art come! Ere I tell, ere thou speak, 239
Savage I was sitting in my house, late, 974
See, as the prettiest graves will do in time, 227
Shall I sonnet sing you about myself? 1068
She should never have looked at me, 226
Sing me a hero! Quench my thirst, 1166
So far as our story approaches the end, 351
So, friend, your shop was all your house! 1068
So, I shall see her in three days, 254
"So say the foolish!" Say the foolish so, Love?
1295

So, the head aches and the limbs are faint, 1226
So, the three Court-ladies began, 1298
So, the year's done with! 228 Solomon King of the Jews and the Queen of Sheba Balkis, 1197
Some people hang portraits up, 518
Stand still, true poet that you are! 258 Still ailing, Wind? Wilt be appeased or no?
489
Still you stand, still you listen, still you smile! 1072
Stop, let me have the truth of that! 405 Stop playing, poet! May a brother speak? 438 Stop rowing! This one of our bye-cannals, 1301
Such a starved bank of moss, 1133
Suppose that we part (work done, comes play), 1215 [Supposed of Pamphylax the Antiochene, 503

Take the cloak from his face, and at first, 257
That fawn-skin-dappled hair of hers, 253
That second time they hunted me, 342
That's my last Duchess painted on the wall, 334
That was I, you heard last night, 251
The fancy I had to-day, 932
The grey sea and the long black land, 228
The Lord, we look to once for all, 368
The morn when first it thunders in March, 233
"The Poet's age is sad: for why?" 1293
"The poets pour us wine —" 1091
The rain set early in to-night, 375
The swallow has set her six young on the rail, 487
The year's at the spring, 180
There is nothing to remember in me, 491 There's a palace in Florence, the world knows
well, 372
There's a woman like a dewdrop, 292
There's heaven above, and night by night, 445
There they are, my fifty men and women, 472
"They tell me, your carpenters," quoth I to my friend the Russ, 1150
This is a spray the Bird clung to, 251

- This now, this other story makes amends, 1202
 This strange thing happened to a painter once, 1304
 This was my dream: I saw a Forest, 1207
 Thus the Mayne glideth, 50
 Touch him ne'er so lightly, into song he broke, 1103
 'Twas Bedford Special Assize, one daft Midsum-mer's Day, 1166
- Up jumped Tokay on our table, 222
- Vanity, saith the preacher, vanity! 454 Verse-making was least of my virtues: I viewed with despair, 1230
- Wanting is — what? 1104
 We two stood simply friend-like side by side, 1297
 We were two lovers; let me lie by her, 1072
 What a pretty tale you told me, 1151
 What girl but, having gathered flowers, 1295
 What, he on whom our voice unanimously ran, 1299
 What, I disturb thee at thy morning-meal, 1229
 What is he buzzing in my ears? 516
 What it was struck the terror into me? 1310
- What's become of Waring, 348
 When I vexed you and you chid me, 1228
 When these parts Tiberius, — not yet Cæsar, — travelled, 1187
 Where the quiet-coloured end of evening smiles, 229
 "Why from the world," Ferishtah smiled,
 "should thanks," 1240
 "Will sprawl, now that the heat of day is best, 512
 Will you hear my story also, 1194
 Wish no word unspoken, want no look away!
 1219
 Woe, he went galloping into the war, 1294
 Would it were I had been false, not you! 493 Would that the structure brave, the manifold music I build, 499
- Yet womanhood you reverence, 1301
 "You are sick, that's sure" — they say, 1173
 You blame me that I ran away? 1301
 You groped your way across my room i' the drear dark dead of night, 1220
 You in the flesh and here, 1296
 You know, we French stormed Ratisbon, 333
 Your ghost will walk, you lover of trees, 238 You'll love me yet! — and I can tarry, 191 You're my friend, 356
